(b) Public service will be improved by the greater flexibility and business orientation of a corporate structure and through the direct management labour interaction referred to in (a) above.

2. Yes, in so far as the government can anticipate the conversion from department to Crown corporation.

3. As a Crown corporation the Post Office remains accountable to Parliament through a responsible minister.

4. The Post Office remains an instrument of government policy and as such is accountable to Parliament and cabinet.

STATISTICS CANADA—EMPLOYMENT SURVEY DEVELOPMENT PROJECT

Question No. 943—Mr. MacKay:

With reference to Statistics Canada's Employment Survey Development Project (ESDP), initiated in 1976 after the publication of articles by Wayne Cheveldayoff in The Globe and Mail, questioning the accuracy of the labour income and certain other components of GNP, what is (a) the present status of the project (b) its planned completion date (c) its costs to date, including manpower, office accommodation, etc. (d) its planned costs upon completion (e) its interim findings as to the accuracy of the labour income component of GNP (f) the effect of the resignation of its long-standing head, Mrs. M. Cottrell-Boyd?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): Statistics Canada reports:

(a) Present Status of Project

Presently the ESDP is in the process of developing and implementing the results of a field test conducted in January and February of 1980. Based upon an evaluation of this test, decisions have been made upon the final content, methodology and processing system to be used for the new survey.

(b) Planned Completion Date

The intention is to begin the new survey of employment, payrolls and hours in April of 1981. The objective ot the early months of the survey will be a gradual build-up of the sample size, to a full complement of about 600,000 reporting unities, as a means of establishing a smooth running operational system. Coincidentally, it is intended to produce estimates from the new survey which can be used for comparisons with the estimates of the present surveys, resulting in linkage to existing data and preventing a discontinuity in the time series. During the latter part of 1981, it is planned to have the full sample in place, estimates produced and linkage of estimates between present and new surveys accomplished. The present surveys should terminate in March of 1982, when the new survey will become the official measure of employment, payrolls and hours.

(c) Cost to Date

The Employment Survey Development Project began in April of 1976. The cost by fiscal year since that time up to and including the 1979/80 fiscal year are as follows:

1979/80	$	1,111,000

(d) Planned costs upon completion

The budget for the 1980/81 fiscal year is approximately $1,560,000 and for 1981/82 the costs are $3,910,000. An estimated ESDP final cost is shown below.

1981/82	$3,910,000

The continuing budget for the survey, once it is in full operation, will be about $4,500,000 per year.

(e) There are no interim data available yet from the survey which are sufficiently comprehensive to allow for an estimation. Furthermore, the objectives of the ESDP were not to produce or evaluate labour income estimates for GNP, but rather to produce earnings data, with greater timeliness, reduced respondent burden and at least equivalent quality as at present, for all sizes of firms in all sectors of the economy. The new employment, payrolls and hours survey will not estimate total labour income but only the wages and salaries portion of it. A comprehensive evaluation from the new employment, payrolls and hours survey will be available in 1982.

(f) Departure of Project Manager

A new manager for the ESDP has been appointed, and at no time was the project without a manager. Other than normal learning periods and minor changes in managerial style, the change in project manager is expected to have little impact.

STATISTICS CANADA

Question No. 1,317—Mr. Cossitt:

Was the jurisdiction for Statistics Canada transferred to the Minister of Supply and Services and, if so, what is a detailed explanation of the rationale behind the transfer?

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): The jurisdiction for Statistics Canada was transferred by order in council on Friday. June 13, 1980, from the Hon. Donald Johnston, President of the Treasury Board to the Hon. Jean-Jacques Blais, Minister of Supply and Services. This transfer was done in the interest of improved efficiency and effectiveness of the government. The service orientation of the DSS is well suited to the fundamental purpose of Statistics Canada while in the previous instance there could be a potential or perceived conflict of interest between the minister's portfolio responsibility and Statistics Canada.

Question No. 1,444—Mr. Crosby:

1. How many prisoners were transferred to Dorchester Penitentiary, New Brunswick, in relation to the closing of the British Columbia Penitentiary and what is a breakdown of the prisoners transferred from the British Columbia Penitentiary to other maximum security institutions?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): By the Ministry of the Solicitor General: In so far as The Correctional Service of Canada is concerned:

RECEIVER GENERAL OF CANADA—CHEQUES RECEIVED FROM THE CHIEF ELECTORAL OFFICER

Question No. 1,510—Mr. Cossitt:

1. How many cheques in the amount of $200 representing deposits by candidates contesting the general election of February 18, 1980, did the Receiver General of Canada receive from the Chief Electoral Officer?

2. How many of the cheques were returned to those who issued them and how many were retained by the Receiver General for various reasons?

3. What was the total sum of money in the hands of the Receiver General at any time for the general election and was this money in any way invested and (a) if so, what was the rate and the amount of interest received (b) if not, for what reason?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): 1. Fifteen hundred and one (1,501) cheques of $200 each representing deposits by candidates contesting the general election of February 18, 1980 were deposited to the credit of the Receiver General for Canada.

2. None of the cheques were returned to those who issued them but refunds have been paid by the Receiver General to 651 candidates, leaving a balance of 850 cheques for which refunds will not be made.

3. The total sum of money in the hands of the Receiver General at any time, pertaining to the deposits by candidates contesting the general election of February 18, 1980, was $300,200 of which $130,200 has been refunded. These funds then became part of the balances of the Receiver General, almost all of which are deposited in the chartered banks. Interest payments by the chartered banks on Receiver General deposits are 90 per cent of the interest rate on 90-day treasury bills on the weekly minimum balance in excess of $100 million.

Order Paper Questions

The exact amount of interest attributable to deposits returned to candidates contesting the general election is, however, unknown because the deposits were not separated from other moneys held in Receiver General bank accounts. An estimate of the interest earned on deposits returned to candidates, based on the average rate of return on Receiver General balances from January to September, 1980 of 7.57 per cent, was $4,696.

3. On what date is the new terminal scheduled to come on line and is any delay in meeting the schedule expected and, if so, what delay is anticipated?

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The National Harbours Board advises as follows: 1. Construction of wharf structure and land filling is completed. Contracts have been awarded and work is under way for the construction of the copewall, the crane foundations and the roro ramp and the installation of water, sewage, drainage and electrical systems.

2. Yes, Ceres Stevedoring Company Limited.

2. Were copies of the booklet "11 Steps To Survival" handed out at the display and, if so, how many?

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): 1. The portion of the Government of Canada display at the Pacific Exhibition used for emergency planning purposes cost $250.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. Under the provisions of the order passed on Tuesday, April 29, Committee of the Whole will proceed today and next Monday with the consideration of the estimates under the item Employment and Immigration of the schedule to Bill C-47, an act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the government of Canada for the financial year ending March 31, 1981.

DEPARTMENT OF EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION:

Vote No. 1

[English]

Mr. Collenette: Mr. Chairman, I am sorry but the minister was detained. He is about to come in. If he does not come in immediately, perhaps we might wait until his officials come in.

The Deputy Chairman: I see the minister arriving now.

[Translation]

Before the hon. minister entered the House, vote No. 1 had been called. Shall vote No. 1 carry?

[English]

Shall Vote 1 carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Lewis: Is the minister not going to address some remarks on vote 1?

The Deputy Chairman: I called vote 1 twice and I heard "carried" on each occasion. I see the parliamentary secretary rising now, perhaps for an explanation.

Mr. Collenette: Mr. Chairman, I thought you were going to wait until the minister was here to call vote 1. When you do so, the minister will stand up. Will you be so kind as to call vote 1 immediately?

• (1210)

The Deputy Chairman: I will call it again. The minister was in his seat when I called vote 1. Shall vote 1 carry?

Miss MacDonald: He does not hear very well.

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, I welcome this unexpected opportunity to talk about the work and activities of the commission on employment and immigration and on the status of women. Also I welcome the opportunity to listen to the questions asked by members of the House, and to their comments. There is a tendency in the day to day affairs of my department for people to seize upon the more sensational aspects of some of its activities, such as an immigration case which all of a sudden bursts forth in the headlines, and at the same time to ignore the large range and volume of work on a daily basis.

While I am quite anxious to deal with the specific and ad hoc questions and inquiries of hon. members, I hope we can devote some time during the discussion of these estimates to look at some of the longer term questions faced by the department, because it is a crucial department in terms of the economic and social policies which we will be facing in the 1980s.

Fundamentally, in my portfolios I deal with the problems of people, particularly the more effective and useful management of the human resources of the country, to ensure that not only is there an effective use of people in terms of jobs, training and skills, but also that there is a fair and equal use of people so that those who are suffering disadvantages can be assisted in trying to overcome their disadvantages.

I think members of the House will recognize that there is no more difficult a task, because we are dealing with people, and people cannot be ordered around in the same way as aeroplanes, bridges, or other more solid objects. People have their own mixtures of reasons why they want to live where they do, or work where they do. At the same time we are faced with very important problems of managing in relation to other groups and sectors of the economy. Our work is very closely tied in with the work of the business and labour sectors of Canada and also with the work of provincial governments. Yet, to mix and match those particular segments, one realizes that changes do not come easily. They must come with some degree of agreement and acceptance on the part of all the actors in the play. I use the word "play" with some degree of reservation, considering the events of the past week. Nevertheless, the federal government must play a very important leadership role in providing direction in the critical areas of helping people to get jobs, to move to this country, and to achieve some degree of equality in what they do.

It is particularly important, in light of the changes which can be seen on the horizon as taking place in the 1980s, to note that there will be some very important changes in the labour market conditions of Canada, ones which will require alterations in the programs of our government, provincial governments, and the private sector. That is why we undertook, as one of our first initiatives upon returning to government, to establish some very serious reviews of labour market conditions.

I just want to emphasize that we look forward, with some anticipation, to the findings of the parliamentary task force established to look into the critical question of employment needs for the 1980s. Much of the deliberations of our department will be dependent upon the assessments made by members of the House in coming to grips with some of those very critical issues. At the same time we have undertaken certain studies, within our own commissions, on the unemployment insurance program, on labour market forecasting, and on immigration programs, as ways to develop new data and ideas about where we should be going in response to these changing conditions.

If I may, I should like to mention just a few of those. One of the most important changes we are facing is a substantial change in the labour market itself. One of the most serious issues faced by both the public and private sectors over the decades of the sixties and seventies was a very large increase in the numbers of young people coming into the labour market. We faced probably the largest growth of young people coming into the work force of any country in the industrialized world. Over the period of the decade of the seventies we were able to maintain the highest growth of employment of any industrialized country. While no one can be totally satisfied that we are able to provide jobs for everybody, certainly our record speaks for itself in being able to respond to that issue.

Beginning in the 1980s there will be a gradual decline in the number of young people coming into the market. In fact, that is beginning now. At the same time there will be an increasing demand for new skills, trades, and crafts. So, we will be facing a paradox in the labour market that we could, in some ways, even reach the point of shortages by the mid-1980s. I believe very firmly that it is the responsibility of the government not just to respond to the short-term crises but to put in place the program elements which will enable us to respond to longer-term issues.

At the same time we will be facing a major shift in industrial activity in Canada, both between industries and between regions. That is simply a reality at which we must look. We are all aware of the shifting focus of economic growth and activity in western Canada and the increasing concentration of work within the resource and resource construction areas. That has created the paradox in the country that, while there are still large concentrations and pockets of unemployed in areas where unemployment has been traditionally located, there are increasing demands for and shortages of skills in other areas of the country. Therefore, one of the primary requirements of the government is to ensure that there can be substantial mobility of the work force and the acquisition of new skills to respond to the changing conditions of the marketplace.

That is why the government places such a very high priority, within the charter of rights in the constitutional debate, upon the establishment of mobility rights. It is to ensure that Canadians have the right to choose where they want to work and live. The increasing evolution of provincial barriers to the free movement of labour in the country is clear to us.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order to help the minister out. I am just wondering whether he is aware of the testimony of the Council on Social Development before the constitutional committee yesterday in which it was indicated that the clause on mobility in fact would provide the legal basis to close the borders and create sovereign states.

Some hon. Members: You will have your turn.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please.

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, I understand the high degree of anxiety and agitation of the hon. member, because he has been in that state for about two months. But I hope he can restrain himself and allow some proper flowing discussion to take place.

Mr. Forrestall: You might take a lesson from your colleague and watch your temper.

Mr. Axworthy: Now I am receiving gratuitous lessons from members opposite on temperament. I would suggest, by the tone of the hon. member's voice, that he might follow his own advice.

Mr. Forrestall: You watch your own temper.

Mr. Axworthy: Therefore, what we are trying to look at, in terms of changing conditions in the marketplace, is how we put in place the kinds of programs and policies which will respond to the shift both in the occupational structure of Canada and in the regional shift of industries. On one hand that means responding to areas or industries experiencing decline, at the same time as responding to areas experiencing high rates of growth.

It is also critical, in looking at future conditions, to ensure a fair degree of equity in the job market. This means looking at the groups of people in society who have been excluded or denied access to jobs in proportion to the numbers of the population or to their simple rights as Canadians. The most obvious group, which is a majority, is the women in Canada who, over a period of generations, have been concentrated in a very few occupations which tend to be on the lower scale of pay and opportunity. That is why the government, as was announced in the Speech from the Throne, put such a very high priority on developing an effective employment strategy to deal with the problems of women and to begin developing new initiatives to provide incentives for the private sector, as well as to take actions within the public service to establish principles of affirmative action. In this way we hope to provide some sense of leadership to redress the imbalances in the continuing area of discrimination.

It is fortunate I have the double portfolio of employment and immigration. This gives me the ability to focus on the status of women. It gives us the ability to provide some influence and direction within the government to reach solutions in that area.

Another issue which has caused a great deal of concern and public discussion in recent months has been the shortage of skills in Canada. It is a symptom of major changes which are going on in the workplace. For a long period of time Canadian industry has relied upon immigration as a source of its major skills. Studies in both British Columbia and Ontario have indicated the majority of their skilled tradesmen have come from countries offshore. Unfortunately that work source is now aging and they will soon be eligible for retirement. As a result, we are put in a position where we will be short a number of important skills. It will not be possible to rely upon the immigration of skills from other countries to the same degree as we have in the past.

We are now very much in an international labour market where there is a high degree of competition from all kinds of countries. In areas where there used to be a fairly ample supply of people with basic craft and trade skills, they now find themselves in severe competition in gaining skills for themselves. As a result, that traditional source is now coming home to industry. They are recognizing the need to gear-up substantial new efforts in the area of skill training.

With respect to this area, Mr. Chairman, our department is trying to assist them in as many ways as it can. We have in our estimates well over $800 million allocated to a wide variety of training programs. This will provide training places both in industry and institutions for well over 300,000 Canadians. At the same time we recognize that is not enough and that we will have to develop additional incentives. That is one of the reasons we look forward to the proposals coming from the task force of Parliament and from our own studies and reviews.

I would like to make it clear, Mr. Chairman, that this is not a topic on which one can simply point to a victim or an aggressor. We are all responsible for being caught short, which is simply a problem which must be solved. A good deal of my time over the last several months has been taken up in meetings with representatives of business and labour to see how we can develop joint efforts and responses to this serious need.

The area of unemployment insurance is a critical one where we must re-examine our proposals. Unemployment insurance has been the fundamental foundation of job security for Canadians since 1940. Since that time it has gone through a wide variety of changes. What we see now is that the expenditures on unemployment insurance should be reviewed from the point of view of determining to what degree it provides security and to what degree it provides disincentives to work. We must look at whether it provides a fair allocation of the cost of the program and at the degree to which the unemployment insurance program can provide additional services to enable additional people to come into the work force. These are people we will need. As part of this review, that is why we are taking a very careful look at issues such as improved maternity benefits and benefits which would allow women to come into the work force.

We are also involved in the examination of new programs and policies in the area of adjusting to industrial decline. Members of this House will recognize this in the budget of the Minister of Finance. In that budget there was an allocation of $350 million aimed at the problem of industrial adjustment. Our department has been working in conjunction with the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, the Department of Labour, and the Department of Regional Economic Expansion to develop responses, using those funds, to zero in on industry and areas directly affected by industrial change. This is done primarily to provide stimulation for new alternative economic development as well as to provide ways in which workers in those areas can be continuously employed, either in those industries or alternative ones. It is my hope we will be able to announce, within three or four weeks, an outline of that program.

Before I conclude my brief overview of some of the initiatives taken by the department I would like to highlight something which often does not get much attention in debates in this House. I think it is important to comment on it. The basic conventional services of the employment and immigration commission are to provide major job placements for Canadians across Canada. This goes back to the point about the requirement for ensuring mobility, to ensure that people have full information about where jobs are and how they can go about getting them. We have an extensive network of employment offices spread across the country which provide a high volume of registrations and placements. What we recognize is the need to make those basic services even more efficient than they are.

In the last year we introduced a program of computerization to ensure that within an urban area, such as Ottawa, Montreal or Toronto, there is a computer system which would provide for the instantaneous transfer of job placements and vacancies so that workers in those areas can instantly respond to it.

About a month ago we announced the initiation of a major national job bank which computerizes job placements and vacancies right across Canada. It is a program which has already been greeted responsively by workers and employers. It is our intention to continue to make those basic services more efficient and more effective. That is one way we can assist in the transfer and transition of people who want to change jobs, who find themselves out of work and move to new employment. I would be very interested if members of this House would like further information with regard to this area because it is one of the fundamental and important services which we provide to Canadians.

Finally, I would like to speak for a moment about immigration and refugees. There was a major change in the Immigration Act which was passed in this House. That change began to take full effect in 1978. We are now beginning to see the changes in the composition and pattern in immigration which were caused by the alteration which went with that legislation. One of the requirements we have is to provide an annual immigration level to Parliament. I am pleased to report that this year the immigration level has been greeted with a high degree of consensus and support by both provincial governments and the public. This is partly due to the extensive consultation which has taken place.

I would like to highlight one particular problem which bothers me a great deal as I look at it with respect to the responsibility of immigration. That is the problem of refugees. We have just been through one of the most heart-warming experiences as Canadians, as the sixty thousandth Vietnamese refugee landed in Montreal under the special program. I think it is an event worth noting because of its significance, in the sense that it was probably the largest effort for a country of this size to resettle such a cohesive group of people in such a short time. We must not overlook the fact that with that major influx of Vietnamese refugees, substantial requirements will be necessary to ensure they become properly integrated into our communities, that they have the ability and the opportunity to obtain full employment and to get language training so that they will fit into the communities and neighbourhoods in which they have located with a minimum amount of fuss and dislocation. That is part of the emphasis put forward in the immigration paper. We would like to spend the next year or so putting primary emphasis on the integration and development of services for the large number of refugees who have come to this country over the past two years.

I would also remind hon. members that these plans will not cure the refugee problem. If there is any major worldwide occurrence which should be addressed, it is the accelerating numbers of displaced people and refugees throughout the world. It is occurring in southeast Asia, the Middle East, Africa, Latin America and, in fact, there is not an area in the world where there is not a refugee problem.

It is my concern that we begin to focus as a country and a Parliament on the international dimensions of the refugee question. I would hope that the debate and discussion during this consideration of the estimates will give us an opportunity to look at what we might be doing in response to one of the most burning and critical issues faced by this country because of its privileged position as an affluent and comfortable place to live.

There are many people asking us questions because of our past leadership.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. minister, but his allotted time has expired. Nevertheless, he may continue with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, I will conclude my remarks in about two minutes. One of the final requirements of putting into place this variety of initiatives is that it must be done in combination and co-operation with other people, other levels of government, labour, and business. We cannot respond to the series of problems of skills, new job creation, movement of people and the development of new economic opportunity without a major effort to bring the different sectors of our country together. Certainly it will be the next phase of our approach, once we receive the reports of Parliament and of our own studies, to undertake major meetings across Canada with those sectors in order to develop a consensus or agreement upon the direction which we should take to put people to work in Canada and to assure that the right of Canadians to choose where they want to work is defended and guarded. With those comments, Mr. Chairman, I welcome debate and discussion in this committee.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Chairman, I welcome this opportunity to discuss matters listed under the minister's estimates with the minister and his officials. Prior to my remarks, which are fairly specific to my area of interest, I would like to touch on what the minister said about the immigration of refugees to Canada. The problem in rural and semi-rural areas in that very well meaning civic groups and churches have brought refugees into Canada under the program only to find that, after these refugees have arrived into their communities and are given training in language, employment opportunities and so on, they, perhaps because they feel more comfortable in metropolitan areas or because of the cultural shock, want to migrate to metropolitan areas.

I myself am involved in a situation where a group of refugees wishes to migrate to the United States. I am having some difficulty in deciding what I should do or what the church groups should do to assist in helping these people, once they have arrived in Canada and spent the money allotted, to emigrate to the United States. If the minister would address that problem, it would be helpful.

The rest of my remarks will be a little more partisan. At first I was tempted to begin with the massive inconsistencies which can be found in the minister's treatment of hockey players who, for example, may want to play for the Quebec Nordiques and of men and women who have another vocation which they want to practise in Ontario. We would like to discourage discrimination against Ontario. We appreciate that it is a policy of the government which is sometimes aided, sometimes abetted, but most of the time watched helplessly by the Liberal members. But after I read the remarks of Laura Sabia in the Toronto Sun, I felt it would be impossible for me to do any better.

Mr. Axworthy: Is she your new source of information?

Mr. Lewis: The high unemployment rate in Canada is a result of a lack of concern by the government, and it is affecting every geographic area in the country. It is having an effect on my area as well as other areas, all occupations and age categories.

During the course of my remarks I want to touch specifically on the employment problems in the construction industry. As the result of the government's policies we are concerned for the training of young people in the construction trades. I also have one or two local concerns with regard to my riding of Simcoe North which I will address to the minister.

With regard to housing starts, I spent some time last night reading the remarks of the minister when he was on this side of the House criticizing our efforts to stimulate the housing industry. I felt that many of his remarks were very disparaging, and when I looked at today's record I was embarrassed for the minister. The minister has the problem of standing in this House and coping with the inability of another minister to rectify the situation. In 1980 housing starts will fall short of the 1979 figure by either 37,000, if one takes CMHC figures, or 47,000 if one takes HUDAC figures. I read the comments the minister made last fall, which were very disparaging about the starts last fall being less than the year before.

CMHC said that we needed 266,000 starts this year, and we are running at an annual adjusted figure of only 160,000 starts. In 1979, the year the minister was on this side of the House and the year in which he was so disparaging in his remarks toward the then government, the starts were down 13.5 per cent from 1978. That drop in housing starts, whether one takes the figure of 37,000 or the figure of 47,000, equates to approximately 50,000 new jobs. I know that there are different methods for computing that equation, but for the purposes of what we are talking about today, we can say 50,000 jobs will be lost in the construction industry as a result of the lack of action by the government.

These lost jobs will result in a drain on the unemployment insurance reserve and the paying out of benefits of approximately $213 million if one bases it on 38 weeks of benefits. The minister of housing is on record on several occasions as stating that MURBs will dramatically increase employment in the housing industry because there will be MURBs all over the place. He has also suggested that co-op housing will increase by 10,000 units.

On the other hand, a representative for CHMC in Toronto said yesterday that no applications have been received recently from private developers for rental projects. So on the one hand we have a suggested policy which will sprout up housing in the form of multiple urban starts, and on the other hand we have an official of the department saying that there are no starts. The official went on to say that the rental situation will get worse, which means unemployment in that very basic industry.

There are no prospects on the horizon for a dramatic increase in housing starts, and that means unemployment. What will the government do with these skilled unemployed construction workers who want to work but, as a result of a downturn in residential construction in this country, are continuously forced to leave the industry? At the same time the inventory of unsold, single family dwellings is depleting. Hopefully this will result in an increase in residential housing starts, but this will be offset because of the way in which the government has allowed mortgage interest rates to rise. We have a paradise with, on the one hand, skilled labour leaving the industry due to lack of demand and, on the other hand, people crying for accommodation.

I will run through my questions and then ask the minister to reply, if I may, Mr. Chairman. How does the minister intend to address the problem of putting skilled and unskilled workers in the construction industry to work when the minister who is responsible for housing is obviously unable to come up with any program to stimulate the industry, especially the multiple dwelling aspect of it?

Training programs are pretty important to young Canadians who are out of work, Mr. Chairman. The Canada Manpower office in the riding of Simcoe North has advised me that 314 people are registered in the Orillia office and 346 are registered with the Midland office, in the construction industry. It is ironic that at the time when we have a 2.3 vacancy rate, a new record, 660 people in my riding are looking for work in the housing construction field. That is just one riding, Mr. Chairman. At the same time the experts predict a labour shortage. But, Mr. Chairman, these people are unemployed and they want to work.

I would suggest to the minister that now is the time to implement a program to train or retrain workers who are presently unemployed in the construction industry so that if we ever reach a point where we have a comprehensive policy in place, then the skilled labour will be available. Does the minister feel that we should be training these people to get out of the construction industry, or retraining them, or upgrading their training so that the skilled labour will be available when the industry does recover?

I would point out to the minister that the type of housing constructed in Canada at the present time has undergone a change. It used to be that we built 30, 40, 500, 100-home subdivisions, all the same models. That meant 100 holes in the ground and 100 buildings went up. I think the minister will agree that information from the housing industry indicates that there is going to be a shift in emphasis. People cannot afford to buy a new home, or to change houses in order to upgrade their housing. Because of the mortgage interest rate policy of this government, they are staying in their homes. What they want to do is to renovate. They want to renovate and upgrade the homes in which they presently live.

I suggest to the minister that there is going to be a greater demand for skilled construction labour that can renovate homes. We are going to need plumbers who can do renovation plumbing, not just plumbing for a new building, that can be put wherever they want, or wherever the plans show it should go. I would ask the minister to address this problem of how people can be retrained to handle the renovation industry.

I should like now to deal with some local problems in the riding of Simcoe North. For some strange reason there are two economic regional boundaries in Simcoe North for the purpose of Unemployment Insurance Commission payments. Region 'C', the Toronto area, includes the townships of Rama and Mara which are on the easterly side of Lakes Simcoe and Couchiching in Simcoe county. The balance of the riding is in Region 'H', known as the Georgian Bay area.

The Toronto area has a lower unemployment rate than the Georgian Bay area, which is essentially rural and tourist oriented. Rural people must work longer than people in the remainder of the riding in order to qualify for unemployment insurance benefits. They are therefore at a disadvantage when it comes to the legitimate collection of unemployment insurance benefits. I do not think it should be assumed that unemployment opportunities in these two townships are greater than in the rest of the riding; they do not relate in any way to the Toronto area. The people of the townships work and shop in Orillia and their attachment is to the community of Orillia rather than Toronto. I would ask the minister to investigate whether the two townships of Rama and Mara could be transferred to Region 'H'. I bring this question up, Mr. Chairman, because I have often found that local problems can be expanded and the solution can sometimes be applied nationally.

The village of Warminster is 29 miles from Barrie, but the people of the village must use the unemployment insurance office in Barrie. In Toronto, people can get on a bus and go to one office or another, but these people have to go 29 miles in order to find the same service. I would ask the minister to see if this situation can be corrected.

The last local problem that I should like to deal with pertains to grants under the Canada Community Development Program. I want to congratulate the minister on this as I think it provides for a very good review by local people. The lady in the Barrie office was most helpful to me and I have had an opportunity to review the programs. An application was made by the town of Midland for a grant to improve its harbour facilities. As the member of Parliament for Simcoe North, I endorsed this project with the caveat that I wanted to be fully satisfied that whatever moneys were spent under the program were used for the development of skills of young people who would otherwise be drawing unemployment insurance benefits during the winter. The program was not approved. It is my contention, Mr. Chairman, that the young people in Midland want to work and that they should be trained. While I agree with a lot of the other grants that were given, I am disappointed that this one was not approved. I hope that more emphasis can be given in the future to programs which are endorsed by the member of Parliament with perhaps a proviso that they be changed to meet the terms of the grant.

Mr. Axworthy: Give me the name of the project.

Mr. Lewis: I can get the number of the project and the name for the minister.

I should now like to refer to a brief presented to the government by the Canadian Executive Board, Building and Construction Trades Department, which I am sure he has reviewed. In his remarks he referred to mobility in the construction industry. I think we all agree that this particularly applies to the construction industry because, by their very nature, construction projects do not always offer continuing employment. I think now of some of the large projects which draw people from all over Canada.

The brief asks the government to amend the Income Tax Act to provide that all reasonable allowances paid by an employer to a worker for room and board and or any type of transportation be non-taxable. From my experience in the days when I used to do income tax returns I know that some construction workers have to travel a fair distance and that it sometimes means uprooting their families for months at a time. Other times it may mean that they have to drive 70 or 80 miles one way, or perhaps 100 miles round trip, to a particular job. We are faced with a problem here. Do we have these people sitting at home saying "I am unemployed. I cannot find a job in my area"? Or do we decide that it is better use of our manpower in Canada to grant an allowance to a worker to go far enough to work?

There are some matters in this brief the minister should address which include things in the construction industry. While I am talking about the construction industry, I share the concern of the Canadian Construction Association regarding changes contemplated to reduce the minimum insurability level from 20 hours of work per week, or 30 per cent of the maximum insurable earnings, to 15 hours of work per week. I am sure the minister and many members of this House at one time or another held a part time job, whether or not it was while going to school. I know the minister realizes there has been an increase in the number of part-time workers in Canada. In 1961 part-time employment accounted for 7.9 per cent of the total work force. By 1978 this share had increased to 12.1 per cent.

My concern is this. By adding those working 15 to 20 hours per week to the unemployment eligibility rolls, will we find that we have created two problems, the first being an abuse of the principle that the unemployment insurance system was set up to protect workers who worked a normal 35 or 40-hour week? Or, do we suggest that it should now be changed to protect people who work only 15 hours per week? I am not for a minute criticizing people who work on a part-time basis. I am suggesting, however, that the minister might find part-time workers objecting to unemployment insurance premiums being deducted from them in the first place. He may also find that part-time workers do not view a part-time job with the same concern as full-time workers and thus object to paying unemployment insurance premiums.

If we find this is a severe drain on the unemployment insurance reserve, will we not find that employees who work full time, because of the increases proposed in the budget, will find that they are paying for the part-time unemployment insurance benefits? Also, if, as, and when this program is brought into place—

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please, I regret to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but his allotted time has expired. He may continue with unanimous consent? Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Chairman, this is a novel concept. I am not saying whether I am for it or against it, but I think it must be examined on that basis. I hope that proper record keeping will be set up so the minister can look at the program after three or four months and ask should we be charging these people more and what sort of an effect is this having on the unemployment insurance program.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. I understand the time has expired for both the question and the answer.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Chairman, we are dealing with a very large department which has a tremendous variety of fields under the minister's jurisdiction. In the New Democratic Party we are going to try to allocate among our members various aspects of the department which we feel need some discussion.

Today I want to deal with three or four points. I shall attempt to make my points briefly and concisely and deal with them one at a time. I hope the minister will be as brief in his answers as I will be with my questions so we can get a few items discussed.

First, I want to deal with the very serious problem we have in Canada regarding the shortage of skilled workers. In his opening remarks the minister mentioned that there is a parliamentary task force meeting on employment in the 1980s. He mentioned that he wants to hear from them. I know the minister has an internal task force looking into the department. I do not expect the minister to give us a complete answer today on what the department proposes to do. Nevertheless, I want to put on the record some things which the parliamentary task force has heard.

From one end of Canada to the other, employees and employers, with the exception of the building trade unions who were before us a couple of days ago—employees grouped from unions, from employers, from community colleges and provincial departments have given the same reports time after time, namely, that the system of training people to fill the skilled jobs we need simply has not done the job.

According to a vice-president of one of our largest banks, we will have more than one million unemployed this winter. Despite that, we have this tremendous shortage of skilled workers.

The Machinery and Equipment Manufacturers Association of Canada made a representation to the task force. I shall quote just a few paragraphs from that report:

—86 per cent of this industry sector was experiencing difficulty in hiring journeyman workers.

—training programs in place at the time of the survey in 1979 would only satisfy 17 per cent of that year's requirements.

The Globe and Mail for Friday, November 28, 1980, summarized a report of the Mining Association of Canada. In part the article in The Globe and Mail reads:

The survey of manpower projections at 69 mining operations across Canada indicates that while the industry will require 5,278 skilled tradesmen by 1982, current training programs will only provide 3,248 trained workers, leaving a gap of 2,030 tradesmen.

Those are just two small illustrations of the problem we have. Mr. John Bullock of the Canadian Federation of Independent Business was before our task force last June. Although I do not have his exact quote, I shall paraphrase what he said which will be right on track. He said something to the effect that the last place an employer will go for a skilled worker is the Department of Employment and Immigration.

My first question is this: can the minister give us any idea of what his department proposes to do to meet this tremendous shortage of skilled workers which we will have in the 1980s?

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. I do now leave the chair until two o'clock.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 2 p.m.

The Deputy Chairman: When the committee rose at one o'clock, the hon. member for Winnipeg North had the floor. I presume he has resumed his seat so the minister can answer his question.

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, I am pleased to answer the inquiries of the hon. member for Winnipeg North. He referred to the studies submitted by the mining industry to the parliamentary task force. Perhaps he did not know we had participated rather actively in the development of those studies with the association. It has been one of our policies to work very closely with a variety of industrial groups to do the initial analysis and assessment of what their skilled needs might be now and in the future. The commission offered a wide variety of services to them in doing the compilations, getting the numbers, and the actual figuring out of what their needs will be. We are already engaged in getting that very essential first step started, which is to come up with the proper information.

Beyond that, as the hon. member knows, we have a very active program in our training areas where we provide direct incentives to employers. Most of the apprentice programs utilize the Canadian manpower training programs as a way of assisting or subsidizing the training of apprentices. In the last year or two we initiated the critical skills training program which was deliberately designed to provide direct assistance to industrial on-the-floor training. We provide not only the cost of the wages and salaries of the apprentices, but additional costs incurred by the employer in that area.

The hon. member might recall that in my announcement of new programs last spring I indicated we would add $10 million to the critical skills training program as a further incentive to the private sector to begin training more people. The difficulty we encountered with certain downturns in the economy, particularly in the manufacturing area, is that the take-up on the critical skills training program has not been as high as we would have liked. That is one reason why we are looking for ways of enriching the critical skills training program to provide further incentives in this area.

I wish to take this opportunity to point out to the hon. member, who I know is interested, where and how the critical skills training program does offer incentives. I can use one example in Manitoba where, under the critical skills training program, there are now 15 apprentices in the Sherritt Gordon complex, several of those being of native ancestry.

At the Kramer Tractor Company of Regina, Saskatchewan, there are now 12 apprentices on the shop floor compared to the three to five average for the past several years, again attributable to the application of the CSTP program. A major agreement with the interior forest association of British Columbia has been signed to provide for an industry-wide training agreement to bring people into these areas. There are a number of efforts being made to provide for that direct incentive.

What we have to overcome is a number of years of neglect by private industry in securing their own training requirements. As indicated in my opening remarks, there has been a tendency by the private sector to rely almost exclusively on the import of skills from other countries. Now that that particular pool of labour is drying up or is not available, the programs to respond simply are not in place in much of private industry.

As the hon. member knows, because of the riding he represents, it takes anywhere from three to five years to do a proper apprenticeship training program. We are facing a certain time lag. These programs are in place. We hope to improve upon the existing critical skills-training system and, furthermore, to look upon the work that he and other members of the parliamentary committee will produce in giving us a broader range of alternative solutions which we will be very interested in implementing once the report is received.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Chairman, there have been some good beginnings in the last year or so. The programs which have been initiated represent only a very small fraction of the requirements we will have to meet in the next five to ten years. I urge the minister and his department to look very carefully at the proposals made to the task force by the Canadian Labour Congress and the grant levy system they proposed.

Respecting the other end of the labour scale, that is, the unskilled, a study done by Professor Adams for the Department of Labour, raises a very serious problem we have with regard to people whose education is far below the minimum required for any kind of skilled training. Let me read from one paragraph in his report in which Professor Adams said:

> Adult illiteracy in Canada is a serious social and economic problem which is being largely ignored.

We are talking about five million Canadians, about 20 per cent of Canadian people. He goes on to say that five million Canadians are functionally illiterate and 30 per cent of all Canadians over the age of 15 have no education above grade eight. When we look at the expenditures of the minister's department we see there has been, rather than efforts to improve the situation, a deliberate decision to reduce the effort, to reduce the expenditure on the number of people who need the basic education if they are going to get into any kind of skilled trade over a period of years.

For the year 1973-74 there were 51,900 people enrolled in the Basic Training for Skill Development programs. Every year from 1973-74 right through to 1979-80, the last year we have figures for, there has been a sharp reduction, so that in 1979-80 only 29,600 people were involved in these programs. That means for the people who are functionally illiterate, as Dr. Adams has said—I know it is expensive to train them and I know that there are many who never succeed—and for those people the department has cut back on and who are not going to get the basic skill training, we are in fact saying to them that we accept the idea that they are likely to be on welfare or on public assistance for the rest of their lives.

It is not only immoral to follow that kind of policy but it is damned poor economics. In the long run, it is the training of people that gets them jobs. I suggest to the minister that he should look more carefully at the success of the training programs in the province of Manitoba which have been so successful. We now have over 400 native teachers in the province of Manitoba. Other programs have brought native people, most of whom had been on welfare, into actual productive, useful and satisfying jobs. I urge the minister and his department to work on that kind of problem together with the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

Mr. Axworthy: I certainly agree with the hon. member for Winnipeg North. The position taken by the hon. member is an accurate one. There are a large number of Canadians who find themselves without proper basic skills to command any access to the job market. In fact if the hon. member were to look at the unemployment figures, he would find that the largest percentage is concentrated amongst those with the lowest education.

We have a tendency in this House to make fairly broad sweeping generalizations about unemployment. The fact of the matter is that unemployment is a highly concentrated experience for a very small range of Canadians. Those who suffer most deeply from it are those who do not have the proper education or required skills. The difficulty that we face, of course, is one that began much earlier, and we, as a department, cannot be held responsible for that.

The difficulty that we face is a jurisdictional one. May I remind the hon. member that there was a very strong recommendation that came from the Senate committee on manpower that the federal government totally abandon its activity in the Basic Skills Training Program because it really is a provincial responsibility. Of course we have the paradox of provinces demanding that we take less revenues. It is a paradox in the sense that you cannot have it both ways. I certainly sympathize with the concern, and we have maintained an ongoing commitment to the Basic Skills Training Program which is an indication that we realize we must compensate for the vacuum that is created in the educational system in this country. At the same time there is an intensive demand for money for all kinds of programs.

We increasingly believe that more of our resources should be going into the area of skilled training, or particularly target them in on those groups of people in the population who have severe disadvantages and need that kind of opportunity. That is why we have put an increasing effort into our Outreach programs to provide that kind of access, and that is why we are looking at alternative employment programs for disadvantaged workers.

I suggest to the hon. member and all other members of this House that they use their good offices to make the case in committee that the provincial governments must also accept their responsibility in this field.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Chairman, of course the provinces have to accept their responsibility, but the fact is that it is not of much use to the people who do not have education to be told by provinces that the federal government should do it, and by the federal government that the provinces should do it. I point out to the minister that a very large percentage of those who do not have education are status Indians who are the direct responsibility of the federal government.

I remind the minister of the success in the province of Manitoba of teacher-training programs. There are now over 400 native teachers in Manitoba and doing a very excellent job. They became teachers because of special programs funded by the federal and provincial governments. If there can be 400 native teachers, why can we not have special programs to train native people to become social workers, probation officers, correctional officers or conservation officers? They are all fields in which native people are involved.

More than 50 per cent of the people in our jails are native people. Why can there not be native correctional officers? I am sure it is not particularly difficult to train people to the correctional officers, even if they do not have high school education. Most of the people who are now teachers did not have high school education. Why can the minister's department, together with the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, not put into effect some of these practical programs so that native people can be employed, do useful work, set an example to the native community and show it that they can in fact make it and find a useful and productive place in our society?

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, I point out to the hon. member that there are a number of programs available in our department which apply directly to the issue he has raised. We spend well over $30 million a year under LEAP directly on native-sponsored projects. LEAP itself provides a wide variety of opportunities for native people as well as for others who lack the skills needed to get their first work experience and to acquire certain other basic skills.

There have been a number of notable successes, including one in our own province. I recall attending an opening this past summer at the Ukrainian cultural centre where one of the Indian bands were operating a major woodworking and woodcarving project under LEAP. This is now becoming a commercially viable enterprise standing on its own merits and generating sufficient funds to keep itself in operation. We do have LEAP—

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. minister, but the time allotted to the questioner has expired. Nevertheless, the minister may carry on if there is unanimous consent.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Axworthy: Perhaps I could point out that in addition to LEAP, which we operate, we initiated an additional $10 million native training fund this year to provide new training opportunities to native people. I can report to the hon. member that that fund has already received a very widespread response from native bands and groups right across Canada. It will be providing additional opportunities for native people to get basic skill training.

Mr. MacLaren: Mr. Chairman, in speaking to the item before us today, I want to ask some questions of the minister, but I want first to say a word about the initiatives taken by the minister and his department to help alleviate the suffering which has resulted from the recent earthquake in Italy. The prompt response of the Government of Canada, as an expression of humanitarian instinct has been a source of pride for all Canadians. I should not want this occasion to pass without noting the rapid and effective response to that disaster made by the minister and his department.

The discussion so far has been centred in large measure on the question of manpower training. It is to that subject that I would like to address myself for a moment, and then I shall ask the minister for elucidation of some of the interesting points he made during his introductory statement.

We are all aware that today in Canada the problem of availability of skilled labour is a deterrent, to a degree, to our further economic development. While the problem has been identified often enough in recent years the solutions have eluded us partly, I think, because they depend on federal-provincial co-operation and, indeed, co-operation among three levels of government. We have sometimes achieved our goals only because we have had, as the minister noted, the opportunity to draw upon skills and trained manpower from other countries through the immigration policies we have pursued.

Although one might note the variety of programs which the Canadian government has put into place over the past decade to help promote skilled manpower training in Canada, it must be obvious to all of us that more remains to be done in a way which will effectively involve labour and industry in a co-operative venture with the government more than has been the case in the past.

Some, of course, describe the current situation as a crisis. That may be an overstatement, but there is no question that with new and often science-based industries coming on stream, and with mega projects, particularly in the energy field, looming before us, the demand for skilled manpower will become yet more acute.

In addition, there is a challenge to the department to promote programs which offer the worker not only training in skills but also the opportunity to achieve some self-fulfilment in his workplace, an aspect of employment that perhaps in the past has not always received the attention some of us would have desired.

The minister noted earlier that we in Canada have had for some time, the highest rate of job creation amongst the OECD countries, but that has been matched by an even larger number of workers, especially young and often untrained young people, coming on the job market. This volume of new workers has exceeded that of almost all other western countries in proportion to our total population. Even though we have had that problem in the past, I ask the minister whether it is his expectation that the growth in the labour force, which has been running at about 3 per cent annually for some years, is expected soon to drop off? If indeed that rate of growth is expected to decline significantly, how does he see that changing the emphasis and scope of his departmental programs as we proceed through the decade of the 1980s?

The minister and others in the House have already mentioned the question of the training of specific groups in the time ahead. As I understand it, the expectation with respect to new workers coming on to the job market is that some 65 per cent will be women. Whether that is an accurate estimate is perhaps a secondary consideration. The fact remains that large numbers of women will be entering the job market for the first time. Presumably the minister has in mind some appropriate training programs, which he has indeed mentioned to a certain extent, but if he could give us some further details on that aspect of skilled training I for one would be very glad to have them.

The success of many of our training programs in the past has depended on co-operation between two and even three levels of government. During the early part of next year the federal-provincial training agreements under the Adult Occupational Training Act expire. I hope that plans are made either for the renewal or the revision of those joint federal-provincial arrangements. If the minister has a comment to make on the evolving nature of those federal-provincial arrangements, I would be pleased to hear it.

Some reference has been made to the question of mobility in the work force. I understand that 4.5 million Canadians change their jobs annually or enter and leave the work force. The need for mobility, which has been incorporated in the constitutional proposals, becomes all the more important, but so do the mobility programs of the department. If the minister has some comment about the mobility assistance programs of the department and whether he sees the need for acceleration in that activity in the time ahead, I would be very glad to hear it.

Finally, the success which I suggested earlier of our manpower training programs depends, to a very large degree, not only on co-operation between the two principal levels of government in Canada but also on the active participation of labour and industry. There are those who have criticized industry for its reluctance to provide the necessary funds and commitment to ensure skilled training because of the ready access to immigrant skills. There have been those, on the other hand, who have criticized labour unions for being defensive and protective in attempting to ensure the work of their members by, in effect, opposing or being reluctant to participate in labour-skilled training programs.

In that connection I would take some encouragement from the fact that the Business Council on National Issues, the BCNI, has taken some initiatives to promote industry co-operation with the government, not only in the design of skilled manpower training programs but also in some financial support for that activity. Equally, the CLC more recently has taken a more pronounced interest in the training of skilled manpower. I hope that from that growing consciousness, on the part of industry and labour, of the vital need in Canada for more skilled manpower, a quadripartite effort involving the federal-provincial governments, labour and business, would soon emerge. I hope that the minister will offer comments on that as well.

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, in response to the parliamentary secretary's comments I think it would be quite accurate to say that there will be major changes in the composition of the labour force over the next four or five years. Perhaps the most dramatic one will be the gradual decline in the growth of that labour force, from a high of about 3 per cent over the past decade to about 1.7 per cent.

The impact of that change will be felt in a number of areas where there will be an increasing shrinkage in the available manpower for certain key occupations, because that decline in the labour force will be accompanied by a substantial expansion in the economic sectors, such as manufacturing, capital goods, and non-residential construction, which have traditionally employed men in their activities. What that dictates to us very clearly is the need to provide for ways of making a transition for the female work force in this country in the non-traditional work, both to increase their opportunities in a fast growing area in the economy as well as to ensure that there is a sufficient number of people to do the jobs necessary.

The initiatives that one could take in this area combine a requirement to eliminate discrimination in the workplace where it does exist, and that is why this summer we introduced the affirmative action program in the public service to provide very direct public leadership in this area so that those barriers would come down and so that we could demonstrate to the private sector that that is one way of ensuring that there is better and more open access for women in the work force as well as for minority groups.

At the same time, we believe there must also be a series of incentives. One of the trial projects which we are trying, and which we announced last spring, is a training program for women in non-traditional work, under which we offered to pay 75 per cent of the wages of a trainee. I think the success of it is shown because there has been already an increase of over 60 per cent in women going into non-traditional work in 1979, work of machinists, miners, and so on. We will be monitoring the effect of that program carefully to see if that kind of incentive can be used to encourage employers to bring women into training positions in their own plants or shop floor, as well as into the very critical areas of resource skills.

What we have to do also, as I indicated in my opening remarks, is to make sure that there is a much more efficient system of translation between where the jobs are and where people with the skills are. The hon. member for Simcoe North indicated this morning that a brief had been submitted by the executive board of the Building and Trade Labour Council. I would like to report to hon. members that I met with that group last evening to discuss their brief with them and some of the proposals they made about how to ensure greater mobility for Canadian workers in the resource projects. These proposals were very thoughtful and were very well received.

I indicated to the group last night that we will take on in particular the proposal for tying a closer relationship between immigration and the requirement for mobility, as well as the idea of a taxable refund on mobility. I intend to take it up with the Minister of Finance to provide greater incentives for workers to move from their present location to where the jobs might be so that we can provide for a more efficient working system.

As to the final point raised by the parliamentary secretary about the need for co-ordination, it is one of those motherhood phrases which everyone uses, that we must have more co-ordination. Unfortunately in this field not much has taken place. There has been a serious breakdown over the years between industry, labour and government, and between governments in this area. One of the things I have been trying to do in the last several months has been to sit down with groups in each of the industrial sectors, in mining, in oil and gas, in aerospace, in furniture manufacturing, in textiles, to see how we could develop a co-ordinated approach from our side in those areas. There has been a high degree of response from the industrial leaders.

I want to report, however, that there is not quite the same keenness and enthusiam expressed by provincial officials, particularly in our western provinces where they tend to want to go it alone and, as a result, are substantially impeding the development of new training programs in these areas. Again this highlights the importance, as mentioned by the parliamentary secretary, of the need to establish mobility rights in the charter to ensure that that is seen as a signal or signpost upon which we can develop a national employment strategy, one that will take into account that there is an enormous movement of people from one end of the country to the other.

The only way we can supply our human resource need and ensure that there is effective productivity is to ensure the easy movement of the people to where the jobs are. So long as we tolerate or allow barriers to exist, we will not be able to employ a national employment strategy. To those who sometimes condemn the constitutional debate as being somewhat abstract or academic in this area, I would say that certainly in this area, it is a very real and vital necessity to make our economy grow.

Mr. Jarvis: Mr. Chairman, first of all may I say to the minister that if I do not leave him time to reply to some of the points that I am going to raise, and if he has a chance later in the day or on Monday to do so, I want to emphasize that I have to leave the House shortly before four o'clock and I cannot be back on Monday, and therefore when he does reply, if I should be absent my absence is certainly not dictated by any lack of courtesy or lack of interest in what the minister has to say, but it is simply inadvertent because, particularly this week, and on Monday, I am preoccupied with the Stratford Festival in my riding.

I do not want to dwell on the festival as a narrow issue, except I think I should say a couple of things because the broader issue is much more important and relevant. One matter that may or may not be minor on the specific issue of the festival is the answer which the minister gave to my colleague, the hon. member for Cambridge, who, as the minister might recall, put a question in two parts to him. First he talked about Peter Ustinov doing King Lear for two consecutive seasons as compared to the Dexter application for artistic director, but in the same question my colleague dealt with certain athletes and mentioned, for example, the Jamie Bone case.

In his reply the minister cautioned my colleague to distinguish between someone coming into the country on a permanent basis and someone coming in under a visa for a short-term engagement. I have not seen the specific application of Mr. Dexter, but traditionally artistic directors, whether it was Sir Tyrone Guthrie, Mr. Neville, Robin Phillips or whoever, would come in under work permits or working visas rather than under landed immigrant status. I hope the minister was not implying that unless such is the case and Mr. Dexter was applying for landed immigrant status. I do not think he was. I see the minister shaking his head. Perhaps he was referring more to athletes than the Ustinov-Dexter cases.

I should like to make one or two comments concerning the Dexter case. The minister is in possession of much more information than I. I acknowledge that fact, and he acknowledged that I was one of the instruments, albeit minor, who supplied some of the information to him. If we compare what I know to what he knows and acknowledging that he has facilities for gathering information, I think I would have come to the opposite conclusion vis-à-vis the application. But I am not sure that is what is important in the present context.

The minister will know this is an extremely important and emotional issue. The obvious inclination is to seek someone to blame, or a scapegoat. Some people may like to blame the board of directors; some people may like to blame the minister. I would like to blame the minister, from a partisan point of view. because it is very convenient. I am very emotional about this issue. Some people may blame the previous directorate; others may blame heaven only knows whom. I think that is natural, and it is understandable that it is very unproductive as far as the festival and the country are concerned. Likely the minister would share that view with me. I hope everyone picks up the pieces, in some form or another, and goes on to restore that institution to the level we would like to have.

I want to deal with issues far broader than the Stratford festival, the vehicle which brought them to my attention. The criteria in the minister's press release included "a thorough and reasonable search". On December 3 I asked the minister for guidelines which would assist in determining who might be admitted to the country under a work permit. As reported at page 5283 of Hansard, the minister said:

—the question is which guidelines apply to companies, groups or organizations in Canada in terms of their hiring policy.

On the same page he was later reported as saying:

There is a responsibility on the part of any employer to ensure that proper and extensive searches are made to make sure that Canadians do have that opportunity of access to those jobs.

He went on to say that there was a certain obligation, as reported at page 5284 of Hansard:

—to make sure that when a choice is made Canadians are given the opportunity to make application and to have access to that employment. That is the only criterion.

This is where the minister and I part ways. The minister referred my colleagues and me to the legislation and the spirit in which Parliament passed the act because on December 3 I asked about the economic and cultural considerations. I think the same answer would apply to the cultural considerations, but when I asked him about the economic ones, he said:

The decision with regard to the economic impact of the appointment of a director should fall squarely upon the board of directors of that institution.

I think the minister is wrong. He suggested that we on this side should read the act, which is good advice. In part I, section 3 of the act, the objectives of the Canadian immigration policy, the preamble indicates that the act is "designed and administered in such a manner as to promote the domestic and international interest of Canada". I emphasize the word "international", but then it goes on to indicate one of the criterion in section 3(b) is "to enrich and strengthen the cultural and social fabric of Canada, taking into account the federal and bilingual" characteristics of Canada. Subsection (e) is "to facilitate the entry of visitors into Canada for the purposes of fostering trade, commerce, tourism, cultural and scientific activities and international understanding." Subsection (h) is "to foster the development of a strong and viable economy and the prosperity of all regions in Canada."

I accused the minister of implementing immigration policy in isolation or in a vacuum, but I believe he has a mandate to consider much more than a thorough and extensive search. He said:

—to make sure that when a choice is made Canadians are given the opportunity to make application and to have access to that employment. That is the only criterion.

The act does not indicate that it is the only criterion. It lists various criteria in terms of what shall be considered as "designed and administered in such a manner as to promote the domestic and international interests of Canada". It goes on to specify economic, cultural and tourism interests. Yet the minister said that the only criterion is to ensure "Canadians are given the opportunity to make application".

In reading the criteria in the act, I have great difficulty reconciling them with the minister's answers in the House earlier this week. It seems to me, if we bring in someone of international renown to work with Canadians, as we have in Stratford and other artistic endeavors, it is greatly in the interests of Canadians. I am sure other theatrical companies have done this. Perhaps the Toronto symphony is a good example in terms of visiting conductors. I do not know, but certainly non-Canadian conductors have been brought in to conduct that symphony orchestra during its history. It is greatly in the interests of Canadians to have the marvellous and unique opportunity of working with the best in the world.

Mr. McDermid: Ontario Place.

Mr. Jarvis: Yes, Ontario Place, as my colleague mentions. I am sure there are various examples. Maybe the Winnipeg symphony would be a better-known example to the minister. Perhaps I could refer to the Neptune Theatre, the Citadel Theatre or wherever.

I am not a soccer fan; I do not know much about the sport, but when the North American Soccer League was getting started it brought Pele from Brazil to participate in the league. I thought it was terrific because it attracted an interest in the sport which otherwise would not have occurred. Robin Phillips is the outgoing artistic director of Stratford. I think it is marvellous that a company, which is 98 per cent Canadian, had the chance to work with Robin Phillips because it makes them better performers.

An hon. Member: Right on.

Mr. Jarvis: I think the minister should read the act and look at some of the other criteria. I am really concerned—and I think the Liberal government has been consistent in this regard—about the government's Peter Newman mentality. Peter Newman's mentality is to build a cultural curtain around Canada, which is based on the premise that we are not good enough to compete outside Canada. There may be some basis for it, but I do not accept it. I remember the Hon. Robert Stanfield indicating something to the effect that a truly dynamic country must be more than a refuge. I am not a very profound person, but that comment meant a great deal to me.

• (1450)

I read the comments of Mr. Bliss, the Executive Director of the Metropolitan Opera Company, who drew very interesting distinctions. He said one might consider top talent—I suppose he meant in terms of performers, directors or producers—in a different light than ordinary talent. I suppose one might compare Maggie Smith coming into Stratford, or a symphony director coming into Toronto, or a soccer star coming in to play soccer, in a different light than an understudy at Stratford. In my view that understudy has to be Canadian so he or she benefit from the Maggie Smiths and whomever else—Brian Bedford, and so on. Mr. Bliss draws that distinction very well. I am not quite sure the minister does.

But the other distinction which is even more important and which is hard to come to grips with is that Mr. Bliss says one must distinguish between a performing company in a national sense, a national company, and a world company. And he considers the Metropolitan Opera Company a world company. I cannot judge that because I am not an opera fan and I do not know much about it. But Mr. Bliss said he considers the Metropolitan Opera Company an international company, a world company. Therefore, one can make the distinction that international stars should be admitted to the U.S. to sing with that company.

Maybe I think too much of Stratford but I am told by those whose judgment I value that Stratford is in the top three, internationally, in the English-speaking theatre.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jarvis: I say to the minister we may be the victim of our own success. There is a down side if they are in that league. It is the big league, and you have to play with the big guys in that league. That may be part of the problem. The Minister of Communications said to his colleague, the Minister of Immigration, that Stratford is an international institution. I agree with him. I think we all agree on that. I am not sure the Minister of Immigration is in agreement with that because of this Peter Newman philosophy. Maybe there are other institutions in that category. I suppose the Montreal Canadiens are more than a national institution—I would hope so, having won that many Stanley Cups. I do not think the minister understands there is another category, which Mr. Bliss calls the world company class.

I think we build walls around Canada under the guise of nationalism. It is true, because we are afraid and timid to compete in the greater world arena. I do not know why we should be afraid to compete. The minister knows we have had extraordinary Canadians in the TV production field who went to the United States and the United Kingdom because they wanted to get into that competition since it did not exist here. They wanted to have a chance to compete with the best, to see how they would fare. I say bravo to that. If the reverse is true, if a Maggie Smith, a Brian Bedford, a John Dexter, a Robin Phillips, a Peter Cole or a John Neville is permitted into Canada to work with Canadian companies—98 per cent Canadian like Stratford—I think that gives the Canadian a tremendous amount of confidence when people like those I have mentioned say, "You are good. I know, because I am an international judge. I have directed all over the English-speaking world." I think it is absolutely magnificent for Canadians to have that kind of compliment paid to them. I do not know if the comparison I have given is very good with reference to the extensive search.

Does the minister really believe that if the Winnipeg Blue Bombers fire their coach they will conduct an extensive and exhaustive search before they make an offer to someone from the NHL?

That has been our history. I do not know how many of them there have been. I suppose the coach in Edmonton who has been here a long time may be a naturalized Canadian. Maybe George Brancato is one. We all know, generally speaking, that CFL coaches are brought in from the U.S., usually under work permits, and they go back to Texas, Louisiana, or New York at the end of the season and spend the winter in a more moderate climate. Then they return under work permits.

With respect to musicians and conductors, I wonder if we really have an extensive and exhaustive search for a Canadian before someone comes in to spend a year or two with the Toronto Symphony. The other category is with respect to university professors. I do not know what it is like now, but when I went to university there were always several professors from the United Kingdom, and more from the U.S. At law schools I attended there were professors from Harvard, Yale or Columbia. I never heard about an exhaustive search being conducted to find a Canadian. The same applies to football coaches and players, and so on.

The last point I want to make is that the minister has selected a certain criterion. He says there is just one. I think there are more. What very much disturbs me is that he has that absolute right—I quarrel with the criteria but I agree when he says he has to make the final decision here. Sure he does, and I respect that. I do not have any direct quote to nail him with, but I am worried about the minister going beyond that and saying, "You must satisfy me that you have made a thorough search." If he has not said expressly, "Go out and make a thorough search", he has implied it. That is okay. But when he says "I know there is somebody out there", that is not okay. The second part is not okay.

The minister cannot be the czar of professional athletics, of the performing arts, of university professors or symphony conductors. The minister can set these guidelines out for these organizations, that is, that they must go through the process. Maybe the process is only putting the notice on the board at manpower offices which says that the job is open. I think it should be more than that. I think the minister thinks it should be more than that. But I do not think the minister can say, "Go out and do this search because I know there are Canadians out there who can fill this job." The minister might even go so far as to say that there is John Doe, Mr. X and Mr. Y, out there, and so on. But that second step is too dangerous.

The minister has no mandate, no ability, nor do his officials, to substitute their judgment for the judgment of the board of directors of an athletic club, a theatre, or a university board of governors, or whatever. He has no mandate, no ability, and I presume precious little time to substitute his judgment and determine who shall be selected. He has all the authority in the world to set the criteria, but I say to the minister that he is interpreted by many as having taken that second vis-à-vis Stratford. He has virtually said to Stratford, "Do the search". Not only that, he has gone on to say "because I know there is a Canadian who can do the job." There may very well be. I hope so. But the minister has not the authority to go that far.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. The hon. minister may answer only if there is unanimous consent.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, I thank hon. members for allowing me to respond. The points made by the hon. member are worthy and deserving of a response if only to clarify the reason for the decision and the grounds upon which it was made. I hope I can answer some of his questions so he can properly relate them to his constituents in Stratford who, I know, are quite concerned.

I would like to begin by giving the hon. member every assurance that I have neither Peter Newman's mentality nor his money, nor any other of his characteristics. It is not that I do not respect the man but I do not think those are the grounds upon which the decision was made. There is a requirement under the act that any employer, whether an artistic organization, university, a factory or a firm, shall undertake a proper search to find out if there are Canadians available to fill the vacancy. In this circumstance it is quite clear to me, having weighed the evidence from a number of sources, that the board of directors has not conducted such a search in accordance with the law.

I would like to recall one series of events, without going through the whole history. The board of directors had in place a four-person directorate made up of Canadians, whom they dismissed. It was their right to do that. But at the very instant of dismissing them they made application for the hiring of Mr. Dexter, who was obviously a qualified man. There was not even a hint of hesitation between that act of dismissal and the act of hiring a new director from offshore. The hon. member must agree that this does not constitute a proper and effective search especially when a person to replace the one who was just fired is already at hand. I have made no effort, and will make no effort, to dictate to anybody as to who should be chosen. As I have said in this House before, I feel it is my responsibility to ensure that Canadians in the artistic community at least have a chance to make application for a given job and to demonstrate their credentials so as to be duly considered by the board. Canadians should not be totally ignored because it was felt, in the judgment of the board, that Mr. Dexter could do a better job.

The point is that it was not a matter of preference over Canadians; it was a total exclusion of Canadians. The claim by the board that it spent 18 months does not hold water because evidence clearly shows that it stretched beyond the 18 months. Many of the offers made went back 18 months before Mr. Dexter even became a gleam in the eye and before the director was hired. There is a lot of history which could be gone into, but I would simply assure the hon. member that the judgment employed was employed for the reason that it appeared Canadians were being excluded.

I would also point out to the hon. member, because he has raised some general principles with regard to the Immigration Act and how it applies to athletes and other groups of people, that there is the requirement that other groups and organizations must apply exactly the same standards. The case at Stratford has been duplicated many other times by many other ministers who have had to make a similar judgment. For example, there are very strict standards in the hiring of a university personnel, partially because over a period of years the tendency was, perhaps due to academic routine—and I can attest to that—some university faculties were composed up to 70 per cent or 90 per cent of Americans or people from other countries. This occurred even though there were Canadians in the same field available. There was a certain disposition to think that someone from a certain graduate school should be hired. I will not go into it, but what we require now when a university wishes to hire a dean, a president or a professor, is a demonstration that it has made a proper search for academics of similar qualification across Canada.

It goes back to the point I made earlier in my remarks—that certain cases hit the headlines because they have a sensational quality, they strike the imagination or because a confrontation occurs. Decisions have to be taken on these cases all the time. Unfortunately, I deal only with the rough cases. The easier cases are handled further down the line and the tough ones are passed up quickly. Discretion must be employed in most of the immigration categories because one is dealing with personalities. Immigration is not a matter of rubber-stamping something from a machine. It involves people with different histories, backgrounds, needs, and requirements and discretion must be applied.

There is no one in this chamber who would rather have the situation another way than me because I am the one who ends up making the decision. As I have discovered, there is no such thing as a totally happy decision; it tends to cut both ways, but these judgments must be made. One of the reasons we are in this chamber is that we have been elected to make such decisions. Public servants should not be called upon to take the tough decisions because they are not accountable; the decision cannot be made by a computer because it is a mechanical function. We will always be judged on the basis on which we take our decisions because of matters of human behaviour, and must be judged by people who apply some sense of standards.

Our judgements will differ. I guess that over a period of time the shadings of decisions made by members opposite would be different from those made by members on this side because of our different philosophies. One philosophy is Liberal and the other philosophy is Conservative. Each side feels strongly about its philosophy, and that would dictate a certain different range of decisions.

Rarely is there a clearcut answer to any immigration case. There are reasonable arguments on both sides and that is why we must spend time assessing the facts going over the information. Immigration sometimes slows down in its procedures, because it takes so long to gather all the documentation together and talk to the people involved. I have expressed concerns similar to those of the hon. member as to how well it all works under the new act. That is why I have established a task force within the department, namely, to examine things like the use of ministerial permits and the appeal procedures. I want to make sure that there is an absolute guarantee of fairness and equity in the system and eliminate areas where there may be a high degree of bias.

Since taking over this ministry I have had the opportunity to look at some of the past cases of my predecessor from the Conservative party. He was faced with equally tough and controversial decisions. I can recall feeling some sympathy for my predecessor while watching him on television during the last election as he was being barricaded in his constituency office by a group of people who did not like his decision in one particular case. In this area one is called upon to make Solomon-like judgments which turn out to be not so Solomon-like, but one can only do one's best. We should not dismiss in quite so cavalier fashion the idea that we can simply have this great open international policy. We as a Parliament spend a lot of money to defend the concept of the Canadian culture. Close to $600 million is spent on the CBC each year to ensure that there is a Canadian alternative. We do so for the reason that Canada is in a unique position. We have a small population with its own traditions and we live beside a very large country with enormous power and influence in media, culture and the arts.

Mr. McDermid: Yet we bring in all kinds of movie stars.

Mr. Axworthy: The requirements under the American labour laws for Canadians to be employed in the arts there are much tougher than our requirements. One of the reasons groups such as Actors' Equity and ACTRA become so incensed about Britons, Americans or someone else coming to Canada is that these organizations know full well they will not have the same ease of access to these foreign countries.

Mr. McDermid: Is that right?

Mr. Axworthy: It happens to be true.

Mr. McDermid: Is that right?

Mr. Axworthy: It is not right, but the fact is they create that kind of problem. Our problem is almost double because we are faced with the enormous influence which is exerted on the Canadian media and theatre and which could overwhelm us unless there was some form of response or alternative.

In an institution with the importance and significance of Stratford, the board of directors has a responsibility to give some due care and sensitive consideration to the availability of Canadians for the job. I am not saying that it is required to hire a Canadian, but it should make sure that it gives proper consideration to the hiring of a Canadian, and in this case there was no such consideration. That was the sole basis for the judgment.

The hon. member has said we should be careful because of the economic and cultural impact. I can assure him that I have considered these areas. I have had contact with members of Stratford to determine how the matter can be resolved. It is important that the festival go on, but it must be according to the spirit of the law of Canada and according to our principles and objectives in that law. I would hope that the hon. member, when he goes back to his riding, will argue for flexibility and openness in the minds of the board of directors who, rather than respond to my decision of last week and say, "If that is the decision we will start a search", up to this point in time have implacably refused to take any steps whatsoever.

We have taken certain initiatives in this regard, and I hope they will produce results. The board has not responded in that spirit, but has simply dug in its heels. I know that the member will use his office to say that there should be a way of ensuring that the festival will go on with the spirit of the law being honoured and recognized. I appreciate the way in which the hon. member has approached this matter, because I know it has caused him some difficulty in his riding. As I know there is a solution to Stratford, I dearly hope that the matter will be resolved, but it must be on the grounds of how I think I must administer, judge and interpret the laws.

[Translation]

Mr. Dubois: Mr. Chairman, with respect to the estimates of the Department of Employment and Immigration, I would like to deal briefly with all the programs which have been carried on and whose estimates have been increased and afterwards I will put the usual questions to the minister about those programs. First, as the House may recall, in June last, more especially on June 2, the department announced a series of steps costing some $137 million for this financial year, their purpose being to meet the critical and immediate problem of employment facing many Canadians. Of those $137 million, more than $100 million have been allotted this winter and next year to the community development program, especially in those areas where the unemployment rate is higher. In connection with that program, Canada Works, I think that under the previous government our colleagues opposite had decided to drop it. They will surely open their eyes and their ears to learn that many projects which could be beneficial to many people have been introduced.

In Quebec those projects are still very popular and many people have submitted applications. Any member from Quebec, as well as any other province will confirm that the amounts budgeted proved insufficient in view of the numerous applications. The one thing I regret is that, as far as Quebec is concerned, the program was to create jobs for unemployed men and women. Many associations, such as co-operatives and organizations, could submit projects.

What is especially unfortunate, and this, I am sure, is of great concern to the minister, is that the present government in Quebec refused to participate in that type of program by allowing municipalities to sponsor projects. I would like to deal with this refusal by my provincial government which I find deplorable. As a member of Parliament from Quebec I cannot accept the idea that my government, as a self-proclaimed promoter of job creation, could stand in the way of well established organizations, such as municipalities which are keenly aware of the needs and which can grant applications for sponsorship. I cannot understand why the Quebec government could have refused. The situation was such, in many municipalities of my riding, that people had to turn back and try, shortly before the deadline, and still claiming that municipalities had the authority to sponsor the projects, to find other organizations which do not always have the guarantees or the ability to act as sponsor for job-creation projects. A number of mayors in my area have brought up the problem. I certainly hope that the situation can be solved in the year ahead.

The community development program for Quebec had a budget of $37,931,000. In early December, 1,059 of those projects had already been approved for a total of $29 million. There were 3,247 applications received in Quebec, which would have required a total of $186,507,499. For example, and this situation does not exist only in my riding of Lotbinière, I had a budget of $336,000, while the amounts requested in the applications would have required over $2 million.

How is it that a government like that of Quebec, which claims to be progressive, perhaps not Progressive Conservative but progressive, should not realize just how popular that program is and allow permanent bodies such as municipalities to participate in an activity that is most important for job creation? With regard to community development programs, I said earlier in my remarks that the previous government had cancelled them. When you see the number of applications, even from Quebec alone, you realize just how much the people appreciate that kind of activity and are happy to participate and give jobs out there in our ridings.

Another example allows us to continue in that field. Looking at the years 1970-1979, we see that Canada, through the Canadian government, created more jobs, on a percentage basis than the United States, Australia, Sweden, Japan, Germany, the United Kingdom, countries whose economic growth is fairly high. On a percentage basis, according to my source, which is not really political, in fact it is the OECD, percentagewise Canada created over 32 per cent compared with 23 per cent for the United States, on a scale of zero, going up and down, in both directions. We see therefore that this situation should be maintained and even improved upon; we should not do what the administration did that is now sitting across the way from us, when it dropped those programs. The program situation having been brought up since June, there was talk of community development programs.

In that regard, Mr. Chairman, I think that the funds earmarked for those programs should be increased in the not too distant future because many people are involved in them. For instance, you have daycare centres, child care after school hours, emergency assistance services and also home care services for the old. Many people who were not directly affected by the community development program approached me, as my colleagues from Quebec have also surely been approached, with the suggestion that projects be presented to help out the old who are housebound and who do not have the help required to clean up the house and do odd jobs of that kind, and they asked us: Is it possible to introduce that type of program? Before going any further, I shall put the question directly to you. Do you think those programs can be restructured and their budgets increased in the near future, in view of the outstanding demand for them?

[English]

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member asks two very important questions. I should point out to hon. members, particularly those from the province of Quebec, that we have run into a real difficulty with the allocation of funds under the direct job employment programs with the province of Quebec.

Before the announcement of those programs or the allocation of funds, we made a special effort to consult with the province of Quebec and to encourage them to allow their municipalities to have access to direct employment money. As hon. members know, there is a law in that province which deals with the municipalities, requiring them to have the agreement of the provincial government before accepting a federal government grant in this area. To my disappointment, that has not been allowed for these direct employment programs. It has been denied. Mr. Johnson, who is no longer in the relevant portfolio, was quite adamant about this. I can assure hon. members, however, that as long as we are in this business we will keep trying to convince him otherwise. Perhaps it may take other changes instituted by the people of Quebec to bring this about, rather than something that we can do in this chamber.

Mr. Dubois: A change of government.

Mr. Axworthy: That is right. I am not in the position to make recommendations to the people of Quebec about their politics but perhaps in this case they have a very good and compelling reason for making a change!

I want to thank the hon. member for his comments about the community development project. As he knows, we had to put this program into effect very quickly because of its cancellation by the previous administration. Sometimes these things do not work as well as we would like, but generally we have been able to supply a good service, particularly to areas of high unemployment. The difficulty we ran into was in the actual allocation of funds, as we were working on estimates provided by the previous government. What we were able to do was translate some of that money back into the direct employment program. It is certainly my intention to make a case for additional funding under these programs because I think it fits the philosophy which we put forward in the Speech from the Throne. In other words, where we have resources in the employment field, they should go where the needs are greatest. It is my intention to apply most of the funds in the areas where unemployment is the highest, and to make sure the money actually goes into projects which normally provide employment but can provide valuable services to those communities also. Those are the two principles upon which we try to work. I ask the hon. member to use his good offices when and if he has an opportunity to discuss these matters with my colleagues. Perhaps he can help to provide them with the same encouragement he is providing me, by urging that we should be doing more in the direct employment field.

Mr. Dubois: Mr. Chairman, I thank the hon. minister and take note of this assertion concerning representations to be made to his colleagues. I think that this situation, particularly as it relates to community service programs, brings us to deal with a very important point because those projects which had been put forward are those which applied to the care of older people. Many departmental officials told us: In this regard, if you introduce programs for the care of older people in a home, you will create a dependency and that is not what we want. But I suggest the community service program indeed meets our desires and we will not fail to make the necessary representations to your colleagues.

There is another program which offers many possibilities, the Local Employment Assistance Program, LEAP for short. This program offers long-term financing for projects which contribute to business development and provide permanent employment for the participants or prepare them for a regular job. I have a question for the minister about this program. Some businesses in my constituency have tried to apply for assistance under this program. I come from the Lotbinière-Victoriaville area which comes under the jurisdiction of the administrative region of Trois-Rivières, which is part of the Sherbrooke region, which in turn comes under the jurisdiction of Montreal. Montreal oversees all these other areas, and a general budget is provided for a very large region, so that the officials of your department whom we contacted told us—

The Chairman: Order, please. Would the hon. member please address himself to the committee chairman.

Mr. Dubois: Mr. Chairman, could the department not decentralize the allocation of sums under this program, as it does for community development projects, because we are now being told the Montreal region has a certain amount of money to distribute among the Trois-Rivières, Victoriaville and Sherbrooke areas and there is not enough to go around. Would it be possible eventually to decentralize the LEAP program? It seems to be very popular, but it is too centralized in Montreal and this causes budget problems.

[English]

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, concerning the administration of the community development project, we have been working through the idea of an advisory board being placed in each constituency. This advisory board would work within the regional office of the employment and immigration commission. Actual processing does take place in the regional office in Montreal for the province of Quebec. However, we do rely very strongly upon the advice and recommendation of the local employment officers working with the advisory board and members of Parliament.

I am open to taking advice and recommendations as to how we could improve delivery of the program as well as how we might provide for greater accountability at the local level. We use the constituency advisory board system so there can be very strong local recommendations coming from each of the local communities within the riding. I believe that is what the hon. member is referring to—or is there another area that I missed?

[Translation]

Mr. Dubois: Yes, Mr. Chairman, it is another program, the full name is the Local Employment Assistance Program. This is a permanent program which provides for the long-term financing of projects that will contribute to the creation of an enterprise offering permanent jobs to people or preparing them for steady employment. It is rather this program that I am asking the minister to decentralize and not the community development projects. We know that each of the ridings have to go to Montreal to submit their projects. LEAP, that is, the Local Employment Assistance Program, is overcentralized in Montreal in my opinion. Is there any way to improve on this situation?

[English]

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, I apologize to the hon. member. I did not quite understand his question the first time around. If he is referring to the LEAP program, that is presently administered from the regional office in Montreal. What I might provide for him is something that we have now introduced in two of the western provinces under that program. I was not very satisfied with the delivery of that program in my own province of Manitoba, nor in the province of Saskatchewan, and for exactly the same reason. The projects tend to be given to one group of people and many others are ignored. A task force was set up in those two provinces. It recommended that allocation be done on a regional basis within the province. I would be quite prepared to talk with members of Parliament from Quebec to see if they would like to introduce a similar review in their own province and come up with similar recommendations. I do not mean they would have to come up with identical ones, but we could look at a delivery system within the province of Quebec to see if we could get a better representation. I will undertake, through my parliamentary secretary, to discuss that with members of Parliament from Quebec to see if that can be done.

The Chairman: I recognize the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Dubois) for one last question.

Mr. Dubois: Mr. Chairman, my last question deals with a situation which is gaining popularity in Canada and in Quebec. A number of families are adopting children from other countries as well as children from Canadian or Quebec parents. Some people have come to us to ask for the same benefits as for a mother giving birth to a child and getting unemployment benefits for a while before going back to work.

So I would like to ask the minister if under his department's policies in relation with adoption internationally or domestically, a working woman deciding to adopt a child could not enjoy the same unemployment benefits. What are we doing for that kind of woman now?

[English]

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, I just want to tell the hon. member that that is one of the topics being looked at in the unemployment insurance review which we initiated last spring. The first report will be in my hands before Christmas. It does include examination of that topic, which will then be discussed in Parliament. We will be working out our procedure for consultation after Christmas and there will be a full discussion at that time.

Mr. Speyer: Mr. Chairman, I wish to ask the minister a series of questions pertaining to the refusal of the work permit for John Dexter. The minister said certain things in answer to my friend, the hon. member from Perth, with which I agreed. He is correct when he said that in the Immigration Act there is a requirement to see whether any Canadian citizen can do the job adequately for which purpose it was designed.

There is also a philosophy within the regulations and within the discretion to promote the free movement of exceptional international talent. Sometimes there is a collision between these two values. In statements both inside and outside the House, the minister stated that in his judgment, and it is his judgment that is absolutely paramount in this case, there was not an adequate search made for a successor to Robin Phillips. I would like the minister to reply, in some detail if he wishes, because there was an extensive investigation conducted by his department, stating the information that he acted upon in terms of whether there was an adequate search. In other words, I am after the facts which led the minister to his conclusion that there was an inadequate search.

We have known for some time that Robin Phillips would be leaving Stratford. A search was in fact conducted. The minister pointed out that a Canadian directorate had been appointed and their services were terminated. I would like the minister to state to the committee on the basis of the information he received how many Canadians were interviewed, and how many turned it down. Will he inform the Canadian people and myself of this, because I do not know the facts? I would like to know the facts upon which he arrived at his conclusion. I ask the minister to be detailed in telling us the facts upon which he came to the conclusion the board did not make a proper search.

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, I will try to answer that question. It is difficult in some cases because the facts which came from the board were confusing. It was not certain at all over the 18 months the hon. member speaks of who was contacted and whether they were offered the same conditions as Mr. Dexter or what kind of approach was made. Many people who might have been available were disregarded out of hand without ever being contacted. Several of those who were contacted were offered different kinds of conditions. It was in the time period prior to the time the directorate was established.

Perhaps the hon. member was not in the House when I replied to the previous member. I will repeat. At the point the Canadian directorate was fired or dismissed, no effort was made in any way, shape or form to contact any Canadian to offer him or her the job. Mr. Dexter was already waiting in the wings, to use a theatrical expression. There was no effort to contact any Canadian at that point in time.

Mr. Speyer: I do not think anyone would disagree with the minister's conclusion that Mr. Dexter was, to use the minister's words, in the wings at the time the Canadian directorate was terminated. My question is, before they were hired, how many Canadians had been asked and had been offered contracts? Will the minister please tell the names of these people who were offered contracts to assume the directorship at Stratford.

Mr. Axworthy: I do not believe it is up to me to offer that information to the hon. member. That is information within the knowledge of the board of governors. It is something they may want to keep privileged. If the hon. member wants information, I suggest he talk to the board of governors. I simply tell him that I consulted a number of sources, among them the board of governors as well as other organizations and other people. On the basis of all that information, I came to my decision. If the hon. member wants that information from the board of governors, I am sure they will be prepared to receive his inquiry.

Mr. Speyer: Mr. Chairman, I am not interested in what the board of directors did. I am interested in the information upon which the minister acted in exercising his judgment. It may have been proper, it may have been improper. I am entitled to the exact information with regard to what the board of directors did on the basis of the report that was given to the minister. Will the minister give us the factual information with respect to enticing or asking other Canadians to take over the festival directorship over the period of 18 months? Who was approached? Were there significant contractual problems? Were the offers acceptable? We would like to know the information the minister acted upon in reaching his decision, not what the board did?

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, I thought I had made my position clear to the hon. member. I told him the reason for making the decision, namely, that there was no search undertaken by the directorate. If the hon. member wants to go back into history prior to that time, he is welcome to do so. I invite him to talk to the board. As minister, I have the responsibility to check a number of sources. If the hon. member wants to make him own search, I would invite him to do that.

Mr. Speyer: I submit it is the height of unfairness when a minister in the House on two separate occasions squarely blames the board for an inadequate search for Canadian talent and then refuses to disclose the information upon which he made his decision. I can think of nothing more irresponsible. Why will he not make the facts available upon which he made his decision? I am not interested in his conclusion. I am interested in the facts that led to his conclusion so that the Canadian people can decide whether the minister was right or wrong. It is a question of preference. Everyone will not agree. However, we are entitled to the facts upon which the investigation was undertaken by his ministry and what caused him to arrive at that conclusion.

I would like to ask a broader question having to do with the free movement of international talent. I will focus on exceptional international talent. Is there a comprehensive policy for the minister in exercising his discretion to deny an application by one exceptional artist and grant a permit to another. The other day I asked the minister about a person such as Peter Ustinov who came for a limited stay to play King Lear. Obviously he is an actor of great capacity. He was granted a work permit. Why was a man of artistic value such as John Dexter not allowed the same? Is it the ad hoc whim of the minister or is there some type of comprehensive policy to deal with artists?

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, I simply refer the hon. member to Hansard and the answer given at that time. When somebody is coming for a particular term and is engaged for a theatrical performance, a work permit is applied for and a judgment is made. The permit may or may not be issued. Where there is a position that has a higher degree of permanency, such as full artistic director where the work permit applied for is for a full year, a more extensive search is made. If the hon. member would like to read the regulations in that area, I invite him to do so and he will get the full details.

Mr. Speyer: I wish to ask the minister another question because there are not many tentacles within the discretion that is exercised. We know that in the sport area in Canada, there has been a great deal of controversy concerning Canadian quarterbacks. In my province there is the case of James Bone from the University of Western Ontario, an outstanding Canadian quarterback. According to the findings of the Ontario Human Rights Commission, he did not get a fair chance in the CFL. When young men such as Scott Mallender or Jamie Bone, both of exceptional ability, wish to play quarterback in the CFL, they must compete against talent from foreign sources. When issuing permits to athletes from offshore will the minister take this into consideration as he did in the case of John Dexter? Will he take into consideration that there are exceptional Canadians who might play quarterback on CFL teams but, because of the unfairness of the regulations, they are not given an adequate chance. The minister's decision in the Dexter case gives rise to many implications. I want to know whether there is a comprehensive policy dealing with entertainers or artists or whether it is done at the ad hoc whim of the minister.

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, I suggest the implications are in the eyes of the beholder. The hon. member is in danger of building up a series of fanciful castles in the sky to satisfy his own time allotment. The fact is that by making those comparisons they simply are comparing apples to oranges or, as in this case, football players and artistic directors. I would point out to the hon. members, in case he has never tried out for an athletic team, particularly in the professional sense, there are Canadians on the field competing at the same time. It is my observation that in the CFL there is not only a Canadian quota requirement—that is one reason I suppose why we have superior football clubs in the west due to better coaching of Canadian home-brewed players—but on the field itself the competition is equal. If a particular coach or judge or management body uses bias or discrimination, that causes concern which, again, the board of directors should be taking up with them. The fact is, competition is there and the access is there. In the case of Mr. Dexter there was not even access provided.

Mr. Speyer: Mr. Chairman, I think with respect to the question of quarterbacks in the CFL the minister has demonstrated his vast ignorance of that subject. The matter was before the Ontario Human Rights Commission and there is no doubt as to the findings of that commission. In that case there was a sense of discrimination against Jamie Bone and damages were awarded. If the minister is not even sensitive to that, I do not understand how he can be sensitive to matters pertaining to artists. I conclude on this matter by stating that on Wednesday and again today the minister has failed to disclose the facts upon which this case was decided. We know that every case depends on the particular facts that give rise to it. The minister has categorically blamed the board—he may be right or wrong—but he refuses to disclose the information upon which he acts.

I asked the minister the other day about the report of his officials when it reached his desk after the intensive investigation which was promised. There was no answer forthcoming. He said he assumed responsibility. He is right. He does assume responsibility, but he has a responsibility to say what the officials recommend in terms of the facts and not the conclusions drawn. It is disgraceful that we have a minister of the Crown who makes assertions against very important and respected men and women in communities next to mine. The minister refuses to tell the facts upon which he made those decisions.

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, I find it somewhat curious that the hon. member has not been able to absorb the facts which I have given him.

Mr. Speyer: You have given us nothing.

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, I have told the hon. member quite clearly several times, although he obviously was unable to hear. The facts were that at the time at which there was an opening for the position of artistic director following the firing of a director, there was only one person considered and that was Mr. Dexter who is not a Canadian. That is fact, Mr. Chairman. It is the fact upon which the decision was based. There was no effort made, not a finger lifted, not a phone call no letter or advertisement to provide any opportunity for anyone else—

Mr. Speyer: What about before that?

Mr. Axworthy: We are talking about the position that was filled and then opened. Let us hope that the hon. member is able to understand that secret. I do not wish to explain the sequence to him, but there was a directorate, they were dismissed, another person was hired and that was Mr. Dexter. No search was made.

Mr. Speyer: Why don't you tell the whole story?

Miss Bégin: Listen.

Mr. Axworthy: The fact simply stated is that the hon. member is totally and completely unprepared to listen to the facts.

Mr. Maltais: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to take part once again this week in the debate on the Department of Employment and Immigration. First I would like to congratulate the minister and his department for their excellent work in my area of Manicouagan because as a whole the department performs relatively well. I might add in passing, since the minister is also responsible for the office on the Status of Women in Manicouagan, that two women are managers of the Canada Manpower centres, namely Mrs. Bujold in Port-Cartier and Mrs. Pelchat in Sept-Îles. The person responsible for the community programs of Canada is Mrs. Georgette Desjardins who does outstanding work. I think that hon. members in the House often have occasion to adopt a more or less critical or even negative attitude. At this stage, it is proper to state just the same that things are going well and that the people there are doing an excellent job.

Still it stands to reason that an overly large riding such as Manicouagan experiences some problems and I think it is difficult for the department officials to understand, no matter who is minister. Just the same it remains an area which is difficult to identify or at least it is rather difficult to define the problems since in that same constituency there are not two places alike, there is not a town or a village that has similar problems.

I would also like to thank the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Employment and Immigration who is doing an excellent job and with whom we have friendly relations. He is prepared to listen to us at any time. I can certify in my case that he can be reached day or night.

I should like to put another direct question about the extension program aimed at the Havre-Saint-Pierre area up to Blanc-Sablon. The main office is located in Sept-Îles while another important office is located in Baie-Comeau. East of Sept-Îles, over a stretch of 450 miles, the most important town is Havre-Saint-Pierre. We have a branch office in Havre-Saint-Pierre and that town is located 150 miles east of Sept-Îles and there ends the road. Past Havre-Saint-Pierre there is another 350-mile stretch without roads, along which there are 14 Anglophone hamlets, and a few with adjoining Indian reserves. The problem at this point is that the people who want to phone or meet the representatives of the department, either at Havre-Saint-Pierre or at Sept-Îles, can travel only by plane or by boat, seeing there are no roads. The program has now existed for two or three years; it has cost the department $120,000 to keep a branch office at Havre-Saint-Pierre and have a few agents along the coast.

I ask the minister to review the program completely or that part of the program in order to institutionalize it so that henceforth Havre-Saint-Pierre can be considered as a full-fledged manpower centre, and there can be project officers here and there along the coast. That is very important, and I would even ask the minister to consider the point of view of the manpower centre manager at Sept-Îles, Mrs. Pelchat, whom I spoke of previously. It is imperative that there be consultation in preparing the program to ensure that it really takes into account particular local circumstances. That covers my first question.

The second question deals with Canada Works or community development projects. We should stop changing names every year and settle for one name to give us a chance to know what we are talking about. Those programs are of basic importance to the people back home because we have managed to build up a lot of community services, buildings, wharves to launch boats, public parks, all of which are concrete achievements of great social advantage and public benefit. Still, we have a problem right now because Quebec is opposed to any construction unless it meets the standards of OCQ, and also because the salary paid on community development projects in Canada is $4.50 an hour, while the Office de Construction du Québec wages are set at $10 to $12 an hour; this means that it is no longer possible for us to work on construction projects.

So that the program does not go haywire, so to speak, and lead nowhere, I think we should accept fewer applications but increase the amounts, so that we get more concrete results. In my area, that is basic. I wish the north shore, which I represent, were considered somewhat apart from other Quebec regions, because the type of building we do there is quite basic. On that point I would ask the minister to get in touch with the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans to indicate to him that it is his responsibility to look after wharves and that he should not delegate that responsibility to you and do things to save money.

Last year, when we were in opposition, I said the same thing to the then minister, Mr. Atkey, and Mr. LeBlanc, who was listening, gave tremendous applause. I would therefore urge him to swallow the same medicine, because the department has a role to play and should not replace or substitute itself for another. I would like each—

The Chairman: Order. Would the hon. member please address the chairman of the committee.

Mr. Maltais: Mr. Chairman, if the minister and his officials are listening, all I can say is thumbs up!

As far as Canada Works projects are concerned, the amount could stay the same, but the number of projects should be decreased so that we get more complete and more concrete projects, with salaries in accordance with Quebec standards and so that our community framework remains top quality. A third important point that I would like to emphasize is the need for information. People are not aware of the regulations governing the mobility or moving programs, and when in good faith they report to manpower centres to apply for a job in this or that part of the country they have found and for which they would get paid such and such salary, they are told by the official that there is section 2 or 4 which states that they must not have started working and that, unfortunately, they have been working for 15 days already. On the other hand, they must not earn more than a maximum salary. These people realize immediately that they are not eligible.

It is a well known fact, however, that the procedure for professionals is quite different, since they are there on a trial basis and are therefore in no need to start; on the other hand, they agree to a six-month contract with a lower salary, which admits a playful interpretation, so that qualified workers are privileged over untrained workers who may really be needy. This happens all the time at the manpower centres, whether or not you know the officials. In charge of student employment for three summers in my own area, I have learned how far it is possible to go in the area of regulations and especially interpretation. I wish the department would look into this and provide on television more information concerning the regulations truly affecting the users. I suggest the department's contribution leaves much to be desired, as far as the methodology and the application of regulations directly affecting the users is concerned.

I should like also to deal with another point and to make again the same recommendation to the minister, because the process is slow, as I indicated to the Minister of Transport last Wednesday. Six months ago already, I told the department that it should appoint a judge on the arbitration board on the north shore. That was six months ago and he has not been appointed yet. What would it take to have someone appointed in less than six months? I wonder, Mr. Minister. Red tape? The Privy Council? What is going on? The department must bring someone from Quebec City to Sept-Îles and pay for his travelling and lodging expenses. That is a shameful waste of public funds that could be avoided by proceeding some other way. I am not saying it is your fault, Mr. Minister. Nor anybody else's. I am not putting anybody on trial. But those are the facts. Six months later the person recommended as judge on the arbitration board for the north shore area has still not been appointed. We think that is an important matter to which we require a prompt solution. Most of all I would not like this to happen again. It is not enough to criticize a situation, it should not happen again. And often the public servants should follow up on the matters we raise with them. What is infuriating is that we write letters and make appeals that remain unanswered. I should like the public servants who are responsible to the minister to tell him about particular cases that need to be brought up in the Privy Council. I receive an average of 45 calls a day and about 100 letters. There is no way I can deal with all those cases. I think there should be someone in the department whose task would be to follow up on the matters we raise with him.

I would like to bring something else to the attention of the minister. I do not know how much time I have left. Time goes by so quickly. However I would like to make a recommendation about a bureaucratic administration which is extremely rigid and callous. Should we not create in manpower centres the position of local or regional ombudsman, I mean one or three persons, more or less like what we in Quebec call the services—I forget the name—with regard to the ombudsman you simply have to appear before somebody who is usually a judge and present your case, this costs $5 or $10 and then you state your arguments directly and you get—it is the small claims court, that is what it is called. There would be one or three persons who would be hired on a full-time basis and when someone having dealt with your department would feel dissatisfied, not on acount of the Canada Works program, but because of regulations regarding unemployment insurance or regarding his search for a job, this person could go and see these three individuals whose main task would be to make a decision and within 24 hours the case would be dealt with.

What is now difficult for claimants is that all answers are computerized and very often they do not take any account of special situations and cause even more problems to the person in trouble than they solve. If the system could at least be humanized and each case explained with a judgement given within 24 hours, this would take away much of the frustration that now exists. I am not saying that another structure should be created, but simply that someone on top should listen every week to the complaints of claimants. There could perhaps be a deterrent fee of $5 to $10 for each appearance before the board which would be responsible for making rulings within 24 hours, and this would in my opinion take away much of the frustration of the present system and even clarify some of the rulings that are made regularly.

I would like in closing to note that the constituency of Manicouagan has received over $15 million within the last ten years under the Local Initiatives Program, Canada Works, Young Canada Works and community development projects. For instance, several villages received more money under the Canada Works program in one year than the annual budget of the municipality. This program is essential in our area. Of course it should be reviewed and amended as any other program, but it should be maintained and even extended and perhaps better adapted to various areas, which is very important in our case.

I have a few minutes left. The people of Schefferville, Gagnon and Fairmount, who live 385 miles north of Sept-Îles, cannot call the Sept-Îles manpower centre free of charge if they have complaints or comments to make or if they want to ask for explanations. This is surprising, and it is the same everywhere else in Canada. If we look at the phone book, we see that the only department which allows collect calls or calls through the Zenith exchange is the Department of National Revenue. In any phone book, as soon as we have 300 or even 100 people in a village, it is written: Government of Canada, Zenith Exchange, National Revenue of Canada. These people are easy to contact. But for other departments, it is unthinkable. Therefore I would ask department officials to reconsider this very important problem which creates gross injustice. It must be corrected because I live in a communication constituency, a transport constituency, and I believe there is no reason why we should have to pay for calls made to officials of the Department of Employment and Immigration.

I also wish to congratulate Mr. Jean Bouchard, director of the Department of Employment and Immigration, who did a beautiful job welcoming refugees, who was very active and should be set as an example, I suggest, for those officials who want to show initiative. I believe this must be pointed out, because unfortunately, employment security too often enables people to remain idle, and to wait for other people to serve them instead of being at their service. I would ask departmental officials to ascertain whether the human aspect is really present in offices, whether some efforts are really being made. I went to the Sept-Îles office, and as a whole, the situation there is relatively good, but if you go to those in Quebec City or Montreal, you really feel you are a number among others, which, I suggest, is very depressing for people who have to visit them. I conclude with these remarks, Mr. Chairman. I would appreciate receiving immediate answers if possible, but above all I would appreciate written ones, since we will be discussing this again next year.

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member has supplied us with a number of very useful suggestions. As he suggests, we could supply him with written answers to many of the recommendations he has made. I take particular note of the proposal for an ombudsman which I find to be a very attractive idea. I know how close and accessible he is to our parliamentary secretary, so I will ask the parliamentary secretary to follow up that particular suggestion and give us a report.

[Translation]

Mr. Maltais: Mr. Chairman, could you tell me how much time I have remaining?

The Chairman: Four minutes to go.

Mr. Maltais: I would also like, Mr. Chairman, to emphasize the significant contribution made by your department to the Port Cartier area when ITT closed down. The department acted with rather amazing speed to help directly the people who were in immediate need. This has to be emphasized, because in such areas morale dips very low at times, and this was a severe blow. I must pay tribute to the department officials who acted without delay.

I would now like to know what can be done in the foreseeable future for the people in Port Cartier. I already wrote to the minister to ask whether the man in charge of the manpower centre advisory group should not be integrated with the Port Cartier office, the gentleman who worked between ITT and the manpower centre. In my view, that official did an outstanding job. He has a trememdous knowledge of the whole ITT situation, and it would be important in my view that he be integrated into the department because very often I have had to contact people in the Port Cartier manpower centre and refer to the ITT file, and not too many people know the case as well as a certain Mr. Gilles Larouche over there. And quite honestly I am not aware of the internal department mechanism to ascertain this, but it is my opinion it should be integrated to the Port Cartier staff, because this is quite important. This is my last remark. I would appreciate very much that you consider this, and I would appreciate receiving a response to my requests including that for Port Cartier.

[English]

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, I would like to thank the hon. member for his commendation and his kind words about our officials and I will make sure that they are passed on to them. We are also prepared to look at the recommendation he made to see if it is possible to carry it out.

Mr. Ellis: Mr. Chairman, I wish to participate in this debate very briefly. I want to bring publicly to the minister's attention a matter which has been before me now for almost two months and one about which, unfortunately, I spoke to the minister way back in October. At that time I wrote the minister spelling out the problem of a refugee family from Vietnam who had applied to come to Canada together with the family of a brother who were also refugees. They had been sponsored by two separate Roman Catholic churches. The first family was brought over as a result of work done by Saint Michael's, and the second family was being brought over by Holy Rosary. Unfortunately, in the camp—and I can only guess at the circumstances which prevailed there—the family applied to come to both Canada and the United States, although they had been told not to do so. However, I can readily understand that in the deplorable conditions in which they found themselves, they saw it as an insurance guarantee that they might at least get out of the camp in which they were staying. They were accepted by both Canada and the United States. However, the transportation to the United States turned up first. At first they hesitated about getting on the U.S. aircraft simply because they really wanted to come to Canada. They were told by the authorities in the camp, however, that unless they got on their airplane to the United States, they might be prevented from ever leaving the camp. As a consequence, they did as I am sure any of us would do under the circumstances. They boarded the American aircraft and ultimately arrived in Atlanta, Georgia. The very industrious people from Holy Rosary tracked them down, made contact with them and again expressed their willingness and desire to bring that family to Prince Edward-Hastings.

It was at that point that I contacted the minister and, as was not unreasonable, was asked to write a letter. On October 22 I wrote a letter giving all the details and the name of the family, which unfortunately I could not begin to pronounce. I wrote about the fact that the family was in Atlanta, that the officials in Atlanta were holding that family in abeyance so far as settling them was concerned until such time as the Canadian authorities could deal with the matter, because obviously there would be co-operation between them. Having done that, I myself subsequently contacted people in the minister's office two or three times a week. Usually we deal with a different person each time. I received only one letter back from the minister which was a month later, on November 13. It was the usual note saying that the minister had received the inquiry and would write shortly. Again that was almost a month ago and we still have not settled the case of this poor family.

Today we had a call from the department, from another person in the department, asking if we could give them more details. May I say to the minister, through you, Mr. Chairman, that the department has all the details. The family is in Atlanta, they were originally destined to come to Belleville, there is a family in the church of the Holy Rosary waiting to look after them in Belleville, the family wants to come, the authorities in the States are prepared to let them come, and the people in Belleville are prepared to drive down to Atlanta and drive them back to Canada. They have been down to Atlanta once already and have spoken to the family. I do not know what more we can do to clear up this very simple misunderstanding.

I am told that the reason the Canadian authorities are procrastinating is that once the family left the camp in Viet Nam and came to the United States, they were no longer under the jurisdiction of the United Nations. That is the excuse we have been given, but surely to goodness compassion would indicate that the family arrived in the United States simply because they were desperate to leave a completely untenable situation. Surely common sense and decency would indicate that when everything is ready for them here, they should be allowed to come. Perhaps we can send another family back to the States, I really do not know. I do not mean to be facetious about this, but surely in some things that are as straightforward and simple as this the minister could, with the stroke of a pen, make provision for this family to come to Canada to be with their relatives. There is a home for them, there is employment for them, and everything is ready and waiting for them. I wonder why we cannot have that happen.

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, I apologize to the hon. member if there has been some delay. We have been looking at the case, we have tried to get the information that is available. We transferred the file that we had down to the Atlanta office where we have an immigration officer employed, and they have been dealing with the U.S. authorities there and the family itself.

However, the case is not quite as simple as the hon. member makes it out to be. What did take place is that the family applied to come to both countries—

Mr. Ellis: I said that.

Mr. Axworthy: —it was accepted by both countries, but it did not tell the other country that it was applying to the other.

Mr. Ellis: I said that.

Mr. Axworthy: As a result, there was some confusion. The difficulty is this, that now they are landed in the United States and have been accepted, they no longer qualify as refugees.

Mr. Ellis: I said that.

Mr. Axworthy: The hon. member may have said it, but it means that there is a different requirement under the law. There is a law that has to be administered. For me to sign the permit by a stroke of the pen would not give them the same kind of permanency as they would have otherwise if they came under another category. The minister's permit is only good for a year and must be extended year after year. If we could try to provide a more permanent way for them to come, we would try to do so. I am simply saying to the hon. member that it is not quite as easy as signing a minister's permit. That would not provide them with the permanent settlement they desire. There is the other point, that if we take this family, it denies another refugee family still in the camps the right to come to either the United States or Canada. It might not be a critical consideration, but we are trying to work out a means for the family to come to Belleville under a more permanent settlement, rather than the temporary one of the minister's permit. If the member was simply asking for that, it can be done, but certainly it is not the preferable solution under the circumstances.

Mr. Ellis: Mr. Chairman, I am sorry, but what I am hearing is bureaucratic red tape. If a family came from Vietnam or from some refugee camp on an aircraft directly to Canada, there would be absolutely no problem. We are talking about blood brothers, close relatives; these people are close families. If these people had boarded an aircraft and come directly to Canada, there would be absolutely no problem. But, they got here part way on a different aircraft. They stopped along the way, not because they wanted to, but they were desperate to get out of the refugee camp. Now they would like to continue their trip, and their trip can be continued. The people from Holy Rosary will take the same station wagon, which they have used two or three times to visit them, and pick them up. They will put them in the station wagon and drive them to Belleville where their family, a home and everything else is waiting. Surely to goodness somewhere in the United States they could find one other family, if they want to take them into Atlanta, Georgia.

Surely it does not disrupt this confounded bureaucracy that much that these people, out of desperation, travelled a few hundred miles off track in a trip of some 10,000 miles. Surely it is not a big problem. I am not suggesting the use of the minister's permit. I frankly do not know all the ways and means by which this can happen, but it seems to me it is very, very simple. These people have been delayed almost two months by nothing other than bureaucratic red tape. The kind, generous and proper thing to do would be to reunite the family before Christmas as they were originally. I do not know how it can be done or what permits should be used; I really do not care. But if they could be brought from a plane which would have landed in Montreal to Belleville, they can be brought from a plane which landed in Atlanta, Georgia, to Belleville. It is that simple.

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, there is no dispute between the hon. member and I. We would like to accommodate him, but it was not a simple mistake of getting on the wrong plane. The family applied to the American and Canadian authorities. The option of the United States came first. It was not a matter of them wandering on to a plane, being at the wrong place and stopping at the wrong place. They deliberately chose to go to the United States; they had applied to go there. The other part of their family decided to go to Canada, and now they are separated.

I will try to find a solution, but the easy solution recommended by the hon. member of issuing a permit is not the best one because it provides no permanency. If I can find another way, I will. I have told the member that I will try, but the fact is they have now landed in the United States, they are wards of the United States and they are no longer refugees. In a sense they are landed immigrants in the United States which means that by our act they must go through another requirement. I will try to work it out, but I ask for the patience of the member so that it can be done properly, rather than forcing them into a temporary solution which would only continue their impermanent state. I think that would be the last thing the refugee family would want, that is, to be battered around by two governments. We are working on it; we will find a solution.

Mr. Ellis: Mr. Chairman, I did not intend to carry on for so long, but I should like to indicate three things. Yes, the family applied to two countries. I have seen pictures and have heard described the manner in which these people are required to live in refugee camps. If I were in their shoes, no matter what the officials said, I would apply to 18 dozen different countries. However, I have checked the fact that they were accepted by Canada. They had also been accepted by the United States and when the United States aeroplane arrived first, some bureaucrat told them: "You must get on that plane or you are out of luck; you won't ever get out of here". So, why would they not board the plane?

I have talked to the United States authorities, and they have agreed to waive and overlook the fact that they came into Atlanta and that they applied to two countries. Certainly it is against the regulations, but it is a shame. As I said, if I were in their shoes I would apply to more than two countries.

I do not think I am requesting anything that is very special. I do not know all the rules and regulations; I would not pretend to. But I am confident that in the past two months we could have found a simple way of ignoring the fact that they got to the wrong town on the way here, because they were accepted by Canada.

At least they got to North America, and I can assure the minister that the good people of Holy Rosary would be prepared to see them the rest of their journey.

Mr. Forrestall: Fix that poor family up; don't be so cruel!

Mr. Ogle: Mr. Chairman, my opening remarks are almost directly related to those of the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings. Last week I was thrilled and privileged to see a solution to a situation not unlike the one to which the member referred. In St. John's parish in Saskatoon a complicated situation was worked out by the minister's department. I know the people there. It amounted to a different situation. Apparently a Greek ship picked up part of a family, which meant that they were destined to go to Greece. Then another member of the same family who had arrived in Saskatoon earlier found a way to solve the problem. I am sure the situation referred to a moment ago will be resolved.

I appreciate the difficulties which the hon. minister must encounter many times when he is confronted with the problem of refugees in the world today. I am sure he must be torn between what his heart would like to do and what the law says he must do. I do not know how the minister is able to handle the situation. It must be a very difficult tension under which to live.

In past months I have dealt with the minister in various difficult refugee situations and I know he has found ways to handle many of them. I thank him for changing with the stroke of a pen the futures of persons, families and generations of a family. It is a very difficult power with which he lives and I thank him for addressing these most difficult questions.

However, I should like to speak about the general problem of refugees in the world and address my remarks in perhaps a more critical manner to a particular area which I feel the policy for refugees does not confront adequately. As recently as this week, an article in The Citizen indicated the number of refugee people in the world, which I am sure the minister and his department are well aware, is constantly climbing. Not long ago ten million was given as the number of people who, through no basic fault of their own, and certainly not because they wanted it, became refugees. The recent article in The Citizen to which I allude indicates that the number of refugees in the world is now close to 15 million. We as citizens on this planet must face that kind of reality—the reality that the number of refugees in the world almost equals the number of citizens in this country. It is appropriate in situations like this that members of the House of Commons and people across this country appreciate that many of us arrived here indirectly as a result of the admission of refugees into this country. One becomes a refugee as a result of some political, religious or social upheaval when no longer allowed to live in peace in the country of their birth.

I have had the experience of living in another country for a number of years. I learned the language, the culture and the ways. I appreciate the difficulty this kind of transition causes. However, I did it freely, without force. I did it of my own will because I wanted to do it. Still, I found it difficult, even with all those things on my side. However, when a person is uprooted through political force, by religious upheaval or whatever and is forced to leave his roots behind I think we can appreciate the tension, sorrow and agony he must face. Yet we will find if we check into our ancestry that many of us sitting in this House of Commons today are here because at one time our country allowed a refugee family to land here. We must really take this fact to heart when we face the great reality today of there being 15 million refugees without a home and without a future unless the doors to our country, if I may call them that, are open and we say to them "Come on in".

When I began my remarks to the minister I said that he must live with the tension which is created by the law, which says we can take these and not those. He lives with the tension of having to make that choice. What are we to do in the face of this problem? The boat people from southeast Asia certainly assumed a high profile in the minds of Canadians and North Americans in general. As the minister pointed out in his opening remarks, Canada has accepted 60,000 people from that flood—as opposed to 15 million, 60,000 is literally a drop in the bucket. It was a good experience for Canadians. We saw that we could handle that kind of problem. As I said, last Saturday night I was associated with this family coming into Saskatoon. I realized they had left a tropical climate and were coming into 30-degree below zero weather. Knowing what they were going through, at least the social and emotional tensions, I saw the community of St. John's parish in Saskatoon opening up their arms and saying "Come on in; the door is open." It was a thrilling event.

I would like now to direct my remarks to an issue of policy. We have in place a policy which seems to say that if you have been a refugee because of communist oppression, real or unreal, you are welcome. But our response to victims of fascist oppression has been much more equivocal. I must suggest that there is a sistematic bias in that policy. In their masterful two-volume study, "The Political Economy of Human Rights",

Noam Chomsky and Edward Herman present a devastating exposé of this selective compassion using unimpeachable sources, for example, amnesty reports and other painstaking documentation.

Speaking specifically of communist Indo-China, Chomsky and Herman show how refugees there can be used rather dishonestly by western countries for their own political purposes. At the same time, pleas for asylum from Latin America or South Africa evoke a faint response, or even a negative one. To some extent the figures on our total refugee intake, which includes both government and private sponsorships, speak for themselves. In 1979 Canada took in 27,740 refugees all told. In 1980 this figure is expected to top 40,000. As of August 31 of this year, 31,241 refugees had been admitted from the following principal sources: 28,000 from Indo-China, 2,695 from Eastern Europe, 108 from Latin America and 66 from Cuba. In 1981 the government plans to sponsor, in addition to about 5,000 private sponsorships, the following numbers of refugees: 8,000 from Indo-China, which I understand is down from 10,000 this year; 4,000 from eastern Europe, which is up from 3,000 in 1980; and 1,000 from Latin America and the Caribbean, which is up 500 from 1980. One notes that although the Latin American quota for this year is 500 only 108 had arrived as of August 31. One also notes that the flow of refugees from Latin America is a trickle compared with the flood from Indo-China in the last two years. Yet for more than 15 years there has been massive and savage repression to the point of genocide in Latin America as country after country has fallen under the iron fist of military dictators, many of whom were open admirers of the European fascism of the thirties. In the tiny country of El Salvador there will be 10,000 or more political murders this year alone. As the news reported this morning three Maryknoll sisters from the United States and one social worker were murdered yesterday outside the airport as two of them tried to come back into the country. It is estimated that one in every 50 Uruguayans is or has been a political prisoner since the military came to power in 1968.

The point I make is that a very real, vicious oppression is present in the countries there. I have had a great deal of experience in that part of the world. It seems we have a blind spot when it comes to the free world or countries which are sort of lumped under the term "free world". We find it hard to accept that capitalistic and pro-western regimes can be the perpetrators of totalitarian repression, even when there is a mass of evidence that these are regimes in the Third World, not the communist bloc, which torture and assassinate their opponents. I think there is a solid basis for what I am saying as proved by Amnesty International and many other international groups. They have presented facts about the destruction of human rights in those countries. In cases of pro-western regimes which are known as human rights violators, we seem to scrutinize very carefully each individual application for political asylum. We seem to treat the evidence of political persecution with extreme scepticism and seldom, if ever, give the applicant the benefit of the doubt. Quotas for refugees from these dark corners of this misnamed "free world" are kept low and strictly adhered to. Such bureaucratic scrupulousness goes by the board in cases of refugees from communism where the propaganda value is clear and immediate.

There is a group in Regina—and I am sure the minister is aware of these groups right across Canada—which has prepared a brief on behalf of the Chilean refugees. It points out the great difficulty in getting refugee status. It is still an oppressive situation in Chile. The Amnesty International group in Saskatoon has been attempting to get a family from Chile. To the credit of the minister's department, the family has finally been cleared to come to Canada. Just today I was asked by this group to tell the minister that when it finally came time for the family to leave they were refused exit because they did not have the air fare. The people involved have not been able to get the air fare. The ordinary policy applied to refugees does not seem to be the same policy used in Chile. What is Canada's policy on countries in Central America and Latin America with regard to refugee status? Is there a special way of looking at these countries?

I appreciate that the RCMP demands clearance. But trying to get clearance of that sort from the police in Latin America would be like a Jewish family getting a visa in Germany in 1940. It is not just that simple if there is any political involvement, which can be as little as expressing the view that one would like a democratic government so that one might contribute to the ruling of a country. Would the minister tell me our policy in Latin America?

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, I am pleased to respond to the questions of the hon. member because they need some clarification. There is no difference in our attitude toward Latin American refugees as compared to those from other regions. We do not recognize any preferred group or region. We try to relate our refugee program to where the demand and the need are greatest. At the time of the problem in Chile, Canada opened its doors as wide for Chileans as for the Vietnamese refugees. Close to 8,000 Chileans have settled in Canada, and this is proportionate to the numbers who came out of the country as compared to the boat people. We provided just as much opportunity for Chilean refugees to come to Canada as for Vietnamese refugees or eastern Europeans. There is no policy which gives special recognition to one region over another.

At times we face certain difficulties. One such difficulty is that Latin Americans, mainly for historical and geographical reasons, do not seem to relate as readily to Canada as do other groups. For example, during the exodus from Cuba last year we were prepared to accept 300 refugees fleeing from that country, but it took several months to fill that quota because they did not want to come to Canada. Most of their friends, relatives and connections are in the United States and they chose to go to that country. Even though there was this opportunity, very few Cubans availed themselves of the program. I believe we have received only 250 or 270 Cubans in that program.

With regard to the visa problem in Chile, I can assure the hon. member that since I became the Minister of Immigration, no problem took up more of my time in the early months than examining in great detail the arguments put forward by church organizations, Amnesty International and others. They felt that the visa regulations put forward by the previous administration were a hindrance to people who wanted to escape from Chile and come to Canada. We listened to both sides of this case, including the points of views of officials, embassies and other sources, which said that the matter was quite open and that there were no problems. I spent many hours poring over documents on the case. I have never come across a case which had absolutely no common ground in fact or in anything else, other than in some of the disputes I have had with members of the Tory party, most of which has left leaving behind only its corpus guard.

An independent fact-finding team went to Chile last summer. My parliamentary secretary, who has also left me, was on that team. This team had no prejudices and was simply asked to examine the situation. It interviewed a wide variety of individuals, including members of different political groups and the Vicaria, which is the major refugee organization in the country. After this very careful examination the team concluded that in fact there was no major problem for someone who wanted to apply for refugee status through our embassy and come to Canada. That judgment and observation was quite independent and objective in its point of view and the decision was to maintain the regulations as they existed. On this basis, it was not a matter of our disregarding the case which was made. We spent a great deal of time and considered carefully the arguments put forward before we came to our decision.

We deliberately made certain choices in setting refugee levels this year in order to provide for a 100 per cent increase in the reserve allocated for refugees coming from Latin America. We also extended the contingency fund in order to respond to particular situations and to give us the flexibility to absorb more people without being assigned to any one country. We have undertaken special negotiations with the province of Quebec because of what is called the Cullen-Couture agreement which allowed us to set up the arrangement whereby we would accept 3,000 Haitians who had arrived in the country illegally. Because the province of Quebec was prepared to take that group, we were prepared to land them here.

What I have said goes to indicate that in most cases we have been responsive and interested as much in the refugee problem in Latin America as in southeast Asia and in eastern Europe. We must take a new look at the refugee problem around the world. I undertook some discussions with the American government in the summer in order to establish a new approach to some of the major refugee problems around the world. Unfortunately, the administration has now changed and negotiations will have to be started over again. I hope the new administration will be as open and responsive as the last administration on the problem of refugees.

Our present approach to refugee problems is not totally satisfactory. I would hope that through the co-operation of my colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and through working with the United Nations and other countries we will be able to provide a new approach in the next year or two to refugee problems.

Miss Nicholson: Mr. Chairman, during his remarks this morning, the minister referred to amendments to the Immigration Act in 1976. I would remind hon. members that the 1976 act did not amend the previous act, it replaced it. The 1976 act was a completely new act. It followed the appointment of a special joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons which had travelled throughout Canada and heard witnesses on immigration policy.

The act included many recommendations from the special joint committee. I was chairman of the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration at the time the bill was referred to committee, and the committee worked on it long and hard. We heard witnesses and before the bill was approved there were 33 sessions. It was reported back to the House with approximately 100 amendments.

That committee worked with real commitment and an unusual lack of partisanship in an attempt to give Canada an immigration act that was fair and humane. There were often strong and deep divisions in the committee, not on party lines but rather on grounds of personal ideology or different opinions about how best to achieve a common goal of giving Canada an immigration act which would be fair and leave room for discretion and compassion in special circumstances.

The previous immigration act had not been amended for many years. The department was operating on accumulated jurisprudence, on regulations and, to a large extent, on internal directives. The language of the previous act was harsh and in some cases exclusionary, it was language that was not acceptable to modern ears.

Working on that committee, which operated with a very rare absence of partisanship, was one of the finest experiences of my life. Members from all sides of the House tried very hard to put aside party differences and to work as Canadians for the common good. They tried to produce an act where the rules were clear, public, and understandable; where there was also some flexibility and room for the exercise of discretion on compassionate and humanitarian grounds. They even insisted on seeing the draft regulations before reporting the bill, to ensure that these were compatible with the intent of the statute and the spirit in which the committee worked.

Today the minister referred to consultation with the provinces on levels of immigration. This is required under the new act. The committee considered it important to ensure that immigrants are welcomed appropriately and that services under provincial jurisdiction, such as schools, housing and so on, can comfortably accommodate new arrivals. The minister's remarks on consultation implied that this was working well, that it is more than pro forma. If that is so, all those involved are to be complimented.

I have a number of concerns about the operation of the present act, an operation which is beginning to differ in some ways from the intent of the act as I remember it. The new act repealed the existing act, yet the minister referred to the 1976 act as having amended the earlier act. I find that his officials are continuing with practices which were begun under the earlier act. I have a number of questions about where this authority is derived from, Mr. Chairman. I should like to ask all my questions at the same time, then perhaps the minister could reply at the end, rather than seriatim.

The first is the question of special status for retiring ambassadors. This practice grew up under the old act and I think it was sometimes abused. I know of one case where it was used to land a 35-year old consul who came back to Canada as a landed immigrant and was working within two months. This could hardly be regarded as retirement, but rather as queue jumping or being given special consideration. The new act has no special provision for retiring ambassarors, yet I understand that they are still treated in a special way because of tradition.

There are a number of other matters as well, Mr. Chairman. The interpretation of some regulations by officials seems to go considerably beyond what is written down. There is a regulation that allows Canadian citizens or landed immigrants to sponsor any relative once in a lifetime if they do not have a relative who falls within the normal sponsorable category. The regulation clearly refers to the position of the Canadian citizen, yet it is sometimes interpreted to mean that the person being sponsored must also be alone in the world. The person trying to sponsor under this provision sometimes runs into the difficulty of the prospective immigrant bringing in dependents. There is nothing whatsoever in the statute or regulations that calls for special treatment for this kind of sponsorship.

The regulations also refer to an immigration officer or a senior immigration officer requiring a visitor to post a bond. There is nothing in the act or regulations that ties the act of posting a bond to the place where the immigration officer works. Yet, because screening was traditionally done at the port of entry, some immigration staff now claim that the law requires them to ask for such bond at the point of entry only. Families who anticipate difficulties at the port of entry—perhaps because a visitor previously overstayed—and who try to prepay a bond, are told that this cannot be done and that the visitor must arrive at the port and take his chances on being sent back or allowed to post a bond.

I would ask the minister why there is this rigidity. At what point is the authority divided between the port of entry staff and an immigration officer in an office, say, in downtown Toronto? Where does this practice come from? We are told it is tradition, but under which act—the present one or the one that was repealed?

I also have great concern about the extension of the use of program officers in posts overseas, a practice which seems to have been increasing in recent months. I find that this is contrary to the spirit, if not to the letter of the act. The act and the regulations refer to a visa officer making decisions about approving potential immigrants. Obviously powers can be delegated and I can see some limited justification for having clerical work done by indigenous workers in posts abroad, but the increased use of program officers who are not Canadian, who have no commitment to Canada, to make decisions on who will come to Canada as a permanent resident, is a questionable practice to my mind. There may be reasons for this which I do not understand, and perhaps the minister will explain that later.

I am also concerned that officials take so little responsibility for delays caused by them, particularly in our posts overseas. Canadian citizens sponsoring parents, for instance, may find that the processing takes up to three years in some countries. If a brother or sister turns 21 before the parents are finally interviewed, he or she is ineligible to come in as a dependent, even thought the application is made in time. I think the date that the application was received, Mr. Chairman, should be the determinant—

An hon. Member: Hear, hear!

Miss Nicholson: —rather than the date at which the officials get around to dealing with the case, especially since some delays overseas seem to be caused by program officers, not by Canadian staff.

Finally, when the act was proclaimed, the government of the day published it widely. Members of this House wanted openness. We wanted potential immigrants to know the terms of the act. The act also requires regulations to be published 30 days before implementation and it requires regulations to be presented in the House.

We had hoped, too, as members of this committee, that the department would keep their internal directives to a manageable book size which could be handed to prospective immigrants or their relatives. Mr. Chairman, in fact, at this point, only two years after operation, the department has two tomes which can be inspected but not removed. I do not know the reason for this but perhaps the minister will be able to tell me if he has this problem under advisement and whether he is hoping the original aim of making the Immigration Act simple and understandable is still an aim.

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, I want to thank the hon. member for her comments. It is very helpful to receive the advice of someone who was in at the birth of the act and who understands it so well. Her views have been very helpful, particularly to me because I was not in the House at the time and she has given me a better understanding of the reasons and the underlying principles in the act.

I agree with the hon. member that perhaps there is nothing more important in the immigration area than to make it as simple and as fair as possible. That is one of the reasons I established an internal task force two months ago which reports to me directly. It is made up primarily of lawyers and people who work in the area of regulations. They are to review the act from the point of view of regulatory procedures as well as to examine a wide variety of issues which would both speed up the processing and ensure a much higher degree of fairness in the application of the law. Also, they are to see where there might be irregularities or eccentricities that have grown up in the application of the act.

One of the first things I will do is to refer the comments of the hon. member directly to that group and ask for a report so that I can make changes immediately after their review. Perhaps the hon. member would be prepared to spend some time with members of that task force and elaborate upon those points.

I will respond to some of the considerations and put them on the record. Perhaps we can provide more elaboration in a written response. But on the question of special status for ambassadors, as far as I know there is no special status for ambassadors. If there are cases where that has been so, I would like to hear them from the member and we will look into them.

On the question of the bonds, I am advised by my officials that that was an interpretation given to us by lawyers in the justice department. We will check to see if there cannot be more flexibility but we did ask for that interpretation.

On the question of program officers, that is an issue which has concerned me. There are very strict rules that we do not allow program officers in the embassies or consulates overseas to make decisions. They are there primarily to help in the processing of the paper work, which is fairly heavy. They are not supposed to make decisions, but there may be occasions where that has crept into the procedures. That is also being looked into to make sure there is a clear demarcation of responsibilities.

One of the difficulties we are experiencing as a result of the act which was passed, and I am not saying it was a direct cause, is that because of the change in the family class requirements there is a much greater need for documentation, particularly as to proof of age. To prove that someone is over and above that magic age of 21 in countries where there is limited documentation means checking birth records, voting records and other things. This certainly slows the whole process down inordinately. Therefore, there is difficulty in making sure that the act is administered in the way members of Parliament want it to and it does cause major backlogs. I agree that in some cases the backlogs are unacceptable but we are trying to clear that up now. We have received a special recommendation and I have approached cabinet to ask authorization for additional person employment years so that we can respond to that problem. But there is a consequence of having that particular act. Perhaps in discussions over the next year or two in the manpower committee, we may want to raise that issue with members so we can have a response as to whether or not the age requirement itself puts a heavier burden on the process and slows it down. There may be a better way of facilitating that.

Those are the short answers. I notice there is not much time left, but I will provide more detailed answers for the member to these specific questions and perhaps follow up with her, if she is willing, by asking her to speak to members of the task force about the regulations we have established.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Chairman, we are running very short of time. Could the minister tell us how many man-years or person-years are created during the construction phase of one tar sands plant?

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, I would have to get that information for the hon. member.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Chairman, would the minister have any idea how many person-years are created throughout the 25-year life cycle of a tar sands plant operation?

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, I will attempt to get that information as well.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Chairman, I am continually surprised by the minister. He is the minister from the west and he is the minister in charge of employment. Those are rather important factors to the west, to Ontario and to Quebec. I suggest to the minister that there are several millions of years of employment from that source. I hope that by Monday we will have answers to that question.

Can the minister tell me whether he is happy with the current policy of making people eligible for UIC benefits by registering at union hiring halls in the construction industry?

Mr. Axworthy: That is presently a policy of this government, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Chairman, can the minister tell me whether union hiring halls are aware of all construction job vacancies in Canada?

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, as the hon. member might know, we do not have hiring halls in all provinces so there cannot be a totally national system.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Chairman, can the minister answer my question: are those union hiring halls which exist aware of all construction job vacancies in Canada on any given day?

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, I just answered the question.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Chairman, if the minister answered the question—and Hansard shows he did not—could he answer it again?

Are all union hiring halls aware of all the construction job vacancies in Canada on any given day? More specifically, do the Canada Manpower centres, which are aware of those jobs, make union hiring halls aware of all job vacancies?

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, as I indicated to the member previously, union hiring halls are aware of which jobs are available through the union system, but they are not extensive throughout the entire country nor are they aware of those jobs not on union sites.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Chairman, the minister said earlier today that he was moving in the direction of creating a job searching possibility across the country where, through Canada Manpower centres, people seeking work would be aware of all job vacancies. Does the minister not intend to include the union hiring halls in that principle?

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, we are putting in place the national job bank which will attempt to provide that mobility of information as well as mobility of people which will ensure that information is available. It is obviously accessible to anyone who wants to use it, including union organizations which run the hiring halls in certain provinces.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Chairman, over the weekend, would the minister examine the principle of allowing people to certify eligibility for UIC benefits when they are not aware of job vacancies? This runs counter to what I think the whole system is all about.

We have less than half a minute left, but I want to alert the minister to another series of questions which will come early next week. Near the beginning of this debate, I made an interjection by way of a point of order in which I drew to the minister's attention that yesterday the Council of Social Development brought to the attention of the constitutional committee the possibility that he and his government can seek to enshrine in law the possibility that mobility in Canada could be severely damaged by the specific wording of the mobility rights section—that the social service system in this country might be severely damaged by the mobility rights section. I heard the minister indicate two or three times today that he is counting on that section to make the economic situation for the unemployed better. I hope he will read that section and that by Monday his head will be a little clearer about its potential.

Progress reported.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being five o'clock, this House stands adjourned until Monday at two o'clock, pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

At 5.01 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

PUBLIC WORKS

DREDGING CONTRACTS—EQUITABLE TREATMENT OF CANADIAN COMPANIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Madam Speaker, I rise pursuant to Standing Order 43 for the purpose of bringing to the attention of the House a matter of some urgent and pressing necessity. My motion is with respect to the proposed pay-out of sales tax which has been extended to foreign companies for dredging in Canada and the unfair advantage this policy gives to non-Canadian equipment, as well as to non-Canadian labour and employment opportunities, inasmuch as it denies personal and corporate revenues to Canada. It denies full utilization of Canadian shipyards, their labour and materials, and it inhibits the development of Arctic technology in dredging. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay):

That the government give immediate and urgent attention to the tendering procedures that will ensure equitable treatment of Canadian dredging companies and at the same time maximize the utility of Canadian technological expertise and tax return to this government.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

SMALL BUSINESS

EXTENSION OF DEVELOPMENT BOND PROGRAM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Of the total sales volume of all the businesses in Canada, 28 per cent is made up of small business transactions. These firms employ about 2.5 million people. Indeed, these people make up 42 per cent of all business employment in the whole country. How long does this government intend to penalize business people with interest rates which are currently 15½ per cent or more? Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay):

That this government, having been silent in the aftermath of their campaign promises, and having deepened the silence in their budget, act to help small businesses by extending the term of the small business development bonds program, qualifying spouses of independent businessmen for business expenses, and by enacting other measures which the previous Conservative government was prevented from doing by the often-referred to "Liberal Democratic Party of Canada".

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

INCREASED INTEREST RATES—CONDEMNATION OF BANKS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Madam Speaker, I rise to present a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that Canada's chartered banks have raised the prime lending rate one full point to 15.5 per cent and restricted the increased interest rate on depositors' savings accounts to just 0.75 per cent, thereby increasing their interest rates and so permitting another increase in the already substantial bank profits, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent):

That this House condemns Canada's chartered banks for again taking advantage of the higher interest rates and ripping off Canadian consumers.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

IMMIGRATION

ASSISTANCE TO REFUGEES FROM SOUTHEAST ASIA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. David Berger (Laurier): Madam Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion dealing with an important matter of pressing and urgent necessity.

Considering that two families representing the last group of 60,000 Indo-Chinese refugees arrived in Canada are in the House today, I am pleased to move, seconded by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald):

That the House acknowledge the efforts and the generosity of thousands of Canadians who have helped the families of Indo-Chinese refugees to settle down in Canada.

Madam Speaker: The presentation of such a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

ENERGY

CALL FOR NEW ENERGY PACKAGE FOR ALBERTA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under Standing Order 43. Whereas oil companies and oil rigs are leaving Canada en masse for the United States, taking capital and jobs with them, while others have already cut back their 1981 budgets, including Ontario steel mills; whereas industries throughout Canada have already slowed down, causing greater unemployment and a lower GNP, and whereas even former Liberals in Alberta, including a former Liberal MP, Dr. Hu Harries, have denounced Mr. Trudeau's energy package, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Wright):

That this House, before there is a catastrophe too shocking to think of, urges the Liberal government to offer Alberta a complete energy package, including 75 per cent of world prices for conventional oil and world prices for other oils, and the removal of the excise tax on a provincial resource.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

THE ECONOMY

CALL FOR RECISION OF BUDGET AND ENERGY POLICY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Given the obvious and complete failure of the MacEachen budget and Liberal energy policy to strengthen the Canadian economy and to encourage investment in Canada, as witnessed by reports of billions of dollars of potential Canadian investment flowing south into the U.S. market because of the poor economic climate created by this government, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers):

That this House direct the finance minister to scrap his current budget and energy policy and revert to the Crosbie budget, which was designed to encourage investment in Canada and to strengthen the Canadian economy.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PENSIONS

CALL FOR INCREASE IN RATE OF PENSION PAID SENIOR CITIZENS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, and seconded by the hon. member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent), I move:

That this House recognizes that couples 65 years of age or over have to spend one-fifth of their income on food and, and that food prices are rising at the rate of 14 per cent or 15 per cent, which means that the present system of indexing falls far short of enabling senior citizens to maintain an adequate standard of living, and this House therefore calls on the government to implement its promise to provide help where help is needed by making an immediate increase in the rate of the pension paid to Canada's senior citizens.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent? of the House. Is there unanimous consent.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

MEXICO—ALLEGED LACK OF CONCERN FOR LIBERTY AND LIVES OF CANADIANS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Joe Reid (St. Catharines): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43, and what can be more important than the lives of Canadians? In a press comment last week it was said that last year 785 Canadians were jailed in foreign countries, 426 died abroad, 594 were hospitalized, while others have simply vanished. Some of the worst situations arise in Mexico, but trade consideration, including that of Mexican oil, hamper, hinder and delay inquiries and even the obtaining of simple information as to the whereabouts of those lost Canadians. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath):

That when the Prime Minister visits the President of Mexico in January of next year, he raise the matter of this disproportionate number of Canadians who encounter detainment, violence and even death in mysterious ways and that he initiate action which would dispel this country's apparent lack of concern for the liberties and lives of Canadians.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

HIGH INTEREST RATES—PLEDGE TO ENHANCE DIGNITY AND SECURITY OF CANADIANS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. The policy of the Liberal party, as expressed last November 6 by the finance critic, is as follows:

The Liberals and I generally want action now to prevent the hardship this Conservative high interest rate policy is creating for millions of Canadians and their families.

The present government's interest rate policy is not different; that has been amply proven in the last nine months. The prime rate at the bank is 15.5 per cent, which is higher than at any time during the nine months we were in office.

My question to the Prime Minister is this. We responded with a small business development bond to help small business, a mortgage and property tax program to help the home owner and an energy tax credit to help lower income people. We helped unincorporated businesses with tax concessions which have been adopted by this government. What is the government going to respond with now that interest rates are higher than they were during our time? What action will the Prime Minister take to help prevent the hardship of this high interest rate situation?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State, Finance): Madam Speaker, first of all I would like the hon. member to note that the question of interest rates is not one which should be determined to the minute or to the day. It must be examined and analysed regularly. The hon. member must recall the explanations he gave himself in reply to questions asked in this House since he has taken it upon himself to quote people who made some comments at the time when he was finance minister. He must therefore remember the replies he gave, the principles on which he based his answers and his explanations to the effect that interest rates are interrelated to other economic phenomena. In our opinion, these difficult times that we are now going through will be over relatively quickly because of the medium and long-term action outlined by the Minister of Finance in his budget.

[English]

Mr. Crosbie: Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is also addressed to the Prime Minister. This is the only House where you ask a question of Popeye and get the answer from Olive Oyl.

My question to the Prime Minister is this. The fifth plank of the Prime Minister's economic program of last January 12 was, and I quote:

Fifth, the Liberal party commits itself to enhancing the dignity and security of individual Canadians.

That is the fifth plank. He went on to say:

We must endorse the right of every Canadian to have a job.

How is permitting interest rates to increase, permitting unemployment to go to 1,120,000 next year, which is what the Minister of Finance predicts, permitting energy costs to go up, permitting a decrease in the GNP by 1 per cent this year,—going to enhance the dignity and security of individual Canadians? Don't bother referring to the $35 per month increase in the GIS; that is long since gone. When is the Prime Minister going to carry out that commitment and how is he going to carry it out?

[Translation]

Mr. Bussières: Madam Speaker, I believe the hon. member is falling into the trap that the Minister of Finance has been able to avoid. He is raising all kinds of problems, be it inflation, unemployment or an ever present recession problem; at the same time, he would like these problems to be solved overnight in a somewhat miraculous way. Obviously, and it is just common sense, unemployment, inflation, interest rates, recession will not be solved all together at the same time; they will be solved through consistent medium and long-term action. In our view, such action is to be directed mainly toward a strong fight against inflation so that in the medium and long range, all Canadians will be better off thanks to an improved economy. It is based also on an economic recovery brought about by the national energy program announced by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. If we refer to the last quarter, some figures on national accounts, we can see that some progress has been made and that the effects of a lessening recession can already be felt.

[English]

Mr. Crosbie: These answers are stupefying, Madam Speaker. They are simply stupefying.

• (1420)

I want to address my last supplementary to the Prime Minister. I do not know whether he is annoyed with me or whether he is not interested in the economy. Perhaps he is not interested because it is not a question about the constitution. Nevertheless, could I put it to the Prime Minister again. The Prime Minister made his own personal pledge last January that he was going to enhance the dignity and security of individual Canadians and endorse the right of every Canadian to have a job. At that time 1979 had come to a close and the average unemployment for the year was 838,000. The average predicted by his minister for next year is 1,120,000, which is an increase of almost 200,000. Do the Prime Minister's election pledges mean anything to him? Do these commitments mean anything? Obviously they do not seem to but I have a large heart and I am willing to give him the benefit of the doubt. Will the Prime Minister explain to me how he is going to carry out these pledges, or will he make any attempt at all to carry them out?

Mr. Paproski: You are sitting on your pledges.

[Translation]

Mr. Bussières: Madam Speaker, I think the hon. member is trying to scare the people with a big figure, namely, one million. He should know that the prime basis of a figure is its relativity, that is, its significance in relation to something else. He should also know that our performance since our return to power compared with what he had forecast means that there are more jobs available and that the rate of unemployment has gone down; had we implemented the economic policies he advocated in his budget, we would have many more than one million unemployed; the country would be faced with absolutely staggering rates of unemployment.

PUBLIC SERVICE

CAFETERIA AND LAUNDRY EMPLOYEES—EQUAL PAY FOR WOMEN

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. I must say it would not surprise me if he does not answer it since he has consistently taken so little interest in this subject. Last January 12, the Prime Minister said:

> We must reaffirm the rights of women and forthrightly say to every employer that women must receive the same wages and benefits as men. There is no place for sex discrimination on the job.

It is now six months since the Canadian Human Rights Commission condemned the federal government and considered it guilty of violating the equal pay provisions in its refusal to grant some 3,000 women employees, mostly laundry and cafeteria workers, equal pay for work of equal value. In light of what the Prime Minister said on January 12 and in view of the Canadian Human Rights Commission condemnation, I ask the Prime Minister—or if he will not answer, then I ask the minister responsible for the status of women or the President of the Treasury Board—when the government will honour the commitments which the Prime Minister made to Canadian women last January. When will the government correct this injustice which is being perpetrated against some 3,000 women employees of the civil service who are cafeteria and laundry workers?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, as the hon. member knows, this government is firmly committed to that provision. In fact, it was a Liberal government which brought in the provision.

The issue is a very technical one. I have had meetings with Gordon Fairweather and with other representatives of the commission to discuss means whereby this particular dispute can be settled effectively. It is not a simple question of saying, "Let us settle at a particular level", because the group in question is to be compared with another group which has a number of sublevels. One of the issues in the interpretation of that provision is what level is to be selected. Is it the highest level, the lowest level or the median? This is something which has been discussed and negotiated with the commission.

We are looking for guidance from the commission and we are continuing to attempt to settle this dispute, which we acknowledge as a legitimate grievance. There are a number of others that have been raised. Apart from that, we have taken action in Treasury Board to seek areas of abuse so as to ensure that the spirit of that part of the law, section 11 of the Canadian Human Rights Act, can be properly applied.

EQUAL PAY AND BENEFITS FOR WOMEN

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, it is the same tired, old excuses when it comes to the government producing equitable solutions for women. I would like to ask a supplementary question. I presume the Prime Minister will not answer, so I will direct it to the minister responsible for the status of women. Last month the Advisory Council on the Status of Women produced a report which showed that, after five years of the so-called equal opportunities program of the government, the scientific and professional category of public servants, those in the higher paid jobs, now has a higher percentage of men than five years ago, whereas in the administrative support category, the clerks and secretaries who are at the lowest end of the salary scale, there is now a higher percentage of women than five years ago. In other words, the situation with regard to pay scales is getting worse for women rather than better.

I would like to ask the minister responsible for the status of women when he or any member of the government is going to honour the commitments made last January by the Prime Minister so that women can receive the same pay and the same benefits as men.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I would tell the hon. member we are already in the process of honouring that commitment by establishing the affirmative action program for the public service which was announced last July. The results of that affirmative action program are to establish very clear directions to government departments by which they can make sure there is equal opportunity, and to bring about any changes in regulations, legislation, training or hiring programs to ensure there is equality of access, opportunity and treatment. That step began last July. The first phase is already completed in terms of hiring and putting in place affirmative action counsellors in each of the departments. We are now proceeding to the second phase of the operation.

Miss MacDonald: Madam Speaker, the announcement at the time the government tiptoed into the affirmative action program was that there would be three distinct stages in the development of the affirmative action strategy. Those three stages were analysis, policy review and planned development. Does the minister realize that women have been analysed, policy reviewed and plan developed to death? Those things have been going on year after year with no noticeable improvement. We are not asking for more review, analysis and planned development, but action, and we want to know from the minister when this action is going to take place.

Mr. Axworthy: Madam Speaker, I will be pleased to take the opportunity to explain the affirmative action program to the hon. member because it is quite obvious that she has not looked at the details of that managerial operation.

Miss MacDonald: I have read it.

Mr. Axworthy: It is a very sophisticated managerial tool.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Axworthy: Members of the NDP may not think so because simple minds see things in simple ways. The fact is that it is a very important step forward, one that has been recognized by most women's organizations in this country as something that is long overdue. We intend to proceed with that program in a deliberate and proper way, and not be pushed into it by these kinds of remarks by the hon. member opposite.

REQUEST FOR ACTION TO REDUCE INTEREST RATES

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. I will preface it by saying that unless the Prime Minister answers questions in this House of Commons, there is no point at all in his coming here for the question period.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: On Friday, in reply to a question from a journalist on the escalating cost of food, the Prime Minister said that Canadians would have to "switch priorities and spend a bit more on food". Food prices are forecast to go up more than 14 per cent next year, which is what they went up this year. Farm income is going to go down. A good reason for that is that interest charges paid by farmers will go up by more than 20 per cent, and this increase is automatically passed on, understandably, to the consumer. I would ask the Prime Minister, who is busy advising Canadians what to do about switching priorities, if he will do the same and take some direct action now to bring down the level of interest rates.

• (1430)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I want to tell my hon. friend, the Leader of the New Democratic Party, that I cannot accept his advice about not being here simply because I have not answered a couple of questions. They were answered perfectly well by the relevant ministers.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: The Leader of the New Democratic Party should know, and if he does not he should look up his files, that we have a minister of state for economic affairs who speaks for the Minister of Finance when he is not here, and we have a minister responsible for the status of women who answers questions on that subject. We have a President of the Treasury Board who is responsible for the employees hired by the federal government. Therefore, I do not accept his enjoinder that I have to answer all questions in this House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss MacDonald: Who made the statement?

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, the point is that the Prime Minister has not answered any questions. The Prime Minister has general responsibility for the Government of Canada. When a member of the opposition, whether a member of this party or the Conservative party, raises a question for the Prime Minister, he should have the courtesy to answer the question.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Since the Prime Minister had, in my view, the presumption to tell Canadians what to do in terms of organizing their family budget, as he did on Friday when he said they should switch their priorities and spend a little more on food, could he tell us how those who are on fixed incomes, those who are living at the poverty level, can be expected to carry out his advice?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, when the hon. member lectures me on courtesy, I want to point out to him that it would be a courtesy to the ministers in this cabinet and who are assigned special responsibilities to have the questions relevant to their departments or their responsibilities addressed to them. That would be a courtesy on the part of the New Democratic leader.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: It is your statement, Pierre.

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, there is no particular criticism of the relevant ministers. In this case the relevant ministers are in fact answering the questions. We may not agree with them but at least they have the courtesy to answer.

The question I put to the Prime Minister concerns a quotation from him. Since he has the presumption to advise the ordinary Canadian how he or she should change his or her family budget, could he tell us today if he knows the price of a pound of butter, does he know the price of a loaf of bread, does he know the price of a dozen eggs in downtown Ottawa where he presumably does his shopping?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, the hon. member may have had a quotation from me. I take it this exchange began because he told me there was no point in my coming here if I were not going to answer all questions addressed to me. In that sense, as far as the latter part of the question is concerned, it is of a statistical nature and the hon. member knows it is against the rules to ask statistics of a minister.

INQUIRY RESPECTING ASSISTANCE TO PENSIONERS AND LOW-INCOME CANADIANS

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, when the Prime Minister gave advice to Canadians on Friday last, he said that if they wanted to maintain the same level of food on their tables they should reduce spending in other areas. What advice is the Prime Minister prepared to give to the one million unemployed Canadians whose budget is taken up by food costs, shelter costs and fuel costs? They have no other areas where they can cut back. We already know that over half of the guaranteed income supplement increase of $35 to old age pensioners is gradually being eaten up by fuel cost increases and food price increases. What advice does the Prime Minister have for the low-income Canadians and the old age pensioners of this country who have no other place to go? They have no other areas where they can cut back.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the hon. member makes much of the answer I gave to the question put to me the other day about increased prices of food. I take it he himself knows it is a common sense matter when you have a set budget to spend more or less of it on the aspects which are more necessary to your daily life, and this happens all the time. I am sure the hon. member practises this particular policy, as does everyone, so there is nothing surprising in that advice.

Mr. McGrath: Madam Speaker, the Prime Minister seems to forget we are not talking about the average Canadian. We are trying to make the case in this House for the million unemployed Canadians who have to get by on welfare or unemployment insurance and for the old age pensioners of this country whose incomes are being eaten up, indexing notwithstanding, by inflation and increased fuel prices. Let me ask this. On November 6, 1979, at page 1017 of Hansard, when the Minister of Employment and Immigration was in opposition, he said:

> —if there is a requirement to raise interest rates, there is an equal requirement to help those people who are hurt by those interest rate increases.

That was the advice given by the present Minister of Employment and Immigration last November. I ask the Prime Minister what steps the government intends to take to offset increasing interest rates in this country which will increase unemployment, which will increase food costs and which will make it virtually impossible for low-income earners, the unemployed and the old age pensioners of this country to keep an adequate diet on their tables and enough fuel in the furnace to keep themselves warm? What advice does he have for these people?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, the member asks about what steps are being taken regarding pensioners. I remind him again that we have increased the old age pension, the guaranteed income supplement, by $35 a month.

An hon. Member: It's all gone.

Mr. Trudeau: The hon. member says it is all gone. It is a monthly cheque and it cannot be spent in advance. The hon. member asks what we are going to do to help them put fuel in their furnaces. Let me tell the hon. member, and perhaps even the noisy New Democrats, that we have a policy which is before the House now and which was put forth before the budget to make sure that fuel prices do not increase in an unacceptable way. If we only had the support of the hon. members opposite, that policy could be implemented very quickly rather than go to the kind of prices for fuel that their budget was going to impose, not only on old age pensioners but which would have literally crippled the economy if we followed the course proposed by another member opposite.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

INQUIRY RESPECTING GOVERNMENT ACCOMPLISHMENTS

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Madam Speaker, may I try the Prime Minister with another quotation from his well-known speech in Toronto. I will quote very briefly from page 6:

> We must increase the economic might of Canada by strengthening each of the regions. We will make the big projects happen, whether they be developing the fishery in the Atlantic, rebuilding the railways in the west, developing new manufacturing strength in Ontario and Quebec, or expanding British Columbia's resource and trade potential. We need a national government that builds up rather than tears down.

Could the Prime Minister tell the House very briefly of any tangible accomplishment he and his administration have accomplished in this regard since he returned to office, other than the negative ones which have seen an exodus of people, investment and companies from this country?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the hon. member asked for tangible evidence. I refer him to the budget speech of a couple of months ago where he heard that the government plans to see some $15 billion spent over the next few years on the big projects of which he talks. This, of course, would call for the support of this House to get the budgetary measures through. This $15 billion, if he looks at the budget speech, is to be spent in all parts of Canada. There is $4 billion specifically earmarked for the west, and the rest is for various projects related directly or indirectly to energy, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, which would create jobs, make Canada self-reliant in energy and permit this economy to bounce ahead. But we would need not the negative approach of the opposition but a constructive belief in Canada and support for this budget, and that is what I ask for.

Mr. MacKay: Madam Speaker, we in the opposition would be pleased to support the government if it brought forward anything tangible and worth while. It is interesting to see the government try to blame its own inadequacies on someone else again.

The Prime Minister said that he wanted to strengthen the regions. He promised to do that, but in Nova Scotia the fishing fleet is under pressure. It is said that its operations will be curtailed next year because of government policy. CN is retrenching its operations. The business plan for Sydney Steel has not been approved, and in Newfoundland unemployment insurance accounts for one-twelfth of the personal income of that province as opposed to one-fortieth in the rest of Canada.

I respect the Prime Minister's preoccupations, but would he not agree, using mature and other reflective qualities, that perhaps his preoccupation with the constitution, and that of his government in this regard, has operated to the detriment not only of development of the regions but also of the economic thrust for the entire country? I do not want the Prime Minister to abandon totally his constitutional tasks, but would he not agree that it would be far more sensible for him to pay a little more attention to the management and guidance of the economy of this country so that he could fulfil some of the promises he made in such a definite way with his campaign rhetoric which many months later have not yet even begun to be fulfilled?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, the hon. member talks about our preoccupation with the constitution. I have said repeatedly in this House and elsewhere that we would like to get the matter behind us. If it had not been for the stalling and procrastination of the hon. member's party, we would be on to other things now. Indeed, we could be moving forward with some of the projects to which I referred.

The hon. member asks what are tangible and worth-while projects. Let me talk to him about the Montreal-maritimes pipeline. We have been trying to build the first leg of that but we have not been able to get the co-operation of the government of Quebec. The pipeline was supposed to begin last spring; we will not be able to begin it until next spring. This is not the fault of the federal government. It is because—

Mr. Paproski: Blame it on the provinces.

Mr. Trudeau: Now the hon. member for Edmonton North wants to get into the act. I will gladly deal with him later.

FINANCE

HIGH INTEREST RATES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Lyle S. Kristiansen (Kootenay West): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Finance responsible for exorbitant interest rates, my question is directed to the Prime Minister, who presumably shares that responsibility.

In a prepared and prophetic speech delivered to a Financial Post conference on July 10 of this year, the Minister of Finance solemnly concluded that he himself found, and I quote:

—some affinity for the Keynes who wrote: "But beware! The time for all this is not yet. For at least another hundred years we must pretend to ourselves and to everyone that fair is foul and foul is fair; for foul is useful and fair is not. Avarice and usury and precaution must be our gods for a little longer still."

In view of the avaricious and usurious interest rates now prevailing as a result of this government's action—or, rather, inaction—was the minister's Macbethian-sounding witches' prophecy of toil and trouble a simple short-term economic forecast, or was it rather a clear and definitive statement of long-term Liberal government policy?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State, Finance): Madam Speaker, I would certainly not want to mix poetry and prophecy to the cruel and hard realities of the economy.

As I have just said in answer to another question, the situation with respect to interest rates is temporary and congruent with the present economic climate in North America.

All parliamentarians and all economic agents must support the government in its fight against inflation and promote a climate which will allow us progressively to achieve economic recovery. All other factors in the economy will adjust accordingly, and interest rates will return to more acceptable levels.

[English]

Mr. Kristiansen: Madam Speaker, that is more boil and bubble than toil and trouble, but toil and trouble is obviously all that thousands of Canadian home builders, woodworkers and mortgagees who are caught by the rise in this government's interest rates can expect from the government.

My supplementary question is again directed to the Prime Minister in the absence of the Minister of Finance. When will the Prime Minister, the Minister of Finance and the government stop this act from Macbeth and quit trying to wash their hands of responsibility for the tragic results of their misdeeds?

Specifically, will the Prime Minister and the government now agree to free the Canadian dollar, take positive and decisive action, including action to make mortgages available from financial institutions at affordable rates, and stop this ruinous rise of interest rates, consequent foreclosures and resultant unemployment before this Shakespearian tragedy unfolds any further?

[Translation]

Mr. Bussières: Madam Speaker, the hon. member should have realized by now that the government does not use Canada and its economy as a sort of laboratory to test far-out economic theories. Our objective is to fight against inflation. The budget has mapped out the ways to achieve economic recovery, and with the support of the House and of the Canadian people as a whole, we will indeed achieve our objective and look forward to better times ahead as the economy regains its strength.

INDUSTRY

SPEECH OF PRIME MINISTER IN TORONTO—EFFECT OF BUDGET ON INDUSTRIAL DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Madam Speaker, my questioning follows along the line of questioning of the hon. member for St. John's West and deals with that infamous speech of the Prime Minister.

I would like to ask the Prime Minister a question in two parts. In his speech of January 12 the Prime Minister gave as one of five promises the promise to bring economic stability to Canada by developing industrial policies. Point three in the Prime Minister's speech was to develop industrial policies which will provide jobs and spur growth.

My question is in two parts. First, before the Prime Minister passes the question on to someone else, did the Prime Minister write the speech? Did he produce this document? If he did produce this seven-page document on economic growth for Canada, would the Prime Minister please respond to this. In the area of central Ontario, and Peterborough in particular, Canadian General Electric is losing business. Would the Prime Minister please tell us what is in the budget which spurs economic and industrial development growth in central Ontario? What is in it which will create a lessening of unemployment? What is in the budget speech which will address point three, economic growth?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, it is paradoxical that the hon. member asks me if I wrote the speech just after a long question asked by Mr. Shakespeare. I will tell the hon. member who prepared my speech if he tells me who prepared his question.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Domm: Madam Speaker, I am delighted to advise the Prime Minister that I personally prepared the question.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Domm: I will read the supplementary question, which I prepared, to the Prime Minister. In a recent policy statement on energy by the government of Ontario, the deputy premier of Ontario said that Ontario needs seven tar sands plants. If the Prime Minister is going to help the Premier of Ontario and the government of Ontario, why is he cutting three tar sands plants down to one through lack of a budgetary program which will initiate incentive? Why is he doing that rather than answering the premier and the government of Ontario when they say that they need seven to create jobs, employment and a good economic climate? I made the question up; let the Prime Minister try to answer it.

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, if the hon. member wrote that question, I must congratulate him. He should be sitting on the front bench instead of the comic character from Newfoundland.

Mr. Crosbie: Where should you be? You won't answer questions.

• (1450)

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, the hon. member does not seem to realize that we have not cut the tar sands. On the contrary, our budget and our energy policy are predicated on the importance of the tar sands projects going forward. As the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has said repeatedly in this House, it is the Premier of Alberta who refuses to come to an agreement on the tar sands, for reasons best known to him, and this is an absolute—

Mr. Crosbie: That is false.

Mr. Trudeau: The hon. member says this is false. It is the premier himself who said that. If the hon. member thinks the premier is taking a falsehood out on him, he should blame the premier, not me.

SUPPLY AND SERVICES

PATROL FRIGATE PROGRAM—INQUIRY WHEN CONTRACT DEFINITION PHASE WILL TERMINATE

Hon. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Supply and Services who issued a press release today indicating that Scan Marine and Saint John Shipbuilding are the winners for the contract definition phase for the Canadian patrol frigate. I must say I am surprised and disappointed that the minister did not take the more honourable position of raising this on motions today. Would he now tell us when the contract definition phase will end?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): Madam Speaker, the time that is foreseen in terms of the contract definition phase is approximately 15 months. There will be a period of six months required for the negotiation of the contract with the two successful bidders who will be participating in that phase. I would point out to the hon. gentleman that I am very optimistic that the program will be completed and that the first ship will be delivered in 1987 as initially planned.

Mr. McKinnon: Madam Speaker, the first ship was to be delivered in 1986, not 1987.

As Cantec, or Vickers Canada, as it is also known, has been dropped again from the short list, could the minister explain why it has been put on the list after it had been dropped by the Conservative government? This means that it has been dropped once, put on again and then off again. This has resulted in a delay of one year. Can the minister tell us why, in going through the list, he went through this rather fruitless exercise during the past nine months of putting them back on, only to drop them again, unless it was so the department could stretch the program out and find some money for it?

Mr. Blais: Madam Speaker, I do not recall the previous government having announced any successful bidders. I recall that there was a short list of three which had been identified, but the hon. gentleman was minister of national defence at that time and he is privy to what occurred in those days. However, I do not recall any official statement to that effect. He will recall that in March, after we came into office, we included in the Speech from the Throne a provision which indicated that we would use the procurement dollars in order to maximize Canadian content. As a result, of course, in June of 1980 we requested the participants on the short list to attempt to repair their bids in order to maximize their own offer so as to ensure an increased Canadianization of the contracts and the contract definition stage. In my humble estimation, we were successful in doing that.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

F-18A FIGHTER AIRCRAFT—RENEGOTIATION OF CONTRACT

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Madam Speaker, may I preface my remarks by saying that that is a bunch of nonsense and the minister knows it.

May I ask the Minister of Supply and Services, through you, Madam Speaker, a question based on one put to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Supply and Services last Friday. The Leader of the Opposition asked, as reported at page 5402 of Hansard, in reference to the CF-18A program and reports emanating from the United States about the review of that program—

—whether the official view of the Government of Canada is that the arrangement can be renegotiated?

I put that question to the Minister of Supply and Services given the seriousness of the reports emanating from the United States.

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): Madam Speaker, I am somewhat concerned about the negative attitude which the hon. gentleman took with regard to the announcement on the frigate program. I thought that he would have been the first one to recognize that this announcement will be very helpful to the shipbuilding industry in Canada, a large portion of its activities being in the hon. gentleman's region.

Having said that, I would indicate that in terms of the CF-18 contract there is no need to renegotiate nor any intention to do so. I might point out to the hon. gentleman that he might want to get a copy of that contract from the hon. member for Victoria, in which he will see that that contract as negotiated at present is one of the better opportunities we have had in terms of military procurement in the recent past.

Mr. Forrestall: Madam Speaker, my question to the Minister of Supply and Services was whether or not the minister believes that that contract can be renegotiated. Will the minister respond to that question? With respect to the frigate program, the government has been procrastinating and delaying ad nauseam. With respect to the CF-18 program, can the minister respond whether he can renegotiate that contract?

Mr. Blais: Madam Speaker, I would point out to the hon. gentleman that the reply which I gave to the hon. member for Victoria was justification for requesting the three short list competitors to repair their bid to maximize Canadian content. We are dealing here with a technology, a weapons system, which we want to be the state of the art once production is secured. I would urge the hon. gentleman to offer us every possible assistance in order to achieve that.

In terms of the CF-18 program, as I pointed out to the hon. gentleman, there is no need to renegotiate it. We are satisfied that the contract is a very good one, that the delivery dates will be met, and that the target prices which have been determined in the contract will be satisfied.

AUTOMOTIVE INDUSTRY

FUTURE EMPLOYMENT PROSPECTS—MEASURES TO STIMULATE DEMAND

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Prime Minister, if I may. I know the Prime Minister is aware of the fact that the auto industry accounts for close to 17 per cent of the employment opportunities in the province of Ontario and that its future depends to a great extent on consumer confidence and demand. The recent high interest rates have undermined that confidence and contributed significantly to the quite unacceptable unemployment levels in that industry and in other related industries.

Can the Prime Minister say whether or not his government has in mind policies which can guarantee that the almost 20,000 people who are unemployed in the Windsor area, and others unemployed across the province, will return to work some time within the next three months? Second, would the Prime Minister consider, as leader of the federal government, initiating meetings with the various provinces, with the banks and with the industry involved, in an effort to establish a joint program which would stimulate consumer demand, such as perhaps sales tax cuts, interest rate rebates or industry rebates to consumers of automobiles, in order that we can attempt to get that industry back on its feet?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, this is obviously a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce who, unfortunately, is ill either in the hospital or at home. I will be glad to make note of the question on his behalf. With regard to consumer demand, I would point out to the hon. member that the statistics revealed today by Statistics Canada indicate that in the third quarter there has been a rise in consumer demand—

An hon. Member: You are using statistics now.

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, Madam Speaker. There has been a rise in consumer demand—

An hon. Member: What is the price of butter?

Mr. Trudeau: —and we just hope that this is the beginning of a recovery which will last.

ASSISTANCE TO WORKERS IN WINDSOR AREA

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, I should like to direct my supplementary question to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Given that the Prime Minister has not been able, as yet at least, to give some assurance that the programs which are in place, or for that matter any programs which may be put in place, will guarantee the return to work of the workers in the Windsor area and across the province, can the minister indicate why until this time there has been no TAB program brought in by this government, why until this time the government has gone from the shorter waiting period for workers in Windsor to the normal waiting period, and why there is no supplemental benefit program available to those workers in view of the fact there is no hope that they will return to work immediately, given that they still have to pay their bills, and also given that we hope they will remain in the Windsor area so that they can some day return to work in the auto industry and produce automobiles for people here in Canada?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I would point out to the hon. member that at present well over 95 per cent to 96 per cent of the workers laid off in the auto industry in the Windsor area are totally covered by unemployment insurance and that most of those workers whose premiums or benefits have run out will immediately be able to qualify for the re-engagement of those benefits.

Second, within the budget announcement made by the Minister of Finance, he put forward the proposal for a $350 million adjustment program which will both stimulate the economy in areas where industries are declining as well as provide additional benefits to workers. Those programs are now being developed in consultation with business and the unions. We hope to make an announcement very shortly on the results of those discussions.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Hon. George Hees (Northumberland): Madam Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. It concerns the exchange which took place at the beginning of the question period between himself and the Leader of the NDP. As there is nothing sadder than a beautiful relationship which ceases to exist, would the Prime Minister tell us when it was that the love affair between the government and the NDP ended; and does he see any chance of reconciliation in the near future?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, there is nothing like a father figure to help that come about, and I rely on the hon. member to do it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

AGRICULTURE

REPORTED DIOXIN CONTAMINATION OF ONTARIO CHICKENS

Mr. Al MacBain (Niagara Falls): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. According to press reports, a leaked government study indicated that there are high levels of dioxin in Ontario-raised chickens. Can the parliamentary secretary comment on the truth or otherwise of these reports and the possible source of the dioxin, in the event the reports are true?

Mr. Doug Frith (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, in reply to the question of the hon. member for Niagara Falls, in November 1979 the department found the presence of dioxin in chicken livers. It took that opportunity to inform its provincial counterparts. As a result of that a special federal-provincial task force was set up to investigate the use of pentachlorophenol, which is apparently used in the treatment of wood. The wood chips are purchased by farmers to be used as bedding in chicken operations; apparently this is the source of the dioxin.

As a result of this special task force, recommendations are now being made and are being studied. As well, the Department of National Health and Welfare and the Department of Agriculture are conducting further tests on the effects of dioxin on meat and poultry. At the same time we have asked the chemical industry to investigate the possibility of using some chemical other than pentachlorophenol in the treatment of wood. With those recommendations in mind, we hope to have some solution to the problem.

MR. KNOWLES—INCORRECT PRESS REFERENCE TO AGE

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, I rise for a moment on a question of personal privilege. It was drawn to my attention just a short while ago that there is a story in today's edition of the Ottawa Citizen concerning the manner in which we as House leaders eluded the press the last time we held a meeting. I do not object to that part of the story, but there are some things which should be kept correct. The story refers to me as "a 68-year old veteran MP". Not only was the press unable to keep up with us, but that writer is four years behind. I am 72.

EXPORT DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION—ANNUAL REPORT

Question No. 1,215—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Was the 1979 Annual Report of the Export Development Corporation published and, if so (a) how many copies were printed (b) was it printed by the Department of Supply and Services and (i) if so, what was the total cost (ii) if not, who printed it and at what cost?

2. Was the unit cost approximately $4.87 and (a) if so, is the government aware that figures compiled by a Toronto business authority in January 1980, declared the unit costs of the average private corporations' annual report was $1.50 to $2.00 per unit and, if so, in what way was the difference accounted for (b) if not, what was it?

3. Were tenders for the printing of the report (a) invited and, if so, what are the names of all those invited including the amount of their bid (b) called for by advertisement and, if so, what are the names of all those who responded including the amount of their bid?

Hon. Ed Lumley (Minister of State, Trade): In so far as Export Development Corporation is concerned: 1. Yes.

(a) 32,000

(b) No

(i) N/A

(ii) M.O.M. Printing—$127,555.32

2. Yes.

(a) and (b) No; but the Annual Report of Export Development Corporation performs more functions than does the report of an average private corporation; it is designed for export development, to show potential markets to businessmen and to inform the business community of the financial facilities available for exporters. To that end a large number of copies are printed and widely distributed.

3. (a) Tenders were invited from the following:

M.O.M. Printing,
300 Parkdale Avenue,
Ottawa, Ontario

National Printer (Ottawa) Ltd.,
1980 Merivale Road,

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

APPROPRIATION ACT NO. 2, 1980-81

The House resumed from Friday, December 5, consideration in committee of Bill C-47, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the Government of Canada for the financial year ending March 31, 1981—Mr. Pinard—Mr. Ethier in the chair.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. House again in Committee of the Whole on Bill C-47, an act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the Government of Canada for the financial year ending March 31, 1981.

When the committee rose on Friday, December 5, Vote No. 1 under the Department of Employment and Immigration was under consideration, and the hon. member for Calgary West had the floor. The Chair has been informed there was an understanding between the parties, since the minister will be absent for the beginning of the debate, that the hon. member for Calgary West will forgo his turn to speak now, as long as he is recognized after the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce.

DEPARTMENT OF EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION:

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Chairman, as chairman of the parliamentary Task Force on Employment Opportunities for the '80s, I should like to report briefly to the House, to the minister and his officials what the task force has been doing since its appointment last June and what has been told to us about employment problems in the country. Obviously, in making this informal report to the House I am not speaking on behalf of the special committee. What I will be saying very often will be opinions which have been told to us and on which we have not yet made a decision or recommendation.

As hon. members know, the special Task Force on Employment Opportunities for the '80s was established by Parliament on May 23, 1980, and its membership was appointed on June 4. There are seven members on the task force, four from the government and three from the opposition. The three members from the opposition include the chief critics of the Conservative party and the New Democratic Party. These seven members are very well distributed among the regions of the country, with two from the west, two from Ontario, two from Quebec, and one from the Atlantic region.

In setting up a task force of members of Parliament on these problems, it was hoped that we would have a different approach to these problems than many of the task forces, commissions and study groups established internally by ministers over the years. As I see it, one of the great advantages of a task force of members of Parliament is that once they make their report to Parliament and to the government, the members will still be in the House putting questions to the minister with respect to its implementation.

As hon. members know, when other task forces are established of experts and academics from outside, they are dispersed once they have made their reports and cannot follow up in the same manner as members of Parliament.

The mandate of the task force, in a nutshell, was to examine the situation in Canada where, on the one hand, we have unacceptable high levels of unemployment, and on the other hand, growing critical shortages of skill trades, critical skill shortages both in the blue collar and white collar areas. In examining that problem we are making a critical analysis of our manpower policies, our training and retraining programs, and our labour mobility programs.

We started our hearings within one week of our appointment, and during the months of June and July we heard many of the national associations and groups here in Ottawa: the Canadian Labour Congress, the Economic Council of Canada, the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, and so on.

During the month of August and early September members of the task force met privately with provincial governments with respect to these problems. As members know, this is a field which is jointly shared between the federal and provincial governments and, consequently, we felt it extremely important to consult with the provincial governments in order to let them know that we do not intend to tread into their jurisdiction but that we felt we wanted to explore the area completely. Those meetings with the provinces are completed, except for the province of Quebec, with which we have not yet been able to set a date.

The committee then undertook its travels on the road. Up until this point we have had hearings in Newfoundland, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick, British Columbia, Alberta, Manitoba and Saskatchewan, and in the Jonquière-Lac St. Jean area of Quebec. We were obliged to suspend the balance of our hearings scheduled for Quebec and Ontario because of the early recall of Parliament and the fact that there were so many other important matters taking place here, such as the budget, the energy policy announcement and the constitutional proposals. So, from the point of the recall of Parliament, we have been holding meetings here in Ottawa and we have been receiving many views.

I want to say something about the views, suggestions, recommendations and criticisms which have been coming to us via the various groups, and individuals who have appeared before us. To begin with, I wish to confirm in a most emphatic way that all witnesses felt we are in the midst of serious critical shortages with respect to skilled workers. These shortages will become worse leading up to 1985. Many people feel if important steps are not taken this year and next to turn around what is taking place, we will seriously impair the productive capacity of the industrial and service sector of this country. As a matter of fact, some witnesses have already reported to us that they have had to refuse orders and that they have had to withhold expansion. Some employers have had to close down wings of their plants or their businesses because they cannot find the skilled workers required to do the work which is necessary. Several reasons have been given for these serious, critical, skill shortages.

In a time when there is relatively high unemployment, some of the reasons given are the following. It has been pointed out to us time and again that whereas in the 1960s and 1970s we were dealing with the baby boom of the 1950s, we are now, in the 1980s, beginning to feel the results of the serious curtailment in the birth rate which started in about 1960. And, whereas we had large numbers of people coming into the labour market in the 1970s, it is pointed out that this will gradually decline as we go into the 1980s and the shortages will become more acute.

Second, the terrible record Canadian employers have, both in the industrial and other sectors, in training their own workers, has been mentioned to us time and again. The Canadian Manufacturers' Association, in a refreshing brief put before us, were very critical of their own members in pointing out that less than 20 per cent of the members of that association actually did any training on the job for skilled workers required by their own companies. They said this was a deplorable situation and must be turned around as quickly as possible.

The reason many of these companies have not done the training in the past, in Canada, is because it was much cheaper for them to go to western Europe or the United States to obtain skilled workers trained in those countries. The situation now is that those countries, the countries of western Europe, those in the common market as well as those which are not in the common market, and the United States, are also faced with a declining birth rate. Also, they are fortunate enough to have very improved conditions in those countries so that it is now extremely difficult for Canadian employers to get the kind of skilled worker they got in the past from those countries.

The last reason which has been given to us deals with the rather negative attitudes which have developed in this country since the Second World War with respect to blue collar work. These are attitudes which have been expressed in a way that almost any kind of white collar work is superior to blue collar work, and that blue collar work is in some sense dirty work whereas white collar work is clean work. This has resulted in many parents encouraging their children to take jobs as clerks in offices rather than to take up some apprenticeship or skilled trade, which very often is much more necessary to society, is honourable, and which we need if we are to produce the goods and services in this country to meet our market commitments.

Those are four of the reasons which have been given: the declining birth rate, the inability to attract immigrants as we have in the past—especially trained immigrants, the lack of training programs in our own industries, and negative attitudes.

Where are these critical shortages developing? To give some examples, companies, employers and unions have told us that the critical shortages are developing with respect to machinists, welders, tool and die makers, electronics technicians, computer technicians, communications technicians, engineers of all kinds, people who can do financial analyses, accountants, actuaries, personnel in the medical and para-medical field, nurses, psychiatric nurses, occupational therapists and physiotherapists, and so on. These are the types of trades and professions which are being affected by these serious shortages.

In Saint John, New Brunswick, it was reported to us that a wing of the Saint John General Hospital had to be closed due to a shortage of nurses. In Halifax the administrator of a large hospital told us that they had recently acquired very complex electronic equipment to be used in the hospital but that they could not find anyone to maintain and repair that equipment. Not only could they not find somebody in Halifax, or in Nova Scotia, but they could find no one in Canada to maintain and repair that equipment. They had to go to Chicago, Illinois, in order to find somebody to do the job. And this is in a province where there are high levels of unemployment.

Another striking example was pointed out to us when we held our hearings in Sydney, Nova Scotia. A relatively young man told us he had come to Cape Breton from Massachusetts because he found in Nova Scotia fishing boats were becoming highly computerized yet there was no one in Nova Scotia, or relatively no one, with the skills to do the maintenance or repair on the mini-computers and electronic systems on those fishing boats. Here is an American who comes to Canada, sets up a business to carry out this type of work, and who is now beginning to train young Canadians in the Cape Breton area to do this maintenance and repair work on fishing boats.

We have been told time and again that these shortages are bad enough now but will become worse unless something extremely positive is done. This is something which is accentuated even further by the megaprojects which are scheduled to come on-line shortly—the oil sands projects, the pipe lines, the offshore developments for energy in the Atlantic and Arctic regions and the superports which are planned. These mega projects will take up much of our skilled manpower, both in the blue collar and white collar fields, such as the engineers, welders, tool and die makers, and so on. They will be taken up from the entire country and brought to Alberta, or wherever the major megaprojects will take place, bidding up the salaries with strong inflationary pressure, and leaving shortages in many other parts of the country which just cannot bid in competition for salaries with those projects. Those are the existing problems and the anticipated ones.

What are the suggested solutions? There has been much criticism of our forecasting system, particularly the forecasting which is necessary to plan training programs and for setting in place proper counselling programs in the high schools, technicals schools, vocational schools and so on. Many witnesses felt that the statistical information which is being used throughout the country is based to far too great an extent on a macro-analysis system and that it does not take into account important regional problems. It has also been felt that the people of Statistics Canada who collected the information which is necessary for the labour market analysis have not been as sensitive as they could be to the phrasing or formulation of questions used to collect that information.

For example, while speaking to a representative of one of the governments in the Atlantic area, it was pointed out that a Statistics Canada questionnaire for industries in Altantic Canada had a question to the effect, "how many part-time workers do you employ?" And there were other questions related to that question. Since tourism is an important industry to that particular province, the ministers and the officials concerned telephoned Statistics Canada in Ottawa for the information on that questionnaire. Statistics Canada officials said that they could not provide that information because, although the questions had been asked and the industries had sent in answers, they decided that it was not necessary to put the data into the computer to make the information available. Of course the provincial officials were upset because this was the sort of information which would have been very useful to them for labour market analysis within the province.

So we have received criticism and recommendations on the statistical information which is being provided, particularly that it should be more appropriate to the regional problems, whether it be northeastern New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island, Labrador, the Gaspé, northern Ontario and so on, and that the information is not detailed enough to solve the problems of these regions. In order to phase in the courses required by industry and to provide the kind of trained labour force necessary and phase out those courses which are no longer required, this statistical information is necessary for such planning and to provide counselling to young people.

Other recommendations have been to the effect that there should be much more on-the-job training and that, if possible, it should be tied into some kind of co-operative educational system. Many employers were very positive with respect to the kinds of programs found at the University of Waterloo, the University of Sherbrooke and Ryerson Tech in which the students spend so much of their time in the institution and so much of their time in the work place. When these students graduate with a degree or a diploma, they have logged many practical hours in the workplace, which is of much benefit to the employer. I understand that the minister and the government over the past few years have been moving in this direction. All I can say is that the recommendations have been that we should move even quicker and further in that direction.

Another recommendation is that we amend our policies, laws and programs to allow to a much greater extent than is presently the case shared-work programs so that firms may keep on skilled workers after the age of 65. For example, one individual might work two or three days a week and another individual the remaining two or three days. In this way two senior citizen workers could come in on a reduced schedule and perform a job which cannot be performed by a younger person simply because no young person with the skills can be found.

I forget the exact figures, but one of the shocking revelations is that a very high percentage of the present skilled blue collar workers in Canada are well over 45 years of age and that there are very few young people coming in to replace these people. Many firms would like to keep their skilled blue collar workers after the age of 65 on a reduced work schedule, but this is not always possible today because of the laws, regulations, collective agreements and so on.

Another shared-work program suggestion which the committee received was that better use could be made of married women who, very often, have been trained to do jobs but have been forced to leave the work force for a number of years to bring up children. The suggestion was that in order to take advantage of these women who have the skills, the system be changed so that they could come in at least two or three days a week, which would contribute to the Canadian economy while at the same time allowing these people to take care of their families at home.

With respect to the young, it was suggested that we facilitate to a greater extent than is presently the case co-operative education programs so that young people may move in and out of the educational institution and the work force. There were also many recommendations received with respect to certain minorities or disadvantaged people. It seems to us that not only does justice demand it but the economic situation requires that we make much greater use of our women, our native people and our handicapped.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his allotted time has expired.

Mr. Allmand: I wonder if I might have a few minutes to complete my remarks.

The Deputy Chairman: That can only be done with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Allmand: I thank you, Mr. Chairman, and members of the committee. I will bring my remarks to a close in a very few minutes. As I was saying, with respect to those groups it was felt that we must make a much greater effort to utilize women in non-traditional work, train our native people so that they can do the skilled jobs required, and that we must use our handicapped people who are often very capable of doing skilled work. It was pointed out that not only does justice demand that this be done but the economic situation requires it. If this country is to reach the production capacity of which it is capable, we must use our potential workers, regardless of their sex, background or handicap.

Many Canadians in the outer regions of the country, in such areas as Atlantic Canada, the west and the northern parts of our central provinces, have suggested that there be much more flexibility in the manpower retraining programs and the mobility programs which are now in use. They feel that many of the rules which have been put in place are based on a statistical analysis which more properly reflects southern Ontario or the major urban centres of this country and that very often those policies do very little to correct the situation in Cape Breton, Gaspé, northern Ontario and other such areas.

It is obvious that something is wrong with our system. Considering the rate of unemployment in this country and the growing critical shortages in the labour force, there must be something wrong with our manpower retraining policies, because they do not recycle all those unemployed people who want to work and who want to learn skills and trades. These people should be retrained and put into these openings which are becoming more numerous.

In conclusion, the task force has obtained agreement with all parties as to the date on which its work will continue. It was impossible to deal with the complex subjects in the short time which was allocated. We will be continuing our work into the late spring, after which there will be a final report. In the meantime we will try to put out an interim report which, I hope, will help the minister in formulating new policies and correcting some of the problems to which I have referred in my remarks today.

Mr. Hawkes: As the minister was absent during the excellent presentation made by my colleague across the floor, I hope he will read it in Hansard. I think we have discovered a lot of information through that task force and I am glad that some of it, at least, is on public record.

On Friday last, in the five minutes allocated to me, I asked the minister a series of questions. I should like to begin with those questions today as he has had the weekend to search out the information.

Could the minister tell us how many person-years of employment will be created by the construction of a single tar sands plant?

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, before answering the hon. member for Calgary West I would like to assure him and the chairman of the parliamentary task force that not only will I read the Hansard report but I look forward with a great deal of anticipation to their presentation. I am sure it will reflect the wisdom and experience of the members—perhaps with some exceptions. I know the chairman has spent a great deal of time in this area. We look forward very much to the findings of this committee.

In response to the question of the hon. member for Calgary West, I would point out to him that each tar sands project has its own characteristics, depending on its size and nature. There is no standard tar sands project; each had different investments and different types of appropriation. I could provide the guesstimate figures that the oil companies have provided, and which our regional offices have provided. Perhaps the most illustrative example would be the Syncrude plant which used approximately 19,720 person-years during construction over a seven-year period and now has an operative complement of approximately 4,000 people.

The projection for the Alsands tar sands project calls for approximately 300 person-years in 1980; 300 in 1981; 1,200 in 1982; 3,395 in 1983; 6,308 in 1984; 6,673 in 1985 and 3,577 in 1986, for an approximate total of 21,757 person-years during the construction phase of the project. We estimate that the operating phase will require about 2,800 people for each of those areas.

The Cold Lake project which is presently being considered calls for 500 construction person-years in 1980; 677 in 1981; 2,091 in 1982; 4,771 in 1983; 7,679 in 1984; 7,552 in 1985; 4,796 in 1986, and 2,910 in 1987, for a total of 30,076 person-years in construction. The operation of that plant will require something approximating 2,600 person-years after it is completed.

As the hon. member knows, the decision on the progress of the tar sands plants is being held up by the Premier of Alberta for, as the Prime Minister said during question period, reasons known only to himself. The hon. member knows that we have put forward a very clear offer to provide the pricing asked for by the oil companies of $38 per barrel. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources made that offer in early fall, so we have responded to the demands of the oil companies for a price commensurate with the actual cost of recovery in the tar sands. The Premier of Alberta thus far has refused to grant permits to those projects. As I have mentioned to the hon. member previously, I hope he will use his good offices as a member of the Conservative party of Alberta to persuade the Premier of Alberta otherwise, so that these very necessary projects can go ahead.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Chairman, the minister continues to amaze me. As a minister from the west he should understand clearly that even the federal price offer on the tar sands makes those projects non-viable economically. I agree that the Premier of Alberta has indicated clearly that in the absence of a sane and sensible oil policy for this country, he is not prepared to deal with one small portion of that sane and sensible policy, but instead will do his best to teach the federal government what are the requirements of a sane and sensible policy which might lead us to self-sufficiency.

Let me return to the question of person-years of employment created in relation to those plants. Could the minister indicate whether his figures include the person-years of employment for the infrastructure—the city that is required to go with each of those plants? If not, could he give us some estimate of the person-years involved in construction of the cities that relate to the plants?

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, when the hon. member asked his questions on Friday, he neglected to include that request. We cannot, therefore, provide those detailed figures. I will make every effort to find those figures for him, but because this is the only day left for consideration of these estimates, I am afraid we will have to communicate with him by letter, unless we can find the figures. He will recognize it will require some degree of pretty gross estimating. We do not know exactly what the necessary size would be. We could transpose from the developments in Fort McMurray, I presume, but we will attempt to get those figures and provide them to him.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Chairman, I would hope that with 25,000 employees we might have those figures later today. It might just take a phone call from one of the officials that I notice in the gallery and on the floor.

I asked the minister a question about person-years of employment created throughout the life cycle of a plant, assuming a 25-year life cycle. The minister will recognize that the figures he has given to this point are related specifically to the building of the plant and the operation of it, but do not include the multiplier effect.

For instance, if we were to build a home with all the rooms that normally go in it, we would include the person-years required to erect that building but not the person-years generated in the plants that make the bathroom fixtures, the rugs, and so on. Could the minister indicate what his officials use as a multiplier in terms of the construction? It would be some figure within three to four times as many jobs, I presume, being created in a multiplier sense as opposed to the direct sense. Could the minister tell us what figures his department uses?

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member will recognize that he is now very slowly moving into the arcane world of black magic forecasting for which economists are well known, and the inaccuracies of which are well recognized. I would not want to mislead the House by giving figures which suggest a multiplication that is not true. The average multiplier often used by economists is in the area of three to five, but at this point there is no accurate multiplier factor for jobs created in the tar sands plants other than those which we could track down once they are in place, and use as examples. The Syncrude plant is the first major tar sands operation, and it would take some time to gain the experience and the evidence to give a sound data base on which accurate figures can be based.

I will ascertain from my officials whether there is a multiplier with which they would feel reasonably comfortable. I want to say that I would find that a fairly dangerous practice to use, in the present imperfect art that is economic forecasting in this country.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Chairman, just using the bottom end of that arcane black magic determination for which, as a taxpayer, I know I contribute tremendous sums of money to the federal government, I am a little disappointed that the minister chooses not to share those numbers with us. Using the bottom number just on the construction phase alone, we are looking at better than 120,000 person-years of employment and using the upper number we are looking at 180,000 person-years of employment. That is for one plant alone. Given his knowledge of the labour force in Canada, could the minister tell us how many of those plants could proceed during the same time space without us getting into severe skilled manpower shortages?

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, I raised that very same question about six weeks ago when I met with representatives of the oil companies who were engaged in the development and planning of the tar sands area. Quite frankly, they do not know, either. As we all know, one of the weaknesses in the country thus far has been effective planning of human resources in our major resource field. There has been great reluctance on the part of industry to combine efforts so as to come up with joint forecasting, joint planning and development of skill requirements. Industry has been relying on an ad hoc, piecemeal, company-by-company formula, and no efforts have been made to combine them on an industry-wide basis.

During the time of the advisory council meetings in Calgary, which I believe were held in October, we had a large-scale meeting with representatives of oil companies in an attempt to convince them that it may be important to proceed with a closer arrangement of planning. However, one of the impediments is the action by the province of Alberta which cancelled agreements of the manpower consultative and planning committee, something we normally have with each of the provinces. We endeavour to sit down and set up planning and consultative committees with provincial governments, industry, and the federal government. But I believe the province of Alberta withdrew from that about a year or so ago, perhaps a little bit longer than that, so we have not had the participation of the province in those areas.

They have voiced their reluctance from time to time to have companies deal directly with the federal government. This is something I deeply regret because I think the problem is much bigger than any one government's position or policy, or any one industry's. Rather, it is necessary for us to begin to combine our efforts to come to some agreement. But until we are able to get all the parties to agree that it is necessary, it will be very difficult to make those forecasts and to try to co-ordinate the efforts of the companies so they can space out their planning on a sequential basis so there is no overheating of the economy or a squeeze on manpower requirements. We suggested at that meeting that if all the projects converged at the same time, there would be a very short and intense pressure placed upon labour requirements in certain key fields, for example, pipefitting, machinery, engineering and what not.

Because the oil and gas industry is a high paying industry we suggested they could draw sufficient numbers of people from other industries within the province of Alberta, western Canada, and from other parts of the country. What it would do though is create a second order of deficiencies. Industries which cannot compete with them on the same price scale will be forced into severe shortages which would affect productivity.

It is the old story of robbing Peter to pay Paul. The oil and gas megaprojects could probably go ahead, but other industries which require the same kinds of skills and workers would suffer increasingly. That is why I suggested in my opening remarks that it would be very important for us to develop the kind of training and apprenticeship programs which would draw people from other walks of life who are presently not having the same advantages into those training areas. That is why we have to develop not just an industry or a sector approach, but we have to develop a national employment training strategy so there will not be those sort of shock effects when one draws people from one industry to another, which creates tremendous gravitational pulls from another industrial sector. Therefore, it is important that we begin to put together the building blocks of a national employment training scheme. We are trying to do that through the operations of the committee of this Parliament, the operations of our own committee, and through discussions with the provinces next year when we renegotiate the occupational training act.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for Calgary West. I must remind him that he has only one minute left.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Chairman, in a recent speech the minister said that finding solutions will not be made easier if we follow what he thinks is a recently established Canadian pattern of finger pointing and buck passing. He said we seem to have developed a knack of solving our problems by blaming them on each other.

I suggest to the minister that the forecasts of manpower needs in the province of Alberta are of pretty good quality. They are available to the federal government. The reason they are of good quality is that we tend to work together with the employees, the employers, and the government of the province. This is done in an atmosphere of mutual trust and co-operation. We do not treat each other as the enemy. I suggest the consequence of that is a more productive system, and a system in which it is possible to plan because employers choose to give accurate rather than inaccurate information. There may be a message for the minister in that process. I look forward to further discussion on other issues as the day progresses.

[Translation]

Mr. Lapointe (Beauce): Mr. Chairman, I am extremely pleased to have the opportunity to take part in this debate which will enable me to describe briefly the federal policy instruments which were used to promote job creation in my constituency. I shall conclude by asking a few questions of the minister on specific subjects. For a decade several job-creation initiatives have been introduced in each constituency through the Minister of Employment and Immigration and the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. Many of those projects attracted several participants and raised much interest, particularly because of their numerous effects on the socioeconomic life of our constituents. The first objective of the various programs which were established was, as we know, to create employment and to improve living conditions in the community.

Mr. Chairman, the people in Beauce supported those various programs with enthusiasm, particularly if we consider the number of applications I received for the new community development program this year. Seventy-five groups filed an application to have their projects approved, and some of them are very innovative. That enthusiasm is typical of the business mentality in Beauce where hundreds of diversified industries normally depend on local financing and manpower. It did not surprise me; indeed, the contrary would have. It gave me the opportunity of realizing how much imagination and creativity some of those people have. Unfortunately, the consultative committee and myself had to turn down almost half the applications because of budget restrictions. Indeed, out of 75 projects only 36 were accepted after a careful examination aimed at selecting those projects that were most representative of the criteria set down by the department.

The government injected $600,000 in my riding through that program. I should like to ask the minister if he still expects the budget earmarked for the ridings to be increased in order to meet more adequately the many requests we receive each year from our ridings; over $2 million is needed as I have received requests for over that amount in my riding alone. I am very much aware that it may be very difficult for the minister to grant such an amount, but might it not be possible to increase the amount of $600,000 to $1 million, for instance, and spread the projects over a slightly longer period? This would result in an even better performance and even more encouraging results.

[English]

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, I thank the hon. member for his comments about the effectiveness of the program in his area. We introduced that program for the very reasons he has put forward, namely, to concentrate our scarce financial resources in the areas where the need is greatest. I regret that we were not able to supply all the money which would put the people in the Beauce region to work. We were working with a set of estimates prepared by the previous government. As a result, we were required to provide for some reallocation of those moneys in order to re-introduce a job-creation program.

The previous government cancelled the direct job-creation program, so there would have been no money available at all. We had to work within very finite limits. Since the introduction of the program we now see what a strong demand there is. I intend to continue discussing this with my colleagues in cabinet to see if there are funds available which could be reallocated, and we would make every effort to put them back into those work projects. That is a discussion that is ongoing.

I hope we will be able to provide some answers to the hon. member and other hon. members in very short order to see if we can do some further reallocation to provide further work opportunities. As I pointed out, this is a transition period. We are trying to do a thorough re-evaluation of our employment programs to get more effective use, and to target where the needs are greatest. I welcome very much the comments of the hon. member. It gives us a better set of information to work on in his region.

Mr. Lapointe (Beauce): I thank the minister, Mr. Chairman. Still, in terms of jobs in my riding this year, the department will have created 125 jobs thanks to this new program, to be added to the other 800 created since 1977 under the Canada Works program. The student program gave rise to some controversy this year in my riding with regard to the geographic distribution of the projects, but in my opinion the criticisms were groundless, since I could not answer all applications received because of lack of money. On the other hand, the Young Canada Works program created some 425 jobs and injected $675,000 over the last four years. That program helped young people representing about 27 per cent of the labour force and almost 45 per cent of the total number of unemployed getting a job which gave them a good experience while benefiting the community.

I used these programs as examples to demonstrate that the federal government has helped the unemployment situation in Beauce where the participation rate increased from 55.8 per cent in 1975 to 58.4 per cent in 1979. The ratio between the labour force and the corresponding population aged 15 and over has risen from 51.5 per cent to 53.2 per cent. Although the levels of these two percentages are not as high as the corresponding figures for the province of Quebec and Canada as a whole, their rates of growth are superior. As a matter of fact, the participation rate for the economic region of Quebec went up by 2.6 per cent, compared with 1.4 per cent and 1.5 per cent for the province of Quebec and Canada respectively. The total creation of these jobs through various employment and immigration programs has helped lower the unemployment level during certain periods. In spite of adverse economic circumstances, the Beauce region has maintained its unemployment rate at a lower level than the averages for Quebec and Canada. To a certain extent this has been made possible in part thanks to another federal department, namely, the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, which has invested in the riding more than $18.5 million and created some 3,850 new jobs since its establishment in 1969. There are a few figures. In the town of St. Georges in Beauce alone, some 1,300 jobs have been created and that is significant. However, the problem of unemployment is still too acute, especially when there is a shortage of manpower in some specialized trades. I agree with the spokesmen for the Task Force on Employment Opportunities for the '80s who suggested that we should emphasize training and manpower mobility schemes. In that connection, I would like to congratulate my colleague the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce and the members of his task force for their contribution to that effort to set up a coherent employment strategy for the eighties.

This is where the importance of consultation is evident. I entirely agree that each employment centre should set up a committee on manpower requirements which would be made up of people from all trades who could advisedly make some suggestions on courses which could be given to workers who are prepared to retrain in forefront areas where many jobs are available. I am therefore happy to see that the government has added an additional $10 million to the critical trades, skills and training program. I also want to draw attention to other departmental programs which truly satisfy the needs of my constituents, especially the technology employment program which will provide the small and medium-sized businesses in my ridings with the funds necessary to hire students with specialized training and to subsidize their salaries.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, I want to indicate to the minister that there is an urgent need in the second largest city of my riding, namely, Ste. Marie and its area, to have an unemployment insurance office independent from the one in St. Georges. Ste. Marie is an important centre in Beauce. The population is certainly large enough to support such an office. The people must now travel approximately 85 kilometres to get to the nearest office, which, I am sure you will agree, is a fair distance.

[English]

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, I would like to comment on the last point made by the hon. member on services provided regarding Ste. Marie or St. Georges, and indicate to him that officials of the Quebec region are looking into that question to see to what degree additional services may be necessary based upon the clientele. I will report to him as soon as I have that information.

• (1600)

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Chairman, it is a delight to be back. To begin, could I ask the minister how many jobs have been created in the Canadian economy in the first ten months of this year?

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, I believe the number is 277,000.

Mr. Hawkes: The minister's answer is very similar to the one he gave in the House on Friday, when the blues recorded that he said 270,000. But Friday's printed Hansard has the figure of 170,000. Could the minister tell me what happened between the printing of the blues and the final version of Hansard?

Mr. Axworthy: I have no idea. We will check with the Hansard office, but my answer has been the same throughout, 277,000.

Mr. Hawkes: Could the Minister of Employment and Immigration tell us how many jobs were created in the nine months the Conservative government was in office?

Mr. Axworthy: I will endeavour to look up the information. Because the record was so poor, we have not paid much attention to what they did exactly.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Chairman, a million unemployed is a rather serious situation. In the seven months since the return of the Liberal Government of Canada less than 200,000 jobs have been created. In fact, if you examine the labour force survey you will find there has been an average of a little more than 17,000 jobs a month created. In the previous nine months there were over 301,000 jobs created, and I think the minister will find that that is in excess of 30,000, in fact, in the neighbourhood of 33,000 jobs a month, which is almost double. Can the minister tell me of the jobs he claims have been created under his government, what proportion of those are in the public administration or in the public service sector?

Mr. Axworthy: Before I answer the specific question raised by the hon. member, I think it would be important to point out to him some simple economic lessons about how the economy works. I am not trying to be presumptuous about it because I know he often reminds us of what a set of advanced degrees he has. To try to play a game of somehow saying that in nine months we can demarcate a period in which there was a major changeover does not take into account the economic reality that trends and patterns of the economy are affected very much by international conditions, the international flow of money in cash and the kind of industrial development that takes place. We know, for example, from our own history of the last 20 or 30 years that we are very susceptible to the economic decisions made in the United States in terms of purchasing power for exports, on which about 60 per cent of our economy depends.

Furthermore, I should like to point out that in the area of public policy and public stimulation there is a certain time lag. The initiatives taken, the tax changes and various kinds of incentives offered take a certain amount of time to take hold and one flows into the other. To claim somehow there was a period in 1979 when everything was magical, I would say that was probably directly a product of the previous Liberal decisions made in the budget of 1978.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Axworthy: If the hon. member is here to compliment previous Liberal administrations, I am sure my colleagues who were here during that time will be glad to take those compliments willingly. The fact of the matter is we should not have to be involved in that kind of game. We must recognize that what a government does is respond to conditions both as it sees them and as it tries to counteract them. What we are trying to do is to live with a very difficult and very awesome economic situation.

May I point out to the hon. member that at the present time the employment growth in Canada is one of the highest in the industrialized world. We are still maintaining a phenomenal record of job creation. Contrary to the statement he made, we have created 270,000 jobs in the first ten months of this year, at a time when the United States has gone through a very severe recession and when a number of normal markets such as lumber and the automobile industry have been in serious decline. We have faced drop-offs in the area of automobile production because the market is not there, much of the market being demanded by the United States. Even within a very difficult and very onerous economic period we are able still to maintain a high degree of economic growth.

May I point out there are even some bright spots on the horizon. For example, the job creation for women during that ten-month period has been higher than any other period—close to 5.5 per cent economic and employment growth for women during that period of time, which is much higher than the normal employment growth. The unemployment rate for women has dropped in the last ten months from a high of 7.8 per cent down to 6.6 per cent. Therefore, it shows there is a certain degree of promise in parts of the economy even though there are other parts which are heavily depressed.

As I pointed out in this House many times, and as my colleague, the Minister of Finance, has pointed out, we cannot totally and completely command the economy because we live basically in a private market economy. Most of the economic decisions are made by investors, corporations, and others. The government can only try to provide some direction and some guidelines within those areas. Certainly we cannot twist the economy according to our whims but must ride the currents which are, in many cases, caused outside our borders and within our borders. We have to develop an economic policy that tries to concentrate where the problems are most severe, as in the case of unemployment, areas wich face the greatest disadvantage. That is why we have adopted the kinds of policies targeted at high unemmployment regions and targeted at certain groups within the economy who face the greatest difficulty in getting jobs.

Much of the other kind of growth is a stimulant based primarily upon decisions made outside the government by others who are not really within our control and only respond to some of the signals we provide. I can attempt to give some of the breakdowns in the area of the actual labour market development.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for Calgary West rises on a point of order.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Chairman, I think the question I asked the minister was what proportion of the jobs he claims have been created, since they took office in March, were in the public administration sector. I wonder if I could just have that simple answer.

Mr. Axworthy: The answer I will attempt to give is as follows: The employment growth in the primary goods producing area was 7.4 per cent during 1980; in secondary goods producing, 9.2 per cent; and the service producing contribution to average employment growth was 83 per cent. In these areas we have actual growth rates of 2.6, .9, and 3.3.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member rises on a point of order.

Mr. Hawkes: I appreciate the free information but it has the incorrect base. I am asking about the period March to October which is the period in which the party opposite has been governing this country. He is giving me the total 1980 figures which reflect not too badly because they include a period of the Conservative government. I would like him to restrict his answer to that period from March to October.

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, I tried to point out to the hon. member before that to make these sort of artificial demarcations at a point of an election and implying that all of a sudden the economy turns over, is absolutely ludicrous. I will attempt to get him a month-by-month breakdown regarding some of these figures. To say that these were Tory times and Liberal times is not the way the economy works. I would suggest that he go and get some small briefing on the fact that economic currents and trends flow through different months and different years. The advent of an election or no election is usually immaterial to those other than in the longer term when the government has the opportunity to change its policy, to change the direction to provide more stimulation. As we have pointed out in the budget presented by my colleague, we have now provided a more stimulative budget than that which was provided under the previous government and those returns will show up in the Canadian economy within the next nine to 18 months.

Mr. Hawkes: That is economic theory from 100 years ago. We live in a modern age of communication, and I might suggest to the minister opposite that there is something called psychological confidence. There is either a belief that governments work together with industry, work together with entrepreneurs to create jobs, or there is a belief that the government is determined to put the private sector out of business. Those two psychological differences, I suggest, have a great deal more impact on the economy than the minister may in fact recognize.

If he is playing a political game with us, I am not worried, but if he honestly believes what he is saying, that the degree of trust which private sector people have in their government is not an important factor in their decisions to proceed to invest or in a young person's decision to go to school—if he honestly believes that faith in government is not important in that context—then I am more worried than I was when I began this day.

Let me just put on the public record the fact that since his government took office—and these statistics are in our labour force survey data—it has created less than 200,000 jobs, and about one-third of them are in the public administration sector. In our nine months in office we created approximately twice as many jobs per month, but only about 6,000 of that total of over 300,000 were in public administration, which is less than 2 per cent compared with 33 per cent to 35 per cent. Those figures are in the labour force survey, and they are irrefutable. I do not suggest and have not suggested that this was specifically because of economic policy because our budget was defeated, but I do suggest that the business community had psychological confidence that the Government of Canada cared about jobs and about economic development. I suggest that was a very important factor in the increase in job creation under our administration and is today a very important concern which was accelerated on October 28 by the government opposite.

Can the minister tell us how many man-years, or person-years, of employment are created by one drilling rig in this country? The minister is from the west, and this is an important industry. We seem to have an economic policy which chases rigs out of the country. However, as a rig operates for a full year and searches for oil for us, how many jobs are created throughout the Canadian economy by the direct activity of one rig during one year?

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, I suppose the answer depends on how deep the rig digs. I do not think we have to give a specific answer to that kind of question. I think the hon. member is simply toying at this point in time, but we will attempt to find the answer for him. We will consult the oil rig industry and find out the number of person-years involved. I would like to provide a small correction to the hon. member's terminology. It is person-years, not man-years, because we are now in an era of non-traditional work for women, and I think it would be helpful if the hon. member recognized that. However, we will attempt to obtain information in terms of person-years for the hon. member.

I would like to go back to this new economic theory about psychological confidence in the economy the hon. member has put forward for our consideration. This sounds something like a cross between psycho-cybernetics and Milton Friedman.

Mr. Evans: Let's be careful.

Mr. Axworthy: I apologize to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance whose tutelage, I gather, was under Professor Friedman. If the hon. member for Calgary West wants definitive proof of the psychology of things between one year and another, I point out to him that the actual registrations in our employment offices in Alberta are down this year from a year ago. In other words, more people registered for work considering that there was higher unemployment or higher demand for work a year ago than there is this year. By using the logic of the hon. member's argument, I suppose we would have to suggest that more people in Alberta are more confident with this government than they were with the previous government.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Chairman, in the face of the considerable number of business decisions which are made in the province of Alberta and across the west—and I suggest across Canada—to take capital south, to Asia or to the North Sea, and in view of the number of those decisions which have been made in the last six months, accelerated by the events of October 28, it is difficult for me to sit on this side of the House and hear the minister repeat that business confidence is not important to economic development.

Let us leave that for a moment and ask the minister about the budgeted amount of $350 million which is to be split between the minister's and other departments of the federal government for industrial purposes in the next four years. This is a $350 million special development fund. Could the minister indicate to us what portion of that fund will be coming to his department and for what purposes?

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, as the hon. member would recognize, based upon budget discussions we felt it very important to respond in a variety of ways to the changes in the industrial composition of the country. I do not think those changes can be divided purely along departmental lines. It should be more along the lines of the kinds of activities and services we want to sponsor and promote. What we are presently doing is working in co-operation with several departments of government.

We are working with the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, the Department of Labour and the Department of Regional Economic Expansion to come up with a package of proposals which would help industries which are going through major changes or shifts in production and help the workers in those industries who are facing adjustment problems to be able to respond to them. We are not trying at this time to divide the money along departmental lines, although once we get to the administration of it, it will be administered through certain departments. What we are far more concerned about is applying the $350 million to target industries and communities which are most directly affected by some form of industrial change. As I indicated in the House this afternoon, we are presently working to put that package forward. We hope to be able to have made decisions on it sometime within the next three or four weeks. Once the announcement is made, I am sure the hon. member will have an opportunity to ask questions in the House in order to get further details.

At the moment that matter is before cabinet, and besides indicating the general purpose and objective of that program I cannot go much further until the cabinet has finally decided on the program itself.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Chairman, I direct the minister's attention to publications from the Institute of Social Research in the United States and particularly Dr. George Katona. The minister may find those studies instructive in dealing effectively with the economy in the manner I have suggested.

I direct the minister's attention to his own statement on Friday afternoon at page 5415 of Hansard. As reported on that page the minister said:

—there has been a tendency by the private sector to rely almost exclusively on the import of skills from other countries.

In that same context he talked about his own program providing training spaces for 300,000 Canadians. I am wondering if the minister could give us the exact reference which enables him to conclude that the private sector in this country relies almost exclusively on the import of skills from other countries. What on earth led to that statement? What is the specific reference which gives the minister the data base on which to make the statement?

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, I am surprised at the nature of the hon. member's question because I believe he was in attendance at the Conference Board meetings about three weeks ago in Toronto at which this very topic was discussed. Private employers who were in attendance themselves conceded and admitted that that is exactly the kind of program they have been relying upon, the importation of skills. If the hon. member wants exact data, we will provide it for him in terms of showing the actual immigration levels under the independent classifications.

I will give the hon. member just one example. The Employers' Council of British Columbia published a study last summer—I will get the exact reference for the hon. member—which indicated that close to 70 per cent of the skilled, trained workers in certain key areas of the forest industry are from offshore. The problem the council is most concerned about is that the industry is not able to replace those workers. They are now reaching an age which is close to retirement. They will soon be out of the work force because of compulsory retirement requirements. The people required for replacement simply are not there. So I would be very glad to obtain for the hon. member, because I know he is a member of the Allmand parliamentary task force, some of the exact data.

I recall from memory the figures mentioned in statements at the Employers' Council of British Columbia, statements made at the Economic Conference Board, the latest report of the mining industry and the latest report of the construction industry. The construction industry's report, which I received this week, indicates that close to 50 per cent of their skilled membership originally derives from outside Canada. So I think it is pretty clear that those are, in fact, the figures with which we are working.

We are not attempting to lay blame. We are simply asking industry to recognize that that easy way of obtaining skilled labour will no longer be available to them, that there is too much competition in the world for the very same skills, and that we will increasingly have to put far more concentration upon the training of people here in Canada. That is one reason why we feel it is very important to alter the training programs to provide for opportunities and access to women to come into non-traditional fields, an area which they have been denied for a long period of time, and to broaden the scope—

The Deputy Chairman: I regret to interrupt the minister, but the time allotted to both questions and answers has expired.

Miss MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, I should like to deal for a while this afternoon with a subject which I raised with the minister and some of his colleagues who either cared to answer or did not care to answer me in the House today, on the subject of women in the public service, and the lack of advancement by women in the public service over the years, something which, I say with regret to the minister, I do not see as having improved much. In fact, in many cases the situation has regressed.

If we are to look at the question of non-discrimination in the work force on the basis of hiring, on the basis of responsibility and on the basis of salary and income, then surely the prime responsibility for equality must rest with the federal government and the way in which it treats its own employees. It is the federal government which must set the standards and implement the programs. It must take action if it wishes the rest of the country to follow. It must take action if it wishes business and labour to follow the same way. It must set the example.

What I want to do this afternoon is to point to some of the inequities which exist and which, in many cases, are becoming more pronounced. Unfortunately, that is not the view of some of the minister's colleagues, and I direct my remarks to him in the most constructive way possible because I think he realizes that this is an area in which I have a great deal of concern and in which I have had a specific interest over the years.

It was with some interest, therefore, that I read the press release issued by the President of the Treasury Board on August 22, in which he stated:

> We have come a long way toward achieving the government's goal of making equal opportunities for women a reality in the Public Service of Canada.

His interpretation of what "coming a long way to achieving the government's goal of making equal opportunities for women a reality", and mine, and that of a great many other women, are entirely different. We really do not believe that we have come that far in providing equal opportunities for women in the Public Service of Canada. If I were to look only at the Treasury Board I would see that there is only one person, as of this time, with one secretary working on all the equal pay for equal work cases in the whole of the public service. All there is in the Treasury Board is two people who are looking at these cases. I would urge the minister to speak to his colleague, the President of the Treasury Board, and try to bring to his attention the fact that this will become a much bigger problem than two people can handle, that it will grow in dimension, not diminish.

I am sure that the minister responsible for the status of women knows that the statement in the press release issued by the President of the Treasury Board has been totally refuted by the Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women in their most recent publication, released in October, 1980, entitled "Women in the Public Service: Overlooked and Undervalued." I am going to quote rather extensively from that publication, first of all because I feel that the views in this report should be disseminated much more widely than they have been heretofore, that it should be in the public domain to a much greater extent, and also because I hope that what the advisory council has to say about women employees in the public service will be brought home much more succinctly to the minister responsible for the status of women. The following are some of the quotes from the report.

We read, for example, that:

> Inequities today persist in spite of the fact that most departments currently have five year "action" plans in line with the equal opportunities for women policy adopted in 1975.

The inequities exist after five years of so-called action plans having been in progress.

As the minister is aware, there are six occupational categories in the public service, that of senior executive, scientific and professional, administrative and foreign service, technical, administrative support and operational. All of these, of course, have responsibilities and salary scales attached to them. In the top four, those which offer the most salary and the most responsibility, those which are considered to be the most prestigious categories, that is, senior executive, scientific and professional, administrative and foreign service and technical, 45.6 per cent of the employees are male, 21.4 per cent are female, that is, in the all officer categories. In other words, less than half the employees in those four top categories are female. But in the other two categories where the income is lower and the responsibilities are lesser, in the support categories, that is, administrative support and operational, 54.3 per cent of the employees are male, whereas 78.6 per cent are female. In other words, at the lower end of the salary scale, at the lower end of responsibility, and at the lower end of upward mobility, we find a great many women locked into almost dead-end jobs.

The minister is aware that women make up slightly more than one-third of the public service, and yet when we look at the category of senior executives we find that 96.3 per cent of the senior executives are male and 3.7 per cent are female, this with one-third of the public service being composed of women. Indeed, I suppose one can say that since 1972 women have made some slight changes in most categories except in the scientific and professional category. The rate of change, however, in that eight-year period has been extremely slow. If these rates of progress were to continue, it would take another 66 years, until the year 2046, for women to achieve proportional representation among senior executives. Frankly, Mr. Chairman, I know I will not be here to see that longed for proportional representation of women. I doubt very much whether the minister will be here.

Mr. Breau: I will be here.

Miss MacDonald: I am sure even the hon. member for Gloucester will not be here, but I would ask him to do everything he possibly can to ensure that the time-span is diminished so that women will receive much greater equality long before that period of time, given these projections. Being the honest fellow he is, I am sure the member will want to make that effort to try to get the minister to move much more rapidly than he is in this field.

In the six occupational categories which I mentioned, two of them have become increasingly segregated over the years. As the ministers will appreciate, that is a deplorable fact. The scientific and professional category has become much more a male preserve. The percentage of men who hold jobs in the scientific and professional category has increased, while the administrative support category has become consistently more female-dominated. In 1972, 68.2 per cent of the employees in the administrative support category were women, that is, secretaries, clerks and so on. In the eight years since then the percentage of women has risen to 79.7 per cent. In other words, women are more increasingly being locked into the lower end of the salary scale.

These categories have a specific number of groupings within them, all of them in a hierarchical scale. Even in the top categories which a few women manage to enter, they are at the bottom of the groupings in those categories; they do not make it to the top.

I have mentioned the administrative support grouping where women are found to be most predominant. Over 90 per cent of the women were in the bottom four levels of the group's eight levels, so we see even within a category itself women are being denied access to the top positions. As the minister will appreciate, all of this has a very distinct bearing on the differences in incomes between men and women which, of course, has an even greater bearing on the economic independence women are able to achieve for themselves.

The wage gap in the federal public service unfortunately is growing between men and women, rather than diminishing. There are a number of reasons for this. Some 67 per cent of all female public servants earned wages in the last year which placed them in the bottom 40 per cent of all employees in the public service, whereas only 26 per cent of men were in that category. By contrast, in the top 60 per cent earning categories of the public service where higher salaries are found, 73 per cent of the employees were men but only 32 per cent were women.

The earnings of female public servants relative to their male counterparts have improved only slightly in a few categories since 1977, but in certain categories they have not improved at all. I mentioned before the very top category; the minister will know the incomes of women in that top category of salaries. In 1977, 26.8 per cent were men in that category. In 1979 it was still 26.8 per cent. Women had 6 per cent in 1977 and only 6.1 per cent in 1979. They had gone up but a mere fraction. At the bottom end of the salary scale—and this is of significance—39.2 per cent of the employees were women in 1977, but in 1979 that number increased to 41 per cent.

The minister talked about the increase in the number of women employed in the public service, but as the numbers of women employees increase, they increase in the lowest end of the salary scale. Women are not making the breakthrough into the top area. When different groups within the public service negotiate salary increases, they are generally negotiated across the board for the whole group in that category. This means that the increases tend not to be as great a benefit to those who receive lower salaries as those who receive the higher ones. In other words, the increment which a women receives is smaller because her income is smaller to begin with, whereas the increment which a man receives is larger because of his already larger salary. Perhaps the minister will say that everyone is being treated equally, but the percentage increase is allegedly sex blind, and in that regard a woman is doubly penalized.

There are other aspects in the public service to which I want specifically to draw the minister's attention. The system denies women access to the decision-making levels. If the minister looks at the manner in which women are placed in jobs in the public service, I am sure he will see how few of them rise to the level of decision-making where they can provide real input into the recommendations and options brought before ministers or deputy ministers. As long as women continue to be at the margin of decision-making, it is unlikely that decisions taken will reflect the special priorities of women, which is something that must be considered. Currently women have very little input into decisions being made about which programs to cut to reduce government expenditures, even though they may have a tremendous amount to do with the lives of other women.

Since 1977 the proportion of women in the senior executive group has increased only .8 of one per cent and remains abysmally low at 3.3 per cent. As of March 31, 1979, there were only 42 female SXs compared with 1,220 male executives. I ask the minister what kind of comparison that is—42 women as against 1,220 men in that category?

These are the kinds of things which make it very difficult for women to accept the statement of the President of the Treasury Board that we have come a long way in ruling out the inequities against women which exist within the public service. I know the minister will rise and talk about affirmative action programs and about things that are being done. I am really serious when I ask him to address this matter and tell us what kinds of programs are being considered, not just in one or two departments but in the entire public service. I am not referring to programs which are very limited. I am referring to programs which will be mandatory for the whole public service in order that the inequities which I have listed, whether they happen to be in incomes or in the input of decision-making are removed.

Is there really a program under way which will correct these inequities that have existed despite the five-year programs, which are supposedly in existence, and despite the affirmative action programs which are now only in the process of planning and development? Is there really some significant commitment that we can point to which will not be torn to ribbons, as the most recent statements of the President of the Treasury Board have been by the Advisory Council on the Status of Women?

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. minister has one minute to answer that question.

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, I will try to do my best, although it is not enough time to respond adequately to the questions raised by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands, because they are serious questions. I say to her that the report of the advisory council accurately describes the conditions. No one argues with that or refutes it. There is, however, a certain time lag in that report. The time lag is there because the report was prepared before we introduced the affirmative action programs.

I would ask her, as someone who is known to be interested in this area, not to disregard so lightly, pass over or push away the importance of the affirmative action program we have implemented. It is not frivolous, light-hearted or perfunctory.

It is a very serious attempt to overcome the underlying discrimination which exists in most work structures in this country. It is clear that the equal opportunity program was not working very effectively, although there were some marginal improvements and certainly some major improvements on the lower level of the professional recruitment for women.

There is a certain kind of ratchet effect where the problem of having a number of SXs takes a certain amount of time to work up the ladder. There was not much effort made for lateral movement in the civil service. We can see some improvements, but it would take some time to achieve that. Therefore, after discussing the problem quite seriously among the ministers concerned, including myself and the President of Treasury Board, we felt that the only response was to employ the affirmative action system, or technique, which has been incorporated in the United States, Great Britain, and a few other countries. It is a very tough system, Mr. Chairman. It really works.

The Deputy Chairman: I regret to interrupt the hon. minister but to continue he would need the unanimous consent of the committee.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, I thank hon. members for giving me the opportunity to continue. I will make my reply as brief as I can.

The reason why the affirmative action program was introduced in only three departments to begin with was that it does take a certain number of people who know how to make the program work. One of the drawbacks in this country was getting the skilled personnel in the management area who have the technical skills, expertise and knowledge in affirmative action requirements. Therefore, we are using those three departments. The initial phase is to build up those skills. We have now established a resource team in my own department which provides for other departments in the public service. We have established affirmative action counsellors and teams in each of the respective departments, who report directly to the deputy minister. Those deputy ministers then report directly to a small committee of cabinet, who will monitor on a monthly basis the progress which is being made.

The first question was accountability—to make sure that there was a senior commitment from the ministerial level on down. That commitment has been made. Second, we had to develop the resources, which we have now done. As that circle widens, as more people get skills, then we will be able to broaden the approach. But, frankly, we have had to borrow people from my department in the regions and bring them into Ottawa to make the program work. We are not getting the experience. It is now in place. The training is now completed. We have just gone through a very extensive training phase of the affirmative action counsellors. I believe that was completed last week. So the first phase is now complete.

We are now into the second phase, which is the identification of the problems. The hon. member said in question period that the problem has been studied enough. That is not quite true. The statistical work has not been done. What must happen is you must compare not only the number of people in each category and occupation but in each department. You must compare them to the availability of those in the work force outside.

For example, in the case of my department if we have a hundred chartered accountants who work in the department and only 5 per cent of those are women, yet 20 per cent of chartered accountants available in the work force are women, we know there is a discrepancy. That kind of comparative analysis must be done, which is what we are presently doing to make sure that the judgments are made according to what is available within that work force, so that the targets can be effectively set. I will conclude quickly, Mr. Chairman. Once that is in place we can then identify where the blockages in the system are. Is it in the recruitment program, the training program, the pay scales, or personnel practices?

Miss MacDonald: It is the people in charge.

Mr. Axworthy: I disagree with the hon. member. What is very clear from the affirmative action experience in the United States is that it is not the personnel manager who is the bigot or who dislikes women—there are some of those—but, in fact, what has been allowed to evolve over the years is systemic discrimination—discrimination which grows into the system over generations and decades. The only way you can eliminate that is to change the system, change the hiring practices, the recruitment and training practices. Once the blockages, the handicaps and limitations are identified they will then be removed, thus ensuring that women, as well as native groups and minority groups, will have access.

I want to point out to hon. members that the removal of those blockages and handicaps will not just affect the three departments. Once they are implemented they will then become system-wide because the three departments are being used as the lead agencies to determine that. It may be that there will be legislative changes to the Public Service Employment Act. It may be that certain public service regulations will have to be altered. It may be that the whole system of in-house training must be altered. In each of those cases, once that improvement or reform is introduced for my department, Treasury Board, or Secretary of State, it can then become system-wide in its application.

I want to assure the hon. member that we are very strongly committed to the principle. The affirmative action program has more teeth and vigour in it than the equal opportunities program ever had. This is because we recognize the deficiencies it had, which is why we have gone to the other system. It is a system which has a proven track record. Where it has been employed, in the case of the United States, it has been demonstrated that there can be substantial improvements for those groups which are being given greater opportunities or access. It will take about a four-year period to implement. As the hon. member well recognizes, four years compared to the long history of discrimination is a very short period of time.

But I am quite convinced that we will see substantial improvements when that four-year period is over.

Mr. Manly: Mr. Chairman, last Friday in his opening remarks the minister said:

> While I am quite anxious to deal with the specific and ad hoc questions and inquiries of hon. members, I hope we can devote some time during the discussion of these estimates to look at some of the longer term questions faced by the department, because it is a crucial department in terms of the economic and social policies which we will be facing in the 1980s.

I agree with those comments of the minister but I would like to point out that the long lists of specific questions, which will come to him from almost every part of the country, are really a result of the government's failure to take that long look in times past.

I regret that during his opening remarks the minister did not make any mention of the employment needs of native people. I would remind the minister of the statistics published by the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development in their publication "Indian Conditions as Surveyed." It points out that recent estimates of Indian unemployment have ranged between 35 per cent and 75 per cent of the labour force. In his June 2 statement the minister accepted the 75 per cent figure. Whether it is 35 per cent or 75 per cent, we realize that this problem is getting worse.

As this report says, in the next ten to 15 years it is estimated that the net increase in the Indian working age population will be 50,000 to 60,000, an average of 4,000 to 6,000 per year. The creation of permanent jobs through Indian economic development has recently averaged slightly more than 1,000 per year. We are falling behind.

In addition to that, the minister knows that approximately 35 per cent of those Indian people who do have employment are employed for less than six months per year. They support a large number of dependants and they take home a smaller pay cheque. Considering this fact, I regret that, in spite of hearing of some ad hoc programs, I have not heard of any long-term policies. What we have had is more ad hockery.

I have a number of questions which I would like to address to the minister. I will attempt to be brief, and I ask that the minister be brief so that we can get through as many as possible.

The minister has established a native opportunities training fund of some $10 million. According to a Department of Indian Affairs study, there are some 108 projects across the country with environmental hazards which will have a major impact on native populations. It seems to me that with 108 major projects this $10 million is completely inadequate. Will the minister first of all indicate on what this $10 million for the Native Opportunities Training Program is based, and what objective study of the needs for native training lies behind it? Is it a one shot fund or is it a permanent fund?

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, if we are dealing with ad hockery, it would be useful for those who are raising questions to follow the same principles and not deal with ad hoc programs. There is a range of programs available to native people, and it is not useful to pull out one program and identify it as being the only program. For example, within my department—and it is not the only department which is exclusively involved in providing job opportunities for native people—there are the services of our regular training programs, both institutional and industrial. Some 5,000 native people are enrolled in the traditional Canada Manpower program and the Canada Manpower industrial training programs.

In addition, there is the LEAP project which has a budget of $65 million, of which 50 per cent is directly focused on native training employment programs. The LEAP programs are probably the most advanced and successful programs for providing work training opportunities across Canada, and particularly in western Canada where the LEAP project is able to respond to community needs and to provide for sponsorship within a wide variety of both status and non-status communities to give many people that necessary first work experience to begin developing basic skills. The allocation in this program has been approximately $32 million, and the enrolment for native people is 8,800.

There is also the Outreach programs, 50 per cent of which are allocated to native people, to provide them with the Outreach extension services in native communities and the opportunity to develop their own work opportunities in the private market or in the Manpower programs which we otherwise employ.

The $10 million native training program was added to these other programs to provide special priority for projects related to source development in western Canada or other places where there would be new needs arising, and where native groups themselves could see opportunities to develop further work opportunities if they have the proper skills. The government is in the position of signing for several such programs. I believe we have signed close to 100 agreements since the announcement of the program last spring. The program is being used partly as a test case to determine whether its approach is effective in developing direct line training programs with native groups themselves.

As I have pointed out on many occasions in this House, we are in a transition period. Major studies are under way through the parliamentary task force and through the department to revise and revamp many of the training and employment programs. In the meantime different models, approaches and plans are being tested to determine which are the most effective. From early evaluation, indications are that the way in which the $10 million native opportunities program has been utilized has been very successful. It has given the native groups the opportunity to choose, design and tailor training to meet their specific needs in resource areas. I will be in a position to report more accurately to the House at a later date on the outcome of that program which is really just being implemented. Early reports show that it is somewhat effective.

Mr Manly: The minister points out that this is a test program. I presume that if it is successful it can look forward to a substantial increase in the amount of funding provided to it. I would like to refer to a specific situation relating to the Cold Lake project. On December 2, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources was asked about native participation in this project. As it is reported at page 5236 in Hansard, he answered:

> It is difficult to know what exact arrangements will be possible. I have raised this matter with Imperial Oil, which is the main promoter of Cold Lake, and they have indicated they are willing to consider participation by the Indians in the project. Obviously, it would require the full co-operation of the two governments in order to achieve this particular purpose.

Considering the fact that Canadians have been asked to put up an additional $40 million for this project, and thereby have a vital stake in it, this approach by the government is a very weak-kneed—"If Imperial Oil is willing, if the Alberta government is willing; then we can see what we can do about native participation". Is the minister prepared to fight for an affirmative action program for the Cold Lake project and to insist that no pricing agreement be signed without agreement on native training, native employment, and native business development support? In view of the $40 million allocated to Imperial Oil, how much will the minister make available for native training, and is it all to come out of this $10 million?

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, while we would like to implement an affirmative action program for the major resource projects in Alberta, the provincial government seriously disagrees with our approach. It follows what it calls the "local preference program". In fact their human rights legislation has basically outlawed affirmative action principles or requirements other than if the provincial cabinet makes an exception, which would have to be approved by order in council. In effect, what the Alberta government is saying is that affirmative action programs are illegal according to provincial statutes.

The federal government has made it very clear that it does not agree with this opinion. It will be an area of some continuing discussion between the federal government and the government of Alberta because we, as a government, are fully committed to this principle. Because of this, the resource companies are caught between the Alberta government, which is not prepared to recognize affirmative action, and the federal government and its insistence upon it. That is really what the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources was referring to.

There is no clearcut choice, and it may be that there will have to be a court case. I believe, and my hon. friend over here would know, that two Indian bands have already gone to court to test that law in Alberta, and that the courts have sided with the bands. It may be that the federal government at some point will have to go to court as well, but that decision has not yet been taken in the hope that we can work out an arrangement with the government of Alberta. In the meantime this law is a serious impediment to the introduction of the affirmative action principle.

Mr. Hawkes: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, would the minister give us chapter and verse proof that the Alberta government has refused to recognize affirmative action?

The Deputy Chairman: Order. There are time limitations. The hon. member will have his opportunity when we return to him.

Mr. Manly: I certainly hope that the federal government will use its leverage to insist that there be an affirmative action program and to protect native participation in this project, instead of sacrificing it to other interests. I think it is important that the federal government start living up to its responsibility for native people and not always be backing down to provinces like Alberta on something like this.

• (1700)

The minister referred to the fact that his is not the only department involved in funding. I should like to refer to a paper issued by Irvin Goodleaf, executive director of the National Indian Brotherhood, entitled "Native Employment Strategy for the '80s". In part he states as follows:

> I refer, lastly, to Canadian Employment and Immigration Commission programs which all too often place bands and enterprises in a "Catch-22" situation by their restrictive criteria. We are told, for example, that we cannot use LEAP funds to establish businesses in competition with existing non-Indian businesses. We are told that LEAP funds cannot be used to finance 'the normal activities of any ongoing enterprise.'
> Mr. Axworthy, on June 2, 1980, announced a whole range of employment programs, each one geared to specific purposes. Picture the situation of a small band with limited staff resources, far from any Canada Manpower centre, trying to determine the most appropriate funding source for its specific projects.
> A more appropriate approach would be to establish a single community development fund for Indian communities with a straightforward set of criteria stating how the money can be spent.

At a meeting of the National Indian Brotherhood executive council on October 20 it was noted that many federal departments and agencies had included Indian population statistics in the distribution of federal funds to provinces, municipalities and other agencies. It was also noted that Indian moneys on a federal level have been distributed to other federal departments, resulting in the diffusion of services and under the guise of a native component, both of which give little value for the funds appropriated for Indian governments. It was recommended that a joint approach be made to Treasury Board, other federal departments, Indian governments, and the minister so that a one agency concept could be developed and implemented which will identify all Indian moneys and have them distributed to the various Indian governments by the minister.

Whenever we ask either the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development or the Minister of Employment and Immigration about this, they point out that this is not the only program, that there are other programs. This is confusing enough for members of Parliament, so I am sure that for the native people who are trying to get funding for necessary programs, it is very confusing indeed. I wonder if the minister would give us reaction to the one source concept of funding.

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, there is already a system in place within cabinet for that kind of co-ordination with the social committee, where major priority is given to the development of new native programs. The responsible ministers in each of the departments that have an impact on native programs are represented. It is through that committee that a fair amount of discussion is presently taking place, part of which is related to the issue of how to develop better delivery of federal services and federal resources to native people.

Part of the problem is the split jurisdiction between the federal and provincial governments. Our responsibility is clearly with status Indians, while the non-status and Metis come under the jurisdiction of the provinces, even though we help them through our internal programs. The hon. member can see where there might be a certain static in the system if we simply co-ordinate our programs for status Indians, because we would then have to pull the rug from under a lot of the non-status groups that we presently help through LEAP programs and Outreach programs.

With regard to the criticisms raised in the paper that the hon. member quoted from, I do not think they are fair in some respects. The question was asked how small Indian bands are expected to respond. As I pointed out earlier, close to $3.7 million is allocated under Outreach programs which, in many cases, provide workers to many of the small bands and councils and communities in the north and in western Canada to make them aware of native programs.

In northern Manitoba there are something like 20 or 30 Outreach workers who live within the reserves or the communities. They provide ongoing information, contact and liaison between the native organizations and the department about the programs that are available. I met with many of them a month and one half ago in order to find out how well this is working. In some cases they are the only workers represented in those areas and they do get deflected into providing health and social services and other kinds of programs. Through the Outreach program, however, we have attempted to provide the direct contact and information and advocacy which is necessary in order to provide the native communities with the opportunity to take advantage of the programs that are available. That is what we use the Outreach program for, with varying degrees of success. As I have pointed out, we are evaluating how effective this approach has been, and the Outreach program itself is being re-evaluated.

Mr. Manly: Mr. Chairman, I think the fact remains that the bands that have expertise in applying for different funds get much more in return from those funds than those bands that simply rely upon the Outreach program.

I should like to mention the labour component for housing which is a very significant need in most Indian communities. As the minister knows, this used to be provided by LEAP, and some $8 million has been allocated for housing from LEAP in the current year. In future, the labour component must be funded through the Canada Community Development Project Fund. A total of $7 million is available for all native projects across Canada. If all housing moneys were taken out of this $7 million CCDP, how much would be left for other community development projects in native communities?

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, in the one minute left, I have to say that under the Canada Community Development Project, while we put an additional $7 million over and above the normal allocation, obviously in those constituency areas where there is a large native population, the full allocation can also be registered, and it is equated according to the unemployment figures as labour surplus figures in those areas. We have attempted to make adjustments in those cases so that the allocation does not all necessarily go for housing. It really depends upon the advice we get from the advisory boards in each of those constituencies.

[Translation]

Mr. Gimaïel: Mr. Chairman, it is always most interesting to deal with manpower and immigration in this country, and especially with manpower. As we are now looking into the department's estimates, I can truly say that in ridings such as Lac-Saint-Jean which I represent, the Department of Employment and Immigration is probably most representative in various ways of the Canadian government. First of all, the department's presence has been excellent for a number of years; there are several of its officials operating within my riding; most of my constituents have been in contact with one or more of these officials. Moreover, the department's policies are in line with the country's policies, which means that in whatever region they may live in Canada, all Canadians have equal opportunities to develop and acquire a higher social status, thus safeguarding their self respect.

At noon today, I was interested to hear the hon. member for Oshawa and Leader of the New Democratic Party ask the Prime Minister what his government meant to offer small wage earners to help them pay for food costs which have risen and will certainly continue to rise. Mr. Trudeau replied that Canadians may have to change slightly their purchasing habits and spend more money on food. My own reaction would have been to say: just consider the past ten years, and you will realize what this government has done precisely to help the have-nots in this country. The best example of its effort is the fine job which the Department of Employment and Immigration has done.

And then there are what are called job-creation programs. Whatever one may say or think, it is a tremendous and unique experience. For once a government, in the early seventies, when unemployment was not as high as it is today, feeling that the future might be less promising because the economic and international situation was getting increasingly difficult and hard for different groups of people, decided to earmark millions of dollars and make them available to the Canadian people. That is what we may call a vote of confidence not only in the present but also in the future.

The sad thing is that most unemployment problems we face in this country are felt especially by the young people. Half the jobless in this country are young. Why? For all kinds of reasons. The jobs are unionized and thus protected. There is also the fact that a large number of young people are entering the labour market, and a large number of women are leaving home and returning to work as they were entitled to do. The fact is that young people have to face the problem of our economic structure. And what does it mean when a government says, "We are giving you millions. Please develop your ideas and implement them." That represents an extraordinary poll. It means an extraordinary political structural basis. It also means that people who do not have much money can state their ideas and contribute to the development of their country.

A more important consideration, however, is that in Canada it is impossible for everyone to be wrong at the same time. I know some countries and even some provinces where policies come from higher authorities, where everything is directed where you can get money when you endorse government decisions. This is quite fine until the day when the higher authority is wrong and then everyone is wrong.

In projects such as Canada Works or in the local employment assistance projects it is possible, of course, that certain things are done that are not so good. This can happen. Yet most of the things done are good and I would even go so far as saying that most ideas become essential directions for the government. It is in that respect that I find this program to be so important.

Just think that barely one year ago only—indeed we are soon going to celebrate the defeat of the former Progressive Conservative government—let us just think that hardly a year ago there were people calling themselves Canadians, who say that they are in favour of developing this country, who preach separatism, for instance, both in the west and in the east, be it in Montreal or Calgary, who enjoy saying once in a while that they would like to see this country break apart, these people came to tell us that they were suppressing these labour force programs, especially the programs designed to create employment.

Instead, you will be given tax credits for hiring. That is all very well, but when you come to a province like Alberta the situation is much better than in Quebec. There has been a lot of hiring going on in Alberta in the last little while. And there is going to be much more in the next few years because that is where the billions are. Everyone is aware of that, everyone knows this. But did that government think for one minute of the negative social impact of such a decision?

I refuse to discuss the matter any longer, Mr. Chairman, but I still want to stress to my hon. colleagues the fact beyond the political will of governments, beyond the wishes of the heads of states, one thing remains that is extremely important in this world of ours: the sun shines for everyone and, given that context, everyone under the sun has a right to human dignity. And in our society, regrettably so I must say, human dignity depends to some extent on money.

If a man does not get the bare minimum of income to at least go shopping holding his head high, serious social problems arise. In that context I should now like to ask the minister—but first I must congratulate him on those projects, on those local employment programs. I shall never forget the Canada Works program. I should like to ask the minister if we can now hope to have them again next year, while thanking him for having reintroduced them this year.

• (1710)

[English]

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, in answer to the hon. member, we have pointed out several times in this House the philosophy that we are trying to apply in this department. We try to focus on the areas in the country, and on those groups and those industries which need help the most. To do that we need to have some degree of control and some ability to focus on those areas and to move away from programs which are simply glossed over which may affect some of the unemployed and others who are not. For that reason, we have tended to move more into the direct employment programs where we can have a greater sense of design, planning, and application, where the problems are most severe. To that extent I can assure the hon. member that that will be our intention. However, we will have to wait to see what kind of proposals come from the parliamentary task force and others who, I hope, will give us useful advice on how we might improve upon those programs.

[Translation]

Mr. Gimaïel: Thank you, Mr. Minister. Concerning the recommendations which will be made by the task force on the opportunities for the eighties, I hope that, in that context, my colleagues who will be members of that group will also consider the great impact of such projects in areas which, like mine, maintained social peace in our country for the last ten years. Those projects are very important and I hope nobody will try to diminish their merits by saying, as I often heard in some provincial legislatures, that they only amounted to a patching policy. I smiled a lot since then because those same people developed programs such as OSE and everything you want, all kinds of programs which are only reproductions of those which were established ten years ago. And I hope that we shall go on moving at top speed as we have been doing up to date in that area.

If I may put aside your department for a while, I would like to deal with what I think is a fairly interesting issue concerning employment across Canada. In the last ten years, the Canadian government, through a department which does not come under your authority but which is doubly related to yours, by the fact that Mr. Love, your present deputy minister was for many years deputy minister at DREE, and the fact that it too deals with economic issues, and you will know by now, of course, that I am talking about the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, the government, therefore, through this department, has acquired tremendous control over the economy, not only of the provinces or the major economic regions of this country, but over all its subregions. At present, no provincial department of trade and commerce can provide us, in a reasonable amount of time, with as much information as DREE can on any subregion in any province of Canada. I find that most interesting and I also think that it is the key to the future policies of your department and of other economically oriented departments.

Also it is obvious that by knowing the needs, the causes and the problems in each one of our regions, the government can provide leadership to provincial and municipal governments through the programs it develops to solve our economic problems. What concerns me most is that there are still inadequacies in certain services. I am thinking, for example, of the Post Office, which has yet to open post offices in some areas. But what I mean especially is that additional facilities could be provided across the country. In some areas, because policies were not fully implemented or for some other reason such as change in government, services provided by certain departments are not as good as elsewhere.

My question therefore is this: does your department foresee the possibility of using funds already available in other programs or funds that it may be granted, to call upon local manpower to build federal government facilities, such as post offices, in certain areas?

I expect you will tell me that comes under the Department of Public Works but I can reply that that department, when it is forced to pay for labour and material, is burdened with very heavy economic duties. Since your department is already paying much for labour in the country all year long I wonder if it is conceivable that part of the manpower you pay for either through Canada Works or various other programs could be used for purposes such as those?

[English]

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, I think the hon. member poses a very important policy question as to how we can begin to combine the efforts of the employment creation which we are able to support and some of the other priorities of departments, such as fisheries, regional economic expansion, and public works. In the development of the community development employment program this year, we set forward the principle that we would work with other departments which had specific capital works programs in mind, that we would provide the employment component and they provide the capital component. It worked very successfully in the maritimes where the departments of fisheries and the environment put up a certain amount of capital to do fishing wharf enhancement and the development of new fishing services. We provided the employment composite.

● (1720)

We have been fairly enthusiastic about the way that worked out. We hope to develop it further in our additional employment programs, as they develop. It is a way of getting double value for the amount of money that is spent. We can enhance our own priorities so that we will be increasingly moving our employment programs toward the establishment of key national priorities, so that two or three departments can combine and use their resources in a combined fashion.

[Translation]

Mr. Gimaïel: I thank the minister for a quite satisfactory answer. It is true that you contributed to many of the Department of Fisheries and Oceans programs, my own riding being one of those which received grants, and it is true that there is a very important double goal that is often achieved. I should wish the experience to be repeated with other departments.

In a somewhat different area that still concerns DREE, I was telling you earlier about the expertise of DREE in ascertaining the needs of areas, but that department is still acutely aware of the strengths and weaknesses of the various areas of the country. There is nonetheless something that worries me a little about what is going on in your department. I have already written you about it. I would like to make further comments on it this afternoon after having thought out the matter. The small matter that worries me relates to the Canada Manpower Mobility Program, the CMMP as it is called in the various sectors of your department. That program was, and I repeat was most useful for the people in my area. It could allow people to move over short distances within provinces with a reasonable amount, by that I mean they were receiving enough of a grant, based on real costs, to go and look for a job 100 or 120 kilometres away, or a greater distance if needed. This program was changed, and that change was quite negative because, taking as an example the province of Quebec, the largest in Canada, the program is now available within reasonable standards, that is, for amounts of $100 and more, to people undertaking rather extensive trips.

Assuming someone goes from Quebec to Alberta, because he or she found work through the manpower centre, your department will give a sizeable grant to help. But should the same individual go from my constituency, Lac-Saint-Jean, to work in Quebec City, he would not reach the minimal $100 level, and this is a misery because $100 is not enough in my view to cover the move; he would not reach that minimum level and would be flatly refused. As I said, Quebec being the largest province, the same policy applies to provinces like New Brunswick and Nova Scotia and almost completely eliminates any help from your department for interprovincial manpower move. This is an extremely drastic change. Instead of a plan that took people from areas within greater regions to bring them to strong points, taking them for instance from Lac-Saint-Jean to work in Quebec City or Montreal, your program now takes people from a province, from a large region with a weak economy and moves them to another province with a very strong economy.

I consider that a setback because I will say very frankly that I strongly believe in moving workers within regions and even within provinces. Why? Because they have the opportunity to undergo training and sometimes even to come back home with some experience after a while. That also enables a great many young people who are obviously without any qualifications when there is a job opportunity to leave these areas and find work where there are more opportunities. But I believe that asking them to move to a completely new environment is to court serious social problems.

I would look unfavourably at a policy of the Government of Canada promoting the displacement of people from the maritimes to Alberta which would bring about a massive exodus greater than usual from the maritimes or from Quebec toward Alberta or the richer provinces. I would be concerned by such a movement because we must realize that it is not so easy to settle in these rich provinces for it is well known that housing is expensive, development is extremely rapid and local municipalities can hardly keep up with it to provide the necessary infrastructures, and if you add to all these problems the fact that governments of some provinces, like Alberta, are more interested today in increasing the liquidity they get from the sale of oil even to their own residents than in trying to help their own citizens or their own municipalities develop fast enough, I am afraid that such a program would make matters worse. And I ask you, Mr. Chairman, if it would not be possible not to do away with the structure of the manpower mobility programs as it now exists and with the help it provides for long distance travel but to revert partly to the previous policy which was specifically intended to help movements within the same subregions of Canada.

[English]

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. The time allotted for the question and answer has expired.

Miss MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, I want to carry on with my questioning with regard to the affirmative action programs the minister mentioned. He seems to put a great deal of reliance on that approach to correct the inequities which exist within the federal public service respecting women. I would perhaps be more reassured if I thought that some of the programs initiated by his government earlier had had more commitment to them than we have seen over the years.

I want to ask two questions about the affirmative action program. First, what is committed to it in the way of resources, and from where are those resources being drawn? Second, will the minister undertake now to provide the House with a quarterly report as to the advances being made by the affirmative action program so that we will know from quarter to quarter just what is being accomplished? I say this because I know the minister has tremendous statistical and research resources at his disposal within the department. This is something he can do very easily to prove the affirmative action programs are working.

Mr. Axworthy: In the first two phases of the program, the hon. member will recognize the primary resource is the allocation of person-years. I believe it is about 25 person-years which have been allocated to this stage for the first two phases as the programs extend and the reallocation comes about. As for her second suggestion about the quarterly report, I personally will be pleased to consult with my colleagues, the President of the Treasury Board and the Secretary of State, who are part of the committee. Knowing of their generosity and openness, I am sure they will not object.

Miss MacDonald: I am not as sure as the minister. When he answers the first part of the question, I would like him to tell me where the resources are being drawn from so that I will know some other program is not being cut back as a result.

There is a second matter I wish to draw to the minister's attention with regard to the under-representation of women. I draw some of my facts and statistics from a report prepared for the Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women. I am talking about boards, commissions, councils, committees, Crown corporations, all of that grouping of corporations and commissions whose members are appointed by the federal government.

I am sure the minister realizes that to those commissions and boards, those order in council appointments, there are two kinds of appointments. There are full-time appointments and part-time appointments. First of all, I want to mention the full-time appointments. There are some 292 full-time appointments to boards, commissions, councils and so on that are made by the federal government. Of these 292 appointments, 247 of them are men and 45 are women. The majority of those 45 women are appointed to two commissions only, that is to the citizenship commission and to the Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women. If we take out the number of women on those two boards from the 45 women appointed, it would leave only 21 women appointed to the other 84 agencies or committees. Of those 21 women appointed, only about 9.4 per cent of them hold executive positions. In other words, they are not providing major input at the decision-making level.

Of the 13 women who hold full-time executive positions, only five are at the very top. Of these five women, only two are classified at the deputy minister level—in fact, I think it has dropped to one now. So that we have only five women holding executive positions at the same time as 125 men holding senior executive positions. That shows, in brief summary, that women are not only under-represented in full-time appointments, but they are in positions where they can wield very little power and are denied comparable status in pay. Those are the full-time appointments to boards.

As for part-time appointments, there are some 956 appointments in the federal government. Of those, 812 are male and 144 are female. Of the 144 females appointed part-time, only two hold executive positions. Again, we see how poorly women are represented in these appointments and, secondly, how they get very minimal or low-status appointments. There are no women at the very top. There are no women who hold the position of chairperson, of president or of chief commissioner.

I should like to bring to the attention of the minister the kinds of boards and commissions I am talking about, such as Air Canada, the Bank of Canada, the Canada Labour Relations Board, the CBC, Canadian National, the Canadian Transport Commission, the National Energy Board and Petro-Canada. In all of these, decisions are being taken which affect our communications, our transportation systems, our finances, our energy supplies and our economic strategies. These are decisions that are being made without adequate representation from one half of the population of this country.

Three of the eight agencies I mentioned have only one woman sitting on their boards. They are Air Canada, the Canadian Labour Relations Board and the National Energy Board. The other five I mentioned have no women on their boards at the present time. They are, the Bank of Canada, the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, Canadian National, the Canadian Transport Commission and Petro-Canada. There are no women on the boards of these very important agencies which are directing much of the decision-making of this country.

What I should like to ask the minister is this. Since this is another whole area where the federal government has the opportunity to move and where he as minister responsible for the status of women has a great opportunity to provide input, how many of these Crown corporations or federally-tied companies are committed now to affirmative action programs?

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, I thought the hon. member was going on to another line of questioning, but I see she came back to the actual affirmative action issue. I can tell the members of the House—I do not know if it is public yet but I am sure they would not mind my saying—that we have already signed an agreement with Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation to establish an affirmative action program. The president of that corporation and the minister responsible have been very co-operative in coming together. Since we have undertaken the activity with the public service, they have now agreed to this in that major Crown corporation as a first step. I have also written letters to several of my colleagues who have a number of Crown corporations under their jurisdiction indicating to them an interest to negotiate with them.

As the hon. member may know, within our own Department of Employment and Immigration we have a separate section working with the private sector to develop affirmative action programs with private companies and with Crown corporations. These are being negotiated right now. For example, they are negotiating one with the government in my own city of Winnipeg, on the same premise.

In the area of Crown corporations we are attempting to make some progress and are negotiating to get these agreements signed, although it does take some time to explain to them what the opportunities might be, how the affirmative action programs in fact work and how to get decisions by their board of directors or by their other chief executives. This is something we are pursuing.

Miss MacDonald: May I suggest to the minister, who has been making such a great thing about a search for a Canadian in a certain other occupation, that he take that approach with the president of Petro-Canada, with the chairman of the National Energy Board, the president of the CBC, the president of Canadian National Railways and with a good many Crown corporations. I can assure him they would not have to search nearly as hard to find a number of women who have the ability and the clout to provide the input necessary on these boards. The minister responsible for the status of women should give these commissions very direct guidelines to go out and search immediately for women to become members of the boards of these Crown companies and government agencies.

Just one final question on a different matter, a matter that I know is of great concern to many people across this country. I want to know if the minister is approaching his provincial counterparts to discuss the updgrading of work standards for domestic workers in this country, especially those who have recently immigrated to Canada and where the work situations in which they find themselves are anything but adequate.

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, in respect to the last question, I have written to the provincial ministers of labour outlining the position of our government. We feel that the labour codes should be brought up to standard and applied to domestic workers who come from offshore. The position of this government is that we would not agree to issue work permits until we gain some assurance that the working conditions for someone coming to work as a domestic would be comparable to those offered to a Canadian. That is not always possible to administer because so much of the labour activity is beyond our jurisdiction. I have written to the provincial ministers about that and we are in discussing holding some kind of conference this year, and we will certainly put that item on the agenda.

Mr. Foster: Mr. Chairman, the estimates of the Department of Employment and Immigration before us today certainly give us an opportunity to raise a wide range of questions concerning this department. The programs operated by this department are very important to the slow-growth areas of the country. I think especially of programs like Canada Works, LIP, the youth employment program, LEAP and a large number of other training-related programs which have a definite effect on the slow-growth areas of our country, especially those requiring direct job-creation programs.

In my constituency these programs have had a more visible impact on rural communities than perhaps any other federal government program. Their impact is visible in terms of improved housing for Indian bands, new halls and recreational facilities and docking and marina facilities in a large number of communities. There are programs for new firehalls, new community halls and facilities for senior citizens. There is also a large number of recreational programs. I think we have reached a certain limit, however, with respect to community facilities in that many municipalities have now used up all the funds available to them for material costs.

Many municipalities and the department generally are now interested in projects which will actually create new economic activity. In this respect I think of projects under LEAP. For instance, this winter we are building an addition to the nursing home at Wikwimekong which is one of the largest Indian bands in the Algoma-Manitoulin area. This nursing home is receiving LEAP funding and will ultimately provide accommodations for some 30 patients. LEAP is providing funding for labour costs. It will ultimately create some 14 jobs in that nursing home.

Likewise funds which are being spent under direct employment programs like Canada Works and the Winter Works programs will improve docking facilities for the tourist industry, which is very important throughout the Algoma-Manitoulin district and for which no other source of funding seems to have been available for the last year or so. The Canada Works program has been very beneficial there.

However, the problem we face with these programs is the drastic reduction in the amount of funding. For the past several years the funding level in the Algoma-Manitoulin area has run in the neighbourhood of $1.5 million. During this past year it has been something like $250,000. Applications from Indian bands, rural municipalities and other non-profit groups have continued at the higher level. A few weeks ago I asked the minister if additional funding would be provided for the community development program, and he indicated that in the budget there is some $350 million for industrial activity and adjustment. I hope he will be able to indicate to us today the amount of additional funding which will be provided under the community development program, because a number of projects which were not funded or had to be reduced in size for this coming winter could be funded if the minister allocated additional moneys to this program.

The second inquiry I have is whether future funding for this program will be set out in the main estimates. When the community development program and the Canada Works program was established, it was established on a five-year basis and the funds were put in the main estimates of the department. Job-creation officers working with municipalities or Indian bands were able to say, "We will do this project over a two or three-year period". The program was totally cancelled while the Conservative government was in power, and many projects were left half completed.

However, now that the program has now been reinstated, I hope the minister will be able to indicate how many years this program will be in operation so that groups applying for funding can plan to phase their projects over a period of years. This is very important because funding for materials must be put up, and since groups often cannot afford to pay the full cost in one year, they phase their projects over a number of years. For instance, at least one municipality in my constituency—there might have been two or three others—was undertaking a marina project. It was phased over a period of two or three years as its shares of funding was available. I hope the minister will be able to indicate the duration of this program.

I want to raise a number of questions about the Local Economic Development Assistance program. Applications have been sought from a number of municipalities across the country to set up LEDA corporations in an effort to generate more economic activity, especially among the private sector, to provide some assistance to local development corporations, to seek out and find worth-while industries in slow-growth areas and to provide some capital funding or loan funding. A number of municipalities are waiting to find out whether they will receive interim funding for the design of projects, and I would be interested in knowing if the minister could tell us when decisions about LEDA corporations will be made known, at least in the Ontario region.

Early this fall the minister indicated to me that he was assessing the possibility of establishing a Canada Employment Centre in Blind River, Ontario for the north shore area. I think this would be a wise move. There is a certain amount of economic activity there, but the services of Canada Manpower would be very valuable to that community and to the north shore region. I hope the minister will give an indication today whether a decision has been made and when the Manpower centre will be provided for that community and that whole sweep of communities along the north shore of Lake Huron.

The hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce, who is involved with the special committee on manpower and critical manpower needs, spoke in the House this afternoon. I think his committee has a very important responsibility to this House because in a large number of instances in communities in northern Ontario there is a shortage of trained, skilled workmen, especially tradesmen, diesel mechanics and tool and die makers. There are all critical manpower shortages, yet we have high unemployment in the country.

I hope that committee will be making recommendations, because surely during the 1980s, as major construction projects go forward—I refer to Elliot Lake, Sault Ste. Marie, Espanola and a number of other pulp and paper communities throughout northern Ontario—there will be shortages in certain trades such as pipe fitting, steam fitting and others like that. I certainly hope we can find a solution to this problem of high unemployment while at the same time a number of tradesmen are in short supply. A few years ago mining companies in northern Ontario were applying for these skilled tradesmen in the United Kingdom. A few months later there were massive lay-offs at the Inco mine at Sudbury. So obviously we need a better training program and a better forecasting mechanism in the department.

Recently I read that the Department of Employment and Immigration, in co-operation with the provincial governments, was planning to purchase a new school in Toronto for training people, which would reduce the apprenticeship and training period on the job from four years to three years. It seems to me that this would be a good move, and I wonder if the minister is planning to do that in other communities across the country, thus increasing the tradesmen who are available while at the same time giving more Canadians a chance to work in trades where there is a shortage of supply.

The minister noted on Friday in his speech that about 170,000 jobs were created this year. He also indicated that the number of people coming into the labour force would be reduced during the next few years. I wonder if the minister could provide us with the figure for the actual number of people which the department anticipates will come into the labour force between 1981 and 1985. It seems to me that it would be useful for the House to know whether the actual number of people coming into the labour force, as projected by the department, is dropping. This has been indicated many times, but we are not sure of the exact projections of the department. Surely it would be useful, in planning the work of the committee and of the department, if the number of people coming into the labour force were reduced during this period. Ultimately this would reduce the number of unemployed.

Mr. Chairman, I want to leave sufficient time for the minister to respond to the several questions I have put to him, so I will take my seat now.

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, I should like to thank the hon. member for a series of interesting and important questions. I will try to answer them as best I can in the time he has left me.

On the first question concerning the funding for the community development projects, as I pointed out, we have to work within the estimate limits which were set by the previous government. We are now reconsidering the employment programs we have. As I pointed out in my previous answer, we are at present looking at these matters in cabinet. There is the obvious difficulty that there are thousands of demands on very scarce resources and we are trying to allocate them to the most important needs. Certainly it is my intention to request some additional funds in the employment area. When we are able to make some decisions on the budget allocations put forward by the Minister of Finance, the hon. member will find proper attention paid to the employment requirements in this country, particularly in areas of high unemployment.

On the issue of the Blind River office, I apologize to the hon. member but a decision has not yet been made. We are assessing the requirements of either setting up a branch office or of increasing the frequency of our visits to the area. I hope we will be able to have a decision for the hon. member by mid-January, so he can assure his constituents that they will have some form of improved service by that period.

On the question of the trade schools, I have been intrigued by that particular development. We have received a high degree of co-operation from the government of Ontario in developing new approaches to training programs. We will be starting major negotiations with all provincial governments within the next six to nine months on the extension of the occupational training act. This is the fundamental formula we use for applying training moneys to provincial institutions. It is our hope at that time, when we have possession of some of the findings and ideas that have been developed by the Allmand task force and the task force working in our own department, to be able to use those ideas as a way of developing new approaches which we will be in a position to discuss with provincial officials.

I would say by way of comment that the new approach which that trade school initiative represents is one that I personally find very attractive because it responds to the real problem of making sure that those who are going into training programs are not limited to either institutional or industrial training but have a combination of both. We have been looking at the polytechnic model which is used in Europe as one of the ways in which we can focus on particular sector needs, whether it be in construction, aerospace, or whatever, to set up different kinds of training centres which would specialize in those areas across Canada. We will be looking at that experiment very closely, analysing it and discussing it with provincial officials.

In the area of the LEDA proposals, as the hon. member will recognize, we put that forward as an experimental program in longer-term community economic development, and we will be administering this jointly with the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. As I indicated at the time, our resources would allow for perhaps 15 projects across Canada. At this time we have received upwards of 40 applications, and many keep coming in, which shows the attractiveness of that approach. So we will be in the very tough position of having to decide which projects may best illustrate different facets of different ideals, different methods of local economic development, and we will be choosing according to that criterion. So some choice will begin to be made within the next month when an announcement will be made. My own regret is that we will not be able to fund all the projects, but will be choosing them according to those which give the best over-all picture of different opportunities and different alternatives which we can try.

With regard to the labour force growth, this is work that is being done by the different task forces which are working at present. By way of illustration, early forecasts have shown that while the labour force growth in the period of 1976 to 1979—the period which we have just completed—has been about 3 per cent, it is our expectation that in the period 1980 to 1985 it will be in the range of about 2 per cent, which, when measured against the labour force in Canada, which is in the neighbourhood of about 11.6 million workers, will show an approximate growth of 900,000.

We have to be very careful in using that figure in the sense that one other phenomenon or trend has been quite obvious, and that is the increasing participation rate of the labour force. One thing we have been noticing is that the participation of women has gone up radically, by almost 5 per cent or 6 per cent in the last four or five years. The participation rate of young people has also gone up quite remarkably so that there is a higher ratio of people working than at any other time in the country as compared to over-all population. So while there may be a decline in the population numbers, if the ratio of participation rates goes up, it will tend to shorten the gap between labour demand and labour growth.

At the same time I think we will still be facing the possibility of running labour short in key areas of the population which have been traditionally restricted to male workers, because that may be the area where the shortage may show up most profoundly. That is why it is important for us to develop ways of making a transition in providing opportunities for women to move into non-traditional work, and that is one of the reasons why we have introduced several new programs to that effect.

Mr. Foster: There is one short question to which I would like the minister to respond. It concerns some indication that the direct employment programs, such as the community development program, will be in operation, or a clear signal given that this program will operate for two or three years. This would allow municipalities to do a phased project. After all, they have to put up the material costs. I wonder if the minister is planning to have the funding for such direct employment programs in the main estimates next year, because in the past year they have been in the supplementary estimates and there has been no clear indication of the length of time during which the program will run. I think it is important both for municipal officials and employees in the minister's own department to have a clear signal that the program will last for one, two or three years. I hope that that will be the way in which the program will be operated.

Mr. Axworthy: May I say in half a minute that that is a very worthy proposal. We are examining it in the context of the over-all evaluation we are conducting of labour market requirements which the task force and others are examining. Of course, the only limitation is that estimates can only signify money for one year, and we must keep going back for new funding. But certainly from my experience the community services program, in which we provided for the extension of the program over a three-year period, seems to be working very well. We will be using it as a model to examine, as part of the larger direct employment programs.

Mr. Hawkes: Could I ask the minister how many people live in Alberta?

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, I do not have the exact figures. I believe it is somewhere over the two million mark and growing very rapidly, by about 8 per cent per year.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Chairman, it is a little over 2,100,000. How many people live in western Canada?

Mr. Collenette: What is this?

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, if the member persists in elementary geography and demography lessons, I am sure we can get him an atlas which would supply him with information. But I would hope we could go on to more serious topics.

Mr. Hawkes: It is a little over six million. About 8 per cent of the people of the country live in the province of Alberta; a little over 25 per cent live in western Canada. In the registered apprenticeship trades in Canada, what proportion of those registered in apprenticeship trades programs are registered in the province of Alberta?

Mr. Axworthy: I will get those figures for the hon. member. We will look them up.

Mr. Hawkes: Are those figures available from the minister's officials? I am willing to wait a moment.

Mr. Axworthy: Yes.

Mr. Hawkes: Could I have the figures for western Canada as well? The answers to those questions are important to the line of questioning I wish to pursue.

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, if the hon. member will bear with me, I will provide the following figures. Under the present institutional training programs, in the province of Manitoba there are 9,640; in the province of Saskatchewan there are 8,947—

Mr. Hawkes: A point of order, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Axworthy: —in the province of Alberta there are 29,465; in the province of British Columbia there are 33,833. In industrial—

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for Calgary West is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Chairman, I just asked the minister for the registered apprenticeship trades programs. He is giving the programs of his department, but I am interested in the proportion of people in apprenticeable trades who are registered in the province of Alberta. I suggest to the minister that it is in excess of 25 per cent, with around 8 per cent of the population. Will the minister simply confirm that and give me the figures for western Canada?

Mr. Axworthy: I was endeavouring to give the figures for western Canada before the hon. member popped to his feet with one of his often gratuitous points of order. If I may continue giving the answer, under the industrial program, which pays for most of the apprenticeship programs or the critical trade skills, the following figures are available for the province of Alberta, 6,563; in the critical trade skills area, 200. Those are the programs we supply. If the hon. member wants further numbers, we will endeavour to find them for him.

Mr. Hawkes: I suggest to the minister that the province of Alberta specifically and western Canada generally have the best record in Canada today of people in trades training programs. I think the facts are such that well over one-quarter of the people registered in apprenticeable trades in Canada today are registered in the province of Alberta. I raised that issue in that form because, as reported on page 5418 of Hansard, the minister made the following statement:

I want to report, however, that there is not quite the same keenness and enthusiasm expressed by provincial officials, particularly in our western provinces where they tend to want to go it alone and, as a result, are substantially impeding the development of new training programs in these areas.

Where is the minister's justification for claiming that western provinces are impeding the progress of training?

Mr. Axworthy: As we have tried to point out in the House several times, the labour market in Canada is not divided along provincial or even regional lines. We must draw our skills, our people and our resources from right across the country and from outside Canada. In our forecast it is estimated that the skill shortage in the western provinces will be in the neighbourhood of almost 30,000 per year over the next four years. Those are people who are not available in those provinces or are not being trained at the present time. They will come from other provinces and other countries.

Under those circumstances it is very important to ensure when they arrive that they have proper training and that the training is allocated in accordance with demands in terms of the different industrial sectors, whether it is mining, oil and gas, or pipeline construction. Therefore, it is very important to have the ability to employ a national training scheme and to have those kinds of discussions so that, within the jurisdiction of the federal government, where we must be responsible for the movement and mobility of people across Canada, we have the ability to make decisions and choices to ensure a large movement of people to satisfy the shortages in these areas.

At the present time we spend in the province of Alberta, which "likes to go it alone", as they say, well over $65 million of federal money on our programs to ensure training in those areas. Furthermore, it is very important when training is provided that it is not provided for only one group or category of the population. We as a federal government have tried to be an equal opportunity employer and trainer to ensure proper access for native groups, women and minority groups.

As I pointed out in a previous answer, there are certain provinces which are opposed to that approach and say so in their legislation. If we are to make effective and efficient use of people in the country, then we must ensure equal opportunities. Again that is why we feel there must be a national approach.

If the member would look at the context in which that statement was made, it was within the context that Canadians must supply the labour market needs of western Canada. Canadians would be moving into those areas, not just regional or provincial people. That is the difference in approach between this side of the House and that side of the House.

Mr. Hawkes: Again I direct the minister to his statement, as reported on page 5418 of Hansard for last Friday. He deliberately said that it is the western provinces which are impeding progress in training. I suggest that is a false statement; nothing which he has said in the last two minutes substantiates it.

Let me move to disadvantaged people. Has the minister made a comparison of the success of provincial manpower departments versus Canada Manpower centres in terms of their ability to place disadvantaged people in this country, those who are disadvantaged because of age or physical handicaps, women and native people? Which agencies of government, provincial agencies or federal government ones, have the best record in the country today?

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, I point out to the hon. member who seems to be here to defend the provincial governments, a role to which he is welcome, that in the very famous apprenticeship program in the province of Alberta, of which he is so proud, less than 1 per cent of the enrollees are women.

Mr. Hawkes: I suggest to the minister that that situation is true across the country, as we have discovered, and in fact in some places it is even less. If he looked at Government of Canada apprenticeable trades in some government departments, I do not think he would find anything about which to be proud.

There is a great deal of fear growing in Canada. The tone of the minister's speeches seems to imply that he intends to interfere with provincial jurisdiction in the area of education. I would like to ask him if he can clarify for us whether or not it is his intention, over time, to take unto the federal parliament responsibility for many educational endeavours which are in the laps of the provinces under the present constitution.

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, we know how easily the hon. member opposite gets frightened. I do not think most Canadians share his well-developed sense of apprehension. I have never indicated I intend to take over the jurisdiction of education, nor does this government intend to do that. In many cases we have been quite concerned that the provincial governments have not lived up to some of their responsibilities. If the hon. member recalls, we had a discussion in this House on Friday concerning that very problem. In many cases we were being asked to provide opportunities to ensure there were basic skills. This was an area which properly fell within provincial jurisdiction but it was not being satisfied.

I would also like to point out to the hon. member that the area of training is one which is shared by levels of government and with industry itself. Many of the problems we face in getting people into areas where skill shortages exist begin in the primary and secondary schools where there is lack of counselling. We have worked in a very co-operative fashion with a number of provincial governments to overcome that problem. In my own province of Manitoba we have worked with the provincial government to establish resource centres and choice programs so that young people can receive the kind of counselling and career choices which they so desperately need.

We have absolutely no interest in developing major confrontations with the provinces, as long as they are prepared to co-operate with us. Co-operation is a two-way street. It must work in a joint fashion. But there are problems which arise because someone says, "We will take your money but we will not take any accountability for it; you just give us the money and we will spend it." As a result they do not agree with some of the basic principles that we have as a federal government. We are not prepared to accept that.

By the way, I would like to point out for the enlightenment of the hon. member, since I know how interested he is in getting proper information, that when he said the position of the apprenticeable trades in Alberta is no different from anywhere else, he was wrong. In the area of apprenticeship the present figure for women in Alberta is .9 per cent compared with 4.7 per cent in Ontario, 6.9 per cent in Newfoundland and 5.7 per cent in British Columbia. That is a substantial difference, I suggest, in terms of percentages—none of which is good enough. That is one reason why we have been quite insistent—

Miss MacDonald: I thought you were bragging.

Mr. Axworthy: The hon. member opposite tends to be skeptical. I would ask her to tell us what her party did when it was in government to promote the working of women in non-traditional fields. What programs did they introduce? Not one, Mr. Chairman.

Miss MacDonald: A great deal more than you.

Mr. Axworthy: No programs at all. No affirmative action, no training programs. Not one single program was introduced by the previous government to deal with the broadening opportunities for women.

Miss MacDonald: We replaced all of your Outreach programs which you cut out.

Mr. Axworthy: I am prepared to accept the responsibility of this government but I think the hon. member opposite should look first at her own dismal record, which is not exactly great.

Mr. Hawkes: I continue to be amazed by the minister. Apprenticeable trades vary from province to province, according to their definition. I think in the provinces the minister was talking about he was including trades such as hairdressing and cooking.

Mr. Axworthy: As they do in all of them.

Mr. Hawkes: I think he may find some differences exist across provincial borders. I only have five minutes left but could the minister indicate to the House what he considers to be the primary barriers to mobility which exist in Canada today? What are the primary barriers to labour market mobility?

Mr. Axworthy: I am very pleased the hon. member has left me four minutes in which to address such a large topic. I will try my best to be brief.

I think there are a variety of barriers to mobility. Certainly one of the most important barriers at the present time is the difference in standards which are set. We have attempted to work with the provinces to establish a red seal program which would certify trades in each of the provinces on a standard basis. However, at the present time there is only a limited number of those trades which are so certified and there is a limited number of workers in those trades. It would be my ambition that we be able to work much more directly with the provinces substantially to extend the red seal program so that there could be common certification and a common standard set for the application of trades right across Canada. Again, that is something which we intend to discuss with the provincial ministers when we have an opportunity to meet them this spring. That is certainly one of the major barriers.

A second major barrier is basic human motivation and behaviour, in the sense of being tied to a community and developing the incentive to move. That is one reason we have attempted to enrich mobility grants up to a maximum of $4,500 to ensure that if there is an economic reason why someone is reluctant to move from where the jobs are declining to where they are expanding, that economic barrier could be reduced or eliminated. So the second major problem is overcoming some of the economic hurdles for people who decide to move.

The third area is the transfer of information so people will know where jobs are. Those people with certain trades but no work will be able to go to where work may be. We have introduced a national job bank, which is a computerized system that will be able to plug in the job vacancies right across Canada through computer terminals in major centres. Workers can then go and find out where work may be available in other parts of the country. Within the first two or three months there is already something in the range of 9,000 different placements on that job bank. The number will certainly grow beyond that. This gives us the ability to provide for an information transfer so people know that the job is there.

The fourth area, as we have pointed out, is major regulatory and legislative limitations imposed by both levels of government. We must work to eliminate those. At the provincial level there is the kind of Draconian legislation which we see in the province of Newfoundland where they totally exclude workers from other provinces, preventing them from moving in to work in the offshore fields. There is the construction legislation in the province of Quebec which also excludes workers from other provinces. There are regulations in the trade services and training areas which must be reworked in order to provide for common standards. We must provide that kind of mobility where legislative or regulatory barriers have been set up which people must try to get around.

Those are some examples of the kind of mobility barriers which we must work on. As I pointed out, they must be worked on in a variety of ways and in combination with levels of government and industry itself.

Mr. Hawkes: Could the minister explain to us what the difference is between the manpower regulations associated with the northern pipeline and the legislation passed by the Newfoundland government?

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, I believe that if the hon. member looks at the legislation he will find it does not provide for exclusive hiring for the north, with a preference. That is the very major difference between the two pieces of legislation.

Mr. Hawkes: We may explore that when we have more time later this evening. Out of the four major mobility problems the minister referred to, could he indicate which of those would be solved by the constitution legislation of 1980?

Mr. Axworthy: We would hope that we can provide some solution to all of them. The charter of rights would establish a basic standard, a foundation upon which all governments and individuals would know that they have certain rights. Where there are impediments to that, such as the Newfoundland legislation, they could be struck down. But as the hon. member should know, because he is a member of the constitution committee, one of the other advantages of the charter of rights, whether or not it is in a non-discriminatory area, is that it will require governments to go back and check their statutes, their laws and regulations, to make sure that they conform to those precepts of the charter of rights. Therefore, they will have to make a complete re-evaluation to ensure that there is not, within their different standards or codes, that kind of impediment to choosing where they will work or live.

Mr. Hawkes: On Friday afternoon I asked the minister to read the brief in the Canadian Council on Social Development to the constitution committee. Has the minister taken the opportunity to read that? Is he saying to us he totally disagrees with their perspective and that they, in fact, are dead wrong? How can he make the statement he just made in light of the information which is contained in that brief?

● (1820)

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, it is not my function to agree or disagree with the Canadian Council on Social Development; it is the function of the hon. member who sits on the committee. The committee was established to receive briefs and representations, to sift through them, distil them, decide which is right and which is wrong and then to advise the House. As a member of this House I am quite prepared to put my trust and faith in that committee and the soundness of its judgment.

[Translation]

Mrs. Hervieux-Payette: Mr. Chairman, first I would like to say how pleased I am to have this opportunity to state the point of view of a woman who has returned to the labour market. As a member, I suppose I am part of the labour market, but I should say to my constituents and probably to all Canadians that for 11 years I was a full-time mother and that at the end of those 11 years I had to resume my studies and complete my training while I was still acting as a mother.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to make a few general comments as a woman who is now on the labour market, who left a job in the private sector after having worked in the public sector. As for whether a bill of rights should be included in the constitutional motion, my colleague opposite was asking a while ago if Canadian women found it essential to have such a bill of rights. I should say that in my opinion and in the opinion of the majority of women whom I have consulted so far in Canada, it is essential to include a bill of rights in the Canadian Constitution.

Indeed, Mr. Chairman, one cannot claim that in 1980, after more than a hundred years, women have achieved equal status in the market place. There are many obstacles which Canadian women must overcome when they want to join or rejoin the labour force. Of course, one of these obstacles—which should not be one—is motherhood. The fact that they bring children into this world and thus contribute to Canada's future is not an asset but a liability for women who want to rejoin the labour force. Even their getting married is an obstacle, Mr. Chairman, and I am sorry to say in 1980, without a bill of human rights enshrined in the constitution, with a somewhat limited tradition of equal rights under federal and provincial legislation, following some ten, 15 or 20 years of experience of a federal or provincial charter of human rights, I find the status of women deplorable. Mr. Chairman, Canadian women have still a long way to go before they can get equal pay for equal work.

In spite of the organizations which have been established and the legislation which has been adopted, I suggest that all governments, past and present, have failed in their duty to provide jobs to all Canadians, especially to women, who want to work, something to which they should be entitled as a right. Mr. Chairman, there is also a part of our charter of rights which deals with manpower mobility. I suggest that these provisions will benefit women. There are agreements under the red seal concerning tradesmen. We are all well aware that there are very few women involved in the various trades who are able to move from province to province. Some professions have acquired national status, like engineering, technology, and others. We must confess, however, that in some occupations which seem reserved for women, there exist important obstacles preventing them from securing employment. And I suggest that it is the federal government's responsibility to eliminate these obstacles partly or entirely.

With regard to job access, Mr. Chairman, I think the job-creation program should make it easier for women to get back onto the labour market, especially for those who have raised children and now have to help pay the cost of their children's education or those who became head of the family. Those women, Mr. Chairman, who are now in their forties, who were unable to attend school for very long, now find themselves at a dead end in that they are left with taking very low-paying jobs or else living on unemployment or welfare benefits. And I must say, Mr. Chairman, that in this day and age it is unthinkable that in a country like Canada about 70 per cent of single parent women and their children are getting welfare payments. Indeed there surely must be something missing in their education for the women to be in such a large number in that category. Mr. Chairman, I suggest we should dispel the impression too often given by the business community or even by government circles that women are parasites in society and are eating away at government revenues through welfare payments. Mr. Chairman, I say women live on welfare not by choice but by obligation and because of discrimination in the labour market.

I believe employment and manpower programs for the '80s must be studied in light of the economic growth that we will witness. Yes, Canada is a country with a great potential. We have tremendous possibilities in the field of energy, we have natural resources in large numbers and we have manpower, people who can join the labour market, who in fact are already in the labour force and who represent tremendous human capital. In fact, Mr. Chairman, in the last ten years, Canada has been one of the countries whose employment rate of growth has been considerable, one of the highest among the members of the OECD. Between 1970 and 1974, the annual rate of growth was 3.5 per cent, and according to forecasts, it will be 2 per cent from 1980 to 1984, and 1.7 per cent from 1985 to 1989. Despite those forecasts, Mr. Chairman, it must be recognized that there will be a shortage of workers in the labour market. On the other hand, I should like to give some figures to show the evolution of women's role in the labour force. In 1955, they represented only 19.4 per cent of the work force; by 1980, at this point in time, they represent 45.9 per cent of it and by 1985, forecasts have it that women will represent 51 per cent, almost the same percentage they represent in terms of population.

Mr. Chairman, I feel it is important to study employment and immigration from two angles: how we will make up for shortages in the 1980s, and how and toward what work women should orient their efforts in the labour force. On the one hand, immigration can be one source of workers; on the other, I feel that women working in larger numbers can fill the other 50,000 jobs the present work force would be unable to fill.

Those sectors now under development, that is high technology, those in which skilled workers can find employment, where salaries are higher, where jobs are more secure, are those which at the present time are probably the least accessible to women. Speaking of the major developments in Canada, let us mention the James Bay project where women worked almost exclusively in the traditional fields, where they held clerical jobs and were the object of, let us say, Mr. Chairman, a certain amount of sectorialization not to say discrimination.

Indeed, well paid positions at James Bay were seldom open to women yet in future development, in the development of gas and oil resources, in the development of the tar sands, projects as important as Cold Lake in Alberta will generate from 8,000 to 10,000 jobs. What kind of positions are these projects going to create? First, they will be specialized jobs such as welding, machinery and in these specialized jobs, Mr. Chairman, there will be very few women, unfortunately. Women could perform welding tasks, but they do not get the necessary training to do that kind of work. We know there will be growth in these areas over the next ten years and it is in this area that female labour force training should take place.

In 1980 only 1 per cent of Canadian women were apprentices in the area of non-traditional jobs. In adult vocational training women made up 42 per cent of the enrolment yet only 862 women were directed towards non-traditional jobs compared to 35,000 men. Where is the deficiency, Mr. Chairman? I do not think there would be much difficulty for women to learn those trades of welders, drillers, programmers, key punch operators, all trades which provide stable employment and are jobs of the future. What programs does the minister propose to correct this situation? At present there is the on-the-job training program which, I think, could be greatly extended. It is a very progressive program, especially with respect to Quebec which has not yet taken full advantage of it. Quebec employers could indeed apply for the grant which pays up to 75 per cent of the salary, for up to 52 weeks, at a weekly rate of $185. In fact, 3,500 Canadian women, Mr. Chairman, could benefit from this program.

What efforts will be made to attract female workers in these areas which provide interesting jobs and are a good source of manpower for employers? I think that this area, Mr. Chairman, calls for joint action. The federal government must make its concerns known to the business community, unions, teaching institutions, women's organizations, so that all those concerned can join in the effort to publicize these on-the-job training programs. In order to ensure that women make a smooth entry into the labour force, there are other measures I think, Mr. Chairman, which must be taken and one of those which will be crucial to our economy in the years ahead is the development of private daycares in industry with the help of government, or of public daycares set up in schools which would provide ideal settings for this and which, in any case, are emptying year after year.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to speak of another measure which is essential to Canadian working women. I am referring specifically to the last brief by the Canadian Chamber of Commerce which stated that we must do away with the maternity leave benefits provided by unemployment insurance. I am astounded that the chamber of commerce made no mention of the possibility, by the same token, of eliminating sick leave for workers. I think that unemployment insurance benefits now paid are the least that can be done to encourage maternity leave and that they should at least remain at the same level and preferably be increased. That is why I ask and suggest to the minister that he should consider with his colleagues the possibility of extending maternity leave into unpaid maternity leave of at least 12 months renewable for a second year. This type of maternity leave policy, which provides for job security for the mother or the father, would certainly be in line with a harmonious population increase policy for Canada. It would be a question, Mr. Chairman, so as not to frighten the chambers of commerce or the employers, not so much of protecting the employee's job but rather the employee's employment. Furthermore, I think that this type of leave should apply in cases of adoption.

I think that among the steps the Minister of Employment and Immigration should take to encourage the return to work of mothers, flexible hours can promote the harmonization of working conditions for the spouses, particularly for those who have children and who should finally lead a harmonious family life. Furthermore, economically, I think that those flexible hours make it possible to relieve traffic, reduce absenteeism and offer several other advantages which were demonstrated by numerous studies.

Another area the Minister of Employment and Immigration should reflect upon more deeply is time sharing. At the present time I think that there are many barriers as far as time sharing is concerned. We should first enable employers not to completely absorb the problems of fringe benefits twice and to have fiscal policies which would make that formula possible and which would enable families who need an additional salary, to have the additional income the second spouse can bring to the family without jeopardizing the education of children.

Mr. Chairman, having been deprived of this myself and having had to devote several years of great effort and spend especially a considerable amount of money, I suggest the government and particularly the Minister of Employment and Immigration should introduce fiscal measures related to training at the technical, college and university levels. I think discussions should be held with the Minister of Finance with a view to allowing working spouses to write off tuition fees incurred for the training of the spouse who must go back to school to further his or her education; I believe such a program is a necessary supplement to an employment policy. Indeed, I point out to the Minister of Employment and Immigration that such training leaves are recommended by the International Labour Organization, and also that in some countries, such as France, people are granted training leave every seven years. For a young country like Canada I am not asking for educational leave every seven years, but we must at least be favourable to the idea of facilitating the return to work of women who were denied secondary, collegiate and university education.

I now come, Mr. Chairman, to the types of programs recognized in the charter of rights the government is proposing in the resolution on the constitution. They are the affirmative action programs. I think both the public and private sectors should now insist on the implementation of such programs. Up to now three departments have agreed to implement affirmative action programs. They are the Secretary of State, the Public Service Commission and the Employment and Immigration departments. It is a very good and worthy undertaking but I think the department should let us know when other departments will join in the program, when Crown corporations will have to carry on affirmative action programs. I would also like the minister to tell us when he is going to put pressure on his colleagues about the government's contracts with those who supply it with the goods and services it needs to the tune of $6 billion each year. Those companies would not be forced—because I think that word is pejorative—but would have the advantage of participating in a positive action program. In other words the fallouts from projects like the F-18 and the frigates and all other federal government projects would also benefit women and all jobs in the field of advanced technology like aeronautics would not be reserved exclusively to men.

Furthermore, the federal government sets funds aside for the creation of jobs every year. This year the government will spend $100 million to that end. I would like the minister to tell us how much of that sum will go toward the creation of jobs for women. On the other hand, Mr. Minister, I would say that one of the major difficulties experienced by women who want to go back to work or join the labour force is a certain lack of information within women groups or in private employment offices or in training centres.

I think the federal government should promote the hiring of women through good advertising programs, for instance, the program for on the job training in non-traditional trades. I think those programs are not readily accessible to women who are at home or who are looking for a job. Mr. Chairman, I would like to refer to my personal experience in that whole issue of on the job training and hiring which is very positive and in my own riding, which gives me a—

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but her time has now expired.

Mrs. Hervieux-Payette: Mr. Chairman, may I conclude?

The experience of my own riding of Mercier has demonstrated that women can weld, do iron bending, to the satisfaction of employers, and also in Japan those experiences are very positive. I ask the minister whether he could answer my previous questions.

[English]

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Chairman, could the minister give us a quick summary on the philosophical differences between Canada Manpower centres in Canada and the employment centres run by the state of California?

Mr. Axworthy: Not right away, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Chairman, I think the minister might find that employment centre operations which are run by the provinces in Canada are more similar to those run by the state of California than they are to the ones run by Canada Manpower. Could the minister tell me what he feels is the major difference between provincial government employment placement operations and federal government employment placement operations? What is the difference in philosophy?

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, the major difference is that the provincial employment centres are restrictive and ours cover the entire country. We attempt to provide services for individuals right across Canada to make sure there is full opportunity and access. The provincial centres cater to their own populations and to specific industries only.

If the hon. member wants to argue for a restrictive manpower service run by the provinces, then he is welcome to it. But we on this side of the House happen to feel, consistent with our own philosophy, that this country survives and continues to exist by a national approach and a shared national approach. Therefore, we will continue to operate a manpower service for all Canadians.

Mr. Hawkes: Could the minister confirm—I will give him another minute to think—that he believes that the philosophical differences are in the area of a restrictive and limited manpower service, that is, between the way in which provinces run their manpower placement services and the way in which the federal government runs its manpower placement services? Is that the minister's state of knowledge?

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, I am not here to debate the state of the knowledge of one member over another. I try to do my best, and I am sure the hon. member tries to do his best. I simply pointed out that they are restrictive to the extent that those services only operate within provincial boundaries. They cater only to the population within finite limits. That is why there are provinces, and that is why we need a national government to make sure there is the ability to transcend those provincial boundaries and not to have the country fragmented into jurisdictions with fences between them. It is to make sure that a Canadian in Manitoba who wants to move to Alberta knows there is a way of finding out whether there is a job there and that there is a mobility grant to move him there, and training is available which may be useful in both places so he could move back and forth. That is the difference.

Sometimes the hon. member expressed amazement. Sometimes we find it amazing that he and others like him have such a limited and restricted view of this country. They see it only in terms of its provincial boundaries and not in terms of its national focus.

I suggest that if we are to go through a mutual educational process during these hours together, it may be well worth while for the hon. member to think about his philosophical basis, which it seems to me is totally parochial and provincial in scope, with the assumption that without question provincial governments do things better. Provincial governments do some things very well. There are very good provincial governments. I was a member of a provincial assembly for seven years. I took a great deal of pride and a great deal of interest in that particular occupation. However, I came to one conclusion, namely, there are things provincial governments simply cannot do.

If we are to hold this country together, there must be a strong national government which can provide services, resources and facilities for Canadians regardless in which region or province they happen to live. That is a real difference. So if we are going to exchange philosophies, I suggest that the hon. member has a few things to learn as well about what this country is all about.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Chairman, let me tell the hon. minister that I have worked in different regions of the country, perhaps in more regions than he has and for a longer period of time. I care about Canada at least as deeply and maybe more deeply than he does. I understand clearly that we are free men and women who enter into social contracts to work together.

An hon. Member: It doesn't look like it.

Mr. Hawkes: There is a great deal of resentment of a central government which operates under the guise of being strong, which is doing irreparable harm to this nation. The government he supports is dangerously on that course.

I did not indicate to the minister in any way that I preferred the provincial model over the federal model. I think we need to utilize all the philosophies available in the placement field. I am beginning to discover, however, that the minister seems either unwilling or unable to deal with the fact that there are at least two major philosophies relating to replacement operations. In this country provincial governments tend to adopt a placement philosophy which is different from the federal one. Provincial governments tend to actualize it. There may be a good model by using both, with the federal government doing one thing and the provincial doing another. I am anxious to discover whether or not in the theoretical literature dealing with placement services the minister recognizes the two different philosophies. Then we might move on to an examination of what he sees as the strengths and weaknesses of them. Does the minister know what the two major philosophies are?

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, it would be helpful if the hon. member would describe the philosophies he is talking about. In reading the literature, as the hon. member knows, there is a wide variety. There are not just two philosophies of placement services. There are several philosophies of placement services. There are almost as many philosophies of placement services as there are theoreticians of personnel policy. Everyone has designed his own will or his own pyramid. I would suggest if the hon. member wants an answer he should outline which two philosophies he is putting in contradiction.

There are several philosophies, several approaches, and all kinds of models. We would be very interested in hearing from him which one he thinks is appropriate, or which two he puts in contra-distinction. If he is referring to the distinction I raised before between the position taken by the government in his own province, which is that of assuming local preference, versus one where we think there should be equal opportunity, then there is a major difference and I do take issue with that idea.

I do believe that one should not be judged by one's geographical location, and if there be exclusions, monopolies or restrictions put on people because of sex, age, or because they live in another location; I do not think this country is formed purely by geographical boundaries. Clearly, one of the problems we have faced in Canada, whether it is in training or employment programs, has been discrimination based upon sex, race or ethnic background. Those are the discriminations which we think must be overcome if we are to provide for full mobility, not just in a geographical sense across Canada but also in a vertical sense so that people can move into occupations that have been denied to them in the work place.

The hon. member's colleague from Kingston has rightly argued that for generations women have been denied proper opportunity for access to a full range of jobs and proper pay. Slowly, that is a recognition which this country is reaching. We have denied equal opportunity to 51 per cent of the people in Canada.

We, the government, declared in our throne speech that we want to end that discrimination. It will take time. It will not happen in the miraculous fashion which the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands prescribes, even though she and her government did not do much about it when they were in office. But that is history. Nevertheless, it will take some time and it will take some effort, but we are committed to that principle. We want to see it implemented, but we cannot implement it if the contrary policy, put forward by certain provincial governments, as the hon. member proposes, does not even recognize that there is that kind of discrimination. They say there cannot be discrimination because theirs is a province where discrimination does not exist. By the stroke of a pen they eliminate it, even though it is a very real factor.

I suggest the hon. member read some of the court cases brought by Indian bands in his province against his provincial government on the affirmative action question of resource projects. If he read those court statements and briefs submitted by the native bands, he would see how wrong is the decision of his province. It has served to deny many native people in that province opportunity to those resource projects. If that is the discrimination he is talking about, I am prepared to say those governments are wrong. The approach we take is to promote equal opportunity of people, geographically, between sexes, races and backgrounds, is the right one and we intend to continue promoting it.

Mr. Hawkes: I bring to the minister's attention the statutes of the province of Alberta. Here is our human rights act. It had a lot more force in law than anything his government has done in the past 17 years to protect the rights of individuals. I come back to the theme. The minister has a habit which is well known in this House. When he does not have a knowledge base, he talks about something other than the question which has been asked. I specifically asked the minister how many dollars in the estimates before us within his Canada Manpower centres are devoted to the placement of handicapped people.

Mr. Axworthy: Again, Mr. Chairman, this is information we will attempt to find out. It really is such a niggardly request that it defies description, that you can separate out of the amount of estimates that amount allocated to one group of people. Our employment centres provide multi-regional services for a wide variety of people. When someone comes to them, the counsellor does not say, "Because you are not handicapped, I cannot serve you". They serve people of all kinds, descriptions and needs, every day in the placements they make. The number this year was close to a million registrations.

We do not ask people what their background is. We do not deny them access. Nor do we say we have a special allocation, that counselling or placement service is pigeonholed for only one group of people. If we did that, the first to scream about an inefficient operation would be members opposite. They would say there are rows and rows of counters with people waiting for someone to walk in the door.

We have tried to provide programs to aid and assist those with handicaps. We provided a major program of changing the physical facilities within our employment offices to ensure easier access. We established an affirmative action program. Part of the group which will get more equal opportunity are those who are handicapped. In a short period of time we will be announcing a special employment program geared specifically to those with handicaps. We are trying to target where it is needed.

It is really not possible to respond to the question the hon. member asks. Frankly, just to save a lot more time, I will tell him that we will not try to find out exactly how much. However, we will tell the hon. member how much we spend on employment programs, training and placements, what we do in terms of Outreach programs, all of which are designed to help different groups of people. We will not try to do a time value study as to what one of our employment counsellors in an office in Swift Current spends percentage-wise dealing with people with handicaps simply to satisfy the curious curiosity of the hon. member opposite.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Chairman, that reply speaks to something pretty troublesome. I think the information available in the world will tell us very clearly that there is a proportion of the population in Canada which has extreme difficulty in becoming employed. There is a lot of research evidence which indicates that resources specifically allocated to those who are strongly disadvantaged are in fact paying off for individuals and for society. Whether the minister knows it or not, he has been touching on the major philosophical difference between employment services run in the state of California and most Canadian provinces and those run by the Canada Employment Centre.

It seems logical that resources specifically designated in at least our larger communities to assist physically handicapped people in securing employment, in the first instance going out and visiting employers to find potential jobs, are different from the one the minister outlined and one which should be considered over time.

Let me ask a similar type question. What kinds of special services are provided in Canada Employment Centres for those who cannot read either English or French?

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, we have translators on call for those who have special language needs.

Mr. Hawkes: Can the minister tell me what kinds of special services exist for people who cannot read?

An hon. Member: You should know.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Axworthy: We are using the hon. member as a test case in this respect. Material is available in braille for those who are blind. Special services are provided in that area. For the illiterate, we have the basic skills-training programs, plus many of the LEAP projects which are available for the upgrading of skills. I remind the hon. member that education is under the responsibility of the provincial governments. The primary and secondary school systems are charged with the task of providing basic reading skills. It is a task they fulfil to the best of their abilities. We attempt to supplement them with special programs such as a "Choices" program and counselling services. It is a provincial responsibility supplemented only when we get special needs programs, such as the Outreach program, LEAP, special programs for native training and basic skills training. All those programs are for those with problems.

Mr. Hawkes: The minister moved to training programs that exist, some in co-operation with provincial governments and some of them alone. My question is directed toward the services provided by Canada Employment Centres, the placement services for people who cannot read or write.

Mr. Axworthy: As I tried to outline to the hon. member, we do not discriminate against those who cannot read or write. If someone comes into our office and wants to find a job, we have a counsellor who is prepared to sit down and make an assessment of that person's skills and abilities and the types of job that will suit that person. They are available on a local and regional level. We can plug them into a job bank. If they require retraining, we advise them where that can be obtained. If the basic handicap they face is illiteracy, we recommend programs available in their region which will help overcome their problem. Those are the kinds of services we specifically provide for those with a deficiency. I repeat that the service is provided to anyone who walks in the door.

Mr. Hawkes: Can the minister, in light of the last five or ten minutes, indicate why, in his opinion, one of the fastest growing occupational groupings in Canada today is private placement services and why there has been such an explosion of placement services run and funded by provincial governments? In light of his assertion that providing services to everyone should be something that this House supports and seconds, could the minister indicate why he thinks we have this phenomenon of rapid increases in private placement activities, and why we have this rapid increase in provincially-funded placement activities?

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, I would suggest one basic reason is that the occupational structure of Canada has diversified. There is far more demand in occupations with specialized needs than there was ten or 15 years ago. It is essential in many cases to provide very highly specialized services for those highly specialized needs. Our programs tend to be broader in their base and we do not deny the value or the utility of other kinds of services. We still provide the basic placement services and, by the way, save private industry hundreds of millions of dollars by the provision of those services. Industries often ask what do we do for them? We provide them with their basic employment services right across Canada saving them an awful lot of money in doing that, and it is money well spent.

Mr. Kristiansen: Mr. Chairman, prior to launching into the subject of unemployment insurance and a myriad of questions arising therefrom, I should like to bring to the attention of the minister a few recent remarks by a former member of this House, the former chairman of the Conservative caucus. These are remarks concerning labour mobility, hiring preferences and the effect upon these, if any, of certain sections of the proposed constitutional resolution. These remarks which, in my considered opinion, constitute irresponsible, ill-considered and mischievous scare-mongering of the worst kind, attempted to suggest that key mobility and rights sections of the proposed constitutional resolution might have the effect of, one, outlawing the closed shop and union hiring; two, preventing mutual agreements providing for a minimum of 10 per cent local hiring access on major hydro projects, for example; and, three, and this one might really blow some minds, disallowing a company, Cominco in this case, from giving hiring preference to the qualified sons and daughters of employees.

I am sure the minister appreciates that working people and Canadians generally are already facing enough insecurities without having to suffer such partisan and self-serving drivel. I am not inexperienced in these areas and, in fact, have spent considerable time dealing with issues of hiring practices, local preferences and studying the history of "freedom of association" clauses in other jurisdictions. It is a non-issue as far as the United States court rulings on union shop rights are concerned.

Would the minister briefly comment on these three Conservative "red-herring" claims, and hopefully help put an end to the needless anxieties and false counsel being spread by members of the Conservative party?

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, that is a welcome invitation. I think we have already had an opportunity to see some examples this afternoon without having to go to the former chairman of the Conservative caucus to find one. I would only make one brief comment. At this time we have to be very careful of what we say. There has been a tendency for people to exaggerate, to take partisan stands and blow them into deep and abiding divisions.

Canada has always been a country where there have been regional differences, and in my own part of the world there has been a history of grievances. But I have deeply regretted the way in which those historical facts have tended to be massaged or blown into something which really is not there. It is an attempt to suggest that somehow the federal government is working against the interest of one region. That is a very dangerous game to play because it can, over a period of time, become a conventional wisdom and people tend to believe they are no longer served by the national government because they are told so often.

If there is any way in which we can ensure the continuation of this country, it is to ensure that people have a right to choose where they want to work and where they want to live. We have to make sure there is a proper balance between the peculiar and distinctive services a provincial government can provide and the broad-base national services that a federal government must supply. The history of this country has been a continuing debate on how we provide for that balance between the two levels of government.

To comment on the hon. member's statement, the best we can do as a House is to deplore that kind of comment, and be a little more diligent in trying to tell the truth, be a little more careful in how we seize upon partisan differences to try to exploit them and, at the same time, putting in motion these self-fulfilling prophecies.

I think a lot of the anger in western Canada could be diluted very quickly if there was a greater attempt to provide proper and accurate information on what is going on. One thing that frightens me is exactly that kind of statement. As I read them, in some cases put forward by some of our colleagues, or by members of some of the provincial houses, and certainly by some of those who lead what they call so-called separatist movements, I find they are engaging in serious distortion. No one will benefit from this if it continues. I appreciate the member drawing that to my attention, but I think it is something of which all members of this House should be sensitive. We have a great responsibility in this House to be very careful and very responsible in what we say, and not to engage in that kind of extremism.

Mr. Kristiansen: I thank the minister for that response. I think it is a reasonably accurate one.

As a rule, would the minister generally agree that social insurance programs in the main should provide the greatest benefits to those who, in his own words, "need help the most", and that the taxes and revenues raised to pay for these programs should generally be levied according to ability to pay? I think a simple yes or no would suffice.

Mr. Axworthy: In general, Mr. Chairman, I agree with that remark.

Mr. Kristiansen: I would gather, then, that the minister would agree that a program, a program which pays the greater benefits to those who have most income but who pay less, that such a program would be unfair. Would that be a correct assessment of the minister's judgment?

Mr. Axworthy: It would be more fair to me if the hon. member told me which programs he is referring to so I could be better able to respond to the specific program, and not deal with generalities.

Mr. Kristiansen: I will state it another way. I would gather the minister would also agree that a program where those recipients with lowest incomes pay the most for less benefits, that a program of that nature would be unjust. Would that be correct? I have put it in another way so that it can be as clear as possible, and I think we should establish the principles first.

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, again working on the basis of existentialism I would prefer to have the circumstance and the case cited for me so that I would be able to respond more accurately to the hon. member rather than just proceeding on broad principles. I think we agree on the principles. We should now get down to case studies.

Mr. Kristiansen: Mr. Chairman, assuming by that reply that we do agree on the principles, I should like briefly to point out that under our unemployment insurance system, which is the social insurance plan to which I was referring in my comments—I am sure the minister suspected as much because the description was certainly accurate—for a person earning $6,000 a year, unemployment insurance will cost $18 more per year in 1981, but he is entitled to collect $8 per week less than he would have been entitled to collect in 1978. If he is unemployed for an average period, that is, 15 weeks average duration of unemployment, he will be paying $18 more for $120 less in benefits.

Second, the $12,000 earner, who is close to the average, in 1981 pays the same net amount for unemployment insurance protection as the $50,000 earner, yet he is entitled to collect $51 per week less.

I would just like to clarify the matter. The minister and his officials might be quizzing themselves as to my meaning, but I believe it was last June in discussion of Bill C-3 that I raised some of these topics. I recently brought some of the cost calculations up to date, including the actual cost, after taxes, of the premiums which people at various income levels pay for, relatively speaking, greater or lesser benefits. We find that in 1981 those with $8,000 earned income, for example, will make required unemployment insurance contributions of $144. Their net insurance contribution, therefore, will also be $144 because there will be no tax saving to them on the basis of deductions due to their income level. This is for a weekly entitlement of $92.

For a person with an earned income of $10,000 the required unemployment insurance contribution is $180. The $44 tax saving due to deduction of the cost of the premium leaves a net unemployment insurance contribution of $136 to provide a weekly unemployment insurance entitlement of $115. They are paying less to get more.

Further up the ladder, a person with an earned income of approximately $20,000 has a required contribution of $295. The tax saving from deduction is $83, and for a net contribution of $212 the entitlement is $189. For exactly that same entitlement of $189, people earning $25,000 make a net contribution of $204 as opposed to $212, and persons with incomes of $50,000 make net contributions of $160, that is, $44 less, also for a benefit of $189.

It seems to me and to many others that we have a system which is totally upside down. Anyone who assumes himself to come under the classic definition at least of a small "l" liberal—maybe large "L" Liberals are not the same—a social reformer, a progressive person or what have you, would think that there is something extremely wrong with any social insurance program which turns all of the normal practices and concepts totally upside down. If there is a moment at the end of my remarks, I will ask the minister to attempt to deal with that situation.

I should like to mention one or two other issues briefly. One has to do with a practice that I mentioned last June 19, which used to exist in many industrial operations. I would like to hear the minister's comment on it. When there were lay-offs, arrangements were made within a given plant so that a senior person could choose to be laid off and allow a junior employee to continue working. To many people in the labour force and many in management that seemed to be a good idea for a multiplicity of reasons. One of those was an economic saving to the unemployment insurance program itself. It allowed young people who had recently entered the labour force, who needed work experience and who had to learn what it was like to earn a living to continue to work. God knows there seems to be enough around who could benefit from that kind of experience. It also allowed people with young families, low incomes, and small bank accounts to work and to gain increased experience and seniority in the labour force, and it allowed those who were older and perhaps trying to phase into the concept of retirement and into the practices of retirement to do so.

Why does it matter to the unemployment insurance program, to the government or to anyone, which of those two employees should be laid off and which should be working when, in all likelihood, the most experienced worker under the unemployment insurance program would probably have an easier time finding a job elsewhere on a temporary basis than a junior employee with little work experience? I will stop now and give the minister an opportunity to answer.

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, I think the hon. member raises some very important points. They have given me some cause for concern primarily because over the years the Unemployment Insurance Act has gone through a wide and varying series of amendments sometimes totally out of joint with those which preceded them. The act at times took on the appearance of a Rube Goldberg machine. Some parts to which other parts were not connected were functioning. It was for that reason that when I took over this ministry I asked for a complete and total review not only of the basic structure of the Unemployment Insurance Act but also of some of the underlying principles. One of those which is most important in that review is the question of redistribution of income and to what degree the act deals with equity as part of its program.

I admit that the reduction of benefits ratio from 66 per cent to 60 per cent was unfair when combined with an increase in premiums. Those two combinations worked out of sync with each other. There were other reasons for doing it, of course. One was that over the years the public purse percentage of the cost of the Unemployment Insurance Act had increased from 20 per cent to 40 per cent, so increasingly we were carrying a larger and larger percentage of the amount.

In some defence I point out to the hon. member that while waiting for the recommendations of the unemployment insurance review, we have taken certain steps to broaden the coverage. Perhaps the most important was the extension in the act of minimum insurability, from a 20-hour week to a 15-hour week, which brought some 200,000 part-time workers, 70 per cent of whom were female, under coverage. That was a fairly major extension, and I think it could properly be seen as an attempt to build more equity into the program to make sure there was not the elimination or the erasing of large groups of workers who were part-time but, nonetheless, permanent workers. They were permanently in the work force but not working the full 20 hours. We tried to extend the act that way to provide more fairness in that respect.

We have also tried to eliminate some of the more obvious discriminatory aspects of the act such as those which involve fishermen's wives. Under the program we now in a sense give them a full range of benefits.

Going back to the fundamental principle raised by the hon. member, that is presently being examined. We hope to put forward a report shortly after Christmas, certainly in January or February, and I believe he will see, once that review is completed, that there is a real attempt to straighten the system out and to make sure the principles of equity are recognized through the entire administration of the act.

Mr. Kristiansen: Mr. Chairman, I certainly hope that review will result in something more productive than the changes we have seen since 1978 which have been, in the main, extremely regressive. I know some hon. members opposite have expressed that feeling rather eloquently on earlier occasions.

One final item has to do with income tax deductions with respect to unemployment insurance. Is it not possible for the government to consider holding back deductions for tax purposes from unemployment insurance cheques and allowing those to be paid at the end of the year, on whatever basis? When one is unemployed one is least able to pay taxes or any other premium, especially when benefits are reduced. This is true even of someone who enjoys a rather healthy annual income.

In this day and age people tend to live up to their income on a month to month basis, or very close to that. It becomes very difficult, and a great hardship on many families, especially with children when, at the time when their income is already being reduced by at least 40 per cent, if not by more in many cases, they find the extra bite taken out. No one objects to paying their fair share of taxes based on their annual income, but it is an unnecessary hardship, I suggest, that that tax be deducted at the time of the year when they can least afford it. I will certainly welcome any assurance that the government will seriously consider making that kind of reform.

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, I am advised that the proposition put forward by the hon. member would not be legal under the Income Tax Act, and therefore that is one reason we do not do it. I suppose there is also the practical reason that people have to pay their tax some time. It is a question of whether it is easier to take it on a monthly basis or in a lump sum at the end. Personally I find it a little easier when I am nicked each month, it does not seem to hurt as much, but that is a personal preference.

Mr. Kristiansen: Not when you do not have a pay cheque!

Mr. Cyr: Mr. Chairman, I believe that I should first of all point out to the committee that there is only one representative of the official opposition present for a debate which is very important for all Canadians.

First, Mr. Chairman, I wish to congratulate the hon. minister and his officials for the opening in September of the new unemployment insurance office in Sainte-Anne-des-Monts, in the Gaspé Peninsula. This area of northern Gaspé had been waiting for this office for many years and the claimants will no longer have to travel 100 miles or more to meet an official. Now that I have paid a few compliments, I would like to talk about some of the problems which exist in the Gaspé constituency. We should try together to find solutions.

I would like the hon. minister to note that some of the unemployed filed benefit claims in September and October and have yet to receive any benefits. It seems that there are more delays in Gaspé, even though there are some in the other unemployment insurance offices of my constituency such as Sainte-Anne-des-Monts and Chandler. Can the minister ask the people in charge of those manpower centres to do their utmost so that the claimants can receive their benefits before Christmas?

Mr. Chairman, I would like to outline an abnormal situation at the Chandler arbitration board. This board is the only one in the Gaspé Peninsula. The next nearest is located in Rimouski in the lower St. Lawrence area. The claimants who appeal the decision of an official must travel 150 miles and those from the Magdalen Islands must take the plane to come to Chandler. In 1979-80, this board included one chairman and two representatives each of labour and management. Some of the hearings have had to be cancelled because management or labour were not represented. For one hearing scheduled on a Wednesday, one of the management representatives is on holidays and the other is available, so notices to appear are sent. On the day of the hearing, the single management representative is sick and the board is therefore unable to sit. The hearing is cancelled or else a member of the nearest arbitration board located in Rimouski is called.

So, besides paying the salary of this board member we must pay for a 250-mile round trip which comes to 500 miles, and postpone the nine o'clock morning session to three or four o'clock in the afternoon. Just think of these poor claimants who must travel 100 or 150 miles, pay for their extra meals and sometimes even for their hotel rooms. It is unacceptable that a claimant who appeals to the arbitration board should make a trip just to find out there is no meeting. To correct this situation, Mr. Chairman, I recommend the appointment of additional representatives, one for the employees, one for the employers, and also a chairman. So the acting chairman is already appointed and so is the employees' representative. The employers' division has yet to appoint a representative, male or female. I requested that a woman be appointed to that arbitration board and I do not believe, Mr. Chairman, that the minister would object to the appointment of a woman on this arbitration board because she would be the only one in eastern Quebec.

Last week the last person was not yet appointed. So tonight I ask the minister to take the necessary action so as to make this arbitration board works properly in 1981 and in the future, that it is a board made up of two chairmen, three employers' representatives and three employees' representatives. Mr. Chairman, I think I would not accept in 1981 that the Chandler arbitration board meetings be cancelled again because there are not enough board members. If that should happen again after this warning, I believe that the department would have to pay for the extra travel expenses of claimants appealing to the arbitration board.

Now, I would like to say something about the community development projects program in Canada. In a letter which the minister sent to me on November 10, he stated:

> On October 14, the Quebec government raised the following points with regard to the implementation of Canada community development projects in Quebec: the exclusion of specific organizations falling under the Intergovernmental Affairs Department Act, the exclusion of specific activities such as construction and those creating dependency and, finally, the consultation process.

Mr. Chairman, non-profit organizations in the Atlantic provinces are achieving very useful projects for the community, building houses and fishing shelters, and employers' associations in these provinces are not subject to construction regulations. In Quebec, construction work is subject to wages imposed by the labour department and the implementation phase is carried out through the Quebec construction board bureau.

The pay schedule suggested by the Department of Employment and Immigration is the provincial minimum wage. For certains trades like carpenters and painters, communities cannot afford to pay construction bureau salaries. I therefore ask the minister whether he has entered into consultations with his Quebec counterpart to obtain building regulations exemptions for community development projects such as buildings and wharves, or as I said earlier, slips for fishermen's boats or community halls for Golden Age Clubs and farm-wives associations.

Certain local and regional initiatives that are very worthy cannot proceed in Quebec because of the salaries ordered by the construction bureau.

Another point I should like to make concerns the Unemployment Insurance Act. Under that act, the claimant must have made 20 contributions in the case of a first job to be entitled to benefits, or have worked 20 weeks if he returned to the work force and received no benefits during the last 52 weeks. I must say, Mr. Chairman, that in the Gaspé Peninsula and the maritimes, where the majority of jobs are of a seasonal nature, that 20-week entitlement period is too stringent. I would ask the minister whether he intends soon to introduce an amendment to the act, reducing the entitlement period from 20 weeks to 15. I will give the minister an opportunity to answer these few questions, and I will put another one later on.

[English]

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, may I say in response to the hon. member's questions that, first of all, I understand well the problems faced in the Gaspé region with the board of trustees, because it is a region where it is difficult to provide a full range of services. The only difficulty up to now has been the relatively low workload. I can promise the hon. member that we are looking at it and we will attempt to provide some additional services to ensure that his constituents are properly looked after. By the way, I take some comfort in the comment of my colleague that in the beautiful area of Rimouski there is a woman commissioner and member already in place. We will follow her prime example.

● (1930)

On the question of changing the act itself respecting the re-entry phase, it is being examined as part of the review about which I spoke earlier. We hope to have the review ready for public discussion in the House within a few weeks after Christmas. At that time I know the hon. member will have a chance to look at our proposals to alter the manner in which re-entry weeks are allowed for members coming back into the work force.

Finally, on the question the member raised about the delay in payments, as he knows we suffered a serious slowdown as a result of the strike. We are attempting to catch up as well as we can. I will ask the regional director to make a report on the member's region and get it to him by the next week to see how we can catch up. I believe within another two or three weeks we should be almost fully caught up, but I will ask for a report to assure the member that that is the case.

Mr. Cyr: Mr. Chairman, I think I have another case to submit to the minister. In 1979, the Department of Employment and Immigration, in co-operation with the Secretary of State and the Quebec minister of communications authorized a project entitled "Resource groups for community media", more especially radio, and that project bears No. 001N-17-32. The program, according to a letter I received from the minister, was meant to be as follows. Its primary purpose was to increase employment opportunities for young unemployed. When I checked the names of the individuals who were hired, I realized that they are not young unemployed, but most of them are full-time station employees who were rehired under that program.

Mr. Chairman, I should like to suggest to the minister this evening that if he is to enter into new agreements with the Quebec government and community organizations in Quebec, he should formally instruct his officials to check and make sure that the standards of the program are complied with and that the personnel hired under that program are not full-time station or organization employees but young unemployed, as provided under the program.

[English]

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member's question is quite specific and detailed. I will have to look at it specifically, get an explanation and report back to him.

Mr. Schellenberger: Mr. Chairman, I came into the chamber just as the minister was answering some questions on the affirmative action programs in Alberta. Perhaps he will have to set me straight because I may not have heard everything, but I believe he said that in some way a bill before the Alberta government infringed upon native people taking advantage of some affirmative action programs.

As I understand the problem, it lies within the statutes of the province of Alberta, in the bill of rights. In the court cases which took place, the judges ruled that the statute of the province took precedence over the affirmative action programs in place. They quoted section 6 of the act which indicated that no employer or person acting on behalf of an employer shall refuse to employ or refuse to continue to employ any person or discriminate against any person with regard to employment or any term or condition of employment.

The province realized that there was a need for affirmative action particularly when it looked at the various large plants in the province, and the act that those plants were in areas where there were large unemployed groups of people such as native people on reserves, and the only way to do it was to pass another act in the legislature that affirmative action programs could take place in the cabinet signed the necessary documents. If I am wrong, I would like to know about it, because I would like to discuss it with the province. As I understand it, the province is willing to undertake affirmative action programs in those areas, but given the bill of rights it had to take the necessary procedure to overcome that provision in the act.

I have travelled through those projects and I understand, particularly in the Syncrude project, that there has been great success with those programs, that many native people have been employed. Hopefully that will take place in other plants if the two governments can get together regarding the construction of those plants. Am I correct in my assumptions, or can the minister add anything to them?

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, essentially the member is correct that under the Alberta human rights act the only way in which there could be an exception and one could introduce an affirmative action program is by a specific order in council of the provincial cabinet. The native bands of the province have challenged the actual human rights act of Alberta by saying that it is unconstitutional. If the charter of rights we are discussing and debating presently is passed, it could very well be that that act would be unconstitutional. I am not a lawyer, so I will not judge it.

I also am concerned—and perhaps this is where the member missed some of the discussion—that the government of Alberta is even attempting to apply that standard against federal direct employment programs in which we have introduced the affirmative action principle. At this point the government of Alberta is not prepared to provide us with an exception on that. There is some ongoing discussion between our officials to overcome that problem.

Mr. Schellenberger: I was not aware that that was the case. I am sure some discussions will take place to see if in effect the province of Alberta is attempting to apply it. I would be very surprised if that was the case, particularly if it was to the benefit of certain groups in the province and did not lie in direct opposition to the statute in place. I would have to check on it before I could challenge the minister.

Another area I should like to discuss is one with which I am most familiar. I am referring to the native people of the country. I listened to the remarks which the minister made earlier in reply to another member, but one area which comes under his jurisdiction and which I should like to discuss with him for a moment is that of Indians who migrate to cities. They tend to lose the protection of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and end up constituting an increasing and disproportionate part of the caseloads of social agencies, including those dealing with health and welfare, and of correctional institutions. Most of the problem lies in their inability to obtain employment.

As I said earlier this week, recent surveys have indicated that unemployment for off-reserve Indian people is three to four times higher than that of non-Indians. The major reason for that—and this was cited by the department—was that Indian people tend to have a lack of training in those areas which are necessary for employment. There are certain physical disabilities and there is a need to attend to family responsibilities which particularly, in the case of women, is a problem. It means that they must live off social welfare rather than working. I suppose part of that lies in their inability to meet the skills which are necessary, and also the inability to get the daycare facilities, or to take advantage of daycare facilities if jobs are available.

As an example I use a case which exists in my own province where current migration trends indicate that by 1986 about 35 per cent of the registered Indian population of Alberta will be in the cities of Edmonton and Calgary. That will constitute an even greater problem, of which I am sure the minister is aware. He is most likely taking those statistics into consideration when he looks to the programs he will be announcing in the 1980s.

If we look more closely at those statistics we will see that Indian people migrating to the urban centres today have an unemployment rate of over 27 per cent compared with the national rate, which is in the order of 8 per cent. If we project that figure we will see that by the mid-1980s the Indian population will have a much higher proportion of unemployed people between the ages of 15 and 29 than similar groups nationally. That figure will rise even higher as time goes on. We now find that Indian participation in the labour force is only two-thirds that of the national population. Their unemployment rate is generally 35 per cent, and, seasonally, it is as high as 75 per cent. We must organize our programs to meet that challenge as it becomes more intensive in the 1980s.

Due to the increase in the working population over the next ten years the number of native workers who will be unemployed could be as high as 30,000 to 40,000 people in the cities, if we are to project those figures. They will not have a job based on the statistics we have today if they have no additional programs or training. The average income earned by native people is half that of the national average. Therefore the entire Indian population is supported by only 30 per cent of its population. As I said before, this indicates we have more serious social problems in that sector of our society than in most other sectors. Those problems will only increase unless we deal with them.

The minister stated, in answer to another member, that those people on the reserves are generally looked after by the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development through economic development funding. There is DREE and then, within that minister's department, there is LEAP, LIP and CMHC, which are attempting to deal with those problems. The minister categorized them for the hon. member.

The problem is that native people are becoming so efficient at filling out forms that the nearby towns are asking their advice to teach them to fill them out properly. The native people are becoming so good at it because they take advantage of these programs since there does not seem to be another alternative for them to follow. Because of these programs they move off the reserves to take the challenge of the cities. It often becomes quite hopeless in those areas.

With respect to the community service project in LEDA, is there any breakdown of the amounts and when these programs will be coming forward? Will they be extended to status native people? Is there a breakdown between the status and non-status Indians and Metis? What are the successes of these programs with respect to those groups? The challenges in the city centres are the same in many instances for those groups and I would be interested if the minister could give some indication of the success of that program and in what areas most of the native people are taking advantage of that program.

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, I wish to thank the hon. member for his very thoughtful statement. He has very well summarized what many of us in western Canada know, regardless of our party or background, that is that if there is any one issue that we must address in the next few years it must be the economic and social situation of the native people.

In dealing with his specific question, in most of the programs we do not make a strong distinction between status and non-status Indians. In the area of community development projects we do, because we have allocated additional funding that would be applied to constituencies where there are reserves. So there is additional funding and we do take it into account there. In the areas of the community service programs, the LEDA programs and the Outreach programs, they are pretty much dependent upon the objectives and the purpose of the program. It has nothing to do with whether someone carries a card designating their status or whether they do not. To give you an example, in the hon. member's own province we spent close to $600,000 on Outreach programs. This is a service which is basically run by native people themselves to provide information and access on the reserves and in their communities to get information on job requirements and training opportunities.

The hon. member was good enough to give us the benefit of his thoughts, and I would like to return the compliment, if I might. Perhaps there has never been a better opportunity than now to address seriously the problem of native people in the west with respect to economic activity being created in the resource boom. If there has ever been a time when we can break through the enormous wall which has prevented native people in western Canada from obtaining an economic stake in the community, it is now.

One of the real tasks of federal and provincial governments, as well as of the private sector, all of us who are involved in these massive investments in pipelines, construction projects and new mines, is to recognize that if we do not move now we will never be able to do it. The time is now for us to make the effort. We must be careful to eliminate laws, regulations or practices which have prevented native people from entering the work force. As well, we must try to provide the incentives, training and support programs which would enable them to obtain the skills that are necessary. We tried to achieve this through the $10 million training program which we introduced last spring. We have also employed such programs as LEAP.

I also want to suggest to the hon. member that we are examining some of the options which are available to us under the western initiatives fund, a fund set up using the revenues from the resource base to be recycled back into western Canada. We should be looking at how we can use a substantial portion of those funds for the economic development of native people in the west in order to cut across the boundaries and apply the funds where they are needed. We want to create in their own communities the economic basis, the economic capacity and the economic services that would give them the ability to become self-sufficient in their own right. As chairman of the western cabinet committee which is looking at that prospect, I hope to consult with provincial governments and private groups in the west. I indicate to the hon. member that it is one of the options, one of the initiatives we are considering seriously, to break the back of that centuries-long problem which is a disgrace to all Canadians.

Mr. Schellenberger: I think people from the western provinces will realize it is important that those people who had difficulty in the past take an active part in any large resource development which does take place. We are somewhat hindered at the present time because of the policies between the federal government and the provincial governments. The argument of whether the provinces should use more of their resource wealth to develop those kinds of economic strategy, or take the money from the province and recycle it through the federal government, is something we will discuss for some time. That is not the point I want to make.

My other question is this. Does the minister have a special team which consults with the Department of Employment and Immigration and the Department of Indian Affairs? Is there at the present time an even broader team or intergovernmental group dealing with the question of native unemployment and with developing new strategies for off-reserve native people? In the downtown area of my city there are many native women who require special counselling before they can enter a training program or learn a skill of their particular interest. Is there this kind of intergovernmental group dealing with native unemployment in the future and with new strategies for those people in the cities?

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, the secretariat of the social development committee has the responsibility of combining departments which are working in this field. Under that committee a special task force composed of deputy ministers has been organized to negotiate with western provinces on urban and native conditions. This task force is developing recommendations which will be presented through the secretariat to the cabinet committee on social development. So there is an attempt to combine and co-ordinate the various efforts to zero in on that particular situation.

I repeat, through some of our own programs there is a special division in the employment and immigration commission which deals with native employment issues. We have begun to put more emphasis on the aspect the hon. member has mentioned, that in the downtown areas of cities it is often the single parent native women who are the real problem. For example, we initiated a special Outreach program in Winnipeg to work with native women in the downtown area to relate them, for example, to the fashion industry and other employment opportunities. The project has been going for two months, and it is preparing its first report. As a result of that report, I hope that we will be able to expand this concept to other western cities.

Mr. Schellenberger: Mr. Chairman, the minister mentioned what is happening in his department. Is there also an interdepartmental group working on these problems, many of which lie in other departments? We are always seeking better co-ordination of the funds which are spent.

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, perhaps I did not make it clear that the cabinet committee on social development, which is composed of ministers of the government whose departments relate to social development programs, is looking at that problem as a priority item. A secretariat is assigned to that cabinet committee and it is involved in a task force arrangement calling for a report to that cabinet committee, at which point the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, the Secretary of State, the minister for DREE and myself will get together to review the report and make recommendations back to the committee.

Mr. Schellenberger: Mr. Chairman, I thank the minister for that clarification. We were in government for such a short period that I am not aware of all the intricacies.

The Chairman: This will be the hon. member's last question.

Mr. Schellenberger: I would like to question in a little more detail the $10 million allotted for the training program. I realize that it is in its developing stages, but the minister might be able to enlighten us as to how the program is going.

The most recent estimate I have, up to mid-November shows that 1,255 native people have enrolled in institutional training and 225 have enrolled in industrial training. Are these figures what the minister expected? Is he satisfied with the number of applicants, and how the program is going to date? Were many, or any, of the applicants refused? How much of the $10 million is accounted for to date?

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, the program started up over the summer months. We believe it is on target and I think the hon. member's figures are accurate in terms of the actual number of allocations. Our target throughout the program is 2,100 placements on the institutional side and 1,719 on the industrial side. We feel that with the projects now coming on stream we will be able to meet that target during the fiscal year. We are now at the stage where the largest number of projects are to be examined or approved during the next two or three months. It took the summer to make the program available, to get the information out and get the proposals back.

[Translation]

Mr. Tousignant: Mr. Chairman, it is with pleasure that I take this opportunity to give to the House my views on employment and immigration. First, I would like to mention the fact that this subject is of interest to me having been myself an employer for a good 15 years hiring personnel and acting as manager, mediator, pay clerk and doing all those other things good and bad that go with being the boss. Thanks to this experience I can state that we still have in Canada a potential and a labour force of exceptional quality provided we know how to use it with respect, care and intelligence.

When I speak of an intelligent use of this labour force, I mean the practical aspect of the working conditions, but I also mean the general framework of things in terms of employment policy and labour legislation. While I admit we must improve labour-management relations we must also take care of not giving in to over-regulation or what I would call an inextricable bureaucratic network of standards and regulations which in the end create more problems and headaches than improvements.

But first, Mr. Chairman, one word of warning: I am neither backward nor old fashioned. I do not want to turn back the clock. But allow me to make a few observations to prove what strikes me as meddling, pure and simple, on the part of governments, an interference that is unjustified and condemnable. I am alluding here to that servile and degrading obligation for a worker to get a permit in order to earn his living, as is the case in the building trade in Quebec. Under the pretext of cleaning up the trade and setting quotas, supposedly to improve it, what happens in fact? Exactly the opposite. Yes, the situation is improved for a minute percentage of the work force but it is a nuisance for all the other workers. To get a permit, a worker must have put in at least 250 hours of work in the previous year in the construction trade, and to put in those 250 hours in the field of construction in Quebec, one needs a permit. One cannot make head or tail of it; it is as difficult to explain, with all due respect, Mr. Chairman, as if I were to ask you why dogs do not have piles at this time of the year.

As I mentioned earlier, before becoming involved in politics I was an employer. People would be surprised, Mr. Chairman, if I told them how many times competent and well-intentioned applicants have come to my office to ask for a job knowing all too well in advance that they would have to face the injustices of the system. They knew they could not qualify but when you are hungry, when you are desperate, you will try anything. I could see them feeling uneasy, embarrassed, considering themselves quite guilty of having to ask for a job. Imagine the situation. A family man only asking for the possibility of earning a living to support his wife and kids. It has become an illegal act to work, precisely in Quebec. The inconsistency, the irrational character and I would even say the abject complicity between provincial and federal laws literally deny people this right to work. It is forbidden to work, Mr. Chairman. It is no surprise then that we count so many unemployed. Lay-offs, yes these are called lay-offs, and we are now mass-producing unemployed people.

Let us now talk about improved control of workers by the construction bureau. In my riding of Témiscamingue, Mr. Chairman, whether in Rouyn, La Sarre, Ville-Marie or even Palmarolle, we have highly qualified men who are also hard workers. But do you know what happens? These people are sitting on the front porch while contractors who are doing construction works right across the street are forced to wait for the construction bureau to recommend to them workers who supposedly have their working permit.

So what happens? It is well known that summer is short in our area. The men who could work are sitting on their butt, machinery which could be put to work on earthwork and which costs hundreds of thousands of dollars remains idle, shining in the sun, and everybody is waiting for the good offices of the construction bureau. And then, when he receives the phone call from the construction bureau, the contractor rushes to call the recommended person, who supposedly holds a working permit. Do you know what happens? When he calls that person at home he is told he has been dead for two years. That is how things work. What a wonderful invention that construction bureau is, Mr. Chairman! I am sure that if Einstein were told, that would make him turn in his grave.

Some will say that came from Quebec. I agree, but I mention it simply in the hope that other provinces will not make the same mistake, and to show how one can be locked into a system thought out by thinkers, by those brainy birds who are paid $35,000 a year. They live way up there in the clouds. They certainly do not put themselves in the shoes, or should I say in the boots, of those whose everyday lives depend on the lucubrations of those gentlemen. Indeed, Mr. Chairman, between imagining a scheme in the comfort of well-heated offices and implementing it in the field there is, as the title of a movie says, "one bridge too far". That is why I say that rather than imposing all kinds of far-fetched procedures and restrictions upon workers, it would probably be preferable to give them a little bit of freedom of action. A person free to act is perhaps the best instrument to beat unemployment.

Mr. Chairman, as I said, work is forbidden in our area. Our legislation, although very fine in principle, cannot be implemented and is causing serious prejudice to the workers. As Julius Nyerere, the president of one African country whose name I forget said, "We, rulers, are often closer to those people who possess a second car than to those who need bread." It is easy for us to solve the problems of workers while sitting comfortably in our offices, getting a good salary, but let us trade place with this man who does not have $100 in his pocket, who has outstanding payments and who, with Christmas coming, is trying to get a job. He is looking for a job, he finds one but he is forbidden to work because he does not belong to the system. This is simply disgusting.

Of course, Mr. Chairman, I could have chosen to make an academic, tranquillizing speech, since it is much more pleasant and it disturbs people less, obviously, because thanks to rhetoric one can hide the truth and make us accept with a smile that we are walking on pavement when in fact we are tramping through slush. This exercise is frequently practised here in this Parliament. Labour legislation is far from perfect, Mr. Chairman. Those who succeed in finding temporary employment do not want to accept it because they will risk losing their unemployment insurance benefits and welfare payments. What happens because of this? People play cat and mouse with the law and do odd jobs on the side.

The Unemployment Insurance Act is outmoded in its present form. As everyone will admit, social conditions have changed a lot since the Unemployment Insurance Act was developed and passed in 1937. I do not have to tell the House that the morals, scruples and conscience of the public are now somewhat more flexible than in 1937. Some abuse the system and others suffer because of it. How can we solve the problem? I realize, Mr. Chairman, that there is no magic solution. First of all, I believe we should bring together in this Parliament those members who show a sincere desire to solve the problem, who have the ability to do so and who are knowledgeable about the issues. On both sides of the House, there are people who have been or still are involved in business and these are the people on whom we should call and whom we should bring together for two or three days. We would be surprised at the good ideas which could come of this.

Of course, if I had more time, I would tell the House what I personally think of this issue. Because of the little time at my disposal, I have to be satisfied with touching on the matter. For instance, if we tried to develop legislation, not only from a legal and bureaucratic point of view, but also the point of view of its application to real cases, this would give a more comprehensive view of the whole issue of the labour market and would give more access to employment by eliminating contradictions between some of our laws. Perhaps we should eliminate all social programs and replace them by a mailing of 24 postdated cheques once a year to all Canadians. Or still simpler funds could be credited to your account every month by a computer. When we know how many millions of dollars it costs every month to issue a series of cheques, it is just startling. Figures show clearly in black and white that it would not be more expensive and it would help us straighten out a situation by eliminating all unnecessary waiting, quarrels, humiliation for those who have to produce evidence and justify their applications. This simplification which would be fair to everybody would allow us to cut 60,000 jobs in the federal civil service.

This does not include provincial employees who would earn their basic wages and who could be much more productive in the private sector.

Thus, I would like to urge the minister to pursue his goals and try to improve the services provided to the unemployed by those offices in my riding. I am assured that the constraints, the delays suffered by the claimants are mostly due to the temporary physical organization and that as soon as the office will be relocated everything will be back in order. We know that employees are now divided into two offices in Rouyn, which tremendously complicates the operations. Those are the explanations I have been given. So I am prepared to give them a chance. But once the reasonable delay expires, if service is still inadequate they will see I can be very scathing.

They talk of temporary relocation, since the manpower centre will eventually be located in the new federal building to be started during winter or in the spring. As my old college buddy Jean de Lafontaine was wont to say, one must never count one's chickens before they are hatched. But take my word, this project which was promised in so many election campaigns will at long last see the day thanks to a Liberal government and a member of the right persuasion in the riding of Témiscamingue. The request for funds is now before Treasury Board, the last stage before tenders are called.

To conclude, I should like to congratulate the Minister of Employment and Immigration for the boundless concern and dedication he has demonstrated from the moment he was appointed. It is because the Government of Canada is made up of Canadians of similar stature that we trust in the future growth and wealth of our country. Since I am still entitled to a couple of minutes, I should like to finish on a pleasant yet true note. Last night, as I was taking part in an official opening in a parish called La Reine which is in my riding way out in northwestern Quebec, I met two great old gentlemen, Mr. Bernard and Mr. Goulet, very likely the two greatest Liberals ever in this country, who told me, "You know, kid, there are some people here who claim that we are 'coloured' Liberals." We can tell you it is not so. It is not a matter of colour, just a matter of common sense. Mr. Chairman, I trust that the present government will make sure that it remains a matter of common sense.

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Chairman, I believe in giving credit where credit is due. I wish to thank the minister for the co-operation he has shown in a large number of immigration cases and to the community program which is to take place this fall. I appreciate that co-operation. Also I want to pay a tribute to the project managers in Edmonton, particularly to Miss Turnley who has shown herself to be highly qualified. We got to know her better because she was in charge of the Bow River projects. The minister can certainly be proud of the work she did.

For a moment or so I would like to deal with the situation of the Indian and native people who are the greatest unused source of manpower in Canada. We sometimes forget the tremendous potential we have in these Indian and native people.

The Alberta government is taking giant strides in trying to help the Indian and Metis people to help themselves. In the great Canadian oil sands project at Fort McMurray, we established a type of college for training these people for specific jobs. At the Syncrude project they had special on the job-training programs for the Indian and Metis people. Most of them became excellent workmen.

As to the point the minister raised, and which the member for Wetaskiwin dealt with in regard to the bill of rights stopping some projects in Alberta, that is correct. The University of Calgary has taken a special interest in Indian and Metis people. Education has been taken to the reserves. Special training has been provided from Grade I up, if necessary. Indian people have been accepted into the University of Calgary without the usual qualifications and they have been given training. If my memory serves me correctly, more than 27 of them graduated with degrees. The University of Calgary now wants to establish a native faculty headed by a highly qualified native person. I have recommended this proposal to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development because I think it would attract native people from all across Canada. The university has already shown itself to be understanding and receptive to Indian people. Similarly, the Indian people know the university is helping them. It is wonderful to see Indian people mingling with all other Canadians on the campus. I would like to encourage the minister to assist wherever possible in establishing this faculty for Indians at the University of Calgary. In my opinion, this will be a giant step forward in getting our people off welfare and into a position where they can support themselves.

The University of Calgary found the bill of rights was hindering this program because the program was aimed at Indian people only. After a white woman had questioned why she was not allowed to take the course, she was permitted to take the course. But a court case followed and it was ruled the university could not discriminate in that way. Subsequently the Alberta government amended that section either in this session or the last and there is now no difficulty with it. These programs can now proceed at the University of Calgary and they are also being made available on the reserves for Indian people. There are special programs at the university where Indians can take a course, finish off their grade 10, 11 or 12 subjects, if necessary, and then go on with university training. This is a splendid thing. I think the people of Canada should know that the University of Calgary is doing this with the full support of the hon. David King and the hon. Jim Horsman, the ministers of education for Alberta.

Special courses for our Indian people have also been offered. When I was with the department of highways in Alberta we gave a course for heavy equipment operators. It was remarkable how many Indians qualified to operate those machines and became most efficient in that vocation. Indian people just require some understanding and assistance. They can become our greatest source of manpower in Canada. We bring people in from other countries and train them. I have no objection to training people from Vietnam because they need training. But let us make the training available to our Indian people and if necessary to people who have not had an education and are white skinned. That, too, could help. If we make these programs available to the greatest number of people, we will achieve the greatest results. I recommend this to the minister. I want to go on to one or two other matters, dealing with employment first and then immigration. The minister will remember the mobility study on construction which came out of the 1978 first ministers' conference. I wonder if he could briefly outline the major points in it and tell us whether it is helping to solve the unemployment problem in Canada.

Is there anything in that document or in the Unemployment Insurance Commission regulations which discourage people moving from one province to another? If there is, it should be removed. In the constitution we talk about mobility. I do not think a better example of mobility can be found than in the province of Alberta today. The Alberta minister of labour informed me that on October 1, 1980, there were 53,000 more people working in Alberta than on October 1, 1979. A large percentage came from the Atlantic provinces, and a tremendous number from Quebec and Ontario, as well as from Manitoba, Saskatchewan and British Columbia. Relatively few came from the United States and other countries.

As far as we in Alberta are concerned, mobility is no problem. I would like to know from the minister whether there is anything in the mobility study which discourages the Unemployment Insurance Commission from encouraging people to move from one place to another.

The government can help reduce the unemployment problem, but I differ from my friends to the left who think the government should be able to do everything to solve that problem. The government will never do that. I do not know what it is like in Russia. Maybe under the government there everybody is working. However, that is not the type of administration most Canadians want.

We want people to be able to make a dollar and earn a living. Although we do not believe in exorbitant profit, we do believe in profit. One of the best ways to get the unemployed working is to have thousands of small shops which hire one, two, three or more people. It is amazing how a mass of small enterprises could help solve the unemployment problem.

Capital is leaving Canada today. Within the last two years, $6 billion has left. We are losing jobs in Canada. The budget encouraged people to move out because of the tax situation and the threat of nationalization. Some people call it Canadianization. I call it nationalization when the government takes over industry. I suggest this is what is giving the minister the greatest amount of difficulty in trying to solve the unemployment problem. People will not invest money if they think that a few years down the road the government will take over and stop them from making a profit. If the minister wants to solve the unemployment problem, he should deal with that aspect.

I wish to deal with one other matter in connection with employment before moving on to immigration. It concerns abuses of unemployment insurance. I would go a second, third or fourth mile to help anyone who wants to work. However, I will not spend my time on those who are lazy, trying to find ways and means of beating the people, not contributing their share and making an easy thing out of the Unemployment Insurance Act.

The act never intended that people should work only in the summer and collect unemployment insurance in the winter. It was intended for those who wanted to work and could not find a job. There are too many abuses today and we should not be supporting those abuses. It is not fair to those who are working, or to the country. I ask the minister what exactly is going to be done with regard to weeding out those who abuse unemployment insurance, making it difficult for others with genuine cases.

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, I will attempt to answer the three major issues raised by the hon. member. Before doing so, I would comment on his opening remarks concerning the education of native people. One of the interesting themes to appear during the examination of these estimates has been the priority that we must give to that problem. I welcome the hon. member's comments about the University of Calgary. It is similar to some of the work being done in the University of Brandon in my province, of which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is chancellor. They have the same kind of extension policy.

I agree totally this is one of the ways we can provide for a self-help concept. It is true that education is the best guarantee of proper employment in this country, regardless of what we hear. The more we can open up those opportunities, the better it will be. I compliment the University of Calgary through the hon. member for what they are doing.

On the question of mobility which has been discussed on several occasions in this committee, the hon. member for Bow River raised the issue of the study of mobility in the construction trades. We have looked at that study. The primary recommendation to my department was that we introduce a series of mobility grants to cover the cost of room and board in order to overcome economic disincentives. Someone might feel there is not enough incentive to pull up stakes and move without extra support or a subsidy.

That recommendation was also referred to me within the past two or three days by the executive board of the building and construction trades department. As I indicated in the House on Friday, this is an area we will be looking at. It is a very important recommendation. As the hon. member knows, we have a task force in the department looking at the whole issue of labour market practices, including mobility. That matter has been referred to them. I hope it will come out as part of their recommendations. When we come forward with those recommendations, I hope the hon. member will consider supporting us, at least in that regard.

With regard to the unemployment insurance program, over the past year and a half the government has introduced a number of measures in an effort to tighten up the act through legislation. We specifically increased the number of weeks required for someone re-entering the work force. Reforms were undertaken in administrative procedures. A new record-of-employment program was started. We advertised urging employers to ensure that the forms are filled out so that we may have a more accurate record of someone's actual employment history. If someone tried to submit two or three applications, he would be detected much more easily.

We introduced computerization of unemployment registration which gives us a much greater capability to record the enormous numbers of registrations. Again, we have a better capability. A major study is being undertaken, I believe by Wood Gundy, on managerial practices in the Unemployment Insurance Commission. That is also a way of tightening up. This is balancing off the requirement to ensure fairness and equity of the program while preventing abuse. We hope to strike the right balance.

Mr. Taylor: I suggest to the minister that one of the best ways of getting this country working again is through free enterprise. With more people opening more shops or expanding their businesses, we can stop the flight of capital out of the country. The sooner we do that, the sooner we benefit this country.

There is no system like free enterprise. It gives a person an incentive to work. We have built up our standard of living under that system and we should not abandon it for any form of nationalization.

The next point I want to deal with is immigration. I have a few cases I want to deal with. One of the biggest aggravations I have found since entering federal politics is trying to get someone to answer the telephone in the Unemployment Insurance Commission. It rings and rings and rings. I thought I was the only one having that trouble. However, I have a letter here from a United Church minister who said this:

> I began phoning at 8.45 a.m. and let the phone ring for 25 times. Over a period of one hour, I phoned back five times letting it ring 25 times each time.

When I finally did get through, I asked the girl whether they had a central place which could receive calls when the line is busy and relay them when a line was free. She said the government would not give them anything like that. It is very annoying. I suggest that the minister modernize the telephone system there in order to avoid this frustration. There is nothing more frustrating than listening to a telephone ring and ring and ring waiting for someone to say "hello". Even if you are later turned down, you at least have had the satisfaction of talking to someone.

I next want to deal with section 19(1)(a) of the Immigration Act. I do not like the way some people are using this. I quote from section 19:

> (1) No person shall be granted admission if he is a member of any of the following classes:
> (a) persons who are suffering from any disease, disorder, disability or other health impairment as a result of the nature, severity or probable duration of which, in the opinion of a medical officer concurred in by at least one other medical officer,
> (i) they are or are likely to be a danger to public health or to public safety, or
> (ii) their admission would cause or might reasonably be expected to cause excessive demands on health or social services;

The act should be amended or enlarged to indicate that diseases which are not infectious or contagious should not be covered under that section. I know of a case where a Canadian medical doctor in England ruled that surgery on the bowel would prevent a person getting a visa to enter Canada. I talked to medical men in Canada and they cannot see how that would be considered infectious or contagious after two years or even, under the next clause, how it might cause unreasonable expense. In the new act people are given ten years in which to pay off such expense or to take out an insurance policy. That should be sufficient to look after such a situation. I ask the minister to check that item.

I come now to another question, Mr. Chairman. There is a lot of unemployment in Canada and it is not at all in the small villages and towns. In the Calgary office there is a man by the name of Kuizw who cannot seem to realize that though someone may be unemployed in Calgary there are no unemployed in a place like Vulcan. If someone in Calgary is available for work, this man will not issue the necessary certificate for someone to be brought in from China for a particular job. The applicants may specify that they need someone who can speak Chinese, someone to act as a nanny for their children or that they want someone to work in a restaurant, to learn the trade and to learn the English language under capable management. One immigration officer wrote to an applicant stating that the employment of the foreign worker would have an adverse effect on the employment and career opportunities for Canadians.

The Chairman: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

Mr. Taylor: I hope I would be given a chance to continue.

The Chairman: Does the minister wish to make a brief reply at this point? The hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, if the hon. member wants to continue—

The Chairman: The hon. member may continue with the unanimous consent of the House. Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Flis: Mr. Chairman, as the member of Parliament for Parkdale-High Park, I have the honour of representing many individuals whose heritage lies in other countries of the world and who still maintain close family ties with those countries. These individuals make up the ethnocultural mosaic of our country. I am proud to say that Parkdale-High Park has one of the largest multicultural mixes in Canada. In view of this, I am approached on a regular basis with requests for assistance in the immigration of friends and relatives to Canada. Often these individuals encounter difficulties and call on me for help in expediting their case.

Since June, 1979, when my constituency office opened in Toronto, I have become involved in 390 cases directly concerning immigration and involving such countries as the United States, England, Poland, the Philippines, India, the West Indies, Austria, China, Germany and the Soviet Union. As a result, I have worked closely with the Department of Employment and Immigration, and most recently together with the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

I applaud and appreciate the very difficult portfolio which the Minister of Employment and Immigration holds. If there are so many cases in only one constituency, one must only multiply that number by 282 members of Parliament to appreciate the immensity and responsibilities of the post.

I wish to compliment the minister on the humanitarian approach he has taken toward helping to resolve difficult immigration appeals, particularly in the case of family reunification from such areas as the east European countries and the Soviet Union.

Canada has come to be regarded as a compassionate country, and it is through programs and regulations included in the Immigration Act, as well as the decisiveness of our Minister of Employment and Immigration that we will continue to maintain the enviable position we hold in the world. By listening to and understanding the pleas of these many individuals throughout the world, as well as to the groups representing them here in Canada, I feel we can accomplish our goal. This concern was recently shown in my own riding, when the hon. minister visited Toronto to meet and discuss many factors concerning immigration with representatives from the Canadian Polish Congress.

I have had the opportunity many times to ask questions of the minister, through correspondence or in committee. I receive numerous complaints and inquiries from constituents and have often found the need for official clarification or explanation on points of law concerning the Immigration Act. I must thank the minister for the replies I have received to these many questions and for the positive suggestions and actions he has put forth.

One example of this is a letter I sent to the minister in July of this year requesting information on whether the self-exiled designated class regulation which was due to expire on January 1, 1981, would be extended to allow many east European refugees to resettle in Canada. This regulation gives individuals who are unable to return to their homelands or those who have escaped political and personal harassment the opportunity to resettle in Canada, on special humanitarian grounds, in cases where they would not be eligible for immigration under normal circumstances. The minister replied to my letter positively by extending the regulation until January 1, 1983, thus maintaining the opportunity for these unfortunate people to take advantage of this special program.

I also received extensive information from the minister which provided statistical data on such topics as the number of refugees from Asia and eastern Europe seeking resettlement in Canada, the number of individuals given permission to remain in Canada under special minister's permits, the numbers of individuals deported from Canada for various reasons over the last five years and the number of immigrants destined to the Toronto area who would be enrolling children in the school system.

I was able to pass this information on to interested departments at the Toronto Board of Education for their use. I would like to take this opportunity to congratulate the Toronto Board of Education on its excellent programs for new Canadian children. The Toronto Board of Education has provided reception classes for students who have just arrived in Canada, English classes, translation and interpretation services in practically every language of the world, heritage language classes and other programs which I do not have time to mention here. However, in Toronto multiculturalism is a reality.

In addition, I have obtained from the minister information on major funding available for services which provide immigration counselling and assistance on a private basis in Toronto. Again I thank the minister for providing me with such useful information.

There is substantial interest among members of the public concerning immigration, particularly among the people I mentioned who have families who remain in other parts of the world. This was demonstrated in my own riding when I held an immigration seminar at which top officials from the local office of the Department of Employment and Immigration were present to meet the public and to answer many questions. Over 200 people took time from their own schedules to attend this meeting. This just illustrates how much concern and interest exist within our community in the area of immigration.

There are, however, several questions which continue to be asked and about which I would appreciate receiving clarification from the minister. These problems occur frequently in the cases presented to me, and I am seeking ways to resolve some of them.

Does the minister have any plans to reduce the number of illegal immigrants in Canada—the number of immigrants who are living underground and of whom we know nothing of their whereabouts? Many of these individuals are afraid to send their children to school because of the fear that they will be recognized. However, many of them have remained in Canada for many years and have settled well. I would appreciate knowing whether special consideration will be given to these individuals when deciding whether they should be allowed to remain in Canada.

Does the minister have any plans to curb so-called immigration consultant sharks, as I call them, who charge as much as $5,000 promising someone permanent residence status in Canada and frequently disappointing that person when all is done or, I should say, not done.

Why is Canada not living up to the spirit of basket 3 of the Helsinki Final Act concerning human contacts? The act, which Canada signed, reads, and I quote:

—contacts and regular meetings on the basis of family ties, in order to promote the further development of contacts on the basis of family ties, the participating states favourably consider application for travel with the purpose of allowing persons to enter or leave their territory temporarily, and on a regular basis if desired, in order to visit members of their families.

In connection with this, when a family wishes to visit relatives in Canada for a period of three months I would like to ask the minister why the officials in our foreign posts insist on granting a visa for only one month or a shorter period of time. Is this not contravening the spirit of the Helsinki Final Act of which Canada is a signatory? The processing of seeking extensions of these visas wastes valuable time for the immigration officials, the member of Parliament involved and the sponsoring families.

I would appreciate an update on the minister's negotiations with the United States concerning the infamous "Buffalo shuffle" by which individuals wishing to apply for permanent residence in Canada through a Canadian post in the United States are unable to do so due to the fact that Canada will not guarantee their readmission to Canada and the United States government will not admit them unless they have such a guarantee.

My next question is with respect to the serious political and economic situation in Poland. Should a war break out in Poland—and we hope not—would visitors who are here from Poland be granted asylum in Canada? Would the minister allow such Polish citizens trapped in Canada to apply quickly for permanent residence from within Canada? In the same circumstances would the government attempt to process quickly any outstanding applications from Poland and allow an increased flow of immigration from that country?

I would appreciate an update on the minister's negotiations with the provinces. Which provinces have requested more immigration, and which provinces have requested less?

I would appreciate information on family reunification cases, from the Ukraine specifically. Many of the Ukrainian-Canadian groups in Toronto have approached me many times to state that very few cases are resolved from the Ukraine, and I would like specific statistics to deal with this question.

The 4(H) regulation of the act concerning immigration of members of the family class is another area of concern to many of my constituents. The regulations state that an individual alone in Canada who wishes to sponsor a relative but who has another relative who is also sponsorable cannot sponsor the relative wishing to be sponsored. For example, a person in Canada wishing to sponsor a younger brother cannot do so because an elderly grandfather is still living, despite the fact that the grandfather does not wish to be sponsored and has no wish to come to Canada. It would appear that this legislation, while on the one hand attempting to help in a compassionate way permanent residents in Canada who are alone, at the same time creates and promotes an artificial hardship. I would appreciate learning from the minister whether he has any plans to amend this legislation. If he does not, I suggest that the relevant paragraph in information booklets printed by the Department of Employment and Immigration be reworded to avoid confusion. Much of the wording as it now stands leads people astray, as in the case I have just cited. The family class sponsorship section of the booklet reads, and I quote:

Any relative, regardless of age or marital status, can be sponsored.

In reality this is not true. Would the minister consider amending legislation to allow co-sponsorship in cases where one individual in a family is not able to sponsor a relative alone but perhaps a brother and a sister are willing to do so?

The minister's answers to the above questions will be of great interest and assistance to all hon. members of this House, to my dear constituents of Parkdale-High Park and to all Canadians.

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, I thank the hon. member for his kind words. As Minister of Employment and Immigration I am not used to such compliments in such frequency. When they do come, I am particularly appreciative because of that infrequency. I compliment the hon. member in return by saying it is through the efforts of hon. members like himself who take such a strong and thoughtful interest in immigration that we are able to perform our functions.

I said in the House on Friday that the administration of the immigration law is very much made of human judgments. It cannot be bureaucratized. It cannot be regularized. It is something which requires an individual to make choices. Sometimes they are tough choices, and I want to thank the hon. member for the assistance he has provided me in many cases by bringing information and wisdom to many of the more difficult judgments we have had to make.

The hon. member has asked a number of very specific questions. I hope I will have time to respond fully to them. If I cannot give complete answers, I will make sure they are given to the hon. member in written form.

His first question dealt with illegal immigrants. This matter should really be looked at on a case-by-case basis. We obviously do not want to encourage large-scale illegal entry to Canada because it is unfair for those who apply legally and go through proper procedures. That is why we put some effort into enforcement.

At the same time, if an individual or family has been here for a long period of time, has settled into a community and demonstrated worth, I give the hon. member and other members the assurance that we would be prepared to consider such cases on their merits and to apply the standards of compassion and recognition to contribution to this country. We cannot make a blanket statement on that, for obvious reasons, but we are certainly prepared to look at individual cases as they come forward.

The question of immigration consultants has bothered me a great deal and I have referred it to the special task force on immigration regulations which I established two months ago. The task force has prepared a discussion paper outlining the legal regulatory questions related to immigration consultants who do sometimes prey upon immigrants. What I intend to do is release that discussion paper to provincial governments, immigration groups and ethnic groups for their comments and then bring about whatever changes are necessary to tighten up the system. I hope this discussion paper will be ready immediately after Christmas. I will ensure that the hon. member receives one, as will all members of Parliament.

On the question of visitors' visas I am concerned about the assertion of the hon. member that some people in his constituency have complained that they have been denied visitors' visas for the time period they requested. The general principle is that applications are considered carefully in our offices overseas, and whether visits be requested for three months or six months, if they are legitimate the applications should be considered in accordance with that time frame. I can only say to the hon. member for Parkdale-High Park, and perhaps to other hon. members opposite, that if there has been a tightening in certain immigration posts abroad, they should let me know and we will immediately telex and ask them about specific cases. I make the same offer to the hon. member for Mississauga.

As to the Buffalo shuffle, I do not like to use that word in the confines of the House, Mr. Chairman. It almost sounds like a new dance we are originating, and in fact it is almost a new dance. It really does mean there is a reciprocity between the United States and ourselves for people who may be in this country and do not want the total inconvenience of going back to a country far away to apply to come here. We are working out arrangements with the U.S. authorities. We have been negotiating an agreement with the U.S. authorities since July, I believe, and I can report to the House that the agreement is almost finalized and there will be reciprocity between the two governments in terms of exchanging those privileges. I want to indicate that that is not a general privilege; it is one that will be fairly well administered in terms of control in cases which really warrant it. In most instances we feel that people who want to land here, should follow the rules and go back to their place of origin, but where there are special circumstances we are prepared to make those arrangements with the U.S. authorities, and they are able to do likewise.

On the question of special measures for Poland, this is an area in which I feel a little reluctant to intervene because External Affairs is not my responsibility, nor necessarily my strong point. Perhaps I lack the diplomatic skills which are required for that post. However, I would say we would obviously be ready to respond to any immediate emergency, just as we responded two weeks ago to the severe problems in Italy when they experienced the earthquake. If there were a major problem—our past record shows how we responded to the problems in Czechoslovakia or Hungary—we would obviously be prepared to consider such arrangements. But, as the saying goes, let us not cross the bridge until we come to it, and I suppose it works in this case. I would only say that we are watching the situation in Poland very carefully, along with other organizations and countries, and we hope nothing serious will happen. If there were a major invasion or some other international crisis, we would obviously make our immigration services respond in a flexible and open manner.

As far as consultation with provinces is concerned, we are required by law, as the hon. member knows, to consult with each of the provinces before we establish immigration levels each year. We undertook a very extensive consultation the previous summer with them and most of the provinces reported to us that they were prepared to accept the existing immigration levels. In some cases, provinces indicated that they were prepared to take more immigrants, particularly the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta. In no case did we receive a request that the numbers be fewer. It was upon the basis of that consultation that we arrived at the proposal for continuing immigration levels at about the same level as last year but changing the composition of that level, as the hon. member knows, to provide for more people coming in under the family class and under the independent class.

With regard to the question related to regulation 4H, this is a matter which we will refer to the task force I mentioned. It has been charged with the examination of a large variety of regulatory decisions and procedures under the Immigration Act. I will refer the hon. member's request to them and ask for a report. In fact, I suggest to him, as I did to another hon. member earlier, that perhaps he would like to meet the members of the task force and explain his case more fully so they will have a better understanding of his point of view and can incorporate it into their findings.

With regard to the Helsinki agreement on the visiting of families, I go back to my point with regard to the visitors' visas. We will attempt to provide for the proper length of time as that provided in exchange. I know of the hon. member's great concern with difficulties in the Ukraine. We have to admit that there has been a serious falling off in the numbers coming in from the Ukraine. It is not owing to our action but rather to the fact that the Soviet Union is limiting the number of people they allow to leave, which is contrary to the Helsinki agreement. I had a meeting with the new ambassador, Ambassador Pearson, before he went to Moscow and I asked him to take up that matter with the Soviet authorities as soon as he arrives; I expect a report from him on the discussions he will hold.

Finally, on the issue of co-sponsorships, I think that the hon. member has raised a very important point. I will take it under consideration. I think it would require changes in the act which I am not all that anxious to make right away since we have enough problems. But it is a very useful suggestion and we will look at it. I thank the hon. member for his questions and comments.

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Chairman, my intervention will be relatively brief. I might say at the outset that it continues to be a disappointment—although I am pleased to see the Minister of State for Mines in the chamber at present—that the Minister of Employment and Immigration is left to his own devices this evening, as was the Minister of Transport last week. Of course, the exercise we are going through is a brand new one for most members in this chamber. For some of us it is a welcome return to what democracy is all about, a welcome return to what we lost some time ago when the House gave up any control over the spending by the executive. It takes us back to a point when there was real control by the House over the executive. What we may have right now is a bit of a sham, but it is pleasant to remember. In that context, I wish that other treasury bench members had exhibited sufficient concern, as does the Minister of State for Mines, the only other minister present in the House, for employment and approaches to employment in this country to have been here to personally monitor the debate.

I look up to the galleries and, apart from the minister's officials, I see none of the young whiz kids, the bright executive assistants. I do not see any of them. There is only one lone representative of the Canadian Press, a couple of constables and a handful of government supporters who are obviously sincere. They are here to support the minister. A number of our people are here because they are interested in employment and immigration problems. For example, I wish the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce were here and I wish the Minister of Labour were here. Or is this the night when he and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources get their walking papers and are given other responsibilities? Perhaps the minister might comment on that. Will there be a change, or can he bring an end to these rumours that have persisted over radio and other electronic press media in the last two or three hours? I wish these ministers were here because many of the questions which the Minister of Employment and Immigration has been answering last week and today have to do with the creation of job opportunities. Of course, that is not his responsibility. I should like to ask him about an Atlantic industrial strategy. What are we going to do in that respect? For example, is the minister aware of the extraordinary high unemployment levels among the blacks in Atlantic Canada? If the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre would move away from the minister's officials so that they might listen to me for a minute, or, instead, speak to the minister, who is not particularly concerned either, I would be grateful. I wish the minister would speak about a strategy for the Atlantic provinces where, as he must be aware, we are suffering from chronic—not unemployment, but underemployment. I am not sure that we can learn from the minister and I am not sure he is the proper man to ask, but I wish we could learn about an Atlantic strategy with respect to ridding us of this underemployment and unemployment difficulty which we continue to have. I wish the Minister of National Health and Welfare and the minister responsible for social matters were here so that I might ask them questions, but I will put my question to the Minister of Employment and Immigration because I am sure he is capable of answering it.

I am concerned about the drain on the national fund and also the reasons for it. What consideration has the government given in recent years to diverting moneys from the unemployment insurance fund into the area of identification and correction of learning disabilities? Concerned professional people have indicated that in this area the strain on the fund is enormous and that even a token transfer of funds to identification and correction at a very early age could save taxpayers enormous amounts of money. I have listened to the minister wax philosophically. Could he perhaps address himself to that question for a moment or two, and then I will have one or two others for him?

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, before answering the hon. member specifically, I should like to relate my own nostalgic memory about this exercise of estimates when I was a member of the provincial House. We went through this exercise on an annual basis and some 90 hours were devoted to the examination of the estimates of different ministerial departments. Of course, the only difference is that this time I am on the other side. If one had to make a choice in this exercise, I suppose one would find at certain times that it is more fun being in opposition than in government.

An hon. Member: Not as a long-term project.

Mr. Axworthy: That is right. However, it has certain short-term gains.

There is already an opportunity under the unemployment insurance fund to transfer money directly into training programs. It is our expectation that this year close to $200 million from the fund will be reallocated into training recipients rather than simply putting them on the dole or whatever one would want to call it. Since 1977 we have had the right to transfer funds, and the $200 million is being reallocated in a fairly successful way. We intend to look at it even further as part of the task force review which is presently under way. We will consider how to better allocate our resources into job training and employment funds on a longer-term basis. That is one reason we introduced the LEDA program—to see how we could use the funds for investment directly in communities. Perhaps the hon. member for Bow River will be interested in this because he asked how we could get small business back into business again. Through a concept like LEDA, we hope we can go into smaller communities like the ones which exist in the maritimes, for example, and provide start-up grants for small businesses to create longer-term jobs. It would be a way of establishing an economic development program as opposed to simply a job-creation program. This is one of the things we are trying out.

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Chairman, my question did not have anything to do with that at all. I will put it very directly. How much money has been diverted in the last three years to the identification and correction of learning disabilities in children?

Mr. Axworthy: I would have to get the precise amount which might have been allocated for that particular purpose. We do not have that information available now. I will find it for the hon. member.

M. Forrestall: I appreciate the minister's response. While he is at it, perhaps he would ask his officials for an opinion as to the dollars saved. If he does not mind, I would invite the minister to respond to that question in the form of a letter which, with his permission, I intend to distribute among the people in this country who are concerned about the identification and correction of learning disabilities and the dollar savings which can be achieved through the early and adequate addressing of this major problem, not only in Canada but in the entire world.

During the Clark administration, the then minister of immigration, Mr. Atkey, responded to requests from farm communities in central and eastern Canada respecting migrant farm labourers at the time of harvesting and what not. In response to repeated demands, the government of the day removed the existing quota and allowed migrant workers to come into the country. It seemed to work out fairly well. These workers came principally from the Caribbean and Mexico to meet the demands of our rural communities. While they were here, of course, they were required to make contributions to the Canada Pension Plan and other contributory funds. When they returned to their own countries, they were able to make application for the return of some of those contributions, because under normal circumstances there was no way they could put in the required number of years to qualify, and indeed they were not eligible to draw Canada Pension benefits because they were not Canadians. It would seem only natural that their contributions should be returned to them. The difficulty is twofold—first, because of the removal of the quota the numbers have increased considerably; second, the processing of applications is so slow and lengthy that very few migrant workers bother to seek the return of their contributions. As I understand it, according to the liaison officer for the Windward Islands, the process is lengthy and complex, and indeed, money is charged for the processing of these applications. I know this subject matter is under discussion at certain levels within the minister's department. Has the minister reached any conclusion with respect to it? If we are encouraging people to come into our country to perform menial, hard, back-breaking labour in our vineyards and harvesting other crops for our benefit, perhaps we should have the courtesy not to take money from them, particularly when they can never hope realistically to gain any advantage from their contributions. What is the minister's attitude with respect to this? Does he not believe that perhaps it is time to take a second look at this area, in the interests of continuing to attract migrant labour which we very desperately need on an annual basis? Should we not stop collecting contributions unless they continue to show up year in and year out, in which event there might be another status to consider?

Mr. Axworthy: I must confess to the hon. member that this is the first I have heard of that problem. A month or so ago I met with the ambassadors of the Caribbean countries to discuss a whole range of issues related to foreign agricultural workers coming into the country. They did not raise that issue with me. Perhaps it is a matter which falls more under the Department of National Revenue since it involves the collection of funds. Certainly I will take it under advisement. I will raise it with the Minister of Finance or the Minister of National Revenue. I intend to meet with the Caribbean ambassadors every three or four months. I will raise it with them at the next meeting to see if it is a major problem, and I will attempt to get back to the member on this issue.

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Chairman, I am somewhat appalled. I am not sure what question to ask the minister next. I would like to say to him very personally, as a long-time advocate of paying greater attention to the Caribbean and those island nations, that I welcome the minister's indication that he meets with them every three or four months and intends to continue doing that.

I would like to move to another area. I apologize to him if he has dealt with it already; if he has, he can refer me to his response. If he has not dealt with it I would like him to elaborate on it. As a very proud parent of four adopted children and one of my own, I would like to ask the minister why it is we continue to militate against parents—not mothers, but parents of either sex—who may have adopted a child. When a baby comes into your home it does not matter, whether it is four or five days old or whether it has been brought there in the normal process or not. It is still loved and requires attention. I am talking about maternity benefits. This is a matter which has been on the order paper, standing in my name, on and off for about 15 years. I wonder if the minister could say a word or two about it.

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, the matter of the relationship between adoptive parents and benefits under the Unemployment Insurance Act has been brought to my attention several times. I can tell the hon. member I became somewhat curious as to the evolution of the act and how it came to single out maternity benefits. It really had to do with the changes in the act over time so that the inclusion of maternity benefits was seen as a stoppage of work for hospitalization reasons, for health reasons, really for physical disability. It has since evolved to a much broader concept, one which I personally endorse, which is the idea of parental care. There should be a provision in the act recognizing parental care as a qualification for benefit. As part of the review of the Unemployment Insurance Act I have asked the commissioners to look specifically at the question of how the Unemployment Insurance Act relates to adoption. It will be part of the report we shall be releasing for discussion in the future.

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Chairman, do I have time for a brief question or two? I would like to return to my opening observations with respect to the programs the minister and his colleagues have in mind for the longer term. Can the minister tell us what is the long-term strategy for correcting underemployment and unemployment in Atlantic Canada, apart from the programs we heard mentioned ad nauseam on Friday and today?

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, I thought the member would end his remarks with an easy question. It would be less than forthcoming of me to say that at this point that work is being done in the government on the idea of a national industrial strategy which would have its own regional breakdowns. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce is the lead minister in developing that program. What we are attempting to do through our own work in the labour market is to determine what the employment-unemployment situation might be over a period of time. There have been some reasonably positive signs as trends are measured, that is, in the last year or two, that the unemployment rate in the maritimes has begun to fall. There is an increase in economic growth in certain parts of that region. There is obviously a great expectation that with new discoveries in the offshore areas in oil and gas and the prosperity of the fishing industry there will be an increased demand for workers.

Right now we are trying to develop training programs in the Atlantic provinces which are suitable for those new job requirements and the new supply requirements which we see forthcoming in the next four or five years. We have had some very serious discussions with manpower and labour ministers in the maritime provinces with respect to that. We shall be negotiating with the provincial ministers during the coming year as we renegotiate the occupational training legislation to ensure that as far as our own department is concerned we shall be in a position to work with them to put in place the right kinds of programs to meet those new demands. There is a real prospect for substantial changes in the maritimes in terms of increased employment growth. It could be one of the faster employment growth areas in the country.

Mr. Forrestall: I see my time is running out but I would like to ask the minister with respect to retraining whether there is a retraining program in Atlantic Canada in the petrochemical industry. The minister has a puzzled look on his face. I would like to suggest to him that his colleague, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Ressources, has told Canadians in Atlantic Canada on two separate occasions, that we have a snowball's chance in hell of getting a petrochemical industry in the Strait of Canso—it is going to Gros Cacouna. The minister of energy ducks these questions in the House, as does the minister responsible for regional economic development. He will deny that this was said and that was said. But members of the press have overheard the comments and they are not, in my view, fabricators or distortionists with respect to the truth. My question is: what is going to replace this last opportunity to use our provincial resources, for any practical purposes? I am talking about our ability to derive economic benefit from those resources by way of job opportunities and the possibility of developing a viable petrochemical industry for the offshore market, for the Third World—South America, Africa and Asia. We have lost that opportunity in Atlantic Canada, watching it slip through our fingers because of the overhwelming pressure of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, who has the guts to go ahead and do what he believes in doing, regardless of the effect it has on Atlantic Canada. But what is going to replace it? I let the minister demonstrate to me why I should have faith in the free due process. Let him tell me that he is training people to work in the petrochemical industry and then I will believe that the National Energy Board has the freedom to make a decision with respect to the location of the LNG terminal, the regasification terminal. Tell me that and I will believe it. But the minister cannot do that. What will we do? Are we to be hewers of wood for the rest of our lives? Ministers over there talk about great opportunities but it takes seven or eight years to put a pipeline in place and get oil and gas through it. Do they know what we are? We are watchers of a pipeline carrying our resources to Quebec and to central Canada. Do something that demonstrates concern about us. We hear about these ad hoc programs. They just drive us further into isolation.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order, please. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but unless he wishes to seek the unanimous consent of the committee I must interrupt him to tell him his time has expired.

Miss Jewett: I would like to ask the minister who is responsible for the status of women a few questions which I do not believe have been touched on yet today. One of my grave concerns, as the minister knows—and I hope it is one he shares—is the protection of the equal rights of women in the law, as well as before the law, in the government's constitutional proposals. Perhaps I should clarify that by saying that this lack of the protection of the equal rights of women in the constitutional proposals has been brought out very vividly by the National Action Committee on the Status of Women and by his own Advisory Council on the Status of Women. Tomorrow morning it will be brought out again. I do not know whether the minister has yet had time to see the brief submitted by the National Association of Women and the Law. It was also one of the main points in the brief given by the commissioner of the Canadian Human Rights Commission. Was the minister simply relying on what the Minister of Justice and the government's legal experts were saying about section 15 and section 1? Did he at any time this summer when the drafts were proposed take a look, as the minister responsible for the status of women, at the actual wording to see if it would in fact provide women and men equal rights within the law? Did he ask the advisory council for their opinion? As the minister knows they were preparing many papers for a conference which, unfortunately, could not be held in the first week of September, including a brilliant paper to which I have referred before by Professor Beverley Baines on women and the law and the constitution.

I was quite amazed when I asked one of the vice-presidents of the Advisory Council on the Status of Women, Madam Lucie Pépin, whether she, the president, or any members of the council had been asked by the minister if they were satisfied with the protection of the equality of women, and she said that they had not been consulted at all. This struck me as extraordinary considering that the Baines paper came out in August and the council was preparing for this conference and preparing a lot of papers with some very sharp criticisms of the government proposals as being totally inadequate, particularly with regard to the before-the-law clause, but on many other clauses as well.

I wonder why the minister did not consult with the advisory council. Perhaps it is more important now to know whether he has since read with some care their briefs and the briefs of others including the one I just mentioned by the National Association of Women and the Law? If the minister does see the strength of their arguments, will he pursue them with his colleagues in cabinet? In fact, it would be excellent if the minister himself would pursue the necessary amendments to the constitutional proposals because, as the human rights commissioner has said, they are gravely flawed, before the committee. Might he perhaps do that?

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, the resolution containing the charter of rights is presently being considered by a committee of this House. As I said earlier today, as a member of this House I look forward with interest to its deliberations and recommendations. The reason for the committee is, as the hon. member suggests, to receive representations from a wide variety of groups and organizations and to use its best judgment to extract what they think is proper, effective, useful and helpful from those representations. Obviously, it will not accept all of them because in many cases the recommendations are contradictory.

Miss Jewett: No, they are all the same.

Mr. Knowles: The women are united.

Mr. Axworthy: One reason why this committee of Parliament was established is to bring the judgment of our peers to bear upon that issue. The inclusion of the non-discriminatory rights in the charter was a major step forward for women in this country on the ground that it entrenches their rights. This has never occurred before and the history of our court cases and our jurisprudence shows that we have suffered from the lack of a clear, fundamental law which establishes basic rights against which other rights passed by statutes of this Parliament or by legislative assemblies would have to be judged.

The difficulty encountered in past court cases in which conflicting statutes are involved—for example, the Unemployment Insurance Act versus the Canadian Bill of Rights—is that the courts have clearly stated—and I would cite for the member's interest the judgment of Chief Justice Bora Laskin in Curr versus The Queen—that where there are two statutes passed by the same House the courts cannot judge which is of more merit, simply because they have both been passed by the same House with the same authority and the same mandate. In many of the cases which have worked against women's rights, it has been on these grounds. It was not because of a superior law or a fundamental law. The hon. member is disputing with the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court.

Miss Jewett: That is not a case concerning women. You have the wrong case.

Mr. Axworthy: I presume the hon. member can pit her knowledge against that of the chief justice, and that is her business.

Miss Jewett: You have the wrong case, Lloyd.

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, I do not have the wrong case. I have looked at this matter very carefully.

Miss Jewett: No, you haven't.

Mr. Axworthy: I know the hon. member is a fount of most wisdom in this country, but I think she recognizes that there are legitimate differences on the viewpoint and its interpretation.

Miss Jewett: Just facts.

Mr. Axworthy: Regardless, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Knowles: Can't you two professors get along better than this?

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, I am not attempting to argue, I am attempting to explain, and I thought that the hon. member wanted an explanation. That was one of the major problems in our courts of law. There was not a fundamental law which gave clear signals to the courts upon which they could make decisions. It is on those grounds that many of the cases were decided against the expansion of rights. The entrenchment of a charter takes a major step forward in providing that clear and abiding signal. That was not something that was analysed in the Baines paper, and while it was a brilliant paper in some respects, it ignored some facts in law.

In the second case, I would point out to the hon. member that the entrenchment of rights in the constitution would have the immediate effect of requiring the legislative assemblies and Parliament to go back and re-evaluate the various laws which are available to determine in what ways they contradict or run against the charter. So, without going to court at all, there is an immediate cleansing of the act, a certain catharsis of the law in terms of eliminating discriminatory clauses. This was discussed in cabinet and this is why the three-year time lag was imposed, so that this Parliament and the legislatures could review the laws in their statute books to determine what would have to be changed in accordance with the requirements to ensure equal rights for people, regardless of their background, age, sex or whatever.

The hon. member would have to admit that this is a major step forward. Even the wording of the act can be changed to strengthen it and it is certainly the intention of members of this government and this caucus to support such cases. That is the reason the committee was established and why it was mandated by this Parliament to use its judgment to see how the resolution and the charter could be improved upon.

The government, the Prime Minister, the Minister of Justice and I have all indicated this to organizations with which we have met. I have met with the advisory council and the national action committee, and perhaps more women's groups than the hon. member over the last two months, to discuss this matter and I indicated, that we are prepared to look at any proposed changes which would improve upon the law. But we do want to see the committee's considerations because I, for one, would not want to impose my judgment on that committee. It has a mandate from this Parliament which I respect, and I assume that it will follow through, listen to briefs put before it, then act and use its judgment accordingly. It is very important that we recognize and respect the due procedures of this House.

It would be wrong for the hon. member to try to create false confrontation where there is none because we have already indicated our interest in improving upon the charter and our interest in looking with favour upon the recommendations of the committee.

Miss Jewett: Mr. Chairman, the reason I was so conciliatory is because I am so concerned about this matter that I want the minister to give it serious attention. That is why I have been trying to talk about it in a non-confrontational way. The fact is, the minister has not read the briefs very carefully or, if he has, he has not understood them.

● (2130)

They are not contradictory. I am speaking now of the Human Rights Commission brief, the NAC brief and his own advisory council brief as well as the National Association of Women and the Law brief. All hone in on the same point so it is wrong to say that they are contradictory. They all point out very carefully that the matter is complex and that entrenchment of the same words will not do any good at all. The most recent brief points out that an examination of the two leading sex inequality cases, Lavell and Bliss, reveals that the decisions did not turn on a difference between a statutory and a constitutional standard for equality. It says that they are not at all confident that the Supreme Court will begin to interpret this clause, which is worded exactly the same as it is in the Canadian Bill of Rights, in a broader way simply because it is entrenched and that in their view these words are likely to receive exactly the same interpretation after entrenchment as before. That is the view of all of the constitutional experts who have helped these groups to prepare briefs. There is no contradiction whatsoever.

The Curr case that the minister mentioned is irrelevant. The Baines paper did discuss it very briefly because it is not relevant to the equality of women.

As to the three-year time period, Mr. Chairman, they have all said the same. The only part of the constitutional document that says this clause does not have to be enforced for three years will prevent a good deal of the inequality that now exists from being adjudicated. This is a very serious question. I am glad the minister has talked to these groups but I am sorry that he did not consult them ahead of time, particularly the advisory council. I think they would have been helpful in drawing up the constitutional proposals in a more reasonable fashion in the first place.

I am sorry that the minister has not taken up the cause more vigorously than he has to date. I would have thought that one way to do that would be to use his influence with the Minister of Justice and his department to ensure that the changes unanimously agreed upon will be made. I hope he will reconsider his rather laissez-faire attitude on a matter that I am sure concerns him as much as it does all the women for whom, in a way, he speaks as the minister responsible for women.

I have a few other questions that I should like to address to the minister, Mr. Chairman. As he knows, I have been very interested in the Outreach program particularly the Outreach program for women. I am having difficulty finding out what is happening with the program. I cannot even find out the total number of Outreach programs in existence or how many are designated as women's Outreach project. I cannot find out what the total budget is and what part of it is designated for women's Outreach projects. I am speaking now of the projects for the current fiscal year. I cannot find out what percentage increase will be forthcoming to ensure they keep pace with inflation. I have not yet heard what plans the minister has for the next fiscal year nor have any of the regional directors heard. Will they be cut back or will he be adding to them? Is he concerned or is he impressed with what they have done? I think he must be impressed.

There is a project in my constituency called "Aware" and at a meeting this summer in Vancouver which a board member attended the minister encouraged them to submit a proposal to him to expand Aware services from New Westminster to Port Coquitlam, Coquitlam, Maple Ridge and Surrey.

The minister made the request in June. In July, Aware sent a draft proposal outlining the suggested expansion. At the end of August they received a letter from the minister acknowledging the draft and stating that he would be in touch. The next word they got was to the effect that there was no money available. I wrote to the minister about this on October 16 and only today received a reply dated December 5 from the minister, stating that unfortunately the British Columbia and Yukon region and all other regional funds for the fiscal year 1980-81 are fully committed to existing projects. Yet they had got the impression that they had done so well that funds would be made available; that it would not be a matter of taking them out of the program for some other region. I wonder if the minister could answer these general questions about the women's Outreach programs and in particular why the Aware project in New Westminster was encouraged to develop and then, several months later, told that no funds were available?

Mr. Axworthy: On the matter of the Outreach programs, Mr. Chairman, the first step was to re-establish the financing commitment to the $9.7 million level so that we really put back about $1.3 million into the program.

Second, I asked the department to freeze applications for that money. At that point, close to 50 per cent or 60 per cent were going to native Outreach programs and I wanted to change the percentage to give more emphasis to women's projects. At the present time there are 19 projects dealing with the employment concerns of women across Canada, and about five or six more are under consideration. This was simply to catch up to the very low level of the previous year. We have encouraged the women counsellors in the regional offices to develop new projects and several are coming on stream. To the extent that they are valuable contributions and break new ground, we will consider them. The funding is pretty well exhausted this year because much of the total allocation has already been made but I believe some are left which are being allocated primarily to women's projects.

As for the specific Aware program she mentioned, I will check on the details and respond to the hon. member in writing.

The Chairman: The hon. member for New Westminster-Coquitlam has one minute left.

Miss Jewett: As I mentioned, Mr. Chairman, the minister's letter about the specific project in my constituency reached me only today so I would appreciate hearing from him about it.

May I return to a comment the minister made about the affirmative action program? There was a good deal of discussion earlier today about affirmative action in the public sector so I shall not go over that ground again.

The minister made a passing comment about encouraging affirmative action programs in the private sector. Someone said the government had $7 billion in contracts but I understand that the government has purchased $11 billion from private companies. If there were affirmative action programs in all those companies you would really get some fast action. I gather that the government is still operating on the voluntary system whereby companies may or may not start an affirmative action program. Several months ago the minister said this did not seem to be working very well. I think he said that in committee. He said he would seriously consider making it mandatory. He mentioned that it seems to be stronger in the United States. It certainly does.

The Chairman: I regret to interrupt the hon. member but she has already exceeded her time. She may continue with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Dion: Mr. Chairman, I am very happy to have this opportunity of speaking to a subject that concerns me greatly, as it does also my colleagues, and that is the job-creation policies of our government. On June 2, the Minister of Employment and Immigration announced his program to stimulate employment in the 1980s. At that time he announced a whole series of programs that would affect directly the unemployed Canadians and lay greater emphasis on those groups most severely affected by unemployment, namely, women, the native peoples and the young.

Mr. Chairman, the riding of Portneuf, which I represent here in the House, also feels the effects of the economic recession that is being experienced not only in Canada but also next door in the United States. The riding of Portneuf comprises 43 municipalities that are wholly rural, semi-rural and urban. Its economy is based mainly on agriculture which represents 40 per cent of its income. Farming is particularly successful in the north and northwest parts of Portneuf. In the south, economic development depends mostly on small and medium businesses, and that despite the fact that this is where are located two main industries in Portneuf, namely, Domtar at Donnacona and Ciment Québec at Saint-Basile.

In the area comprising the municipalities of Val-Bélair, Neufchatel, Shannon and Saint-Augustin, the main industries are the military base at Valcartier, Valcartier Industries, the National Defence Research Centre and the industrial park of Saint-Augustin which regroups the small and medium businesses located in the vicinity of Quebec City.

That indeed shows, Mr. Chairman, how vast the Portneuf riding is and how diversified its development has been. We therefore welcome the policies announced by the minister, and I myself am particularly interested in them. I want to thank and congratulate the minister for extending the youth employment programs and also for announcing and implementing the community development programs, which, obviously, have had a wide success in my area.

There is, however, one thing in my opinion, and in the opinion of all my colleagues no doubt, that should be improved upon and that is that the funds provided for these programs are insufficient and should be increased. In Portneuf, we have been allocated a total of $627,000 for these programs but, and I ask the minister to take note, we have received applications for over $3.5 million.

Since the inception of these programs, in the seventies, Portneuf has received some $7 million in federal grants and these have been put to good use. These federal government programs are very popular in my area. Also, in urban and semi-urban ridings which have 40-odd municipalities, like Portneuf, there are many non-profit organizations concerned with the development of their community, such as chambers of commerce, caisses populaires, social clubs, sports associations and all sorts of non-profit corporations. These groups always submit many well conceived projects, in accordance with the criteria set out in the program and satisfying a true need since they create jobs.

When they are financed, such projects bring about extraordinary results. I can name some which would never have happened without this program. I can mention the Marmite Falls in Rivière-à-Pierre, the Saint-Raymond ski resort, the Saint-Raymond Chamber of Commerce Information Centre, the Vieux Moulin Marcoux of Pont-Rouge, the nature centre in Saint-Basile and 90 per cent of all cross-country and nature trails of all municipalities in the Portneuf constituency.

Mr. Chairman, like all hon. members, I deplore the fact that the government of Quebec has refused to allow municipalities to sponsor projects. As the former mayor of a municipality such as Ville Saint-Raymond, which has developed enormously and introduced many projects in this area, I must say I am very disappointed at the attitude of the Quebec government and I hope the minister will exert all the pressures required so that municipalities can benefit from these programs even if this would mean deleting water and sewer systems, parks and so on from these programs. I believe that all the development that a municipality can enjoy would be very welcome within such programs.

On this same topic, I would like to call the attention of the hon. minister and all members of this House to another program which I believe will be ideal in developing a true policy of permanent employment development in constituencies such as mine. I sincerely believe that the Local Economic Development Assistance program, or LEDA, will become the most valuable of all programs introduced by the minister.

The purpose of the LEDA program is to help communities with rather slow growth and high unemployment. It will play an active role in creating permanent employment. This program, which will offer funds for analysis and development, will also provide limited financial assistance to businesses in the community and will be very useful in my constituency. In other words, LEDA is quite welcome in Portneuf. As a matter of fact, Mr. Chairman, an organization of my constituency has already filed an application for this agency which could be located in the southern part of the Portneuf constituency and would regroup about 15 municipalities. The organization which applied is very excited about that program, and I remain convinced that the hon. Minister of Employment and Immigration, in conjunction with the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, will consider favourably the application of the Chamber of Commerce of Donnacona-Cap-Santé which is very hopeful it will be accepted in order to have such an agency in their community. I am told that here we have at last a program which exactly meets the needs of the area. And to that I would add, Mr. Chairman, that I am very excited about that agency we could create there and which would be a great success, I am sure.

I must admit, Mr. Chairman, that I ask myself a few questions about the number of projects which will be accepted. People in the department informed me that once again, the applications will outnumber by far the projects which will be given the go ahead. Furthermore, I was told that the projects which are liable to be approved are those coming from areas with the highest unemployment rate. I would like to see the minister make an assesment or an in-depth study on all the applications he will receive, with the co-operation of his colleague, the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion and, if necessary, to increase that budget envelope since that program will be by far the most effective in helping the small and medium-sized businesses in our areas. We should invest in the LEDA program since it should be emphasized to create permanent employment in our areas. The creation of such an agency meets also the expectations of business leaders who constantly face the administrative burden of all the job creation programs offered by both the federal and provincial governments. I think such an agency would be a necessary tool for the economic recovery of our area.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, I would like to put two questions to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. First, considering the number of applications received for community development projects, I would like to know whether his department will increase the funds earmarked for that program. Second, considering the high unemployment rate in Quebec, I would ask the minister whether it is possible that all LEDA projects suggested by the organizations be approved. He could answer my questions afterwards, but in concluding I would like to congratulate the Minister of Employment and Immigration, his parliamentary secretary, the member for Louis-Hébert as well as all department staff who in my opinion are doing effective work.

[English]

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, I thank the hon. member for his kind remarks. I will make sure the parliamentary secretary hears of this. I know he likes to hear remarks like that. I will make my first job the transmission of the hon. member's comments to him. I would like to be able to say that we had more money to put into these projects. I agree with the hon. member. They provide a very important service.

Community development projects in terms of applications in relation to funds available are running four to one. Hon. members will recognize the tough job it is to make decisions on what must be cut out. I am attempting to persuade my colleagues in government that perhaps additional support will be necessary. If I can make a small unpaid political announcement, I am sure that any further representations by members on both sides to that extent would be of great help in making my case. Therefore, I very much appreciate the remarks of the hon. member.

On the LEDA program, I agree fully. It is one of the most important things we are trying out. If it works, it has the opportunity to create long-term jobs where there are not jobs now. That is the real trick to it and that it what we are trying. We want to move away from short-term annual job creation to something which will allow communities that have not had much hope to be able to do it on their own. They can use government to assist them in their own job creations, working with small businessmen and non-profit organizations in their own areas. That is the basic formula behind the LEDA program.

At this point all we are able to do is to try 15 or so projects across Canada. That is all the money available under this year's estimates. I can state the initial success in take up. We have already received approximately 40 applications for these projects, and more will be coming in. Again it will be seen that this is a very tough job.

The criteria are not exactly as it was stated by the officials. In fact, decisions will be made—I hesitate to say this because there will be some pressure—by the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion and myself. We will personally review each application to try to get a mixture of projects across Canada so that we have a variety of circumstances that we can judge. We will try to determine whether something can work in a small community as opposed to a downtown area of a city.

We will try to determine where the programs work most effectively. We want to try different kinds of cases and approaches to see how we can get a basis or formula for a more extensive program in the years ahead, if it works. If it proves to be successful, we will go forward with additional requests for more money. In the meantime, I hope the hon. member will continue to make speeches as he just did encouraging my colleagues to support us in adding further fuel to the fire.

Mr. Friesen: Mr. Chairman, I would like to talk to the minister about the immigration offices at Douglas and Pacific Highway. I have already given him notice. I hope he got the note so that he will have the file ready and be able to talk about it.

I hope the minister is aware that that office, which is a border crossing point on the Pacific coast, is the busiest west of Toronto. I hope, too, he is aware that the traffic at Douglas has increased many, many times over the past five to ten years. I suspect he is aware that the man-hours allocated to those offices have not increased at all in spite of the incredible increase in traffic. In other words, though the traffic has increased five or ten times in the past ten years with people coming across the border, the customs officers, who are the first line of defence at the border point, have not had their man-hours increased. I doubt whether the staffing of the immigration office at Douglas has been increased in the past five to ten years.

I begin by asking the minister some statistical questions. First, how many entrants per year have there been in the past five years at Douglas or Pacific Highway, or a combination of the two if he would like to combine those two offices? How many applications for sponsorships, permanent residence, whatever the classification may be, are being processed per year at Douglas? Is the minister aware that at Douglas there is now a three-month waiting period for an interview at that point? Will the minister answer those questions for me?

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, I would very much like to give an immediate response to the hon. member. I will ask my officials to check on the conditions at the Douglas port of entry which he raised and report to him as soon as we can. At the present time we just do not have the specific figures that he requested on the table. We will get them for him as soon as possible.

Mr. Friesen: If the minister does not have the exact figures, is he aware that the increase in volume is phenomenal at that border point? Will he concede that point? He nods his head and admits that he does.

I come to the second point I would like to make. I hope the minister is aware that in 1977 the immigration officers at all border points were classified as PM-1s. At that time, officers at Dorval and Toronto were reclassified as PM-2s. Their salaries were increased retroactively to October, 1976, over one year. I concede to the minister that traffic increased at Toronto and Dorval. The minister has already agreed it increased at Pacific Highway and Douglas and Vancouver international airport. I ask a simple question. If the officers at Dorval and Toronto warranted a pay increase retroactive for over a year, why was not the same done for those doing the same kind of work at Douglas and Vancouver international airport?

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, I am very much aware of that condition. The last time I was in the British Columbia region, I spoke with the director general of the region about that problem. All I can say to the hon. member is that we are looking at it. We hope to be able to rectify it within a short time. It is now going through the machinery. We will try to correct it, but we first have to do an assessment of the volumes and make the calculations based upon the actual numbers and present that to Treasury Board.

Mr. Friesen: That really is not good enough. I do not know if the minister is aware that a month or six weeks ago an officer was shot at Douglas. They have regularly to deal with dangerous people at that point. The danger level there is just as high and possibly more than at airports. They face those issues—problems and volume. As I have already indicated, they are three months behind in interviews at Douglas.

The minister talks about putting this through the machinery. It is my understanding that a task force was appointed in July, 1980, to look into this and to review the duties of PM-1s. Their survey is to be completed in April, 1982. I wish to ask the minister whether it will be April, 1982 before the task force will have its report for him.

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, the actual survey of the volumes going through the ports of entry on the west coast has now been completed. Those numbers are now being analysed and based upon that analysis we will make recommendations to the Treasury Board. There are a number of steps that have to be taken. I am sure the hon. member knows, as well as I do, the variety of steps through the Public Service Commission which must be properly and carefully followed so as not to make any mistakes. The first round of analysis has been done and we will be making those submissions.

Mr. Friesen: I would simply like to ask the minister why was it so much easier to go through the machinery for those immigration officers in Malton and at Dorval without having to wait so long? If you are going to promote on the basis of workload and responsibility, would it not have been right and fair to examine all of the offices across Canada and give all of the PM-1s a promotion to PM-2 based on the kind of workload they are faced with? Why was there a discrepancy in the first place?

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, the survey analyses of volumes at the ports of entry are done on a two-year cycle. The last survey done two years ago clearly demonstrated a substantial difference in the Malton and Dorval airports compared to those on the west coast and other ports of entry. The second cycle of survey analysis has been completed on a national basis. It is our expectation it will show the volume has substantially increased at the west coast ports of entry and based upon that analysis we will then make recommendations to Treasury Board to change the classification and the salary rankings of the officers working there. That is the reason there was a distinction. The other two posts were administered based upon the analysis done two years ago.

Mr. Friesen: If this is now based on volume, can I have the assurance the issue will be settled long before April, 1982?

Mr. Axworthy: Yes.

Mr. Friesen: It will be. When the minister stands up to answer, could he give me an indication of the target date when this is going to be settled and whether this is going to take care of all of the immigration officers at Douglas-Pacific, at the Vancouver international airport, at the various other immigration offices, the offices of the professional people downtown, as well as the new immigration office which is going to be in Surrey? In other words, is it going to be across-the-board to all the officers who are deserving?

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, it would be my hope to have that re-evaluation of all the ports of entry completed and the submissions made within a matter of three or four months and the results will be known then. I will make sure the member gets the results for the Douglas port of entry at that time.

Mr. Friesen: I take it, then, if you have the results in three or four months, that the new salary schedules could be operative within the next six or eight months, certainly before the end of 1981, and that would have been passed by Treasury Board at that time.

I should like to move to another question which apparently came up some hours ago when the minister, in answer to a question of another hon. member, referred to the Buffalo shuffle. My understanding of what he is saying is that somebody who is here on a visitor's visa, let us say relatives of Canadian citizens, can go down to Buffalo and be deemed to be residents in the United States, process their papers and come to Canada by that direction. Is that true or am I misunderstanding?

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, it is not a blanket exception. We would still expect the large proportion of those who apply to do so from their country of origin. Only in cases considered to be of national interest or where there is a very strict requirement would we work on an individual basis. It may be that because of illness or let us say, reasons of compassion, such an arrangement would be made. It would be monitored very carefully. The decision would be made at the national headquarters and there would not be blanket coverage. The normal procedures would still apply. That is the basis upon which we negotiated with the Americans.

Frankly, there was a tendency in the last two or three years to abuse that reciprocity agreement. That is why the Americans and ourselves ceased to use it for a period of time. I met with the American officials in Washington last spring to discuss the matter with them and with the assistant secretary of state responsible for visas. We thought there could be proper arrangements which would be very carefully controlled. My officials negotiated that kind of agreement and it is just being finalized. The actual terms of the agreement will be available to members of the House.

Mr. Friesen: Mr. Chairman, I want the minister to know I am not trying to promote that kind of a scheme. I believe in the policy under which intending immigrants apply from their own countries wherever possible. If that scheme is to be the policy of the department then surely it is not only Buffalo but also Seattle, for example, Fargo and all of these other cities. It is going to be a principle across northern United States.

Mr. Axworthy: A U.S.-Canadian agreement.

Mr. Friesen: A U.S.-Canadian agreement. Okay. I have another series of questions which are of great concern to me. As the minister knows, I have a lot of immigrants coming to my constituency. He may be curious to know that between the May and February elections the voters' list in my riding increased by 6,000 so there is a fair movement into my constituency. I spend a lot of time intervening on behalf of those who have applied for sponsorships under the various categories of the act. I am very concerned about the great disparity in the processing of applications. I have, at present, 20 active cases on file in my office and 14 of these have had serious problems in processing; not simply routine, but serious problems. Immigrants come to me wondering if there are scams taking place in the foreign offices. I would like to ask what kind of security arrangements are in place in immigration offices around the world? For example, when we worked on this act in 1976, I was on the committee which studied this particular legislation and I badgered the health officials from the department asking them for a provision which would allow for a second opinion in terms of health. It is all too easy for an applicant to become the victim of one person's judgment in another country. Immigrants have come to me suspecting the medical officer is "on the take." Can the minister give the House an indication of what security arrangements there are in immigration offices around the world to make sure that applicants are not victims of any kind of scam?

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, I tried to explain when we had the discussion on Friday; it is necessary to look at the changes in the act introduced in 1976 to understand why, in many respects, we are facing long delays. I think members of Parliament in their wisdom decided to put the major priority in our immigration law upon family reunification and set certain clear guidelines for what that reunification would involve, particularly in the opportunity to bring in relatives under the age of 21 as long as they were accompanied by a parent.

Those circumstances brought about an enormous requirement for the evaluation and checking of documentation. I think the hon. member would recognize that in countries where there are serious economic conditions of poverty, deprivation and suffering many people are anxious to get out. This is not the fault of the countries; it is just that there are serious problems. In these circumstances there is a tendency to use the immigration route as one very handy way of escaping from those tough conditions. The ability to test and evaluate documents becomes quite critical, because the act is quite clear that if you are under 21 you are allowed to come in, and if you are over 21 you are not. What this has really meant is that our officers abroad must spend an inordinate amount of time determining whether documents of proof of age are accurate, legitimate, proper and genuine. As a result, the system is slowed down in order that our officers may be assured that they are administering the act in a proper and legitimate way. Often this means going back and checking school records and voters list, looking at birth certificates and sometimes having to travel to small villages to try to determine sources, because that is the way the act reads.

At the same time there has been a substantial change in the composition of immigration. Close to 50 per cent of those coming into this country are now coming in the family class category, which again creates an increasing need for the checks I just mentioned. If there is any explanation for the long delays which are being encountered, it really is in some very real measure those major changes which were taking place under the act.

What I have done in the meantime, as I explained to the House before, is establish a task force to look at regulations, procedures and processing under the act. That task force is presently examining all aspects and is focussing on this issue of whether it is possible to speed up application processing.

As far as security is concerned, there are security officers available at posts, but I do not think that is the problem. I think this is part of the rumour mill. People become frustrated and try to explain their frustration by looking for a victim or a scapegoat. In large part the system is overloaded at this point; applications in some countries number 200,000.

Hon. members can imagine the difficulty. The system simply bogs down with those large numbers. In the meantime, in defence of officials of various governments, including this one, the previous one and ones previous to that, we have been following a policy of restraint, which means that we have been quite careful about applying new person-years to the immigration service. The numbers have not gone up as much as is necessary. I have asked for some additional person-years this year. I hope to be able to get them, but at the same time our offices in many cases are understaffed compared with the workload they face simply because of the continuing restraint policy. Sometimes we are hammered by hon. members opposite. We are told there are too many public officials. At the same time hon. members opposite want good service for their constituents. In this case good service requires additional personnel to make sure processing takes place in a more expeditious fashion.

Mr. Friesen: Mr. Chairman, I have heard explanations like that given by the minister many times, and I can understand the problem, particularly in Third World countries where there may be a paucity of records. However, the minister can also understand that if 50 per cent of immigrants come under the family class category and if there is some one who is 18 years old when he applies, it is easy for one official to victimize that person when he nears the 21-year-old bracket.

Of all of the applicants coming to me, people wanting me to help them bring relatives to Canada, the single most difficult constituent I have to help is a constituent who has relatives in the United Kingdom. I would like to ask the minister why it is so difficult for people in the United Kingdom to qualify to come into Canada.

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, I will ask my officials to get the exact number, but I can tell the hon. member that with the exception of the large number of Vietnamese refugees we have taken this year the largest source of immigration to Canada is still the United Kingdom. It has traditionally been that way, and it continues to be that way. My official has the number. I can give it directly to the hon. member just by way of example. The totals for the first six months of 1980 were as follows: 10,272 from Europe; 4,410 from the Middle East; 38,000 from Asia—that includes the large number of refugees who were coming in—and 8,625 from Great Britain. That is one country compared with all the European countries. The number of immigrants from the United States was 4,144; and 6,000 came from the Americas, that is, the entire Latin America-Caribbean region. The hon. member can see that Great Britain is the origin of by far the largest number of immigrants when compared with others.

Mr. Masters: Mr. Chairman, I would like to thank the minister for his sensitive assistance in the many special immigration cases which have occurred in my riding and which have required ministerial understanding. I say the same thing to the officials with whom I have come into contact. Because of the nature of the community and because it is an international port, Thunder Bay is a place where there are many immigration situations which require special study and understanding. This has always been received.

Tonight I would like to speak as a parent and a long-time observer of the Canadian scene. I would like to speak about one of the most challenging problems facing our nation today, the upgrading of our labour force. However, before looking at the present situation and what may lie ahead for Canadians, I believe it would be useful to have a historical perspective of training.

Technical and vocational education in Canada today is the product of evolution. Our early settlers learned by watching and practising, and during the nineteenth century such practical instruction became formalized as it was embodied in the school curriculum.

Federal government involvement in the field of education began with the proclamation of the Agricultural Aid Act in 1912 followed by the Agricultural Instruction Act in 1913. There have been various federal acts and agreements made under their authority since then except for the period 1929 through to 1937.

The federal government has played an increasingly important role in this field, particularly since the passing of the Technical Education Act of 1919 which clearly defined the responsibilities of the provinces and the federal government and stipulated that the federal government would share up to 50 per cent of the provincial expenditures for technical education. The federal involvement was justified on the basis of the need of an industrial nation for an adequate supply of skilled workers, provision of equality of education opportunity and the high cost to local and provincial authorities of providing adequate training programs and facilities.

It is interesting to note that in 1919 the federal government's contribution to technical education was $700,000 compared with its contribution of $800 million to adult occupational training in 1980-81.

The Adult Occupational Training Act of 1967 marked a significant new departure for Canada. It clearly separated the occupational training of adults from the education of the young. The then newly-established department of manpower and immigration was given responsibility for implementing the provisions of the act through the Canada Manpower Training Program. This act allowed the federal government to purchase training services from the provinces and private schools on behalf of its adult workers and to enter into contracts with employers. A striking feature of the act was its linking of occupational training for adults with the needs and opportunities of the labour market. The federal and provincial governments co-operate to determine training needs and develop training plans. Budget and guidelines are set nationally but focus on local needs and conditions.

In 1972 the act was amended significantly to increase its flexibility. The program was made available to more adults, some of the restrictions on the provision of industrial training were lifted and certain sections which were no longer relevant were repealed.

While it is very easy to sit back and criticize the training carried out under the act, the fact of the matter is that there are hundreds of thousands of Canadians who have benefited from the program. Without it many of them would not have had the opportunity to learn skills or to improve their skills.

● (2220)

As in any program, there is always room for improvement. At the present time, two task forces are studying it, and their recommendations may have a great influence on the future direction of training in Canada. They are the parliamentary task force on critical skills for the eighties, headed by the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce (Mr. Allmand), and a high level task force reporting to the chairman of Employment and Immigration Canada, which will work to develop a comprehensive employment strategy for the eighties. As a result of these studies, there will, no doubt, be proposals made to increase the effectiveness of the training program.

For many years I have had an interest in the way in which young Canadians are prepared for their careers. That interest has increased since I became a member of Parliament and have had the opportunity to discuss with other hon. members the relationship between education and employment across the country.

It is my opinion, and I am sure that many other hon. members will agree, that we have not always been doing a good job of preparing students for the labour market. Not only have we failed in many instances to give students the technical skills that the jobs of the future will require, we have also failed to provide them with an elementary understanding of the world of work and the ways in which working life is different from the lives they have so far known—family life and school life. We have not told students about the jobs of the future and we have not found ways to give them the hands-on experience that will reveal their strengths and weaknesses, their likes and dislikes, and what in general they can expect of work.

Too many students are making decisions about their education and the career they hope to pursue without adequate information and without much thought. Too many students are graduating without any thought to the labour market and the places in that market where they may find a niche. I have heard estimates that one-third of our graduating students cannot say what occupations they would like to follow. I suspect that there is another third of our graduating students who, although they can say what jobs they would like, have only the most elementary knowledge of the world of work.

A lot could be said on this subject about the needs of students and the problems which so far have hindered our attempts to prepare them for the working world. There is a big job to be done and those who tackle it—employers, educators, governments and students—deserve every support and encouragement.

The experts tell us that the next decade will be marked by considerable industrial and labour market adjustment, and shifts away from traditional approaches to training will be inevitable. New initiatives and innovative methods, responding quickly to local and regional needs, will have to dominate future training systems. Obviously, everything cannot happen at once. But where we can, we must move quickly to bring about meaningful changes to existing situations.

Now I would like to speak about another subject, if I may, Mr. Chairman. When Parliament opened in April, the priorities and directions of the new administration were stated in the Speech from the Throne. You will recall that the throne speech acknowledged that Canada, like other countries throughout the world, faces difficult economic times. Canadians recognize that the state cannot possibly meet every demand or satisfy every group. But the throne speech laid down a very important principle as a touchstone for this government's policies. We are committed to helping first those who need help most.

The intention is to build upon Canada's comprehensive social security system which was put into place during the 1960s and 1970s. Over that period, the federal government's social policy was aimed at providing Canadians with virtually cradle-to-grave security against extreme deprivation caused by age, illness or loss of employment. Many of the programs that were introduced or improved had broad terms of eligibility and were therefore very expensive. Indeed, these programs accounted for a very large part of the increase in the government share of gross national expenditure between 1966 and 1976, when that share rose from 30.9 per cent to 40.2 per cent. We have now reached a period when we must target scarce resources on special needs groups.

Last June, the Minister of Employment and Immigration introduced a $137 million package of employment measures and made a major step by targetting—that is, by reaching out directly to those who traditionally receive little or no benefit from the economic growth of the country. The new job-creation programs and training initiatives introduced by the minister focus on the needs of natives, women, young people and other groups facing special difficulties in finding and retaining jobs. In addition, extra jobs are being provided in areas of high unemployment. In short, a fundamental pillar of our employment policy is to bring these disadvantaged people into the community of employment opportunities.

That term "disadvantaged" means people who, because of artificial social barriers, ranging from administrative hangups to downright discrimination, are prevented from realizing their full potential in the labour market. This group includes women, who make up 51 per cent of the population and 39 per cent of the labour force. It includes native people whose numbers are growing quickly in relation to the total work force. It includes the handicapped who face not only the challenge of overcoming their disability, but must also contend with the invisible barriers of prejudice and ignorance that bar their entry into the labour force.

Our commitment is to break the back of the problem—to bring these people back into the economic mainstream. Obviously, the new employment measures are not the entire solution to the problems faced by people with special needs, but they are a beginning—and a good beginning. They build on already established programs offered by the Canada Employment and Immigration Commission to help these people achieve their full potential.

For example, under the Canada manpower industrial training program, 85 per cent of salary can be paid for special needs clients, and as a means of stimulating the employment of women in jobs traditionally reserved for men we subsidize 75 per cent of the cost of job training for women in some of these lines of work.

The local employment assistance program, LEAP, is a particularly important program. Its principal advantage is that it allows for the creation of ongoing businesses which will provide jobs for the chronically unemployed or for the establishment of projects which will develop job skills for the chronically unemployed to help them integrate into the regular labour market.

LEAP projects have already created many jobs for disabled Canadians. Perhaps the most interesting program for helping people with special needs to find and keep jobs is Outreach. Outreach projects serve people who are not able to make effective use of the regular services offered by Canada employment centres. By way of illustration, in 1979-80 an estimated 9,500 physically and mentally disabled persons across Canada received specialized services through the program.

This government has also made some progress in asserting the principle of affirmative action in the public service and in job-creation programs by resetting the dials to encourage the hiring of a greater proportion of people who experience particular difficulties in finding suitable employment. We are also looking at the possibility of making the adoption of affirmative action principles a condition for large contractors who want to do business with the Government of Canada. These are the kinds of actions which make for more efficient use of human resources. The idea is to enable these people to make an important contribution they are not allowed to make today.

It is clear that the federal government must give leadership and introduce vigorous programs to ensure that individuals with special employment problems are not frustrated in their yearning to participate fully in the economic life of Canada. Much remains to be done, but we already have taken many important steps toward our goal of ensuring that all Canadians enjoy rising levels of income.

Before I conclude my remarks, I would like to refer to the statement made by the Minister of Employment and Immigration when he announced his new employment measures in the House of Commons on June 2. He indicated at that time that he proposed to bring in another program offering incentives so that persons with severe employment problems might be employed in the private sector. I would like to take this opportunity to ask the minister when the government intends to announce the new program.

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, I would like to thank the hon. member for his very fine words. He illustrates a point which has been made several times in the discussion of these estimates. There must be a very strong and very forceful sense of leadership from the national government to meet our employment training programs. We must develop a national employment strategy which covers the country from one end to the other and ensures equal access and opportunity for all Canadians. I feel this point must be underlined time and time again in demonstrating the direction in which we must go in the next four or five years. We cannot afford to let our programs become fragmented or our approaches divided simply along provincial and regional lines. There must be a national approach to programs. Therefore, it is very important to support the programs put forward in the budget and the national energy program which would give us the resources to meet those demands.

As far as the question concerning an additional program to provide incentives for the private sector to hire disadvantaged workers is concerned, we have been working on that program for three or four months, culminating in the examination we have made of the industrial adjustment programs which must be brought in to respond to the issues of declining industries and declining communities. We have taken some time because we wanted to ensure that we consulted adequately with the different groups involved.

In this case I want to pay particular tribute to the work of the parliamentary committee on the disabled which is chaired by the hon. member for Don Valley East. I have now had two or three meetings with that committee which is comprised of members from both sides of the House. They have provided me with very valuable information concerning the employment problems experienced by those who are handicapped in Canada. Not only have they provided me with their experience, they have some very forceful and specific recommendations. We really wanted to wait until we had the ability to gather the information and ideas developed by that task force.

I met with them approximately ten days ago. We will be incorporating much of the findings and proposals of that parliamentary task force into our own work. Now that we have those findings, we will be able to present to cabinet submissions for an employment program dealing with the needs of the disadvantaged. If we are lucky and able to get proper scheduling on the cabinet timetable, I hope to be able to make some announcement of those programs either just before Christmas or certainly within two or three weeks after. We wanted to wait to make sure we had the full information.

The program has not yet been fully decided by cabinet, so I cannot outline the details. But it will follow the basic principle of providing incentives to private employers to hire those with work disadvantages. We hope it will provide us with a certain approach which could be used in the development of a more broad-based employment strategy in the years ahead.

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Chairman, I should like to convey to the minister that his immigration office in Mississauga is first class and that Jack McMillan, the key officer in charge, has the sensitivity and ability to do good work for Canada and has been doing so. The minister knows that I have a great number of immigration problems in my growing city, and I should like to ask him a number of questions with respect to them.

My first problem is the feeling of people that their member of Parliament can somehow work miracles for them, that the Immigration Act is not a question of one's status but who one knows and what strings one can pull. Unfortunately this spring the minister was involved in the case of Giuseppe Calamusa. I am not questioning the minister's honesty in this. I am looking at the compassionate grounds on which he managed to work things out for Mr. Calamusa and his family.

The minister will appreciate that the rest of us are members of Parliament and unfortunately not ministers of immigration. Therefore, we cannot do the wonderful things that were done for this particular person. Also he will appreciate that as members of Parliament we have people with immigration problems that are perhaps much more serious and at least as deserving, certainly in the eyes of the applicant, as those of Mr. Calamusa. When the minister bent over backwards and managed to exercise his discretion in favour of a family which, on any reasonable interpretation of the act, should have had their deportation confirmed, he leaves us as members faced with the position that the law is one way for some and not for others in the eyes of people with immigration problems.

I was wondering if the minister could tell us—and I hope he does not use all my time—what he can do to provide some sense of rule and regulation in this act so that we can firmly tell constituents that if they fall within the terms of the purview of the minister something can be done, and if not, they cannot expect any miracles to happen on their behalf just because they happen to know someone. I bring this seriously to the minister's attention because it is a problem faced by members on both sides of the House.

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, I find it a little unusual that the hon. member would raise one case because I see around me seven, eight or nine members of the House who in the last month or so have brought cases to me for adjudication, where they wanted some settlement based upon reasons of compassion or whatever. I could not give the exact number, but a fair number have been adjudicated thusly. So, it would be wrong to say that there has been only one miracle; there are no miracles, but judgments are applied.

The hon. member himself has made representations on behalf of some of his constituents. We have looked at them carefully and in some cases have said that if there are reasons and grounds for compassion, we would issue ministerial permits. In order to provide the member with some indication of what is involved, in 1979 before I became minister, close to 16,000 ministerial permits were given. I am pleased to report that the number this year will be substantially less. I do not want to make a direct correlation, but I suggest that perhaps we are not quite as loose with ministerial permits as the department was under my predecessor who was a member of the Conservative government. But I will not make that comparison; I will not say that that is why there were so many permits.

The particular case the member cited was not in itself unique. A number of similar cases are being judged all the time. It is just that that one had a highly emotive quality and I would suggest some political quality to it as well, caused by some of his friends and colleagues. As I have said before, I do not pretend to be infallible. Sometime we will make mistakes in judgment. If I err, I try to err with some degree of compassion, and I think I have tried to treat some members and their cases in that way.

I, too, have become concerned about the area of discretion. One of the first questions I asked when I became minister was whether there was any jurisprudence upon ministerial discretion, whether there was any precedent which I could use. Nothing had been codified, no one had sat down and said, "Here is the precedent which might be used to guide your decision". That is one of the reasons I set up the special task force—to develop some advice and recommendation on the area and orbit of ministerial discretion which we might use, that I would use to guide my actions.

Mr. Blenkarn: I thank the minister for that answer.

The second problem I face concerns the number of people who come from, or who have relatives in, pretty disorganized parts of the world. I refer to Guyana, Indonesia, Ireland and Iran. I remind the minister of a letter I received from him on December 1 with respect to Iran. The minister said in his letter that he did not think the Armenian people in Iran were being prejudiced against or were really true refugees. He went on to say:

> In the new Iranian constitution, for example, Armenians along with other religious minorities have been guaranteed certain fundamental rights by the government of Iran.

The minister knows that those same fundamental rights are granted to people in Indonesia. They were certainly granted to people in Vietnam. They are certainly granted in Guyana and I am sure they are granted in Soviet Russia. Is the fact that written constitutions in countries like Iran guarantee religious minorities fundamental rights sufficient to make them non-refugees because of the nature of their constitutions?

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, I would like to answer the hon. member by pointing out that under our Immigration Act the definition of a refugee is taken from the United Nations Commission of Refugees, which says that in order to be a refugee one must be under threat of political persecution. We interpret that definition as broadly as we can. Anyone who feels directly threatened or in some danger within the regime of his or her own country can go to any one of our offices and apply for refugee status. They would have their application considered on those grounds, or on their merits. There may be cases of Armenians in Iran but our evidence thus far has not demonstrated they are a class or group that is being persecuted generally. I am certainly prepared to accept further evidence from the hon. member. They certainly have the right to make application as refugees. The difficulty presently in Iran is that we do not have an embassy, for reasons of which the hon. member is fully aware. This makes it far more difficult and I apologize for that. If there is something the hon. member would like to bring to my attention which would shed more light on this, I would be glad to consider it.

Mr. Blenkarn: I have also written to the minister in connection with our offices in other parts of the world. I find that our offices in New Delhi and Port of Spain are particularly difficult. The minister is aware of a number of cases I have had in which spouses of Canadian citizens have had to wait for more than a year and a half for their spouse to be able to enter Canada under the family class. That strikes me as unconscionable and ridiculous. I was wondering what the minister can do with respect to spousal applications for family or reunification in the offices of New Delhi and Port of Spain. The delays are interminable. It is not sufficient to say that there is not the staff there. Surely to goodness different classes of family applications can be considered in a better priority. Surely when a man is separated from his wife by the artificiality of an immigration law he should not have to wait nine months to a year and a half to finally get someone to look at the medical histories and approve that application. Will the minister tell me what he can do about that?

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, while the act has not set any priorities between the class of relatives, it would be brought under the family class. As a matter of policy we try to give priority to spouses. There are often real delays, particularly in the two offices the member mentioned, New Delhi and Port of Spain. As I told the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock there are some reasons to explain this. There is the enormous backlog in applications. We must do very serious checking in those areas just to clarify documents. But we do have this task force which is looking at these procedures and trying to streamline them to see if there are ways of providing for some shading to give preference to those who have spouses. I expect to have that report very soon.

Mr. Blenkarn: The member for Surrey-White Rock brought up the problem with respect to immigration from the United Kingdom. As the minister knows, the type of family application there is essentially assisted-relative applications as opposed to family class applications. We have a number of situations where people could very easily adapt in Canada but are nevertheless refused entry. I could give the minister chapter and verse on a number of applications but I do not think it would be fair at this point to mention their names in this House. Young people with technical skills, mechanics, electrical technicians and so on have been told in our U.K. offices that there is no job for them here. Clearly their families and family businesses here could put them to work right away. It strikes me as improper that these people should be kept out of Canada when they would fit into the country very well. They have an education standard at least as high as the average Canadian. They have families with businesses here where they could be immediately employed. Is there no difference in criteria for applicants from the United Kingdom, a nation of people who can easily adapt to Canada, or from Ireland, where there is a great deal of religious tension, a country whose people could easily adapt to Canadian life? For years our traditional flow of immigrants has come from these countries. At one time people were entitled, as an absolute right, to come to this country if they were British. Is there any reason why these people should not be given preference over people coming from other countries where their customs and language are not ours?

Mr. Axworthy: The immigration law does not recognize a special preference to any one country. The law is written by Parliament to apply certain standards, either for family, compassionate, humanitarian or economic reasons. The difficulty we often experience is that those who are coming from the United Kingdom often times make applications for cousins or more distant relatives. I know that is why the hon. member receives complaints. In those cases they must apply under the assisted-relative class. They must show some harmony with the labour market requirements and they must show job authorizations. We cannot and will not impose any special category to say that country of origin is important. The same standard must apply equally to everybody. I can understand the frustration in those cases and why some people do not understand it. But that is the way the law was written. I think it represented the wish of Parliament and of Canadians that we do not have a discriminatory immigration policy but one which is simply based upon criteria of what is required in our own labour markets, what is required to unify families and what is required to make judgments on humanitarian grounds. Those are the only criteria we can use.

Mr. Blenkarn: With respect to the task force the minister spoke of, will he add to it the obligation that they look at whether we should not also impose the criterion that the person have the ability to fit into our socioeconomic system in Canada? Should they not look at whether the applicant's cultural background and so on is similar to our culture, and that his language is similar to ours? Will the minister have the task force examine those as further criteria in determining the suitability of immigrants?

Mr. Axworthy: That really is not the mandate of the task force. I have instructed them to look at questions of regulations and procedures within the process of the act. If there were to be major amendments to the act—and that would require a major amendment—it would be something which should go through Parliament and be considered by parliamentarians, not necessarily by outside consultants who are simply working to streamline the procedures.

I do not think this is the initiative which should be taken. The present Immigration Act has been in operation for a little less than two years and there is still much to learn about it. There may be a time when changes will be required, but I do not think that we should get into judging suitability. Obviously there is some judgment made by our officers abroad with regard to individual applications. There are in the act certain provisions which prevent undesirables, for example, people who have bad records, from coming into the country, and further restrictions on medical grounds. But if we start trying to determine who fits our country, we get into a very dicey area and one which I am sure we would not want to impose upon the officials abroad. I am most comfortable, as a Liberal, with the way the act is currently constructed.

Mr. Blenkarn: From time to time people in my riding who are clearly illegal immigrants into Canada come to see me. I also know that a person can get off the airplane at Toronto international airport and, if they look right, they will probably have no difficulty with the minister's staff, particularly if it appears they are coming here for a holiday and have lots of money to pay their hotel bills and so on.

When I go to Australia I am required, even as a member of Parliament and of this House, to get a visa. Why do we not have a visa system, aside from our obvious interaction with the United States. If I go to Mexico, or many other countries, I need a visa, but people who come from a great number of places around the world do not need visas when they come to Canada. Would that system not assist the minister in controlling illegal immigration? I say this to the minister because I happen to know a number of people in my constituency who are illegal immigrants. Some of them run businesses and own property, and I would not be surprised if they vote in federal elections.

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, I am tempted to ask what party they vote for, but I already know the answer. There are presently some 80 countries from which we require visas. Any addition to that number is a matter of government policy and must be considered by cabinet each time. If the hon. member has information to suggest that some country is beginning to flood us with illegal immigrants, then we would have to take a look at imposing visa regulations. For example, we recently put visa regulations on Haiti in order to stem the flow of a large number of illegal immigrants from that country into Canada. We take a case by case approach and we are certainly prepared to receive any information which the hon. member might have.

Mr. Blenkarn: Is there any way the minister can speed up some of the answers to queries I have made of his office? The minister's staff is pretty good sometimes, but a number of situations have arisen where I have had to make a number of representations and phone calls to the minister's office. I looked at one letter tonight with respect to Anna Seawack, a young lady who came here from Poland. The family who brought her over wanted their child to learn Polish and Anna Seawack, a first cousin, was chosen. These people wanted to be very legal about the matter so they went to the employment office where they were told that a work permit was required because she was working as a babysitter or domestic.

The minister's office said that Anna Seawack would have to go to Detroit and do a Detroit shuffle rather than a Buffalo shuffle. Anna Seawack was a bank clerk in Poland so she could not possibly do anything like babysitting in Canada and certainly could not teach Polish to a young child because after all she was a bank clerk and—

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Would the hon. member like to finish his point because his allotted time has expired.

Mr. Blenkarn: Would the minister tell me why we must go through this red tape?

Mr. Hawkes: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, I wonder if I might have the unanimous consent of the committee to split the next round of the official opposition between the hon. member for Waterloo and the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka?

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: The hon. member suggests that on the next occasion when a Conservative member would speak, two members would speak for ten minutes each instead. Obviously, there would be no difference in the total time consumed. Is there agreement?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Parent: Mr. Chairman, I have a few points with regard to the refugee problem which I want to put on the record. I preface my remarks by saying that we in the Niagara Peninsula are very well served by the immigration officers there. I centre out the director in charge of Niagara Falls, Mr. Don Bandy, and one of his field workers, Mr. Carl Nauman, with whom we have been working for a number of years.

That being said, I take great exception to the former speaker's remarks in the sense that he would have a very preferred list of people who could come into this country. This is not the way in which the country was built or the way in which it came together. The criteria in place now for the admission of immigrants to the country is fair. It can be improved on in some ways but, by and large, it allows the greatest number of people the greatest chance to come to Canada and take part in our great country.

Last summer I visited Hong Kong. While there, I visited the refugee camps. In so doing, I obtained a first-hand view of the conditions in those camps. I had a chance to speak with the officers who were in place, and they informed me that the conditions from which these people came in Vietnam were virtually too abhorrent to describe and beyond anything we could imagine. As for the conditions in the camps for the people who were scheduled to come to Canada, the camps were well run, clean and the people were well taken care of.

One might wonder why I bring this matter up. It is because I want to make a comparison between the conditions from which these people have come and the conditions of the surrounding area. These refugees have difficulty learning our language and adapting to our way of life, but if we were only to admit people who were exactly like ourselves, it would take away a great deal from the flavour and fibre which makes this country strong. It is for that reason that I encourage the minister to admit the number of refugees scheduled to come to Canada from Vietnam and southeast Asia.

By sharing what we have, Canada can show other countries that it is willing to open its doors and its heart to people who are less fortunate. There are those who would say that these men and women will take jobs from Canadians. The minister must consider that many of these people are willing to perform menial tasks which are not currently accepted by many of the workers in the country. I am not criticizing the general worker in Canada. I am saying that these people will do virtually any job because it is a chance for freedom. For us it is a chance to better ourselves and have the better things in life, but for them it is a case of life and death—no more or no less. It is for that reasons that these people who have taken a place in our society are welcomed citizens because they will help build this country in the years to come.

Some years ago a study was made of immigrants on the welfare and unemployment roles. It was found, in 1977, that .07 per cent of immigrants admitted to the country in the five years previous were on welfare—and not for the average length of time. In that respect they have taken their place as worth-while citizens.

I wonder if the minister could address himself specifically to the area of refugees who have come to this country or those it is proposed to admit. Maybe he could tell us if they have adapted and if they are contributing to the well-being of all people in the country.

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, I should like to begin by recounting to members of the House an experience I had today when I met the Chong family representing the sixty thousandth refugees brought to Canada under the special program. They are two brothers and their wives and each family has three children. They were on their way to Goderich, Ontario. The sponsoring family, from the Roman Catholic Church in that area, thought they would bring them here to symbolize the quite amazing partnership that has taken place in this country in the last two years.

I should like to pay tribute in part, to my predecessors, Mr. Atkey and the hon. member for Sarnia who in this portfolio were very much responsible for putting the program together. I certainly would not want to take the credit for it because it was through them that the special refugee program was initiated. We are now simply able to complete it.

This was one of those moments that one remembers. As politicians we take a lot of harassment and abuse but this was one of the moments that makes public life worth while when one realizes that through some action of oneself and one's colleagues, something very important has been done for another human being. The kind of appreciation and gratitude expressed by the Chong family at being in Canada and also by the sponsoring family for the opportunity to share in the experience of helping these families to come and settle here, is something that I shall never forget. Members of this house who have had similar experiences in their ridings will realize how very important and remarkable the refugee movement has been in the last two years.

But the problem is not over, Mr. Chairman. Now that 60,000 people have arrived we are not stopping there; another 16,000 refugees will arrive in the years to come because the problems of refugees in the world are so immense. A very great effort has to be made by Canadians to make sure that they are settled in this country with care and sensitivity. These people have different languages, different customs and will require special consideration, training in languages, and must be found jobs and places to live.

It is for those reasons that the immigration paper presented to Parliament last October stated that the emphasis of this government in the next year or two will be on the establishment of major resettlement programs. We have been working quite closely with the voluntary sector and we give direct grants to community organizations under the immigration settlements assistance program so that they can provide counselling and orientation to help people settle in the community. The program will be extended and we plan to have immigration offices available across Canada to help in this resettlement program. We are also working with the provinces to make sure that schooling and other services are provided. As a government, we intend to concentrate on our responsibility to make sure that people settle into the country.

I am a little fearful that we might simply bring people over, that the headlines would appear, and then they would be forgotten. We cannot forget, Mr. Chairman. We must work very hard at this. We will be able to rely upon that same degree of volunteerism and private participation, I hope, that enabled us to bring people over and to help them settle with a degree of grace, dignity and self-support.

I would urge those members who know of sponsoring families in their constituencies to use their good offices to ensure that this commitment and contribution continues. In some cases, we are into the much more difficult phase of ensuring that these people have a chance to become good Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Darling: Mr. Chairman, I have listened with interest to the many questions from all sides of the House and am pleased to put a few myself. I should like to thank the minister for the co-operation I have received from his departmental officials. I do not always agree with their decisions, perhaps, but I appreciate their efforts.

There are two questions that I should like to put to the minister. Under the manpower training program, funds are provided for tuition in various vocations, trades and services and an allowance is made for people taking training. On the weekend it was brought to my attention that a particular service in which I have a peculiar interest, as I was a real estate broker for many years, is not covered. Real estate salesmen are not eligible under this program and I promised to try to find out why this is.

Anyone who wants to take this particular course in Parry Sound-Muskoka, some 100 miles north of Toronto, must go to Toronto and spend $300 or $400 for it as well as incur accommodation expenses. Five-week courses are to be offered by the community colleges early in the coming year. I wonder why these courses are not included in the program.

When I received my sales licence, I read the book through and then wrote an examination and that is about all there was to it. It is a lot more complicated now. The process of becoming a real estate broker is long and drawn out and I can only say thank the Lord I do not have to write the examination now. I should like the minister's comments on this.

I have listened to the questions posed to the minister on immigration—who gets in and who does not. A great many people contact me on this question. I wrote to the minister two or three days ago about the problem of a young Chinese girl from Hong Kong, a student who passed her examinations with outstanding results. She was given a work permit and is presently working in a Christian Horizon home in my village of Burks Falls where she is a counsellor. She certainly works more than 40 hours a week and certainly is not paid the highest wages. I believe she earns $9600 per year. Her work permit has expired and she will now have to return to Hong Kong. She is in the best of health but maybe that is against her! She is paying her way and doing a great job. It seems unfortunate that ministerial discretion cannot be exercised in this case. It has been mentioned that there is a possibility of a "shuffle off to Buffalo". I am delighted to hear that a plan is being suggested for a reciprocal arrangement whereby it would not be necessary for people to return to their native land, especially those from so far off. In this particular case, I wonder if the minister cannot take a second look.

I am well aware, as the minister has said himself, that as far as decisions are concerned, he is all powerful. He can certainly make a ministerial decision but letters from his officials convey the impression—"that is it; that is all there is to it; according to the rules this is not a hardship case". And so forth.

Other members mentioned earlier that a great many applications from the British Isles do not seem to be approved. Several people have contacted me. I know the application is not here formally but this is a case about which we wrote to the department seven or eight months ago which was turned down. It concerned a retired RAF officer who is economically independent and young enough not to want to remain idle when he comes here. I believe he has accounting experience. I just wonder why an application such as this one could not be considered.

I was pleased to learn the figures with regard to people coming from Europe and the United Kingdom. Three or four people in my riding have come over on visitor's permits. They bought property and have invested substantial amounts of money. I believe I have mentioned one specific instance personally to the minister. One family invested one quarter of a million dollars and another invested close to a half a million dollars. This money is being used for the tourist industry, to attract European tourists to this country. In one case an appeal was to be launched to bring over Dutch people; the other case concerned German people. Even on a quota basis, with the balance of payments the way they are now, I would hope the minister would look at the matter from a dollars and cents point of view. That kind of money coming into Canada should certainly count for a good many pluses on the point system, or whatever it is.

I want to commend to the minister the Orillia immigration office. That is the office with which I deal in my riding. We have had exceptional co-operation from its manager, Mr. Charles Brooks. I am very sorry to hear that he is reaching retirement age. However, I presume he will be replaced shortly by someone who will carry on his good work. My constituency office and myself are delighted with the co-operation we receive from him.

Under the winter works program, or whatever it is called now, many of the ridings have had their budgets reduced to $100,000, plus a little extra for the native people. But due to the serious employment situation with which we will be faced I hope some extra money will be found to take people off the unemployment rolls and provide work under this worth-while project. I know that my time has run out, but could the minister comment on some of those questions I have presented to him?

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, I will attempt to answer briefly. If the hon. member wants more extensive answers, we could supply them by letter.

On the question of the admission of real estate agents under the training program, in each province where there are agreements we have what is called a manpower needs committee. Under that scheme, provincial officials sit down with federal representatives to discuss what kinds of training programs have the highest priority. Training programs must be run through their own institutions. The grading is simply done under what is called the greatest need because we have scarce resources. Real estate programs are just not considered to be as high a priority as those for machinists, pipefitters, etc.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Is that provincial or federal?

Mr. Axworthy: It is a joint committee. We have officials from both levels of government. But I do understand that the real estate industry itself has its own program which it administers. On the immigration cases, I would be prepared to consider the ones which the hon. member has raised. I know the particular case of the Dutch family because the hon. member has spoken to me about that. This family had been told before coming to Canada that landed immigrant status could not be granted, althouth I believe I pointed out in the letter that they may become eligible under the entrepreneurial class. Again, this is something we could discuss with officials of the province of Ontario; the province has to certify that it is a legitimate investment in the business. However, I will be glad to follow that up with the hon. member.

In the other case, if the hon. member would like to refer the matter to me, I will be glad to take a look at it.

Mr. McLean: Mr. Chairman, I would like to thank my colleagues and other members of the House for allowing me some time before the close of this period.

I would like to turn to the question of the budget's effect on programs for women. It is evident that there will be increases in social affairs spending in the next three years. These are projected at 10.6 per cent, 6.3 per cent and 6.9 per cent. By contrast, total government spending for those same years was expected to be 12.8 per cent, 10.5 per cent and 10.1 per cent. Clearly, the funding for the envelope in which the minister's portfolios fall is not going to be held at levels sufficient even to keep pace with the inflation rates. As we are looking at estimates, what is the minister going to do to make sure that the level of funding is raising to a priority level in over-all government spending, particularly because of its prominent place in the throne speech and the minister's own commitments to women's programs.

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, I am glad the hon. member asked me that question because I think I shall be able to provide some answers which he will find welcome. While some restraints have been imposed on the social affairs committee, we have been quite successful in increasing substantially the funding for different women's activities under federal government jurisdiction. For example, the office of the co-ordinator of the status of women has had its budget doubled this year to provide for 12 new positions to allow for a greater degree of activity and co-ordination. The Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women, which also comes directly under my responsibility, has had its budget for 1980-1981 increased to close to $600,000 which again, represents almost a doubling of its budget in this budget year.

In the case of women's programs under the Secretary of State, whose department provides substantial support for research and operating grants for women's groups across the country, in August of this year the cabinet committee agreed to an increase of $500,000. This again provides a substantial increase, almost a doubling of the amount. In the women's bureau of the Department of Labour, again there has been a substantial increase in funding. It has had an increase of close to $300,000. In each of these cases of bureaus or operations directly affecting women's programs, we have been able to affect substantial increases in the amount of personnel and the amount of money at their disposal.

Mr. McLean: Mr. Chairman, I thank the minister for those comments. It would appear, though, there would be major cutbacks in other areas in the light of the over-all balance unless there is a secret fund somewhere else.

More and more low-income mothers are going to work. Subsidized care is less available, and day care is costly, especially to people who can least afford it. The number of women in the labour force with children under the age of six now exceeds half a million. This puts enormous pressure on day care facilities. Non-commercial day care centres are 95 per cent subsidized. In 1978-1979 non-commercial day care increased by only 4.8 per cent while commercial and the more expensive day care increased by 28.3 per cent. I do not need to quote the comment made on behalf of the Canadian Council on Social Development on the need for a national day care policy. The minister is encouraging women to re-enter the work force through retraining and affirmative action programs. What is his position on a national day care policy and what has he done to see that this increasing need is getting the attention of the Minister of National Health and Welfare? How many of those available dollars he told us about are going directly to this area of need?

Mr. Axworthy: Along with the hon. member, I feel there is an essential requirement to improve child care services in this country. The difficulty we face as a federal government is that the determination of day care policy is very much a provincial responsibility and jurisdiction. They are responsible for the design, implementation and management of day care programs within each of their provincial regions. Our involvement with day care is to share the funding under the CAP program where we provide 50 per cent of the cost at the present time.

As most organizations have pointed out, in many instances the decision on day care must not only concern increased resources, but increased availability. The Minister of National Heath and Welfare made several comments about the need to do a basic review of the Canada Assistance Plan with a view to getting more guidelines or responsibilities attached to it regarding the allocation of these programs.

I do not have to remind the hon. member that there has been some discussion between the provinces and ourselves about the notion of block funding and we have lost control of much of the money we have given because we have not been able to set those guidelines in motion. With the review of the CAP, the Minister of National Health and Welfare intends to take a hard look as to how that can be more directly allocated toward child care programs. In the meantime, I would tell the hon. member that when we introduced the community services employment program this summer, we put a high priority on the employment of people in child care services across Canada.

One of the priority items for social services or community service groups across Canada is some degree of additional assistance from the federal government by application through the community service program. This is given a very high priority. I do not have the latest figures, but I think close to 30 per cent goes into child care under our direct employment programs.

Mr. McLean: I would like to press the minister a little on this. Is he prepared to use his office to press for the calling of a national conference on day care? I would also like to ask the minister about farm women. It will be known to him that the government recently announced that farmers will be able to claim wages paid to their spouses for farm work. One group excluded from the provisions is the category of spouses. They will not be able to claim unemployment insurance in the event that their jobs as farm wives are lost. What steps does the minister plan to take to remedy this oversight? Has he discussed this with the Minister of Agriculture?

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, I will give a very short answer. I remind the hon. member that a very interesting conference was held in this city last week by farm women at which a number of these proposals were made. That is probably where the question came from, I would guess. This is a very important issue. If I could return the compliment, I would say that improvements for farm women will be contained in the Minister of Finance's amendments to the Income Tax Act. I hope the hon. member will use his good offices with his House leader to make sure that bill receives very speedy passage through the House so that the measure can go into effect as soon as possible.

Mr. McLean: In the moment or so left, I wonder if the minister could make reference to the Canadian Human Rights Act and the matter of equal pay for work of equal value. What action has the minister taken to persuade Treasury Board to live up to the government's stated commitment to justice and opportunity in the work place? There have been reports of resistance. Can the minister comment on that.

Mr. Axworthy: It seems so long ago, Mr. Chairman, but we had a fairly extensive discussion on that this afternoon. I refer the hon. member to Hansard. If it is not there, I will be glad to provide answers to him. Time does not allow a full exposition of a very important subject.

Mr. Deans: Mr. Chairman, I have two or three matters I want to raise with the minister. I will do that as quickly as I can. I hope he can respond to them. I have a fairly simple question. Why is it that under the Unemployment Insurance Act real estate salesmen or brokers who are licensed must turn in their licences before becoming eligible for unemployment insurance? At this time of great difficulty in the real estate business, it is unfortunate and unfair for a licensed salesman or broker to be required, even though he is not working within the industry but may be looking forward to going back when there is an upturn, to relinquish his licence. It is his.

My second question has to do with the construction industry. Can the minister enlighten us as to what became of the recommendations contained in the report by the task force on mobility in the construction industry? The minister well knows that mobility within the construction industry is a necessary prerequisite for maintaining a viable industrial sector.

People have to be encouraged to go to those areas where construction is taking place. A number of basic concerns were expressed in the report. I will run through them quickly. On the basis of presentations made to the task force by representatives of labour, management and government, it concluded the following major factors affect the movement of construction workers: room, board and travel allowance, the Canada Employment and Immigration Commission mobility program, taxation and equities, industry practices, the Quebec construction industry labour relations act, a lack of information and the demand for and supply of labour, reciprocity and portability of health, welfare and pension plans, licensing and certification of trades and apprenticeship training.

I appreciate that the minister and the federal government do not have jurisdiction over all these areas. However, the minister and the government do have jurisdiction over certain of them or at least a shared responsibility. I am interested in knowing what, if anything, the minister intends to do to respond in a positive way to the many worth-while recommendations contained in this extremely well written, well thought out document which was presented more than two years ago to this government and the provincial governments.

This task force was set up as a result of a decision made by the first ministers in 1978. Its participants are representative of the various sectors within the construction industry. They have recommended such things as room, board and travel allowances in order to encourage people who must out of necessity be away from home, to allow them to live reasonably well while away and still maintain their family and their home where they live.

It also spoke about apprenticeship training and the need for some uniformity across the country. It is suggested the federal government might consider in one way or another influencing the provinces, where it clearly falls within provincial jurisdiction, to develop uniformity across the country in apprenticeship training and, therefore, high mobility.

There is so much more in the report. I cannot go through it all in the few minutes allowed to me. I would very much like the minister to devote a moment or two to that subject.

When doing so, he might consider another problem which directly relates to the construction industry and which is also part of the unemployment insurance scheme. In order to qualify for an insurable week under the unemployment insurance program, a person must have 20 hours of work with one employer. It is not inconceivable, in fact it is quite frequently the case, that people in construction do not get 20 consecutive, or for that matter 20 hours with one employer during a one-week period. Because they do not, they could move from one employer in the morning to another in the afternoon, but they might not have those 20 hours with one employer. Therefore, though they have completed 40 hours of work in a week, it is not considered to be an insurable week under the act. This strikes me as being unfair.

Will the minister consider whether or not there might be justification to base the payment and the determination of payment on individual industry sectors within the construction industry? From time to time there is work in one trade but there is no work in another. Yet, when calculations are made they are made on the basis of the industry as a whole and this can, and does, work a hardship on some workers.

I should like to turn from that to a marginally related matter. On a number of occasions I have raised the problems presently confronting people within the auto industry who are not able to find employment but who are anticipating returning to the auto industry if, as and when it recovers. After checking it through, I find that although the minister did respond some months ago to the problems of Windsor, with its 20,000 auto workers and related industry employees unemployed, he did so by reducing the numbers of weeks a person must have worked in order to requalify. As I understand it, unfortunately the calculation is based on StatsCan evidence and when StatsCan evidence is gathered it is on the basis of a questionnaire. The people who were unemployed and who were working with the local manpower and unemployment offices in the Windsor area were informed when they discussed their dilemma with those local offices, that they need not go through the motions of looking for work in Windsor at that point simply because there was no work available. It made no sense to come in with trumped up lists of places they had been when everyone knew there were no jobs anyway. They were told not to go through that process. When StatsCan asked them if they were actively looking for work, they said no. That, as I understand it, reflected on the decisions of the Unemployment Insurance Commission and, therefore, the reduced number of weeks that had to be met for compliance was eliminated and they went back to the normal waiting period. I would like the minister to consider this and to indicate whether it is, in fact, an accurate reflection of what happened and, if it is, to find a new method of calculating. The infirm Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce told me the other night—I am sorry he has broken his knee; I will go no further—that the difficulty is that the area within which Windsor workers are considered for unemployment insurance benefits includes Sarnia and other communities. Although conditions have improved in some of the outlying parts of that particular geographical area, they have certainly not yet improved substantially in Windsor. Can the minister tell us whether or not he is considering making an adjustment to what we might call the catchment area, I suppose, for unemployment insurance calculations as they apply to auto workers and other people who are now unemployed as a result of the downturn in the auto industry in the Windsor area in particular? There should be an effort to try to guarantee that when the industry makes its recovery, as we all hope it will, there will then be in that area skilled and trained people within that industry still available for work and that the people will not have been disentitled as a result of bureaucratic mix-up, or as a result of an unfair boundary arrangement which really does not reflect reality, or disentitled because they were given information by the offices of the UIC and Manpower which, when relayed to Statistics Canada, turned out to their disadvatange.

Finally, I want to turn to a matter which was raised by my colleague, the hon. member for New Westminster-Coquitlam, earlier this afternoon or this evening. The minister will recall that the hon. member was discussing affirmative action, which I think is of concern to a great number of people all across the country. I think we have come to the conclusion in a general way that if women are to achieve their rightful reward in the workplace they will achieve it only if there is an affirmative action program which is mandated.

It is becoming increasingly clear to most of us that although it might well be desirable, voluntary affirmative action is somewhat impractical. Compare our level of success with that of the United States. The minister surely knows that in the United States the laws have teeth and citizens can sue unfair employers under the affirmative action law. In addition to that, all large companies with federal contracts are monitored by government officials. They look to make sure that there is parity in the work force and parity in the workplace and that women are given a reasonable opportunity on the basis of their numbers, something they not only deserve but to which they are entitled. What they have asked, quite simply, is that if 45 per cent or 47 per cent of a town's workers are female, why is it that a local company might have only 20 per cent or less of its total staff composed of female workers with perhaps none of them in management? That is not uncommon. I am sure the minister knows that in the past few years the city of Chicago, the U.S. department of energy and even The New York Times have been successfully sued. They have had to pay many millions of dollars for not having lived up to the affirmative action program and the letter of the law.

That money has been paid to women who have suffered from job discrimination. I do not suggest for a moment that there are not people who comply willingly with what is accepted by most of us as a fair and rightful position, but I do suggest that far too many do not. I heard it said today that the federal government does some $11 billion worth of business through contracts purchased from private companies in the private sector, and I think it would be useful if the government were to implement as a matter of law that the rights of women are not to be discriminated against, and put into practice an affirmative action program with respect to those companies and, in all fairness, an affirmative action program within the various ministries. I mean one which works. Otherwise, I do not think we should enter into contracts with those companies. It would not take long. Within a short period of time they would be happy to comply and would in fact comply.

I have one final point to make. It is somewhat related although considerably different in many aspects. Some day we will have to look at new ways to get people who are handicapped into the workplace. I think we start from the wrong premise. Somehow we look at a person who is handicapped and try to think of what job he or she could do. I think we will have to try to get people to start at the other end and assume that unless it is proved otherwise, handicapped persons can, in fact, undertake any job at any place of work, and insist that they be given an opportunity. I think it is only fair and I think we must undertake that if there is to be any kind of equality in this country worth speaking about.

With those few remarks, I invite the minister to comment on what I asked; if there is a moment left, I may wrap up, but I doubt there will be a moment left.

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, I understand that three minutes are left, so if I take two to answer, the hon. member will have one to sum up.

He asked me a number of very detailed and important questions. I will again treat them briefly, and if he is not satisfied, I will attempt to obtain the answers for him in a written form.

With regard to the question of real estate agents, let me tell him that under the Unemployment Insurance Act you are eligible for benefits only when you show that you can no longer perform the job to which you have been assigned. The only proof we have of a real estate agent being eligible is to take away his licence. Otherwise he or she could still go out and sell real estate, which means he or she would still be in the market. I think the hon. member would agree that we would not want that kind of double functioning, of being able to sell at the same time as being able to receive benefits. That is the reason there must be some proof of the fact that you are now eligible for benefits, that you can no longer work in your chosen profession.

On the mobility proposal in the construction industry, let me say that just two nights ago I met together with my colleague, the Minister of Labour, with the executive board of the construction trades. They made many of the same proposals. The one which attracted my interest most directly concerned mobility grants for workers. I told them at the time, and I repeated it in the committee, that this is a matter I intend to take up with the Minister of Finance. I think it is a very important recommendation and I see no reason why we could not introduce at an appropriate time when we find the money necessary. It makes good sense and I know I have the support of many of my colleagues.

On the question of the minimum insurability, I would remind the hon. member, just to clarify the record, that he said it would be 20 hours. As of January 1 of the coming year, 15 hours per work week of employment will be required. We are examining the issue of whether there should be one or more employers and we realize there is an inconsistency. I have referred this matter to the unemployment insurance review. As I have said before, they will be putting forward their discussion paper some time in the new year, and one of the items which will be examined is how we can have a degree of equity extending to those who have a mobile profession, such as people in the construction trade.

On the matter of the Windsor area, I must confess that it has given me some trouble. We advised the workers there that because of the obvious condition of lay-offs they would not have to show up. I am not sure it was sufficient to change the actual statistics because we did work through a three months moving average. StatsCan uses that kind of equation. I think a much more important factor was the fact that there were other cities and town within the statistical region which have very low unemployment rates, and this brought the average substantially down. It goes back to an issue which many of my colleagues here have raised with me, particularly those from Quebec and New Brunswick. I guess I have spent more agonizing hours as minister trying to organize those economic regions than I have spent on many other issues. Again this is an issue we are addressing in the unemployment insurance review. I for one hope we will find an answer to it so I can get some rest on that particular matter.

Finally, with regard to affirmative action, I want to point out to the hon. member that the question of mandatory or compulsory affirmative action is being examined by the government. We recognize that the voluntary approach which has been used so far has resulted in only 18 agreements in the past three years, and I personally do not consider that good enough. However, I do not think we were able to go to the private sector until we did something in the public service. We have now introduced a program in the public service and we can legitimately say, "We have started our reform; now you should take a look at yours". I made several speeches to business groups—not to overwhelming applause, I suggest, but at least they were interested in hearing that we will be moving in that direction.

I do think we should not necessarily move in the same way as the Americans are moving. I think we can improve upon their affirmative action program and I would like to do so in consultation with the employers and the trade unions. I think it would be a much more effective program if they came on our side in that program rather than having government enforce it upon them. So we are holding a number of discussions with them. It is something which I intend to present to cabinet within the next month or two for their consideration, but it would need a fairly long period of consultation to make sure that there was consensus on the approach, style and method of that affirmative action principle.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. I ask the minister to clarify whether he meant mobility grants when he was talking about the construction industry people or whether he meant tax relief for those who get reasonable expenses from employers.

An hon. Member: That is not a point of order.

Mr. Dawson: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a real point of order. After 14-3/4 hours, I was wondering if we could have the permission of the opposition that the next 15 minutes will be shared by the hon. member for Restigouche and the hon. member for Spadina.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Earlier the hon. member for Calgary West requested the unanimous consent of the House to divide that party's time into two sections and the same request is now being made.

Mr. Knowles: Agreed.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: If that is agreed, I will recognize the hon. member for Restigouche followed by the hon. member for Spadina for seven minutes each.

Mr. Harquail: Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the opportunity to join in a positive way with the previous speakers of today to second the motion and all the good things said about what is being done by the department, the minister, and as has been demonstrated today, by his parliamentary secretary.

When I talk about positive action, I am talking about all the good programs such as the community development program, young Canada works, LEAP, the Outreach program for the handicapped, LEDA in co-operation with DREE and various other projects. I might say I have the impression it might be an improvement to combine unemployment insurance with manpower once again. I want to take a minute to say something about that this evening so that the minister could have the department look at the manpower within the department in terms of the attitude of employees toward Canadian citizens who are required to go into these offices, whether they are soliciting help in locating positions or new employment, whether they are being placed through Manpower in new jobs, or whether they are applying for unemployment insurance coverage. Certainly this has been of some concern to me in the past. I do not want to generalize, but I am speaking specifically about the attitude of staff in some areas. It is important when we talk about a national government delivering these programs to Canadians to try to instill in the employees a sense of pride not only in their work but in the country, so that they can help with the whole question of unity and leave a good impression with those Canadians who go into these offices.

While I am listening as an elected member to requests from my constituents, all too often they comment on the attitudes of Manpower and unemployment insurance employees. I would suggest that some regional officers should get a little closer to members of Parliament. They should come out and meet members of Parliament in their constituency offices to find out exactly what are the comments of the elected representatives as to what they find and really feel about the manner in which these programs are being implemented.

Also on the subject of programs, I was somewhat distressed about the titles that are being used. I do not think Canadians need to be more confused about programs. I have noticed that throughout the bureaucracy we are using the word "community" all too often. For example, there is the community services contribution program, the Canada community services projects program, and now the community development program.

It is difficult enough for the average taxpayer on the street to understand the various ramifications of the three levels of government—municipal, provincial and federal—without our contributing to this confusion by using similar titles in CMHC, Manpower and some of the other ongoing programs. It contributes to the confusion and makes everyone's job a little more difficult. This might be something to take into consideration when we are thinking of titles for these programs; we should try to avoid similarities. As I say, Canada Works, for example, would have been just fine to carry on under the title that everyone was becoming familiar with, and then we introduced it as community development. As I said, I want to put these brief remarks on record in order to join in with other members in congratulating the minister on his handling of a difficult task. It has been a long day and I will be sharing the time with the member for Spadina. I would like to leave a few minutes so that we could get a response from the minister. I was discussing with him the other day the question of the balance of service in given areas. In my own constituency I have an area where they are complaining that they do not have adequate service in some of the villages and outlying areas. They do not feel they are being adequately served by one or two days service per week. They would like to have someone located right in their community. I think that is a fair request. I wonder if I could get your reaction to what I have said, sir.

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, I know we have only a few minutes left but I want to tell the hon. member for Restigouche that I agree with his principle that we should try to decentralize the services more directly. We have tried to do that through some of the new programs, as he knows. We have tried to do it through the community development program and by setting the priorities within each of the provinces and regions so that the work projects would reflect the interests of those areas. We have worked that out at the local advisory board level in the constituencies as well as at the regional level. As I have said several times today, we are revamping and reorganizing the department and the programs. That is one of the principles which is included in the idea of greater autonomy and decentralization, for making judgments at the local level.

Mr. Stollery: Mr. Chairman, I, too, will make my remarks very briefly. I know the minister would like to have a couple of minutes to wind up.

First of all, I would like to respond to the point which was brought up about the applications from Britain. Some hon. members may not be aware that Canada is a very difficult country to get into. We have a non-discriminatory immigration policy. This means it affects people from Britain just like it affects people from Portugal, China, South America and everywhere else. Because the policy is non-discriminatory it affects people from the United Kingdom and the United States just as it affects people from all around the world. We have a restricted immigration policy and I am personally happy that it applies reasonably equitably to everyone from whatever area of the world they happen to come from. I think the minister and the department are to be complimented for taking this non-discriminating approach to our immigration policy.

I do a considerable amount of immigration work because of the constituency I represent. I would like to bring to the minister's attention one or two problems which have arisen recently in my constituency. The first is with respect to people who have been accepted for landing under the order in council procedures, usually spouses of landed immigrants or Canadian citizens. This difficulty has continued, but it started when the Conservative party was in government. It is the question of immigrants accepted for landing not receiving a work permit, which they should receive. In this case a person has been accepted by the system. He or she is a spouse, and has married a Canadian citizen for one reason or another. We are keeping them for up to nine months or a year in a kind of limbo where they are told that if they can get a job then they can have a work permit. But they go to employers and the employers say that if they do not have a work permit they cannot be given a job. I think this is something which should be looked into. I am convinced it is because the message has not gotten around that this kind of red tape is something we do not bother with.

My second question is with respect to Hong Kong where we have a real problem with local staff just processing all of the paperwork. I wish to compliment the tremendous work done by the immigration officers in these places. These immigration officers handle the applications of thousands of refugees plus all the normal immigration cases. They must also handle the immigration cases from the People's Republic of China, which pose a special problem.

They cannot do any more. What is needed is local staff to help the paper work. It is very important that we get this backlog cleared up. So the two points are with regard to (1) People being accepted through an order in council but not receiving their work permits and having to see members of parliament unnecessarily or hang around the immigration department and, (2) the employment of local staff, particularly in light of the pressure under which these men and women have worked with the Indo-Chinese immigration movement plus the normal immigration flow.

The third question is of a political nature, and I am still not clear if a process has evolved. It is the question of family businesses about which we all hear about from time to time, the particular difficulty faced by people who cannot meet the occupational demand requirements but who are required to help in a family business. I am sure members of Parliament on both sides of this House have faced this problem. I will not take any more time. I have dealt with a number of immigration cases under four or five ministers of employment and immigration and I can compliment the current Minister of Employment and Immigration on the immigration department. Under difficult circumstances, I think he has handled the department very well in this last little while.

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, I will answer the hon. member for Spadina as well as I can. I think I have about three minutes left in my voice so I will eke out the last words. His question of landing permits sounds like a "Catch 22" problem which sometimes arises. I would ask the hon. member to speak to me privately, to outline the details. There should be no reason for such a delay. If there is a reason, we will find it out and if it is some quirk in the procedures, then the task force can straighten it out.

On the question of additional staff for our offices overseas, the hon. member knows that there has been an integration of the foreign service, External Affairs and Trade and Commerce. But the decisions on local staff lie with my colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and I would certainly be glad to carry the hon. member's representations to him.

On the question of family businesses, a directive was issued in September, modifying the requirements of family business applications. Where there are positions of trust, then the normal regulations should be waived. These directives have gone out to all the offices and posts and should be in effect. It may take a while for the momentum and the routine to change, but all our immigration offices should not have this directive which should provide for a greater ease of movement in that particular class. I will gladly send a copy of those directives to the hon. member.

In the two minutes that are left I will simply say that after the 15 hours of estimates I feel the same as I did the first time I entered a marathon race. Once I got into it, I realized I would not win but that I had to finish!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, I am about finished.

I would like to thank the officials from my staff and from the department who have stood by me all this time. We in this House are sometimes guilty of making disparaging remarks about the Public Service of Canada. For sheer effort and assistance the officials of the department and my staff are owed my gratitude. They have been a great help to me during this time.

I would also like to thank members of the committee on both sides. This has been a good experience—not one that I should like to repeat soon, of course. Their questions and comments have been very helpful to me in the operation of this department and I am sure that I will be the one to benefit most from this experience. I hope we have been able to supply the answers that will enable members to better understand the workings of what I consider to be a very important department of government, one that deals with people. I would never say that we always make the right judgments but we try to make good judgments. That is the standard I use.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Progress reported.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): It being midnight, this House stands adjourned until two o'clock today.

At 12.02 a.m. the House adjourned without question put pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

TRANSPORT

CROWSNEST PASS RATES—CALL FOR EXPLANATION OF FUTURE POLICY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 in view of the tug-of-war that is taking place between the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) and the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) over the Crowsnest freight rates. In Calgary, two weeks ago, the Minister of Transport said, "A task force on the Crow rates would be desirable"; one week later, also in Calgary, the Minister of Agriculture said, "There won't be any more studies done on the problems of the rail system and Crow rates". I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Hargrave):

That this House call upon the government to get its act together, have its ministers communicate and forget their rivalries, and provide western producers with a single policy and a definitive explanation of its future intentions vis-à-vis the Crow rates.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

DECISION RESPECTING INDUSTRIAL WASTE SITE AT SOUTH CAYUGA, ONT.—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bud Bradley (Haldimand-Norfolk): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that the province of Ontario has decided to place an industrial waste site in South Cayuga, without a realistic environmental study, without an environmental hearing and contradictory to the MacLaren report, which did not choose South Cayuga as one of the 17 original sites, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Beatty):

That this House direct the government to investigate this decision and report to the House on the propriety and safety of this action.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

POLAND—CALL FOR ASSISTANCE TO REBUILD ECONOMY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Miss Pauline Jewett (New Westminster-Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Whereas political stability in Poland and in eastern Europe in general could be undermined by any further economic hardships for the Polish people, and whereas the Government of Canada should take a constructive lead in encouraging stability, prosperity and peace, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent):

That this House urge the government to help stabilize and rebuild the Polish economy; that Canada join with other nations, such as West Germany and Australia, which are willing to provide much needed food commodity credits and other economic assistance to the Polish people and government; and that the Prime Minister contact leaders of other governments to seek and co-ordinate multilateral economic assistance.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

NEWS MEDIA COVERAGE OF FOREIGN TOURS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Lorne Greenaway (Cariboo-Chilcotin): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Whereas the executive of the parliamentary press gallery has proposed a motion to its membership opposing attempts by the Prime Minister to place limits on news media members travelling with him on future foreign tours and reaffirming a "no limits" policy on news coverage of the Prime Minister while he is travelling on state business, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Cooper):

S.O. 43

That the Prime Minister cease his attempts to use this means to select the journalists covering him and demonstrate his respect for the principle of freedom of the press by returning to past policy regarding news media coverage of foreign tours.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

MANUFACTURERS' INVESTMENT TAX CREDIT PROGRAM—DESIGNATION OF NEW BRUNSWICK—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy-Royal): Madam Speaker, one of the provisions of the budget was a 50 per cent manufacturers' investment tax credit for designated areas. In response to a civil request to the minister responsible for DREE by my colleague from York-Sunbury (Mr. Howie) for the data base used to select these designated areas, the minister indignantly stated he was shocked that that inference was used, indicating that anything but the most scientific and fair methods were used to determine these areas.

In view of this, in view of the fact that families in Queens county and several other areas in New Brunswick represented by Conservative members have average incomes, which is one of the criteria, well below most areas included in the program, all represented by Liberals, and in view of the fact that $12,285,000 of the $12,692,000, or 96.8 per cent, of the community development project moneys in New Brunswick went to constituencies held by Liberals, I move, seconded by the hon. member for York-Sunbury:

That the minister include the entire province of New Brunswick as a designated area in the 50 per cent manufacturers' investment tax credit program.

Madam Speaker: Presentation of this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CULTURAL AFFAIRS

DEATH OF JOHN LENNON—CONDOLENCES TO WIDOW, FAMILY AND FRIENDS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina East): Madam Speaker, under Standing Order 43 I rise on a matter of pressing necessity. Last night, at the age of 40, John Lennon was shot to death. John Lennon, through his songs as a member of the Beatles, and on his solo albums, did much to shape the thinking of young people during the sixties and early seventies. His vision of love, peace and human harmony was a major influence in shaping the consciousness, the hopes and dreams of a generation. His musical contributions helped change, unalterably, popular music and our culture. John Lennon is dead; but his work is reflected in the hearts and minds of millions of men and women, in Canada and the world over.

I therefore move, Madam Speaker, seconded by the hon. member for Don Valley West (Mr. Bosley) and supported by the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Berger):

That this House pay tribute to the outstanding cultural contribution of John Lennon and express its condolences to his wife Yoko Ono and his family and friends.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: Presentation of such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Madam Speaker: There is unanimous consent?

FINANCE

INQUIRY INTO FISCAL AND MONETARY POLICY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. We have rising unemployment; we have a dollar that sinks lower in value every day; we have business forced to borrow money at rates in excess of 17 and 18 per cent; we have the spectre of an 11.5 per cent inflation rate next year. It is a condition labelled as "stagflation". I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Fraser Valley West (Mr. Wenman):

That this House do immediately constitute a special seven-member task force committee to inquire into the fiscal and monetary policy conducted by this government and the Bank of Canada and for this purpose review the evidence taken before the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs in its inquiry into interest rate policy in the Thirty-first Parliament and call such witnesses as the committee deems necessary in order that Canadians can be assured that Parliament, if not this government, is prepared to deal with "stagflation".

Madam Speaker: Presentation of such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

EFFECT OF ECONOMIC POLICY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. G. M. Gurbin (Bruce-Grey): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the importance of agriculture to our national economy, with interest rate increases and farm operating costs rising faster than the consumer price index, so that net farm income will grow only slightly in 1981, in spite of consumers facing at least a 15 per cent increase in food prices next year; in view of major fuel oil, diesel, gasoline and probably fertilizer costs yet to be added in the coming year; in view of the questionable impact of the Minister of Agriculture on the deliberations of the Minister of Finance, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Halliday):

That the Minister of Finance be examined for fiscal fitness by those interested and capable in agricultural economics and bring forward an assessment of present government policies in the context of Canadian and world economies to determine the effects on our agricultural community and to submit recommendations.

Madam Speaker: Presentation of such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

AIRPORTS

REQUEST GOVERNMENT RECEIVE REPRESENTATION FROM ROUYN-NORANDA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Henri Tousignant (Témiscamingue): Madam Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion dealing with an important matter of pressing and urgent necessity.

In view of the fact that a delegation representing businessmen from my constituency and the mayors of Rouyn-Noranda came to Ottawa to meet with Department of Transport officials concerning the installation of equipment which is absolutely essential for the Rouyn airport, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Abitibi (Mr. Gingras):

That this delegation receive the whole attention of the Department of Transport, which attention it should have got a long time ago.

Madam Speaker: Presentation of such a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

LABOUR CONDITIONS

UNEMPLOYMENT—STIMULATION OF CONSTRUCTION INDUSTRY

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. He must have noted that employment in the Canadian construction industry is down by 50,000 Canadian workers, half of those workers being from Ontario alone and 30 per cent from Quebec. If the minister has noted that, will he tell us whether any study is being given to some type of new approach to stimulate the construction industry in this country, bearing in mind the minister gave such short shrift to the mortgage interest and property tax program of the Clark government which would have ensured that those 50,000 Canadians would not be out of work today as they are?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I have noticed the variation in employment in the goods-producing industry, which includes construction. Having noted that, I have also noted that the over-all, seasonally adjusted unemployment rate in Canada decreased over the past month, that decrease in unemployment having been registered in almost all regions of the country.

Mr. Stevens: Madam Speaker, surely that reply is only reflective of the callous attitude of this government—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: —which hands us seasonally adjusted figures but ignores the fact there are more Canadians out of work today than there were previously.

My question is again directed to the Minister of Finance. Has he noticed that the Canadian Manufacturers' Association has stated that the decision to deem marginal manufacturing liable to federal sales tax has created a great groundswell of concern among their members, a groundswell that has not been experienced for a long time and has contributed to the unemployment with which we are now living in the manufacturing sector? If the minister is aware of CMA's comment that by simply redefining manufacturing to include marginal manufacturing he is triggering more unemployment in this country, will the minister correct the mistake he made in his budget?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, I should point out to the hon. member that the unemployment rate for November, 1980, is precisely the same unemployment rate which existed a year ago when the hon. member's seatmate brought in a budget which, if it had been accepted by the House of Commons, would have had very serious and deep effects on the unemployment situation in Canada. I want to tell the hon.

member today that I am following quite a different fiscal policy from that which he supported a year ago.

An hon. Member: What a disaster.

Mr. Stevens: Madam Speaker, this Minister of Finance does not have to tell anyone in Canada that he is following a different fiscal pattern.

Mr. Nowlan: It is irresponsible.

Mr. Stevens: With the falling dollar, the rising interest rates, the rising unemployment—in numbers, not statistics—the rising inflation, that fact is obvious to all Canadians.

Will the minister answer my question? CMA has indicated that by changing the definition of manufacturing to include marginal manufacturing with respect to the implementation of sales tax, he is driving more and more manufacturing into foreign lands and creating more and more unemployment in this country. If the minister is aware of this, will he tell the House that he is going to correct the mistake that now exists in his budget?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, there was absolutely no mistake made in the budget in moving to this change. The idea was to provide for greater equity within the tax system and to provide equality of treatment for Canadian producers in comparison with imported goods. I would think that that objective would appeal to the hon. member.

FORECASTS RESPECTING INFLATION—EFFECT ON UNEMPLOYMENT

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, the only equal treatment in the budget is that everybody is getting shafted equally.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: My question is addressed to the Minister of Finance. I remind the minister that there were 787,000 people unemployed in November. The minister has forecast this will average 1,026,000 people during 1981. He also forecasts that food costs will go up 12 per cent in 1981 while the latest forecast of the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce is that food prices will go up 15 per cent. The minister's solution is to suggest that Canadians accept a lower standard of living. The Prime Minister's solution is that Canadians should change their priorities and spend more on food and less on other things.

My question is this. Will the minister reconsider those solutions, which are unpalatable, and now bring in a budget? We have not yet had one. We just had a cop-out attached to a smash and grab raid on the energy industry. Will he bring in a budget and policies which will help Canadians overcome unemployment and help them overcome inflation?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I would point out to the hon. member in case the facts have escaped him that the seasonally adjusted unemployment rate is down from 7.6 per cent to 7.3 per cent. This decrease in the seasonally adjusted unemployment rate is due entirely to an improvement in the employment situation. Over the past year, the number of new jobs has increased by more than 200,000. The unemployment rate today in Canada is less than that existing in the United States. These are some of the facts the hon. member conveniently forgets. I wonder whether he could think up some new questions which have not been asked 20 times in the past two weeks.

Mr. Crosbie: Madam Speaker, the only thing that can be said of the minister is that he has the guts to answer and the Prime Minister has not. However, his answers are still not satisfactory. Let me point out to the Minister of Finance that the reason the adjusted figures are down is because the labour force totals are down in Newfoundland and Ontario as workers there have given up looking for jobs, knowing there are none to be found. If the minister looks at the Economic Council of Canada report on Newfoundland, he will see the phenomenon described in ample terms. The minister has forecast unemployment for over one million Canadians next year. He has forecast increases in the cost of living of 10.2 per cent and in food prices of 12 per cent. These have since been revised upwards.

In a speech in Halifax on September 9 the minister said and I quote:

> Let me assure you that it was to create jobs, improve living standards and promote greater equity that I took the position of Minister of Finance.

If the minister took the position for that reason, how is it that jobs are being lost and that over a million will be unemployed next year? He is now telling the Canadian people to lower their standard of living. His only concept of equity is that Canadians cease spending on other things and spend more on food. Will he explain why he is still minister if that is his reason for being minister?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, may I just correct an error which crept into the hon. member's rather excited, frenzied and repetitive question, a question by the way that he picked up from the hon. member for Broadview which was asked and answered about two months ago. Let me tell the hon. member he is wrong in talking about the labour force. We have scored this improvement in employment in Canada despite virtually no change in the labour force in the country. The hon. member ought to get his facts straight before he poses questions.

Mr. Crosbie: You get yours straight.

FORECAST UNEMPLOYMENT—ADVICE TO UNEMPLOYED WORKERS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, the minister says he keeps hearing the same questions. Regrettably we on this side keep hearing the same answers and they are totally inadequate. I would like to hear what the Prime Minister has to say on this question. I point out to the minister that Statistics Canada reports, and I quote:

There is no significant change in labour market conditions compared to the previous month.

● (1425)

Statistics Canada recognizes the real numbers of more than one million unemployed and the minister should acknowledge that. On the weekend the Prime Minister gave advice to Canadians who could not afford the high cost of food by telling them to change their priorities. Would the Prime Minister tell the people of Canada, since it is estimated that one out of four in the labour force is going to be out of their job some time next year, what advice he would give to those people who will be unemployed?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I will take notice of the question, Madam Speaker.

Mr. Broadbent: I am sure the unemployed in Canada will take great consolation from the Prime Minister's indifference as revealed in that answer. The Minister of Finance, in spite of his boasting, has forecast an increase in unemployment going upwards of some 150,000 next year. Since factories are operating at the lowest level in two decades, bankruptcies are up and housing starts are down, will the government recognize at long last the serious problems in the Canadian economy, show some concern and bring in some programs which will create jobs instead of higher levels of unemployment?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, if the hon. member would refer to the budget he would realize its main impact is to create jobs—

Mr. Crosbie: Which budget? How many years?

Mr. Trudeau: —through the $15 billion it plans to raise through the energy package over the next three years. For that reason we wish to have the support of this House in passing these budgetary measures as soon as possible.

Mr. Crosbie: You said that yesterday.

Mr. Broadbent: If the Prime Minister will re-read the budget with care he will note an unemployment increase forecast of more than 1 per cent, which means an increase of 150,000 unemployed. Since the Prime Minister has expressed recent concern about the problems of the Third World, which are indeed real, does he not think there is just more than a little hypocrisy in that expressed concern when he ignores the real human problems here in Canada?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, do I understand from the Leader of the NDP that I should stop being concerned about the poor in the Third World?

An hon. Member: What about here?

Mr. Trudeau: Then what is his suggestion, Madam Speaker? The difference between his party and ours is that we can deal with both subjects. We do not have a one-track mind like the NDP.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

CHARGES RESPECTING EXPORTATION OF NUCLEAR COMPONENTS

Hon. Allan Lawrence (Durham-Northumberland): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General. It relates to the allegations made in this House and elsewhere last week regarding the export of some critical and crucial nuclear components to a banned country, namely, Pakistan, by three Canadian citizens. I understand more serious charges have now been laid against these three Canadian citizens.

Why, when the police investigation ended two and a half months ago, after the media raised the question and after the question was raised in this House, have the more serious charges only now been laid?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, the hon. member will understand it would not be proper for me to comment on charges which have been laid and on a case which is now under way.

Mr. Lawrence: Obviously I am not asking the Solicitor General to comment on the merits or the demerits of any prosecution now taking place. I am not talking about that. I am talking about the serious allegations that pressure from the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce and the Department of External Affairs, through the Solicitor General, caused the minor charges to be laid in the first place. That has nothing to do with the case. This concerns improper pressure on the police of this country.

Did the Department of External Affairs and the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce withdraw their pressure on the minister so that these charges have now been laid, or did the RCMP lay these charges in contravention of any direct instructions from the Solicitor General?

Mr. Kaplan: Madam Speaker, no pressures were put on the RCMP working on this particular case. The laying of charges is a police decision made on the basis of whether adequate evidence in available to sustain charges.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PRESS COVERAGE OF PROPOSED FOREIGN TOUR OF PRIME MINISTER

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. After his fiasco of a trip to Saudi Arabia where he humped through that country and after jetting to Europe for discussions there, the Prime Minister is now planning another junket to Latin America and Africa. He is using a Boeing 707 government jet refitted in what is termed a "comfortable configuration". He is limiting accommodation for the press and continuing the policy of restricting access to, and coverage of, himself on a trip which is made at public expense. What criteria, aside from favouritism, is the Prime Minister using in designating seats on this plane with respect to press coverage of his next trip?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, as to the use of the 707 and its comfortable configuration, my understanding is that it is exactly the same plane and the same configuration the hon. member's leader used when he flew to the Commonwealth meeting in Africa last year, so I see nothing exceptional about this. It is the plane which has been used by myself and was used by the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition when he was prime minister.

As far as the press is concerned, my understanding is that the press can send who it wants to whatever events it wishes; but if members of the press want to come on this plane, their numbers will be limited and it will be up to them to choose who they want to send. The reason for this is that some of the countries we are going to—and went to on the last trip—have indicated that they would appreciate it if we did not come with 40 or 50 press people. We are trying to meet that courtesy but, of course, the press is always free to cover every one of my events which takes place publicly in any of the countries I am in.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Madam Speaker, I think the question here is that of access to the Prime Minister on a trip paid for by the taxpayers of Canada. We have the substitution of "mousketeers" in this country by a "junketeer" in the person of the Prime Minister.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lumley: You should be ashamed of yourself.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: The fact of the matter is that the Prime Minister is leaving our country to take these trips at a time when we are having a serious constitutional debate, when unemployment is reaching unprecedented levels—

Mr. MacEachen: It is decreasing.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: —and energy policies are causing great division and collapsing activity in our country. The Prime Minister approved the expenditure of in excess of $60 million for advertising and manipulation of public opinion in this country. Can he not see his way clear to dedicate part of this money to ensure that there is free coverage by the press and not just coverage by what I might term the sycophants of the Prime Minister?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I am sorry to see the hon. member now joining the Leader of the New Democratic Party in describing as junketeering a trip which intends to show Canada's concern for the some billion human beings in this world who are very poor, who go to bed hungry every night and who do not have enough money to live in proper sanitary conditions. If the hon. member is condemning this approach by this government to try to help the plight of the Third World, he can form an alliance with the Leader of the New Democratic Party and let the public judge his position.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: You are doing it in secret.

THE BUDGET

PROJECTIONS RESPECTING UNEMPLOYMENT AND INFLATION—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. It concerns the discrepancy between the projections contained in the budget and the so-called medium-term document which was released at the time of the budget and the figures which are now developing with respect to the state of the Canadian economy. I remind the minister that on page 25 of his budget speech he said, and I quote:

> The fiscal projections are based on the medium-term economic projections described in a companion budget paper.

If we look at the unemployment figures which are being compiled for the year 1980, we see that it will be necessary to have a figure of under 6 per cent in December in order for us to meet the figures which are projected in the budget by the minister on a year-over-year basis. We can see the number of conflicts in the figures with regard to food prices which have now been released and projected for the next year. Most estimates, apart from those of the Department of Finance, show rates as high as 14 per cent or 15 per cent from the Bank of Commerce and 16 per cent from the Ontario Federation of Agriculture.

If it can be established—and I suggest it can—that the projections in the budget both with respect to unemployment next year and to inflation next year are shown to be entirely off base and do not reflect what is really going on in the economy, does the minister not think that it is time for the government to re-think its economic policy to take into account what is clearly a worsening situation?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I have no difficulty in acknowledging to the hon. member that these projections are bound to be revised as conditions, not only in Canada but in the world itself, change. When I gave the budget speech I thought I made it clear that all projections in the budget were at risk. I believe I made that statement in the budget speech. I think it is a reasonable one, and I assure the hon. member that I do not intend to feel apologetic if certain projections which have been laid out for 1981 or even earlier are not realized because of changing conditions. Projecting the economy is a risky business, and I find that economists are more often wrong than they are right.

Mr. Rae: So are Liberals.

Mr. MacEachen: That is no surprise to the hon. member, but I will tell him that if the basic conditions which are outlined in the budget change, then I would of course reconsider the posture which I adopted in the budget. However, I projected inflation and unemployment and I developed a fiscal program which I felt was the best possible one to deal with the situation this country will face over the next year.

Mr. Rae: Madam Speaker, I would like to thank the minister for that answer and point out to him that on Thursday night people in Toronto were treated to a statement by his deputy minister with respect to the inflation problem. He cited a number of factors which meant that inflation was a worse and more severe problem than the department thought only four weeks ago. In light of this fact, the fact that the unemployment situation is clearly worse than projected even in the budget and that the government is prepared to accept an 8.7 per cent official rate of unemployment next year, which means 1.4 million or 1.5 million real unemployed people—which is important—I would like to ask the minister in what way he plans to change the government's policy since he indicated in his first answer that he does not hold to the projections. We are not talking about statistics in the sky. We are talking about whether real people will or will not have jobs next year and the prices real people will be paying for their food next year.

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, the hon. member has talked about inflation, which undoubtedly is a very serious problem, and the chances are that it will not abate in the near future. However, every proposal I have heard from him, from his leader and from every member of his party, if adopted, would add to the inflationary problem.

Mr. Broadbent: That is absurd.

Mr. MacEachen: It is absolutely the case that every proposal in the form of increased spending and in the form of instructions to the governor of the Bank of Canada to reduce interest rates, if adopted, would really show the country what inflation could be like under a New Democratic Party government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Oral Questions

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

PROPOSED WASTE DISPOSAL SITE AT SOUTH CAYUGA, ONT.

Mr. Bud Bradley (Haldimand-Norfolk): Madam Speaker, my question should be diverted to the Minister of the Environment. I will give him the benefit of the doubt and say that it appears he has sneaked out for coffee. Possibly the acting minister or the parliamentary secretary can answer my question.

I am sure the minister is aware of the action taken by the province of Ontario in establishing an industrial waste dispoal site in South Cayuga, as pointed out in my motion under Standing Order 43, without holding an environmental hearing. I am equally sure the minister is aware that it will replace all 12 existing sites in Ontario, that it is on agricultural land and that it will require transportation of toxic wastes through the greatly populated agricultural heartland of Ontario.

Has the minister or his department taken or planned any action pertaining to this obvious denial of the individual's right to be heard?

[Translation]

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the minister, I shall refer to him the question asked by the hon. member at the earliest opportunity and ensure that the hon. member receives a full reply.

[English]

Madam Speaker: Does the hon. member wish to ask a supplementary question? I would not think so since the minister is not here.

Mr. Bradley: Yes, I do, Madam Speaker. I am sorry there is not someone opposite who could have given me some sort of answer.

I am sure the minister will know that this site rests between Lake Erie, a national waterway, and the Grand River, which is a major tributary to Lake Erie and is of national importance. This site is only one mile from the Grand River, Madam Speaker, and it is on a type of land that is shrinking only too quickly at this time.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. Would the hon. member please put the question. Supplementary questions must be kept fairly short.

Mr. Bradley: Would the minister please answer my supplementary question, since I see he has returned?

An hon. Member: Ask your question.

Mr. Bradley: Since a national waterway is involved at a site only 40 miles from Niagara Falls and the Love Canal and only 40 miles from the constituency of the hon. member for Hamilton West, and since this is a matter with which the minister has been involved, will the minister have his department check into the propriety of this decision and ensure that proper studies and tests are carried out to protect the residents of the Great Lakes area?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): As the hon. gentleman knows, we are dealing here essentially with a question under the jurisdiction of the provincial government of Ontario, but given the very evident concern he has expressed, I will have my officials look into the matter.

METRIC CONVERSION

MEMORANDUM RESPECTING RESUMPTION OF PROGRAM

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Madam Speaker, my question was to be directed to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs or, in his absence, to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. However, in the absence of both of them, I wonder if I might put my question to the Prime Minister. It concerns a memo delivered to my office this morning which says, in one line, that we can expect, as members of Parliament, a low-key announcement or a press release on the resumption of forced metric conversion coast to coast on January 1, 1982, this announcement to take place in late December or early January at a time when the public and the press are still in a festive period and not on the alert.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Domm: Would the Prime Minister advise the House if a decision has been made by the Privy Council, the cabinet or any of his ministers to proceed with forced implementation of metric conversion in the retail food sector on January 1?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Would the hon. member say who signed the memo, Madam Speaker?

An hon. Member: Pierre Trudeau.

Mr. Domm: The Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs advised the House that they were considering proceeding with metric conversion on January 1, 1982. My question to the Prime Minister is this. In light of his minister's confirmation of the intent and in light of this notice, would the Prime Minister confirm to the House that it is a fact that the government is going to proceed coast to coast in the retail food sector with metric conversion on January 1, 1982?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, we have a minister present who could deal with the substance of the question, but the hon. member prefaced his question by saying he had received a one line memo, if I understood him correctly. Could he tell us who signed that one line memo so that we know with whom we are dealing in the House?

An hon. Member: Answer the question.

Mr. Domm: Madam Speaker, this is not my supplementary question, but I will tell the Prime Minister that it was his own ministry which confirmed to the House that forced metric conversion will proceed.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Trudeau: Who signed the memo?

An hon. Member: Who is questioning whom around here?

Mr. Domm: My supplementary question to the Prime Minister is this.

An hon. Member: It's gossip, that's what it is.

Mr. Domm: This is not gossip.

An hon. Member: They don't sign memos.

Mr. Domm: My question deals with an American press release today. The American press has notified the people of the United States that Congress is not going to proceed with forced metric conversion for ten or 15 years in the retail food sector in the United States. Would the Prime Minister state in the House that, so far as metric conversion is concerned, we should be in harmony with our trading partner to the south and not be an island unto ourselves. My supplementary question is this. His ministry has confirmed that we might proceed with metric conversion on January 1, 1982. Would the Prime Minister confirm that there has been a decision to proceed, or are we being given no direction? Will there be metric conversion, regardless whether or not the United States is with us?

Some hon. Members: Put the question.

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, hon. members here have difficulties when hon. members opposite do not follow the rules and introduce all kinds of preambles to their questions, trying to use preambles to convey falsehoods or spread rumours which are unfounded. I wish the hon. member would come clear and give us a copy of that memo so we could know to whom he is referring.

An hon. Member: Answer the policy question.

REGIONAL AND ECONOMIC EXPANSION

LOCKEPORT, N.S.—RECONSTRUCTION OF FISH PLANT

Mr. Ted Miller (Nanaimo-Alberni): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, I should like to address my question to the Minister of Finance who is from Nova Scotia. On July 23 of this year, a fire in Lockeport, Nova Scotia, destroyed the National Sea Products fish plant which was the major employer of some 300 people in the community of 1,030 people. Could the minister indicate to the House and to the people in that community who are dependent on the fish plant at what stage negotiations are now between DREE and National Sea Products for the reconstruction of that plant, and if one of the stumbling blocks to the reconstruction is the high interest rate policy followed by the government?

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Madam Speaker, I should like to mention to the hon. member that the policies of this government are not a factor in the decision to go ahead with assistance to the fish plant at Lockeport. The feasibility of proceeding with financial assistance to that fish plant is being investigated at present by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, and we believe we will have a recommendation from the Nova Scotia office very shortly.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

EFFECTS OF FISH PLANT CLOSURE ON UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. Ted Miller (Nanaimo-Alberni): Madam Speaker, it was my information that the region had referred that decision to the federal government by now.

I should like to address my supplementary question to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. The minister is aware of the fact that the closure of that plant has indeed affected approximately 20 smaller fish plants in the area and a number of fishing vessels. It has also led to the unemployment of 200 people as of now and a further 100 people in the near future, people who are highly qualified to work in fish plants. Has the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans been in contact with his colleagues, the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion and the Minister of Employment and Immigration, and has he made any recommendations to those ministers on how we might overcome this highly unacceptable situation in Lockeport?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Madam Speaker, yes, the Department of Fisheries and Oceans and the Department of Regional Economic Expansion have been working together. One of the problems is that the application to replace the plant was predicated on a considerable increase in production, and this is an area which is highly competitive and where, in fact, fishermen are sought out by the plants for their products. We have said that we could see a replacement of a plant of the same size as the one which burned down. In that sense we would support the recommendation, but we would certainly not support a recommendation for an increase in the capacity of that plant or of other plants in the area because the area is already quite well equipped with fish processing plants.

Oral Questions

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

POLAND—POSSIBLE INTERVENTION BY U.S.S.R.—INQUIRY RESPECTING ACTION TAKEN BY CANADA

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister who will know that Admiral Falls, the chief of the NATO military committee, has said:

The ability of the Soviets to intervene in Poland is such that they could do it with very little warning. Indeed I am talking of hours, not days—

The Prime Minister will know that leaders of other nations have warned that such an intervention would destroy détente. I wonder if the Prime Minister can tell the House whether he or his Secretary of State for External Affairs has yet called in the Soviet ambassador to Canada to express Canada's concern about Soviet troops massing around Poland?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, to my knowledge the Secretary of State for External Affairs has not called in the Soviet ambassador as yet.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, I wonder if the Prime Minister could tell us why that elementary step has not been taken?

Mr. Trudeau: Because I communicated directly with Mr. Brezhnev of the Soviet Union, Madam Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

● (1450)

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, we would all be interested in the contents of that communication. I would ask the Prime Minister why it has not been made public and to affirm that it will be made public.

While he is is on his feet, and since he indicated that, rather than dealing through ambassadors, he has been responding to this question by correspondence and conversations with other world leaders, will he indicate whether he has had any response from the other world leaders to whom he made reference the other day, what has been the nature of that response and the nature of the plan which is being evolved by Canada and other countries to try to deal with this question?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I gave the answer to the first part of the question in the House the other day—

Mr. Forrestall: Whose side are you on?

Mr. Trudeau: —that Canada has been concerned about trying to establish some collective attitude vis-à-vis the threats in Poland and vis-à-vis the possible disturbances there. The other day I answered by indicating what communications I had had with other summit heads of government and state.

As to possible co-operation, there is such consultation, as I suggested, taking place now in NATO, with the Secretary of State for External Affairs being present and consulting on the subject with our allies. Also there will be a meeting in Paris in a few days with like-minded countries to consider a possible alleviation of some of the economic problems in Poland. There will be consultation on this subject, much along the lines suggested by the member from Vancouver—

Mr. Forrestall: You are not prepared to pay for it, and you know it.

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I am not quite clear what—

Mr. Forrestall: Come clean.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member does not have the floor at this time.

Mr. Trudeau: Perhaps the hon. member could discuss this matter with his leader and come together on some kind of coherent policy on their part.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, the Prime Minister neglected to answer the question whether he would table the communication with Mr. Brezhnev. Also he neglected to indicate why that communication was not made public in the first place.

Mr. Trudeau: Because, Madam Speaker, we are not trying to get political credit; we are trying to get the West united against a possible danger to the West.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

SUPPLY AND SERVICES

F-18A FIGHTER AIRCRAFT CONTRACT—INQUIRY WHETHER NOTICE OF DELAY RECEIVED

Hon. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Supply and Services. Under the rather feckless new fighter aircraft contract, McDonnell-Douglas cannot be held responsible for "excusable delays", a very broad category which includes "any action of government". As the United States government has delayed the defence systems acquisition review council decision on F-18A production, and as the Australian government has postponed its decision on a possible F-18A purchase, has our government received any notice of delay as required by the contract?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): Madam Speaker, we have not received any notice of delay under the contract.

Mr. McKinnon: Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the same minister. In the new fighter aircraft contract, the October 31 payment, milestone No. 5, brings the cumulative total payment to $25 million; but that payment was subject to "completion of a review of contractor progress by the contract authority", that is, the government. Was the review made, was it satisfactory, and was the payment made?

Mr. Blais: Madam Speaker, with reference to that specific contract, I will have to inquire and inform the hon. member.

UNITED NATIONS

SUGGESTED INVESTIGATION OF SITUATION IN POLAND BY SECURITY COUNCIL

Mr. Jesse P. Flis (Parkdale-High Park): Madam Speaker, my question is supplementary to the one posed by the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition. Since he has difficulty posing questions on Poland, I thought I would ask this question of the Prime Minister.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Flis: In view of the fact that the Soviet Union has apparently completed its preparations for a possible intervention in Poland, and that the United Nations, under Chapter VI, article 34 of its charter, may have its security council investigate any dispute or any situation which might lead to international friction or give rise to a dispute in order to determine whether the continuance of the dispute or situation is likely to endanger the maintenance of international peace and security, would the Prime Minister say whether he is prepared to ask the United Nations Security Council, through proper channels, to proceed under the terms of article 34 in an effort to maintain world peace?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, certainly I think that is a most worthy suggestion and I will bring it to the attention of the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

INQUIRY WHETHER RETIREES WILL BENEFIT FROM INDEXATION

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the President of the Treasury Board concerning two important subjects that normally prompt questions at year's end. First I would like to know whether the hon. gentleman has decided upon a definite policy concerning public servants who will retire before December 31—more specifically, will they receive cost of living indexation for the year in which they retire, and what indexing rate will apply for the current year?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, on the first part of the question, we still intend to bring in amendments to the act concerning the particular matter raised by the hon. member. As far as the indexation rate is concerned, we will be announcing soon the rate that will apply to the current year.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

LOCKEPORT, N.S.—REQUEST FOR TEMPORARY OFFICE TO HANDLE CLAIMS

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Madam Speaker, I have a question which I should direct to the minister of manpower and immigration, but in his absence—

An hon. Member: He is here.

An hon. Member: He is half here.

Mr. Crouse: I am sorry. My question is directed to the minister of manpower, who was hiding behind the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. Some four months after the destruction of the National Sea Products plant in Lockeport, Nova Scotia, unfortunately only 33 per cent of the displaced work force have found new employment. Since an estimated 200 former National Sea Products employees have filed for Unemployment Insurance Commission benefits, and some 25 of these workers have yet to receive a cent of assistance in the last four months due to bureaucratic red tape, will the minister take steps to open a temporary office in the town of Lockeport in order to handle the claims of these citizens who are really unemployed through no fault of their own, through what is really a disaster?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, although the hon. member was a little late in recognizing who the minister is, the name of the department is the Department of Employment and Immigration and it has been that way for two years.

Miss MacDonald: Lloyd who?

Mr. Axworthy: I would answer the hon. member by saying that we have a procedure whereby we establish consultative committees in towns affected by industrial change, strikes or lay-offs. We are quite prepared to establish such a committee to work with local citizens and provincial authorities to respond to the conditions the member described. I will ask my officials to look into it right away and give him a report.

Mr. Crouse: Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the same minister. Since the only recourse of many of these people is municipal social assistance, which will cost the county of Shelburne an estimated $40,000 per month from now until spring of until some employment opportunities are provided, what special steps is the government planning to take to help ease this financial burden?

Mr. Axworthy: Madam Speaker, I would point out that welfare payments are already covered to the extent of 50 per cent of the cost by the federal government through the Canada Assistance Plan program, but I indicated to the hon. member that we will be looking into the situation, establishing a Manpower consultative committee if it is required, and working with local authorities to provide for any remedial solutions. As soon as I have a proper assessment of the conditions, I will give him a report and make sure that we take the steps that are necessary.

RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT

INQUIRY RESPECTING LONG-TERM FUNDING PLANS

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina East): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Science and Technology. It has become obvious that there is a tremendous need for long-term strategy as it relates to research and development. Not too long ago the chief research director for the Lamontagne Senate committee estimated that if we had had 1.5 per cent of our gross national product devoted to research and development we would have generated 1.52 million new jobs and $15.4 billion in additional exports.

Research and development requires long-term planning and there is none. The minister stated not too long ago that he would tell the country in a few weeks when the government will be prepared to bring in its long-term funding arrangements. Could the minister inform the House and the scientific community in this country when the government will be prepared to lay out its long-term funding plans in order to bring research and development to 1.5 per cent of the gross national product?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): Very soon, Madam Speaker. I look forward to some opportunity early in the new year to be able to present our proposals in this regard.

Mr. de Jong: Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister. He mentioned in committee it would be two weeks, and that was a week ago. I have noted in another press release that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce suggested spring, 1981; I hope it will be sooner.

My supplementary question also relates to research and development and university funding. The universities are in a state of—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. It is not necessary for the hon. member to respond to the minister's answer before asking his supplementary question. The hon. member should go directly to his question.

Mr. de Jong: Madam Speaker, I will go immediately to my question. Will the government commit itself to a review of existing fiscal transfer arrangements with the provinces to ensure that Canadian universities will in the future receive provincial support at a level commensurate with national research and development targets? Will the government also ensure that university research in industrial and technological development is related to provincial as well as national interests?

Mr. Roberts: Madam Speaker, the hon. member read his question rather quickly and I am not sure I caught all of the nuances. If he is asking whether there is a review under way of educational transfer arrangements, I would say that in the general reconsideration of the established programs financing arrangements, that is taking place.

PRIVILEGE

MR. WADDELL—STATEMENTS MADE BY MR. ANDRE

Madam Speaker: On November 28, 1980, the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell) raised a question of privilege in which he objected to the use of the term "McCarthyism" by the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre), who had applied that term to describe certain actions of the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway. In turn, the hon. member for Calgary Centre objected to the use of the term "separatism", which had been applied by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway to describe a position taken by the hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington), and others. A spirited debate ensued, which I followed closely, and which demonstrated to my satisfaction that however opprobrious the terms "McCarthyism" and "separatism" might be, they do not fall within the general class of words such as "crook, demagogue, idiot", and so forth, which have been ruled unparliamentary.

Whether one approves of the connotations or not, the words "McCarthyism" and "separatism" have become part of the political vocabulary and therefore their applicability is a matter of interpretation and debate in which the Chair has no role.

Furthermore, I would suggest that Erskine May offers a useful test of unparliamentary language at page 445 of the nineteenth edition where it is stated:

> From time to time the Chair has intervened to deal with the use of certain expressions in debate, which, in the context in which they were used, were abusive or insulting and of a nature to cause disorder.

It seems to me, therefore, that to be unparliamentary in the true sense, the language must be both abusive or insulting and give rise to a certain disorder.

Having said all of that, however, I would draw the attention of all hon. members to another passage in the same edition of Erskine May at page 429 where it is stated:

> Good temper and moderation are the characteristics of parliamentary language. Parliamentary language is never more desirable than when a member is canvassing the opinions and conduct of his opponents in debate.

MR. BROADBENT—STATEMENT MADE BY MR. TRUDEAU DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, I rise on a separate question of privilege. Earlier in the day in the question period the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), in answer to me and a member for the Conservative party, suggested that the New Democractic Party does not share his stated interest in problems of the Third World. Madam Speaker, my question of privilege is that the Prime Minister was misstating reality, of which he ought to have been aware. I want to make it known that this party has always made it abundantly clear to anyone who would listen that we will support any effort to alleviate poverty in the Third World. Furthermore, we will support the Prime Minister with respect to his trip abroad, which he plans to make after Christmas. If he comes back with a commitment made by Canada to do at least what the average Scandinavian countries are doing for the Third World, he will have the support of the New Democratic Party.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: But the point raised in the question by myself was that the Prime Minister should begin at home, as well, in showing concern for the problems faced by Canadians. They are not mutually exclusive concerns.

Madam Speaker: The hon. member does not have a question of privilege. I think he realizes that. He did want to make a point, and I suppose he has made it.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. HNATYSHYN—STATEMENT MADE BY MR. TRUDEAU DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. In view of the fact that there was not a question of privilege by the Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent), I simply want to indicate that I was not standing on that same question of privilege because I think the Prime Minister's statement was beneath contempt. I refuse to answer that stupid kind of accusation.

PRIVILEGE

MR. SARGEANT—CANADA COMMUNITY DEVELOPMENT PROJECTS IN MANITOBA

Madam Speaker: I have notice of a question of privilege from the hon. member for Selkirk-Interlake (Mr. Sargeant).

Mr. Terry Sargeant (Selkirk-Interlake): Madam Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege affecting many members of this House. It concerns some of the actions, or perhaps lack of actions, by the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr.

Axworthy) in the matter of granting ministerial approval for Canada community development projects.

It has come to my attention to date that so far in Manitoba only 12 projects submitted by local advisory boards from the whole province have been approved. Each and every one of these 12 projects originated from the Winnipeg ridings of St. Boniface and Winnipeg-Fort Garry. Coincidentally, these are the only two ridings held in Manitoba by the Liberal party. I submit that such action is inexcusable. How can the minister, at a time of tremendously high unemployment—indeed, we heard questions earlier this afternoon about the state of unemployment in this country today—play petty partisan politics with job-creation programs?

It is not bad enough that we learned today that the only projects so far approved come from Liberal ridings, but we also learned that for some reason there will be a further delay in approving the remaining projects in Manitoba. Under the guidelines established by his department some of these projects were to have started on November 17. I am willing to accept the delay of a few days, or perhaps a week to a week and a half, but it is now reaching beyond an acceptable length of time. By the time these programs are approved it will be after Christmas and the new year before work will be started on those projects.

This is not the first time this has happened. Last spring my colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill (Mr. Blaikie), asked the minister to explain delays in approving Summer Youth Employment projects. At that time we were told that because some members had not followed the rules which the minister had laid down we, the members of Parliament, were the cause of the delay. However, we found upon closer scrutiny that this was not really the case and it was an unfair charge. What cannot be the subject of debate at this time, though, is that members of Parliament from Manitoba have played by the rules. Some local advisory board recommendations have been sitting in the minister's office since at least November 12 but we have not heard a word on these projects, other than those few projects I mentioned earlier in the Liberal ridings.

How can we members of Parliament be expected to perform our jobs if ministers of the Crown engage in, what seems to me to be, seemingly petty activities? The minister and his department set up the rules, and in Selkirk-Interlake we followed those rules. We set up the local advisory board. They met and held two or three meetings. They made their recommendations. We received good co-operation from his officials in Winnipeg and I understand that they have forwarded the recommendations of the local advisory board to the minister's office. At this point we come to the foul-up. The minister seems to have thrown a spanner into the works.

Today we learn that there are a further 3,000 people unemployed in Manitoba. My riding of Selkirk-Interlake has an unemployment rate of 8.2 per cent, the highest rate in Manitoba. Unemployment rates in Winnipeg North Centre, Winnipeg North, and the Churchill riding are all very high. Yet the minister has seen fit to approve projects for Manitoba in the wealthy suburbs of Winnipeg, such as St. Boniface and Fort Garry, where, by his own department's calculation, unemployment is the lowest.

What are the priorities of this minister? Why has he chosen to put partisan interests ahead of the economic well-being of his own province? Among my roles as a member of Parliament is the selection of applications for the Canada community development programs. This role was defined by the minister. By subverting this process and by not approving the programs until much after the start-up date, he is denying me the right of properly fulfilling this role. I submit that this violates my privileges as a member of Parliament.

I am sure, Madam Speaker, that you understand how important this matter is, and I hope your ruling will allow us to straighten out this unfortunate situation and get people to work in the province of Manitoba and, indeed, in other provinces where there may be these same kinds of hold-ups. There are areas in my riding which have unemployment rates at the present time of some 95 per cent, due mostly to the closing of the fishing season. For the minister or his department to hold up these programs at this time is unconscionable and I would ask, Madam Speaker, that you give a favourable ruling on the matter.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Madam Speaker, I rise on the same question of privilege. I want to point out to the minister that two years ago Canada Works in Manitoba was allocated $9.5 million, under a Liberal government. This year, two years later, when unemployment is higher, the allocation is $2.5 million, less than 30 per cent of what we received two years ago. Two years ago in the two constituencies represented by myself and my colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), the allocation for Canada Works programs was over $2 million, and half of that was for native employment. This year the allocation for the Canada community development program is just over $400,000. That is less than 20 per cent of what we received two years ago.

We are told that the reason for the reduction is that the rate of unemployment is low in our city and that in my constituency there are only 904 unemployed native people. I do not know from where the minister or his department collected these figures, but I am sure that the minister knows that the survey done by the Winnipeg school division showed unemployment rates of 50 per cent in the core area of the city.

I refer the minister to an article written by Val Werier, respected Winnipeg columnist, which appeared recently in the Winnipeg Free Press. He quotes the comments of some of the school principals in charge of schools in the core area, and I would like to take a moment to put some of them on the record. The principal of David Livingstone School said:

> The unemployment rate among the school parents is 53 per cent.

That is in his school. The principal of the Aberdeen School says:

Of 370 students, 80 per cent are of native origin. Unemployment among parents is 55 per cent.

The article goes on to say that at the William Whyte School, of 383 students more than half are from families with single parents and with an unemployment rate of 55 per cent.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I am afraid that the hon. member is not applying his remarks to the point of the question of privilege. I have seen no indication of a question of privilege yet. If the hon. member wishes to be helpful to the Chair, he should focus on his arguments to prove the privilege.

Mr. Orlikow: Madam Speaker, I was just coming to that, but allow me to put on the record one more quotation from the article. The principal of the William Whyte School is quoted as saying:

We are talking about a Third World right within our own city.

That comment is apropos of the questions raised earlier today.

My question of privilege arises because we co-operated with the minister, despite the very low allocations for our areas. We appointed our advisory committees to work on the applications, and they followed the guidelines laid down by the minister and his department. The applications were examined and screened, and the best ones were sent forward to the minister. Here we are in December with a very high rate of unemployment in the core area of Winnipeg, and the minister has not seen fit to look at and approve the applications which have been recommended so that these people who are unemployed can get on with the job. We are talking about people who are living in real poverty and slum conditions. It is a disgrace that the minister has not—and I would say it is for political reasons—seen fit to move these applications forward.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I would like to address myself to the purported question of privilege brought forward by the combined forces of the Manitoba New Democratic Party. In saying that I underline the fact that it has less to do with privilege and more to do with politics, obviously in the Conservative tact. I spent 12 hours in this House yesterday on estimates, at which time hon. members had every opportunity to raise any question, make any comment, or bring anything to my attention. Neither of the hon. gentlemen who raised the question of privilege had the courtesy or the respect to raise this issue during that period of time. It suggests to me that they are simply using this particular opportunity to make a political point.

In so far as the question is concerned, the hon. member for Selkirk-Interlake (Mr. Sargeant) is dead wrong. The projects for Manitoba constituencies were approved well over a week ago and sent to the regional office for distribution. There was no hold-up in my office. I approved something like 900 projects in the past week which were recommended by all parties, and I intend to approve the rest of the projects this week.

The projects for any one constituency were not held up. As far as I know, the projects for Manitoba were approved, but I do not know why there was a hold-up. I will check into it, but it must be somewhere between my office and the regional office.

It would have been far more in keeping with the procedures, rules and conventions of this House if the hon. member, rather than protesting so much, had had the common decency to call my office, and he would have received that information. It is not a question of privilege, but a question of sheer street-barrel politics.

Mr. Sargeant: Madam Speaker—

Madam Speaker: I will cut the debate. The hon. member for Selkirk-Interlake (Mr. Sargeant) knows he cannot speak twice on the same question of privilege. I will not entertain any other hon. members on the question of privilege because, as it was posed, I did not find a prima facie case of privilege. The hon. member might perhaps have a legitimate grievance, but he certainly does not have a question of privilege. The matter is a perfect subject for debate, and the hon. member should perhaps take advantage of the proper time to introduce that debate, but that is up to him.

In his intervention the hon. member said that the minister had not played by the rules. The rules to which he referred were not the rules of the House of Commons. The hon. member also said that the minister established the rules and that everybody is required to follow those rules except the minister. I reiterate that these are not the rules of the House of Commons and, therefore, the entire matter is completely outside my jurisdiction. So, if as the hon. member has suggested, the matter needs to be straightened out, I would suggest that the two hon. members straighten it out between themselves. Certainly it is not a matter in which the Chair can usefully intervene.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 1,641, 1,679 and 1,736.

[Text]

ADMIRAL ROBERT FALLS

1. Was Admiral Robert Falls originally appointed a special defence adviser to the Prime Minister as a way of technically getting around regulations preventing him from being paid his salary by the government while working for NATO and, if so (a) on what date did he (i) commence (ii) cease to receive a salary for such position (b) was the cabinet order appointing him revoked and, if so, on what date?

2. Has the government found an alternative method of paying public funds to Admiral Falls and (a) if so, what are all the details (b) if not, is the stipend to Admiral Falls being covered by interests other than the Canadian government or is he working for nothing in return for accommodation and accoutrements therein being supplied to him by the government in Brussels, Belgium?

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): 1. In accordance with a standard procedure, Admiral R. Falls was appointed a special adviser to the Prime Minister in order that his salary could be set and reviewed in the same way as are the salaries of senior public servants occupying positions in agencies and departments in Canada.

1 (a) and (b) and 2.

Admiral Falls began to receive a salary effective May 31, 1980, and continues to receive such salary. Until October 2, 1980, Admiral Falls was paid under the authority of the order in council appointing him special adviser to the Prime Minister. On October 2, 1980, that order in council was revoked, as an amendment to the Queen's regulations and orders had been approved by Treasury Board on September 18, 1980 which will allow Admiral Falls' salary to be set by the Minister of National Defence on the advice of the committee of senior officials on executive personnel.

PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARIES—ANSWER TO QUESTIONS IN THE HOUSE

Question No. 1,679—Mr. Cossitt:

1. With reference to the answers to questions numbered 1,484, 1,485 and 1,488 (a) whose signature appears on the manuscript of the answers and is it that of the Parliamentary Secretary to the Secretary of State and Minister of Communications (b) which state in part, "I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as follows: . . . ", on what date was the Parliamentary Secretary informed and what was the name and job designation of the person who informed him?

2. (a) Is the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation owned by the people of Canada and is it responsible to Parliament through the Secretary of State (b) is it government policy that the CBC is the only Crown corporation that does not have to answer questions by members of Parliament on its internal management, administration, etc. and, if so, for what reason?

3. Will the government consider making the CBC accountable on all of its operations to Parliament and, if not, for what reason?

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): 1. Standing Orders of the House of Commons provide for ministers and parliamentary secretaries to answer questions and table documents in the House. The government takes full parliamentary responsibility for its answers to questions.

2. (a) The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is owned by the Queen in Right of Canada.

3. The government supports the policies it has on several occasions laid before the House of Commons.

CANADIAN ARSENALS LTD.—ORDER FOR AMMUNITION

Question No. 1,736—Mr. McKinnon:

Did the Department of National Defence place a $2,828,535 order for ammunition with Canadian Arsenals Ltd. under contract number MA20.3689502 and, if so, (a) for what type of ammunition? (b) how many rounds will be purchased?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services):

The House resumed, from Monday, December 8, consideration in committee of Bill C-47, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the Government of Canada for the financial year ending March 31, 1981—Mr. Pinard—Mr. Francis in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Vote No. 1

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Chairman and hon. members, I welcome this opportunity of reviewing with you the spending estimates of Agriculture Canada. My department's activities touch the lives of all Canadians every day and so I am glad that you and I will have the chance to explore in the public eye just what Agriculture Canada is doing to assist our basic agricultural industry and also to safeguard the health, and the pocketbooks, of Canadian consumers.

I believe these next couple of days will serve to highlight the tremendous importance that the agri-food industry will continue to have in the development of our great country.

In this context I want you to realize that Agriculture Canada operates with only 1.3 per cent of the total federal budget. Mr. Chairman, that is something that a lot of people do not understand. When asked how much money is spent on Agriculture Canada by the federal government, a lot of people who one would think would know better, estimate anywhere from 30 per cent to 20 per cent, or 12 per cent. But, Mr. Chairman, only 1.3 per cent of the total federal budget is spent on Agriculture Canada and, Mr. Chairman and members of this committee, we run the best ship of all and take second place to no one! That amount is extremely modest considering the benefits agriculture brings to all Canadians.

I would like to pause for a moment to consider the record of achievement of the Canadian farmer who has always faced a multitude of hardships and challenges. Consider the geographic and climatic adversities, where less than 10 per cent of our 2,272 million acres of land can be farmed.

Fully two-thirds of Canada cannot be used for any commercial agriculture due to climate and soil limitations. And of the remaining one-third, most is limited by too much moisture, rockiness or steepness. There are only about 200 million acres of potentially usable land and to date we have developed about 174 million acres. But really less than 24 million acres out of the total is top class land in the climatically favoured areas. In short, the Canadian farmer has had to do much more with less than his counterpart in many other countries.

We have about 3 per cent of the world's farmland and yet we are producing a sizeable percentage of the world's food—up to 6 per cent of the world's wheat and barley; 12 per cent of the world's oats, and 2 per cent of the world's meat and milk products.

Not only are the Canadian farmer's outstanding achievements heralded on the world's stage, but the accomplishments at home are just as remarkable. For example, between the years 1975 and 1978 the productivity of the Canadian farmer was almost twice that of the labour productivity of other industrial sectors. As a matter of fact, if you go back even further, 20 years ago each of our farmers was producing enough food to feed less than 30 people, and now the Canadian farmer can produce enough food to feed more than 55 people. And, what is more, it is estimated that by the year 2000 one Canadian farmer will be feeding nearly 200 people. If you travel from coast to coast, you will find that the average Canadian farmer produces nearly $3,000 worth of food more than his counterpart in the United States. In my opinion, the work of the Canadian farmer is second to none and that is a fact that I feel, from time to time, we do not pay enough heed to.

Right now, one out of every four Canadians works in a food-related job, from production to processing to transportation to retailing to farm machinery manufacturing, and so on. The agri-food industry generates billions of dollars of income. As a matter of fact this year gross farm income alone will surpass $15 billion, and when you take into account that every dollar made in farming is multiplied by three as it works its way through the economy, the impact on all of Canada is significant.

One of the more important factors of late for the Canadian farmer has been the stabilization of the marketplace. The Canadian consumer has been given the opportunity to buy food, good Canadian products at a reasonable cost, while at the same time the Canadian farmer has been able to depend on a reasonable return for his labour and investment most years. To take the peaks and valleys out of farm markets and deliver more in the way of confidence for the Canadian farmer has always been one of the priorities of my department.

We have instituted assistance programs on several fronts that include transportation, storage, and insurance. We have made payments under the Agricultural Stabilization Act when farm prices have fallen drastically. The Agricultural Products Board has bought and processed surplus fruits and vegetables when this action was needed to stabilize prices.

But the bottom line has always been to create an atmosphere of stability. Another example is crop insurance. This year Canadian farmers increased their crop insurance coverage by about 30 per cent. Our higher spending on crop insurance in 1980-1981 represents about $23 million of the more than $62 million requested in the supplementary estimates. I feel crop insurance is one of the major security blankets farmers have to provide real income stability.

In many parts of Canada people do not realize who pays for crop insurance. The Government of Canada pays 50 per cent of the producer's premiums. The producer pays the other 50 per cent, and the administration is run and paid for by the provinces. In some parts of Canada you would think the federal government had nothing to do with this insurance program. For instance, if you read the brochures on crop insurance in Saskatchewan, you would hardly know that there was any federal participation in it.

An hon. Member: You are learning from Fleming.

Mr. Whelan: Crop insurance is there in case there is a disaster. When the funds run out we have to make up 75 per cent of the funds to be raised in the event there is not enough in the fund itself. Many people are not aware of that fact either.

In addition, this past year there were other programs to help farmers faced with crop losses. These included the Herd Maintenance Assistance Program and the Fodder Procurement Program, and other federal responses to the drought in the west and in northwestern Ontario. The Fodder Procurement Program, which is administered by Agriculture Canada, could cost about $16.8 million, but we do not think the amount will be that high. However, that would be the utmost. The herd maintenance program is administered by the PFRA. This program will cost over $60 million to maintain the herds in western Canada, particularly in Saskatchewan and Manitoba, part of Alberta, and also in part of northern Ontario.

The popularity of several other Agriculture Canada programs has meant that an increase in funding was necessary. For example, growers of storable crops have shown a great deal of interest in the Advance Payments for Crops Act, and have increased their involvement to an extent where $3 million will be needed to cover the interest payments on these loans to farm co-operatives and commodity boards making advance payments to their members. This $3 million is because these funds are interest free.

These funds are being used more and more extensively all the time. We instituted this program four years ago. It helps farmers make payments for farm operations that year without distress selling. British Columbia uses this program more than any other province or part of Canada. People in British Columbia are now in a position, using this program and also the fruit and vegetable construction financial assistance program, to assist the industry in constructing storage facilities. They told me the other day that B.C. will be exporting more this year than before, even though the competition is rough.

Last year B.C. exported apples to 34 countries. That is as a result of this program which this fiscal year will require more than $3 million to cover the cost of the program. I would not be surprised if they are back to ask for more money because of the applications which we have already received for this assistance in building storage for fruit and vegetables.

At the outset of my remarks, I said that the Canadian farmer's record of achievement under adverse conditions has been remarkable. One factor that has gone a long way to help has been Agriculture Canada's involvement in research and development. Our scientists are working to develop new plant strains and superior livestock, so that the Canadian farmer will have even hardier and more efficient raw materials and livestock to work with in the future. At present Agriculture Canada conducts about one half of the agricultural research performed in Canada. The division is shared 98 per cent by government, and 2 per cent by provinces. The rest is covered by universities, etc.

As a matter of fact, although there have been recent cuts in departmental expenditures we have protected and increased the budget for the research and development component of departmental activities. This year our budget was nearly $155 million, or about $5 for each man, woman and child across the country. But if you are just relating it to a per capita expenditure for those people involved in the agricultural sector, the figure then is closer to $122 per person.

I am proud that our involvement in the research and development field represents one of the highest dollar figures and one of the best results of any country in the world. I strongly support the federal government's plans to increase over-all research expenditures from .9 per cent of the GNP to 1.5 per cent by 1985. We have a number of valuable research projects that could start if we got additional funds.

There has been a lot of talk about Canada's natural resources of late, having to do with energy. But what about the energy source, food, that fuels the human body? It, too, is a renewable resource, supplied by a great force in this country, namely, the Canadian farmer.

In this House we must never underestimate the importance of agriculture to the economy, history, culture and national unity of this great country, Canada. It is in that spirit that I come before you today requesting your support for Agriculture Canada's programs so that we may continue to lend our whole-hearted support to those who supply this nation and the world with the lifegiving resource of food.

Mr. Wise: Mr. Chairman, I hoped that in the minister's statement he would have answered some of the questions which I have in mind. Unfortunately, he chose to deal in general terms with the activities of the department and the industry. I am positive that we will demonstrate today and tomorrow that bringing the Minister of Agriculture's estimates before the House is to again draw to the attention of the House and Canadians the absolute necessity of maintaining the agricultural industry's health, strength, and vitality.

I am certain that during the course of this session we will be able to illustrate in numerous areas that the government has ignored many of the serious problems facing the agricultural community.

Agriculture, in our government, was at the centre of decision-making. If you look at the record during that short period of time we were in office, it would be very difficult to challenge that statement. The record will demonstrate that we delivered on our promises and we fulfilled our commitments. In contrast, the industry under this government more often than not simply receives lip service, brief bursts of attention and indications of action, actions which seldom, if ever, materialize or develop.

When we assumed office the department and the industry were still reeling from the cuts delivered unilaterally in August, 1978, by the Prime Minister's office. Within our brief term of office we reinstated those programs and restored the funding. For example, we added person years to the inspection branch and we added some $13 million to the research division.

I am sure you would agree, Mr. Chairman, that that is support, not neglect. But let us look at the record of this government. Shortly after the February election this minister made a commitment to do something about the problem of high interest rates. He made that commitment here in Ottawa before 1,000 farmers. I had the opportunity to attend that meeting. I expect the Minister of Agriculture supported his cabinet colleagues regarding support to the home owners and regarding support to Chrysler Corporation. On numerous occasions when the minister was speaking in western Canada he has said that if he had his way he would financially support Massey-Ferguson. Now that we have interest rates reaching almost those same levels they were at a year ago, what does the minister have in mind for special assistance and help to farmers? He will have another opportunity to deliver on the promise made last spring to the farmers here in Ottawa.

Second, the minister made a commitment on behalf of the government to raise valuation day values to December 31, 1974, levels. That was a campaign commitment. I have a copy of his campaign literature. He made that statement time and time again. We, of course, would support that. I remind the minister that our budget last December dealt quite appropriately with the subject of capital gains. The minister voted against that proposal. I could forgive the minister if he would match our provision, but after two opportunities he has not delivered anything. That is obviously neglect, not support. My second question would be, when can we expect the minister to match our commitment with reference to capital gains?

I will move on to the third area and deal with his commitments respecting the Farm Credit Corporation. Here the minister made two promises or commitments. The first was to enlarge the corporation, and the second to maintain the interest rate advantage. These are commendable commitments. There is no question about that. Again the record reveals no additional funding has been secured for the Farm Credit Corporation. Second, he raised the interest rate to 13 per cent, the highest level on record in the 50 or 51 years history of the Farm Credit Corporation.

We increased funding by some $50 million. In addition, we prepared legislation for the corporation to seek additional funds from non-government sources. I would like to know the status of the legislation and if the minister can provide matching funds as we did a year ago.

Fourth, the minister indicated that all fuels used in the on farm production and delivery of food would receive some cushion. That is not my word, it is directly from the national Liberal campaign commitment. The document indicated that these fuels would receive some cushion to shield them from the effects of accelerating energy prices. What did we get? Instead of the cushion promised, the agricultural and food industry got the axe from the minister. Instead we got an energy policy which will double the cost of farm fuels in two years and quadruple farm prices in five years. To make matters worse, our security of supply and self-sufficiency has been severely threatened. In fact it was not until last week that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources placed farm fuels for some production in the top priority.

Fifth, what has happened to the minister's agriculture export corporation, a Crown corporation promised by the Prime Minister in western Canada in April, 1979, almost two years ago? We have supported the need for such a structure since 1974. While we were in office the necessary cabinet document had been prepared. What has happened? Has someone canned Canagrex? On the subject of export sales, we were always concerned about the number of agricultural sales people in our embassies and consular offices around the world.

I believe there were about six. During our short period in office we were able to hire two, and I believe we made preparations to place a third. How many additional placements have been made since the minister was appointed Minister of Agriculture for a second term?

Sixth, again referring to a campaign commitment of the Minister of Agriculture, he attracted a great deal of attention on this issue. He said that if re-elected he would immediately renegotiate the level of chicken imports from the United States to Canada. The Liberal campaign document refers specifically to that subject. What is the progress on this issue? Has there been any progress on this promise?

I know the minister went to Paris and China. I have no reason to believe he went to Washington concerning this subject. It is rather interesting that during the time the minister was in China, the United States made a very significant wheat sale to that country. Can the minister advise us whether he was able to make any additional wheat sales to China? I know he is not directly responsible for selling wheat on behalf of the Canadian government. Did he make any other significant sales while there?

We accepted our responsibilities with regard to that issue. The minister will well remember, going back as far as 1973, that he made some very definite commitments to do something about the level of chicken imports. At that time it was about six million pounds. When we assumed office, it was approaching 60 million. We certified the national agency. We renegotiated the import level, a level which gave the Canadian producer about 94 per cent of the domestic market. The minister's hide was saved last summer because of high sales in the United States of that product and because of the very hot, dry summer there. The minister made this definite campaign commitment to renegotiate the level of U.S. chickens coming into Canada. The real question is, when will he fulfil his responsibility and commitment?

I now come to the seventh area I would like to talk about and pose questions to the minister. It is a very important subject, research and development. The minister stated that when he assumed office, funding and research activities would be increased. Again we see no evidence of the minister keeping that commitment.

Increased research funding is vital. We have achieved our present levels of productivity and efficiency largely, if not totally, as a direct result of the efforts of research. Since 50 per cent of all agricultural research is carried on by Agriculture Canada, it is absolutely necessary if the agricultural food industry is to supply the food requirements of Canadians, and indeed others throughout the world in the future, that we continue to increase funding publicly and encourage greater private efforts in the area of research and development.

The minister stated earlier that not that many years ago one farmer fed himself and four or five others. Today that has increased to between 50 and 60. By the year 2000, that food producer will be expected to feed over 200 people.

With that thought in mind, and when one takes into account what will happen in world population growth, our research people face a real challenge. I am confident that our research people have the capabilities and expertise. There is no question about that. However, we will only meet those challenges if our research people are properly funded. We realized the importance of research and, as I indicated earlier, clearly demonstrated our commitment by increasing this funding by approximately $13 million.

The eighth area I want to deal with is the minister's promise that all agricultural products would be protected to the extent of $250,000. I refer to the amendment to section 88 of the Bank Act. We have those changes made, but the level of production is not the level of $250,000 promised by this government. It is $100,000, which is less than half of the promised level. The minister looks at me with some skepticism. I am only quoting the minister directly from his campaign document.

I realize the minister, on behalf of the government, has introduced two of our measures, first, the provision to allow the deduction of wages as expenses paid to the spouse in a farming operation, and secondly, the meat import law. Because of the very low priority given to agriculture by this government, these measures still may be a long time in coming into effect. I would hope to get a definite commitment today from the minister with reference to the timetable for these two pieces of legislation. If the minister could ever get House time we could give him the clear commitment today that we could move both of these pieces of legislation through this House certainly within half a day.

Then there is Canfarm, this being the eleventh area I am going to touch on. The government has clearly broken a commitment, has clearly broken an agreement made back in 1979. We honoured our commitment while being faced with this very same issue a year ago. We provided $1.2 million and a loan guarantee of $4.2 million as called for in the 1979 agreement. If the minister has so much faith in the operation of Canfarm—he and his officials, during committee hearings in the last couple of weeks went clearly on record by indicating that Canfarm services were excellent ones and that they were doing a great job—if he has so much faith in the Canfarm services president, Peter Hannam, then he had better start demonstrating it by dollars and deeds rather than words. Mr. Hannam is a very capable farm leader and he is absolutely correct when he states he has been betrayed by—

Mr. Whelan: No.

Mr. Wise: Yes, he did, Mr. Minister. He said that directly to me. I did not read it in the newspaper, I talked to him directly. Mr. Hannam is a man of his word. He has been betrayed by your government and, in fact, by the Minister of Agriculture.

An hon. Member: Shame!

Mr. Wise: The twelfth area deals with dairy policy. We hear all kinds of rumours about the future of the national dairy policy. I would be the first person to go on record and indicate that that policy has worked extremely well over the last ten years for both consumers and producers alike. I want to make it very clear that we stand fully committed to the continuation of that dairy policy. We expanded the dairy policy with specific emphasis on the export side. Can the minister, in view of the rumours that are going across the country—I know that producers and producers' organizations are calling members of Parliament in all parties and from all sections of the country—give the assurance that the national dairy policy will in fact continue to receive support at the same level in the future?

I know my time is running rather short, Mr. Chairman. I have touched on only a few of the problems facing the agricultural industry. My colleagues will touch on some of these in more detail during the course of the next two days, and on other issues as well.

The sad and disappointing fact is that, as far as this minister is concerned, and as far as this government is concerned, there is often a recognition of these problems. They do not ignore them; they do recognize them. Usually there is some plan of action or an intense signal to the industry, and false hopes are given. Unfortunately, too often no action is ever taken. The minister indicated in his opening remarks that he would welcome the opportunity to respond to these questions.

If you assess the promises made and the promises kept by this minister and by this government, a very dismal record is revealed. I regret to say this minister, who represents the most important segment of our whole society, this minister who is supported by a most capable departmental staff—in fact I would say the capabilities of the staff of Agriculture Canada are second to none when we compare them to other people in other branches of the public service, and I speak from experience and I make no reservations in placing that on the public record—referring strictly to the record the minister succeeds only at one thing, and that is failure. That disappoints me very much.

It is the official opposition who feel strongly about agriculture and the agricultural food industry. We had no difficulty convincing our caucus members that we should set aside two days in the House of Commons to talk about the problems, and to try to work together to do something about them.

An hon. Member: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Chairman, I just came from the Canadian Agriculture Outlook Conference and it was a slightly different atmosphere. I never attended such a positive meeting and met such a group of happy farm leaders from all over Canada, from one coast to the other. It was the most productive and positive meeting they have attended. They look toward 1980 and future years with optimism. the hon. member, the former Minister of Agriculture, makes remarks about research. We have not let down research at all, and it is holding its own. I wish I could say the same for all other branches of the department. We have been accused of spending too much money.

When he talks of high interest rates, let us look at some of the facts. He said we have not done anything and that we have been successful at failure. Right in his own community I bet he has neighbours who have interest-free loans, advanced loans on crops in store—

The Chairman: I regret to interrupt the minister. He may continue with unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Chairman: There is no unanimous consent. I must interrupt the minister.

Mr. Ostiguy: Mr. Chairman, I would like to outline very briefly the prospects for Canadian agriculture during the eighties. Most people will recognize the importance of agriculture for the Canadian economy as concerns income, job creation and commercial value both for domestic trade and our dealings with other countries. Indeed, the spill-over effects of the primary sector of agricultural production on our economy as a whole are so numerous that it is nearly impossible to define them or make a complete list of them. Even so, Mr. Chairman, I would like to give a brief analysis of the impact of agriculture on our economy by giving a short outline of the situation and by trying to forecast what the future holds for us during the next decade.

In the past, agriculture was mostly considered a way of life. Before World War II, more than one-third of the Canadian population lived in a rural environment. At the time, there was a very diversified subsistence agriculture which aimed at meeting first the needs of rural families and second those of local and regional markets. The processing sectors in the field of food products were mostly primary sectors. They included small businesses which depended on local resources and which produced only for their own area. Their activities were limited to primary processing of basic food products such as flour, butter and bread. Each community had its dairy, its flourmill, its bakery, its small grocery store; the milkman was also a local producer. Today, Mr. Chairman, the situation has changed considerably. Agriculture has become a specialized industry, the first link in the agri-food business chain, which meets the specific needs of a society that has evolved tremendously in the last 40 years.

Farmers represent less than 5 per cent of the Canadian population today; however, mechanization has made up for the decrease in the farming, in the rural community. Concurrently with the advent of mechanization, research developed new crops and new strains while improving the quality and the genetic potential of our livestock. Our veterinarian inspection and disease control systems have made of our country one of the top-ranking in the world today for the excellence of its stock. Canadian agricultural producers have benefited incalculably from them and, as the Minister of Agriculture said a while ago, the $150 million budget earmarked for this research is very high in terms of the Canadian population; it is the envy of all farmers around the world. Naturally, all those elements have contributed towards increasing in no small measure the efficiency of Canadian farmers each of whom can now feed, on an average, 60 other persons. That evolution and the increased productivity of our agricultural producers must be paid for; that is only normal.

In 1961, capital investments in Canadian agriculture amounted to roughly $19,000 a farm. Today, that figure is closer to $200,000 and often exceeds it. Farmers, as well, have had to face steep increases in their production costs such as the cost of fertilizers, pesticides, machinery and equipment, and higher interest rates. It is estimated that Canadian farmers inject over $6 billion annually into the Canadian economy in production costs. And that figure is bound to grow with the rising cost of energy.

But higher production costs also affect the other links in the agri-food business chain. A basket of groceries still costs less in Canada than in any other industrialized country in the world; that we owe, I think, Mr. Chairman, to the performance of our farmers, mechanization and our highly technological processing plants. The processing of food is the main manufacturing industry in this country and it too is severely affected by the rising cost of labour and energy. In fact, it has been the main cause of the ever higher cost of food in the last few years. Last year, Canadians spent about $30 billion on food. That amount was paid to the cashiers of supermarkets and restaurants. Which gives us an idea of the magnitude of the business figures of that industry, at least at one end of the chain, that is, the consumer. At the other end, Mr. Chairman, we have the three main elements of the agri-food business chain, namely production, processing and retailing which, directly or indirectly, give jobs to almost a quarter of a million Canadians; in other words, one Canadian worker in four is closely or remotely involved in agriculture, the production of food, or the agri-food industry.

In addition to those who derive their income from this branch of economic activities, all Canadians benefit from our trade balance in agriculture. Our farm exports exceeded $6 billion last year and we have registered a trade surplus of $1.4 billion. This year our exports and trade surplus should reach the $8 billion and $3 billion marks respectively. Mr. Chairman, this means an influx of foreign currencies which helps strengthen our economy tremendously. And as the Speech from the Throne and the Minister of Agriculture have indicated the government's intention to introduce fairly shortly a bill dealing with Canagrex, a farm product export corporation, Mr. Chairman, it is imperative that this corporation should be made a responsibility of the Department of Agriculture, because it would help our producers, processors and Department of Agriculture compete in foreign markets and hopefully reduce our trade balance. This important corporation should be established in early 1981.

All economic activities in agriculture have a multiplier effect on our economy as a whole. An average of 88 per cent of all farm returns generated are transferred to other areas. The sales of farm and farm related goods account for 25 per cent of all employment within the Canadian wholesale industry.

As a matter of fact, the farm industry is responsible for some 14 per cent of all Canadian shipments. Finally, agriculture ranks second among the five main primary industries in Canada and represents 7.3 per cent of the GNP for all industries.

As hon. members can see, various factors have contributed to the extraordinary growth of agriculture to make it one of our main industries. These factors have affected agriculture in the same way as the other areas of our society, by boosting demand for consumer goods and contributing to the ever growing complexity of the farm industry.

It is a series of data and facts which can give us a good idea of the development and present conditions of agriculture and its economic impact in our country. We cannot however forget farmers who are the main architects of the achievements which I have just highlighted. They are the mainstay of that development in our Canadian agricultural system and in the marketing of our foodstuff. They are the instigators of that development, they have provided the required structures and the necessary protection for their survival, progress of their sector, their own prosperity and the welfare of all Canadians.

To make progress, farmers needed protection at the production and harvesting stage against the whims of nature as well as the market level with is often subjected to cycles which can ruin even the richest ones. The various programs set up by the federal and provincial governments have facilitated to a large extent the stabilization of the production sector. Producers are also organized to plan the marketing of their products and thus lessen its risks.

Agriculture Canada, Mr. Chairman, offers an extensive series of programs which help provide necessary stability to the primary sector of agricultural production. First, crop insurance protects farmers against weather conditions enabling them to recover at least part of their production costs since it is a federal-provincial cost-sharing program to which the farmer is also asked to make a financial contribution.

We need only recall that a few years ago, when the federal government implemented the crop insurance program in co-operation with the provinces, very few farmers took advantage of it. It started with one crop, one type of production. Then it expanded to the point where today nearly all farm production is covered by crop insurance. The federal Agricultural Stabilization Act provides farmers, in years where the market for so-called "designated" commodities is poor, with income equivalent to 90 per cent of the average market prices in the five previous years. This rate is also indexed to reflect variations in production costs.

The year 1979-80 was not a good one for hog production and the Agricultural Stabilization Board provided producers with subsidies which compensated for the difference between the cost of production and the selling price. In fact, I think the board, which is under the authority of the Department of Agriculture, contributed $53.5 million, and I am certainly proud to say that 36 per cent of Quebec producers benefited from these Agriculture Canada subsidies.

As far as credit is concerned, the federal government, through the Farm Credit Corporation, helps farmers get long-term loans at preferential interest rates. For example, hog production has prospered to its present state in Quebec certainly because the Farm Credit Corporation was the first to grant loans for hog breeding facilities. In fact, it granted hog producers 80 per cent of their loans.

On the marketing side, the structures established by the federal government to help producers market their products have certainly helped stabilize production. While it was openly criticized a few years ago, for example, the Canadian Egg Marketing Board, now provides egg producers with an adequate level of income from their production and guarantees consumers adequate supplies at reasonable cost. This stabilization system applies to production, prices and supplies and ensures the stabilization needed in this sector, which in turn benefits consumers.

The marketing of industrial milk is another good example of the efficiency of the supply-management systems. After a period of expansion, milk producers have experienced certain difficulties adjusting their production levels to domestic demand for processed milk products. The Canadian Dairy Commission succeeded in stabilising the situation and balancing offer and demand. For the past two or three years this sector has been expanding because of advertising campaigns designed to boost consumption, because of exchange programs set up by the Canadian Dairy Commission and because of the dynamism in the search for new outlets on international markets. Some will say that the rate of growth is rather slow. It may be so, Mr. Chairman, but it is preferable to advance slowly but surely than experiencing drastic increases that generate disorder on the market to the detriment of that very sector. Many producers would suffer from it, some would even lose their shirt on such deals, and in the end consumers would foot the bill.

The dairy program is a good example of intervention by the government which, with its production subsidies, is increasing producers' income while allowing consumers to buy at reasonable prices a basic and nutritional product. This system also enables us to maintain a certain level of production and consumption and that, once again, for the benefit of the production sector and a sound nutrition for all Canadians. On the other hand, Mr. Chairman, the levy system to pay for export marketing directly involves producers who are thus called upon to be responsible, at their level, for the smooth running and prosperity of the whole agri-food industry. Marketing is now the level setting in motion the different components of the Canadian agri-food industry. A lot of other programs carried out by Agriculture Canada could be mentioned. In fact, the department is responsible for the implementation of over 40 acts and regulations.

Another area of activity in the department, namely research, thus far represents the sector with the greatest impact on agriculture. Studies were made on crops, livestock, plant protection and animal disease. Those subjects of research will remain very important, Mr. Chairman, in the research programs of the department but present economic realities give a new direction to research in agriculture. Spiralling energy costs emphasize the need for studies on the replacement of conventional energy sources by so-called renewable energy sources. We are also trying to find a means to integrate biological elements in the fight against plant and animals pests to reduce the use of chemicals which are too expensive and which are harmful to the environment in the long run.

Mr. Chairman, those are only a few examples of the efforts made by Agriculture Canada, by its minister and by its team of civil servants to help the agriculture food industry make continuous progress. This is not by far a comprehensive report on its activities and programs. I should simply like to demonstrate that the department is determined to play an active part in the development of agriculture at all levels and that it intends to continue to take the leadership in the agriculture food business in Canada. But what will the department's future role be?

The world population is growing at the rate of 2 per cent a year. It is estimated there will be 6.4 billion people in the year 2000. The demand for food will increase proportionately. Mr. Chairman, Canada has the potential to expand its production considerably. We have the arable lands, the manpower and the technology to do so. We have the best arable lands throughout the country. To meet the demand, we would have to double our agricultural output before the year 2000. That expansion will have to be based on the development of new domestic markets to replace imports and expansion of foreign markets for a dynamic marketing of our products. In view of the higher cost of energy there will have to be the political will to encourage investment in that area to be able to meet the demand in underdeveloped countries.

As I said earlier, Mr. Chairman, and perhaps the minister can reply briefly, I hope that early in 1981 the agricultural export corporation bill will be tabled in the House which, of course, will benefit Canadian farmers, processing plants and also underdeveloped countries and will enable us to give them the food assistance they need. It is the duty of all of us, Mr. Chairman, and I am confident the Department of Agriculture will be able to move forward.

Mr. Althouse: Mr. Chairman, it has been a pleasure to listen to the outline of the work of the department as presented by the Minister of Agriculture in introducing the estimates of the Department of Agriculture for the current year, which we will be reviewing in the next couple of days. The minister has been Minister of Agriculture for a long time.

An hon. Member: Too long.

Mr. Althouse: He has been presenting to the public the views of the Department of Agriculture. In effect, he is the image of the department and has been that for quite a long time. The hon. member for Essex-Windsor was involved with farm organizations even before becoming Minister of Agriculture. As someone watching him from a distance, I have always been impressed by the image he projected as the voice of the farmer.

An hon. Member: Good grief, who are you talking about?

Mr. Althouse: I have also been impressed by the image changes he has gone through. During one election he lost a little weight and became "lean, mean Gene", to use his words. Recently he purchased a green cowboy hat and changed his image so that he is now "lean, mean Gene in green".

Mr. Whelan: I never bought that hat; it was given to me by some westerners.

An hon. Member: It helped to change your image.

Mr. Whelan: I have had it for over three years.

An hon. Member: Watch it, look what happened to Jack Horner.

Mr. Althouse: Some of the recent speeches which the minister has made have focused on uniting the country, and on the need for a united country. I think it is a very laudable objective and no one takes umbrage with it. The minister has put on a fine performance, but it has been an excellent projection of form rather than substance. When we look at the substance, we find that during the years the minister has been the head of the Department of Agriculture there has not been a lot of progress. There have been some changes within the department in the way in which it works. The people in the department are doing an excellent job, but there is no direction. We heard the minister talking about uniting the country, but where is the agricultural policy showing this?

Some national policies have been developed, many of them before the minister came into office, such as crop insurance, cash advance programs, and the dairy policy. These are national approaches. A number of approaches were initiated by producer groups such as the Broiler Chicken Marketing Agency, the Egg Marketing Agency, and the Turkey Board. They have taken a national approach and have done a lot to unite the country and hold it together. If a national approach is not taken to a policy area as vital as agriculture, it is very difficult to hold the country together.

The country cannot be held together with fine speeches or swift political manoeuvring. There must be a social and economic base which is national in scope if the country is to remain together. These marketing programs have provided such an approach. They were cognizant of that partly because they were initiated by producer groups. They have done a job and have contributed to holding the country together.

I should like to compare that to the agricultural policy which we perceive in western Canada. I live very close to the operation of the former minister of transport, Mr. Otto Lang, and I saw the program he was trying to impose upon the people and farmers of Canada. It was an approach which regionalized the country, broke up groups of farmers, and attempted to deal with commodity groups. Also he tried to provincialize the commodity groups by ignoring a national approach on the part of farmers who went to him to discuss farm policies, and by the public recognition given to very small, regionalized commodity groups. It contributed to the breakdown of the communications system as it applied to producing farm policy. Also it played a role in breaking down the country to the point where the minister is now calling for national unity among farmers.

I think national unity is the right approach for the country. I should like to spend a little time today dealing with a few policies which we think would contribute to national unity and provide better incomes for farmers. Not only would they provide better incomes for farmers, but they would contribute to a more certain supply of food at a more standard cost to consumers.

When we talk about the need for more self-sufficiency and programs which take into account the kind of production which is economically feasible in the country, we must look at the import-export policy, particularly the tariff one. I am not sure the government has spent a great deal of time worrying about a tariff policy to protect the fruit and vegetable production which the farmers of this country are capable of maintaining. We have become very dependent upon the import of a lot of fruit and vegetables. For example, in 1965 we imported 33 million pounds of tomatoes. By 1976 it had increased to 96 million pounds of imported tomatoes, and by 1979 it was up to 128 million pounds. There is a fairly large and active tomato-producing area in the country. The acreage has been shrinking as the imports have been rising. There has been no move on the part of the government to intervene. Perhaps it is tied to the marketing system which has developed with the chain stores.

The chain stores appear to be avoiding domestically-produced goods on a seasonal basis. They seem to prefer to import tomatoes from southern California and Mexico for 12 months of the year, rather than face the inconvenience of a three or four-month domestic production run. They tie themselves in for 12 months of the year and let the domestic industry die. The government has not provided any tariff protection to ensure that that does not happen.

Grain marketing requires a national approach as well. The Regional Marketing Board of the Canadian Wheat Board was established with the approval of producers, and in fact the power of the board was extended by the producers and the provincial and federal governments approximately in 1948 when a plebiscite was taken in at least two prairie provinces requesting that feed grains, oats and barley, be included and marketed under the jurisdiction of the Canadian Wheat Board. A very clear mandate was given by the producers to the various provincial and federal governments involved. They wanted their feed grains marketed by the Canadian Wheat Board.

The kind of thing which has developed from that has been unhappily watched by a great number of farmers in the west. They watched the Conservative minister of agriculture, the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain, reduce the power of the Canadian Wheat Board as it applied to the marketing of feed grains, and exempt feed mills from the powers of the board. Also they watched Mr. Lang, when he was minister, extend that exemption to all feed mills across Canada and reintroduce the open market for feed grains. There was no vote. They ignored the previous vote which indicated approximately an 89 per cent support for the Wheat Board being in charge of the marketing of feed grain. There have been protestations that farmers will be asked to state their preference soon or in coming years. The policy has been in effect for about seven years, and there has been no vote and no change in policy.

A recent development was an interesting one. The advisory committees to the Canadian Wheat Board and to the Canadian Feed Board, which represented consumers from British Columbia to the eastern part of the country, both agreed unanimously that the feed grain marketing system should be put back under the auspices of the Canadian Wheat Board. Producers found it more useful. They have found they are losing between $50 million and $60 million per year through taking lower prices in the open market. The consumers of feed grains decided they wanted to return to feed grain marketing since they want continuity of supplies. They want to know there is a supply of feed grain awaiting them when they go out to purchase it.

What was the minister's response with respect to this? He has been non-committal as a result of the joint motion by the two advisory boards. He has only said, in committee, that he is in favour of orderly marketing. He has refused to specify what he means by "orderly marketing". In the research I have done I found that in a response which he made to a study by the Saskatchewan Natural Products Marketing Council on the losses farmers had incurred in Saskatchewan because of the feed grain policy, he preferred the free market system of selling feed grain. This does nothing to unite the country. It ignores the requests and the will of the producers and consumers. It has slowed down the move, which is a necessary one, to have a national feed grain marketing agency so that we can avoid the kind of foofaraw there has been recently in Ontario where some Ontario producers became convinced they were done out of a market for barley because of Wheat Board actions. This is a development which did not seem to have been possible as time progressed. However, had the grains all been marketed under the Wheat Board, Ontario producers would have been able to participate in that market on an equal basis and would not have felt discriminated against.

As well, under the Wheat Board system we have been able to import varieties where necessary under special licence, to increase productivity or to introduce into the marketing system, in the Wheat Board area, new varieties of barley and of feed wheats which might not likely have been introduced otherwise. I think this national approach would have been of benefit in obtaining new internationally-produced varieties such as Summit barley, Klages barley and Glenlea wheat. This would have avoided some of the reactions we are now receiving from maritime farmers who think they are being left out when it comes to having new high-yielding varieties available to them. They have been sold on the idea of having a type of plant breeders rights system. Most of the benefits of plant breeders rights are available to the producers of Canada now through the Wheat Board, marketing boards, and seed marketing institutions, if we will use them.

When it comes to a national approach in uniting the country, we can look to potato marketing. We again see a regional approach with respect to this. Five provinces in eastern Canada are setting up a situation in which the east will be pitted against the west. Processors are making ready, they are prepared, and the processing industry is already moving out west. That industry has seen the writing on the wall. They have decided to become entrenched with an alternative system further west. They have attempted to and are already moving to develop a countervailing source of supply in the event that the regional eastern agency is established and does become partially successful in influencing price.

We have seen the same kind of non-attention given to national marketing with respect to agricultural policy as it applies to pork marketing. Eight of the provinces have provincial marketing boards. There is a need for a national agency with a national approach. In the interim, the trade, the processing industry and the feed manufacturing industry are shifting, not west this time, as is happening with the potato industry, but they have shifted east into the province of Quebec.

The open market feed grain policy and the lack of a national pork marketing policy have created a climate where an alternative system is developing and flourishing in an attempt to keep other parts of the country divided. It is not a political type of division. It is a straight market, economic type of division. It is the kind of power game large corporations play. It is the kind of power game which can only be counteracted by federal intervention and by an agricultural policy which takes a national approach and attempts to keep the country together. This can and would counteract this type of thing.

I think beef marketing is where the minister has shone the most. He has been very eloquent in talking about the archaic system we have as far as beef marketing is concerned. He has described it as coming out of the middle ages. He has been very hard on the beef marketing system. He is the Minister of Agriculture and he has held that post for a number of years. He has a very highly developed, highly technical and experienced marketing staff. We spend close to half of the department's budget on marketing, as we should. Yet, has he directed that marketing staff to bring up another system? He has been critical of this system. He has been in a position to do something about it. Where is his plan? Where did it go? We have not seen any evidence that he has directed people to draw up an alternate method of marketing beef. He has produced no new and improved method of marketing beef. He has simply ridiculed the present system and he has challenged everybody to work toward something better.

The point I wish to leave with the minister is—and we will be discussing specifics later on during the course of the debate—if farmers are to be exhorted to unite, what good example do we have from the minister to create unity in the beef, potato, grains and pork industries? Where are the examples? What has taken place? What has the minister proposed and what is he doing? The evidence is not there. We see the big hat. We listen to the words. We await the policies.

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Chairman, first I wish to raise a point of order. I find the procedure a little hard to follow, especially when members question me and make accusations, and then they refuse to give unanimous consent to allow me to answer the questions. With my inability to get unanimous consent I then take away from the time, from the democratic right of this side of the House to participate. It is not correct, Mr. Chairman, that if I take the time to answer I am taking the time of one of the members on this side of the House? That is the way I understand the procedures here. If I were sitting in the gallery I would think it a little rough that when a former minister asks me questions and I seek unanimous consent to answer, they will not give it to me. It appears they do not want the answers to the questions. I do not know if I have a point of order, or if I understand the procedures correctly. Could you clarify that for me, Mr. Chairman?

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: I will attempt to do so. The speaking time allotted to all members, including the minister, is 20 minutes. I would indicate to the minister that in previous sittings of Committee of the Whole there have been some instances where parties have agreed internally that certain of their members would split the 20 minutes. That has usually been split in two periods of ten minutes each. But the time allotment is 20 minutes.

With respect to the matter mentioned by the minister relating to whether or not he would have to seek from members of his own party time out of their allotment of time in which to respond, that is not correct. It is not an allocation of time to a party. It is an individual member's allocation of time.

If I understand what the minister is suggesting, then possibly a member from his side of the House might give up some of his time in order that the minister may answer. I do not know how it could be worked out mechanically. It can certainly be done with a little planning in advance, if the Chair is advised and the House is made aware of the arrangement. It has been done previously over the past couple of days.

I also realize that the minister is attempting to solve the problem that occurs when he is asked a series of questions but is unable to respond because the allotted time of the questioner has expired. I do not have an answer to that problem. The minister makes what seems to me to be a good point, that perhaps there is a problem with procedure in that regard, but it is the procedure with which we are working at the moment. I can only say that hon. members have now heard the minister's comments on that problem and presumably members who choose to use their entire 20 minutes will be aware that even if they do ask questions they will not obtain an answer if the 20 minutes have expired.

I go back to the other aspect and say that if the minister wishes to make arrangements with other members of his own party, the House has not objected to this procedure in previous sittings in this Committee of the Whole.

Mr. Murta: Mr. Chairman, I was one of the hon. members who objected to the minister having the time to answer the hon. member for Elgin, and it was based on my experience in this committee during discussion on the transportation estimates. An hon. member is allotted 20 minutes and he can use that time in any way he sees fit. The minister should realize that his own parliamentary secretary also spoke for 20 minutes, and if it was important enough for him to make some comments on the comments of the hon. member for Elgin, he certainly could have used part of the 20 minutes allotted to his parliamentary secretary or, for that matter, used the entire 20 minutes.

The only way in which this committee can operate properly is if we all adhere to the 20 minute time limit. For example, as the next member to speak from our party I intend to ask questions of the minister. In this way hopefully we can have an exchange with regard to some of the various areas in which I am particularly interested.

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Chairman, much can be said for this matter on both sides. Yesterday during the Employment and Immigration estimates, several Liberal members used their 20 minutes to make a speech. That is their right, but the purpose of this exercise is to obtain information from the ministers. I would also suggest that sometimes the minister, by reminiscing and taking a long time to answer, wastes our time as well.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, may I say briefly that the system seemed to work fairly well during the last four days. Each member who gets the floor is allowed 20 minutes, and he has the right to use the full 20 minutes or he can speak briefly and leave time for questions. If the minister will be patient, I am sure he will have plenty of time to answer questions as the committee proceeds.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: If there was a point of order in terms of an appeal to the Standing Orders, I do not think it is necessary to pursue the matter any further. In any event, I recognize that the minister has somewhat of a difficult point and that he might, by consultation with the members of his own party, be able to resolve that point with a shuffle in the time arrangement.

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Chairman, which side of the House will speak next?

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for Lisgar will be the next speaker. As is the custom during normal debate on a bill, the Chair recognizes alternately members from the left and the right. There is a proportion as between members of the three parties which is hopefully adhered to. May I now recognize the hon. member for Lisgar.

Mr. Murta: Mr. Chairman, at the outset I would like to correct the impression which the Minister of Agriculture has left with regard to agricultural research. I do not believe that the minister meant to leave the impression that he or his government increased the research budget in the main estimates which were being discussed earlier. Those main estimates were prepared by the former Progressive Conservative government, and in that context the research portion was allocated before he became the Minister of Agriculture once again.

My first question centres on the area of grain and grain exports. It has been my understanding, since I became a member of Parliament in the early seventies, that if it was not for grain and oil seeds Canada's agricultural picture would not be very rosy. These two grains are the basic export thrust of our country. They make the balance of trade picture in agriculture look very good.

As the minister knows, or should know, world trade in grains and oil seeds has more than doubled. The United States has benefited mostly from this statistic. Since 1961 their exports have tripled and their share has grown from 48 per cent to some 59 per cent. Canada, Australia and Argentina have slipped from 31 per cent to 25 per cent over that same 20 year period from the early 1960s to 1980. This would indicate that we have a long way to go in encouraging and increasing our agricultural exports.

A good many people in this country, particularly in western Canada, are vitally concerned over this drop and the fact that we have not been able to move back up to the level of exports which we enjoyed in the early 1970s. There has been some discussion, most recently by the Canadian Wheat Board Advisory Committee, on what has been called an assured marketing system. If what I know about this assured marketing system is correct, it would mean that the Canadian Wheat Board would purchase all the grain at the end of the crop year at the initial price on the farm. What would happen then—for example, perhaps they would simply lock the bin—has not yet been worked out.

I am surprised that the bureaucracy in Ottawa would be considering this idea at this time when the government is low on cash. While I thought they would listen to the proposal, I did not think any action would be taken. It is my understanding that this approach is being considered and that the cost figure which is being mentioned is upwards of $.5 billion in terms of maximum expenses if the program went ahead.

My question to the minister is this. How closely is this approach being considered by either the minister's department or by the grain group? Would the minister also comment on whether or not there will be any studies on this particular program? If my memory serves me correctly, the Wheat Board Advisory Committee wants some kind of decision on this particular program by the start of the 1981 crop year. I believe it was Roy Atkinson of Saskatoon who put the matter forward. Would the minister comment?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Chairman, I am not aware of what the hon. member is discussing. Is he talking about feed grain or wheat? The Wheat Board Advisory Committee and the Canadian Livestock Feed Board Advisory Committee met and recommended that the Canadian Wheat Board take over total control of all feed grains.

Mr. Whelan: That was a recommendation they made in case no other system could be devised to provide equity in the feed grain system. I do not know what is going to come of that, but I think it is great that these two groups met to discuss a problem which they recognized. The Wheat Board and the Canadian Livestock Feed Board would have to give the matter some consideration, and then it would have to come to the government for further consideration before it could be approved. It is only about a month since the two groups made that recommendation so I do not think there has been detailed study of it.

Mr. Murta: Mr. Chairman, even if the Canadian Wheat Board advisory committee and the Canadian Livestock Feed Board are both considering this matter and make a recommendation, obviously the program will come to nothing if the federal government has not studied it. Does the minister know if his department or the grains group propose to study the matter so that they will have their own information available?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Chairman, many of the farm organizations have made suggestions about how the feed grain system should operate. This is one such suggestion from two different groups, and I must answer that we are continually reviewing the program and it is under concentrated review at the present time.

It may be of interest to the hon. member to know that I received an advance copy of the agriculture report of the Canada West Foundation the other day which stated that this should all come under the Canadian Wheat Board, or else be on the open, free market—that it should not be half and half. That is another suggestion.

Mr. Murta: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to get drawn into a philosophical discussion of what should or should not come under the authority of the Canadian Wheat Board. I assume from the minister's answer that there is a study which will be released in due course. I suppose the government will then decide whether there is any financial or other justification for this fairly major shift that would obviously have to be taken at substantial cost to the government.

My second question is one that was raised at an agriculture committee meeting some time ago, about the grain embargo. To all intents and purposes the embargo is finished, although it is sometimes difficult to know that from what the minister responsible for the Wheat Board says when he makes statements in connection with it. It has been said that the money going to western farmers would be in the neighbourhood of $60 million to $80 million. It has also been said that the money would be paid, if not before the end of December, then at least sometime in January.

Can the minister confirm whether the figure of $60 million to $80 million is accurate, and whether the moneys will be paid out to the farmer as promised by the government, in the month of December or in January?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Chairman, if I understood correctly, the hon. member has two questions. The first one is whether the embargo is over. I believe I should say it is because we are back to normal trading with the U.S.S.R.

The second question is whether there will be compensation for farmers who lost income because of the embargo. That remains to be seen, Mr. Chairman. The final report has yet to be submitted, and I hope this will take place within a few days. When it is, I shall make a submission. I cannot tell the hon. member at this time how many millions of dollars will be involved, it must be fulfilled. We picked up the commitment from the previous government that compensation would be paid to farmers for the commodities under embargo. I have not been informed that this commitment will not be fulfilled.

Mr. Murta: Mr. Chairman, I have another question concerning grains, something that has annoyed many farmers in western Canada. This particular matter is over and done with, but I would be interested to know whether it could happen again. Apparently Ontario has been buying barley from the Canadian Wheat Board at a price much lower than that on the world market at the time of purchase, and has been selling its own barley at the higher world market price. One hears about western alienation, Mr. Chairman, and it is little things like this that contribute to that feeling.

Last Thursday I attended a meeting of 300 farmers in Manitoba when this matter was brought up. There is not a lot of money involved, but the principle is important. They are willing to sell their barley to Ontario, but when Ontario farmers then sell their own barley on the offshore market at a higher price, they begin to wonder what kind of country they are living in. I understand that the Canadian Wheat Board was not in favour of this action but was overruled either by political pressure or by the minister.

As I said, there is not a lot of money involved as only about 800,000 bushels of barley were sold, but if this symbolic gesture were made in some other part of the country, say, Ontario or Quebec, I know it would give rise to the same kind of problem. From a western point of view it does not seem right. I would ask the minister to comment on this matter and I would urge him most strongly not to allow this type of thing to happen again.

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Chairman, the Ontario barley sale that the hon. member refers to normally takes place over a period of five or six years. It is true that a permit was issued by the Canadian Wheat Board after an order in council was passed. I was not in Canada at the time. One of the hon. members' colleagues mentioned that I was in China. I was not involved in this action but I was fully aware of it before I left, and it appeared to me to be a normal sale. The permit was for 30,000 tons, and 15,000 tons were accumulated on order, to be delivered. I understand that it just left the country within the last week.

If I had anything to do with this sort of thing again, Mr. Chairman, I can tell the hon. member that I would not take the same action. I received strong representations from the ministry of agriculture in Ontario on behalf of the barley producers of Ontario who normally made these sales, that it was hurting their market. It should be understood that the barley produced in Ontario always sells at $20 to $30 per ton below western barley. A different pricing structure governs it, although I do not know why that is.

It burns me that the people who sold that barley—one is a multinational—probably made more money on the sale of that barley than farmers made in three or four years by producing a ton of barley. Yet all it took was a scratch of a pen. That annoys me more than anything and it is why I would never make representations for them again. The Ontario ministry of agriculture asked us to make the representation to the Wheat Board and the Government of Canada that it was important that these barley sales be made. The barley is produced in the New Liskeard area and other parts of Ontario, and has always been sold to a commercial market which they wanted again this year. The permit was issued for 30,000 tons and they accumulated approximately 15,000 tons, which was loaded recently on two different boats.

The hon. member intimated that the Wheat Board supplied the barley. Mr. Chairman, the Wheat Board has not supplied barley to eastern Canada for domestic consumption since last April. The barley that was supplied was offboard barley that producers can supply or not as they like. The vast bulk of the barley consumed in the last five years was offboard barley because of the price structure decided upon by the Chicago corn competitive price that they use. That has been to the advantage of barley producers for a couple of years since that program has been in effect. However, it can work both ways. It rarely works to the advantage of producers. Mostly it works to their disadvantage. That must be changed. All I am saying is that is has been blown way out of proportion.

● (1700)

There is another thing about which not much has been said. I am speaking about long-term barley sales which are made three years ahead. The buyer makes as much as a 100 per cent capital gain on that. People will not ask for compensation for that. I am suggesting that the Canadian Livestock Feed Board, on behalf of the producers in British Columbia and eastern Canada who use barley, make the same kind of long-term agreement to barley, perhaps three years or perhaps five years. If a 100 per cent profit is made, no one will say anything. I say treat them the same way as any farm buyer of barley, but make them sign that kind of a contract so that barley producers in western Canada will know what they will receive and the eastern person who is producing that product, meat, pork or beef, is in a better position to provide more stability to the production entity for the consuming public in Canada, at the same time. This is especially true with commodities on cost-price formulae. It is very easy to forecast a year ahead, under those kinds of programs, approximately what the cost of production will be.

Mr. Murta: Mr. Chairman, there are about two minutes remaining. I have a brief question for the minister. When does he anticipate an increase, hopefully in the $2 range, in the initial price for wheat? Will it be before the end of December or after?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Chairman, if I go by what western producers tell me, they want an increase, but not before January 2. I have been to many meetings, as one member has already mentioned. An increase is wanted, but not before the end of the year. Western producers want this increase in the new year, starting in January. I think at that time it will be considered.

APPROPRIATION ACT NO. 2, 1980-81

The House resumed consideration in committee of Bill C-47, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the Government of Canada for the financial year ending March 31, 1981—Mr. Pinard—Mr. Blaker in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Vote No. 1

Mr. Veillette: Mr. Chairman, I am happy to join my colleagues in bringing my humble contribution to the debate on the estimates of Agriculture Canada.

Recently, Mr. Chairman, I had the pleasure of meeting one of the directors of the dairy producers' federation of Mauricie. He gave me a message to convey saying, as soon as you get a chance to speak to the minister, do congratulate him on his current dairy policy. Now, Mr. Minister, those were the very people who, in 1976, came here to the Hill and tried to disguise you into a snowman by throwing powdered milk at you. Mr. Minister, you know the courage of those good old farmers. And they also can appreciate gallant people like you for, at the time, it took courage on your part to take over control of the dairy production, knowing full well that the decision was politically disastrous, but knowing also that it would benefit Canadian dairy producers as a group.

Mr. Minister, you showed foresight then and I am happy to see that dairy producers rejoice today and pay you this tribute. A giant step has been made in the last ten years toward recognizing the value of the farmer and ensuring him the standard of living he deserves. Still, that is no reason for reducing the assistance the department gives that group of the agricultural sector.

Mr. Minister, rumours have it that Treasury Board intends to cancel the $2.66 per hundredweight subsidy paid to dairy producers. If expenditures must be cut, it can be done in many other places without attacking dairy producers. I beg of you,

Mr. Minister, do not allow Treasury Board to slash your budget. I know you as a fighter and I am sure you will be able to convince the members of the cabinet, and that you will not let them push you around. Moreover, you may rest assured that I will support you if you need soldiers and that all hon. members representing rural ridings such as mine will also rally behind you, for if these subsidies were automatically cut off, we would be faced with an increase in inflationary forces which are our common enemy. Should these subsidies be cut off, the prices of butter and powdered milk would rise by at least 30 cents and anywhere between 15 and 20 cents a pound respectively. I should like to pause now, Mr. Minister, so that you may tell me what you think and whether these rumours are founded.

[English]

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Chairman, I have no knowledge whatever of any such recommendation. One of the hon. member's constituents has made a comment about the minister being a fighter. That would be something to make me fighting mad. I believe we have the best dairy program of any country in the world. It is a healthy program and one of the best managed programs in the world. It is under review. It is a program I agreed to, and I know of no such recommendations whatever.

[Translation]

Mr. Veillette: Mr. Chairman, I am concerned about something else. I am referring to the financial assistance provided to our young farmers who want to purchase land. The whole rural community is aware that under the Farm Credit Act, they can borrow up to 100 per cent of the total value of the livestock, lands and buildings. But you know that to operate a dairy farm, they also need quotas the value of which often exceeds $50,000. What happens, therefore, is that young farmers can purchase the land and equipment they need under the Farm Credit Act, but the Farm Credit Corporation does not recognize the value of the quota as a guarantee for the loan. It means that young farmers must pay some money that many have not and consequently they cannot fulfil their wishes and take up farming as the trade of their choice.

Canada now has specialized agents in the sale of agricultural farms travelling through the country to find lands for Europeans who would like to settle in Canada, namely Belgian, Swiss or Dutch people. I have nothing against those people who arrive in Canada loaded with money and purchase our lands with thousands or millions. I am even pleased to see that Canadian farmers selling their lands for a good price. However, this is the reason why I disagree. I do not see why the sons of our farmers cannot obtain the necessary assistance to carry on and till the land which our forefathers have cleared without being bound to leave our heritage to foreigners due to lack of money or government assistance. I would like the minister to tell me whether he is considering the possibility of increasing the funds earmarked for the Farm Credit Corporation.

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Chairman, with regard to the lending policy of the Farm Credit Corporation, the amount of capital it requires is presently under review. No matter what is done federally, we cannot provide all the equity needed in the agricultural industry. Even though 74 per cent of loans is made to farmers between the ages of 17 and 35, more money is needed in the Farm Credit Corporation.

Inequity in the agricultural industry is increasing more than one would imagine, especially in those provinces which have so much money they do not know what to do with it. For instance, in Alberta a young farmer can borrow at 6 per cent interest. He has a tremendous advantage over someone producing the same product in Manitoba, Ontario or Quebec and competing for the domestic or international market. I repeat that we are reviewing the Farm Credit Corporation.

With regard to quotas, this is a provincially run program. This adds a tremendous cost to young farmers becoming involved in farming. Something must be done not only with regard to dairy quotas, but turkey quotas, and in fact any quota with a value on it. This should be reviewed.

There is little action I can take other than to see the national marketing programs continue. We must try to squash such things as companies accumulating quotas. That is not my idea of a national marketing agency, provincial marketing board or a joint national marketing agency in order to preserve the Canadian family farm. Although it has not reached a dangerous position, it is gradually creeping toward that.

Mr. Veillette: Mr. Chairman, the same problem comes up every year at this time, especially in the cheese industry. During the year, this industry helps to dispose of dairy products which would otherwise be considered surpluses which the Canadian Dairy Commission would have to purchase. These cheese dairies, two of which I visited recently, are now short of milk. Those who are able to get large quantities of milk during the summer produce and store their products and pay for storage from their own income.

Mr. Chairman, I do not know whether it would be possible for department officials to find a way to encourage dairy producers to produce as much during the winter as during the summer, as this would be the ideal solution in my opinion. I know we have had and still have several programs to encourage dairy producers to produce as much in the winter as in the summer. However, with the subsidies we now give to dairy producers, we could perhaps find a system which would stimulate producers to produce during the winter, which would certainly solve the problem. I do not know whether the minister and his officials have tried to find a solution, but I believe it would be greatly appreciated by the industry if some program could be developed. I await the reply of the minister.

[English]

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Chairman, the whole dairy program is geared to producers who produce 12 months of the year. I do not have the figures with me at this time, but there is an amazing number of farmers who produce 12 months of the year, producing high quality fresh milk for the dairies and the cheese factories. Production of our specialty cheeses and other cheeses has increased tremendously because of this factor. Some regions of Canada, possibly because of climatic conditions, are not doing this, but they may not have the processing facilities geared to that kind of production. We would like to see close to if not 100 per cent of our dairy producers producing 12 months of the year. Our cost-price formula is geared toward 12-month production, not seven or eight months.

Mr. McKnight: Mr. Minister, I would like to touch briefly on one of the answers you gave my colleague from Lisgar. You were mentioning that Ontario barley always sells on the world market below the price of western barley. The point my colleague was making is it is now selling higher than western barley going into the provinces of Ontario and Quebec.

I would like to take up something else you said. You mentioned that the corn competitive formula causes some anomalies and it will have to be changed. I think I understood your correctly. If so, I would like your comments. I will take a little longer so that you can think while you are sitting there rather than while you are standing, which would only take up extra time.

A statement was made by you to the Quebec Farmers' Association in Quebec. I quote:

> The "Crowsnest rate" and the feed freight assistance program have reduced the cost of grain shipped into Quebec and thus lowered the cost of producing hogs and poultry here. These subsidies have resulted in benefits for western grain growers, but they have also decreased the natural comparative advantage for livestock production on the prairies and given assistance to livestock producers in the east.
> Also, the "Crowsnest rate" has favoured the growth in Quebec of processing plants for meat, flour and vegetable oils since products processed in the west are not eligible for the preferential statutory rate, while the raw products are.

Because of that statement I would like to ask about some statements made by your colleagues. The Minister of Transport called for a task force to study the Crow rate. The disorderly senator in the other place said there will be no change in the Crow for some time. You, Mr. Minister, said you are sick and tired of studies and committees on western transportation problems and there will be no more. Does this mean you are going to stay with the status quo and deprive the people of western Canada of the natural advantage to the other provinces in Canada, are you going to go along with the Minister of Transport in his supposition, or with the disorderly minister from the other place?

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order, please. The atmosphere in Committee of the Whole is more relaxed. It is quite common for members and ministers to address each other directly. It is the responsibility of the Chair to remind hon. members that it is preferable and in accordance with the rules if they address one another through the Chair. In other words, when speaking of another member, the reference is "the hon. member has said", rather than "you".

Second, whatever style of debate we may accept, it might be wise to leave the members of the other place, who do not have an opportunity to defend themselves in this place, without reference to "disorderly". It may not be the best form. I do not say that it is out of order. I just want to note that it could be a small problem the hon. member might consider, because this might go on for days.

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Chairman, I wish to bring to the attention of the hon. member that I was talking about domestic barley prices producers received in Ontario. As history will show, they are always lower than what a western producer receives for barley or what it would cost to have western barley put into that area. There is a discrepancy there. I never said what it sold at, at world price, because I do not know, and I cannot find out what the traders were able to accumulate as a profit. I am told that if a profit was made it was not passed on to any of the producers.

If the traders made an unwarranted mark-up on it, this is the kind of thing that makes one angry. I am sure the hon. member's party condones this great multinational type of operation and this type of world sales program. When we talk about some of the Canadian Wheat Board operations, the hon. member may have some reservations about it. I have talked with him in private conversation and he has told me whom he supported as far as marketing grain was concerned.

I said if we were going to do anything about the Crow rates, and something must be done about them, then it had to be fair for our grain producers so they would not be put at a disadvantage with any other group of grain producers with whom they compete. It must be that kind of system we develop. I did not say it should not be touched or changed. It should be changed.

My colleague, the Minister of Transport, has the right to say "task force" if he wants. I was not aware he was suggesting a task force when I was questioned about that in western Canada this past week. We have volumes and volumes of studies on rail transportation, Crow rates, and what should be done and should not be done. There may be an interdepartmental group looking at it, and if that is the case I am in favour of that kind of task force. This way it may be done quickly and a solution reached.

I mentioned before that the livestock producer and the grain producer in Canada, in some way, must come to realize how important it is to both of them that they survive. If the hon. member wants to read some of my old speeches, he may do so. They were before his time in this House of Commons. When I was in western Canada I said they were dependent on one another.

Eighty per cent of the feed grain produced in Canada is consumed in Canada. The biggest customer for a feed grain producer is the Canadian livestock-poultry producer. If I were a grain producer I would make sure my biggest customer was looked after the best, and then take care of the other 20 per cent. Some years they buy and some years they do not buy. The livestock producers, be they in the east or the west, are the best consumers and the best users of domestic feed grain produced in Canada and should be well looked after. For instance, the freight rate structure and those types of things should encourage, the processing of those products produced in western Canada. It was pointed out earlier, and I have admitted, that some of the freight structures were not that fair so as to encourage this processing. It was fair to the grain producer but not to the livestock producer in western Canada.

Mr. McKnight: Mr. Chairman, regarding the compensation which is due and is just to the producers of western Canada, and indeed all of Canada, because of the embargo imposed on sales to the Soviet Union—the suggestion was made by the hon. minister—it is his hope that the higher prices farmers would receive this year would make up for the lack of money they lost due to the embargo. Higher grain prices, of course, will not make up for the lower prices caused by the embargo. The two are entirely separate issues. Have the producers of western Canada been set up by an answer given to my hon. friend and colleague from Vegreville to a question posed to the Minister of Transport who is responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board? The hon. member for Vegreville asked, and I quote:

> Does the minister feel that more than the embargo limit of 3.8 million tonnes of grain could have been sold and delivered to the U.S.S.R. in the last crop year and, if so, on what does he base his assumption?

The answer to that question quoted from Hansard is no. Because we could not have sold more grain according to the Minister of Transport, and the Minister of Agriculture is saying he believes there should be compensation payable, can the Minister of Agriculture indicate whether there is a difference of opinion, or is it one way the minister and this government are seeking of moving aside a little from the commitment made by the past government and which this government has accepted?

Regarding the feed grain policy, I would like to recall a comment made by my colleague from Lisgar, and some statements made by advisory committees to the Canadian Wheat Board and to the Canadian Livestock Feed Board. The advisory committee to the Canadian Livestock Feed Board is not an advisory committee to the minister. The advisory committee to the Canadian Wheat Board, I would assume, is not an advisory committee to the minister. On the point of supposedly unanimous support given to the proposal that all feed grain should be placed under the Canadian Wheat Board, I have information here which tells me at least four members of the advisory committee to the Wheat Board were not in favour of this proposal.

While we are talking about the cost of feed grains in our country today, I should like to quote an article from the Saskatchewan Natural Products Marketing Council publication in the province of Saskatchewan. It begins by criticizing the open market system, saying that:

> In this study we use the street price for feed wheat, oats and barley quoted by the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool for a 25-cent/cwt freight zone.

Further on it says:

> Since August 1, 1974, the private grain trade has been permitted to buy feed grains on the prairies—

And that includes all the pools, and all the line companies.

The publication goes on:

> Prairie grain producers have always felt that western grains should be marketed in the most efficient manner possible, and . . . reflect the actual charges (justifiable cost) of handling, transporting and marketing the grain.

It also makes mention of the fact that elevator companies have charged an excess profit margin, and this is using Saskatchewan Wheat Pool statistics from the province of Saskatchewan, on feed wheats of 24 cents per bushel, on oats of .07 cents per bushel, and on barley of .04 cents per bushel.

I would just like the minister's thoughts as to the cause of some of this excess profit which has been collected by all elevator companies because of the open marketing system.

I would like to give the minister one more statistic which was released on Friday, October 31, 1980. The price for 3 CW feed wheat export in store at Thunder Bay was $251.12 per tonne. For the same wheat, domestic feed Thunder Bay, the price was $175.80. That is a $75 a tonne difference in what we are asking for export wheat and what we are asking for the same wheat for domestic consumption. I would like the minister's comments on that, and I would like to know if he feels that the corn competitive formula has anything to do with this process.

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Chairman, the question asked by the hon. member is technical. I do not have that information before me, but I should have it after supper, and I should be able to report to him at that time.

Mr. McKnight: Mr. Chairman, I would like to move to another topic. There has been much discussion, and I believe the minister announced that there will be a statement on the regulation of 2,4-D and MCPA before seeding as to whether they will be removed from the market or further regulated.

In spite of the precautions which have been taken with respect to 2,4-D, no health problems have been documented scientifically. In the province of Saskatchewan we grow about 17 million acres of wheat in a normal year. About 75 per cent of that wheat is sprayed for broadleaf weeds in any given year. Of those 17 million acres about 15 million acres are sprayed with 2,4-D. If 2,4-D is removed from the market, food production in Canada, worth about $10 billion a year of which $6 billion is exported—which is 12 per cent of our total accounts payable—will be lost.

I would like the minister to answer these questions. What chemicals would be available to replace 2,4-D, and at what cost? I am referring to 2,4-D or its counterpart MCPA. Which of the weeds which have all but disappeared would return? How would farmers' yields and incomes be affected and how would total farm production and, ultimately, export sales be affected?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Chairman, it is because of dioxins that we are concerned about 2,4-D. There are approximately 1,000 types of dioxins. Only three are possibly deadly. We have to isolate them. We have to make sure we know which ones they are. We are undertaking all the scientific studies and chemical studies which can be made at this time. I do not think I should just ban 2,4-D or ask that it be banned. We work closely with my colleagues in the Department of the Environment and the Department of National Health and Welfare because of the good that 2,4-D does.

I agree with the hon. member that farming could not be carried on without some other type of material if 2,4-D were not available. We could not ban 2,4-D just like that and still expect the type of production from farmers we are getting at the present time. We could not expect there to be the production of cereal grains, corn and many other crops which we see today. Some people suggest that we should ban 2,4-D. It is like saying that because there are one thousand varieties of spiders but only three poisonous varieties, we should kill all one thousand varieties to make sure we get the three poisonous ones. I do not intend to recommend that with respect to 2,4-D.

The hon. member made some suggestion that we were trying to get out of paying even if there was reason to pay compensation for farmers' lost income. I did mention that farmers had received higher prices for their grain. I did mention earlier today that some farmers said that they do not want initial payments before January 1. They told me that in Tisdale, the Battlefords, Saskatoon, Regina, Ste. Rose, Dauphin and Morris, and I can think of many other places. They told me that in Lethbridge too. If the final tabulation of the whole grain sales system shows that we owe farmers money—this pertains not just to western farmers because there could be some farmers in eastern Canada who are commercial grain growers also and who are also involved—I do not feel this government would be in a position to say no. We could not welsh on a commitment we have made, so no matter how anyone tries to interpret anything I have said, I never intended to say we would welsh on a commitment we made.

Mr. McKnight: Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the minister's remarks with respect to the chemical 2,4-D. I know he understands how important it is and that if there happens to be something wrong with 2,4-D and there is no substitute, the farmers of western Canada and, indeed, in all of Canada would be in deep trouble.

I am not too sure what the Eddy Arnold song about places in western Canada the minister has visited had to do with my question.

An hon. Member: Hank Snow.

Mr. McKnight: I was out in Tisdale too, and we had a little more success in Tisdale than the minister.

I would like to go on to the Farm Credit Corporation. Last year approximately 20,000 farmers approached the Farm Credit Corporation for assistance. Those approaches are documented. There were probably many more who did not fill out application forms, but only 5,700 transactions were completed last year. That was last year, and as a result of a shortage of funds in the Farm Credit Corporation it is forecast that this year 1,000 fewer farmers will be receiving funds. Would the minister explain to the House the steps he has taken to broaden the base of farm credit?

In the estimates there are approximately $16.8 million for emergency assistance to prairie livestock producers affected by drought. I recall some press releases in June and July in which the federal government committed about $67 million for drought assistance. I would like the minister to tell me how much has been paid out to date and how much will be paid out.

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Chairman, we have said how much we have estimated. We have never been conservative in our estimates. We have always been quite liberal, and we have never had to use all the funds. For instance, we set aside $7 million for transportation. We used only close to $6 million for transportation. That was arranged with the provinces of Saskatchewan and Manitoba for the transportation of forage for livestock. There was a meeting yesterday morning. It appears we will be spending very close to $67 million both on forage aid and on the herd maintenance program. The herd maintenance program is under the PFRA which is under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. That agency is administering the herd maintenance program through the people who administer community pastures and that type of program.

However, it appears that it has been well received. I believe 35,000 applications are being processed at the present time under the herd maintenance program. I am going by memory again, but I believe more applications have been received under the forage assistance program in the last two weeks than in the previous two months, so it appears that farmers now have more time to fill out applications. However, they are being processed. Review boards are set up immediately for applicants who feel they are not being dealt with properly. Applicants who have been turned down will have a review board to appeal before. We hope that many of these claims will be settled before the end of the year. I believe that approximately 9,000 have been settled already under the herd maintenance program and probably a couple of thousand under the forage aid program. They are speeding along as fast as they can, but they hope that in the new year, in January, many of these claims will be settled.

Mr. Ferguson: Mr. Chairman, first of all, perhaps I should put into perspective some facts that are misinterpreted or miscontrued by the misinformed. Perhaps I should put on record, before going further, the fact that last year gross farm receipts in Canada amounted to $13.9 billion and our exports amounted to $6.1 billion. This would indicate that Canadians paid something like $7.8 billion to the farmers for food produced and consumed in Canada. Now if we were to divide $7.8 billion by 24 million Canadians, we would find that, on an average, each consumer paid $326.65 per year, or 89 cents per day. If we assume that we eat three meals per day, the Canadian consumer paid the Canadian farmer 29.8 cents per meal for food produced and consumed in Canada.

In fact, a recent survey of the cost of a 21-item food basket, in U.S. funds, shows that Canada has the lowest priced food of any of the following countries, in this order: the United States, Australia, the United Kingdom, Spain, Italy, The Netherlands, West Germany, Argentina, Denmark and Japan. The closest of these for similar items was $58.02 for the United States, compared to $55.58 for Canada, and the highest was Japan at $135.10 for the same food basket.

It alarms me, Mr. Chairman, when I read about a consumer spokesperson who recently assailed the farm producing sector and indicated that the consumers were suspicious of our marketing boards. Yet after having made this charge, she admitted, without doing any research, that she believed the return to food producers was equal to that realized in other industries. Of course, she did not say whether she was referring to the Chrysler Corporation, Massey Ferguson or Imperial Oil, nor did she mention the surveys of the USDA food basket report to which I referred earlier, or the report by Mr. A. Cayer released in November, 1979, on the egg industry in Canada, in which he states in conclusion, at page 77, that:

> Consumers in Toronto have paid less for eggs than their counterparts in New York, since the implementation of central pricing by CEMA.

Mr. Cayer goes on to point out that:

> Analyses carried out by a number of groups over the past five years have been misleading because their use of selective indicators did not adequately reflect the longer-term trends or the significant fluctuations in currency values or in the industry.

Now if this consumer were sincere and well informed, she would have pointed out that in November the retail price of beef increased to $2.64 per pound, and the farm price dropped by 4 cents per pound. This meant an increased spread of 15 cents per pound between the producer and the consumer in one month. In Ontario the retail value of the OFA food basket was $39.69, up $5.48 from November, 1979, or an increase in the farm retail spread of 19 per cent in one year. The farm retail spread is the cost to the consumer of processing, packaging, distributing and merchandising food.

This same consumer spokesperson wondered if farmers were using up the organic matter in the soil or damaging the land by the weight of large machinery. Here again the weight of large machinery has nothing to do with the organic content in the soil. The loss of organic matter in the soil is usually caused by poor soil management or improper crop rotation, not by compaction. In fact, as equipment has become larger and heavier, the size of the tires has increased, resulting in better flotation. It is easier to understand this when we realize that whereas one Canadian farmer could feed five other persons not too many years ago, he can now feed upward of 70. Our Canadian agricultural industry is the most efficient in the world.

I will never cease to be amazed, Mr. Chairman, that we allow food into Canada which could just as well be grown domestically. In fact, we import almost $2 billion worth of food which could well be grown here in Canada. One of the most blatant examples of these imports occurred last summer, when two Ontario supermarkets carried only imported peaches, despite the availability of a bumper crop of Ontario peaches. If the workers in those countries where the imports originated had received wages comparable to those of our own workers, I could accept this competition, but when we are competing against wage rates which are in some cases only half ours, consequently involving a lower standard of living, we must ask ourselves: are we importing cheap food or are we importing unemployment? I could also accept some of these imports if the consumer were actually the benefactor, but in many instances the cheaper imported price serves only to give a wider profit margin to the importer.

Another point that I wish to make in regard to food imported into Canada is that these merchandisers are not usually interested in serving the less populated areas but rather concentrate in the Montreal, Toronto and Windsor corridor or the Vancouver area, leaving Canadian processors to serve the more scattered population, or areas where distribution costs are much higher. Are these imported foods produced under the same environmental restrictions as those applied to our own Canadian producers, and does the chemical content conform to the restrictions applied in Canada for our own producers?

I believe, however, that Canadians have taken this vital part of our economy for granted for too long. The recent drought in western Canada and the southwestern U.S., the lower than expected crop yields in Russia and China, indicate the delicate balance of our world grain supplies. In spite of this situation, our market prices for grain are influenced by one of the most unpredictable pricing systems ever devised; I refer to the speculative futures market which is supposed to be geared to supply and demand.

Last week the price of soya beans, for example, dropped by about $1 a bushel. The reason for this drop was not oversupply and it certainly was not an anticipated increased crop in Brazil, because it is still premature to estimate the success of this crop which was planted a few weeks ago. It was people speculating on the commodity markets, speculating and gambling on the basis of the very food we eat, while people on other continents starve.

Mr. Chairman, we in Canada have a better system, a system which, while it is often the victim of speculators in other countries, resists the efforts of manipulators and ensures a more stable return to producers and fair prices to the consumers. I am convinced that as Canadians we can do much more to produce that $2 billion worth of imported food in Canada. As an example, just last week I had the honour of presiding at the opening of Canada's first peanut plant, and was delighted with the quality and flavour of our first Canadian commercial crop of peanuts. I can see a tremendous future in this area. I want to commend the Minister of Agriculture and Agriculture Canada for their contribution under their New Crop Development Program and the research which made this project possible. I want to commend them also on the other projects that are on stream.

With regard to increased exports, we can also provide the vehicle which would assist our producers to enter into contracts with other countries wanting to buy food, long-term contracts if possible, providing our producers with the incentive to produce a product, knowing that they can sell it at a profit. Canada is one of the few countries of the world which has the vehicle in place to plan production for specific domestic and export markets. I believe the potential could be one of several billion dollars. Of course the spin-off effects will benefit all of society.

The other area I should like to touch upon is the concern that there may be a world grain shortage a few years hence. We realize how delicate the balance is at the present time. If there is a world grain shortage, a world food shortage could naturally follow. With proper planning and research I am convinced Canada could double its output of protein. It is in this area of research that I commend Agriculture Canada for the work it is doing. In the years that I have been farming, however, I have noticed what seems to be a shortening of the summer growing season. Those of us involved in farming operations have adapted accordingly.

I am particularly enthused about one interesting aspect of research, that is, research in the area of photosynthesis or the process whereby a plant converts sunlight through its leaves to protein and energy. If we could speed up this process, we could push back the geographical and climatic barriers which curtail the production of specialized crops in more northerly regions or colder climatic zones, thereby strengthening our potential to increase food production.

There are some questions which I want to ask the minister. First, has the research division of Agriculture Canada been conducting research on photosynthesis with the goal of speeding up the process, and what have the successes been at the present time? Second, in the area of research, can Agriculture Canada forecast world crop conditions with infrared sensing equipment in the summer months, and are they doing any work in the area of measuring solar radiation and its effects on different crops? Third, in keeping with the support of national farm organizations in Canada for the concept of a Canadian agriculture export corporation, did the deputy minister of agriculture discover any unserviced markets for food on his recent trip to Mexico, and what is the potential value of those markets? Last, with respect to the Farm Credit Corporation, is any consideration being given at the present time to making funds available to young farmers who want to become established farmers and, using this as a mechanism to stop the purchase of farm land by foreign owners and absentee landlords? This is a very serious situation in some areas of the nation, and I should like to see it dealt with.

I would appreciate any comments the minister may have in reply to my questions.

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Chairman, the Farm Credit Corporation is an old institution which was set up to assist farmers and members of the community, especially those who had been turned down by some other lending institution. In this first instance, the Farm Credit Corporation was to be a lending establishment of last resort for farmers. It was not to be "the" lending institution. At one time nearly 70 per cent of all loans made to farmers in Canada was under the Farm Credit Corporation; now it is something like 40 to 50 per cent of all loans made to farmers. We still think the Farm Credit Corporation has a place in our society. All the countries with which we compete in agricultural production and markets have tremendous lending associations, Crown corporations or similar organizations which are either funded or administered by the government in some fashion or form.

It is felt by some—but certainly not by myself—that all loans should be provided to farmers from the private sector. It is not my intention to go in that direction. My intention is to reorganize the Farm Credit Corporation to make it into the kind of organization we have always wanted, so that our farmers will be in the position to borrow from a lending institution which has a feeling for the farming and rural community of Canada. We want such a lending institution.

We shall be presenting new legislation to the House concerning amendments to the Farm Credit Corporation early in the new year. I had hoped that it would be before the House of Commons prior to Christmas, but it does not appear that we will have the time.

Dealing with the area of new markets, the deputy minister and a small group recently visited Mexico and Cuba. They, with the Canadian Feed Manufacturer's Association, presented a program in Cuba which showed how to use Canadian feed to its utmost in feeding swine. The mortality rate in Cuban swine was 5.5 per cent, but when Canadian feed was used the mortality rate immediately dropped in weaning pigs to about .3 per cent. So, there is a potential market there for perhaps 200,000 tonnes of feed per year. There is an increased possibility of new markets in Mexico in many new agricultural commodities, different varities of wheat, different dairy products and different oilseed products.

I just want to say that we are very optimistic, because Mexico indicated that it will spend nearly half of its oil earnings on food to upgrade the nutrition and protein intake of its people. If it does that, it will be spending about $20 billion in the next couple of years on agricultural products, and it is up to us to get part of it. We will try to get part of it, and that is what the deputy minister and the group were doing in Mexico.

In the first part of January we will be returning to Mexico to try to ensure that some agreements are signed for the purchase of these products. In some instances our producers may have to change their production for markets which will be long-term in nature. I think a conservative estimate for the first year would be about a $500 million increase in trade in agricultural products with Mexico.

When we talk about in-house research into the use of solar energy, we are increasing research directed toward maximizing the efficiency of breeding for higher yield. The higher priority areas include growth analysis, the rates of accumulating solar energy, the partitioning of photosynthesis, the rate and timing of plant development of nitrogen metabolism. Perhaps we are not doing as much as we would like, but I can assure the hon. member that we are moving in that area because we figure it is a very important one.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Does the hon. member for Lambton-Middlesex wish to continue, or would he prefer to call it six o'clock?

Mr. Ferguson: May I call it six o'clock, Mr. Chairman?

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock this evening.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: When the committee rose at six o'clock the hon. Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Small Businesses (Mr. Ferguson) had the floor.

Mr. Ferguson: Mr. Chairman, when time was called at six o'clock I had been speaking about some of the excellent research and development being done by Agriculture Canada. If we look at the poultry and livestock sector in Canada we will recognize that one of the biggest turkey hatcheries in North America, with the best breeding stock, is located in my constituency. In the area of laying hens, egg production and broiler production one of the best operations in the world is located in the Cambridge area. We all recognize the standard of excellence which has prevailed in the dairy industry, beef cattle and horse sectors of Canada over the years.

I would like to ask the minister if the present system of parental blood typing, which is being conducted through the Department of Agriculture, will be continued in Canada. We have the best expertise in this field in the world. There was some concern by Canadian livestock breeders that this program might be farmed out to private institutions. Could the minister assure us that this program will be continued.

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Chairman, I do not know how much of this parental blood typing will be carried on. I do know that we will be blood typing horses. The horse breeders of Canada will be paying for it. We do intend to recover the full costs of this project. It will cost the government nothing to do this for the horse breeders. Horse breeders are asking us to do this. The swine breeders are also asking us for parental blood typing. It is a very costly undertaking for us to become involved in. We just do not have provision for it in our budget unless we are to get full recovery. It appears the horse breeders are the group most inclined to go along with this, more so than any other group in the livestock area.

I cannot tell the hon. member any more about it now. We have met with the swine breeders and the sheep breeders. Both groups want this kind of project. The cost per animal subjected to these tests is about $60. For an animal which is only worth two or three times that amount, there is concern about spending that much money. These groups want it done in Canada. We want it done in Canada. If these tests are conducted in some other part of the world, for example the United States of America, the results would be put into their computer systems. The result would be that they would know more about our livestock industry than we would.

We want to continue with this testing but in order to do so we must find a more economical way of doing it in some of the livestock industries.

Mr. Scott (Victoria-Haliburton): Mr. Chairman, I welcome this opportunity to speak on the estimates of the Department of Agriculture. It gives me a chance to say a few words in support of Canada's number one industry—our agriculture industry. It is an industry of which we are all proud.

I know the Minister of Agriculture feels he is doing a good job. I would be surprised if he thought otherwise. However, all is not well in the agriculture industry in Canada today, and the government must take a large share of the blame. I say that for two reasons, Mr. Chairman. First, the government, through the Department of Agriculture and other agencies, is deeply involved in the private sector of agriculture. For that reason the government should recognize the symptoms of an illness in the industry as quickly as anyone else. Second, the government is not as quick to jump in and help this industry as they were when trouble developed in other sectors, such as the automotive and heavy machinery industries. In fairness to the minister, though, it may be that he does not have the support in cabinet that some of his colleagues seem to have.

The agriculture industry in Canada is facing problems that are serious enough to threaten the very future of food production in our country unless we take steps now to identify them, and then to deal with them. There is a large degree of interrelationship between the problems facing the agriculture industry, just as in other types of industry. But unlike most other industries, the effects on the food industry could be both immediate and long range. Some of these problems are inflation, high cost of production, high cost of good farm land, the lack of ready sources of low cost financing for capital and other operating costs, and uncertainty and instability in the marketplace.

The deadly combination of inflation and high interest rates is driving farmers out of business and making it impossible for many young people to enter the agriculture industry. The young couple fortunate enough to buy a family farm for reasonable terms will lock themselves into a future in the agricultural industry, but what about those who have to buy on the open market? To put it simply, the average young couple today would not even be in the running for that type of money. More farmers leave the land every year. Some of them get fed up with the low rate of return on their investment and their labour. When that happens many of them look around for a likely buyer, and it is often a developer who plans to take the land out of production.

While I am on this subject, I would like to point out that every year tens of thousands of acres of prime agricultural land are taken out of production and used as sites for industries and other non-agricultural purposes. This has the additional effect of pushing up prices of other farms in the area. Other farmers, even if they are hard workers and conscientious, find themselves caught between poor market conditions and high interest rates.

Last year the pork producers were forced to sell hogs at less than production costs. When they looked around for money to restock and weather the poor market season they simply could not afford to go further into debt at today's interest costs. In far too many cases, the farmer cannot turn to any private or government agency for assistance which he can afford. I think many, if not all of them, are waiting for the low interest rates which were promised by the Minister of Agriculture to farmers during the last election campaign. Could this be yet another example of the minister's lack of clout in cabinet?

The decrease in the number of dairy farms in our country is real cause for concern, if not alarm. I think some of my colleagues have given this figure before, but it is worth repeating. This has me deeply concerned, both as a member of Parliament from Ontario, and as a consumer. I do not know how many of those lost farms are in Ontario, but I suspect it is too many.

Between 1971 and 1979 there was a decline in the number of dairy farms in Canada from 129,000 to 70,000, a loss of 59,000 dairy farms in just eight years. In that same period the number of dairy cows and heifers in Ontario declined from 986,300 to 770,000. This leads me to believe that a large number of the farms that were pulled out of the dairy business were in Ontario. Mr. Chairman, to me these are dangerous signs, signs that can no longer be ignored.

It must be admitted that improved production methods and good management resulted in only a slight reduction in milk production in that period, but I am sure there is a limit to the process by which fewer farms and fewer cows can produce the same amount of milk. I believe we are close to that limit, and since the population in Ontario is increasing at a faster rate than that of any other province, the decline in dairy farms and dairy cattle in Ontario concerns me in a more personal way than it does some other hon. members.

I have been told there is some concern in the dairy industry as to what the federal government has in mind with regard to the present national dairy policy. I do not believe the dairy industry is being given enough information about the government's plans. They want to know and, indeed, they must know whether or not the government plans to make any major changes in the national policy and, if so, what will those changes be? They do not want to know the day or the week before they are brought in, but well in advance. I venture to say that it would be unwise for the government to plan any changes to the dairy policy without consulting the industry.

I would like to get back to interest rates for a moment because there is no question that high interest rates represent the greatest single stumbling block to a healthy agriculture industry. There is no question that this issue will have to be addressed by the minister and his colleagues in cabinet in the immediate future. Interest rates creep into every segment of the industry and it is the smaller farm units that are hit first and hardest by spiralling rates. For instance, the cost of farm marchinery has increased due to inflation. Most farmers are forced to buy machinery on time and when one adds the effect of inflation and high interest rates, one can see that it becomes more and more difficult for small farmers to purchase modern machinery and equipment.

Next to modern, efficient machinery, perhaps the most important single thing to a small farmer is fertilizer. Crop yield and crop quality are vital to any farm operation, and this means judicious use of the right kinds and quantities of fertilizer. Unfortunately, the price of fertilizer has been rising at a rapid rate over the past few years, and this is cutting into the profits of all farm operations. In some cases where farmers cannot absorb these higher costs, they are abandoning the use of chemical fertilizers altogether. I am sure this results in a decrease in yield per acre as well as a decrease in the quality of crop.

These are some of the problems facing the agriculture industry today in Canada, but there are others. I have not touched on the end result of all this investment in money, time and labour. I have not mentioned the marketplace. If a farmer does not make it in the marketplace, as the saying goes, he just does not make it. And there are problems in the marketplace in Canada today.

In many respects it is a case of feast or famine. For example, we are all familiar with the plight of potato farmers last year and the year before. Last year potato producers took a real beating. They could not sell their crop and potatoes were dumped almost anywhere to get them out of the way. This year potato prices are up and so are carrot prices. Next year anything could happen with any number of farm products. We do not know what is going to happen and that is bad for the producer and the consumer.

It seems, Mr. Chairman, that the market in food and food products jumps from one extreme to the other from year to year. It either hits the bottom or the top, rising and falling, sometimes out of control. It is no wonder so many small businesses go under every year and so many small farms are taken out of production. The rate of failure among small businesses and small farm operations is increasing every year.

It should be mentioned here that it is not only the farms, or the producers which are decreasing in number. It is happening across the whole spectrum of the food chain. There are fewer producers, fewer wholesalers, fewer processors and fewer retailers. I believe a case can be made that control of the food industry in every sector is being concentrated in too few hands. About a month ago the Toronto Star reported that Canada suffered a deficit in foreign trade in manufactured food of $245 million in 1979 compared with a $50 million surplus in 1971. Why was it not the other way around, considering that the Canadian dollar is depressed, and our products should have been highly competitive in the world markets?

There is something seriously wrong when we cannot even take advantage of a greatly depressed dollar to sell Canadian processed food products to a hungry world. I would have thought that our products would have been in demand, but apparently that is not the case.

Perhaps this might be a good time for us to look into the question of trying to get a larger share of the foreign cheese market. There was a time when Canadian cheddar cheese was in great demand. I would like to see some energetic, imaginative and aggressive initiatives taken so as to get back into the world market in a big way.

While we are at it, Mr. Chairman, perhaps we should also consider stepping up our public relations with the consumer and producer. The federal government should take a lesson from the Ontario government and provide more useful information for the Canadian consumer. There should be more information published by the government on all aspects of the food industry, from the producer to the processor to the wholesaler. Not enough is known by the consumer about what happens to a product when it leaves the farm and moves down the chain, to the table. Good public relations and good information can remove many misconceptions from the mind of the consumer, and that would only be proper, because it is the consumer who pays the bills.

Mr. Chairman, I was interested in an article which appeared in one of the leading newspapers. This article, datelined Jordan Station, appeared in the Toronto Star on October 16, 1980, and begins as follows:

> The price of an egg quota has gone past $17.55 a bird and is heading toward $20 in Ontario, according to testimony before the Ontario Farm Products Appeal Tribunal here Wednesday.
> Mrs. Cornelius Super of Tavistock testified that a bid of $17.55 a bird to buy quota from a Seaforth area egg farmer was turned down in September. She and her husband bid $150,000 for an egg quota of 8,546 birds.
> The farmer countered by offering the quota for $20 a bird, she said, while stipulating that the bird cages would go with the deal.
> But Mrs. Super testified that taking the cages would have represented a cost rather than a benefit because they were in such poor shape that 'the man wanted to get them out of there, I guess.'
> Selling the cages with the birds might give the farmer some tax benefits because taxes on the sale of quota might be higher than on the sale of cages. The official sales price reported to the egg board, which must approve all quota transfers, could also be lowered.
> The egg board has claimed that the going price of quota, as reported to it when transfer applications come in, is running about $10 to $12 a bird.

It is articles like this appearing in our leading newspapers that make the consumer very suspicious. Eggs sell in chain-stores today for approximately $1.19 per dozen. I do not say that is an unfair price; in fact, it is a reasonably fair price. But what would the consumer think after reading about $17.55 being offered for a laying hen quota and $20 being asked, with the cages—which are of little value—included. This is something that our agriculture industry must be concerned about. The price of the commodity must be presented fairly and I do not think an article such as this does so.

Many things are done by the Department of Agriculture that I think are beneficial to both the producer and the consumer, but there ought to be a little guidance—not too much, mind you—and a little forecasting by the department about what the future may be. We need a cushion to carry us over the lows and highs. That can apply both ways, of course.

These are some of the things the retailer is complaining about today, Mr. Chairman. I think the cost of the consumer's food basket today is a reasonably fair one but I also think much more could be done for the Canadian consumer by the food industry.

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Chairman, may I say in reply to the hon. member's remarks about egg quota prices that quotas on every commodity, are under the authority of the provinces. The hon. member suggested we take a lesson from the Ontario government. I should like to tell him that we do not follow their advice. It is the Ontario government that allows quota prices to become so unrealistic. No two provinces run quotas in the same way; in fact, some of them put no value on quota at all and only redistribute quotas when a farmer sells out.

The hon. member used the price of grade A large eggs as a reference. The average price of all grades of eggs in Canada today, in 1980, is less than $1 per dozen. Not many countries in the world can make such a claim and have such a healthy egg producing industry as we have. Not one penny of tax money has been put in the egg producers' pockets since the scheme started eight years ago.

I wonder if the hon. member could bring to my attention the case of even one egg producer who has gone bankrupt. Egg producers in Canada are the most efficient in the world. The feeding formula used to call for over eight pounds of feed to produce one dozen eggs but today a dozen eggs can be produced with less than four pounds of feed. The efficiency of the egg producing industry is the most startling in all agriculture.

The mortality rate used to be 25 per cent or higher, per year. At the present time it is .5 per cent in a laying flock. That is phenomenal, Mr. Chairman.

The hon. member also mentioned dairy farmers. Today there are 50 per cent fewer dairy farmers in Canada than there were 12 or 15 years ago. There are one-third less cattle, but more milk of a higher quality is being produced than 12 or 15 years ago. This efficiency is the envy of the world.

A rumour has been going around to the effect that the dairy farmers' quota is to be cut back. I do not know where that has come from, Mr. Chairman, unless it is a bit of political mischief. It has not come from the Dairy Commission or any study that we know of. If anything were to be done in this area it would only be after full consultation with the dairy industry.

I would draw the attention of hon. members to the Agriculture Outlook Conference that took place in Ottawa in the last two days. All the farm leaders of any significance a from across Canada were present, as were representatives of agribusiness.

Mr. Chairman, I never heard a more positive group in my life talking about the future of agriculture. There has been mention of small farms disappearing, but that has been an ongoing problem. Each province in the country has different programs, which may arrange to provide loans to farmers, help in the division of farms, etc., as I mentioned earlier. Also, Mr. Chairman, there are more young people in agriculture today than at any time in the last 50 years.

Mr. de Jong: Mr. Chairman, in the last few months I have raised in various committees and in this House, several questions concerning chemicals and pesticides. I have done this not out of political motivation, because the question is not an ideological one. I have done it because I am scared. I am scared that in a relatively short period we are altering the evolutionary development of millions of years.

Some of my concerns were expressed in a recent article in the science section of The Globe and Mail. It was written by Mr. Kieran. He said:

> Indeed, many advanced technologies possess as much inherent potential for destruction as for good, and dangerous components become ever harder to discern and control. At the same time, the poisonous byproducts of previous technical 'advances' are starting to come back to haunt us with a legacy of irreversible environmental degradation. Other destructive pressures from within challenge society's ability to respond wisely in this age of accelerated change.

I am scared because hundreds of millions of gallons of new chemicals are used every year on a massive scale. These are distributed over the landscape and throughout the food chain. These chemicals are affecting the chemical composition of our environment which has taken millions of years to develop. Such a major change should require the utmost care, concern and consciousness. For us as human beings who have been occupying this planet for a very short period of time to have such a dramatic influence on the physical world in which we live is surely presumptuous. If we do that, we must do it with the greatest amount of care possible. Yet, Mr. Chairman, I am not convinced that the government has been taking all the necessary precautions and care. I am concerned by the tendency of government to be somewhat secretive about its dealings. Ever since this new Parliament has convened I have been asking various departments, including the Department of National Health and Welfare, to let us know how many chemicals and what chemicals were tested faultily by a company called Industrial Biotest Laboratories. I was not the only one asking for this information. Provincial governments have done so. The government has still not released an accurate list of all the chemicals in use in Canada today. Proper studies do not exist to let us know whether the widespread use of these chemicals is safe for the present and future of the human race.

I am concerned when I read about statements made by officers of the Department of Agriculture who suggest that too much detail on labels could lead to increased violations of laws, or to more charges being laid by environmental groups. In the latter case the department suggests that labelling of pesticide and herbicide products should not be too scary. They say these things should be handled in such a way as to avoid law suits and avoid concern by environmental groups. When I asked about this statement in committee, I did not receive satisfactory answers. In fact, I got evasive answers. Every day there is something new in the newspapers. It makes one very scared to read about these things. Today we found out about dioxin traces in chicken livers. A product is applied to preserve wood shavings used in chicken coops. It contains dioxins of a dangerous type which have now been found in chicken livers. This information was available a year ago. However, the public was never informed about it. We hear about these things by reading The Globe and Mail. It was stated in today's Globe and Mail that this information was released at an international conference two months ago in Rome.

If we continue to use hundreds of millions of gallons of herbicides and pesticides and other new chemicals, one of the first criteria should be an open policy about their use. Unfortunately, as I have indicated before, this has not been the case.

Recently the Minister of Agriculture issued a press release which stated they have found some of the dioxins in 2,4-D, but I ask: how new is this information? In 1970, Doctor Samuel Epstein pointed out in his testimony before Senator Philip Hart's subcommittee that 2,4-D contained dioxins. In 1970-1971, the plant science research division of the United States department of agriculture examined samples of 17 different pesticides derived from chlorophynols. They also found dioxins.

We have also learned that the Department of Agriculture has acquired some new technology. In 1980 they have discovered dioxins in 2,4-D. We do not know what action the government will take on this matter. Here again there is a time lapse.

Unfortunately, technological changes were introduced without fully examining the results and the effects of these technological innovations. Yet, when it is discovered that they can be harmful or that they are harmful to the environment and to people, a long period of time elapses before corrective measures are taken. Essentially, in terms of technological innovation, the government, as indeed most governments—in the "socialist" world and the "free" world face the same problem, because this is not an ideological matter. They react to technological changes too slowly. It is a reaction, rather than knowing ahead of time what dangers to look for. We are beginning to pay the price. Whole parts of our natural environment have been despoiled. Studies from the Department of the Environment show that lindane is a major health concern but it is found in most surface waters on the prairies. In fact, it has found its way into the whole food chain. It has found its way into the animal biological chain, from worms to insects, to birds, etc. The chemical composition of our environment has changed. For what purpose may I ask? I fear the Department of Agriculture has worked too closely with the chemical industry. The Department of Agriculture should be concerned with the welfare of farmers and not with the welfare of the chemical industry. Some of the claims which the chemical industry is making should be taken with a grain of salt. For instance, I have come across an informative article from BioScience, volume 27, No. 3. It is suggested that the increased use of herbicides and pesticides has done very little in recent years to decrease the destruction of crops by pesticides. Speaking about the United States, the article reads:

> Despite an increase in the use of pesticides from about 100 million pounds in 1947 to about 1.1 billion pounds in 1974, crop losses due to pests have not declined but have remained at an estimated 33 per cent. Losses due to insects have nearly doubled, increasing from about 7 per cent in the 1942-1951 period to about 13 per cent in 1974. In corn production, for example, losses from insects have been increasing. A 3.5 per cent loss was reported for the period 1942-1951, a 12.0 per cent loss for 1951-1960, and about a 12 per cent loss for 1972-1974.

What I am afraid of is that Canadian agriculture has ended up on a treadmill, in a "squirrel-gig" situation where more and more pesticides and herbicides are needed to control the number of insects. The insects develop immunities to the new chemicals which are produced and the chemical companies come out with more and more potent chemicals which have an increasingly permanent and adverse effect on our environment and upon human health. I am concerned that the Department of Agriculture has not dealt with the chemical companies with suspicion or concern.

We are also concerned about the effect it has on the health of the population. The government has stated in the past that it has not come across any cases of pesticide poisoning. I will quote again from the same article drawing attention to the situation in America where chemical poisoning has occurred. I quote from the March 7 issue of BioScience, volume 27, No. 3:

> As many as 14,000 individuals may be nonfatally poisoned by pesticides in a given year, 6,000 seriously enough to require hospitalization . . . In the United States about 200 fatalities occur annually. None of the poisonings and fatalities were apparently due to eating foods treated properly with insecticides. Groups particularly prone to exposure to pesticides and poisoning are farm field workers and pesticide applicators—

There is an effect on health. Cases can be documented across this country. For example, a homeowner in Alberta may buy a pesticide product off the shelf in a hardware store, use it at home and end up with toxic poisoning. Farmers in my constituency tell me about the adverse reactions they have experienced when mixing chemicals, using the applicators and spraying their fields.

There is a concern about health. The whole story has not yet been told. We do not have the technique and the ability, nor are we looking for the adverse health effects on the farm population as a result of the widespread use of herbicides and pesticides. Many of these products are sprayed. They drift and get trapped in small towns. Studies show very high levels of 2, 4-D in downtown Saskatoon. The winds swept the chemical there and it remains trapped.

It is important that the government be open about the question of herbicides and pesticides for several reasons. It is important that the public know the extent and full cost of the use of these chemicals so that we can in a fair way balance the pros and cons of their continued use. If we do not know the true costs to health and the environment, we cannot make a judgment. In a democracy, we depend upon full information so that the public can make those types of decisions. As long as the cost and the adverse effects of such a wide use of chemicals are not made public, we can never make a democratic decision.

The second reason is that in the end we must develop ways to control weeds and pests. Any reasonable person will recognize that the dumping of hundreds of millions of gallons of poison on to the earth cannot go on for years and years. An end must come to it. The soil, earth and environment cannot stand hundreds of millions of gallons of additional toxic waste.

We have to develop other less harmful ways of controlling weeds and pests. As long as we do not know the true extent of the social and environmental cost of the extended use of chemicals, there will never be public pressure to develop alternatives. I urge the minister and the department to put more effort into developing alternative ways by which weeds and pests can be controlled, ways which will not be so harmful to the farmer and the environment.

Intensified use of insecticides has resulted in several major problems, first, a greater portion of foods contaminated with insecticide residue than in the past; second, a larger number of insecticide poisonings; third, continued environmental pollution problems from pesticides; fourth, increased use of energy in pest controls, and fifth, increased food costs for the consumer.

We must remember that the cost of herbicides and pesticides has been increasing every year. The development of resistant strains has necessitated increased use of these products. First reading has been given to amendments to the Pest Control Products Act. When it next comes before the House, we will be proposing several amendments along the line of extending the act to include the Department of the Environment and the department of health. I am not the only one who believes that. On July 16, the deputy minister of health wrote to the deputy minister of agriculture suggesting that the department of health should be covered by the Pest Control Products Act. I concur with her.

Registration and use of these new chemicals must be treated in a more responsible way. The long-term effects must be known. Instruments must be developed to handle these products, instruments that are meaningful in the twentieth century, not the nineteenth century as at present. I hope the minister will seriously consider some of my suggestions. On future occasions and in future committees there will be opportunities to discuss this matter again.

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Chairman, I will reply to the hon. member as quickly as I possibly can. The hon. member talked about finding dioxin in chicken livers. This is well below the safety level. In the most recent incident, it was 1.4 parts per billion. That is the highest level. It is natural to find that anything in your system will show up in your liver, but to make a comparison, it is like comparing one foot with the distance to the moon. That is the amount of dioxin in a chicken liver. It is far below the danger level.

When talking about how bad things are, I am sure the hon. member recognizes that while the situation may not be perfect, it is much better than ever before. One of the most severe criticisms I received from all parts of Canada, western Canada in particular, was when I banned the importation of pesticides which were not certified in Canada for use by farmers on their own farms. I did that because I did not feel they came up to our regulations. We are moving to a better chemical industry in Canada. It is wrong for the hon. member to create fear in minds of people.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whelan: We are operating safer than ever before with regard to regulations for pesticides and so on. Recently some pesticides and herbicides for home gardens were banned. It was found that the people who were using them were not trained to use the product. They sometimes used twice what was required and the products were distributed around their neighbourhoods.

There are about 75 different kinds of dioxins. The most dangerous is 2378-TCD. We are using the most modern equipment in history to test these products. As the hon. member said, we are finding out things we did not know existed. For instance, Uniroyal, one of the largest chemical companies in Canada, has approximately 40 people with Ph.Ds and doctorates working on these products and working on hundreds and hundreds of them every day. The hon. member has intimated we are in the back pockets of the chemical companies. If he knew what the chemical companies thought of the Minister of Agriculture he would know this is not so. We have some of the strictest rules of any country in the world—maybe not strict enough—and before any company can use a pesticide it must be registered for use in our country.

Mr. Dionne (Chicoutimi): Mr. Chairman, I am very happy to rise and speak to Bill C-47 with regard to Canadian agriculture. Obviously, in the few minutes allowed me, I shall not be able to deal in depth with the problems of agriculture in Canada; still, I should like to deal with the efficiency of Canadian producers, research, marketing, export products, farm credit, processing and inspection services.

Mr. Chairman, I could not possibly not mention and pay tribute to Canadian farm producers who only 30 years ago, fed barely five persons. In 1980, they are feeding about 55, and in the 1990s they will be feeding at least 150. We must pay tribute, Mr. Chairman, to the dynamism of our farm producers for their magnificent performance in every field of activity in the country. I take my hat off to them because, in a country like Canada, where the climate is quite harsh, one can certainly say that compared with producers in the United States, the only country in the world that produces 12 months out of 12, year in and year out, our farm producers really do quite well, and we only pay 1 to 2 per cent more for our own agricultural produce off the shelves. I want to congratulate our Canadian producers and tell them this: the least expensive of all grocery baskets is found here in Canada, despite a difficult climate, and despite the small population in some parts of the country. I really cannot understand why, in some quarters, there is constant beefing about our producers supposed lack of efficiency, when we know full well that as compared with the United States, Europe and even Japan, our grocery basket is the pride of our country and the envy of all the other countries in the world. So, Mr. Chairman, once again, I want to pay tribute to our farm producers and encourage them to continue to develop, to modernize and industrialize their farms at the rate we have witnessed in the last few years.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if we want to maintain the high rate of productivity of our agricultural class, the government, through the Department of Agriculture, must ensure that research is pursued at suitable levels, so that highly productive strains can be found and our producers can offer the consumers farm produce at consistently reasonable prices.

Mr. Chairman, when one speaks of research, one thinks of highly productive new strains, but we must not forget either that farms have to be owned where the results of the research performed throughout the land by our government agencies can be applied.

Still, Mr. Chairman, I would like to suggest to the minister that, with a view to stimulating research carried on in experimental farms where a lot of time is lost, now and again the Department of Agriculture should investigate very efficient farms which have experienced a high rate of productivity and request the close co-operation of those farmers to promote research in our country. Mr. Chairman, I think that the more new strains we can get and the more we insist on research, the more efficient our farmers will be for the benefit of our consumers.

In addition, I do not want to forget our Agricultural Products Board. We know quite well that several of our agricultural products are among the best in the world right now. We only have to consider our pork as well as our grain and we soon realize that several countries envy the quality of our food products. I would like to suggest to the minister that our Agricultural Products Board be expanded. As far as export is concerned, we all recognize that it is the Minister of Agriculture who is most aware of the problems and who is closest to the agricultural community. I also disagree with letting other departments control the export of our farm products, because it often happens that officials in trade missions do not know our farm products. I am convinced that there is none better qualified than the Department of Agriculture to sell our products in other countries or convince them of the quality of these products.

I would like to deal briefly with marketing because the agricultural sector's efficiency depends on marketing which can provide adequate income for our farmers.

I would like to raise another point which, I think, could help us provide more protection for our farmers. We all know that several distributors or wholesalers in Canada have packaging permits, and they often lower the quality of the products by picking the top quality products and selling the rest in other containers.

I would therefore suggest to the minister that repackaging permits be prohibited since the Department of Agriculture has in recent years made funds available to farmers for the establishment of repackaging, classifying, washing and distribution facilities. Mr. Chairman, I think that if we want to keep these centres, which have proved efficient and which will serve all farmers who can use them, then we will have to implement stiff regulations to protect these investments and ensure compliance with Department of Agriculture regulations.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to touch upon the explosive issue of farm credit. More and more Canadian farmers are being asked to mechanize at the same rate as the rest of the world.

One thing for sure, agricultural producers have perhaps not been treated fairly when they have asked for financing. I would suggest to the hon. minister that our farmers be increasingly treated as businessmen or industrialists, and I shall tell him why. More and more, when a Canadian industry wants to reinvest or use its profit for its business, it is given tax rebates.

In agriculture, Mr. Chairman, every time a farmer makes a profit he does not enjoy the same tax privileges or advantages which, in my opinion, would greatly encourage producers to reinvest in the farming industry without having always to depend on government subsidies, and they would then be able to become more independent and more productive. In my opinion, this would be one of the ways to provide incentives which could help the Department of Agriculture meet its objective of having Canada play its role of feeding the developing countries.

Mr. Chairman, I strongly urge the hon. minister to examine this problem so that once and for all our farmers may be treated as businessmen and receive the same tax exemptions, provided they reinvest their profits in the farm or in agricultural improvements to increase their productivity, which would result in better products on the market and acceptable prices for all consumers.

Mr. Chairman, we all know that the role of the agricultural producer is to feed the consumer, but not at any price. Of course, I agree that the cost of each product must be taken into account. We should not be shocked if the prices of agricultural products increase occasionally. We should stop harassing politically and economically the same 5 per cent of our population by always asking them to make sacrifices to feed the whole country. I am not shocked when the price of a dozen eggs, a bag of potatoes or a quart of milk goes up from time to time; I believe that everything is going the same way in this world and that the price of everything must rise, and I agree with all hon. members that we must still maintain a high rate of productivity.

I believe that, by providing strong incentives, we can maintain this high productivity which has always been typical of Canadian agriculture, and I am proud to repeat this evening, Mr. Chairman, that Canadian agriculture is among the most productive in the world, and I want Canadian producers to be aware of this fact.

I would now like to deal with the processing sector. We all know that, because of the cost of energy, fertilizers, manpower, farm investment, and so on, we no longer have the right to throw away lower quality products which are rejected following an inspection. I hope that the minister will examine this problem today and that we will build more processing plants in this country to make greater use of lower quality products which are often put aside or simply thrown away. We cannot tolerate such a thing in view of all the costs and all the energy needed to harvest these products which cost just as much as first grade products.

Therefore I invite the Department of Agriculture to give serious consideration to that problem. Mr. Chairman, I should also like to deal with climatology, a field where I think we lack development in this country because we have so few experts in climatology. I remember that all summer long the opposition referred to the drought in western Canada. They said that it would bring about higher costs for food, that we would have less abundant crops.

However, I think that in a vast country like Canada, Mr. Chairman, a more developed climatological service would be absolutely necessary because last summer, as we know, while there was a drought in Saskatchewan and in Manitoba, Quebec and the maritime provinces were flooded. Mr. Chairman, I think we can help our farm producers by offering them a much more sophisticated climatological service in order to enable them to plan their crops a little more.

I would not want to overlook the inspection service, Mr. Chairman. The Canadian inspection service is truly outstanding given the fact that the high quality of our products is acknowledged throughout the world. Our inspection service exists, however, for the sole purpose of monitoring the quality of the commodities sold to the consumer.

I should like to mention one weakness. In my opinion, the inspection service should protect farmers against the wide range of chemical products being offered on the market and being advertised as likely to miraculously double or even triple various crop yields which they fail to do more often than not. Mr. Chairman, I suggest that no effort should be spared to protect uninformed farmers against the improper use of these chemical products. Moreover, I would not want to ignore either the remarks made by the hon. member for Regina East (Mr. de Jong) who has a tendency to speak as though we were still in 1940. I would simply remind him that we are in 1980. As a potato grower for some 20 years, I can say that I have used chemicals and that I have never had any problems with them because I would strictly follow the directions on the labels. Perhaps I should add, for the benefit of the hon. member for Regina East, that I was a DDT user. Although I used it extensively, I never experienced any problem with it in the forties and fifties. But I must tell the hon. member that he does not know anything about chemicals and that he has a tendency to suggest that all farmers are inefficient nincompoops. He is wrong! What he says is unfounded, because our farmers are the wisest users of chemicals in Canada. They make the best use of them. I suggest to him also that if he made further inquiries, he would realize that most of the chemicals used in this country since 1975 are biodegradable. He only has to look for the meaning of the word biodegradable and he will then agree with me that none of the chemical products used in this country are dangerous and he should therefore once and for all stop scaring consumers who do not know where to go. This is the sort of thing that scares people and originates from politicians who propagate all kinds of lies. It is sheer ignorance. I daresay the companies, the government and everbody else have at one time or other asked the House that chemicals be free from certain ingredients and that consumers be also protected from these things. We should stop once and for all scaring the whole population. People can think for themselves and have a great deal of respect for politicians. If we want to keep this respect, Mr. Chairman, we have to be honest with the consumer.

[English]

Mr. McCain: Mr. Chairman, some day if all ideologists such as the hon. member for Regina West were to get up for breakfast and find no egg or toast, they would wonder what happened. There would be no egg or toast because farmers would have listened to clowns like the hon. member. If they did, they could not produce enough wheat in Canada to feed Canada, let alone help feed the rest of the world. So you must have a little judgment—

Mr. Benjamin: It takes one clown to know another one.

Mr. McCain: That would qualify you, sir.

Mr. Benjamin: You just qualified.

Mr. McCain: There are a few little things which will grow in the wild, such as berries and so on, and one does not seem to need anything more than perhaps a fire to produce blueberries. Raspberries also will come after burn-out, so if that is the kind of fodder the hon. member wants, if he wants to go back to nature and the land which we inhabited a few hundred years ago, I suggest that is what he would get. I agree totally with the hon. member for Portneuf, who said, "don't scare the country to death in a needless fashion." It is abusing the farmers and the public who eat their produce to talk in such language as that, with so little knowledge of the facts, because there are, including the hon. member for Portneuf and myself, probably two dozen other members in the House who have lived with, worked with, farmed with and needed the chemicals which he condemns to produce the food without which he would starve. Let us use a little judgment.

I will say that he did caution the Department of Agriculture very properly. We in Canada are not doing the kind of research we should be doing to know in time what chemicals we should or should not use. Perhaps we are not providing the necessary cautionary instructions needed on some of the chemicals which we use, and I wish we could improve on that. However, to denounce totally the use of chemicals in agriculture is to ask the rest of the world to submit to starvation.

An hon. Member: You want to have it both ways.

Mr. McCain: You would like to have it both ways. You would like to listen to the ideologists and eat too, and the two do not go together.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. McCain: Just be quiet. The minister will do enough talking but you be quiet. You will have your turn.

Yesterday I went to two different meetings, Mr. Chairman. There is no question about that because here are some of the things I was told. I was told that there is a long way to go for the government—

The Chairman: The hon. member for Chicoutimi rises on a point of order?

Mr. Dionne (Chicoutimi): I should like to say to my dear colleague that my constituency is not Portneuf but Chicoutimi, please, and I thank you very much.

Mr. McCain: I thank you for your correction. We have one point in common and I do not know how many more we will discover before the night is over, but potatoes will be all right.

I was accosted by a gentleman down there who asked, "What in the world is this government doing? Is it not aware that Canada is quite capable of self-sufficiency, and that the moves which the government has taken are leading us further and further from self-sufficiency? We are even importing chicken."

There was another fellow there who said, "Look, I am really concerned about the flour industry in Canada because there does not seem to be any way to stop the dumping of flour from foreign jurisdictions, and our industry is in jeopardy as a result. Someone is trying to buy a market and hope they will have a corner of it." I suppose the minister and I did not meet that fellow. Another fellow came up to me and said that the mushroom industry in Canada is having trouble. "At the moment we seem to have a good corner on the fresh mushroom market, but as the industry is expanding for fresh protected mushrooms, we will need a processing industry." He said, "It is futile to hope we could ever grow mushrooms for processing." These people want a chance to make a living and they do not want to have the product come in from sources where costs are unrealistic in relation to Canadian costs. They want recognition of the fact that farmers have a right to live, even if they grow mushrooms. Whether or not the minister thinks so in Windsor is another question.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: He only grows magic mushrooms.

Mr. McCain: We need an additional preference for domestic products. As an example of what can be done let me point out that when we did have a surplus of onions we had a promotion program which worked to relieve materially the surplus and to increase domestic consumption of Canadian products. It improved the situation.

There was another fellow from Atlantic Canada who came up to me who asked, me, "What are you going to do about a subsidy on feed grains, because the livestock industry in the Atlantic area will starve or choke to death. It cannot survive on the present basis." I do not know, Mr. Chairman. We have a good bunch of farmers in Canada and we have some good programs in agriculture, but everything is not as rosy as some people would like to say it is.

I have a few little questions which I should like to put to the minister. The minister has complained that he has not had a chance to answer questions, so I will put one to him and if he does not take too long to answer it in Committee of the Whole House, I would like to ask him some more. My first question is whether or not the department had a cost-benefit study before it adopted a resolution on seed potato production? The regulations which were passed have a very significant impact upon cost.

Mr. Whelan: First of all, Mr. Chairman, a statement was made about mushrooms and the hon. member will not get away with it. I am sure the hon. member knows—and if he does not he might want to search the library in his office—that under our tariff negotiations we put a 20 per cent tariff on imported canned mushrooms, plus about 18 cents on the Canadian dollar, so that the producers have a benefit or protection of about 38 per cent if they want to can mushrooms in Canada. I do not know what more we can do.

The hon. member asked whether we had a cost analysis for the program. The answer is no.

Mr. McCain: Would the minister have any conception of how much the increased cost per acre will be for the methods which will be necessary to comply with the regulation, and does he have any idea of the cost of machinery replacement which will be necessary in order to plant in the fashion prescribed by the regulations?

Mr. Whelan: The hon. member knows full well why we acted as quickly as we did. We did so because we had to protect that industry. So we put in some severe regulations. There is no doubt about that. They are important to protect that industry. If we are going to expand the seed market which he and many of us have talked about, it is just not possible to do it without those strict regulations. We had to act very quickly, in response to his representations, amongst others, about what we should be doing to make sure that those seed potatoes we export are free of disease.

Mr. McCain: I should like to ask the minister what we got in return for the regulations which we introduced. Does the minister have the assurance that we will in fact have open access to the European Economic Community, because it was only for this community that these regulations were required?

Mr. Whelan: We do not have it at this point in time, but there is an old saying that you shall be known by your actions. We hope we shall have that access. Not only have we made such a representation but my colleague, the Minister of State for Trade, has made such a representation to the EEC and to those countries with which we are having difficulties.

Mr. McCain: The answer is that we do not have access, that we went into this situation without a quid quo pro, without the assurance that we would have the market. I should like to ask the minister now, through you, Mr. Chairman, whether or not we have permission to ship to the European Economic Community during this marketing season and, if so, when did we get it?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member knows that not only do we have to appear as good as Holland and Denmark and some of the other countries with which we are competing, we have to be as good and our legislation has to be as good. If we can develop our seed market in the world from half of 1 per cent to 1 per cent of the world seed potato market, that is what we all want. We expedited the passage of those regulations. We have not hurt a soul as far as I am concerned, and they will have to meet those regulations. They can forget about the potato seed industry anywhere in the world if they are not going to meet the health standards that the other countries are demanding. If we are to compete with Holland and Denmark, I repeat, we must have those regulations and we must adhere to them.

The Chairman: The hon. member for Victoria-Charlotte.

Mr. McCain: Could we try Carleton-Charlotte, sir? I will forgive you, Mr. Chairman, if the hon. member for Chicoutimi will forgive me.

Mr. Chairman, there is an element of logic in what the minister said regarding the answers on the inspection structure, but I wish to ask him one more question. In view of the costs he has imposed by these regulations, without any quid pro quo agreement with the European Economic Community, would he explain why he has exacerbated the problem by suggesting for the first time to Canadian potato farmers that he will charge them for seed inspection?

If ever there was a time in the history of the Canadian potato seed business when producers needed to be encouraged by free inspection, it is now. It is not a matter of imposing now an additional charge over and above the costs of machinery, handling, storing, etc. which are imposed by this regulation without a quid pro quo agreement before starting. There is a great deal of evidence to indicate a substantial market for Canadian seed potatoes outside the European Economic Community. I agree that we need to be inside the EEC, but it is a matter of negotiating on a quid pro quo basis from the beginning. Why have farmers been told that they will be charged for seed potato inspection after the other requirements have been imposed on them without any reward?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Chairman, I am sure the hon. member is aware that we had discussions with the provincial ministers of agriculture concerned. The provincial minister of agriculture for New Brunswick approved of this program. It is a cost-sharing program. It is not totally the responsibility of the producer; it is the responsibility of the producer, the province and the federal government. It is in the true spirit of confederation, if I may put it that way. It is what we call a unified approach. We are sure that we will come out with the best program ever for seed potatoes. When Canagrex is formed and we are selling seed potatoes, we will be able to guarantee disease-free potatoes. There will be no suspicion that they have ring rot or any other disease. We will be able to say that our potatoes are better than the ones from Holland and Denmark. We cannot say that at the present time.

Mr. McCain: Yes, we can.

Mr. Whelan: Unless we adhere to these strict rules and regulations, we will not be able to say it. So, it was a necessary step to take. I have not heard the kind of dissension about this program which the hon. member is trying to put across tonight. That has not been indicated in the correspondence I have received. I have visited potato growers in other parts of Canada who are subject to the same control. The potato growers of Alberta had some concern about it, but when I went to them and explained it, I came away from the meeting with the feeling they understood that it would be good for them and good for us also.

Mr. McCain: Would the minister ask an economist in his department to estimate the additional cost of the production of potatoes for seed, for table stock and for processing so that it will be down in black and white? Would he ask one of his experts if he has ever tried to grow netted gem potatoes from whole potatoes never touched by a knife? If so, how should they be planted to get a yield fit for processing, whether it be in Manitoba, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island or Alberta? Obviously the minister has not asked those questions. It is necessary for these potatoes to be planted whole, if I understand the regulations, unless the department has backed off. It is just not a practical way to grow certain varieties.

Will the minister undertake to get the information I have requested? I would like to know the additional machinery, seed and storage costs. Also, will the minister restrict the Canadian market to nothing but Canadian potatoes? If so, where does he expect to find potatoes for consumers during the middle months of the season? We do not and cannot produce them, and we cannot trade with any country which is subject to the problems the minister is trying to preclude. He knows the objectives as well as I. We are both in accord with the objectives, but the means used to attain the objectives are extremely expensive. I just want to know if the minister realizes what costs he has imposed.

I have one further question. Would the minister explain why his department representatives recommend that onion growers with low incomes should receive $12,000 per farmer, while potato growers receive $4,000 for the same reason?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Chairman, I do not know what statistic the hon. member is using.

Mr. McCain: It was a release from the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. Whelan: When we look at the amount of money we have put into potatoes and compare it to the amount of money we have put into onions over a period of years, both of them could probably use a better marketing system. From 1974 to 1978 we spent $46,800,000 in potato stabilization. If Mr. Chairman will excuse me, we might as well have poured the money down a rathole because it did not make the potato industry—

Mr. McCain: They will be glad to hear that all over Canada.

Mr. Whelan: —that much better; it did not stabilize it that much. It helped some growers to stay in business, but their marketing system is still one of the most horrible. Perhaps there is one which is a little bit worse, but I will not mention it at the present time.

Mr. McCain: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. The minister's answer is in no way related to any of the questions I asked.

The Chairman: With all due respect, the hon. member has a few minutes left in which to make his point. The Minister of Agriculture has the floor.

Mr. Whelan: The hon. member made comments about the officials. The deputy minister went to North Africa to talk to the people there about what kinds of potatoes they wanted, what kinds of potatoes we could supply. We know we can supply the kinds of potatoes they want; we know the kinds they want. We know we will have to plant potatoes here which we can guarantee to be disease-free.

I cannot give the member the answers he is requesting tonight that quickly, but I could have them for him tomorrow in a more detailed form when we resume consideration in Committee of the Whole.

Market risk insurance is included in the program. We are participating in that with the producers and the provinces. The provinces have been told that we must move on this. We have met with the provincial deputy minister of Prince Edward Island on this subject. The provinces want research and development, the hon. member wants research and development. These are being co-ordinated with the program through the food production inspection branch in Ottawa. It is a split-up program. We do not make excuses for it. The hon. member has said, "You are not doing enough", and when we move, he says, "You are doing too much". I do not understand.

Mr. McCain: The questions I have asked have not necessarily denounced the problem totally, but does the minister understand the costs he has imposed? Obviously he does not.

What will happen to the general trading relations which have existed between Canada and the United States, for example, without whose supply consumers will not have any potatoes? The processing industry will not have any potatoes for the summertime because they can neither be stored nor produced for that purpose in Canada at this time. Perhaps research will develop a system whereby we can, but there are problems associated with it.

I fully appreciate that there has been discussion between the minister in Ottawa and the ministers in the individual provinces. There is no question about that, but my information is that some of the agreements which were achieved were not necessarily kept in full as the federal government proceeded after the regulations were made. However, I will not go into that aspect at the moment.

Will the minister commit himself to getting and publicizing the per acre costs imposed by this change? I want him to find out what has been the results of tests conducted on Canadian seed versus Dutch seed or European seed of any kind in the foreign markets which Atlantic Canada is now supplying. The answer he will receive is that Atlantic seed potatoes which were planted in test plots in an international competition are indeed showing better results in the last year than the tests on the seeds of other competitors. The minister mentioned Holland. Holland at the moment is experiencing a cyclical problem which we have been experiencing for the last five years. Are they, in fact, able to comply with the regulations themselves? That is the argument we must put forward. Can they, in fact, comply themselves with the regulations which we have imposed here? They are exposed to table production and to the flight of insects from one jurisdiction to another, as is Atlantic Canada, as is any other agricultural area in Canada. I think the answers to these questions are pertinent to the potato industry.

The Chairman: I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

[Translation]

Mr. Dubois: Mr. Chairman, I am pleased to participate tonight in the debate on the estimates of the Department of Agriculture and on the dairy policy announced last summer, and then to comment on the situation in the province of Quebec, and to show how Quebec milk producers benefit from the Canadian dairy policy.

As of August 1, 1980, the price of industrial milk was raised from $14.68 to $15.26 a hundredweight, that is 3.9 per cent more. Hon. members know that the last increase had been announced on April 1, 1980. Worthy of consideration at the time was the fact the support price paid by the Canadian Dairy Commission for butter went up to $1.592 a pound. That is a raise of 8 cents a pound.

As a member coming from a rural area of Quebec, I noted particularly that the minister had announced the Government of Canada would pay $2.66 a hundredweight for industrial milk produced for the domestic market and for the export program.

My colleagues from Quebec and those from other provinces will remember that at their last convention in Winnipeg Quebec Liberal members had endorsed an important resolution to have the support price for industrial milk maintained at $2.66 a hundredweight. Quebec industrial milk producers thought it was a highly significant factor and it had to be maintained. Effectively, after legislation had been passed, the Canadian Dairy Commission and the department announced that the price would be maintained.

What must be noted in my opinion is that the requirements of the domestic market as established by the Canadian Milk Supply Management Committee were still at 100 million hundredweight even though it was felt at the time that the supply could increase during the dairy year.

The government thus authorized higher export quotas, from three to five million hundredweight. Given the situation of the dairy policy, it can be said that we in Canada have a somewhat particular situation.

My colleague from Chicoutimi was saying a few moments ago that the food basket costs less here than in other countries. He was absolutely right because I have here a table from the U.S. Department of Agriculture showing that in Canada, in U.S. dollars, the same food basket costs $55.56 as opposed to $58.02 in the United States. The other countries included in the comparisons are Australia, the United Kingdom, Spain, Belgium, Italy, The Netherlands, West Germany, Argentina, Sweden, Switzerland, Denmark and Japan where the same food basket goes for $135.10. It must be realized that the Canadian food policy situation is very important.

I would also like to deal with the Canadian policy as it affects Quebec. Many people complain and tell us that Quebec never got its fair share under the agricultural and dairy policy. It can be said that various federal as well as provincial sources confirm that between 20 and 25 per cent of the federal agriculture funds are spent in Quebec. During the last few years the annual budgets of Agriculture Canada and other associated agencies totalled about $700 million. As we know, close to 50 per cent of the Dairy Commission budget alone is spent there, and that exceeds $130 million a year. Between $9 and $10 million are provided for research and more that $20 million for the administration of animal health inspection services, grants and so on in the province of Quebec. Those agencies were spending in Quebec about $160 million or 23 per cent of their total budgets. So I do not think it is a striking and true example of neglect toward Quebec by the Canadian government in agriculture. In 1976 Quebec had 18.7 per cent of the agriculture population of Canada, 15.2 per cent of all farms and their farm income represented 13.5 per cent of the Canadian total. According to those criteria, Quebec has not been neglected by the federal treasury.

If we compare the percentage of Canadian income with the number of farms and examine the budgets of the Canadian Dairy Commission, many people who are not necessarily Quebec federalists can protest as much as they want but it is obvious that federal and provincial sources contradict those facts. Furthermore, the budget mentioned earlier does not include the amounts paid to Agriculture Quebec by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion within the agricultural subsidiary agreement in which the federal contribution amounts to $61.9 million which represents 60 per cent of the total budget to be spent during the period from 1975 to 1982. So, this is one more case where Quebec receives its fair share.

Now, in respect of the votes of the Department of Agriculture, I have some questions to put to the minister regarding the dairy policy and some other policies of his department. First, I should like to ask him what are the amounts allotted. Here again I put the question for the information of those who are not aware of the amounts paid by the Canadian government for some programs. Most of the time they know that the cheques are coming from Quebec City, but in fact the money is coming directly from Ottawa. I wish to know what are the amounts of the subsidies, what assistance is given for the construction of silos, the purchase of drying equipment for grain and feed, the purchase of combines and for underground drainage. We know that a lot of money is coming from Ottawa and I wish to know if the minister could tell us the percentage or the amounts that Quebec receives from Ottawa for those programs.

[English]

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Chairman, the program the hon. member is talking about is one in the course of which we have signed an agreement with the province of Quebec in lieu of removal of feed freight assistance. The program for silos and other equipment is not broken down but $33,500,000 of federal funds were allocated for that program. In Ontario the program would account for $13,400,000.

Mr. Dubois: Mr. Chairman, in the circumstances maybe we should have more publicity about the amounts which are going to Quebec directly from Ottawa as mentioned earlier, because as I realized during election campaigns, a large number of Quebeckers are not aware of its source, particularly concerning the silo construction program. The Quebec farmer does not actually know how much comes from Ottawa and I think it might be appropriate to consider better advertising or at least better information about this funding situation.

I will now turn to another matter, the situation of the Agricultural Stabilization Board. About the way this board dealt with the problems of the Canadian hog producers, we know that last May the Government of Canada granted some $46.5 million to hog fatteners. Unfortunately, quite a number of my constituents are complaining of incredible delays in the payments made by the board. The situation is the same for the weaner pig producers, to whom the Canadian government granted $6.5 million. Concerning finishers, I would like to know how many applications have been received and how many cheques have really been mailed. I would like to know the same about the weaner pig producers. How many applications did he receive and how many cheques have been mailed? Very recently when we were making inquiries we were told that should arrive in a few days. We have been getting this answer for quite a while when making inquiries. Many of my constituents who are hog producers are complaining about that delay. I would like to have an answer to my question concerning the cow-calf producers and weaner pig producers.

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Chairman, the total number of applications received under the market hog program for stabilization is 24,778, and the number of applications processed for payment is 14,332. The two provinces with the most applications were Quebec with 3,427, 1,274 of which are processed and Ontario with 9,482, 6,029 of which are processed. In the weaner pig program, there have been 5,890 applications received and 1,678 have been processed. Since 58 per cent of the applications to the hog program have been processed, it should be finished by the end of December, 1980. Payments made to date under the hog program amount to $19.9 million.

[Translation]

Mr. Dubois: Mr. Chairman, I thank the minister for his answer, and I do hope that concerning weaner pig producers—I believe we have not been able to get any answer concerning pig fatteners, or finishers—the minister would give me the answer as well because the program was announced sometime later during the year, namely, in August. We are getting many telephone calls from producers who are waiting. Would the date that the minister has just indicated for pig fatteners, late December, apply as well to weaner pig producers?

[English]

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Chairman, I am a little confused. There are only two programs, one for weaner pigs and one for the finished product. I did not give the figures on the weaner pigs. There have been 5,890 applications of which 1,678 have been processed. The two provinces with the most producers are Quebec with 3,220 applications of which 1,076 have been processed and Ontario with 1,005 applications of which 236 have been approved. The percentage processed to date is 28 per cent. This kind of program requires more checking to determine whether a farmer is really a weaner pig producer. We must be very careful because it is government money we are spending. We hope that those which are not finished by the end of the year will be finished by the first month of the new year.

[Translation]

Mr. Dubois: Mr. Chairman, I thank the minister. As regards the assistance program to the provinces under the jurisdiction of the Department of Agriculture, I would like to know what are the real amounts spent on cold storage? What are the amounts for which the Government of Canada is committed with regard to cold storage through the Department of Agriculture?

[English]

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Chairman, the projects to which the hon. member has referred are programs for cold storage, controlled atmospheric temperature storage and jacketed storage. From 1973 to 1980, 97 projects amounting to $10,743,869 were started. The number of applications for the fiscal year 1980-1981 is 42. That is how fast this program is growing. There will not be enough funding for all of these programs and some will have to be carried into next year because it is rapidly becoming the kind of program which we want it to be. We will be placing Canadian vegetables in cold storage and they will be as good as the day they were picked, on Christmas day, New Year's Day, St. Patrick's day, Valentine's day, and right up to the day the new products come on the market.

From 1973 to 1980, 23 projects were started in Quebec with a total value of $2,263,633, and in Ontario 32 projects got under way with a total value of $2,780,753. The province which spent the most money, although it had the same number of projects as Quebec, was British Columbia, which had a total expenditure of $3,807,125.

These programs allow for the export of a larger quantity of a product. For instance, British Columbia is now exporting apples to 34 different countries around the world. Quebec has used the program for apples, carrots and other vegetables to supply the state of New York and that area of the United States for a good part of the year.

Mr. Dubois: One last question, Mr. Chairman. Although we produce a lot of milk in Canada, we unfortunately import a lot of cheese and similar products. I would like to know what is the proportion of department funds going to our processing industry, because I feel we have the potential here, with our milk production, to produce our own cheese and dairy products without such a high volume of imports. What is the percentage of the funds going to processing plants?

[English]

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Chairman, the import quota for cheeses was 50 million pounds. Before that quota was established, there was no quota and one could import as much as one wanted. The quota was then changed to 45 million pounds. The increase in the production of Canadian cheese over the past six years has been phenomenal, particularly with regard to specialty cheeses. I believe over 70 different varieties of cheese are made in Canada. We can compete with any country in the world and we are giving the other countries a lot of competition in this area.

Last year we exported to the United Kingdom and the United States six million pounds of cheese, although Canada is a net importer of cheese. The cheese which goes to the United States is mostly specialty cheese. We are now exporting about ten million hundredweights of milk composed of evaporated milk and instantized whole milk powder which is equivalent to 90 million pounds of cheese. I did not know that figure until now. I knew we were exporting a tremendous amount of condensed milk, which is better for us because we have less butter, less powder and less storage costs. All of these things make it better for the dairy industry. I repeat again, our dairy industry is the healthiest in the world.

Mr. McLean: Mr. Chairman, I had hoped to have enough time, with the concurrence of hon. members opposite, not only to ask some questions but to get a response from the minister. I regret that it may only be possible to raise the questions so, since the minister's colleagues have not permitted time for his response, I hope he will be prepared to reply in writing.

I want to inform the minister that today, in this city, the Status of Women Canada held a debriefing session of delegates to the World Conference of the United Nations Decade for Women, held in Copenhagen. The debriefing was attended by representatives of women's organizations from across this country.

One of the major sections of the report entitled "Report of the World Conference of the United Nations Decade for Women" in which Canada concurred, deals with the place of women in agriculture. I should like to remind the minister that Canada concurred in a request to all governments concerning the place of rural women. The report reads as follows on page 106:

> 3. Requests governments to ensure that rural women:
> (a) Are provided with education, technology and training suitable to their needs, as identified by them in order to improve employment opportunities in rural areas;
> (b) Have access to credit and financing mechanisms on a basis of equality with men, and flexibility in the institutions which deliver credit services to rural women;
> (c) Are encouraged and assisted to attain key leadership roles in rural communities and organizations;
> (d) Are encouraged and adequately trained to participate actively in co-operatives and other organizations concerned with marketing;

The minister will have had that background in mind as he prepared his speech. I have in front of me the speech he delivered to the conference of farm women. A report in the press noted that the minister was there, made a number of statements and left before he could be questioned. In his absence, a number of questions were raised.

As we consider the estimates, I should like to raise some questions. I regret that hon. members opposite have not permitted the opportunity for a response. Some of these questions arise from Canada's concurrence as stated in Copenhagen, some from the minister's speech, and others from the failure of the minister to respond to the farm women.

First of all, the question was raised of farm credit and lending practices as they apply to women, and discrimination in that area. The minister will be aware that section 5 of the Human Rights Act, 1977, provides that no person should be denied access to goods, services—that is, credit—on the basis of sex and marital status, among other stipulations. This makes it illegal for a bank or the Farm Credit Corporation to deny a woman credit solely because she is female or because she is single, widowed or divorced. There is a problem, however, about defining credit as a service and many women are denied credit for this reason. Obviously, section 5 should be revised to include credit discrimination. There are problems with the denial of credit to women. If a woman does not sign for a loan to her husband's farm, she does not incur any financial responsibilty, nor does she establish a credit rating. If she is then left alone—widowed or divorced—and wants to secure financing to continue operating the farm business, she has no credit rating.

The FCC does not recognize the woman as a legitimate business partner in a husband-wife partnership. The policy entitles individuals to apply for a maximum of $200,000, and partnerships for a maximum loan of $400,000. However, a husband and wife partnership may receive only up to the individual maximum of $200,000. This discriminates against individuals on the basis of marital status. It also discourages spousal partnerships.

My question concerns farm credit. The minister told the conference that his officials were considering recommendations for change. That was a week ago. This issue was not new at the time the minister spoke. What steps is the minister taking to ensure that the federal government adopts equal credit opportunity guidelines similar to those outlined by the province of Ontario, which guarantee that both single and married women will be granted credit provided they have adequate credit qualifications?

Will the minister press for a better definition of the clauses in the Human Rights Acts dealing with services and ensure that a separate section dealing with credit guidelines is incorporated in every act? Does the minister plan to establish education programs to inform farm women as to the necessity of acquiring credit history as well as how to obtain and use credit?

In the three minutes left to me, Mr. Chairman, I hope to pose some questions about women in agriculture and the CBC, and the discrimination practised regularly in the way farm women are depicted by broadcasters. As the great champion of farm people, will the minister bring to the attention of the CRTC, the dissatisfaction of women's groups, and in particular, farm women's groups, over their portrayal in the media?

I wanted to ask the minister about opportunities for young farmers. In his speech he mentioned the number of female graduates but, he neglected to point out that there is less and less opportunity for them because of the declining number of farms from 480,000 in 1961 to fewer than 340,000 in 1976. Given the current rate of inflation and the poor farm credit standards I have just outlined, how does the minister see this increased number of women graduates being able to set up farms? How are they to be involved in the agriculture industry?

I also want to ask the minister about the appointment of women to boards and whether he concurs with his colleague, the minister responsible for the status of women, in terms of affirmative action. As he knows from the responses of farm women, 15 per cent of federal appointees to 160 agencies—that is, 181 out of 1200—are appointed to farm-related boards. In the United States, 33 per cent of federal appointees are women. Is the minister "on board" with affirmative action, given the direction of the Speech from the Throne with its four references to women? Where is the action? The minister has been in his present portfolio for ten years.

I should have liked to speak to the minister about unemployment insurance opportunities and the fact that of 15 categories, farm women are among those who are being discriminated against and are unable to claim unemployment insurance in the event of losing their jobs through separation or marital discord.

I wanted to ask the minister if he had discussed this matter with the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Can the farm women of Canada expect to be included with other working women as beneficiaries of unemployment insurance?

I regret that I cannot ask these questions, Mr. Chairman, because my time has run out and that I cannot get a response from the minister on these issues so important to the women of Canada and to the viability of farming in this nation.

Progress reported.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY—TAX INCENTIVES FOR INDUSTRY LOCATING IN SLOW GROWTH AREAS

Hon. J. Robert Howie (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I feel that an investment tax credit of 100 per cent would be an excellent incentive for development of the Atlantic region which suffers from regional disparity. It would create taxpayers and simply defer their tax payments until their investments in new industry or expansion are recouped with no loss and, indeed, a net gain for the federal treasury. The government's subsequent decision to offer the lower 50 per cent investment tax credit in parts of the region only tends to contemplate competition within the region instead of strengthening the region as a whole so it can compete fairly with other regions of Canada.

I suggest that the real debate is not whether one locates in a part of a province, but whether resources in one region or another are more attractive for manufacturing or processing. Here DREE can and should operate to equalize an unfair imbalance based on development, transportation, infrastructure, financial resources and training.

I have to confess that I find it very confusing to attempt to rationalize the minister's program. The stated objective is to promote industrial development in those parts of Canada most adversely affected by economic disparities. I find it very difficult to rationalize this approach with the application of the program spread over every province and territory in Canada instead of concentrating on regions which suffer from disparity.

I am not clear whether it is a requirement of the program or only a general target that only 40 per cent of a province qualifies for this benefit and, in either case, why, if more than 40 per cent of a province qualifies under the other program criteria should these areas be excluded from the program. While these discrepancies remain unclear, a quick reference to the areas that are identified in relation to those that are not, raises other questions.

Take the province of Quebec for example. The areas identified range from Bonaventure through to part of Saguenay and nouveau Quebec. The average incomes in these areas related to the latest Revenue Canada figures available range from $8,115 to $10,756. The unemployment rate ranges from 8.2 per cent to 20.2 per cent. The employment to population ratio runs from 37.2 per cent up to 53.3 per cent. These are the areas that are included.

In the same province a quick reference to figures for Maskinongé shows an income figure of $7,883, an unemployment rate of 11.3 per cent and an employment to population ratio of 46.6 per cent. In Charlevoix the income figure is $8,689. The unemployment rate is 13 per cent and the employment to population ratio is 41.5 per cent. L'Islet has an income rate of $7,780, an unemployment rate of 9.3 per cent and an employment to population ratio of 44.3 per cent. These are the areas not included, and they appear to be worse off. There are others.

In another part of Canada, a designated area has an unemployment rate of 7.7 per cent, an employment to population ratio of 62 per cent and an income figure of $11,399. It is included.

There must be little wonder why I asked to have the data base and any related information that was used in arriving at these designated areas tabled in the House.

In the case of New Brunswick I can only say that I have no quarrel with the areas that are included because the segment includes Kent county which has an average income per family of $6,736 to Restigouche county which has an average income of $8,442. But the question becomes more complex when I try to understand why counties such as Queen's county, which has an average income of $7,453, Carleton county which has an average income of $7,397, and Victoria county which has an average income of $7,205, are excluded. So, too, with Charlotte county where the average income is $8,239. The incomes of families in these counties is certainly in the same bracket as those which are included, and as hon. members can see they are lower than some of the ones which are included.

When I look at these discrepancies and note the fact that every area in the Atlantic provinces that is included, with one small exception—part of Guysborough county in Nova Scotia—is represented by a member of the government caucus, questions arise in my mind and there are questions put to me by other people which I simply cannot answer. I would, therefore, like to have the statistical information upon which this program is based.

Generally, the attempt to touch every province and apply an arbitrary rule limiting the benefit to 40 per cent of the population of any one province and excluding the farming, logging and mining sectors, has diminished the value of a basically good idea with serious contradictions caused when the minister spreads DREE too thin and too far and fails to focus on regions of disparity.

My strong recommendation based on the information available to me is that all of the Atlantic provinces should be identified for purposes of this tax benefit and that the 40 per cent rule, if indeed it is a rule, be abandoned.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) has indicated to the Senate finance committee that the revenue foregone would be held to $15 million. The senator from the Miramichi in New Brunswick referred to this amount as "minuscule". This being the case, the need to focus on those areas most in need is all the more apparent.

Mr. John Evans (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, at the time of his April 21, 1980, statement, the minister indicated that he would be reviewing the need to provide further tax incentives of the type suggested in the December 11, 1979, budget for industries locating in the slower growth regions of Canada.

In the period between that time and the budget of October 28, this review did indeed take place within both the Department of Finance and the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. The result, as announced, has been the establishment of a new, very generous, investment tax credit designed to promote growth in those areas of Canada which are in greatest need of economic aid.

The new incentive provides a tax credit of 50 per cent of eligible expenditures. This credit may be deducted directly from the other federal taxes payable by the company making the investment. This level of credit compares to the current investment tax credits of 7, 10 or 20 per cent depending upon the region of Canada in which the investment is made. Expenditures which qualify will be for new plant and equipment in most manufacturing industries in those regions which represent the 5 per cent of the population with the lowest per capita income, and the highest rates of unemployment.

This is a very generous measure. It acts to reduce the cost of the capital equipment in a new installation to one-half of what would otherwise be the cost to the company.

As it is a deduction against other taxes payable, the credit will provide a substantial incentive for successful firms to expand their operations into regions of high unemployment and low incomes. Thus, the incentive will attract firms which will provide a stable employment base of long-term economic benefit to these regions. The measure is experimental in nature. It represents an additional weapon in DREE's arsenal of programs to address regional economic disparities.

With regard to the hon. member's second question concerning the timing of the legislation for the small business development bond, the detailed description of the measure is in the public domain, and will be tabled in Parliament shortly. In addition, in order to allow firms a greater opportunity to take advantage of the measure, the deadline for making such loans has been extended three months beyond the original expiry date until the end of the first quarter in 1981.

NATIONAL REVENUE—INCOME TAX DEDUCTIONS FROM WAGES OF SPOUSES IN UNINCORPORATED BUSINESSES

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, on December 1 I put a question to the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Rompkey) asking him if in fact the government was going to allow wages paid to a spouse working in an unincorporated business as a deduction for income tax purposes. The Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) in his economic statement last April indicated this would be the case. Since then there has been some concern expressed by small businessmen, at least in my district, as to this deductibility.

Small business is a very important part of the Canadian economy. Some 95 per cent of Canadian firms can be considered small or medium-sized businesses in this country. They account for something like 24.5 per cent of the total sales in the country and represent about 42 per cent of employment in Canada. Also, they contribute around 30 per cent of the business gross national product of the country.

I am told that in 1980 there are some 600,000 unincorporated small businesses in Canada, many of them very small. However, many of these small businesses are proprietorships and are unincorporated for one reason or another. Often the spouse works in the small business as a partner or associate. Certainly this arrangement has made many small businesses successful working on this basis and has contributed in a mighty way to the strong position of these business enterprises.

Naturally, I was delighted when the Minister of Finance announced in his April statement that wages paid to spouses working in a small unincorporated business would be deductible for income tax purposes. Lo and behold, during the past few weeks I have had small businessmen coming to me indicating that the income tax department is refusing to accept the contributions deducted from the spouse for income tax purposes. When I put the question to the Minister of National Revenue he indicated that there were problems with the legislation because income tax amendments apparently have to be passed in the House before the bill becomes effective.

I should like to reiterate to the Minister of Finance and the Minister of National Revenue that I believe it is absolutely imperative that the government honour this commitment made in April by the Minister of Finance. Because of the importance of small business, whether it is a farm situation where the spouse works making the business a success, or whether it involves working professionals who are not incorporated and their spouses work along with them, perhaps not full-time but certainly part-time, those concerned are entitled to wages and are entitled to have those deductions for income tax purposes. I hope the Minister of Finance will be able to clarify this situation for the benefit of the 600,000 or so unincorporated small businesses across the country which are assuming the new tax provision will be implemented and will be in effect for the 1980 taxation year.

Mr. John Evans (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): As you know, Mr. Speaker, under the present income tax rules and as the hon. member has pointed out, a taxpayer who employs his spouse in his unincorporated business is not allowed to deduct as a business expense any remuneration paid to that spouse.

Concurrently, any remuneration received by the spouse, who is generally the wife in her capacity as an employee of her husband, is also excluded from the spouse's income. Similarly, where a taxpayer is a member of a partnership which employs his spouse, a proportional part of his spouse's remuneration relative to his share of the partnership business is deemed to be received by him and is not included in the spouse's income. That is the current situation under the existing law.

These rules were meant to prevent income splitting between spouses so that the total income between them would effectively be subject to lower income taxes than if received by only one. However, because the recipient spouse is usually the woman who, through the rules, is denied income and the attendant Canada Pension Plan coverage, various women's groups made strong representations for the removal of these provisions.

The December 11, 1979, budget of the former government included a proposal to remove the rules applicable to the remuneration paid to the spouse of a taxpayer who is an employee in his or her unincorporated business or partnership. This proposal was reintroduced in the April 21, 1980, financial statement by the current Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen), and the ways and means motions were presented to this House. The related draft legislation was released to the public in August, and proposed consequential amendments to the Canada Pension Plan, which would allow the spouse to receive income coverage under the plan, have also been prepared.

Amendments to both the Income Tax Act and the Canada Pension Plan are intended to be effective retroactively to January 1, 1980, and await enactment into law. The bill including these amendments will be introduced in Parliament shortly. As previously mentioned by the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Rompkey), taxpayers have been advised to govern themselves by the proposed amended legislation, and the Department of National Revenue will be accepting the source deductions in anticipation of the enactment of the legislative amendments which will be applicable to the 1980 taxation year.

I think the points raised by the hon. member with regard to whether this legislation will be introduced in time for this tax year and whether it will apply retroactively to January 1, 1980, have both been responded to. In fact, the answer is yes to both those questions.

NORTHERN PIPELINES—EXPROPRIATION OF LAND IN BRITISH COLUMBIA

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East-Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, I rise tonight to discuss a problem related to the expropriation of lands by Foothills Pipe Lines to build a pipeline to carry natural gas to the United States. On November 21 I posed a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde), and the following was his answer:

It was not possible to find time, but nonetheless we have succeeded in reaching a situation whereby the private companies building the pipeline agree to be bound by the particular bill introduced by Senator Olson in the Senate. So in effect, the people concerned can benefit from the provisions of the bill which unfortunately has not yet been passed by the House.

The land has already been expropriated under the Railway Act. If the recommendations of Senator Olson's bill were to be followed as the minister indicated, the next procedure would have been to allow public hearings so that the people's voices could be heard. That was not done.

Second, the minister would have appointed a negotiator to negotiate a settlement between the company and the owners. This also has not been done. Third, if that could not be carried out according to the senator's bill which was passed in the Senate but not in the House, arbitration would have been the next step, which would have called for three arbitrators to be appointed to hear the case and make the final decisions. That also has not been done. Instead, an injunction was arbitrarily obtained and police force was used to carry out that injunction. These people were told that an arbitrator would be appointed and their case would be heard. What happened is altogether contrary to what the minister said in this House on November 21. I ask that the minister carry out the procedures laid down in the senator's bill.

Also I want to express a few more concerns because I asked personally, before the Alberta natural gas company was allowed a permit to export natural gas to the United States, that public hearings be held in my portion of the riding.

I want to speak for a moment, Mr. Speaker, about some of the people whose land may not be expropriated but who could be affected along with other people. I should like to comment very briefly on what was said by Senator Olson when the bill was being discussed in the other place. He said:

At the committee hearings one of the senators advised us that there were certain mortgage companies—and I think he mentioned CMHC in particular—which would not favour advancing a mortgage on a dwelling that was less than 600 feet from a high pressure gas line—and that, of course, would be 600 feet on each side. There are regional planning boards in certain parts of the country which have rules as to what they will approve, and give a building permit for, with respect to distances from high pressure gas lines.

I want to say that 107 miles of this pipeline will go through my riding and many people could be affected, even though their land will not be expropriated. They might find, a year from now, that they do not qualify for a CMHC loan because they live within a certain distance of that line. I think it is imperative that hearings be held now to give an opportunity for these people to express their concerns.

I want to criticize my fellow members from Alberta who are faced with the same problem because this pipeline will cross through Alberta properties. I want to say that if we are going to start using the 1919 Railway Act in order to build a gas pipeline to export natural gas to the United States at the expense of Canadians, then it is time this government started to realize that there are some serious problems out there and they had better deal with them.

I think it is indicative of something that four small land owners in Yahk, British Columbia should be the ones to bring forth this problem and have it presented here in the House. I think the Liberal Party of Canada should be ashamed of itself that it allowed Foothills Natural Gas Pipeline to expropriate property and provide such a small amount of money for the land it is expropriating. I think it is time that the minister and the people involved got together and solved this problem.

Mr. Roy MacLaren (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, neither the Northern Pipeline Agency nor the National Energy Board, under their respective acts, has any authority regarding compensation for land required for pipeline purposes. I understand, however, that the Northern Pipeline Agency has used its good offices in the past to explain the law as it stands to land owners. In previous instances, the agency has been instrumental in a satisfactory agreement being reached between land owners and the pipeline company. Unfortunately, in spite of their best efforts, officials of the Northern Pipeline Agency did not meet with much success in the case involving the land owners in southern British Columbia.

The company, in the first instance, seeks to reach an agreement by offering a certain sum of money to the land owner. This may be subject to further negotiations. When the pipeline company and the land owner cannot come to an agreement, the company must then act under the provisions of the existing law, which is the National Energy Board Act and the related provisions of the Railway Act. In these circumstances, the compensation paid to the land owner is not arbitrarily determined by the pipeline company. Under the arbitration procedures set out in the Railway Act, the company establishes, through the services of an accredited appraiser, a current market value for the lands required. The land owners may also seek the services of an appraiser. The ultimate decision as to the compensation to be paid is made by a presiding judge of the county or superior court, depending on circumstances.

The hon. member may argue that the expropriation of land under provincial legislation is more satisfactory than under the Railway Act. While the procedures for expropriation differ, there is no evidence to show that one law is more advantageous to either the land owner or to the company than the other in terms of compensation paid. Further, it must be understood that in the case of the Alaska Highway Gas Pipeline, we are dealing with a federally regulated pipeline which is bound by the provisions of the Canada-United States Transit Pipeline Treaty. Under this treaty, compensation for lands taken for pipeline purposes must be paid on a non-discriminatory basis. Further, Foothills cannot be expected to pay a higher compensation than is the prevailing rate in similar circumstances for other pipelines.

The government is well aware of a need to revise the present legislation to deal with all aspects of compensation. It was Senator Olson, then chairman of the Special Committee on the Northern Pipeline, who introduced Bill S-12 in the Senate in 1978. Senator Olson, since becoming the minister responsible for the Northern Pipeline Agency, along with the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) have both expressed their general support for the provisions of this bill. When the legislative timetable permits, the bill will be brought forward for further consideration.

Finally, the Foothills Pipe Lines Company has indicated that if Bill S-12 should be passed into law at some point prior to the completion of the Alaska Highway Gas Pipeline project, it would be prepared to make adjustments which further reflect the new approach provided for under Bill S-12.

Mr. Knowles: What about the minister's promise?

CONFERENCE ON SECURITY AND CO-OPERATION IN EUROPE

CASE OF RAOUL WALLENBERG TO BE RAISED WITH SOVIET DELEGATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Walter McLean (Waterloo): Madam Speaker, I rise pursuant to Standing Order 43 on this important and widely recognized International Human Rights Day. I wish to draw the attention of this House to the plight of Mr. Raoul Wallenberg, the Swedish diplomat who disappeared at the end of World War II after helping to save the lives of at least 20,000 Hungarian Jews. Mr. Wallenberg was taken into custody by the Soviets on January 17, 1945. Reports that he is still alive and being held in the Soviet gulag have come from various sources, most recently from Soviet jews who have emigrated to the West. Since both the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacGuigan) and the Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment (Mr. Roberts) have clearly stated their support for further investigation of Raoul Wallenberg's case, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald):

That the government give priority to raising the plight of Mr. Raoul Wallenberg with the Soviet delegation during the first session of the Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe being held in Madrid.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Madam Speaker: Does the House agree to the said motion?

Motion agreed to.

FISHERIES

CALL FOR PROGRAM OF ECONOMIC ASSISTANCE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Madam Speaker, in view of the fact that the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Munro) has announced the establishment of a $4.2 million program to assist native fishermen on the west coast because of limited fishing time, a poor season, intense competition in the industry and other factors, and since non-native fishermen have also suffered economic hardship during the past fishing season, I move, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, seconded by the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock-North Delta (Mr. Friesen):

That this House recognizes the severe economic hardship faced by many west coast fishermen this winter and therefore directs the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans to seek advice immediately from his colleague the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, who has responded too expeditiously to this serious problem, in order that together they may devise a fair and equitable program of economic assistance for all deserving fishermen, whether they be native or non-native.

EQUAL PAY FOR WORK OF EQUAL VALUE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, in light of the fact that today is International Human Rights Day, since this Liberal government has refused to take any concrete action to settle the case of the 3,000 employees, mostly women, who are members of the general service component of PSAC, even though the government lost this case at the Human Rights Commission over six months ago, and since Treasury Board spokesman John Campbell has been quoted, in referring to the delay, as saying, "It's a sign that we don't want this case to become a dangerous precedent", and has further indicated that the government will not make a comprehensive proposal on this matter for several months, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That, in the spirit of International Human Rights Day, the government reverse its regressive and sexist position and establish a "precedent" that would not only accept the principle of equal pay for work of equal or comparable value, but would also demonstrate that the government is willing to become a positive influence in establishing human rights among its employees.

CALL FOR INVESTIGATION INTO METHOD OF ANSWERING QUESTIONS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds-Grenville): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgency concerning the answering of hon. members' questions by cabinet ministers and with particular reference to a Privy Council document, a copy of which has come into my possession, headed "Secret. Not to be photocopied or reproduced". I intend to raise this matter as a question of privilege at three o'clock this afternoon. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg-Assiniboine (Mr. McKenzie):

That in view of the fact that highly questionable, vicious, suspicious, surreptitious subterfuge is being secretly used by the government to deal with legitimate questions asked in this House, as evidenced by a Privy Council document, the House respectfully requests Madam Speaker to order an immediate investigation into the situation with particular reference to any parts played therein by Michael Pitfield, the President of the Privy Council and the Prime Minister. Finally, that an order be issued that all files in existence at this moment which will shed light on this matter be sealed and placed under guard to avoid the possibility of deliberate, diabolical destruction of evidence.

CONGRATULATIONS TO CANADIAN SKI TEAM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Joe Reid (St. Catharines): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to move a motion which should meet with the approval of both sides of this House.

Canadians everywhere rejoiced with the Canadian ski team as it took four of the top five placings and had five racers in the top seven. In effect, they stole the show at the opening downhill event of world cup skiing held in France earlier this week. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Western Arctic (Mr. Nickerson):

That this House extend a message of congratulations to the coach and members of the men's ski team that has brought credit to themselves and in so doing has done much to encourage the sport of skiing in Canada and to enhance the reputation of Canadians in international competition.

Madam Speaker: I am reluctant to consider that it is urgent and pressing to send congratulations, even to a wonderful ski team. I am afraid we will have to restrict ourselves with regard to sending congratulatory messages to people.

NAMIBIA—CALL FOR PROTEST AT SENTENCE OF MARKUS KATEKA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bob Ogle (Saskatoon East): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. On October 13 of this year an illiterate farm worker, Markus Kateka, was sentenced to death by a South African court sitting in Windhoek, Namibia, on a charge of aiding African nationalist guerrillas. In view of the fact that the accused was not involved in any act of violence, and in view of South Africa's illegal occupation of the international territory of Namibia, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill (Mr. Blaikie):

That this House urge the Canadian government to protest to the South African government the illegal sentence against Mr. Kateka, and further pressure South Africa to commute that sentence and to end its occupation of Namibia in compliance with United Nations appeals.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

NATIONAL CAPITAL

EXTENSION OF BOUNDARY TO EAST—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. René Cousineau (Gatineau): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to ask for the unanimous consent of the House and introduce a motion dealing with an important matter of pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that the construction of the Hull-Masson highway is jointly financed by the federal and provincial governments on a 50-50 basis; considering that the eastern limit of the national capital area is situated in Masson; considering that the Quebec government has stated its intention not to extend that highway to Mirabel; considering the importance of that highway for the economic development of the Ottawa region, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Pontiac-Gatineau-Labelle (Mr. Lefebvre):

That the federal government consider the opportunity of extending the eastern limits of the national capital area to make sure at least that this new region will be entitled to a federal contribution, since it is perhaps at present the only way to meet the economic needs of the area, because the Quebec government, instead of increasing the funds earmarked for its road system, is reducing them.

Madam Speaker: The presentation of such a motion under Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CALL FOR INCREASE IN OLD AGE SECURITY PENSION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, and seconded by the hon. member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent), I move:

That the Prime Minister cease and desist from telling older people to do without things they already do not have in order to pay higher prices for their food, and that instead he agree to an increase in the amount of the old age pension so that Canada's senior citizens can have a decent Christmas and happy New Year.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

WELFARE

PROBLEMS OF SINGLE PARENT FAMILIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Peter Elzinga (Pembina): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the increasing magnitude of problems facing the ever-growing number of single parent families, and in view of the fact that 9 per cent of all Canadian families fall into the category of single parent families and about 50 per cent of them have incomes below the poverty level, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Shields):

That the government give the highest priority to solving the ever-increasing problems of single parent families and make efforts to solve these problems as soon as possible.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

MONTREAL ECONOMIC SUMMIT, 1981—REQUEST FOR MEETING OF GOVERNMENT OFFICIALS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I seek the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that the economic development of the Montreal region is tremendously important, and that the city of Montreal, as well as the Quebec and Ottawa governments, have shown considerable interest in various projects, being aware of the conflicting views of the Quebec and Ottawa governments on the economic summit to be held in Montreal next summer, and of the need to favour the interests of metropolitan Montreal residents, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald):

That the House unanimously urge the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion to call as soon as possible a meeting of all Quebec and Montreal officials in charge of economic development, to obtain their co-operation and make this summit a tremendous success.

Madam Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE ECONOMY

PROJECTIONS OF ECONOMIC COUNCIL OF CANADA RESPECTING WAGES AND SALARIES

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, my question, which I hope will not be too exciting or frenzied, is addressed to the Minister of Finance. It is in connection with the annual report of the Economic Council of Canada made public today. That body, of course, is an independent agency of the government set up to give objective forecasts and estimates. In their report, they project that this year real wages, after discounting for inflation, will be reduced 2.2 per cent for working Canadian men and women. Their real wages will be down 2.2. per cent in real terms this year as a result of inflation and other factors. They forecast that in 1981 they will be down 2.4 per cent and in 1982 they will be down 0.1 per cent. In his budget, the minister forecast a decrease this year of 1.5 per cent, an increase next year of 0.4 per cent and an increase in 1982 of 0.9 per cent.

At the time he made these objections, the minister said they were cautiously optimistic. Of course, in light of what is happening, they were recklessly optimistic. Will the minister tell us whether he will be changing his projections? Does he agree with the projections of the Economic Council of Canada? What action is he going to take to try and reverse this loss in purchasing power and standard of living for the average Canadian wage and salary earner in this country?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I am grateful to the Economic Council of Canada for providing a further set of projections which can be useful for the purpose of analysing onward trends in the Canadian economy. On the basis of the projections to which the hon. member refers, and which I have not yet had a chance to examine, I have not decided to launch any new programs or change any budgetary measures.

Mr. Crosbie: Ten months of inactivity, Madam Speaker. Let us not talk of trends. Let me give the minister present facts. At the moment the Canadian dollar is trading at 83.33 cents to the U.S. dollar. We are approaching our all-time historic low. Retail sales seasonally adjusted for October were down 1 per cent—not up as they should be around Christmas—led by autos. There is a drop in sales of automobiles of 7.7 per cent in real terms. We have a situation where the Conference Board of Canada reports that 47 per cent of businessmen expect price inflation in the next six months and 49 per cent expect the same inflation rate. Obviously the government is not impressing anybody with its inflation battle. Do not get excited or frenzied, gentlemen; just wait for me to finish my questions.

● (1420)

Mr. Crosbie: In view of these facts—not trends but actual facts which the Canadian people are becoming frenzied and anxious about—what action is the minister going to take to reverse this deplorable economic condition?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, the hon. gentleman has listed a whole series of economic indicators, each of which require considerable analysis to reply sensibly to the question. Let me make two points. It is a fact there is pressure on the Canadian dollar because of the very wide differential which exists between short-term interest rates in Canada and in the United States. Today, for example, the prime rate in the United States is up to 20 per cent and the equivalent rate in Canada is about 15.5 per cent. In those circumstances, and in view of the relationship which exists between our respective capital markets, it is not surprising there is considerable pressure on the Canadian dollar.

The hon. member asks me what I intend to do at the moment. I certainly do not intend to bring in any form of controls, which is the only direct approach one could take to overcome the influences from the U.S. capital market.

Mr. Crosbie: Madam Speaker, the minister is a perfect illustration of the fact that misery loves company. The only comfort he can give is that interest rates are higher in the United States. Well, ours will be higher later in the week. By the way, there are solutions other than wage and price controls. For instance, we could have a government the people are convinced intends to fight inflation. That is one example. The famous American economist, Otto Eckstein, has said this:

The collision between a stubborn inflation and moderate money supply targets is producing interest rates that will stop the economy's growth in early 1981.

Mr. MacEachen: Who is Otto Eckstein?

Mr. Crosbie: He was the chairman of the council of economic advisers to the U.S. president. Naturally, the minister would not have heard of him. Who has he heard of? Otto Eckstein said this collision is producing interest rates that will stop the economy's growth in early 1981.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Take your time, John. Wait till those yahoos quiet down.

Mr. Crosbie: Would the minister please ask his colleagues to be quiet?

Would the minister advise the House whether he agrees with this general forecast of economists and whether the economy's growth will be stopped in early 1981 by high interest rates? Does he agree or not agree?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, it is not my practice to be put in the position of agreeing with every possible opinion expressed, even by a former famous economist in the United States—

An hon. Member: To a former president.

Mr. MacEachen: —and especially a question addressed by a former finance minister. There is too much "former" in all of that for my taste. It is much too early to accept the hon. member's source or his question, because nobody at this time can foretell with any accuracy or precision the movement of interest rates over the next several weeks, let alone the next several months.

INQUIRY RESPECTING ASSISTANCE TO LOW-INCOME CANADIANS

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, I can assure the House and the government that this is no laughing matter. I would like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Last Friday the Prime Minister advised Canadians that if they wanted to maintain the same amount of food on the table, they should cut their spending in other areas. According to the latest Statistics Canada figures, low-income earners in this country spend 82.6 per cent of their income on food, shelter and clothing, which is significantly higher than the definition of poverty of Statistics Canada, which is 62 per cent of one's income spent on food, clothing and shelter.

In the midst of this economic crisis which the minister knows will lean heaviest on the poor, the working poor, the unemployed and the old age pensioners of this country, and given the minister's statutory responsibilities as minister of welfare for this country, what steps does she propose to recommend to her colleagues so that low-income Canadians will at least have enough money to spend on heat and food?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, I was not in the House on Friday, and I have not read the context of the answer, but everybody knows, especially those people mentioned in the answer of the Prime Minister, about the commitment of the Prime Minister and the government to them. The last increase we obtained of $525 million in July of this year taken through the surtax on corporate profits has been translated into a $35 increase per month in addition to the usual indexation every three months. We have decided to maintain indexation the way it is. That is the best way we have every three months of catching up with the exact increase in the cost of living. I think that is a very serious response to a concern which is felt by all at this time.

Mr. McGrath: Madam Speaker, I do not know on what food basket the minister bases her assertions. Given the escalated rise in the price of food, estimated at anywhere between 15 per cent and 20 per cent—and that includes increases in the prices of eggs, bread and milk—because increased energy prices, fuel oil prices and food prices have all but eaten up the $35 increase in the guaranteed income supplement, and given the projected one million unemployed next year, is the minister at least prepared to tell the House that she will give consideration to entering into discussions with her provincial colleagues to see what help the Government of Canada can provide to low income earners, the working poor, the unemployed and the old age pensioners of this country who will suffer because of the actions of this government? The minister has the power to do that under the Canada Assistance Plan. I ask her if she will at least take that into consideration.

Miss Bégin: Madam Speaker, I have just completed a two-day federal-provincial meeting with my colleagues, the ministers of social affairs of Canada. Some of them told me that they do not accept my raising the GIS by $35. I do not know if they will say that publicly. Our stand is still that as soon as the economy permits we propose to increase the benefits of single pensioners to put them just above the poverty line in order that all seniors in the country will be above the poverty line.

The hon. member asked what food basket we used to calculate indexation. I have gone through theoretical exercises to analyse the food basket and to see how it affects seniors. Other proposals put to me would leave seniors worse off than the actual indicators we use. The Conservative party has the philosophy that indexation of social programs feeds inflation. We will retain the full indexation of social programs.

Oral Questions

PROJECTED INCREASE IN FOOD PRICES

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, having heard the last part of that answer, which was quite laudable, we will see what the Liberal party is prepared to do about the poor in general. Last weekend the Prime Minister suggested to Canadians that, because of the increase in food costs, they should change their priorities. The Agricultural Outlook Conference which concluded yesterday stated that food prices will go up as much as 20 per cent next year. Low-income earners in general—not just pensioners—spend some 31 per cent of their income on food.

My question is directed to the Prime Minister. Will he say today that the government will take special measures now for all low-income Canadians so that they will be able to continue to eat the things they need? Because they cannot afford to change their eating priorities unless they stop eating entirely.

• (1430)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, as the Minister of Finance said in answer to an earlier question, we cannot predict with certainty what the situation will be in the course of next week. The hon. member is asking a question based on his assumption of what the figures will be next year. He is like the former minister of finance who is basing his questions on the assumption that there will be one million unemployed next year.

An hon. Member: That is your minister's assumption.

Mr. Trudeau: The Minister of National Health and Welfare has just answered the question asked by the Leader of the NDP by indicating that the policy of this government was to help first those who need it most, and that will be our policy in the years to come.

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, the Prime Minister's own Minister of Finance made a forecast of the rate of inflation for next year which was just as bad as the inflation in the current year and, as everyone knows, if the forecast is going to go anywhere, inflation is going to be marginally worse, if not substantially worse, rather than better than the forecast. Therefore, the Prime Minister's answer is no substitute for programs to meet the food needs of the poor in the country.

I should like to ask him the following question on a related matter. Since the spread between what the farmer is getting for what he produces and what the consumer pays, according to the most recent data, has actually increased, providing good grounds or good cause for profits for companies such as Loblaws, which went up by some 30 per cent recently, and IGA, which went up by some 33 per cent, will the government demonstrate its concern, at least at this level, for food prices by having a fair prices commission which would have the authority to investigate price increases and, where they are unjustified, order rollbacks?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, had the Leader of the NDP listened to the answer given by the Minister of National Health and Welfare he would have had the answer to his question which, no doubt, he was busily preparing. The minister just went through answering the concern of the hon. member as it concerns inflation in the year to come by indicating that this government had indexed old age pensions and other pensions so that they follow the rate of inflation as it goes up and compensate people on welfare for the higher rate of inflation by providing a higher rate of pension.

So far as the other part of the question regarding rollbacks is concerned, I have urged the hon. member before to explain how the federal government under the present constitution could roll back prices which are essentially under provincial jurisdiction.

Mr. Broadbent: As I politely explained to the Prime Minister before, he could use the same constitutional authority he used to bring in wage and price controls.

An hon. Member: That is right; he never listens.

Mr. Broadbent: What was good to control wages is obviously not adequate for the Prime Minister to control prices. We understand that well on this side of the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: I should like to ask him another question, because he has rejected two approaches. In order to maintain the purchasing power of low-income Canadians in particular, will the Prime Minister at least consider announcing before Christmas an income tax reduction for middle and low-income Canadians so that they can continue to eat the essential foods?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I am sorry to say this, because I know that on another constitutional matter I have the support of the hon. member—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: —but I must point out to him that his knowledge of the constitution apparently does not extend to the areas which permitted us to apply wage and price controls.

An hon. Member: Sit down.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: And these are your friends?

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Trudeau: I wish the member in the second row would learn to control his sphincter; it would be easier then to get an argument across in this House.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Heaven hath no fury like an NDP member scorned!

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, the leader of the NDP will remember that when we brought in wage and price controls, it was after two years in succession that the provincial premiers had urged the federal government to take some firm and drastic action to control inflation, and even then, when we appealed—

An hon. Member: You took no notice of the provincial premiers in the constitutional talks.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: What I said about the member in the second row applies also to members in the back row of the Tory party.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Come on, answer the question.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

POLAND—INQUIRY REGARDING CONTEXT OF PRIME MINISTER'S NOTE TO CHAIRMAN BREZHNEV

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock-North Delta): Madam Speaker, my question is addressed to the Right Hon. Prime Minister who, two weeks ago, met with Mr. Giscard d'Estaing and Chancellor Schmidt. I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether, in his note to Chairman Brezhnev last week, he included a briefing regarding the discussions he had held with Giscard d'Estaing and Chancellor Schmidt.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I would ask the hon. member to understand that correspondence between heads of state and heads of government sometimes is privileged, and I consider this particular correspondence as privileged.

Mr. Friesen: Madam Speaker, I am simply asking the Prime Minister about what is apparently established protocol, and I should like to refer to his news conference of November 7 at which he spoke of the friendship protocol which he signed with the Soviet Union in 1971. At that time the Prime Minister said:

> We would do the same if I were to visit the United States, or something, or see a leader of some other country, we would have the Russian ambassador informed of the discussions.

In view of the fact that the Soviet Union has already shown its true colours in Afghanistan and is apparently preparing for a repeat performance in Poland, I wonder if the Prime Minister would show the firm resolve of the Canadian people to the Soviet Union by renouncing the friendship protocol which he signed in 1971 and cutting off that source of briefing which apparently Chairman Brezhnev has been getting.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I think the sentiment of the Canadian people with regard to the situation in Poland was expressed by this House a few weeks ago when a member of the Liberal caucus moved a motion in this House, which was unanimously supported, indicating the concern of the Canadian government and people regarding events in Poland. I think any further comment must be made while keeping in mind the single most important enjoinder which we are getting from Polish leaders of various sorts, that as this time the West would be wise to show restraint in its political and military posturing.

SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

INQUIRY RESPECTING FUTURE FUNDING OF RESEARCH PROGRAMS

Mr. Gordon Gilchrist (Scarborough East): Madam Speaker, I should have liked to address my question to the Minister of State for Science and Technology but in his absence I will address it to the Right Hon. Prime Minister. It is a serious question involving, not patchwork payments today for the unemployed and for people below the normal income standards, but rather a long-range approach to job creation through science and technology research spending.

The National Research Council has made a clear point of having every dollar spent on research into true job creation being returned 20 times. I wonder if the Prime Minister would tell us what plans he and his ministers have after almost a year in office for research spending of a specific nature into such things as rail transportation and the other things at which we are good, which will result in true job creation for young Canadians on whose behalf I ask this question.

Mr. Roger Simmons (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, the government has already made known its intention to encourage the increase in spending on research and development to 1.5 per cent of the GNP by the mid-1980s. I am pleased to report to the House that it is the intention of the Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment to indicate early in the new year a more comprehensive framework policy which will guide our actions in that particular direction.

SUGGESTED CHANGE IN RESPONSIBILITIES OF MINISTER

Mr. Gordon Gilchrist (Scarborough East): Madam Speaker, I guess we are reassured by that, but the future seems to be put off from week to week and from month to month, and we will be waiting anxiously to hear the specifics of this policy early in the new year.

Would the Prime Minister recognize that after only four months the last government realized the need to separate the two hats of the minister so as to give full attention to research and development, the most important matter to which we can address our minds in the country today? Would the Prime Minister consider changing the responsibilites of this minister, to give him full-time responsibilities rather than diluting his efforts in other areas like the environment, which is important, but also in some lesser roles, such as running to Her Majesty with rather less important things like constitutional matters?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I will consider the representations of the hon. member, but I hardly think that the success of the previous government is an encouragement for me to organize my ministers in the way they did.

SUPPLY AND SERVICES

F-18A FIGHTER AIRCRAFT—TOTAL COST OF PROGRAM TO CANADA—COMMITMENTS RESPECTING OFFSET PROGRAM

Mr. Terry Sargeant (Selkirk-Interlake): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Supply and Services. Last Friday in the House I tried to learn from the government how recent events had affected the cost of Canada's fighter procurement program. Two days ago the minister told the House that he had no intention of renegotiating the contract with McDonnell Douglas. In light of this, could the minister confirm that, using per aircraft costs supplied by the United States navy, the total cost of the Canadian program now exceeds $5 billion? Further, will the minister confirm, if the United States purchase of F-18s is reduced to 1,044, which is very likely, that the Canadian program costs will then exceed $6 billion?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): Madam Speaker, I should like to indicate to the hon. member that his figures are completely askew; they are completely inaccurate. In effect, the number of aircraft which will be purchased by the Americans in the 1981 fiscal year has been increased from 48 to 60 aircraft, and every indication is that the aircraft which will be ordered by the American navy for the 1982 fiscal year will be superior to that initially envisaged. There is no difficulty in the American McDonnell Douglas company meeting its obligations under the contract. I point out to the hon. member as well that a ceiling is contained within the signed contract, and that ceiling will be met.

Mr. Sargeant: Madam Speaker, I wish I shared the minister's optimism. Last week I also tried unsuccessfully to determine whether McDonnell Douglas was living up to its obligations as set out in article 34 of the contract between Canada and that company. In the last couple of months, over 500 workers have been laid off at McDonnell Douglas in Toronto because there is no demand for DC-10s and DC-9s. Could the minister tell the House if McDonnell Douglas is living up to its commitment of $83 million worth of work on these aircraft in 1980 and a similar amount of benefits in 1981? Further, could he tell us in what other areas McDonnell Douglas might be falling short of its offset promises?

Mr. Blais: Madam Speaker, there is every expectation that the obligations under the contract relating to the offsets will be made. The milestones identified to date have been satisfied. There will be an announcement on Tuesday of next week relating to one part of the offset package. Unfortunately, I will be in British Columbia and will be unable to participate. I am aware of two other specific areas where there will be investments directly related to the offset package, and those are meant for western Canada as well. In next Tuesday's package, an announcement will be made relating to an offset within the province of Quebec.

In terms of the lay-offs in Toronto which the hon. member properly identified, those are related directly to the softening of the civilian market in terms of the product of McDonnell Douglas, namely its DC-10 and DK-10.

IMMIGRATION

INQUIRY RESPECTING MEASURES TO ASSIST VICTIMS OF AZORES EARTHQUAKE

Miss Aideen Nicholson (Trinity): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. In view of the fact that the minister now has under consideration a special plan whereby victims of the Italian earthquake would be admitted to Canada as visitors for three years with permission to work, will the minister say whether he is also prepared to consider special measures for victims of the Azores earthquake, many of whom have been living in tents since last January?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, we have closely examined the situation in the Azores. We have asked our immigration officers in Portugal to visit the area and report back to us any serious changes. At this point in time they report that rebuilding is taking place in a very effective manner and that the government of Portugal is making every possible effort to correct the problems which resulted from the earthquake. If there are continuing problems, we would be prepared to look at the representations of the government of Portugal, or of members of Parliament such as the hon. member for Trinity, to see if any further actions are required.

RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT

JOB-CREATION PROGRAMS—POLICY OF DEPARTMENT

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy-Royal): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. On November 17 there was a press release from the Department of the Environment which said, in part, the following:

> Mr. Roberts pointed out that Canada faces a similar energy dilemma to that of the United States. "We, like our neighbours to the south, have to achieve energy self-sufficiency . . . We too are looking for alternatives to our dependence on foreign oil which will involve increasing our use of domestic coal . . . The political will to do this in Canada is strong and we must demonstrate this to the United States."

In support of the minister's statement, I moved a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on November 19 that the House support the Minister of State for Science and Technology and the Minister of the Environment in his efforts. I stated that the House should express its unanimous support for the principle which had been stated, "that the political will to do this in Canada is strong and we must demonstrate this to the United States". The Liberal caucus, the party of the minister, turned down my motion.

In view of the fact that the minister is repudiated by his own party, can the Prime Minister tell us who is speaking for the Department of the Environment and the Ministry of State for Science and Technology in this country? Who can we expect and anticipate will develop a meaningful program for research and job creation? Who speaks for the department, the minister or the Liberal caucus?

Mr. Roger Simmons (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, to the degree that the question was coherent, let me attempt an answer. In response to an earlier question, I indicated that the minister intends early in the new year to inform the House of a comprehensive policy in terms of research and development; he will be doing that.

In so far as the question relates to alternate forms of energy, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources is on record, as is the Minister of Science and Technology and the Minister of the Environment, as saying that any coal conversion which we encourage and foster in the Atlantic area will require the observance of the strictest environmental controls.

Mr. Corbett: Madam Speaker, the coherence is quite simply that the minister has been repudiated by his Liberal colleagues and the government; that is the coherence of the question. I assume the Prime Minister will adopt the suggestion of the hon. member for Scarborough East of splitting that particular ministry, because obviously the minister is not competent to wear or capable of wearing both hats. I ask this question in order to ensure that jobs are created in this country and in order that the Prime Minister ensures that both of these departments, under new ministers and new direction, are funded properly so that job-creation opportunities are available in this country under a comprehensive and competent program of research and development.

Mr. Simmons: Madam Speaker, we will.

INQUIRY RESPECTING FUNDING OF FUSION PROGRAM

Mr. G. M. Gurbin (Bruce-Grey): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the minister my question is for the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment. My question arises out of a position which the minister took approximately five months ago with regard to fusion research in this country. At that time he expressed reservations about the research and development program for fusion in Canada. In the interim I would have hoped that the minister would have had an opportunity to view some of the advantages which there might be for Canada in the areas of metals, fuels, fuel handling and in laser development for industry and medicine. In the meantime what we have had is a continuing program, with $2.1 million dedicated to fusion research. That is only enough to stall the programs in the situation they are in now—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. Science and technology seems to be a marvellous pretext for long preambles to questions. Could the hon. member come to his question?

Mr. Gurbin: Madam Speaker, is the parliamentary secretary able to give this House an indication whether or not the government is prepared to support a research and development fusion program which will allow Canada to maintain its presence in an international atmosphere?

Mr. Roger Simmons (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, first of all, I say with kindness to the hon. member that he has very badly misrepresented the position of the Minister of State for Science and Technology as he expressed it in the estimates committee some months ago. At no time did the minister suggest, either to the press or in committee, that he was against fusion research. What he did say is that there are a number of questions which need to be addressed. He said there are a number of cautions which need to be kept in mind.

I suggest to the hon. member that he avail himself of the opportunity later today to go to the special task force on alternate forms of energy, of which, I believe, he is a member, and put his views forward there. We will look forward to receiving them.

Madam Speaker: A short supplementary from the hon. member for Bruce-Grey.

Mr. Gurbin: Madam Speaker, that will be difficult. The continued amount which is dedicated to that fusion research program is $2.1 million. That is the testimony we have from the minister. I ask this question in view of the International Atomic Energy Agency's representation that Canada is not spending enough, in view of what the minister of energy has said, that he is prepared to see the advantages for Canada, and because Edward Kitner, the head of the program in the United States, is prepared to write Canada into the program. Will the minister through the Ministry of State for Science and Technology dedicate the $2.4 million extra which is required to open the window for Canada into the technology of the world?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Simmons: Madam Speaker, we have heard the member's representation and we will certainly take it under advisement.

IMMIGRATION

PROCESSING OF VICTIMS OF ITALIAN EARTHQUAKE

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. I understand that representatives of the minister's department met recently with members of the Congress of Italo-Canadians with respect to the earthquake disaster in Italy. I understand that the members of that organization made certain proposals to representatives of the minister's department with respect to speeding up the movement of the victims of that earthquake to Canada. I wonder if the minister has had an opportunity to look at those proposals and does he have anything to report?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, we have been concentrating primarily on the first wave of applications under the family class to make sure that those applicants could be brought to this country as quickly as possible. The latest report we have is that about 700 to 800 applications have been made at our embassy in Rome. We are processing those applications right now and the first of the victims of the earthquake are coming to Canada.

In the meantime we have had meetings with representatives of the different organizations in this country as well as keeping in touch with the Italian government to see what other kind of assistance we might be able to provide. My department is presently examining some of those proposals and alternatives. As soon as we discover how they might be applied effectively, we will be prepared to make an announcement to hon. members.

Mr. Orlikow: I understand that among the proposals discussed with representatives of the minister's department there was a proposal that as many of the earthquake victims as possible who could come to Canada as visitors at the present time be permitted to come. The proposal is that after they are here and after the situation has settled somewhat in Italy, those who would like to stay in Canada permanently be permitted to be processed here in Canada. In this way they would be given permission to stay in Canada permanently rather than having to return to Italy in order to apply. I wonder if the minister would give consideration to that proposal from the congress of Italo-Canadians.

Mr. Axworthy: Madam Speaker, I wish to make a slight correction. The proposal he speaks of was a proposal which came to us from the Liberal leader of Ontario, Mr. Stuart Smith. I believe it is a proposal which has a great deal of merit. It would provide the opportunity for those who are displaced or homeless in the earthquake area to come here and receive temporary residence rather than staying in a refugee camp. I told the Ontario Liberal leader that we would be prepared to consider that proposal and endeavour to see if we could also provide some opportunity for those who fall under that plan to work and go to school while they are here. Again, it is something which is presently under advisement and we will report as soon as we have made a careful calculation of that very excellent proposal of Dr. Smith.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

AGRICULTURE

REPORTED REDUCTION IN DAIRY QUOTA

Mr. Leonard Hopkins (Renfrew-Nipissing-Pembroke): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. As the minister is aware, the national dairy policy ended on April 1 of this year and has not yet been renewed. An extensive interdepartmental review of Canada's dairy policy is under way, which has given rise to many serious concerns among dairy farmers. One report which has been gaining considerable momentum among dairy farmers is that their market share quota might be reduced by one-third. Can the minister say whether or not there is any truth to this particular statement? Will the minister state what the government's attitude is toward the future of Canada's national dairy policy, which is the best in the world according to one famous Canadian?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, as far as I am concerned there is not one bit of truth to what the hon. member says is being circulated. It is a bad rumour concerning our very healthy dairy industry. I cannot add any more to my reply at this time.

LABOUR RELATIONS

DE HAVILLAND AIRCRAFT OF CANADA, LIMITED—POLICY RESPECTING FEMALE EMPLOYEES

Mr. John Bosley (Don Valley West): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the minister responsible for de Havilland Aircraft of Canada, Limited, I address my question to the Minister of Labour. It is with regard to that corporation's practices. The chairman of local 673 of the United Auto Workers at de Havilland Aircraft last week charged very seriously that de Havilland is ghettoizing its female workers by refusing to allow them to apply for work on the factory floor with the effect that one-tenth of 1 per cent of the female workers at de Havilland work on the floor, at the same time requiring factory experience if a promotion is to be granted. Given that de Havilland is a federally-owned corporation, could the Minister of Labour assure me that he will be taking action immediately to correct this very unhappy practice of a corporation which should be setting an example in the Canadian workplace?

Hon. Gerald Regan (Minister of Labour): Madam Speaker, the hon. member will realize that the charge has been made by one party to a collective agreement and is not the basis upon which action of the type he suggests can be taken. If, indeed, there has been any discrimination against women workers in the assignment of work or in relation to their application to work on the floor, the remedies under the Canada Labour Code are quite clear, action can be taken and a proper adjudication made on whether or not there has been such discrimination. I suggest to the hon. member that that is the appropriate action in such a circumstance.

Mr. Bosley: Madam Speaker, the minister appears to be suggesting that in a company which the government owns workers should have to rely upon the law and not upon the owner of the company—their government.

Will the minister undertake to investigate this matter, given the seriousness of this allegation, given that it is a federally-owned company, and given that I presume the minister believes that companies we collectively own should set an example? If the allegations prove correct, will he advise de Havilland to correct their practices by setting an example, rather than making those people go to court?

Mr. Regan: Madam Speaker, I am sure the hon. member as the labour critic for his party would be fully aware that Labour Canada can only continue to fulfil its role, either to government-owned corporations or privately-owned corporations, in the same way; that is, by remaining an independent party between the two. Obviously, in that sense the remedy for any such breach is clearly provided. If the hon. member wants to make a representation as to what management should do, then I am sure he is cognizant of the fact that I am not the minister responsible for the operations of the company. He should make those representations elsewhere.

NATIONAL UNITY

WESTERN SEPARATISM—ATTITUDE OF PRIME MINISTER

Hon. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton North): Madam Speaker, I wish to thank you for recognizing me; it is very kind. My question is to the Right Hon. Prime Minister, if I may have his attention.

Mr. Trudeau: I am talking to Gene.

Mr. Paproski: The Prime Minister can either answer from where he is or from his seat, it does not really matter. He can talk to Whelan later.

Mr. Trudeau: I have to choose between two big guys.

Mr. Paproski: Over the past couple of weeks I have wanted to direct a couple of supplementaries to the right hon. gentleman. My question has to do with the Prime Minister taking shots at Quebec and Alberta. Since the separatist campaign is gathering pace, fuelled by the fear that Ottawa will in time turn the screws even tighter and change the face of the west, its economy and its politics, is the Prime Minister playing down western separatism as a minor replay of the Quebec game?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, in spite of the fact that the hon. member has taken several weeks to prepare his question, I wonder whether he has not changed the subject for the object. I am not taking shots at Quebec and Alberta; they are taking shots at me. If the hon. member will travel to these two provinces, he will see that this is the case.

Mr. Paproski: Madam Speaker, we have just had another perfect example of the Prime Minister being glib and misbegotten.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Paproski: The Prime Minister's view of western separatism is as accurate as his pronouncement that Quebec separatism was dead. Is this what he is saying about western separatism? It did not take me two weeks to prepare that one.

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I wish that the hon. member had taken two weeks to prepare that one. When I said Quebec separatism was dead, it was on the eve of the 1976 election—

Mr. Paproski: November 16.

Mr. Trudeau: —when the Quebec separatist party did not have the nerve to run as a separatist party, because it agreed with me that separatism could not win.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Paproski: That is why they got 14,000 people at the Forum last week.

Mr. Trudeau: I see that the political experts in the NDP are guffawing at that one. I wish they would answer my allegations. If separatism was a winner, why did the separatist party not run on a separatist plank and hold its referendum on the separatist plank? Because it knew that separatism was a loser, Therefore, I was right, and I believe that the same thing is true for Alberta.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Paproski: We will wait and see, Pierre.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I would like to make a statement in relation to today's supply proceedings. As hon. members are aware, the special order passed by the House on Tuesday, April 29, 1980, states that today is the last allotted day for the supply period ending December 10, 1980, and that all questions necessary to dispose of the Appropriation Act based on the main estimates shall be put at twelve o'clock midnight without further debate and amendment.

However, the special order does not cover the Supplementary Estimates (B). Pursuant to special order, the House will be sitting today from two o'clock to twelve o'clock midnight without interruption. It would be the Chair's intention when twelve o'clock midnight is reached to interrupt the proceedings in progress and put every question necessary to dispose of all the remaining stages of Bill C-47, the Supplementary Estimates (B), and the bill based thereon, without further debate or amendment.

As was the practice in the past, the supply bill based on the supplementary estimates will be distributed to hon. members as soon as possible. Is it agreed that this will be the procedure which will be followed tonight?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PRIVILEGE

MR. COSSITT—ALLEGATION OF EXISTENCE OF GOVERNMENT GUIDELINES RESPECTING ANSWERS TO WRITTEN QUESTIONS

Madam Speaker: I have notice of a question of privilege from the hon. member for Leeds-Grenville (Mr. Cossitt). If hon. members will bear with me, the hon. member for Leeds-Grenville has given me a notice of his question of privilege but has not included a statement on what that question of privilege will involve. It is quite clear in our Standing Order 17 that the Chair requires a notice and a written statement on the object of the question of privilege.

Recently in the House another hon. member failed to give me a statement on his question of privilege, and upon my making a similar remark, he offered to co-operate with the Chair and give the Chair a written statement. He raised his question of privilege the following day. I point this out to the hon. member for Leeds-Grenville, and I regret that he has not submitted a complete statement on his question of privilege.

I do want hon. members to be on notice that the Chair in the future will require statements on the object of a question of privilege.

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds-Grenville): Madam Speaker, I admit that in my notice I named the subject but did not go into a statement of detail, the reason being that on previous questions of privilege I have raised in this House in the eight years that I have been here, I simply said that I would like to raise a question of privilege at three o'clock, or whatever time, and named the subject. This procedure has never been questioned before. I am aware of the Standing Order, but I felt that it had become the custom of the House—rightly or wrongly, as the case may be—to indicate my intentions as I have done in this case.

I would certainly be glad to meet with the Speaker afterwards and present the evidence which I feel pertains to this subject if I could be permitted to proceed now.

Madam Speaker: I will hear the hon. member. I was merely putting hon. members on notice that in the future I would require that the procedure be followed. One of the advantages of being new is that one does not fall into different habits, and reads the standing orders as they are. It is quite clear to me that a written statement is required, and I will require a written statement.

Mr. Cossitt: Madam Speaker, for some time there have been a number of us in this House, including myself, who have wondered about and questioned the peculiar delay on the part of the government in furnishing information to the House, particularly with regard to answering questions on the order paper, the answers to which might be embarrassing, or considered to be embarrassing to the government. We have frequently been assured that everything is being done as speedily as possible, that there is no political interference, that honest answers are always given as soon as they are available and, in short, that the government is doing the very best it can to be co-operative with the House.

I have always doubted such assurances and expressed such doubts in the House in the past. But now the matter becomes one of a most serious nature that infringes on the privileges of members of the House, because of the existence of strange and peculiar guidelines of a top secret nature laid down by the government in regard to the answering of questions by cabinet ministers, which indicate that this House may have been duped, misled, or cheated by a possible government attempt deliberately to withhold truth from the members of the House and consequently from the Canadian people.

As evidence of what I have been saying, Madam Speaker, I possess a copy of a document originating in the Privy Council office and apparently known to the Prime Minister's office which is marked "secret—not to be photocopied or reproduced". The document is headed "sensitive topics" and also gives the information that the topics listed were in effect to be treated as sensitive when questioned during the second session of the Thirtieth Parliament, that is, up to the defeat of this government on May 22, 1979. I have determined from sources beyond reproach that the same instructions have been reintroduced by the government in this session of this Parliament and they have applied since this government was returned to office after the election of February 18, 1980.

I hope you will permit me, Madam Speaker, to read the document as it would be impossible to judge my question of privilege without the contents being known, on which my question of privilege is based.

At the outset may I say that I realize when something happens outside the House it is usually ruled not to be a question of privilege inside the House. In this case, however, I draw specific attention to the fact that, while the document was issued outside the House, its provisions have been applied inside the House.

The sensitive topics listed by the government for the attention of ministers include items numbered A to Z in this document. In most cases it can be clearly noted that questions on the order paper asking for information on matters mentioned have either never been answered or have been treated with non-answers, which adds proof to the fact that the list has been applied to the method in which the government has acted.

First, in regard to myself as the member for Leeds-Grenville, the document contains a direct interference with my privileges by instructing cabinet ministers as to the sensitivity of, and I quote directly, "any question in the name of the hon. member for Leeds." In other words, this government, presumably on the highest authority of Michael Pitfield and/or the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) and/or the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), and perhaps others, has circulated secret instructions to ministers which, in effect, tell them to hamper and tamper with legitimate questions asked in this House by myself and others. I submit, Madam Speaker, that this interferes directly with my ability and that of others to conduct our duties as members in this House in the manner that we should and, therefore, is a breach of privilege.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Cossitt: The other subjects listed in this startling document are as follows, and each speaks for itself as to where it interferes with our privileges. I should therefore like to quote the document exactly. It is marked "SECRET—Not to be photocopied or reproduced"—with the heading "Sensitive Topics." These are as follows: travel by the Prime Minister, ministers or public servants by plane, train or taxi; official residences; all expenditures by the Prime Minister, ministers, public servants, departments or agencies for goods, buildings or services; all expenditures for government programs; loans, grants or tenders awarded by any agent of the federal government; Prime Minister's, ministers' or public service establishment or salary figures; regional offices of ministers or departments; possible or alleged conflicts of interest; consultants, consultants' studies or contracts for consulting; lawyers retained by departments or agencies; government mailing or publication lists; advertising or publications; former Liberal candidates or office-holders; former public servants; Statistics Canada; CBC Radio-Canada and Radio-Canada International; Crown companies; relocation of departments or agencies; ports or railways; payments to provinces or municipalities; Dominion-provincial relations; bilingualism-official languages policy; invasion of privacy; freedom of information; individual, non-continuing items that might be identified—whatever that might be—and, finally, as I said earlier, any question in the name of the hon. member for Leeds.

To summarize, Madam Speaker, questions on these topics, if answered forthrightly, would indeed be sensitive and embarrassing to the government, and the document clearly illustrates that the government is not approaching the making public of information from a standpoint of proper disclosure but, instead, on the basis of political considerations.

There is no question in my mind that this situation interferes with my privileges and with the privileges of all members in the House of Commons in that it limits our ability to operate as we should in our capacity as members.

I ask, Madam Speaker, that all files of the Privy Council office be sealed and placed under guard, pertaining to this subject, to prevent any possible deliberate destruction this afternoon for the purpose of hiding evidence. I also realize, Madam Speaker, that it may be necessary to reserve judgment for a day—or even two days, I do not know—on the point that I have raised because you will no doubt wish to examine a copy of the document, hear other argument, and consult precedents. Therefore I ask to be permitted to reserve my right to move a motion that this be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections in the event that it should be decided that I have a prima facie case of privilege.

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, I should like to say a few words in reply to the hon. member for Leeds-Grenville (Mr. Cossitt) so that you may consider the point he has raised. The hon. member apparently has quoted from a document which he cannot table under the rules of this House, although I suppose he could append it to Hansard. It is a document whose veracity has not been determined so we are not sure what he is reading from, or who wrote the document. We are not even sure of the origin of the document.

As I have pointed out before, Madam Speaker, the government tries to answer all questions of all hon. members. In particular, the hon. member for Leeds-Grenville and I have been talking about this on the floor of the House for a number of weeks. I should like to point out that we have answered about 56 per cent of the questions posed by the hon. member. He asked 242 questions out of the 1,854 on the order paper. I grant that we have answered 69 per cent of all questions, so his proportion is slightly less, but I can assure him that we do not discriminate between members.

I can categorically deny that any instructions have been issued to me, or by me as the person responsible in this House for tabling these questions, concerning the answers, the form of answers, or the people who should be answered or in what priority. I categorically deny that. This is a wild allegation of the sort we are used to hearing from the hon. member for Leeds-Grenville.

An hon. Member: Right on!

An hon. Member: Shame!

Mr. Collenette: It does concern me that there are some questions on the order paper that have not been answered for a long time, in particular questions Nos. 1, 4, 5, 15, 22, and a few others in the two digit range. It is true that they are all in the name of the hon. member for Leeds-Grenville but he should not imply that there is any conspiracy afoot. It so happens that many of the questions he asks are so complex that it takes a lot of work and a lot of money to get the answers. I think I have proven by what I have just said that we have done a reasonably good job of answering his queries over the last few months, and I undertake to achieve even better results for the hon. member.

It is my contention that the hon. member does not have a question of privilege. He is being treated in the same way as all members of the House; that is, we try to answer his questions along with those of other hon. members without bias or limitation.

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, the hon. member for Leeds-Grenville (Mr. Cossitt) has informed me that he would be prepared to agree to append the document that he dealt with, to Hansard. I hope the government is agreeable that this be done. Let us start right there, so that this Privy Council document to which he referred is available. I trust there will be agreement by the government.

The issue is not the number of questions that have been answered; the issue is not the cost of answering questions; the issue is not even the right of a member to ask questions, and the issue, I must say, is not whether instructions have been given to a parliamentary secretary. The issue, Madam Speaker, is the existence of a document that is now on record in the House, whether the parliamentary secretary knows about it or not, which makes special reference to a special kind of question and which, because the answer may be inconvenient, gives special instructions from the government or a senior public servant within the government, or within the Privy Council office.

The question, therefore, is not how good the government has been about answering questions in terms of numbers; it goes far beyond that. We are really talking now about whether, as a result of a statement, a position, a document or something that exists, the right of the member of Parliament has been impeded not just to put questions on the order paper but to have some expectation of answers to those questions.

The allegation made by the hon. member for Leeds-Grenville is quite clear, and it cannot go unanswered, that there is a special instruction—the parliamentary secretary has indicated only that he does not know about it—that exists within the Privy Council. That is the allegation, and that allegation must be answered.

I do not know how one can argue that this is not a question of privilege. I refer to Beauchesne, the fourth edition, page 59, citation 70, as follows:

> Points of order are questions raised with the view of calling attention to any departure from the Standing Orders or the customary modes of proceeding in debate or in the conduct of legislative business and may be raised at any time by any member, whether he has previously spoken or not.

● (1520)

I am sure that in every free Parliament anywhere in the world it is not customary to have a government direct an injunction that questions cannot be answered against a particular member of Parliament whom they do not like. I think the issue is quite important. It is not an issue of costs. The hon. member for Leeds-Grenville is prepared to stand and tell his constituents: "Of course, it costs money to answer questions."

But as a member of Parliament he has a right to have answers to those questions. The people of his constituency will make a judgment as to whether or not those questions ought to be answered. They have made that election in favour of the hon. member for Leeds-Grenville who has been returned to this House on four separate occasions since 1972. The issue is not one of costs.

There has been an allegation by the hon. member for Leeds-Grenville that the document does exist. There has been a statement from a parliamentary secretary that he does not know about it. Therefore I think the matter must be held in abeyance. But certainly no member of this House, whether it is the hon. member for Leeds-Grenville or any member representing any constituency in the country, can labour under that kind of burden with respect to his right as a member of Parliament to have answers to questions that he has posed. This must apply to all members; to the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert) who asks an equal number of embarrassing questions of the government. He is the best questioner on the government side in terms of the numbers of questions he has on the order paper. He has that right to ask those questions, and both the hon. member for Vaudreuil and the hon. member for Leeds-Grenville have the right to answers.

I think there is a question of privilege. I want to reserve the right on behalf of the House to argue the point further, if it is necessary, to convince you of that, Madam Speaker. We cannot operate if that document exists. The first step with respect to dealing with the question of the authenticity of the document is to have that document affixed to today's Hansard. Then perhaps the investigation can begin by you, Madam Speaker, and by other officials.

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, I rise simply for the purpose of making a suggestion. It seems to me that if this document exists—the one to which the hon. member for Leeds-Grenville (Mr. Cossitt) has referred—and if it is an authentic document, then there is a pretty serious question of privilege. At the moment, he is the only one who has it. It seems to me that either the document should be appended to Hansard so that we can all see it—we have to follow that route because being a private member he cannot table it—or provision should be made for copies of the document to be supplied to Your Honour and to representatives of the parties so we can all see it.

As I say, we should have a chance to look at it so as to make a decision before we proceed. The suggestion made by the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) that it be held in abeyance is a good one. I underline that by making the suggestion that the matter be held in abeyance until at least party representatives and the Chair have had a chance to see the document or copies of it.

Madam Speaker: I cannot hear the hon. member for Leeds-Grenville (Mr. Cossitt) twice on his question of privilege.

Mr. Cossitt: Madam Speaker, I simply want to confirm what my House leader has said. I have expressed my willingness to make the document available and to have it appended to Hansard. I know that as a private member I cannot table anything, but if that procedure is acceptable to the Chair and to the House, I will be glad to make the document available to the Table at this time. The only other point I might make—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member cannot make another point.

[Translation]

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, if we accepted as a matter of principle that private members table any document they want when they want, we would risk becoming submerged, and I believe that in this case I have every reason to object to the request of the hon. member to table papers which, more often than not, I am sure, would come close to being—I shall not use the expression I had in mind but everyone knows the hon. member for Leeds-Grenville (Mr. Cossitt) and I am afraid that if I gave consent today on behalf of my party we would risk being flooded by an ocean of more or less relevant documents on his part.

Madam Speaker, I do not object if he wants to show the document to his friends. He is quite free to do so. This does not bother me, but as far as the House is concerned we are not here to examine every question raised by the hon. member for Leeds-Grenville. There are already a great number of questions in his name on the order paper. My parliamentary secretary gave a very appropriate reply when he said that we are dealing with his questions on the same basis as any other query. A great many of the questions on the order paper are in his name. We do not complain about this. On the contrary, he is the one who complains and every time he does so we take the opportunity to remind him that we reply to a large number of his questions, even though they often refer to nearly every department.

We do not criticize him for the fact that these questions cost the taxpayers a lot of money. We could do so, Madam Speaker, but to be fair to the House as a whole, it is quite normal that when we try to provide answers, we also try to achieve some balance and use the time at our disposal to provide replies to the greatest number of members possible. However, the hon. member can be assured that as far as I am concerned and as far as the government, my parliamentary secretary and the public servants are concerned, no instruction has been given not to reply to the questions asked. On the contrary, instructions are to try to provide to the hon. member the most complete answers possible to as many questions as we can.

Having said this, I would like to refer to the fifth edition of Beauchesne concerning the very important issue of questions. On page 129 of the fifth edition, it is noted that there are two types of questions asked in the House. There are, of course, the oral questions which we all know and which are asked when the subject matter is urgent, and there are also the written questions when there is no urgency. The only difference between the two types of questions, Madam Speaker, is that when they are asked orally, it is because, in principle, they concern an urgent matter. What occurs in practice is another matter but I do not want to debate the point. Second—

[English]

Mr. Cossitt: On a point of order, Madam Speaker, this has nothing to do with the question of privilege I raised. I do not know why we cannot stick to the subject, and not who has how many questions on the order paper and what percentage has been answered. The question I raised is basic. Is this government dishonest? Has it been instructing cabinet ministers to tamper with answers to questions on the order paper? We are getting sidetracked by the parliamentary secretary and by the President of the Privy Council about how great they are and that only as many questions can be answered. But there have been no answers to questions about Goldfarb for about four years, and that is getting a bit ridiculous. If they want to argue and debate, and that is what they are doing, then I should be allowed to do that too. But that is not the point; that is irrelevant. I know from the sources that this document came that it is accurate. If they deny it, then they have destroyed it this afternoon since I raised the matter in this House. I have asked that it be added as an appendix to Hansard because I am quite willing to do that.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, please excuse the hon. member. As I was saying, there are two kinds of questions: oral questions and those that are put on the order paper. Furthermore, Beauchesne gives a whole series of criteria on the basis of which questions are acceptable or not; in the case of written questions these will be found on pages 129-131 and in that of oral questions, on pages 131-133. Were those criteria applied rigorously, the question periods would obviously be much shorter, and the order paper would be much less crowded.

Setting aside that remark, Madam Speaker, because I do not want to start a debate at this point, I should like to point out that Beauchesne goes on detailing the criteria that apply to questions on page 133, he edicts the principle that:

> Ministers may decline to answer any question whatsoever.

Once again, at the beginning of my remarks, I took great pains to indicate that generally we make considerable effort to answer the questions, all of them, and as completely as possible in theory on the basis of parliamentary practice; and according to commentators on the Standing Orders of the House, we are not obliged in any way to answer a question, whether it be oral or written. This is very clear in citation 363 of Beauchesne on the matter, and I quote:

> A minister may decline to answer a question without stating the reason for his refusal, and insistence on an answer is out of order, with no debate being allowed.

Madam Speaker, that cannot be expressed more clearly for the purposes of the question of privilege now before you.

If we were to follow to the letter our parliamentary procedure, the Standing Orders, the authors and the precedents, it is obvious that unless we wanted to we would not have to answer any question on the order paper or any question put during oral question period. Such a decision would not have to be justified on our part and indeed could not result in a debate.

So technically speaking the point I want to make, Madam Speaker, by referring you to page 133 of Beauchesne's fifth edition, is that the question of privilege should obviously be rejected if we do not have to answer, and that refusal on our part to provide answers, which is not the case here anyway but even if it were the case, cannot become the subject of a debate.

Once again—and I want to be quite clear, I do not want to be ambiguous—the member for Leeds makes a request for a document to be annexed to Hansard. On grounds of principle, at this time, I am opposed to such a move whatever the nature of the document. If he wants to show it to newsmen or to his friends, that is his problem. But as far as the House of Commons is concerned, we want the Standing Orders to be complied with. I have just referred to the relevant rules. You see how open we are on this side of the House, because we are not doing what the Standing Orders allow us to do, which is to refrain from answering. On the contrary, as indicated by the hon. parliamentary secretary, we do all we can to answer fully as many questions on the order paper as possible.

Therefore, Madam Speaker, I would ask you to consider that there is absolutely no prima facie case of privilege, and that the remarks made by the hon. member for Leeds and by his House leader are absolutely not in compliance with the Standing Orders, which do not provide for a debate when there is no answer.

Hon. Allan Lawrence (Durham-Northumberland): On a question of privilege, Madam Speaker.

Mr. McKenzie: On the same question of privilege, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I am afraid I cannot hear that many members on the question of privilege. It is already difficult for me to see where the question of privilege lies since most of the actions occurred outside the House. I will listen to one further intervention on the opposition side, and then I will make a statement.

Mr. Lawrence: Madam Speaker, the one request that is immediately before you this afternoon is that the document in question be appended to today's proceedings. To be perfectly frank, I am not sure whether that requires unanimous consent. I believe it may be within the discretion of the Chair whether to permit it or not. If that is the case, I hope the Chair will exercise its discretion in favour of the request.

I do not believe the Chair is capable of determining the real question here this afternoon. Frankly, I do not think any single member, or group of members, in this chamber this afternoon can answer the critical, climactic question. That question is whether the document alleged to be authentic by the hon. member for Leeds Grenville (Mr. Cossitt) is an authentic government document or not. That is the prime question which eventually has to be answered. That is the bottom line. With no disrespect to the Chair, I do not think the Chair is capable of making that determination. In fact I do not think the House is capable of that determination.

I suggest that the only body which can properly call witnesses and determine the authenticity or non-authenticity of that document has to be the body set up under the rules of this House of Commons, and that, obviously, is the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections. That is the body to which this whole matter should be referred. The committee has the capability of calling witnesses. It can properly investigate whether such a document existed to the knowledge of any member of the government. We cannot determine that, nor can the Chair.

I suggest most sincerely that this not only affects the privileges of the hon. member for Leeds-Grenville, but the privileges of every member of this House. For three Parliaments now some of us have been disgusted with the procedure for answering questions on the order paper. Although I used to place questions on the order paper, I seldom do now. In the last session, of course, it was not possible for me to do that. However, when I did submit questions touching some of those subjects which the hon. member for Leeds-Grenville indicated are within the contents of the memorandum he has at hand, they were not answered. Either they were not answered at all or they were answered in an untruthful, evasive manner.

My experience as a member of this House since 1972 with this and previous Liberal administrations follows exactly along the lines of that memorandum. I suggest that the bottom line, the crunch in this whole question, is whether that document is authentic. The only body which can determine that has to be the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections because we cannot call witnesses before the House. That committee can and, therefore, it should go to that committee.

On top of that argument has to be layered the argument that the only way we will know what we are talking about is to have more information about that document, and certainly to have it appended to today's proceedings of this House. If it is an authentic document, or even if it is not, the members of the House deserve to have it included in today's Hansard. Obviously the matter has to go to the committee because, with all due respect, if it is an authentic document, its contents very seriously and gravely affect the privileges of every member of this House.

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. Hon. members were granted the floor to intervene on the question of privilege. Are they now rising on the same question of privilege or on a point of order?

Mr. McKenzie: My point of order is that the precedent for appending letters to Hansard was established last Thursday when the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Collenette) had a letter regarding transportation appended to Hansard. When talking about railroads, he referred to a letter received from an official of one of the railroad companies in Canada and asked to have the letter appended to Hansard. If we can have that kind of letter appended, surely an important document like this can be appended, particularly when the precedent was established last Thursday.

Madam Speaker: I would point out to the hon. member that the letter was appended with the unanimous consent of the House. That does make a difference. If we get unanimous consent, a lot of things can happen. Until now I do not have any indication that we do have unanimous consent of the House, but on the question to which the hon. member refers, if my memory serves me well, it did happen with the unanimous consent of the House.

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Madam Speaker, my point of order arises out of something my friend, the government House leader, said with respect to this point of privilege. As I understood him, he pointed out quite properly that with respect to the answering of questions by the government, whether written or oral, there were certain rules applied and if the government did not wish to answer certain questions, it had that option. What disturbs me about this is that in his remarks I do not think he dealt with something that is of the utmost importance, because it appears at this stage that the member from Leeds has been singled out so that his questions are dealt with differently.

That goes really to the foundation of what we are all to expect as humble members of this House. If we are to be treated in one way, then we should all be treated the same, excluding, of course, members of the cabinet or officers of the House who have special privileges. Perhaps my friend neglected to deal with that important question. Assuming he is correct in what he said, and I have no quarrel with the particular procedural point he put forward, it still does not deal with the very important point raised as a grievance by the member from Leeds that he alone, according to his evidence, apparently has been singled out for special treatment.

Madam Speaker: I will make a few remarks before making a definite statement on this question of privilege. I wish to point out to the hon. member for Leeds-Grenville that I have no authority to seal archives or documents or files pending whatever decision might be taken on this particular question. I cannot comply with that request made to me.

As for the document itself, I would hope the hon. member would send me a copy of it. I cannot rule on this question without having seen the document.

As for other members of this House needing to see the document, that may be so in an absolute way once I have ruled whether a prima facie case of privilege is found in the question raised by the hon. member. If the hon. member wants his document to be seen by a number of members, he has many ways at his disposal in order to do so. He may use the distribution services of the House of Commons or he may hand it out to members around him who may have an interest.

Concerning his request to have it appended to Hansard, I am in the hands of the House and that requires unanimous consent. From what I heard from the hon. President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard), I do not suppose the House would give unanimous consent. Therefore, I am unable to act on that request.

In regard to the total question as it was presented by the various hon. members, I hope to see the document. Members raising a question of privilege can refer to documents and they usually make these known to the Chair. I should like to take this question of privilege under advisement.

MR. SARGEANT—CANADA COMMUNITY DEVELOPMENT PROJECTS IN MANITOBA—MINISTER'S STATEMENT

Madam Speaker: I have a question of privilege in the name of the hon. member for Selkirk-Interlake (Mr. Sargeant). Before the hon. member rises, from the statement he made to me it seems he wants to discuss a ruling I made yesterday. He refers to the answer given by the hon. Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy), and that is what the question of privilege he raised yesterday was all about. However, if the hon. member is rising on something else, I will hear it.

Mr. Terry Sargeant (Selkirk-Interlake): Madam Speaker, my question of privilege today arises out of a charge made by the minister in his comments yesterday when he said my allegations were "dead wrong." I contend that by saying this he has violated my privileges as a member of this House. He further went on to say as reported on page 5536 of yesterday's Hansard:

> The projects for Manitoba constituencies were approved well over a week ago and sent to the regional office for distribution. There was no hold-up in my office.

Upon further examination yesterday I find that as of three o'clock yesterday afternoon Eastern Standard Time the Winnipeg regional office had only received the 12 project approvals—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is discussing the ruling made yesterday. Having taken a look at Hansard, this is precisely the point discussed yesterday during the course of that question of privilege. I am afraid I cannot hear him if he continues in that vein.

Mr. Knowles: Madam Speaker, may I request you listen to my friend for a moment or two. Your Honour will find he wants to report something which happened after the ruling was made yesterday. It concerns something he learned from Winnipeg after the matter was raised in the House.

Mr. Sargeant: That is correct, Madam Speaker. I wish to bring forth further information which might indicate the hon. minister did not give us a correct answer in the House yesterday. He said the projects for the Manitoba constituencies were approved well over a week ago and sent to the regional offices. However, as of three o'clock Eastern Standard Time yesterday, the Winnipeg office had only received the 12 projects to which I referred in my question. Subsequently, at approximately 3.30 Eastern Standard Time, a matter of a few minutes after I brought the subject up in this House, the Winnipeg regional office received a phone call from the minister's office indicating that project approvals would be sent later that day, not a week ago. At about four o'clock Winnipeg time, five o'clock our time, these approvals were being transmitted by telecopier or telex to the Winnipeg office. The staff at the Winnipeg regional office was required to work late yesterday to transfer this information. I really think at this point my case can rest.

I contend that my privilege was violated when the minister charged that I was dead wrong. I think this is especially so since we now learn a different set of facts than those put to this House by the hon. minister. A great disservice is done when a minister of the Crown makes such inaccurate charges against an opposition member. With all due respect, I would request that the minister be asked to withdraw his charge against me, that he apologize, and that he set the record straight for this House.

[Translation]

Mr. Dennis Dawson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): On the same question of privilege, Madam Speaker, I remind the hon. member that the minister admitted yesterday that not all projects had been completed in this $137 million program. He clearly stated that as far as Manitoba was concerned the projects had been approved. He made sure that if there were delays in the correspondence, which leads to a question of privilege in the House—he made sure that this had left the minister's office. When you are dealing with a $137 million program, with I do not know how many projects, with 282 MPs to satisfy and 282 advisory committees, it is difficult to ensure that all ridings are at the same stage. The minister therefore asked me in my capacity as parliamentary secretary to make sure that the decision for all projects was sent as quickly as possible to the officers in charge. But he stated unequivocally that he had approved the Manitoba projects. That, Madam Speaker, is the main issue, I believe: the projects were approved even though the hon. member claimed they were not.

Point of Order—Mr. Hawkes

● (1550)

[English]

Madam Speaker: Does the hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Murphy) wish to speak to this question of privilege?

Mr. Murphy: Yes, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: I do not think I want to hear another hon. member on this question. Would the hon. member please resume his seat?

The question as raised by the hon. member for Selkirk-Interlake and as stated in his letter to me giving me notice, was in fact a bit misleading. I am not saying this was deliberate, but I will quote from the hon. member's letter. He said that he would raise a question of privilege "arising out of the answer given me yesterday in the House by the Minister of Employment and Immigration". When I heard the hon. member's first remarks it was therefore quite clear to me that he was speaking about what was said in his letter. Subsequently he began to discuss the fact that he had a grievance about the way in which certain actions of the government become known in his constituency, or in constituencies around his.

I repeat that this is not a question of privilege. It is a grievance. It is a matter of debate. It is a difference of opinion. It is all those things, but it is certainly not a question of privilege, and that is the reason I will not hear the hon. member for Churchill.

POINTS OF ORDER

MR. HAWKES—OFFICIAL REPORT—INVESTIGATION OF ERRORS AND OMISSIONS

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Madam Speaker, I have notified the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) of my intention to raise this point of order, and his parliamentary secretary has remained in the chamber.

An examination of page 5459 of Hansard for December 8 at approximately four o'clock in the afternoon would indicate an omission of a significant exchange between the minister and myself. There are at least two questions and two responses involved. They are totally absent from the record for that date.

The content of at least one of those questions involved my asking the minister if he could explain the discrepancy in the debates as recorded in Hansard for Friday, December 5 in which, during the question period, the minister provided me with certain information in response to my question. The blues record that accurately, but the final copy of Hansard for Friday was not consistent with what happened in this House on Friday. I asked the minister if he could explain how that came about. In his response to me he indicated he would look into the situation and respond. However, that exchange between us on Monday is totally absent, other parts of the debates of this House on the eighth are also absent, and I wonder if I could call on Your Honour's good offices to explore that situation and perhaps to provide us with an explanation of it.

[Translation]

Mr. Dennis Dawson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): I have checked Hansard both in French and in English to see if there was an omission. The hon. member started his questioning at four o'clock and went on till 4.20 so it is possible that a question asked by the hon. member at that time was missed. I think that House staff will easily be able to check the electronic Hansard to see if one of the hon. member's question was omitted. But I think I could refer the hon. member to page 5456, when he started his questioning, right after question period. There I think he will find the answer to his question.

Madam Speaker: It is indeed the responsibility of the Chair to ensure that Hansard faithfully reflects the discussions in the House, and if there has been an omission, as the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Hawkes) claims, then I shall look into the matter and try to listen to the recordings. I think that these two sources should enable us to set the facts straight. I thank the hon. member for bringing this to our attention.

[English]

MR. TAYLOR—PROCEDURE GOVERNING THE TABLING OF DOCUMENTS

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I would like to request that Your Honour make a special search of Beauchesne and the rules regarding the necessity for unanimous consent to table anything in the House. If there was that necessity, a minister could be stopped from tabling by one dissenting voice. I know of nothing in Beauchesne which requires unanimity for the tabling of any matter.

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, I am sure you could deal with this, but since this point reflects upon what we were discussing earlier I point out that there was no dispute about the ability of a parliamentary secretary or a minister to table a document. We are talking about the long-established practice whereby private members do not have the ability to table documents but can request unanimity on the part of the House to have documents appended to Hansard.

Madam Speaker: I stand to be corrected if I am not interpreting the rules properly. A minister of the Crown, or a parliamentary secretary acting on behalf of his minister, can table documents in the House. In other circumstances unanimous consent is required. I think that is what I stated, but I will look into the rules in light of the remarks of the hon. member. However, I think I am correct in interpreting the rules in that manner.

MR. McKINNON—POSTPONEMENT OF ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

Hon. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Madam Speaker, I rise on a new point of order. We have some procedural difficulties, about which Your Honour is no doubt aware, when a member asks a minister a question and receives the answer that the minister is not able to answer the question at that time but will inquire and inform the hon. member later. All too often we do not hear of it again unless we raise it once more ourselves, thus using up one of our rare opportunities in question period.

Yesterday there was a different kind of incident. I asked the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Blais) a question he was unable to answer, and he said, "I will have to inquire and inform the hon. member". My question was about the fifth milepost report on the new fighter aircraft contract. I asked if a review was made, whether it was satisfactory and whether the milepost payment was made. I would like to put on the record the fact that the minister came to me after the question period and said that a review had been made, the report was satisfactory, and the payment had been made. I hope this example might prove catching and that some other ministers who have allowed similar questions to be outstanding for months might get the idea.

PETITION

MR. MAYER—CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY—CLOSING OF MINIOTA SUBDIVISION

Mr. Charles Mayer (Portage-Marquette): Madam Speaker, I would like to present a petition on behalf of the residents of Manitoba who want public hearings held on the proposed closing of the Miniota subdivision of the CPR. A decision to abandon this rail line was made, I might add, a decision made without adequate consultation with those who will be most affected. I submit that new evidence has shown that this line is still an integral part of the grain transportation system in Manitoba.

On behalf of the petitioners I ask that serious consideration be given to their request that the Canadian Transport Commission hold a full and public inquiry before Canadian Pacific is allowed to close the Miniota subdivision.

DRUG TESTING

Question No. 318—Mr. Herbert:

Does the government require regular testing to determine the comparable (a) purity (b) stability (c) pH (d) inert ingredients (e) mould or bacterial contamination (f) coating (g) absorption rate (h) deterioration of chemically equivalent drugs and, if so, are the findings made public?

Mr. Doug Frith (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Before each lot of a drug may be sold in Canada, the pharmaceutical manufacturer is required to test that drug according to the requirements of the food and drug regulations. The types of testing required are dependent on the specifications of the product in question. Product specifications include requirements for potency, purity and identity of the product as well as other product related requirements such as testing to ensure stability. The adequacy of these specifications and the actual testing are both subject to evaluation by the health protection branch and action may be taken if either are found to be inadequate. The companies are not required to make the results of this testing public. However, when a drug is tested within the Quality of Drug Assessment program, results are provided to provincial and territorial departments of health, hospitals and, upon request, to health professionals.

AIR CANADA

Question No. 1,010—Mr. Cossitt:

1. With reference to the answer to question No. 593 which states in part: "Air Canada regards remuneration and other conditions of officers' and managers' employment as proprietary" (a) is Air Canada a Crown corporation (b) is Air Canada responsible to Parliament through a minister of the Crown (c) can Air Canada refuse a parliamentary request for information on remuneration of its officials and, if so, for what reasons?

2. Is it government policy to make more information available to the Canadian people and, if so, will this include information about Air Canada?

3. Is the government prepared to request Air Canada to reconsider making available, details on the pension, allowances or emoluments of any kind extended to the honourable member for Lincoln when he retired as chairman of Air Canada's board of directors and (a) if so, on what date (b) if not, for what reason?

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): The hon. member may wish to refer to Beauchesne's fifth edition, citation 357(1), which refers to Beauchesne's fourth edition, citation 171. In specificity he may wish to examine sections (a), (d), (h), (i), (j), (k), (m), (q), (r), (t), (w), and (ff), among others, of citation 171. The honourable member may also wish to put questions directly to the management of Air Canada when the company's annual report is before the Standing Committee on Transport.

NEW HORIZONS—GRANT CHEQUES

Question No. 1,414—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Did the Minister of National Health and Welfare state in part before the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs on Wednesday, July 2, 1980, "so can we conclude that we will all meet your New Horizons group and give the cheques yourselves . . .", and, if so, is it government policy to forward New Horizons cheques to recipients through all members of Parliament regardless of their political affiliation and, if so, on what date will this system come into force?

2. Is it the policy of the minister to handle New Horizons grants on a strictly non-political basis?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): 1. See Minutes of Proceedings and Evidence of the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs for July 2, 1980.

2. Yes.

Question No. 1,453—Mr. Cossitt:

With reference to the answer by the Minister of Supply and Services to a question by the honourable member for Leeds-Grenville concerning receipt of a request from the Minister of National Health and Welfare that New Horizons grants cheques be forwarded to recipients by members of parliament and the minister's statement that he would look into the situation, has the Minister arranged for this to be done and (a) if not, for what reason (b) if so, what are all the details?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): Yes.

(b) According to Treasury Board guidelines, Supply and Services can dispatch cheques only to payees or the originating client department.

LANGUAGE PREFERENCE SURVEY

Question No. 1,555—Mr. Wenman:

What was the cost of the Language Preference Survey that was included in the various cheques sent out by the income securities program branch of the Department of National Health and Welfare?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): The cost of the Language Preference Survey included with the cheques to Old Age Security and Family Allowance recipients (approximately six million) in August, 1980, will be approximately $140,000 for material and $150,000 for return postage.

FLYING SCHOOLS—EXEMPTION OF SALES TAX ON AIRCRAFT

Question No. 1,686—Mr. Wenman:

Will the government consider exempting flying schools from paying sales tax on aircraft, parts and equipment purchased for use exclusively in flying training?

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State, Finance): Training aids for use by educational institutions, for example, typewriters for teaching typing, and equipment for training welders, auto mechanics, electricians and machinists, are all subject to the federal sales tax. It would be inappropriate to provide relief for aircraft used in flight instruction when comparable equipment used in teaching other skills is taxable. Nevertheless, student pilots do receive a significant benefit from the government as their tuition fees for ground school training and the cost of flying training under instruction both qualify for deduction from income for income tax calculation purposes.

EXCISE TAX ACT

Will the government consider amending the Excise Tax Act, schedule III, part XVI, section 1(a) to include hydraulic tools in the list of construction equipment eligible for tax exemption?

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State, Finance): The Excise Tax Act now provides relief from the federal sales tax for a range of equipment which is designed for construction or demolition purposes, or for use directly in placing concrete mortar or asphalt. Equipment, for example, hydraulic tools, which have a wide variety of applications have never been extended exemption because of administrative concerns and the revenue cost. The government does not propose any changes in this policy at the present time.

APPROPRIATION ACT NO. 2, 1980-81

The House resumed, from Tuesday, December 9, consideration in committee of Bill C-47, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the Government of Canada for the financial year ending March 31, 1981—Mr. Pinard—Mr. Blaker in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Vote No. 1

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: I understand that the hon. member for Waterloo had the floor when debate in Committee of the Whole on Bill C-47 was concluded yesterday. I believe I am correct in indicating that the hon. member did not utilize the whole time he was allowed and that he has about ten minutes remaining. I will verify this in a moment.

I understand that the hon. member for Waterloo has now determined that he will not utilize the remainder of his time. Therefore, I will recognize an hon. member on my right. In this instance I understand the hon. member for Guelph will rise to speak.

Mr. Schroder: Mr. Chairman, I am grateful for the opportunity to address the House in Committee of the Whole while it is examining the estimates for Agriculture Canada. Of all the ministries of the Government of Canada, my constituency of Guelph is most intimately related to this one. At this point in time the people of Guelph are most concerned about the fate of the Canfarm Co-op. I will return to that subject in a moment, but first I would like to address myself to the broader relationship of agriculture to the nation at large and my own constituency.

In the House of Commons, we frequently talk about the importance of small business, private enterprise, and the importance of enhancing the business climate for the over-all betterment of the Canadian economy. Agriculture, too, is a business in Canada subject to most of the same risks as an ordinary business, consuming large amounts of capital investment, large cash flows, and facing many difficult conditions that many Canadians fail to appreciate. Early in our history the taming of the wilderness and cultivation of the soil laid the foundation for the economic development of Canada. No civilization in history has ever attained any measure of social and industrial development without first having an advanced agricultural sector.

I represent the riding of Guelph which has a strong and vibrant industrial base, and a great university of which we are extremely proud. The international recognition and prestige that this institution enjoys is based primarily on its contribution to agricultural science. The Ontario Agricultural College, established in 1873, and the Ontario Veterinary College, established in 1862, along with the MacDonald Institute, were founding colleges of what is now the University of Guelph. The contributions of these colleges to the science of agriculture is beyond calculation. The husbandry of soil, crops and animals has been advanced to levels unsurpassed anywhere in the world by the applied research of the University of Guelph.

However, we should never forget that the successful application of this specialized knowledge falls on the shoulders of the farmers themselves. It is a national blessing that most provinces in Canada are able to provide strong support for the agricultural sector which provides Canada and the world with its food supply.

I have a strong personal interest in the role of agriculture in Canada in that I have made my living for more than three decades as a professional veterinarian. Most Canadians fail to make the connection between such areas as animal pathology, which was my field, grain transportation, hog prices, an assortment of other agriculture-related areas, and the food on their dinner tables, and the cost of providing it.

Canadians still enjoy the lowest food prices in the world as a proportion of their income. Yet, this is possible because of two factors and two factors only. They are, first, an accident of birth and geography which finds us living within one of the biggest and most fertile agricultural zones in the world, and second, the amazing strides that the farming and agricultural community has made in exploiting these advantages. Canada has never had fewer farmers as a percentage of its population than it has today, yet they produce more in absolute and per capita terms than ever before.

At one point in time it would not have been necessary for a member of Parliament to stand up in public and argue the case for the Canadian farmer to ensure that he receives his due. Before World War II, about one-third of the population was classified as rural. Now the urban population has climbed to a staggering 95 per cent of all Canadians. The farmer is now a smaller minority but he continues to maintain this land as the best fed in the world, and one of the fewer than half-dozen in the world which is still a net exporter of food materials.

I spoke a moment ago of the challenges and successes that the agricultural community has witnessed over the years. In my own area there have been many breakthroughs in animal health. Canadian farmers have developed many varieties of plants that are specially suited to our own environmental conditions.

Output per individual worker in urban industry has doubled since the 1950s. That is not a bad record, but we should all be grateful that the agricultural worker has done considerably better. He has quadrupled his output per capita in the same period.

All of these advances in agriculture did not just happen by accident. Aside from the time and the determination of the people required to reach these plateaus, there remains the question of money and finance.

In 1961, capital investment in Canadian farming amounted to $13.2 billion, rose to $57 billion in 1976, and it is estimated to be at more than $70 billion at this time, more than $120,000 per farmer. It goes without saying that to maintain high levels of output resulting from massive investment, sound and effective financial management is an absolute necessity. This is where Canfarm fits into the scheme of things.

The costs of operating a farm in 1980 are astronomical. Interest rates have proven to be extremely unpredictable and the low interest rates of the Farm Credit Corporation can only provide a partial escape. The federal government has a lot at stake in the farms of Canada in a very literal sense. Seventy per cent of all long-term farm debts in Canada is handled through the Farm Credit Corporation, with an additional load being carried through the Farm Improvement Loans Act. Also I have referred to the record of Canadian agriculture in holding down food costs through new and innovative technology. The over-all health of the farm sector is important in holding the line in the importation of food from abroad.

Canfarm is inseparable from the subject of a vibrant agricultural sector, given the scale of finance involved in modern farming. The Minister of Agriculture made the observation that the Government of Canada has put ten years of research effort and money into Canfarm. Without question, his ministry is now strapped for cash, as are all other ministries. But I do not for a moment disagree with the argument that much of the blame for the current situation of Canfarm rests on the shoulders of provincial ministers of agriculture and the farm organizations which have failed to promote Canfarm sufficiently and to recruit the members it will ultimately need to sustain itself.

Even so, I think the federal government has spent too much time, effort and money in the development of Canfarm to permit it to fold now, regardless of whether or not the present difficulties are the fault of other parties.

A significant portion of new farm loans is made to young farmers under the age of 35. The managerial assistance offered to them through Canfarm is especially valuable. One of the side effects of the high finance of modern farming is the tidal wave of record-keeping which must be maintained. Canfarm reduces this burden immeasurably for thousands of young farmers, giving them a clear idea of their financial positions. Many Canadian farm organizations have answered the call in supporting Canfarm. I urge all farm organizations to take a very close look at what is happening with Canfarm right now.

I offer the same advice to all ministers of agriculture, both federal and provincial. The collapse of Canfarm is an option which is totally unacceptable and should not be entertained by anyone for a moment. The Canfarm co-op is under the outstanding leadership of Mr. Peter Hannam currently and holds the promise of many years of productive service, if it can be preserved. Its loss would not merely be a loss to the agricultural sector, it would be a loss for all Canada, given the intimacy between agriculture and the rest of the economy. There is pressure to have Canfarm continue. Numerous blueprints for its continuation have been proposed, and we must agree on one which is feasible to all parties concerned. Is it really necessary for me to point out that it is far simpler for us to strengthen Canfarm now than it would be to try to recreate it at some time in the future? With all the enthusiasm and influence at my disposal, I strongly urge all parties concerned to go to the furthest extremes to come to an agreement on the preservation of Canfarm. We want it and we need it. The common ground is there. It is up to us to find it.

Would the minister explain where we stand with Canfarm now? What steps has he taken as minister to try to preserve this very necessary organization?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Chairman, as the hon. member stated, it took a long time to develop the Canfarm organization. A lot of research was put into this program, mainly by Agriculture Canada before it was started. It has a lot of experience, but it has not enjoyed the support it should have from anybody other than Agriculture Canada over the period of time from when it started back in the late sixties.

Canfarm has not received the support it should have from the provincial ministers of agriculture, farm organizations or their leaders. Actually the support from some farm organizations has pretty nearly been nil, and from some provincial governments it has been less than that, if that is possible. Since the smaller provincial governments depend on Canfarm for services provided to them because they cannot afford to obtain them from anywhere else, it is important to the smaller provincial governments. They have received some lip service from some farm organizations and their leaders in the fact that they condemn the federal Minister of Agriculture and the federal government for letting down Canfarm. If I were a farm leader, I would do more than that: I would encourage the farm members of my organization to join.

We know the leaders of the UPA in Quebec. If it was not for this session in the House, I would be addressing them later this afternoon in Quebec City; it would be a pleasure to do so. I congratulate them on their efforts and what they are doing at the present time. They are seriously considering buying Canfarm. They say that they can provide 10,000 members for Canfarm in short order.

When we look at the Ontario Federation of Agriculture which claims to have 24,000 members, they would not even require half of that membership to make Canfarm, along with UPA, the tremendous success it must be. As far as I am concerned we have lived within the agreement made to them. We hoped that enrolment in two years would be close to 10,000. If it was at that break-even point now, there would be no difficulty with its financing etc., but Canfarm has only 5,000 members.

There has been some argument—and perhaps it has been legitimate argument—that the number of members we turned over were not real members. We said that about 8,000 members would be turned over to them, and they have pointed out that less than 5,000 members really belong to Canfarm. We know those figures are argumentative.

The break-even point for Canfarm is 10,000 to 12,000 members, preferably 12,000. The Canfarm co-operative service is under the direction of Peter Hannam, as the hon. member stated. He has tried very hard to come up with the proper program. We have lived up to the intent of the agreement. The money received was $1.2 million in 1979-80 and $1.2 million in 1980-81 and depended on the need and the progress of the organization. This is what we said we would do. Presently the financial resources of the co-operative are virtually exhausted. It may be necessary to consider closing down Canfarm and to finish the 1980 farm accounts by March, 1981. The options would be to sell the business, restructure it, or close it down with the decision taken in March or April of 1981.

Those people who feel strongly about Canfarm can make representations to my colleagues in cabinet, to other members of my party and to the leaders of farm organizations to have them come forward. I must say that some of the farm organizations have been very quiet, even under the desperate conditions facing Canfarm at the present time. All options require the loan guarantees to be paid, and we know it could cost us a substantial amount of money to close down Canfarm. We know it will cost quite a bit of money, if we try to continue on operating it under the present conditions following any of these options. All options require Canfarm to operate from now until December 31, 1980, at an estimated extra cost, above the $300,000 we just put into it, if I understand it correctly, of $570,000.

In addition, the costs estimates are as follows: at December 31, 1980, the close down decision is $1.7 million, for January-March, 1981. The sale of business up to January-March, 1981, is $1.7 million. Restructuring or close-down costs decided for March-April are $1.2 million in January-March, 1981, to $1.3 million in April-December, 1981. Total cost estimates of the December, 1980, close-down decision could be $5.8 million. The sale of the business could be $5.8 million. The restructuring or close down decision for March-April 1, 1980-81, could be $5.3 million. For 1980-82 the figure is $1.3 million. The total cost is $6.6 million.

If we had that kind of support for this organization then I agree with the hon. member for Guelph that it does warrant it. I am sure that I, as Minister of Agriculture, can sell a better bill of goods to the economic people in the Government of Canada on where we could go and what we should do with Canfarm.

I personally support Canfarm. I think it is a unique organization. I do not know of any other group of agricultural producers who have this kind of organization available to them. But it is at the stage where we must make a decision in the next few days with respect to what we will do. Unless I get more support than I have at present I will be in no other position but to recommend a close down of Canfarm, either at the end of December, or possibly the end of January, in order that they can finish up the year-end business somehow with a skeleton staff.

Mr. Thacker: Mr. Chairman, I was quite alarmed with what the minister just said vis-à-vis Canfarm. While I hear him blaming the farmers, the co-ops and the provincial governments, I think he will agree, in all fairness, that the government has entered into a three-year agreement with respect to Canfarm and it is really pulling out the plug after two years. That affects the degree of confidence which farmers have with respect to getting into the program. It seems a shame that the government would pull the plug now when Canfarm has just gone through a very extensive advertising program and when they have had accountants and agents in place across the country.

If I understand the minister correctly, I think he is saying that he does not have support from his cabinet colleagues. That ties in with my comments which deal with the role of the department vis-à-vis the Canadian budget—the cheap food policy of Canada and its effect on agriculture and capital gains tax and how that is dramatically affecting our farm community. I believe the reality is that the Department of Agriculture is not receiving the respect and support which it deserves from cabinet. I believe the minister has to bear the responsibility for that. I know how proud he is of his eight-year tenure at the helm of that department, but I think the facts speak for themselves. The department is being systematically downgraded by the cabinet, and we would like to help the minister get that reversed because it is not right.

I notice in the 1980 main estimates that the department had 1.75 per cent of the budget. After the supplementary estimates were received, that dropped to 1.35 per cent in this year alone. I think the minister would agree that is a genuinely alarming situation. I know from estimates in previous years that the departmental percentage was as high as 2.7 per cent and, indeed, I think it was 3.2 per cent in 1969-70.

I also notice in his budget that only $140 million goes to research. That figure is taken from his Lethbridge speech. It is only .2 per cent of a $60 billion budget. When you contrast that with over $10 billion spent on the deficit on debt charges, without reducing the national debt, that is truly alarming. So I ask the minister to give us his specific personal plans to get the department back up to its traditional levels of over 2 per cent of the federal budget.

The second area which he might want to refer to is this cheap food policy. I was quite alarmed to read in a number of Liberal members' brochures which were sent out to householders that they were bragging about Canadians spending the smallest amount of money compared with a number of other countries for a 21-item food basket. They quoted these figures: Canada spent $55.58 for that food basket compared to $80.58 for Italy, $105.40 for Switzerland, and $135.10 for Japan. Those same brochures pointed out how proud the government was that Canadians work a shorter period of time to enable them to buy that basket as compared with the time people in other countries work. Surely the Minister of Agriculture should not be seen travelling around the country bragging about that. This means his department and the people who look to him for leadership are bearing the costs. That cheap food policy does have a cost—the cost is borne directly by our farmers.

Mr. Chairman, the farmers pay in a number of ways. The first major way is that this cheap food policy can only be maintained by smaller farmers dropping away. When we look at the statistics we see that there are over 100,000 fewer agricultural holdings today than there were only a few years ago. So the cheap food policy is only maintained by farmers dropping away and larger farmers taking up land and buying up larger equipment, theoretically achieving greater economies of scale. Presumably that could carry on until we had only one farm left. That would be disastrous.

There are examples of where effectively there is only one farmer—these are in centrally-controlled socialist countries. When you go through the list of them you see that they have all lost, even though at one point they had the ability to feed themselves. They have virtually all lost that ability now, whether it be in Poland, Russia, or even Mexico. At one time Mexico used to export sugar in hundreds of thousands of tons. The moment Mexico went into a highly centralized and controlled bureaucracy it lost that ability. Now it must import sugar.

The solution, of course, is to keep our farmers on the land. Otherwise the cost is too great in terms of the farm community and in terms of the way of life in those places. I submit it is the job of the minister to see that this is encouraged. I would like the minister to comment on why he is not out selling this policy to the consumers. I have read all the minister's speeches, and some of them are very good, but almost invariably they are given to farm communities. Our Minister of Agriculture should go to the cities, not to the farms, to convince people that they need to pay more.

The third area which is quite important deals with capital gains tax and the impact it is having. I believe it is a time bomb which will affect food production in this country far more seriously than anything else we have done. Mr. Chairman, up to 1972 there had never been a capital gains tax imposed on land. It was before that time that we developed the infrastructure in our agricultural community which made this country a vast exporter of grain. Canada is only one of four nations in the world which is exporting grain. But after 1972 a capital gains tax was imposed on farmland and there was a valuation date set at December 31, 1971.

Serious problems have arisen to the extent that in the December, 1979, Conservative party's budget some substantial relief was provided. It did not go as far as many of us would like, but it was a step in the right direction. Then throughout the subsequent election, the Liberal party gave the promise that it would extend the valuation date from 1971 to 1974, but in the October 28 budget nothing happened. That election promise was simply and purely broken. I am wondering what the minister has to say on that matter.

The November, 1980, white paper indicates that there would be no change. Indeed, if one reads the capital gains white paper carefully, it clearly indicates that the Minister of Finance and his officials are thinking of taking away the capital gains benefits which exist now. I know the minister will refer to other nations, but I submit to him that other nations are not the test because other nations which have gone to those types of policies are losing their capacity to produce food, and why would we do that?

As I say, the problem is a time bomb. The December 31 valuation day is simply too low. We know from the statistical records that the value of our land, at least in my constituency, was substantially higher in 1968-1969. But because of economic policy and other influences, land had taken a drop in 1971 and it was at a low point when the valuation day was set. So really the minister's election promise of 1974 values would be much more realistic, if one were to accept the principle of capital gains at all.

The second point on capital gains which is so dangerous is the inflation factor because it has increased the value of land without there having been any real gains. In short, what happened during that 1972 to 1974 period when the minister's government, albeit perhaps not with his permission, turned on the printing press, and created so much money that it had to settle on certain things. Unfortunately, that excess money supply settled on land. So the value of land went up but the real gain was not there.

In the past, retiring farmers had always been able to sell their land, buy a house in the city and have a small nest egg. We have all heard that farmers live poor and die rich, but they do not really die rich because the average size of a farm in Canada today is still only about 400 acres, really a small unit. When a farmer sells land to buy a home and have a little nest egg on which to retire today this triggers the capital gains tax and he is unable to buy and retire to that home.

As a solicitor in southern Alberta, I can list dozens of examples of farmers who have sold farms and simply have been unable to purchase the homes which others had always been able to purchase before and retire. They are virtually forced to remain on the land or to take advantage of one of the rollovers. I know the minister has said that he is happy with the roll-over provisions and believes that they are generous. They are also a trap which is beginning to get the farming community into a very serious situation.

We all know that the spousal rollover is a deferral and that is a good idea to which nobody objects. The tax would be levied when the spouse dies. We also know that if there is only one child and the farmer wants to roll over his farm to that one child who is farming, it will defer the capital gains tax for another generation, and it goes on ad infinitum. If there is more than one child the same feature applies.

The problem arises if the farmer wants to transfer his farm to one child. At the 1971 value he can obtain a roll over of that sum but, as I pointed out earlier, the 1971 value is not enough money to buy a retirement home. But if the farmer wants to sell for more than the 1971 value, he must pay the tax. So, there is not a rollover. If the farmer sells to his son at greater than the 1971 value, the tax has to be paid. Or if the farmer takes from his son a sum greater than the 1971 value but they choose for tax purposes to roll it into the son's name at the 1971 value, ultimately when the son has to sell he must pay the capital gains, and he has already had to pay the cash to the father. So that is a very serious trap.

Because the value of land has increased so substantially, with no inflation factor, farmers are now finding that they are virtually forced to pay the tax so as to get cash in order to retire. It is a serious matter and I would appreciate the minister's comments on how he thinks that problem can be handled.

The most serious problem to which the minister must address his attention is the one where the farmer really wants the farm to go to a farming child, but there are other non-farming children whom he wants to treat fairly when the estate is settled. Most farmers today have daughters and sons who have left the farm. It is almost impossible to leave an equal value to the children who have left the farm. None of the roll-over provisions work under that condition, because if the farmer leaves it to the one farming child, he must somehow create equity for the other children. Invariably, they do not have enough cash to do that. The farmer does not want to leave the farm to these children because he wants it to stay intact as an efficient farming unit. What does the minister propose to do about that problem? It may seem to be a small problem at the moment, but one must consider what it will become in 50 years.

There is a solution. It is based upon an important principle which I hope the minister will embrace, and upon which I will appreciate his comments. We know that only 13 per cent of Canada's land has agricultural potential. We know that only 4 per cent of the land is class one or class two land. On a world scale, Canada has only 3 per cent of the arable land. Therefore, I submit, as a matter of principle, that it is immoral for us to be putting a capital gains tax on bona fide agricultural land. The basis of that principle is that we want to keep the land efficient to produce food. We want to retain the way of life of the agricultural community, and the world needs the food.

I submit to the minister that it is genuinely immoral for Canadians to be taxing agricultural land, just as it is immoral for us to be out in the world economy borrowing money which should be given to Third World countries. It is immoral for Canada to be buying oil on the world market when we could have our own policies for self-sufficiency. I submit that on a global scale it is immoral for us to tax the 3 per cent of the world's land which makes us an exporting country. And there could be a heavy tax.

The minister might want to consider that if the land goes out of agricultural production, then it is an appropriate time for the government to step in. This would lead to developers developing on class four, class five and class six land. It would tend to keep cities on these classes of land. But as long as the land is bona fide agricultural land, there should be no capital gains tax between the generations.

In order to give the minister some time to respond I now ask, why has the departmental budget dropped under the minister, why has the consumer paid less for food under this minister at the cost of the farmers who have had to leave the land, why has the minister permitted capital gains in the first place, and why has he permitted the Minister of Finance to break the election promise of the Liberal party concerning the valuation day date?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member has made many statements and some of them warrant comment. He has asked specific questions and he has commented on the laws which allow for the transfer of farm land from one spouse to another and from parent to child without taxation. No other country in the world has a law of this kind. It cannot be found in the United States, Great Britain, France, or in any countries on which we have checked.

I remember that Mr. Butz, when he was secretary of agriculture in the United States, said this kind of thing could cause a revolution in other parts of our society. I explained to him that the young man or woman who helped build the farm did not then have to buy it by paying taxes. That is a tremendous thing, Mr. Chairman. I know many people with families who farm who are not in a position to do that sort of thing—transfer the farm to a child.

In my own family, for instance, there were six sons on one small farm so there was no opportunity for the land to be turned over to anybody. We each purchased land on our own by doing jobs such as working in factories, share cropping and renting land.

I think our laws are wonderful. I would be surprised if people in the parts of southern Alberta that I know who have any size of holding at all, do not retire with some form of dignity, more dignity than would have been possible even ten years ago, from the return received for their farms. In that time farm values have increased by three of four hundred per cent. That means they have so much more money now although, of course, there will be capital gains tax to pay. As far as I am concerned, we have not finished with that yet. We have said that the valuation date should be 1974, but we can still have discussions on that. The matter is not finished as far as I and many other members of caucus are concerned.

Why is farm land selling at such high prices, Mr. Chairman? The real answer is because agricultural economics are good in Canada. Farmers are buying land because they want to farm it and because it is a good investment. We have one of the best systems in the world. We hear talk about large holdings, but it is still farm families who are buying the land. Two or three members of a family often combine to buy a quarter, half, or a whole section of land in their neighbourhood. We hear a lot about foreign ownership, but over 95 per cent of farms in Canada are owned and operated by families. Not many countries in the world can make that claim. That is one reason why our farms are so productive.

There has been much talk about a Canadian cheap food policy. Mr. Chairman, there are many farmers who never apply to me for any assistance whatsoever. They do not get a penny of our tax dollars; they get all their money from the marketplace. I am referring to some of the people on marketing boards, my prize projects. Those people are paying their bills and taxes, they are making investments and are not receiving a penny of subsidy.

That is one of the reasons why I do not need so much money in my budget. I do not have to give out tremendous subsidies such as those given to the pork producers this year which will amount to $46 million.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order which I have discussed with you and the appropriate persons in the government and the official opposition.

In accordance with the practice that has been employed three or four times in the last few days, each time the New Democratic Party is accorded 20 minutes we would like to split it into two ten-minute periods on the understanding that, if the first member goes over time, the second one is called at the end of a total of 20 minutes. I believe this is acceptable and, of course, we would agree to it if the other parties would like to do the same thing. In the next 20-minute period we would like to present the hon. member for Prince Albert, followed by the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain.

Mr. Collenette: Mr. Chairman, I understand from my colleague, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture, that this would apply to all parties. Is that agreeable?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Mr. Collenette: The 20-minutes period accorded to each party in a normal rotation can be split into two ten-minute speeches by each party if they wish. Is that the agreement?

Mr. Wise: On the same point of order, Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is correct. There has been consultation with us and we certainly agreed. We may not choose to divide our 20 minutes into two ten-minute speeches until, perhaps, eight o'clock. If it is the wish of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and New Democratic members to divide their 20 minutes beginning now, that certainly meets with our approval.

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Chairman, I have a point of order. Hon. members opposite make all kinds of accusations and put questions and I have no opportunity to answer. How am I supposed to answer that kind of discussion unless you leave me about an hour at the end of the session to answer a hundred questions? There must be about 40 already that have not been answered.

Mr. Ostiguy: Mr. Chairman, on the same point of order.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture on a point of order.

Mr. Ostiguy: Mr. Chairman, when the Leader of the New Democratic Party asked me whether it was possible, I said yes as far as the NDP members were concerned, but government members still want 20 minutes to make their statement and an opportunity for the minister to reply.

[English]

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: The matter now falls into two areas, the first being that proposed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre who proposed that each party internally regulate itself to distribute the 20 minutes amongst its members as it sees fit. That is rather different from what we earlier had in mind in the last couple of days, where the time period was distributed evenly in two periods of ten minutes each. I know that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre made it clear that it is a 20-minute time-frame and it is not going to be the responsibility of the Chair to see to it that it is divided within that time.

In that case, as the hon. member suggested, when the first member of a given party sits down and his time period has not been entirely used, if the House now agrees—and I shall come to that in a moment—the Chair will then recognize the next member of that party until the 20 minutes have been used up.

I can see some difficult problems arising. We may get to the point where some hon. members suggest that two minutes remain, or one minute remains, and we will be going around at a fair clip. But if that is the proposal that the hon. member wants to put and if hon. members are satisfied with it, that is fine.

Before I put it to the House, however, there is the matter raised by the Minister of Agriculture. It requires unanimous consent in order to move in the fashion proposed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I do not have an answer for the Minister of Agriculture. It has been noted in previous proceedings that some hon. members apparently put questions to the minister or, as he says, accusations, and then there is not enough time for him to answer. As I said on Monday, that is the way the rules now read. I cannot do anything about that unless some hon. member wants to propose a new system.

I certainly do not want to frustrate the will of the House. I think it is fair to point out that if the hon. minister is not satisfied with the proposal made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, he only has to withhold unanimous consent and the matter will not go forward.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, may I suggest that we try it until nine o'clock tonight and if by that time the minister has not been able to get in, we can review the situation.

Mr. Crosbie: On the same point of order, Mr. Chairman, I have a suggestion for a new procedure. Instead of Liberal members, when they have their turn, occupying it with self-congratulatory statements and nonsensical support of the government, they could give the minister some time to do the exact same thing. He would feel better and everything would go along more smoothly. One out of every three members is a Liberal, unfortunately. That is something that the next election will solve.

Mr. Collenette: Mr. Chairman, as usual, the hon. member for St. John's West has injected a purely irrelevant note into the debate. All members are equal in this House, and Liberal members have every right to question the Minister of Agriculture, as do members on the other side. I think the conduct in this debate by members on this side of the House has been exemplary. The record will show that members on our side have not made 20-minute speeches.

They have been asking questions and probing the minister in the same way as members on the opposite side.

The reason I rise again is to say that we are very flexible on this side, as we are in all matters. If it is the desire of one particular party to have more members ask questions, we would be flexible on that proposition. Perhaps we could reserve the decision for a moment and consult with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and the hon. member for Elgin so we can work out a system instead of using the valuable time of the committee. Perhaps we could come back in a few minutes with an acceptable formula which will not restrict the right of any one party to participate in the debate. The formula has been well established to allow members to use the time allotted to their parties.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, could there be agreement to let the hon. member for Prince Albert and the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain have the next 20 minutes, and in the meantime we can review the situation about the rest of the day?

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: It is my impression that matters have proceeded far enough along the lines proposed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. The hon. member is reducing the time as originally proposed to the House. It is my understanding that hon. members are ready to proceed on a trial effort of no particular duration.

I just want to remind hon. members that there is the possibility that with one, two or three minutes left in any given time slot, there will be various members who will rise wanting recognition. We can see that might cause some distress. However, it has been proposed by the hon. member that we try this procedure. As I understand it, all members who have stood for recognition have agreed to try the procedure without any particular time limit. This is subject to discussion, as the parliamentary secretary indicated, to see whether he is satisfied and others are satisfied that it will work well.

Mr. Collenette: Mr. Chairman, we have not agreed to any particular formula. I have asked that we wait for a few minutes so we can discuss the matter outside the chamber and come back when there is an agreement on the way in which we should proceed.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: As far I am concerned, that is exactly what I just said. We will proceed in that fashion and the Chair will be advised by hon. members in due course if a specific ruling is wanted. In the meantime, the Chair will recognize members in the normal way.

I shall now recognize the hon. member for Prince Albert. My apologies to him. The discussion was centred on the subject matter of his party so much so that I omitted recognizing the hon. member for Algoma, whose turn it is to speak.

Mr. Foster: Mr. Chairman, perhaps this will give hon. members a chance to work out the arrangement just discussed.

I believe the agricultural economy and the production of food is very important. In the next 20 years we will see acute shortages in many areas. Three commodities, minerals, energy and food, will be very important to the world. Food and the capability of a country to produce food will become ever more important. During the past decade we have seen great uncertainties for agricultural producers. These have waxed and waned in importance, but in my own district of Algoma-Manitoulin our agricultural producers have experienced periods of severe uncertainty. For example, the drought period of a couple of years ago and the very depressed prices for beef meant that producers and cow-calf operators suffered from 1975 to 1978. There have been tremendous increases in input costs which dairy producers are experiencing, including such things as the rapid increase in the price of land, fertilizers, fuel, machinery and help. These all add up to uncertainty about the future.

It is important that the Government of Canada and the associated provincial governments do their part in evening out these mountains and valleys for the agricultural producers. The Minister of Agriculture has visited my agricultural producing areas on a couple of occasions. He is always welcome and well received. We are glad to see him because it puts a personal face to the agriculture department of the Government of Canada as far as the agricultural producers are concerned. I know this role he plays is not only applicable to my district but it is also applicable across the country.

Last July I had an opportunity to visit a community in Saskatchewan where I practised for a number of years as a rural veterinarian. I attended the seventy-fifth anniversary of the town of Carnduff. The Minister of Agriculture was there as a special guest as well. During that period much of Manitoba and Saskatchewan was in the midst of a very severe drought. It was certainly the worst drought I had ever seen in the years that I visited or lived in that part of the country. I must say that the minister's visit was a warm and friendly one and it provided an opportunity for him to see severe drought conditions which existed at that time. In Canada we have regionalization in the political parties at this time with Liberals in northern Ontario, northern New Brunswick, Quebec and much of Ontario, but no government members west of Winnipeg. The New Democratic Party was essentially wiped out east of Oshawa, and the Progressive Conservative Party have only one member in the Province of Quebec. It is, therefore, important for ministers of the Crown to visit these areas where we don't have MPs because information provided by provincial governments and local members is often adverse. The minister does an excellent job of meeting with agricultural groups and this enables him to outline his department's programs.

In Saskatchewan in early July the minister had a chance to outline the drought assistance program for the beef producers which will help them to maintain their herds during the next few years.

When the minister responds, perhaps he could let us know the amount of aid which was provided to Manitoba, Saskatchewan and to northwestern Ontario in drought aid this past year, or what the amount is that is anticipated.

I have mentioned the uncertainties which many agricultural producers face with the rapid increase in inflation and input costs. One of those, of course, is the increase in the costs for fuel.

People who are concerned about the rapid increase in the price of food are cognizant of the steps which were taken in the National Energy Program to moderate the price of input costs for fuel for farm operators. This was a major issue in the February 18 election. If we look at a typical agricultural producer in western or eastern Canada using some 6,000 gallons of diesel fuel a year, during the course of the next four years, 1981, 1982, 1983 and 1984, we can see the added costs of the former budget brought in last December 11.

The added cost of the Crosbie budget, if we compare the budgets for those four years, would be approximately $780 in 1981, $780 in 1982, $2,820 in 1983, and $3,840 in 1984. We therefore see that the average agricultural producer who uses 6,000 gallons of diesel fuel would have an added cost with the December 11 budget, compared to the National Energy Program, of $8,220. If it were just a simple case of that cost being passed on to the producer, it would have a drastic effect on the cost of food. However, it probably would not happen that way. In actual fact much of that cost would not be passed on to the consumer but would have to be borne by the agricultural producer. With all the uncertainties he already faces and an added cost of some $8,000 over a four-year period, or some $2,000 a year, my guess is a large percentage of that would come out of the producer's income.

At the same time, if we look at the National Energy Program we see that the cost of natural gas over that same period would rise dramatically, 13 per cent in 1981, 17 per cent in 1982, 65 per cent in 1983, and 71 per cent in 1984. Natural gas, of course, is a prime component for nitrogen fertilizer. Again we would see agriculture producers facing a much higher input cost for fertilizer as well as fuel costs under the former budget of December 11 than with the price and tax regime outlined in "The National Energy Program." It is important that the input costs of agricultural producers be reduced by that amount, so that the consumers ultimately benefit. I would be interested in knowing if the Minister of Agriculture has assessed the impact on the food costs and the pricing regime for diesel fuel and fertilizer, comparing the National Energy Program price and the pricing regime outlined in the Crosbie budget of December 11.

With regard to the renewable energy portion of the National Energy Program, how much and what kinds of research will be carried out by the minister's department? There should be a massive increase in research on renewable energy. What amount of research will be carried out and on what specific projects with regard to biomass, gasohol, ethanol and other manufactured fuels under the renewable energy portion of that program?

There is another question I want to raise with the minister. A letter was sent out by the Ontario Milk Marketing Board indicating that severe and drastic changes are going to be made in the Canadian Dairy Commission policy at the end of this year. Will the minister clarify this situation? Representatives on the Ontario Milk Marketing Board from some areas of the province at least are expressing concern to their elected representatives. I would appreciate it if the minister could clarify that situation. The Canadian Dairy Commission policy has been beneficial to our agricultural producers, both in stabilizing and improving their net back position. I want to leave time for the minister to respond to the three or four questions I have raised during this period.

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Chairman, I first want to comment on the supposedly drastic cuts for dairy farmers in the industrial sector. In an answer during question period I said that was not true. I say again it is nonsense, especially when we consider the requests coming to us from other parts of the world to supply more dairy products. Prices are increasing for these commodities. The over-all position of the dairy industry in Canada is probably one of the healthiest in the world. Not only is the industry healthy, but also the total national herd. We are world leaders in exporting those great food machines, dairy cattle produced in Canada.

The hon. member asked what effect the extra energy costs will have on food prices for consumers. We have carried out some research which indicates that if we went to world prices for energy immediately, by 1985 food price increases to consumers will be as high as 35 to 40 per cent for that one reason alone.

Farmers face the same energy crises as other businesses. The 1980 prices for petroleum products paid by farmers increased by 17 per cent. Earlier the member for Elgin asked about energy costs. I was glad to hear the member for Algoma point out the savings in the period ending 1984 amounting to $8,220. I might point out it is not uncommon for farms to use 6,000 gallons per year. The hon. member for Elgin asked what kind of cushion we were providing. I say that is a pretty good cushion compared to what the Crosbie budget would have offered. We said we would attempt to cushion the rise in energy costs, and that is not a bad cushion.

There are other programs as well. Research is being carried out on renewable energy, biomass materials, the production of gasohol and alcohol from grain products. At the present time that appears to be uneconomic if other sources of energy are used to produce it, such as oil, stove oil, bunker oil, furnace oil or natural gas. If solar energy is used, there is some potential. The same applies to burning off gas, which is not presently being done.

Minimum research, or possibly more than that, has been carried out on farm tillage—for example, how much should be used on western grain farms. Fuel requirements can be reduced under proper conditions by over 30 per cent compared with conventional tillage practices. We know there are many areas where this can be done. Under the program announced by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, we will be working very closely with his department on a national energy saving program for food and food processing. By working in many small ways, it can add up to a significant saving.

I would also point out that in the food sector there has been a saving of 15 per cent in a little less than two years. That is an amazing feat of energy conservation. We see savings in farming come about through improved farm machinery, motor vehicle maintenance, and the use of low temperature crop drying systems. A farmer in my area, the former chairman of the Soybean Marketing Board, has invented a unique grain drying system, probably the most unique in southern Ontario, which does not use gas or oil for drying. It has been viewed by people from as far away as China. He gets a premium on this grain because it is naturally dried grain. Usually the only system he uses is air but on some occasions he uses electric heat bulbs. It is one of the most unique systems of all. There can be a tremendous saving on grain drying using this type of system.

• (1710)

In livestock production fuel consumption is being cut by improved insulation, ventilation, by the recovery of heat from exhaust air, by controlling livestock housing temperatures in heated buildings, and in other ways. Much feel has been wasted in the past. We are very proud of some of the things people are accomplishing with all the conservation demonstration projects on many farms in different parts of Canada. Funds for these projects have been provided by the Ministry of Energy, Mines and Resources. We do not know how successful some of these will be, but the ingenuity and the initiative taken by some of the producers in coming up with new ways and new ideas to save energy are utterly fantastic.

Mr. Foster: Mr. Chairman, I asked the minister if he had an actual indication of the amount of funding provided to Saskatchewan, Manitoba and to northwestern Ontario for drought relief assistance in the past year. Does the minister have an actual figure on the cost of that assistance?

Mr. Whelan: Yes, we do have the figures. In the first instance we said we would pay $7 million for transportation of forage into northern Ontario, Saskatchewan and Manitoba. Those funds were not all used. We then announced we would use moneys for herd maintenance programs. We said we would use over $60 million. I do not have the actual amounts of money paid out because it is not finalized. It appears we would be paying out a total of possibly $67 million or maybe a little less.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order, please. The parties have advised me that an agreement has been reached to permit any party, and in this particular case the NDP, to subdivide the 20-minute period into two ten-minute periods each. In order to do that it would require unanimous consent of the House. The parties have advised me there is unanimous consent of the House. Is that agreed?

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Chairman, I would like to take a few minutes to make some remarks and go over some questions that the minister has been asked. I realize the importance of agriculture in our economy. I listened carefully to some speeches that were made yesterday by members of my province. In fact, from time to time we probably share the same interests and the same problems when we speak of Quebec and agricultural measures.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to tell the minister at the outset that I will probably be less aggressive than I was five years ago when several of my colleagues shared my preoccupations and those of farmers, particularly in the dairy industry in Quebec. Yesterday, the parliamentary secretary explained the background of the agricultural development in Quebec and his comments about the direction of agriculture in Quebec and the rest of Canada were interesting and useful.

Still I would like to refer to the document that all members have received and question the minister, given the interest also shown by farmers in my riding, not to mention milk producers, potato producers, tobacco producers and horticulturists. So agriculture plays an important part in the economy of my riding.

Many farmers are concerned about their future and they have made it known in the brief presented recently by the dairy farmers of Canada to the minister and the department. Yesterday the member for Champlain, I think, talked about a rumour to the effect that the government was intent on putting an end to these subsidies of $2.66 and the minister said that he was not aware of any such recommendation. I would have preferred him to say that no such measure was being considered and that milk producers would continue receiving these subsidies.

The minister said a few times since the beginning of this debate that he regretted not having time to give answers. I am going to try to give him time to answer for the official record. He may rest assured, Mr. Chairman, that I will convey his answers to the farmers of my riding and that Quebec farmers will also be interested to learn about them.

Could the minister tell us right now if these subsidies to dairy producers are not going to be maintained?

[English]

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Chairman, I have told two hon. members today, one during the question period and just recently the member for Algoma, there is no truth to that whatsoever. The Treasury Board has approved the program as of Monday this week for this coming year.

[Translation]

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Chairman, I should like to thank the minister for his reply.

The dairy farmers of Canada are also concerned. In 1975, the federal government announced the implementation of a policy to increase prices comprising a formula for adjusting the income of producers to production costs.

Can the minister tell us today whether or not this policy will be maintained over the long term, since the dairy farmers of Canada stress the importance for the government to commit itself to helping producers over the long haul? Can the minister assure dairy producers that formula pricing will be maintained? For how many years will it apply? I am not sure I can put the question to him in those words, but it does seem that the dairy farmers stress the need for a long-term commitment in that regard.

[English]

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Chairman, if only all agricultural producers in the world had been served as well as the dairy producers have been served under the Canadian dairy policy. I know of no other group of dairy producers in the world who have the kind of long-term dairy policy Canadian producers enjoy. It is one which has been there for many years. It is reviewed every year and unless there is going to be some drastic change they would be notified in due time. There is no suggestion by the dairy producers or by the government at this time that there be any kind of change. It is under review. It is an agreement we made when we established the long-term dairy policy that it would be reviewed from time to time and that is being done at the present time. They would have to go over all the workings and ramifications of this dairy policy. Almost everyone who examines the dairy program run by the dairy commission is complimentary.

We have had people from Japan, from France, from Switzerland, from West Germany come to see this program which is managed so well. I think we are the envy of the world. In practically every other part of the world where dairy production is of any significance there are problems which supersede ours. They are mismanaged in every way imaginable. Even Japan has dairy surpluses and does not know what to do with them. Ours is the best managed of any dairy program in the entire world.

• (1720)

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Chairman, the minister has said time and time again that Canada has the best system in the world. I am not in the mood to discuss that at this time; I am merely concerned with the interests of the dairy farmers of Canada. His colleagues, I am sure, agree with me and would like to know whether or not the government intends to maintain the formula pricing. I do not want the minister to tell me again that he has the best system in the world. We know things are working out reasonably well at this time. I merely want to know, for the benefit of the dairy farmers of Canada, which comprises all dairy producers in the country, whether the government intends to keep the formula. The minister did say "unless there is going to be some drastic change" so right away dairy farmers worry. So, I would like him to tell us whether or not formula pricing will be in effect for one, two or three years. That is the question of the dairy farmers of Canada; it is not mine, Mr. Minister.

[English]

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Chairman, as the hon. member knows, formula pricing has been here since 1975. I do not know if the hon. member is trying to create discontent, trying to start a rumour or what have you, but no one has suggested that formula pricing should be changed, not this minister nor any other minister in this government, as far as I know. There has been no suggestion that formula pricing be changed.

People in other parts of our society have a much more fixed situation than do the dairy farmers of Canada. When we give them formula pricing, it is not any greater than in many other parts of our productive society, nor even some parts of our society which are not so productive with respect to indexing the cost of living for senior citizens, people on disability pensions and others. The formula pricing we have for our dairy farmers is better than that in any other part of the world. The hon. member asked me not to repeat that, but I do so because other parts of the world do not have such a good system for their dairy farmers.

[Translation]

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Chairman, I can appreciate that the minister would give me the same reply as earlier. I do not want to alarm the producers or the Canadian population. My question is very simple. The dairy farmers of Canada hope and wish the minister will maintain this formula pricing. They said so, as the minister is well aware. I simply wanted to ask the minister if he could tell me what he will be able to do for them. Will he maintain this formula pricing this year, at least for some time? I do not know. However, I believe the minister could tell me.

I know that this formula has had good results since 1975. I know all that, but dairy farmers would like to know whether the minister can guarantee that this formula will be maintained and for how long, or at least, I imagine that they would like to be reassured that this formula will still be applied in 1981. If the minister can provide further reassurance, so much the better for dairy farmers. In other words, I am asking the same question once again. Can the minister tell us whether this formula will be maintained in 1981?

[English]

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Chairman, yes.

Mr. La Salle: This reply is very satisfactory, Mr. Chairman. I really like a minister who can provide such answers. I would like to note, Mr. Chairman, that after the contribution made by certain members yesterday, I also had the opportunity to ask certain questions of the minister about the subsidy for pork producers, who include pig fatteners and weaner pig producers. One of the members, I do not remember which one, either the member for Champlain or the member for Chicoutimi, mentioned the delays in receiving these subsidies. I do not want to ask any question of the minister about this, but I simply want to say that I have also received complaints in this regard and I imagine that, after hearing the comments made by my colleagues opposite, the minister will take some action to try to reduce the waiting period for pork producers as concerns the subsidies. Of course, I am happy that the minister has reacted to the representations made concerning the situation of pork producers.

There is another question I would like to bring to the attention of the minister, Mr. Chairman. I have read today in the newspaper that there is a surplus of maple syrup. Perhaps maple syrup producers would be interested in learning whether the minister is aware of this surplus, which is of particular concern to Quebec, as it seems that it could mean losses for producers who would have to store surplus syrup. Moreover, according to the international institute, there seems to be a budget problem for promoting maple syrup. Could the minister throw some light on the subject today?

Is the department prepared to increase allocations for promoting maple syrup? Could the minister tell us whether he would be willing to recommend a moderate budget for promotional purposes so that the producers and the association can dispose of this surplus and also of the maple syrup production they will have in a few months? Perhaps the minister could throw some light on the situation for the information of maple syrup producers.

For the moment, the one who is wasting the time of the House is the minister. He is robbing me of my allotted time.

[English]

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Chairman, we are aware that producers in la belle province had a very good crop of maple syrup last year. We are trying to find figures for the hon. member, but we give producers interest-free advance payments for their maple syrup so that they can properly supply the market. I am not aware whether there is a problem at the present time in marketing the product. I understand it was of high quality. It was on the market at a fairly good price. We advance the moneys so that the producers do not have to sell their product in a distressed market, so that the product does not have to seek a home on the market and so that speculators are not able to take advantage of the maple syrup producers.

We do not have the figure in front of us at this time, but I have received no representations from maple syrup producers in the last few months to my knowledge, so I am taking for granted that things are going as they had projected and hoped. If the hon. member has any information which is contrary to that, I would be pleased to have it, but I have not received any representations along those lines from the official organization representing maple syrup producers.

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Chairman, according to a press release I have here from the International Institute of Maple Syrup Producers—which the parliamentary secretary will no doubt provide him with—there is four times more maple syrup than usual for this time. Under the circumstances, it seems to me that that surplus creates a problem. Perhaps we should consider an advertising campaign and perhaps the minister could ask his officials to look into the possibility of selling a part of this maple syrup outside the country.

But my time is going fast, Mr. Chairman, and I also want to voice to the minister my main concern regarding this sector and that is the question of younger producers who are expected to carry on. We must recognize that this industry is healthier today than before and we have reason to be optimistic, but we must also recognize, as others have indicated, that considering the cost of farms, it is difficult nowadays, even though the lending facilities are there, for a young would-be farmer to buy a farm because of the interest rate, which is also true for other areas. Interest rates represent a prohibitive cost and jeopardize the future of farming for the younger generations. They can also discourage the young from going into debt because there are years when production is not so good. I do not have any solutions to propose to the minister but I would ask him to consider seriously this concern by young producers, this reluctance on their part to go into debt to buy a family farm.

Today, because of their cost, farms are often sold to foreign interests. There has been a change in outlook and values such that the children have a harder time maintaining the family farm, because of cost and interest rates. The minister could therefore consider implementing a specific policy to help young producers become owners and keep the family farm, a policy dealing with these interest costs which are a terrible handicap for the young who are interested in farming.

The minister is perfectly aware of the long-term situation, in any case, and I think that here and now we must concern ourselves with the interest cost problems those young people will have. I could raise the same concerns about the present situation of small home owners. The industry itself is concerned. The subject being agriculture, let us not stray from it. I try to be very objective in my approach, Mr. Chairman, because those are comments we often hear from young farmers who are wondering where the obligation to borrow sums of $150,000 or $200,000 is leading us. At the same time, we cannot help but think that that will indirectly affect production costs, and consequently, the consumer will be directly affected. In the circumstances, I take this opportunity to invite the minister to consider seriously this problem and the future of our young people in agriculture. It is important that young people get increasingly more interested. Some are interested, but the opportunities are limited and right now, in view of the present economic difficulties we all know about, I think interest rates weigh heavily on the future of agriculture. I ask the minister to give the matter serious consideration and try in any case to bring forward a policy that will encourage young Canadians and help them choose agriculture.

I do not know, Mr. Chairman, whether I have a few more minutes—

An hon. Member: One minute.

Mr. La Salle: I have one minute left. I shall give that last minute to the dear minister who has too often complained he did not have enough time to answer. I hope he will seriously consider that last point I made, assistance to young farmers, the commitment to them, and funding is the way. I understand the minister's difficulties, but would he also understand the problems those young people face?

• (1730)

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Chairman, I just want to say that in different parts of Canada there are different kinds of agricultural production, but in la belle province, from which the hon. member comes, the production entity is there. There is only one which I can think of, perhaps two, which does not have some kind of cost-pricing formula. For every dairy farmer who wants to sell out in Quebec, there are three young farmers who want to enter the business, and they are protected with the cost-price formula for interest rates, etc. There is a subsidized form of interest rates for young farmers in Quebec.

To put the record straight, Mr. Chairman, let me say that we have more young farmers percentagewise in the business. The average age of young farmers entering agriculture is the highest since 1951, if I remember the figures correctly. I do not have the exact percentages but there are more young farmers in agriculture now than many people realize. Those are people who have graduated from agricultural schools and university agricultural courses. We have a higher percentage of those young people entering agriculture now because of the good programs we have established for them.

Mr. Hovdebo: Mr. Chairman, first I want to make a couple of comments, and then I will put my questions on a particular area.

Several times in the last three days I have heard it said that 20 years ago one farmer could feed 30 people. Now one farmer feeds 55 people and 20 years from now one farmer will feed 200 people. I am concerned about that approach because the implication is that farmers are becoming more efficient and productive. Possibly they are on an individual basis, but not a great deal more food is being produced per acre of land. I just wanted to make that comment to start with. I think we should watch what is happening so that we do not push too many of our farmers off the land, saying we have very efficient farmers because one farmer can feed 200 people.

Last year has not been a particularly good year for farmers. In the west we started out with a drought which lasted, in certain parts of the west, until the fall and which affected hay crops in particular. The result was that farmers did not have the kind of feed available to them that they had expected. Also, it pushed up the price of hay for feed in the west considerably, in some cases to twice the price it had been the previous year. Also, prices increased for other products and equipment, as was well documented at the Outlook conference last week. The price of fertilizer increased by 15 per cent. I am using ballpark figures because I did not take note of the exact figures which were given. Fuel and fuel-related costs increased by as much as 20 per cent to 24 per cent, depending on what was included in that category. Wages increased by 10 per cent, machinery increased by approximately 15 per cent, interest costs increased by about 20 per cent, and farm land, depending on the location, increased from 20 per cent to 50 per cent.

The effect of those increases was that the real income of farmers in the last year was reduced by 3 per cent. Actually, the reduction is greater than that because that included a certain reduction of inventory as well. We should put these increases in costs against the income of the farmer. The price of grain has gone up in the last little while but, owing to lack of attention on the part of the present government and the former Conservative government, the actual income to farmers from grain was considerably reduced. Also, the price of beef has not increased sufficiently to cover the cost of production, and the price of hogs dropped considerably.

On the whole, farmers have not been doing particularly well in the last year. although the Minister of Agriculture often says that he is in favour of orderly marketing, we cannot be quite sure of that. We seem to go to the free market and every time we do it does the farmer harm. For example, let us consider the embargo. If we had gone to world markets during the time of the embargo, the income of farmers from grain would have increased by a considerable amount in the last year. However, the embargo was imposed.

The principle of compensation for losses suffered by farmers as a result of the embargo has been established by the Conservative government and the Liberal government, and the Prime Minister even made a statement in that regard. Since the spring the government has been working on compensation studies. The minister said that the compensation document would be ready by the end of November, and November has long gone. I am just wondering what is the status of that document. Does the minister have any sense of urgency in this matter? I have referred the fact that costs have increased and incomes have gone down, partly because of the embargo maintained by the government.

On August 23 the minister reponsible for fitness and amateur sport announced that Canadian athletes who were barred from competing in the Moscow Olympics would receive:

—a program of assistance that will facilitate their further education, as well as the development of alternative career possibilities . . . The assistance intended will take the form of actual tuition fees pursuant to normal Canadian standards and related educational support of up to $200 per month during the academic year.

That commitment was specific. It indicated the level of support and delivered on the promise which the federal government made to the athletes of Canada. If the government can do this for the athletes, can it not do it for farmers by naming the crops to be covered and the range of compensation in dollars, so that farmers can make their plans, knowing the specific period of time they can expect that compensation? Can the minister give those specific undertakings now? I will give him an opportunity to answer before my ten minutes are up.

A lot of studies are being conducted, but I should like to ask the minister some questions dealing with the embargo. When will we hear about the embargo? How much will the compensation be? How did they arrive at the figures? If those figures are not adequate, may farm organizations make submissions to the minister in order to give their understanding of what compensation should be paid?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member talked about the incomes of farmers being down. We recognize that, and I have stated that. Their net incomes are down 3 per cent, but they are still in a very substantial net position. Also he talked about the price of beef not being high enough. Of course, the over-all production of pork had a depressing effect upon the price of beef, poultry products and every other meat product. Pork was sold on the market below the cost of production. It was distress selling and the sale prices had the effect to which I refer.

Also the member referred to the embargo and to compensation to farmers who may have lost income because of the embargo. The embargo was put in place by the previous government. The document which I hoped would be finished by the end of November is now ready for signing. It will be signed and submitted to cabinet for consideration in the next two or three days. I cannot tell the hon. member what the document indicates until it has been seen and considered by cabinet. As far as I am concerned, we intend to live up to what we have said. As I said the other day in the House, we do not intend to welsh on any agreement made by the previous government; this is one we said we would fulfil.

Mr. Deans: Mr. Chairman, I will hurriedly dash through my comments in order that the minister might respond. I am really looking for some support from the minister for the farm machinery industry. Those of us who are concerned about the health of the farm machinery industry well appreciate the difficulties of farmers at the moment in even replacing their machinery as this becomes necessary.

I had occasion to look at some of the statistics which have come out in recent months. The most recent were released last Monday and showed quite clearly that farm income is not keeping pace with inflation. In 1979 the cash receipts of farmers were $14.1 billion. In 1980 they had risen to $15.3 billion. Unfortunately they do not afford farmers the opportunity to maintain equality with their 1979 position. In 1979 the net real income of farmers was $3.61 billion, but in 1980 it was only $3.49 billion. In 1979 the interest on the debt load, which includes the debt load on land, was $1.33 billion, but by 1980 it had risen to $1.5 billion.

I have put those figures on the record because I think it is important to understand that in 1979 the amount paid by farmers on their debts for land and equipment equalled 36.1 per cent of their net real income, but by 1980 this had risen to 42.9 per cent, that is, the interest on the debts. Therefore, I well appreciate that Canadian farmers are facing serious problems in trying to plan their future purchases, as reflected in the downturn in the sale of agricultural machinery and implements.

The Canadian market is a substantial one. The 1981 market for farm machinery in current dollars is anticipated to be $2,068 million, which is a substantial sum of money. The Canadian demand in terms of North American production of farm machinery is 15 per cent, but Canadian production of North American farm machinery is only 9 per cent of the total North American production.

I suggest to the minister that we desperately need his voice in the efforts being made to resolve this dilemma. I do not deny for a moment that the farm machinery and implement industry—Massey-Ferguson in particular—is its own worst enemy. One of the primary reasons for the current position of Massey-Ferguson is poor management. It was not well-managed in the seventies. I think even its management today will admit that that is true. However, certainly it would be to the detriment of Canadian farmers if we allowed that industry to disappear and fall by the wayside, because there is no doubt that the cost of imported farm machinery in Canada would be substantially increased if we were not manufacturing at all. While one might want to turn to Massey-Ferguson and say, "It is your own damn fault", the truth is that not only would the people employed in that industry suffer, but farmers across the country would suffer in the long run with no industry producing farm machinery in Canada for Canadian farmers.

Recognizing that poor management played a substantial role, we must also recognize that exorbitant interest rates faced by farmers, as well as by other people, are inhibiting when they attempt to plan purchases in coming years. It is also a severe inhibition to Massey-Ferguson to redevelop the company in a satisfactory and reasonable way.

Of course, what I said earlier about the decline in farm income is also an inhibition to planning for the orderly growth of the industry as it attempts to meet the needs of farmers. I think a farm machinery and implements industry is essential for Canada. There is no question in my mind that the contribution made by that industry to this country is substantial. I think the farmers of Canada need an industry here which can meet their needs. I believe farmers in Canada are concerned about what will happen, in terms not only of replacement of machines, but of replacement parts for the machines which they presently own. I am looking to this minister to accept that it is in our best interests as a country, and in the best interests of the farming community as a whole, to attempt to find a way to rationalize that industry, together with other similar industries, to try to come up with one rationalized, intelligent, competitive and supportable industry in Canada. I think it is also in the best interests of the economy of the country to attempt to do this.

I would therefore ask the minister if he has given some thought to what, if anything, the government might be prepared to do to be of assistance. I ask the minister if he would be prepared to support at this time a task force made up of parliamentarians and also of people from the farming community and the industry itself to take a look at the farm machinery industry in Canada. They should take a look at how it operates, whether or not there is the need, which I suspect there is, to see whether there is a rationalizing process which can take place and whether or not there is a way in which we can fund a newly developed farm machinery and implements company in Canada which will be able to meet the need of the farmers, while at the same time meeting the needs of the workers who are presently faced with difficult times ahead.

I wonder if the minister could indicate whether he would be prepared, as Minister of Agriculture, together with the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and anybody else who is interested, to establish this task force now. I ask the minister if he is prepared to make this task force representative of this House of Commons, representative of the farm community, of the industry itself and of the financial community, and to set it a task. The task is to find a way to rationalize the industry in order that it will work in the interests of the farmer and of the Canadian economy, and to try to put together a package which will guarantee that we will not be paying exorbitant prices for imports in years to come for machinery which we could well have been, and ought to have been, manufacturing In Canada. Because of inadequate management over a number of years we have lost that manufacturing to foreign holdings.

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Chairman, I would like to say a couple of things, and I notice you are pointing at me indicating that I have only two minutes.

With respect to the farm machinery industry, when the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre corrected me the other day he was right; all duty on farm machinery was removed and there was free trade on farm machinery in 1944. That then started the dislocation of the farm machinery industry in Canada.

Mr. Knowles: I was here for it.

Mr. Whelan: The multinationals moved in and decided they were going to centralize production here and centralize production there. As a result, we do not have a really good farm machinery industry in Canada. My colleagues and I have had discussions, such as the one the hon. member has talked about, and we have had discussions with our counterparts in the United States to the effect that this industry must be divided properly and proportionately, at least in North America. I believe it should be better than the auto pact is. But it must be that kind of thing.

We can point to some parts of the Canadian farm machinery industry which are pretty healthy, such as Versatile Manufacturing in Winnipeg. The hon. member asks how we have helped the farm machinery industry. It may not have been in a magnanimous way but we helped Co-op Implements who were not out of the bushes economically. We loaned them nearly $9 million and arranged other co-op credit societies to become involved to keep them going. They are on an upward trend but they are not out of the bushes as far as economic problems are concerned.

I agree with the hon. member about the problems which Massey-Ferguson has. The other day I was talking to some people and I said I could have done as good a job as the president of Massey-Ferguson. I believe his salary is $272,000 a year. I said I could have done as good a job for $252,000 a year, and I do not think that would be an exaggeration.

Mr. Deans: I could have done it for nothing.

Mr. Whelan: I am told that they did not even have a vice-president in charge of sales for Massey-Ferguson. Mr. Chairman, we do not sell farm machinery, farmers buy it. It is the same in the auto industry. The last Chrysler car I bought, I had to make an appointment to buy it.

Mr. Deans: Would you consider a task force?

Mr. Bossy: Mr. Chairman, as this is the first time I have risen to speak in this chamber, I would like to take this opportunity to make hon. members aware of the area I represent. I am pleased to participate in these discussions concerning the budgetary estimates for the Department of Agriculture. I represent a constituency which is the county of Kent in the most southern part of Ontario, in fact, the most southern part of Canada.

Kent is the most productive county agriculturally in all of Canada. In fact, some of the highest quality farm produce grown in the world is harvested in Kent. In the year 1979 Kent county alone produced agricultural goods worth $227 million. Farmers in Kent have achieved the highest average yield per acre of all farmers in Canada in the growing of many crops, including corn.

At this time I will state a few statistics which I have here. We average 100 bushels of corn, soybeans 38 bushels, winter wheat 62 bushels—hon. members from the west will be interested in that figure—barley 63 bushels, and oats 84 bushels. We also grow tobacco and many vegetable crops, such as tomatoes, sweet corn and cucumbers, which are among the highest quality grown in Canada. Much of this achievement must be credited to the research and development which has been conducted by the federal Department of Agriculture.

Since the world's population is ever-increasing, foodstuffs will become more scarce and more valuable in the future, I have great difficulty understanding why the budget for the Department of Agriculture is only 1.3 per cent of the total federal budget. We must be willing to commit larger amounts of money, especially in the area of research, to fulfil our obligation to feed Canadians and the needy peoples of the world.

The agriculture industry employs the largest number of persons directly and indirectly compared with any other industrial sector in Canada. Agriculture should be receiving a much larger percentage of the federal budget.

Mr. Chairman, I would also like to make a few comments on the importance of transportation to the agricultural community. Agriculture is an industry which deals almost entirely with perishable products, which includes livestock in transit. Having travelled across Canada this autumn with the committee on transport, it was made apparent to me just how inadequate our transportation system is with regard to the movement of these perishable goods. Certain functions of the Department of Transport should come under the guidance of the Department of Agriculture. This should occur particularly in such areas as the shipping of potatoes, wheat, cattle, corn, soybeans and so on. No one knows better than the Department of Agriculture what types of cars are needed, whether they should be grain cars or refrigerator cars, the number of cars, what effect freight rates have on the price of the product and the amount of the subsidies. This would mean a great deal to the farmer when competing with producers from outside Canada, such as those of the United States.

I want to say to the Minister of Agriculture that the formulation and implementation of a Canadian agriculture export corporation has been long awaited by farmers throughout Canada. Many countries of the world would be interested in buying our farm products and taking advantage of our technical expertise in the agricultural industry if there were only salesmen out there promoting us. I am positive that we are missing many sales because of the absence of this type of corporation. We promised this assistance in the election campaign and the farmers are asking for it now. Since it would be in the best interests of the country, I believe we as a government should deliver on that promise.

The Minister of Agriculture is owed a debt of thanks for impressing upon the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources the necessity and importance of classifying primary food production under the category A rating of the Energy Supplies Allocation Board. This is the highest priority rating for the supply of petroleum products in the event of an emergency.

While farmers generally accept the fact that fuel prices will increase, they are hoping that much time and effort is being put forward in the development of alternative energy sources. I can think of such fuels as gasohol, which can be used extensively throughout the farming community. Canadians are expecting much to be done in the research and development of alternative energy.

I would emphasize to the minister that a great hardship has been put upon farmers by the current high interest rates. Farmers in my area are faced with extremely high input costs and they have large mortgages due to the unrealistic price of farm land which has been caused by foreign investment. The price for land in my riding of Kent at the present time is in the area of $4,000 to $5,000 per acre. Anyone connected with the farm scene knows that present prices and revenues derived from agricultural products would barely pay the interest and there would be very little left to pay for fertilizer, seed, sprays, fuel, equipment repairs and equipment replacement. I feel that the federal government should initiate a short-term relief program to enable the farmer of Canada to survive this interest rate crunch. The story has been told of the farmer who, when asked after winning a $1 million lottery what he would do with this winnings, replied that he would continue farming until it was all gone. We must not let that happen.

I think a few words of explanation are owed to the consumers of Canada. As was announced this week, food prices will be rising. I want to point out that the farmer should receive very little of the blame for those rising prices. Farmers receive a very small percentage of the market price for most of their products. It has been suggested that even if farmers gave away their wheat, the price of bread on our markets would not drop. As mentioned yesterday by the hon. member for Lambton-Middlesex, Canadians continue to pay the lowest prices for food in the industrial world. These low prices would not be possible were it not for the efficient and effective agricultural practices employed by the Canadian farmer. I am sure that if the industry which handled our agricultural goods was equally as efficient and effective, food prices in Canada would be even lower.

I would like to ask a question of the minister concerning the Farm Credit Corporation. He indicated yesterday, I believe, that changes were in the works in regard to the amount of money which may be allocated to the corporation. At present there are very few loans being approved. Speaking on behalf of the farmers in my area, many of whom have indicated to me that they have had to refinance, the amount of money available through the Farm Credit Corporation is inadequate. Would the minister comment, please?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Kent and the hon. member for Hamilton West have mentioned the amount of interest which farmers must pay to borrow money. The Farm Credit Corporation's current rate of interest is 12.75 per cent. That is an enviable lending rate compared to what other people in society are paying. The highest rate of interest charged by the corporation was in the early part of the year when it was at 13 per cent. In 1979 the rate was 12 per cent and before that it was 10.75 per cent. It has been 10 per cent, and in 1959 it was 5 per cent. When one considers the earning ability and economics of agriculture, a 12.75 per cent interest rate in 1980, as compared to the interest rates that producers in other countries are paying, is not that bad.

I cannot deny what the hon. member for Kent has said about the need for more money within the Farm Credit Corporation. There seems to be a need for unlimited funds in that corporation, and I wish we were in the position where we had unlimited funds. But when one looks at the amount of loans made by the Farm Credit Corporation to farmers in 1980, one will see that they total $358 million. In 1979 we made loans of $349,262,000. The amazing thing about this is that the loss in 1979 was so small that it could hardly be measured. The record of payment was excellent; .002 per cent. It will be about the same for 1980. Such an insignificant loss on the operation of the Farm Credit Corporation indicates a profit on the lending aspect of its operations.

I was amazed, Mr. Chairman, as were some others, to learn that as a Crown corporation the Farm Credit Corporation pays income tax on its profits. It is one of the few Crown corporations to do so when it finds itself in that position from time to time. Originally the Farm Credit Corporation was set up as a lender of last resort—the lender who would advance money to people when all other lending institutions had refused.

An hon. member referred to the difficulty young people have in borrowing money. If we think back to when the interest rate was 5 per cent and remember that the average wage at that time was about one-quarter what it is today, we can see that the present interest rate has not been a factor in inhibiting the efficiency of farm operations.

I repeat what I said earlier, that the number of young people entering agriculture today is not as insignificant as some would have us believe. I hope that I will have more accurate figures available later this evening to show how many young people have entered agriculture in the last ten years. It is more than most people realize and I am happy to see it.

I know it is not as difficult to enter agriculture as it was when as a young man I tried to buy a farm. I did not have the advantage of the different types of programs that are available today, such as interest-free advance payments. The county of Kent and the county of Essex, where I live—it could be argued which county produces the highest quality food—together produce more food than some of the poorer provinces do, in dollar value. They have the heaviest concentration of agriculture of all kinds of nearly any spot in North America, except one place in California. When earning power was low it was difficult to pay even 5 per cent interest. Now that earning power is higher and interest is at 12.25 per cent, things are not as difficult with the help of the Farm Credit Corporation and interest-free advance payments, which mean that a commodity does not have to be sold when the market is low. It can be stored and sold when the market is right. The young farmer today is not faced with the disadvantage of distress selling.

The hon. member for Elgin, who is a former minister of agriculture, spoke about research. This is one of the reasons that Kent county is so productive. The hon. member mentioned that he had increased the budget for research but, Mr. Chairman, it is interesting to go over the figures and find when the biggest increase in the budget took place. There is not much difference but in 1976-77 $109 million was spent. I believe it was the hon. member for Lethbridge who said that $140 million was spent on research this year. Mr. Chairman, in 1979-80 $142.6 million was spent. The figure for 1980-81 is $155 million, an increase of $13 million. It was $117 million in 1977-78 and $133 million in 1978-79, which is the biggest increase for research in the past five years. So I can claim fame as well as the former minister. I increased it more at one time and then he increased it at another time.

We believe that research is important, Mr. Chairman. It is important that we have more money available for it and it is also important that we have more money available for farm credit. We hope to introduce new legislation early in the new year which will give the Farm Credit Corporation the authority to go outside government as they see fit to raise funds when the need arises.

Mr. Hargrave: Mr. Chairman, I want to say initially that I think this is the first time in the eight years I have been in the House that the Department of Agriculture has appeared before this rather unique Committee of the Whole House. I am sure we appreciate the attendance of the minister for these two long days with his support staff, both on the floor of the House and in the gallery. I think it is most appropriate that they are here and we do appreciate it.

I am sure I will not surprise anyone in this House when I say I would like to put some comments on the record that deal with my favourite area of agriculture, the Canadian beef cattle industry. I want to confine my remarks to the current year which is just winding down, 1980. These are personal remarks, Mr. Chairman.

Let me begin by saying that 1980 should have been a good market price year—I emphasize should—if only because of the position of our beef cattle cycle. Our breeding herd numbers—cows and replacement heifers—are only now barely beginning to increase. This phase of the cycle was expected to begin two or three years ago. That extension of the low part of the cycle must have caused all kinds of problems for the statisticians and people who make projections for any industry, especially the cattle industry.

Beef supplies in 1980 were not burdensome. In fact, they were down, at approximately 91 pounds per capita, at least 22 pounds per capita below the peak years of 1977-78. But 1980 was not a very good year for most cattlemen, both producing cattlemen and feeders. In fact, it was disappointing for five contributing reasons or factors.

First, and perhaps most important, we had an all-time record of supplies of competing pork and poultry. For the first time in our history, Canadian pork production exceeded, or will exceed, Canadian beef production. When that statistic came to my attention for the first time, I found it rather hard to believe. It is an indication of what supplies can do. For a while, live hog prices were as low on a per pound basis as one-half, and sometimes even less, of live fed steer prices. It is no wonder that pork consumption jumped and beef prices failed to respond to lower beef supplies as they traditionally do.

The second factor was the western agricultural drought. The minister has heard me comment on this many times both in this House and in committee, so I shall only say that it was very severe for the first six months of this year throughout most of western Canada. This followed the previous winter drought that produced none of the snow moisture that is so needed in western parts of this country in order to start spring growth and, in my own case, to start grass and begin the growth of hay crops. During April, May and June significant numbers of short yearlings, steers and heifers, had to move into feedlots. Normally they would not move until the fall of the year. Six months earlier than is the normal practice a lot of them had to be moved because of the drought situation. Even cows and calves were beginning to move to the market. That is most unusual in the early part of the growing season. There was no incentive whatever to hold back additional replacements.

When the rains finally came they were too late to make a hay crop. I am referring now to the traditional source of hay on cattle ranges that comes from flood schemes, small irrigation projects and so on. They had no moisture from snow to start the hay crop. There simply wasn't any; the rains came too late. In my own case, we put up about 5,000 bales, not the new big ones but the traditional small bales, when a year ago we put up about 45,000. That is an indication of what the half drought year did to us.

The third factor is interest rates, which have erupted twice this year. The first time they went from about 11 per cent to 18 per cent; that was last spring. Now they are back up to 15½ per cent. The realization is apparent, that they are still rising. It was these record high interest rates which caused cattle feeders to sustain their heaviest losses ever. No wonder they are gun-shy now.

Fourth, the beef cattle industry reflects the North American recession. I hate to say it, but I suggest we are still in it. We have high and rising unemployment, double-digit inflation and a very real slowdown in consumer incomes resulting in weakened consumer demand.

Fifth, we have steadily rising feed grain—especially barley—prices in Alberta and corn prices in central Canada. That, along with those interest rates, made the first half of 1980 a disaster cattle feeding period. Not only is that true in central Canada, but certainly in the west. They had a terrible half year in the feed lot operation. I doubt if they will completely recover by the end of this year.

Those five contributing factors have combined to shake our confidence as producers and feeders in our total cattle industry in 1980, and this is happening soon after that four-year price disaster of the mid-1970s in our cattle industry. In my opinion, the most visible and serious implication of the lack of cattle industry confidence is the two to three-year delay in the beginning of the breeding herd build-up across Canada. I refer now only to the beef cattle breeding herd.

Only last Friday in Calgary, at a one-day agricultural task force conference sponsored by the Canada West Foundation, when dealing with the ten-year outlook for Canadian agriculture in the 1980s, Jake Brown, the University of Saskatchewan dean of agriculture, a very highly regarded man, made the statement that it is highly unlikely that Canada will be able to move away from a net import base for beef by 1990 because of the lack of confidence in the future of our Canadian beef cattle industry.

The Minister of Agriculture was at that meeting. He must surely be aware of this lack of confidence. The minister was luncheon speaker at that meeting, but he probably did not hear Dean Brown's comments. I commend them to him. I hope he carefully examines the complete task force report or at least requires his staff to do so, as it is a fairly big report. It is very current and deals with the outlook for the decade we are now entering.

There are a number of other moves the minister might consider to restore that needed cattle industry confidence. For example, there is some unfinished policy direction respecting the federal drought policy. The minister will recall that the $67 million drought program covering herd maintenance and livestock fodder procurement was to benefit the western drought regions and, to quote an earlier statement about the drought, "parts of Alberta" would be eligible for these benefits.

It now seems that in Alberta only the Peace River district and an area around Camrose qualify for the herd maintenance program. Under the federal fodder procurement program, by definition most of Alberta will not be eligible. I regret that very much. I say to the minister, don't tell me that we in Alberta should not qualify because the rains finally came a little earlier than they did in Saskatchewan and Manitoba, which indeed they did, or because we have our wonderful irrigation system. As already indicated, in southern Alberta those welcome rains brought life and growth back to our grass, but I repeat, they never made a bale of hay.

Partly because of the subsidized hay costs, mostly for transportation, our choice irrigated alfalfa from Brooks and Taber and many other irrigation areas sold at $100 to $150 per ton before trucking charges were added. I am making the case for federal transportation assistance in Alberta, at least on a cost sharing basis with the Alberta government. I remind the minister there is between $5 million and $10 million of unspent and unallocated moneys in these two programs. I also remind the minister that his cabinet colleague, the minister of state responsible for the Wheat Board, said in Regina on August 8 that all moneys allocated for drought assistance would be spent on drought assistance. He said and I quote:

> We're fully committed to pay the full amount . . . We will see what portion of the $60 million we have left and we will consult with livestock producers as to how we will pay out the balance.

The minister's new meat import bill should help stimulate some new confidence. I compliment the minister for bringing it in at this time. It is a program which we on this side have proposed for a number of years. We in the Conservative party have always supported the need for a beef import law in Canada. We chose to use that term. We fully support the countercyclical feature and the omission of live cattle, pork and canned meats.

I have some personal concerns about such things as some of the ministerial discretionary powers that are proposed, and with respect to the usefulness and make-up of the proposed advisory committee. However, I urge the minister to bring in the bill for second reading debate as quickly as possible. It is important that we have a good short second reading debate and get the bill into committee so that we can have the benefit of solid input from Canada's beef cattle industry.

There is one other most important and related item. I question the need for the GATT related requirement for the human population growth factor in the determination of meat import quotas. As I understand its operation, it is applied every year. The removal of this requirement would be a clear signal to our cattle producers that the minister does indeed care, and at least some long range incentive would be returned to us to get out and produce enough cattle and beef to be self-sufficient in Canada. We are not in that position now.

Further, this is the time of year for the annual calculations of our beef import quota levels for 1981. It is my understanding that the current year levels which were determined a year ago assumed a breeding cattle herd for 1980 that was too high since, as we know now, our breeding herd build-up has not really begun, at least in significant numbers, as I indicated earlier in these remarks.

Will the minister make a correction for the 1980 formula level in calculating the 1981 quota levels? On this basis, the Canadian Cattlemen's Association indicated the new quota level would be in the neighbourhood of 146.6 million pounds. This level also agrees very closely with the traditional one-tenth relationship to the United States beef import level. One-tenth of their figure of 1.45 billion pounds comes to 145 million pounds.

However, the basic criteria that we should be following in Canada, and one which would be acceptable here, would make our protection equivalent to the offshore import protection of the United States. That is the important guideline. One-tenth of the American level would indeed do that and would be acceptable to our industry.

I have reviewed the Canadian beef cattle situation for the current year only and have cited evidence of and reasons for lack of confidence in both the short and the long-term outlook. I can assure the minister these are very serious concerns.

In closing, I submit most emphatically that our free market system for cattle in Canada is not a factor or part of the problem I have outlined, even though there may very well be some newer producers in the cattle industry who may feel that way. I want to remind the minister about my specific question concerning western drought and the portion of it dealing with the eligibility of parts of Alberta. His comments on that would be appreciated at this time.

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Chairman, on the drought situation mentioned by the hon. member, we have made provision for the funds we said we were going to provide. The total funds we are going to provide for drought relief, I believe, are $67 million and this money will go to the people in need. At the present time, for the herd maintenance program there are 35,000 applications. What the hon. member is asking is if we would consider transportation costs in the province of Alberta. One of the predicaments we ran into on that is that when we first talked of drought assistance, the minister of agriculture for the province of Alberta said they had no drought and needed no assistance.

An hon. Member: Not true.

Mr. Whelan: I am sure the hon. member remembers that later he said we did not provide any assistance for Alberta. I told the hon. member they have the right to appeal on any of these programs we have. The appeal board is being set up at the present time but how quickly it will get into operation, I do not know. We are setting up an appeal board with representatives from Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba and northern Ontario. The herd maintenance program is administered by another ministry, not by mine.

The transportation cost of fodder in Manitoba was not nearly as high. At one point we had allocated $1.6 million for Manitoba. The accumulated amount of money spent to date is only $368,766. For transportation of fodder into Saskatchewan we had allocated over $1 million, and it has now cost $435,163. In northern Ontario the allocation was $400,000 and they did not use anywhere near the amount of money for the transportation of fodder.

The hon. member referred to the beef import law. I do not pretend that that law is the answer to all the beef producers' problems. He mentioned earlier the price of beef and the price of hay. That was a free market system probably working at its worst and not its best. It made some operations uneconomical and they were in a position where they had to purchase barley and hay at exorbitant rates.

Mr. Hargrave: It's the weather.

Mr. Whelan: There was not a great dispersal of cattle according to our figures. I do not have the total figures past the end of September, 1979. There has not been the dispersal of cattle that people said there was going to be on account of the drought. Because of the programs we initiated we did instil some confidence in them. The hon. member answered his own question when he talked about the low price of beef because of overproduction of pork. Pork was sold at distressed prices and depressed the price of beef. Again, that is a free market system which is ill-managed, ill-supplied to the market and sold on the market at distressed prices. Beef did not resume a position where it would get a price which would afford a proper economic return to the beef producers. So we had high stocks of poultry, high stocks of pork and reasonable stocks of beef in Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. Gingras: If I may, Mr. Chairman, I would like to share my time with my colleague from Roberval. Since coming here I realize that my Abitibi constituents are interested in a number of areas. We have seen that energy resources like electricity, wood residues, mines and the tourist trade are part of everyday life in Abitibi. Obviously, farming has been from the outset its raison d'être, and still is a very active industry. We have farmers in the beef industry, in the chicken industry, and in the dairy industry, producing either whole or industrial milk. Quotas for natural milk are regulated by the Régie des marchés agricoles, which means they are under Quebec jurisdiction. The milk goes to the pasteurizing plant and is thereafter consumed without further processing. The price is set by the Régie. Production is regulated to avoid possible overproduction that would drive prices below production cost.

I will not say anything further about whole milk, it being as I said under the Régie des marchés agricoles, to supply the province's domestic market. I would like, however, to deal with a matter of interest to this House, which is the production of industrial milk under the Canadian Dairy Commission. Mr. Chairman, in Abitibi, in Quebec, our cows produce two types of milk. I understand they are now changing not the cows, but the system under which some cows produce whole milk, a provincial type of milk, and others produce industrial milk that is under the jurisdiction of the Canadian Dairy Commission.

Some farmers, Mr. Chairman, have versatile cows. One day they give provincial milk and the next they give federal milk, when they have enough. I cheer up, Mr. Chairman, because I think they will soon be integrated. Mr. Chairman, I insist and say once again that the Canadian Dairy Commission system has proved to be essential for the stabilization of producers in Abitibi. Before 1963, the dairy industry was in pitiful condition. Following the suggestion of the dairy industry, the government set up the Canadian Dairy Commission which has been operating since then and is a vital instrument for the co-ordination of the dairy industry in Canada.

In July, 1980, Mr. Chairman, you stated the concern of the government about the allocation of quotas in some areas of the country. I know that several producers feel that their milk quota is an integral part of their heritage. It is normal that the milk producer should see in the allocation of quotas the only way to sell his product and he gives it a commercial value. We should not forget that to have obtained the assurance of selling his product is solely the result of a good and healthy national dairy policy. This is the first question which I would like to put to the minister: Following his press release of July 1980, could the minister specify his concerns about the fluctuations of those quotas?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Chairman, the Canadian Dairy Commission sets a national quota with the market supply management committee. They set a national quota, and that is distributed to the provinces. How it is distributed in the provinces is up to each separate and individual province.

The hon. member says the quota is a valuable thing and that some farmers feel it is their heritage. That is right, but very few provinces have the same system for pricing valuations on quotas. Industrial products are distributed freely across Canada and marketed freely across Canada, and then they are marketed on the world markets by the Canadian Dairy Commission. Some provinces have one class of milk. The hon. member said there are two kinds of milk. I was glad he clarified that. He said there is federal milk and provincial milk. In the province of Quebec there is probably more of a distinction between producers in one class and the other, although it is intended that they be put into one class. We say they should all be first-class Canadian high quality dairy producers because we now have better quality milk produced in Canada than we have ever had.

All I can say about the quota value is that I am concerned—whether it be for dairy or whatever—that there must be better control. However, we at the federal level do not have the authority to say what the quota should be for a producer within a province. We can recommend and suggest, as we have done, to the dairy farmers of Canada from time to time.

I do not know what more I can say at this time. As I said, the provinces do not have this, but when we look at quotas within the commercial industrial society, we see the same thing with respect to a taxi licence. If one tries to establish himself in the taxi business in the city of Ottawa, he will have to pay a very high price just to get a licence. There would be a quota to have one taxi. We have to be fair to producers who have bought quotas also. However, I have told the Canadian Dairy Commission to ensure that quota values are examined very closely. The chairman of the Canadian Dairy Commission himself has made two or three representations about which I know, to the dairy farmers of Canada to try to make sure that these quotas are kept at a realistic level or, if they are above a realistic level, that they return to a realistic level. Somehow they must be managed so that too few people do not get control of them. When young farmers want to get into the dairy industry when other farmers sell out, quotas should revert to the provincial milk marketing boards, as is the case in some provinces. It is then reallocated at reasonable rates to young people entering the dairy industry, or to anyone entering the dairy industry.

[Translation]

Mr. Gingras: Mr. Chairman, at the convention of the dairy industry held on October 20, 1980, the chairman of the Canadian Dairy Commission estimated that the value of quotas would push the price of dairy products up by 10 to 15 per cent thus making them no longer competitive on export markets. The producers of the province agree with the present marketing policy. The chairman of the Canadian Dairy Commission suggested in his speech that unless the provinces implemented a new policy he would make it a point to recommend a different policy under which the value of quotas, as applied now, could no longer exist.

The minister assured the House this afternoon that the Government of Canada is willing to renew the stabilization program including a subsidy. Is the minister willing to increase that subsidy of $6.04 in 1975, seeing it is now really worth only $3.46, in 1980?

[English]

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Chairman, we have no intention of increasing the subsidy because the subsidy for dairy farmers has stayed constant. Under the pricing formula we use, money comes from the marketplace, and that is the place from which it is intended to come. I would like to be out of the subsidy business. There is no doubt about that. We were removing subsidies from the dairy industry several years ago until the world price of industrial products collapsed. We then had to move in and save the dairy industry by renewing subsidies. At one time the subsidy was down to $111 million for industrial milk producers in Canada. We took the stand at that time that we must receive the return for dairy products from the marketplace. Many people do not understand that there is no subsidy for the whole milk we drink, but there are subsidies for industrial milk producers who have to compete in world markets. Our subsidies are not high when compared with subsidies in other dairy-producing countries, and I refer especially to European countries.

I am well statisfied with the Canadian dairy policy. Our producers are about the best off in the world. I am sure our producers would like to keep the program the way it is since the formula price makes adjustments for changes in costs and for changes in the cost of living. Industrial milk producers know they are being fairly treated. I do not think it is necessary to index the subsidy, as some have suggested, as long as we have formula pricing. As I said earlier to another hon. member, I approve of formula pricing. This is the kind of system we have in many other parts of our society. If it is good for other parts of society, I do not see why it cannot work for dairy farmers.

Mrs. Beauchamp-Niquet: Mr. Chairman, as member of Parliament for the riding of Roberval, I accepted the responsibility of representing and serving the whole population of that riding which is located north of Lac-Saint-Jean, an area that also bears that name. The main industries in the riding of Roberval are primarily those which depend on our wonderful natural resources, our forests. Indeed, three pulp and paper mills and several sawmills belonging to companies of international repute are located there of which, Domtar at Dolbeau and Mistassini, and Donahue at Saint-Félicien. Also, in Desbiens, there is a Saint-Raymond Paper plant which is currently experiencing production and profitability problems. The second industry in Roberval is agriculture. I will therefore take the opportunity today to deal with a matter which is close to my heart.

All Canadian farmers are faced with the same problems and difficulties. My constituents are no exception. I suggest that most farmers would be even less successful were it not for the help, the encouragement and the knowledge of their wives. I am neither a farmer nor a farmer's wife, but I have had the opportunity, within many organizations, to meet people from rural communities, and I want here to pay a special tribute to the farmers' wives who are perfectly able to operate their own farm or that of an ailing or deceased husband.

According to a study conducted two years ago by the Canadian Council of Rural Development, a woman spends an average of 29 hours working in the fields and in the farm buildings, keeping books and doing odd jobs, in addition to the 53 hours she spends on housekeeping duties. She is working, therefore, the number of hours required for holding two full-time jobs, and for that, most of the time, she never gets paid. Because of the increasing number of men who are working full time or part time away from home, many women must replace them on the farm. Moreover, some of them, albeit a few, operate their own farms. Yet, the contribution of women to agriculture in Canada is not properly recognized.

As the Minister of Agriculture so eloquently stated before a large group of farmers' wives gathered for a convention here in Ottawa last week, and I quote:

I must recognize that men have not always been willing to give women a more visible place in agriculture. Also, we have not exactly encouraged women to seek management positions in national organizations such as the Canadian Federation of Agriculture and the Agricultural Union. It is high time the situation changed. Your participation in this convention is indicative of the fact that women want to be recognized as equal partners and have an input in the decision-making process, as they have the right to.

Mr. Chairman, I agree with the minister's statement and I should also like to remind the House that the AFEAS movement in Quebec has had a great part to play in the case which was brought before the provincial and the federal governments, namely, that of the right of women to a fair salary as partners with their spouses in the family business or farm.

I should now like to give a few statistics on milk producers in the western part of Lac-Saint-Jean. In my riding, there are 113 dairy farmers. Between August 1, 1979 and July 31, 1980, there were 21,937,476 litres of milk produced, 37.59 per cent of which was category 1 milk and the rest going to cheese factories. Mr. Chairman, when we speak of cheese in my area, we automatically think of Perron, from Saint-Prime, because this has been a family tradition for a hundred years now. As a matter of fact, the dairy industry started around 1880 in Saint-Prime, in the constituency of Roberval. At the beginning, they only made butter but in the last few years they added cheese making. That cheese factory received milk only four or five months a year. Then, cheddar cheese began to be exported to Quebec.

In those small plants there was no power supply and no electric lighting. Everything was made by hand. That industry developed slowly until 1955. Then because of centralization, 110 small plants had to close down in the area. Everything was centralized in Chambord for butter, cheese and milk powder. However, in 1963, Mr. Albert Perron, the present owner of the Saint-Prime cheese factory bought his father's plant dating back to 1895. In 1968, the plant was completely rebuilt, and in 1980 production reached the astonishing level of 15 million pounds of processed milk a year, which makes, 1.5 million pounds of cheese. I want to emphasize the fact that the Albert Perron Company Inc, won in 1970 the first world prize for cheddar cheese at the Royal International Dairy Show in London, England. In 1976 and in 1979, it won the Lys d'Or in Montreal and in Quebec City.

Mr. Chairman, I have given the historical background of that industry in my constituency because I sincerely believe that its administrators are serious and that they deserve support. Each year the plant faces a serious problem, namely, a short supply of milk, and consequently it cannot meet the demand of its customers.

Mr. Chairman, I would like some information on this subject. Is it because of poor milk quota distribution, and has the government considered developing an incentive program to encourage winter as well as summer production which would solve the problem, or has it considered subsidizing the cost of transporting milk from oversupplied to undersupplied areas? Of course, in addition to dairy and cheese producers, there are also pork, beef and cattle producers in Roberval constituency. As I know that my time is limited, I shall talk about these producers some other time. I am aware that the Canadian government provides assistance programs for these producers, and I shall come back to this matter on another occasion. I would like to congratulate the minister on the recent appointment of three women to senior positions on the Farm Credit Corporation advisory committee.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Beauchamp-Niquet: I would like to add very briefly, Mr. Chairman, that these women will prove worthy of their appointment because of their ability and their qualifications and will contribute to the improvement of the quality of life in Canadian rural communities. I had two questions I wanted to ask the minister, but he has already answered them. First of all, as far as the subsidy is concerned—

The Chairman: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but her time has expired.

[English]

Mr. Neil: Mr. Chairman, I have a series of questions for the minister, the first one of which has to do with the capital gains tax, a subject which was touched upon by my colleague, the hon. member for Lethbridge-Foothills. He spoke about the capital gains tax in some detail and he explained some of the problems which farmers were encountering when faced with this tax.

I might say to the minister that the capital gains tax has done a great deal to inflate the value of farm lands in the prairies. It is not uncommon for an elderly farmer to come into my office and ask me what it will cost him in capital gains tax if he disposes of his farm. He is usually very frank about it and tells me that what he will do is to add the amount of the capital gains tax to the selling price of the land. So not only do we have a situation where the ordinary inflation appreciates the value of farmland but we have, in addition, the capital gains tax which adds still further to the cost. In many cases this is quite a substantial amount per acre.

I recall that in the election campaign earlier this year a news conference was held in the city of Regina by the Liberal party, with a great deal of fanfare. It was indicated at the news conference that, if the Liberals were elected, they would be prepared to change the valuation day from 1972 to December 31, 1974. Every Liberal party candidate in western Canada went from meeting to meeting advertising the fact that this promise would be carried out if they were elected. Of course the promise was never carried out.

● (1900)

Mr. Whelan: Nobody in western Canada believed them because they did not vote for them.

Mr. Neil: They will have fewer people believing them because of broken promises. Recently the provincial Liberal party indicated that as long as farmland remains farmland, no capital gains tax should be levied on the sale of that land.

Bearing in mind the promise made in the last campaign, could the minister tell me what is his party's position at the present time with respect to capital gains? What is the minister's personal opinion? What steps is he taking to see to it that farmers will gain relief from this oppressive tax?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Chairman, my opinion has not changed since the campaign that we should have valuation day from 1974. It is still under discussion. It is not too late to do it.

Mr. Neil: If such a change is made, could the minister indicate whether it will be retroactive?

Mr. Whelan: I cannot say that at this time.

Mr. Neil: Will the minister do everything in his power to see that it is made retroactive?

Mr. Whelan: The hon. member can be assured that I will make those kinds of representations.

Mr. Neil: I hope the minister will take steps at the next meeting of cabinet to impress upon his colleagues the importance of dealing with this subject.

Turning to the subject of the western grain stabilization plan, I believe the minister is jointly responsible for it. In the debates when the plan was proposed, when it went through committee stage and passed Parliament, I recall that the then minister who was putting the bill through indicated that it was the intention of the government to set up the plan in such a manner so that payments under the plan would be made in the spring of the year in order that farmers would have money available to start their seeding and spring work. As each year goes by, the decision on when a payment should be made under this plan becomes later and later in the year. For example, this year no decision was made until some time in November.

I realize the plan makes use of Statistics Canada to determine whether or not there will be a pay-out, and that the cost to the plan of Statistics Canada gathering this information runs at some $1 million. In committee a proposal was put to the government whereby the computer of the income tax department could be used to gather the information and to determine very quicky—perhaps within a month or so after the returns were filed—whether a payment should be made.

In view of the fact that each year the decision as to whether or not a payment is made becomes later and later, is there any intention on the part of the government to review the procedure by which information is gathered in order to determine what are the facts for the pay-out?

Mr. Whelan: All I can say is that we want to be as efficient as we possibly can. It is an embarrassment to the ministers concerned with the program that we are not in a position to say, within one month of the year end of the grain marketing season, that we are able to make a decision. We had hoped that it would be swifter, but it does not appear to be. I cannot answer the hon. member other than by saying that we will continue to try to ensure that it is swifter, because a continual delay is not to our advantage; it is a political embarrassment.

Mr. Neil: Certainly it is not to the advantage of producers not to know or not to get paid until some time in the fall. If the minister is concerned, certainly he must be taking some steps to determine the reason for the delay in gathering the statistics used to determine whether or not there is a pay-out. Would the minister ask some members of his staff to read the minutes of the Standing Committee on Agriculture when the bill was before it and to consider our proposal which was placed before the then minister, Mr. Otto Lang, to see whether or not it could be used to speed up the procedure with respect to the western grain stabilization plan? Will the minister undertake to do that?

Mr. Whelan: I will be meeting the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board tomorrow, and I will discuss it with him at that time.

Mr. Neil: Turning to another subject, yesterday the hon. member for Kindersley-Lloydminster questioned the minister with respect to the sale of 30,000 tonnes of barley in the east earlier this year. I have read the comments of the minister as reported in Hansard of yesterday's date. A short time ago one of the commissioners of the Canadian Wheat Board, Mr. Forrest Hetland, was reported in a publication entitled "Land" as saying:

> "Look, we're shipping western barley into Ontario and Quebec to keep that market supplied, and we don't want their growers shipping barley out to the stronger markets." The board saw that starting to happen early in the summer but doesn't have direct control over marketing outside the prairies. It does, however, have authority to grant export and import permits for all Canadian barley, and it simply refused to grant any until domestic supplies were assured.

Then of course cabinet overruled the Canadian Wheat Board and the minister said yesterday that he was not in Canada at the time. He was out of the country, so he was not party to the discussions which took place. As reported in yesterday's edition of Hansard, the minister said:

> —because I do not know, and I cannot find out what the traders were able to accumulate as a profit. I am told if a profit was made it was not passed on to any of the producers.

Then he went on further to say:

> If the traders made an unwarranted mark-up on it, this is the kind of thing that makes one angry.

Could the minister tell the House to whom the special permits were granted for the export of this barley? If they were given to traders or grain companies, it would seem to me that the reason for doing that was because they had an oversupply of barley in stock; they did not want to lose money; and they prevailed upon cabinet to allow them to recoup some of their loss. If this is what happened, in effect it was a subsidy by the producers of western Canada. To whom were these permits given, and for how much?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Chairman, normal sales take place and even under the embargo normal sales took place. If you will check there has always been, for at least the last five years, normal sales of Ontario barley outside of Canada. They asked for a permit for 30,000 tonnes. They accumulated approximately 15,000 tonnes, which was just shipped out in the last week to ten days. We have no way of knowing at what price.

● (1910)

I know one of the companies was Cargill and I am waiting for the name of the other companies. You quoted Mr. Hetland of the Canadian Wheat Board as saying that they shipped and they must supply grain to that market. I want to make it clear that the Canadian Wheat Board has supplied no barley to eastern Canada since April. The barley which was shipped to eastern Canada came from off-board barley. There was no on-board barley shipped down east at that time. This is a matter which is of concern to us and to the barley producers in Ontario. It is of concern to the barley producers all across Canada. But we must look at the insignificant amount that it was compared with total barley production and barley sales. Mr. Hetland was right when he said that we must look after them because the biggest consumers of feed barley are Canadians—80 per cent of all feed grains are consumed in Canada. They are the biggest customers and the ones which must be looked after.

We know that long-term barley sales have been made. I am sure the hon. member knows that the long-term barley sales which have been made were not that high priced, but the Wheat Board and the people who made these long-term sales would have been condemned if they were not doing that type of thing. They could not foresee that there was to be a drought and poor crops in China and Russia. These conditions were putting unwarranted kinds of pressure on top of the marketing ability, for the supply of that product. This put a tremendous burden on the over-all program for barley. Mr. Hetland was right when he said that you must supply that market because it is your best and biggest customer. The other people in the world may move in and out of the market as it warrants.

Mr. Chairman, I am coming back to long-term sales because they will show that they have been sold at lower than current prices. The pooling will show there will not be a big final payment on barley because those sales were made over a long-term period, something in the order of three years, when barley and corn prices were not as high as they are now.

I want to say that hon. members made no comments about what I said yesterday about making those same kind of long-term deals with the Canadian Livestock Feed Board makes. They will not only serve what you call eastern Canada, but one of the biggest users of that grain is British Columbia, which depends on that kind of grain. We are not just talking about people in the eastern part of Canada, we are talking about people in the western part of Canada who depend upon that grain also under that same pricing.

Let us be fair. If it is to be good for somebody in the Middle East or in Europe to buy barley under those conditions then it should be good for the biggest consumer of all feed grain produced in Canada, the Canadian livestock and poultry producer. Let him or her have that same kind of agreement and that same kind of contract.

Mr. Neil: I would just like to say that the minister has indicated that one of the shippers was Cargill, and I assume that there may have been one or two other companies which obtained permits to ship. It would seem to me that, therefore, it was not the producers in Ontario who were making the money but it was the grain companies. In other words, Cargill and the other grain companies had a surplus of grain in Ontario. The price, undoubtedly, would drop because of the surplus they did not want to sell at a lower price, so cabinet went over and above the Wheat Board and allowed Cargill and others to sell it on the world market at the expense of the western grain producer. I ask the minister if that is not a fact.

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Chairman, I would say it is at the expense of the Ontario barley producer, who always receives less for his barley than the western barley producer; it is always $20 to $30 a tonne less than western barley, in Ontario. So if there was a mark-up, and we do not know that for sure, it is estimated it could have been anywhere from $40 to $45 a tonne. It was a conglomerate of grain companies. There were four I am sure: Cargill, Richardson, Continental, and Northern Sales.

I can say that the representation was made to me, not by any of those grain companies, but by the provincial ministry of agriculture in Ontario on behalf of their barley producers. Not one grain company made representation to me and I know of no grain company making any representation to anybody else. They may have been the ones which made that kind of profit. As I said yesterday, that is a very bad thing because producers would not make that kind of profit in two, three or four years of production. They would not make that kind of profit per tonne.

The marketing system we operate under seems to be the one which the hon. member's party condones, that is, a free market system working at its very best. If you do not want that system, tell us then that you abhor it and that you want us to put everything under the Canadian Wheat Board. That is what the Canada West Foundation said the other day. They said, "Have it all under the Canadian Wheat Board, or all on the free market system." Maybe that is what we should be doing. It seems to me no matter how fair you try to make this system work it just seems to add more confusion to it. They are complaining about what the Russians may have made under a long-term contract—maybe it was 100 per cent they were making profits on—but nobody seems to say that about the foreign buyer. They are talking about what has happened right within our own country and I come back, Mr. Chairman, to the fact that those people of ours who are feeding their stock with that grain are our best customers. They have been there forever and they will be there forever. We can even improve things and make it better for them when we get Canagrex into operation.

Mr. Neil: That was quite interesting, Mr. Minister, but the fact remains that there was a profit made and it appears that it did not go into the hands of the producer.

One short question. The minister is aware of the Prairie Farm Emergency Fund which has some $9,066,000 on hand, which is producers' money. He is aware of the need for research. He has been given the means of using this money for research and I am wondering what his position is, because every day that goes by the producer is losing $3,500 in interest.

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member knows I agree in principle with what he wants to do. I said so before I went on my sabbatical, when I was minister before the short sabbatical I took. Well, I have not changed my mind on that. I think that money should be for the benefit of western farmers, for western research. Lord only knows, the hon. member knows as well as I, that we could use that $9 million so well. We have a bit of a dispute as to whether we should just turn it over into a fund with a committee to administer it, etc. But we are ready to move on that very quickly. Whether we can make a proper agreement with the hon. member or whether he can accept my bill when it comes to the House is something we will have to see, but we will work for the good of the farmers on this, I know.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Chairman, I must say that the words of the minister of late are very interesting. I suspect that a number of us on this side of the House have become strong advocates of the sabbatical system and would certainly encourage him to continue with it.

The particular topic before us tonight has provided one of the most interesting debates I have read in Hansard and sat in on for a long time. It is a topic which touches all of us very closely. Indeed, it touches citizens right around the world whether they be young or old, rich or poor, living in eastern or western Canada or in any other part of the world. I suspect that people are very concerned as never before as to what the future holds with regard to the current trends in agriculture, food production, and the direction of the entire food industry.

Many people are wondering about Canada's role in this industry. One hears a great deal about petropower and nuclear power and the whole concept of agripower. The whole area will be of greater interest to us as Canada plays a greater role in feeding the world population.

Over the years Canada has been proud of its accomplishments in the area of research and development. Indeed, scientific inquiry originating in Canada has led the way in many areas. Many Canadian inventors and scientists are known around the world for their accomplishments in the world agricultural community. Yet the budgeted funds for research and development in agriculture are less today than in the past. It is important that Canada keep up in this ever-changing field where many people around the world are experimenting in such areas as new strains of grains, new types of beef production and new ways of growing vegetables. It is important that the government make a commitment to research and development, not for two years or five years, but for 25 years. Only then can we tell the scientific community that the commitment is there and young people can train in our institutions to participate in this research in the future.

My question to the parliamentary secretary is this. Is the Department of Agriculture prepared to make a commitment to more scientific research in the field than exists today? Is the government prepared to stand up and say, "Yes, this is in the best interests of Canada and its agricultural future so we will commit ourselves to increasing the budget for scientific research in agriculture?

[Translation]

Mr. Ostiguy: Mr. Chairman, in reply to the question of the hon. member opposite about the research programs, I would like to tell him that whatever the programs put forward by the Canadian government, the Department of Agriculture will definitely have its share, as we have seen this year, since the $140 million budget was increased to $150 million. In the future, research programs, and I am referring to all government departments, Agriculture Canada will definitely have its share.

[English]

Mr. Riis: Mr. Chairman, when one considers the cost of scientific equipment and of inflation, the government has added very little if anything to the budgets of past years, and even what it has added is recognized by all people in the agricultural sector as inadequate. I mean that as a positive criticism and I hope that the parliamentary secretary and the minister will give real consideration to increasing the funds to this most crucial area. The same case could probably be made for a number of other areas.

Strong leadership from the minister is required. As in the many sectors of the government, there is a lack of leadership. In agriculture we have seen the disappearance of first class land and growing monopolistic control over food production and distribution. In a sense it will mean the growing dependence of Canadians on foreign producers as we become more and more dependent on foreign suppliers in the food sector. We lack a buy-Canada policy and a grow-Canada policy. Is the parliamentary secretary able to stand up and say, "Yes, my department is prepared to take a strong position and make a commitment to encourage a buy-Canada policy and a grow-Canada policy in a rigorous way."?

[Translation]

Mr. Ostiguy: Mr. Chairman, first, as far as the funds for research are concerned, I would say to the hon. member that 20 per cent of the estimates of the Department of Agriculture are earmarked for research. As the minister explained it on several occasions this afternoon, it is the highest percentage of all funds spent throughout the world on agricultural research and I think that Agriculture Canada and all Canadians should be proud of such achievement.

With respect to land conservation, I would say to the hon. member that under the Canadian Constitution, the conservation of farm or arable land is entirely under provincial jurisdiction.

As for his third question, the department is very conscious of the problem raised by the hon. member and, as Agriculture Canada has always done in the past, we are trying by all possible means to provide better conditions to Canadian farmers while protecting the consumer.

[English]

Mr. Riis: Mr. Chairman, we heard earlier about the fact that the number of farms in Canada is diminishing as a result of more sophisticated machinery. There is also the fact that more energy is being consumed. One can make the case that Canada is the most inefficient food-producing country in the world when it comes to energy. To gather one calorie of energy from food requires four calories of energy using our system, whereas in other systems one calorie of energy results in four calories of foodstuffs coming back. Are we sensitive enough to the role which energy plays in our "efficient food production system"?

I was intrigued by a recent study conducted in the city of Vancouver which says that with the amount of arable land available in that city two million persons could be provided for under an efficient system. Has the parliamentary secretary given much thought to the utilization of the techniques of urban farming as a way of minimizing the amount of energy required to produce foodstuffs for Canadians, and as a way of minimizing the amount of energy required for the transportation of foodstuffs from California, Florida, Mexico or wherever?

[Translation]

Mr. Ostiguy: Mr. Chairman, I should like to tell the hon. member that Agriculture Canada, of course, is well aware of the calorie-costs problems involved in producing foodstuffs, and we try to save energy in all areas of research, whether in the use of greenhouses, nitrates, plants and crops of all kinds. Agriculture Canada is using all possible means to limit energy and oil costs in the production of foodstuffs. Quite recently, a committee was established for the sole purpose of studying the energy problems Agriculture Canada will have to face within the next decade.

● (1930)

Mr. Ogle: Mr. Chairman, I am happy to have a few moments tonight to speak to the Minister of Agriculture on this subject, to lay down a few principles on the whole question of food and international hunger, and the responsibility of food producing countries like our own in relation to the starving people of the world.

I had hoped that the minister would remain in the House during my remarks, but I appreciate that he might be hungry himself at this time. He has gone to supper. I thought that in the context of his own hunger we could have spoken more directly about this human problem that faces something like 800 million people on the face of the globe today.

During the last six months I have had what I consider the privilege of being a member of the North-South Committee on International Development. That committee will be issuing its report next week, probably on Tuesday, when it will make some specific recommendations regarding food, to the minister and his department.

The reason we approach the whole question of food was because of a common knowledge that this is a major international problem. The Brandt commission report that was produced about a year ago stated:

> This commission sees no more important task before the world community than the elimination of hunger and malnutrition in all countries.

On this whole question of hunger, I think it is important to realize that it is more than a lack of food. I have seen many cases where hunger not only produced the phenomenon of being hungry but also produced chronic diseases and illnesses, physical and mental retardation, as well as a lethargy which compounds the whole area of development and brings about non-productivity and early death.

Without a well-nourished population capable of working, a developing country will remain dependent on external forces for development, and a self-sustained and self-generated type of development will not be attained.

When we address the problem of hunger and the production of food, we are striking at one of the most profound problems underlying the whole area of underdevelopment. To put it simply—people starve to death because they cannot buy food. They do not have the economic base themselves to buy food. We rarely see a rich person dying from hunger. Although that sounds a too simple explanation, nevertheless when situations arise in which populations cannot receive enough for their labour, or whatever, to buy food, there is the problem of starvation.

I think it is extremely important that as we consider the whole question of international hunger and the production of international food, we be aware that the women of the planet produce the most food; that the women of the planet care for and look after food.

Many times when we get into discussions with the Department of Agriculture relating to quotas, wheat sales and so on, we forget that, in most of the world, food production, care and preparation are in the hands of women. The solutions which lead to the elimination of starvation, it should be remembered, will probably come from women. This is a simple fact that is often forgotten when we talk about agribusiness and big farming. We forget that women using hoes are growing most of the world's food.

Many of the myths related to food have to be considered at this time as well. Some presentations made to the North-South Committee whose report will be ready for public scrutiny soon, contain matters of importance. People have traditionally been led to believe that hunger was the result of overpopulation, insufficient food production, or adverse soil and climatic conditions. The FAO and other international organizations such as the World Bank, the Commonwealth group of nations and so on, seriously question this simple explanation of that world problem.

We know that even in Bangladesh, one of the most densely populated countries in the world, enough grain is produced to provide a minimal diet for all its people. That follows a time of mass hunger. The FAO has also indicated that the earth as a whole produced enough grain to provide each of us with adequate protein and more than 3,000 calories per day, exclusive of all the fruits, vegetables and grass fed meats that are produced.

When we think about the fact that we have this technology and the resources and the possibility to feed all the world's people, we realize that it is a sin that 800 million people are starving.

Something is lacking, Mr. Chairman. Many things are lacking. One is the political will in many of the developing countries to see food as one of the primary necessities and to consider that the production of food must become one of the first political principles.

The report I have mentioned will discuss food aid, distinguishing very carefully between emergency food aid in situations where there is no other solution except aid or long-term aid, not in the form of food as such, but in a form which will enable people to produce their own food.

I should like to ask the parliamentary secretary about the philosophy or policy of the Department of Agriculture at this time, regarding the whole question of food aid.

[Translation]

Mr. Ostiguy: In reply to our colleague opposite, Mr. Chairman, I should like to say that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan), in co-operation with the international organization FAO, has a very important role to play in developing agriculture. Canadians are indeed privileged in that they have land, technology and human resources to continue developing agriculture. We are already doing quite a lot to feed the hungry of the world, but we hope to do a lot more to feed them by the year 2000. Of course, also for the benefit of the Canadian economy, as I mentioned in my remarks yesterday, Canadian farmers should increase their productive capacity.

• (1940)

As I said a moment ago, Canadians are really privileged. We are aware that because of the high quality of our soil and farmers, we can do more for developing countries. The eighties will certainly be the decade of agriculture and food throughout the world. As I often say, the seventies have been the decade of energy. The eighties will be the decade of agriculture and food. To conclude, I should like to advise the hon. member that steps have already been taken to celebrate October 16 of next year as International Food Day, and that the Minister of Agriculture will actively participate in the ceremonies to help developing countries.

Mr. Leduc: Mr. Chairman, I should like to put a few questions to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture.

Before doing so, however, I should like to start with a preamble on the evolution of agriculture in Quebec and in Canada generally. Speaking of agriculture, not to go too far back, around the years 1789-1840, the evolution at that time—that was the subject of my thesis for a Master's degree—was much the same as that we are witnessing today in that, in order to increase agricultural production and have surpluses, man was forced into revolutionizing agricultural methods and techniques, naturally. The same phenomenon occurred in French Canada and English Canada, under the aegis of a Liberal government which, I might say, proceeded with an agricultural revolution while we went about our industrial revolution.

I remember when I was young back home, 200 farmers produced about as much as five farmers today in our area. That, of course, we owe to more sophisticated techniques and to the improvement in our agricultural schools. One can say that agriculture in Canada is at this point in time the most evolved and advanced in the world. Today, I heard one of the speakers say that the average farmer in Quebec or Canada today can feed about 50 persons. Those statistics are about 20 years old. Today a farmer in French Canada can feed at least 100 to 125 persons; we may even be ahead of the Americans on that score. Therefore, I am not ashamed, I am proud to congratulate our agriculture ministers and our governments for the great work they have done in feeding the Canadian people and others. We are now selling wheat to the Chinese and the Polish. I must therefore—it is my duty as a Canadian—congratulate the people who devoted themselves, who perceived and saw the future of agriculture in Canada. Now, I should like to put a few questions to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture.

In my area, along the shores of Lake Saint-Pierre, this year the corn crop was bad and life is pretty rough. I am therefore wondering whether the Department of Agriculture will be able to make up for the losses and help the farmers.

In the future will the Farm Credit Corporation allow young farmers to borrow money, at reasonable rates of interest, which was pointed out earlier today, and spread out over many years? Otherwise, debts strangle them, and they cannot take over the farms; we know how much they cost. So, is the Minister of Agriculture now willing to help the young buy a farm and go into business for themselves?

My third question has to do with Canada geese. For the past 50 or even 75 years this problem of Canada geese has been lingering, yet these birds are still there and will continue to be there while causing damage to our agriculture especially in my riding because that is where they stop over every year in the fall and on their way back in the spring. Are the Government of Canada and the Department of Agriculture prepared to compensate, under agreement with the provincial government of course, the losses incurred by farmers because of damage caused by Canada geese? My fourth question deals with pesticides. Every year when the corn fields are blooming, insecticides and pesticides are sprayed over them, so as a result bees that feed on cornflowers die.

I kept bees myself at one time, and I know what I am talking about. Beekeepers now lose about half of their hives because of pesticides sprayed on corn. There are about 60,000 bees in a hive during the season they gather honey from flowers. So, about 30,000 bees in each hive die each and every year and consequently do not produce honey because of those pesticides sprayed on corn. What is the government or the department going to do to make up for the beekeepers' losses?

Mr. Ostiguy: Mr. Speaker, I shall answer our colleague from Richelieu. If my memory serves me right, he asked four very good questions. First of all, in the case of the corn program, we are aware, of course, that in some areas, crops were more or less good this year. However, there is a crop insurance program and there can be no support payments by the Agricultural Stabilization Board based on the current price of corn. When the board steps in, it does so on the basis on the last five years. Since the price of corn grain has been rather high over the last five years, it is not anticipated that support payments will be extended for the year 1980, which is almost over. The producers will have to—and I would like to tell the hon. member that this situation is not general throughout Quebec or throughout Canada, because in certain areas farmers were able to harvest well ahead of time and fairly easily; that may be saying much, but they were able to harvest.

As far as farm credit is concerned, in his second question the hon. member talked about finding ways and means to help young people enter agriculture. First of all, the farm credit interest rate has now been set back to 12.75 per cent, which is lower than the bank rate. I would also like to point out to the hon. member that 75 per cent of Farm Credit Corporation loans are made to persons under the age of 35. So I think it is not all that bad. Of course, it remains to be seen what mechanism could be found to help young people aged 20 who do not have the necessary assets.

But on the whole I think that with all the services and facilities provided by the Farm Credit Corporation and other such agriculturally-oriented lending organizations the sons of farmers do manage to buy farms. As far as the goose program is concerned, the hon. member will recall that the minister, the deputy minister and myself met a few months ago with the people in his riding and we said at the time that they should go to the Quebec departments of agriculture and the environment. Afterwards, the department studied the matter, as usual, and published a press release indicating that it would help some western farmers whose crops had been damaged by migrating birds. I think the people we met at the time with the hon. member for Richelieu had built up a very solid case for themselves. I do not know if they presented their case to the Quebec departments of agriculture and the environment but if they did a study will be done by both levels of government, that is by the Quebec agriculture department and Agriculture Canada and the Quebec environment department and Environment Canada.

As for compensation for problems with bees this year, I will say this: farmers must use pesticides and herbicides. One is called Furoden. If it is sprayed from the air, it may cause damages. The label on the product warns against spraying it from the air. It must be applied at ground level. We will therefore have to establish how this herbicide or pesticide was applied and under what conditions. I think that pretty well answers the four questions put by the hon. member for Richelieu.

Mr. Tousignant: Mr. Chairman, there is no need for me to describe the geographical situation of my riding that rejoices in the name of Témiscamingue, the former stronghold of my famous predecessor, Mr. Réal Caouette. It encompasses the Témiscamingue area proper and part of the Abitibi area. La Sarre, for example, is a town in my riding located in northwest Quebec, quite close to the 49th parallel.

Farming in northwest Quebec started in the twenties and some 30 years sooner than in the Témiscamingue area. The whole area was an outlet for social unrest and unemployment during the depression years. In those years, we succeeded in clearing some 550,000 acres by hand, by the strength of our arms and with determination, and I would add, Mr. Chairman, with oaths, and those 550,000 acres, for farming purposes only, cost the government and the farmers themselves huge amounts of money.

What has happened in the last few years, I would say since the early sixties? I understand that agriculture, as any other sector of the economy, has been transformed and undergone an inevitable and necessary metamorphosis. This compounded the difficulties that plagued the farmers of my area in the sixties. Difficulties that are undoubtedly linked to artificial rains.

Yes, Mr. Chairman, many will be surprised to hear me today talk in the House about artificial rains. But it is the honest truth. I have the evidence, the names of the companies that made the tests and the amounts of the contracts that were awarded. Those tests have purely and simply ruined farming in my area. I well remember a ten-year period of continually foul weather and steady rain. And it lasted throughout the summer season. How many times I have seen farmers who had to wait for the first fall frost to retrieve their machinery from the fields and it pull out "by the neck", as we used to say, with a chain and a tractor and, of course, the crop was completely lost. It is the plain truth, Mr. Chairman. Once again, without us knowing it, of course they had chosen the Abitibi-Témiscamingue area to carry out experiments in artificial rain. As I said, this was the death sentence of agriculture in my area. From 550,000 acres of farmland, there was a dramatic drop to some 200,000 acres. Of 11,000 farmers in the Abitibi-Témiscamingue area, there are only 1,400 left today.

The effects of this sharp decline in the farm population are inevitably being felt by the population as a whole, that is, the total population is growing older as the young people leave the area. There is an alarming decrease in population. What are we to do in such a situation? There is not much hope of attracting big companies such as General Motors or Ford or any other. Of course, those people are not very interested in building a plant in Abitibi-Témiscamingue.

Now, if we want to go on living in our area, what can we do exactly? Naturally, several responsible organizations and individuals have looked into the problem. For my part, I met with regional officers of the Quebec department of agriculture, with FPU officers and its president, Mr. Boulet. All those organizations, all those people agree that we must develop a beef cattle industry. First, we are far from self-sufficient in Quebec in beef production. Secondly, at the Kapuskasing experimental farm, in Ontario, which is close to our area, they have developed crops that are most suitable to our area. As ensilage is increasingly used, it is now quite easy to harvest crops, or should I say, to save crops. The artificial rain experiments stopped a few years ago, and I can assure you that as long as I sit in this Parliament, they will not be resumed unless, of course, the people make a formal request, which I doubt very much.

Fourth, in the past producers have suffered from price and market fluctuations. One year prices were good, but they were down the next year and producers went bankrupt. That does not happen any more thanks to the stabilization program.

Fifth, as I said at the beginning of my speech, we have an enormous reserve of agricultural lands which sell at ridiculously low prices. One never hears about lands selling at $2,000 an acre as it happens in the southern part of the province around Saint-Hyacinthe, for instance, or in southern Ontario or in the prairies. Back home land sells for a few hundred dollars an acre.

Since my time has expired, I wonder, Mr. Chairman, if I could urge the minister to have a study made in my region on this subject. If that study shows that it would be profitable to produce cattle, would the minister be prepared to help us through special programs?

[English]

Mr. Vankoughnet: Mr. Chairman, I welcome this opportunity to discuss agriculture with the minister and his officials. The topic of agriculture is a very important one in my riding of Hastings-Frontenac, in Lennox and Addington and, indeed, across Canada. It has been recognized that one out of every four Canadians works in a field related to the food and agricultural industry. In 1979, farm cash receipts totalled some $14 billion. This figure is multiplied as the money taken in by farmers goes through the Canadian economy. There is no question that a healthy growing agricultural economy contributes greatly to a healthy, growing Canadian economy. With record unemployment and inflation in Canada today, the economy needs all the leadership it can get.

There is no question in my mind that the Canadian farmer has been the real strength of this country. It has been the farmers ability to lead by example, to thrive on challenge and to increase efficiency which has built Canada.

I would like to look at some of the areas in which the federal government has shirked its responsibilities to the agricultural industry. The recent budget put forward by the government virtually ignored agriculture. There was no mention of allowing farmers to roll over tax-free the proceeds of the sale of their farm lands into registered retirement savings plans. The budget introduced by the hon. member for St. John's West last December would have provided this worth-while measure. In the latest budget there was no mention of updating the V-Day values used to determine capital gains tax, as promised in the election campaign. These measures concerning capital gains are very important to farmers across this country. As a farmer's retirement income lies in his land, the selling price of a farm has to reflect these high potential capital gains, and as a result the high start-up costs are prohibitive to many who would otherwise be entering farming.

I am happy to see that the present government has followed the lead of the Conservative budget of last December by allowing the deduction of income paid to a spouse in a non-incorporated business. This is good news for farmers who may now take advantage of this measure which, I understand, is to go into effect for the 1980 tax year. It also recognizes the hard work done by farm wives on farms.

The Canadian food system accounts for about 17 per cent of total energy use. Thus the agricultural sector will be hard hit by the government's misguided energy policy, which already appears to be creating more problems than it will solve. Energy self-sufficiency is already suffering.

There is no mention in the budget of exempting fuels used in food production from the federal excise tax, as the Crosbie budget proposed. There is no energy tax credit, as was proposed in the Crosbie budget, to help low and middle-income Canadians adjust to rising energy costs. How is the Canadian farmer expected to show leadership when the federal government shows little itself?

The Progressive Conservative government last year showed leadership in various provisions put forward in its budget and energy program. Several of the proposals in the Crosbie budget have been adopted by the present government, and I hope the minister and his government will also extend some relief to farmers to help them play their important role in the Canadian economy even better.

This past summer many farmers in Frontenac and Lennox and Addington counties supplied hay for the Manitoba emergency hay assistance transportation program. Under this program, Ontario hay was shipped interprovincially by rail to Manitoba farmers to help overcome difficulties associated with the drought conditions there last summer. I understand these rail shipments were subsidized by the railways and the federal and Manitoba governments. Many Ontario farmers were eager to help their Manitoba counterparts by supplying hay to dealers, who in turn shipped the hay west. As it turns out, many farmers in my riding have not yet been satisfactorily paid for the hay supplied. There appear to be conflicting stories about hay quality and weights and financial responsibility for these discrepancies. I would like to ask the Minister of Agriculture if he is aware of the problems brought about by this emergency hay program and what action he and his officials might consider taking to correct shortcomings which are a serious matter of concern to farmers of both Manitoba and Ontario.

The federal government has managed to break another promise through its recent cancellation of funding for Canfarm. As hon. members may know, Canfarm had been run by Agriculture Canada in co-operation with the provinces and universities prior to a transfer to a consortium of farm organizations and co-operatives in March of 1979.

Canfarm is a computerized farm record keeping and financial planning service with offices across Canada. The programs administered by Canfarm are very useful and help Canadian farmers become more efficient and competitive through computer analyses of their business operations.

The government tried to eliminate Canfarm in 1978 in a series of cost-cutting measures. Later, after realizing the full importance of Canfarm, it did agree to consortium bridge financing and loan guarantees. Canfarm was promised a $4 million loan guarantee and grants of $1.2 million by the federal government during its first three years of operation to help in a smooth transition to the private sector.

The Progressive Conservative government was honouring those commitments, but the present government has recently reneged on its funding by cancelling further bridge financing to Canfarm . This is just one more way in which the present government has failed in its commitments to agriculture. I have received letters and telegrams from constituents and organizations reflecting their concern about the government's stopping its funding to Canfarm. I share the concern of these people, who have found Canfarm a vital service and who feel they would face great difficulties without it.

Since becoming privatized, Canfarm has been working hard to organize and design its services to meet the needs of farmers. Officials are working to build up the number of farmers using its various services. In Canfarm's annual report for 1979 President Peter Hannam in his "President's Message" stated, and I quote:

> The stage has now been set to expand beyond the growing pains of 1979 and to take advantage of the opportunities in the 1980s.

He also noted that the founding members of Canfarm's co-operative services—some 14 farm organizations and co-operatives—have broken new ground in establishing Canada's first national farm management co-operative.

In light of the minister's decision to cut off further bridge financing to Canfarm it appears that the minister is closing the door to any opportunities in the eighties, and instead of soothing the growing pains of Canfarm, he is attempting to administer the death blow.

Any transition of a business or agency such as Canfarm requires time, support, hard work and money to make the transition work. The Canfarm program is designed to help the Canadian farmer. Farming, as I have mentioned, is a vital component of our economy.

We hear constantly of government programs to supply money, goods and services to other countries to help them develop various services. This is commendable, but it does not mean that services at home in Canada need to suffer as a result. By withholding the financing it requires the minister and his government are refusing to support Canfarm. The amount is trivial compared with the large sums the government spends. It is to help Canadian farmers in their effort to improve their industry, an industry on which Canada was built.

Amid announcements of Canadian aid in the millions of dollars for projects in other countries and the recent announcement of an additional spending of $17 million for self-serving propaganda advertising within Canada to further the government's misguided constitutional package, could the minister please explain why his government has announced its cancellation of financial aid to help Canfarm, a Canadian program which was helping Canadian farmers?

Why is the government so mixed up in its spending priorities, and why does it continue to forget and insult the farmers? Realizing the tremendous contribution agriculture has made to the development of this country, I find it hard to reconcile the statements made by the Minister of Agriculture with the positions taken by the federal government. The minister said:

> We really should have a national farmer appreciation day. People become too complacent when it comes to the successes of agriculture. As long as you are efficient, productive and doing a good job, everyone seems to take everything for granted. Well, I for one won't, and I'm doing my best so that others won't either.

● (2010)

The cancellation of financing to aid Canfarm, the lack of relief for farmers from the rapidly rising energy costs, and the hidden costs of capital gains, are just some of the sorry indications of the lack of leadership shown by the federal government with respect to the farming industry. Mr. Chairman, Canadian farmers do not have to look too far to see who really takes them for granted.

The minister has referred to the heritage of the Canadian farmers as being the acceptance of responsibility, meeting challenge and defying hard work. The government should reward such a sector of our society by helping them provide an example to all Canadians, not by forgetting about them or taking them for granted just because they have overcome the government's indifference in the past.

We must look to the future, Mr. Chairman, and face the problems head on. The government could use its majority in a constructive way to unify Canada and provide a realistic energy package. We have already seen the results of the government's efforts to unify the country and create energy self-sufficiency.

Agriculture helped build this country with roots deep and strong, and these same roots will help preserve Canada. Determination, sharing and hard work have helped to overcome adversities in all shapes and forms. Tradition was strong. People were slow to change from the known to the unknown for the sake of change alone.

Canada is a large country with diverse geographic and climatic regions. Canadians in one region regularly receive adverse weather from another region, compliments of mother nature. Farmers in particular are hit the hardest by these natural phenomena. Life goes on as people learn to live with something over which they have little control. But when the force that slams the farmer and other Canadians is the federal government, that is a very unnatural phenomenon. People do have control since the government is accountable to the people for what it does. The lightning has gone out from Ottawa, and now the thunder is rolling back in.

So, in concluding my remarks, Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the Minister of Agriculture and his government not to forget the farmers of this country and not to take them for granted. It is for the government to follow many of the attributes accorded to the farmer; those of leadership, self-sufficiency, unity, efficiency and hard work, which will bring about solutions to the very real problems facing Canadians.

Instead of planting the seeds of discontent, the government must sow the seeds of unity. The government must try to understand all of the variables that make a country grow strong, just as a farmer nurtures a crop. The government must know when the crop is healthy before it tries to transplant it to uncultivated fields. Just as a farmer cannot set arbitrary dates for when it would be most convenient to harvest the crop, the federal government cannot set unrealistic deadlines affecting the future of our great country.

I can only hope that the Minister of Agriculture and his colleagues in the months ahead do not lose further sight of the strong heritage and leadership shown by the agricultural industry in Canada and its importance in feeding Canadians as well as hungry people throughout the world.

Agriculture has provided the strong roots for the future. Farmers know that after a threshing there is a lot of chaff. Canadians will not be threshed by a government gone out of control. Our future will not be chaff thrown to the wind. Our roots are too deep.

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member made a great representation about Canfarm, and rightly so, if he feels so strongly about it. Again I come back to the conference which took place here in Ottawa for two days, the Canadian Agricultural Outlook Conference. Not one mention was made at that conference by any farm leader—and practically all of them from all over Canada were there—about Canfarm. I say Canfarm is good and so does the hon. member, but I say we did not break our agreement. The Co-op Credit Society has agreed to fund so much money and we have agreed to fund so much money. I suggest to the hon. member that he should read the agreement on the basis of which we set up Canfarm and study it. If he is still of the same opinion I would be surprised, because the credit societies, the co-operatives and the credit unions which were involved in lending them money have said, "Look, you are not in a position to show a proper return, so we will cut off financing to you." We did not say that we would cut off financing. We asked them to bring in different projections. A different projection has been brought in by Peter Hannam and some of his colleagues in Canfarm. I say this—I said it earlier today and I will say it again: out of 350,000 farmers of Canada, only 5,000 belong to Canfarm. The farm leaders, the co-ops, the huge organizations like the United Co-operatives of Ontario, the Maritime Co-operative Services, the Sask Pool, the Manitoba Pool, the Alberta Pool, the CFA and the OFA, where have they been? The only ones who really show they want to help Canfarm, the UPA in Quebec, say "Please keep it together because we might buy it ourselves and we can put 10,000 members into the organization immediately." The Ontario Federation of Agriculture has 24,000 members and they do not even have to have 50 per cent of what UPA would put into it they would have one of the most successful organizations going.

I do not have the same responsibility as farm leaders have to their people. They have a responsibility to their people to say, "This is good, this has been provided for." It is going to cost the federal government over $5 million to give this organization the kind of backing it needs to start, and it will cost us, as I said today, total involvement. Even to phase it out will have cost us nearly $6 million which we have invested in Canfarm. Where has the response come from? It is a unique service, a service that is second to none, but there has not been much sponsorship from farm organizations or from the province of Ontario or the Ontario ministry of agriculture. If their agricultural representative wanted to sponsor it, I am sure that they also could raise up to 5,000 new members within the province of Ontario.

The hon. member mentioned the problem of farmers not having been paid for the hay they delivered to Manitoba. That was an agreement that Manitoba had made. We made an agreement to pay one-third of the cost of transportation, Manitoba would pay one-third, and the railroads would pay one-third. We did not use up the funds which we have allocated for that program because it started to rain and they did not need as much hay from Ontario as they thought they would need.

I agree with the hon. member that the Ontario farmers have really co-operated and have come forward to say, "We have so many bales of hay which we do not need, we have a big crop." And they let them have it at a very reasonable price. Some people could not believe it was being sold for as low a price as it was. They were not trying to take advantage of the bad situation which existed because people were suffering from the drought. If someone has not paid, I will contact my colleague, the provincial minister of agriculture in Manitoba, but this is the first time such a representation has been made to me. The hon. member spoke about unity in the country. One of the members last night mentioned that some people at the Outlook conference made representations to him about some of their concerns. But let me say to the hon. member that this was one of the most positive meetings we have ever had and one of the best attended. As I said, farm leaders, national, provincial and regional, were all there. There were people from the private sector, from the Canadian Chamber of Commerce and from other agro-business organizations. They all said it was a very positive meeting. I cannot say they were gleeful, but they seemed to be happy about the economic position of agriculture in Canada and the programs we have established. I would challenge the hon. member to find better programs for farmers to run their own business anywhere else in the world. No other country in the world allows its farmers to run their business as we allow them to do in Canada. Sure, we have to work with the provinces, and we do have a close working relationship with them. I say to the hon. member that it is not us who are causing disunity, not us in agriculture and not us in this government. I asked him to check some things that people on the other side of the House are saying when they suggest separatism, and all that kind of thing. The hon. member will find that people in agriculture from coast to coast are willing to share those things which grow in our ground. In these working relationships and in our national marketing boards we have the real ideal of confederation and unity.

[Translation]

Mrs. Côté: Mr. Chairman, it gives me great pleasure to take part in the debate the Committee of the Whole House of Commons is holding tonight on the important question of agriculture. If I may, I would also like to thank the minister and his officials for being here to help us deal with this question. Mr. Chairman, I believe that when we talk about agriculture, we are talking about life. If we were not so fortunate as to have such efficient farmers and agricultural producers in Canada, I believe that the well-being of every one of us would be affected.

The Department of Agriculture has always, but more particularly over the last few years, tried to provide Canadian farmers with programs geared to their needs and conducive to outstanding performance. It is because of the effectiveness of government programs that producers have been able to achieve record productions. During the seventies, agricultural cash incomes have increased tremendously as net farming income went from slightly over $1 billion in 1970 up to $4.1 billion in 1979.

Moreover, Canadian agricultural industries have become among the most effective and productive in the world. It has already been pointed out that Canada only has 3 per cent of the world's farm lands but this point should be emphasized over again. In spite of this, Canada is one of the major food growers in the world, producing 6 per cent of the wheat and barley, 12 per cent of the oats, 17 per cent of the milk, and 2 per cent of all meat and dairy products. In addition Canada exports over 70 per cent of its grain, which is the highest proportion in the world. Between 1975 and 1978, the productivity of farmers was nearly twice that of the other industries. In short, our farming community should be the envy of everyone both in Canada and abroad.

Mr. Chairman, the constituency that I represent, Rimouski-Témiscouata, is essentially rural. In my riding, farmers make every effort to improve their crops to meet the most stringent standards of Agriculture Canada. Some producers carry out their own experiments through Agriculture Canada special programs. For instance, a farming co-operative has been created in Saint-Benoît de Packington, in the Témiscouata area, for growing cauliflower and Chinese lettuce, and this program is very successful. I believe that it is through programs of this type that regional agriculture, if I may use this expression, will be able to develop in harmony with its environment.

I would not want to leave the House with the impression that I am an expert in this field; I am not, even though I was raised on a farm. My father was a farmer for 50 years and lived through all the plights the milk industry had to suffer from 1940 up to the present days when pasteurization and sophisticated milking methods have become common practices. In view of the significant progress accomplished in farming, especially on dairy farms, I wish to congratulate the department and the Minister of Agriculture for the personalized assistance they have extended to dairy producers.

We live in a part of the country with wide temperature ranges and I heard from the committee on agriculture that the research service was doing extremely important experiments to develop crops that might thrive in colder climates like the one prevailing in my area, for instance. So, I am anxious to see the results of those studies so that they can be implemented in the part of the country where I live.

For almost two days I have heard many members on both sides of the House. In spite of the remarks by the former minister of finance who said we are too eager to praise our minister, I think that if I had a bouquet or awards to give I would give them to our farmers. In fact, over the last few years, farmers have made use of programs which had been especially developed to meet their needs and which have proved very beneficial to them and to all of us. I think we should now go one step further as producers have demonstrated that they had the ability and the imagination to adapt to technological changes, and with very limited means to deal with the serious problem of energy cost. For example, in our area we are considering a quite revolutionary system to heat greenhouses and I will be pleased to tell hon. members more about it as soon as it is further developed. This means our farmers are not lacking energy or good will, they really are hard-working people.

I remember, Mr. Speaker, that at the time of the Speech from the Throne the government had announced its intention to lay the emphasis on assistance to farmers for the development of sectors that are thriving and new ones that could be added.

As far as the creation of a Canadian Agricultural Export Corporation is concerned, I will quote a passage from the Speech from the Throne dealing with the development of our economic potential. It reads:

> Food and agriculture are going to be increasingly important to the Canadian economy in the 1980s. To further strengthen the industry, my government plans to create a Canadian Agricultural Export Corporation to expand markets for Canadian producers.

As I said a while ago, I think our producers have shown that they can develop products to meet the needs of both the domestic and the world market. Considering what goes on elsewhere in the world, I think a country like Canada is comparatively very wealthy, that it has great potential despite the poverty which is quite insignificant compared to the poverty of other people in the world when one considers that some countries have to put up with drought, with many evils, not to mention those countries that are at war, countries where the climate makes it impossible to produce foodstuff. I think it is all the more important that Canada develop internationally, that it produces new commodities for the world community. I feel that this task should belong to Agriculture Canada. The policies and programs developed by Agriculture Canada must be implemented in order to meet the needs of Canadian consumers. Producers should be urged to be selective and to be more efficient in food production.

I think Agriculture Canada should launch a worldwide campaign to promote food products made in Canada. It seems to me that the Department of Agriculture holds the pole position to travel to world areas experiencing the worse difficulties in food production so that the Canadian farmer could adjust to the world demand.

Mr. Chairman, perhaps I am expecting too much but I think I would like to hear the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) about that to know how his department explored this possibility, if it ever was considered. The establishment of such an agency was proposed in the Speech from the Throne. I think he should have some ideas about that. And I particularly would like to know which products could be offered throughout the world as Canadian products to provide as much as possible for their needs, if the production of certain products in certain regions of Canada was ever contemplated by his department and in that connection if a thought was given to products which could be made in eastern Quebec, in the lower St. Lawrence region where I live, to help Canada sell its food products to the world. I am waiting for the minister's answer.

● (2030)

[English]

Mr. Whelan: The hon. member asks questions about the proposed Canadian agriculture export corporation. There are many things in which we are proficient in Canada. I feel we can compete efficiently with nearly any country in the world. We do not intend to compete with the Canadian Dairy Commission or the Canadian Wheat Board. But any of the products in the areas of poultry and pork production, and horticulture, areas in which we have efficiency or proficiency, whatever you want to call it, will be the areas where we shall be gearing up our concentrated efforts toward improving our exports. We intend to work very closely with the Canadian Wheat Board and the Canadian Dairy Commission. Whenever the Minister of Agriculture goes abroad, or any member of the cabinet as far as that goes, we do not feel there should ever be a chance that someone should ask him or her, what products we have for sale in Canada, what products we can supply to the customer in some other part of the world. We believe that those products that were at possibly 75 per cent of efficiency at the present time could be put on long-term contracts and create 100 per cent to 110 per cent of production efficiency. We certainly do not intend to put Canagrex into a position where they would be signing up short-term contracts, contracts only when we have surpluses to sell. We must realize that many people in the world eat all the time, not just when we have a surplus. But if we could gear up our production from 75 per cent to 110 per cent efficiency, higher than it has ever been in some areas, that would mean benefits for labour, industry, the building trades, processors, the transportation system, our balance of trade and also for consumers. It would be of benefit because we would reach the peak of efficiency in those production entities, in particular in the poultry area where we are using the cost-price formula. It would be of benefit to them because it is build into their cost-price formula, and when they reach efficiency they do not get more, they agree to take less. When production per unit costs less, they agree to pass on the savings to the consumer of that product. The Canadian Egg Marketing Agency, the Canadian Broiler Marketing Agency, the Canadian Turkey Marketing Agency and all those organizations have built an enviable and proficient production entity which can compare with any in the world.

Mr. Chairman, I do not know how many more minutes I have before I use up the time of the hon. member.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. minister has six more minutes remaining to answer the questions, or for the questioner to pose more questions.

Mr. Whelan: I would like to say that government policy with regard to the Canadian Agriculture Export Corporation, has not yet been finalized. It is the subject of concentrated and detailed discussion at this time. Some drafting has been done on the legislation.

Earlier today the hon. member for Roberval asked about women in agriculture. I think it would be interesting if I put on record the names of some of those women who are involved in Canadian agriculture. For the first time in history we now have a woman director of the Farm Credit Corporation. She is Mrs. Carol Teichrob, from Saskatoon, Saskatchewan, and she is at the present time a director of the Canadian Turkey Marketing Agency. She is also the director of a small poultry processing plant and reeve of a huge township in Saskatchewan. With respect to the Canadian Dairy Commission Advisory Committee we have Mrs. Victoria Billingsley. She is a consumer representative from the Consumers' Association of Canada but we put her on the Canadian Dairy Commission Advisory Committee. She is a consultant from Yellowknife, Northwest Territories. Denise Van Breda, from southern Ontario, who is a tobacco farmer, a very successful farmer in her own right, is on the Agriculture Stabilization Board Advisory Committee. On the National Farm Products Marketing Council we have June Menzies as chairperson and Maryon Brechin as counsellor. June Friessen, a director from Winnipeg, is on the Canadian Chicken Marketing Agency. Lynn Hoffman is also a director of that agency. I come back to Carol Teichrob from Saskatoon who is on the Canadian Turkey Marketing Agency. John Wise, the former minister of agriculture, appointed Brenda McIntosh to the FCC Advisory Board. In my own office I have Linda Clifford from Wilkie, Saskatchewan, who is the manager of my regional office in Regina, and is a special assistant. Norma Lamont from Bruce County is a private secretary in my own office and Mary Ann Allan from Saskatoon is a research assistant. I could name others who are doing these types of things, and if anyone else knows of women in agriculture who are willing to serve on these boards let us know. We have one of the best records among the ministries of appointing qualified women to boards in the area of agriculture administration. I am saying that we are willing, if we can find the people, to appoint them to these boards.

The hon. member for Témiscamingue asked questions about research in the area of beef raising in his own constituency. We cannot turn research on and off like a tap. Some people think we can do it this way. We will look at his proposal very closely to see if we have any people we can send there to do a study for him on the kind of program he was suggesting.

We know that certain parts of northern Quebec and northern Ontario show tremendous possibilities as far as forage production with new modern methods of farming and new species of grasses are concerned. The new short season corns show great potential for that area.

One of the members asked me about milk quotas and he said that they were not being properly administered. I say to him, as I said to another member who spoke earlier, that this comes under the administration of the provinces. We are very concerned about it.

The price of hogs was also mentioned. That is another product which has no supply-management system. Hog production operates on the open free market. The producers take the knocks which come with that industry. There are many other programs under the National Farm Products Marketing legislation which farmers themselves agree to. It allows farmers to look after themselves in a proper fashion and the economic return for most of them as long as the farmers are efficient, is very good.

Mrs. Côté: Mr. Chairman, I thank the minister for answering my question, and also for mentioning the very interesting participation of women in farming. I hope that the administration of the department and of agricultural matters will be improved by it and that the need of citizens will be better met. I thank the minister for answering some questions which had been asked for some time and about which we were expecting an answer. So, I thank the minister for all the information he has given us.

[English]

The Deputy Chairman: I would entertain an answer from the Minister of Agriculture, but the time has expired for both questions and answers.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Chairman, I think I can help the minister by adding some information to what was said by the hon. member for Rimouski. My intervention does not require the minister to take any notes as he already knows what I am about to say. It is merely a question of reminding him that there are still problems in front of the Department of Agriculture.

We heard during the debate yesterday and today of the tremendous growth in farm income in Canada over the past two decades. No industry in Canada on a percentage basis has increased productivity so dramatically as agriculture. Until a few years ago the rate was 7 per cent a year compared to about a 2 per cent or 3 per cent for other industries in Canada. If the gross income for agriculture in 1980 is over $15 billion, I predict that without using any more land for production than is in use now and without too many drastic changes in technology, this same land area will be producing double the value of its present production by the end of the century through more intensive use.

My subject tonight will be the land which exists around this good land, the so-called marginal land on which farmers have had a hard time making a living. If one takes the older provinces—the maritimes, Quebec and Ontario—one will find that more farmland has been abandoned in those provinces than is now being cultivated. My remarks will attempt to answer the type of questions posed by the hon. member for Rimouski. Her county is representative of two or three times more acreage of that type of marginal land in Canada than there is in the so-called currently cultivated acreage.

The demand for energy in the world today has given the farmer in every province of Canada an opportunity which he would never have dreamed of 15 years ago. This knowledge is not new. It is known by our research people in every department in Ottawa interested in research. It is known by our provincial research departments and by industry. But the fact is we have not used this technology and this research information on the ground that as long as there is oil we do not need to take energy from another source.

As long as we continue to use oil in Canada and the United States we delay a little longer the move toward this new technology. Fortunately, in the farm areas of Canada there is available at present prices of oil and competing energy sources a whole series of low grade technologies which lend themselves to farm use and utilization at a price competitive with other forms of energy at the present time. This competitive ability will increase each time oil prices rise. As I said before, these technologies which are coming on and which, in some cases, are here now, are not new.

One of the oldest technologies on the farm is the utilization of wind. No one will pretend that the utilization of wind energy in Canada will provide a large percentage of our total energy requirements, but it can, with the present techniques and with the present prices of competing fuels, provide about 3 per cent or 4 per cent of our energy requirements. Our scientists have produced new types of windmills, but when put to the test of economics, power derived from them is still more expensive than power bought from the ordinary electrical system. Therefore, there is no great urgency in pushing farmers into doing something which does not have an immediate economic advantage.

However, following the wind conference in Regina three years ago, farmers had figured out answers which scientists had not been able to figure out. At that conference under the auspices of Canadian Plains, University of Regina section, they had figured out how to harness the power of high speed wind. All models to date could only operate under winds as high as 25 miles an hour because under higher winds they would fall apart or the generators would burn out. The farmers applied their haywire philosophy and know-how and came up with an answer so simple that one wonders why it was not thought of 30 years ago.

To give an idea of what I mean, if the wind is blowing at ten miles an hour and it produces one kilowatt of electricity per hour, then at 20 mph one might expect that the power produced would be two kilowatts. But because of the peculiar momentum principles of wind power, which increases at the cube of the differences of speed, and since 20 miles an hour is twice ten we therefore get two times two times two, or eight times as much power out of a 20-mile-an-hour wind as out of a ten mile-an-hour wind. In other words, eight kilowatts. If the wind velocity is 30 miles an hour, we get 27 times the power and if it is 40 miles an hour we get 64 times as much power.

That technology is presently on the way to being patented. I know that in the research section of the Department of Agriculture, which is as good as any research section in the world, they have never accepted the principle that it is their responsibility to get information out to the farmers. It believes that this is the function of the provinces, as part of the agreement of 1887. I say it is their duty, because of the failure of the provinces to properly educate farmers as to new technologies to find ways and means in co-operation with the provinces to get their information out.

Another example is heat pumps which have been used in North America for 60 years. Women know the heat pump as a refrigerator which takes the heat out of the food and dumps it on the floor. A heat pump which is used for heating a home or a barn simply takes the heat out of the air outside, even at 30 below, and heats the house or the barn. Or better, still, one should take the heat out of a well or a dugout, the local stream or even the ground. With the free heat of the sun taken from the ground, for example, one can reduce the present cost of energy by 75 per cent. All this knowledge is known but it has been resisted to the last ditch by power corporations and researchers who do not want to face reality. Fortunately this is all changing. The final decision will be made on the economics of the matter. In the last two or three years research on heat pumps to take heat from out of the ground and out of the water has demonstrated that we can save 75 per cent in spite of our climate.

The one thing that is missing of course is the capital to shift into this new technology. Without going into it in detail, it costs $3,000 or $4,000 to shift over to heat pumps which would allow a farmer to keep his dairy barn or beef barn at a constant temperature over summer and winter if it is properly ventilated. The saving in the case of larger buildings can rise as high as ten to one.

I am making my point loud and clear to the minister. We have just finished putting a budget through this Parliament which granted substantial sums of money to the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources to investigate new forms of low grade technology and transference of heat. The department was asked to set up demonstration programs. The only fault with that proposal is that the department does not have the personnel to deliver the programs. Several other departments do, however. Canada Mortgage and Housing has the capacity to deliver that program as has the Department of Agriculture.

Anything that reduces the cost of farming should be of interest to the Department of Agriculture.

The minister knows that in his department there is a small group of men very knowledgeable in the field of renewable energy. Other departments also have such small groups of experts but only the Department of Agriculture has the manpower at this time to deliver the service in rural areas.

Yesterday, mention was made of an organization that is one of the proudest arms of the Department of Agriculture, the PFRA or Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act which covered parts of four or five provinces in the west. That organization was taken away from the Department of Agriculture about 15 years ago and transferred to the Department of the Environment, as I think it then was.

Those PFRA engineers are competent to design and build the biggest dam in the world, and they have done it, Mr. Chairman, but today they sit idle in Regina waiting for their pensions because they are not in the right department. The Department of Agriculture could find lots of work for them, particularly on this heat pump problem. Engineers who design dynamos and everything else for power plants could certainly design a simple heat pump made of a compressor, two coils and an electrical gadget to turn it on and off. Every woman understands her 'fridge'. Engineers understand the heat pump.

The men I mention would be glad to do what they did before—go out and teach farmers how to engineer a dugout system, how to put in tree plantations, how to build dams and irrigation projects. They should have a chance in their retiring years to get back to work for agriculture. I know the minister wants them back. Now is the time to bring them back to work on this program with the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources for demonstration projects on energy savings. The technology is available and there is the know-how and the personnel in the Department of Agriculture to deliver the service.

This would not make Treasury Board or the Department of Finance mad, Mr. Chairman. PFRA should be returned to the Department of Agriculture and its people should go down to Rimouski and every other part of Canada that has been decimated for 50 years because of lack of knowledge as to the use of that type of soil and that type of forest capacity.

I know the minister expects me to speak about another subject which I used to call biomass. Everybody laughed when I first brought it up. The minister picked up the term and found it to be a good way of swearing without anyone knowing what it meant. Mr. Chairman, biomass is simply rotten material. When we die, our bodies go into the ground or into the atmosphere. Every tree dies and every plant dies—every piece of grass dies. We all end the same way, as molecules of this or molecules of that. The hydrocarbon components get trapped some place and that is the basic gas, the basic oil, the basic coal, the basic diamond. Why wait for several billions of years for that to happen? A lot of us would like to be used some time reasonably close to our death. Let us get this rotten material to work, Mr. Chairman. Just the ordinary amount of waste on a farm could supply 3 per cent or 4 per cent of Canada's total energy needs.

Yesterday someone mentioned gasohol. I know the experts say the costs are marginal—$2 per gallon when the cost of power and so on is added. But, Mr. Chairman, the farmer has the waste material anyway and is soon going to have a superabundance of power produced from all the other techniques that he knows about. One of the ways he can utilize this surplus power capacity is by using up all the waste on his farm.

Gasohol is not the main value; the main value to the farmer is this utilization of waste to produce alcohol. Of course, he cannot drink it but he can put it into his tractor, into all his engines and make them last three or four times as long. That is where the economic advantages are, Mr. Chairman. Technically, if he paid himself an hourly wage he would not make money on this product. But with the economy the farmer uses, he could make money because he does not usually consider his own wages, time or the energy which he can make himself, as costs.

In the Crosbie budget, for the first time in Canada's history there was a provision to make it legal to own a still. Rejoicing went through every farm home. Some people actually thought they might be able to sneak off a quart or two. Basically, though, the farmer knew what was meant. The required bond for a miserable little still was reduced from $200,000 to $10,000. Mounted policemen were delirious with happiness because they would now know the location of all stills, as they would have to be licensed, instead of spending cold nights searching for them.

I think the idea of gasohol should not be dropped, Mr. Chairman. In the United States, 36 states are going ahead with production. Our civil servants now know at first hand the warm reception given to the program by thousands of farmers in many states. My constituency is just across the line from North Dakota where they make their own gasohol and we sneak across the line to get it.

For heaven's sake, Mr. Chairman, let us get this back into the budget. It would not cost the government anything. The farmer would bear the cost of the still. He would accept the police coming once a year to inspect it and would gladly put up the $10,000 bond. I am sure he would also be happy to pay his wife a few dollars for sitting to watch the still because that would be deductible.

The main point of my remarks is, of course, poplar trees, Mr. Chairman. When I first came to this House nearly 23 years ago, I made the statement that more money could be made on the farms in Canada, by producing trees than grass. For this I quickly collected the nickname of "Johnny Appleseed." I did not have the relevant figures then but I have them now, thanks to scientists in the forestry section and the research section of the Ontario and B.C. governments. We have bred a poplar tree that will not only provide feed for cattle but will provide lumber, plywood, pulp, and above all, oil. Fifty per cent of dead weight in the dry form of a poplar tree is hydrocarbon. Even at present prices that would yield a farmer, if grown on so-called useless marginal land with drainage, about $300 per acre each year. The cost figures are available, thanks to the Ontario government.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his allotted time has expired.

Mr. Bloomfield: Mr. Chairman, I am very happy to have this opportunity to participate in this discussion on the Department of Agriculture's supplementary estimates. As one who was a farmer prior to having been elected to this chamber, I would like to take this opportunity to convey to the Minister of Agriculture my heartiest commendations for the outstanding job he has done on behalf of all of those involved in agriculture in this country.

I am especially pleased with last week's announcement by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources that the Energy Supplies Allocation Board has given agriculture a priority A rating in the event of an energy shortage. As a member of the agricultural industry, I welcome this initiative since it clearly illustrates the importance of food production for us in Canada, as well as for people in other countries.

I would like to base the first part of my questions to the minister on the subject of energy as it relates to agriculture. In particular, I would like to know if the minister is looking ahead to the future when higher energy prices will be hitting the farmer right square in the pocketbook. In a recent report prepared by the Department of Agriculture, some estimates were set forth illustrating the impact a $1 per barrel increase in crude oil would have on farm input costs. For example, for every $1 per barrel increase in crude, the price of natural gas will rise approximately 15 cents per thousand cubic feet. This means fertilizer prices will skyrocket. Annhydrous ammonia, for example, will rise by $10.54 per tonne. For any farmer growing wheat, barley or corn—crops of great significance in my area of the province—energy costs will be of crucial importance in deciding whether or not a farmer will make any profit in the coming years.

The key here, and I would appreciate the minister's comments on this, is what alternative will the farmer have to offset this drastic increase in input costs? Will it be by substitutes or plant adaptations?

I have read many briefs, articles and proposals for substituting renewable sources of energy for non-renewables. We all seem to realize that some sort of alcohol-based fuel would be most economical if it could be produced in large quantities. The problem is neither the technology nor the materials for producing this type of fuel are available to Canadians on a large scale.

How far down the road is this technology? I do not see energy prices getting much cheaper in the future; we need to be able to move off gasoline and diesel fuel if Canadian farmers want to stay competitive in the food production industry. My question is this: can the minister give us an idea of what priority he has allocated to a renewable energy substitution program? Also, how many years will it be before this program is implemented on a significant scale?

I would like to move to another area of concern. It deals with the fruit and vegetable storage construction financial assistance program. This program, which provides government assistance to fruit and vegetable producers in constructing storage facilities, was discontinued under the previous government. After much consultation with the producers, we reintroduced it, providing $3.3 million worth of assistance to the fruit and vegetable industry in Canada.

In Lambeth, Ontario, five producers have pooled their resources to construct a storage facility for their crops. The building was officially opened on August 25 and the owners have submitted the bulk of their cancelled cheques and invoices and have provided all the proper papers and documentation. They are anxiously awaiting their cheques from the Department of Agriculture, but at present they have not received anything of the kind. Could the minister tell me what is the current status of this project in the department, and whether these people can look forward to receiving their cheques in the near future?

Another area of interest to me is the new Canadian Agricultural Export Corporation, Canagrex. We in Canada enjoyed a very good year last year in so far as agricultural exports are concerned. Canada sold a record $6.1 billion worth of food and agricultural products abroad last year, leaving us with a healthy trade surplus of $1.4 billion. This is very commendable and indicative of the fact that when provided with the proper environment in which to produce their commodities, Canadian farmers are more than equal to the task.

Nonetheless, I feel we can improve this record. I, for one, am of the opinion that Canada can become the world leader in the international marketing of many commodities. I would like to have the minister's comments on how this could be achieved under Canagrex. I would recommend that Canagrex's board of directors be comprised mainly, if not entirely, of farmers. As far as I am concerned, no one knows the farming business as well as farmers themselves.

I would also like to know what the status of Canfarm is at present. I know my hon. colleague from Guelph discussed this matter in some detail. Canfarm offers a unique opportunity for Canadian farmers to receive expert advice and assistance. It would certainly be a substantial loss if it had to be disbanded. Would the minister tell us what he intends to do with respect to this matter?

I would like to be brief on my last topic so as to give the minister a chance to respond to my questions. However, before I finish, I would like to comment on an aspect which will, if not soon corrected, cause a severe problem for Canada in the coming decades. As I see it from here, the Department of Agriculture is not receiving the amount of moneys needed for it to achieve its maximum potential. I am not trying to say that the department is squandering its present allocations or that it is not running a tight ship. When one considers what we have done with what we have at our disposal, I cannot be anything but impressed. However, I am truly alarmed when I look at the estimates and find that we are allocating only 1.3 per cent of our total federal expenditures to the Department of Agriculture. Compared to last year, this represents a 20 per cent cut.

Compare the Department of Agriculture's budget with that of Knowlton Nash and the boys down at the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. It gives one an idea of how badly off agriculture really is. In terms of employees, the CBC has 11,861 compared to 10,110 as projected for March 31, 1981. This year the agriculture departmental budget was increased by less than one per cent while CBC received a 10 per cent increase. Presently, the CBC's budget is approximately $577 million compared to $748 million for Agriculture Canada. The CBC budget is over 75 per cent of that of Agriculture Canada. Where are our priorities?

These figures are proof that the Ministry of Agriculture is not getting its fair share. I can think of no other federal department that took a 20 per cent reduction in expenditures from last year. I want everyone to wake up and remember that it was agriculture that put Canada on the map. I refuse to stand by and see the Department of Agriculture, which has in the past demonstrated its vital importance to Canada's well-being, receive second-class status at a time when so many people are predicting a worldwide food shortage by the end of the century. We must lay the groundwork now to prepare for the crisis ahead. I cannot see how it can be accomplished while agriculture sustains a 20 per cent cutback in revenues. I ask the minister, therefore, to convince his cabinet colleagues that agriculture needs more revenues to enable Canada to maintain its prestigious international position in this most important sector.

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member mentioned how good the cold storage program is. He expressed concern about a group in his constituency who are waiting for a cheque. I am not aware why they have not received it. Nobody has said anything to me for some time about that organization. The hon. member made lots of representations when they were first applying for assistance under the government assistance program where we paid up to one-third of the cost of the structure with a maximum contribution of $500,000. I will have to do some checking to see if I can find out where it is for the hon. member.

He asked about Canagrex and how it can increase agricultural exports. Canagrex can do a tremendous job if it is given the opportunity. There are many small businesses and many small operations in Canada able to take advantage of export markets which can be made available to them if someone is there to back them. In many other countries of the world governments are offering all kinds of opportunities to that kind of production. It makes it very difficult for Canadian farmers to compete because there are no avenues for them to take in order to trade in other parts of the world.

The hon. member for Lambton-Middlesex used figures the other day suggesting we could increase our agricultural exports by $2 billion or $3 billion in the first year of operation. I do not think he is being too liberal when he suggests that. I think he is being very realistic. As far as that goes, he may be a little conservative when using those figures.

People come to our office about the products they wish to buy, as happened last week, and speak not in terms of $100 million, not $200 million; there is a potential of $500 million worth of new agricultural business for the year 1981. If we move quickly we can take part in that. They want to deal with the Minister of Agriculture and the government. They want to get rid of the multinationals and the people who are only in the trading business to make money. I say there is room for those people in the trading business who are willing to accept a decent profit for what they do. That is the kind of trading we want. We want to become involved with those countries producing products we cannot produce in Canada, and products we are producing in Canada which they cannot produce with as much efficiency or proficiency. Those are the areas we will be moving into.

Canfarm is a good thing. It has cost us millions of dollars since its inception but has not taken off with farmers the way it should have. When one thinks about it, only 5,000 farm members in Canada belong to Canfarm. I spoke earlier of the lack of support it has received from farm organizations and the provincial governments; it has received by far the largest amount of support from the federal government and the federal ministry. If they can find some way to come up with solutions in the next few days and if they want to work together, we will work with them to save Canfarm.

The hon. member talks about the amount of money allotted to the Department of Agriculture. We do not have that huge a budget and I brag about the little bit of money that Agriculture Canada has. There is no doubt that I can use more money for some important programs. I agree with the hon. member that food for the system is important; it is important for the mind, it is even important for the people at the CBC because they could not operate if they did not have food. When we look at the over-all structure, the CBC does provide, from time to time, some food for the mind. Sometimes it would be better if it was not provided at all. We could do without the CBC but certainly not without the farmers of Canada. Percentagewise, the CBC is probably the highest subsidized production entity there is in Canada, but I am sure we would not want to do away with the CBC either.

Some of the most progressive farmers in Canada are those who belong to the supply-managed type of marketing boards on which I do not spend one penny. Their production and efficiency is probably the greatest of any production entity in Canada. There are provincial marketing boards running the same kind of system and very few federal marketing boards. In total there are 103 marketing boards in Canada. Some of the toughest marketing boards of all are in Alberta where the farmers are independent and free. They just formed another one the other day to market their potatoes. The oldest marketing boards are in the province of British Columbia. All those who market milk in Canada belong to a milk marketing board. There are many farmers marketing their products. I brag about the efficiency of our producers and the little subsidization they do receive from the federal government or from any government. When you add up the total expenditures of the provinces and the federal government and all other expenditures by other departments which involve themselves in rural Canada, we find that out of the total provincial and federal expenditures less than 4 per cent of total expenditures goes to agriculture.

I do not believe there is another nation in the whole world that can claim to have such a healthy agricultural industry with so little money spent on it. Yes, we can use more money, for research, we could use more money for cold storage, we could use money for the veterinary college in the maritimes, we could use money for the Farm Credit Corporation, we could use money to assist communities in building community centres, we could use money for the fair boards. The Canadian Exhibition associations are always asking for more money. The main reason we are here this evening is to discuss our estimates. I understand the opposition is concerned about the spending of our money. If you notice, Mr. Chairman, almost every speaker wants us to spend more money on agriculture in Canada and not to spend less. For instance, when we consider the $46 million spent on the hog stabilization industry this year, if I had a supply-managed system I would not be spending $46 million. That $46 million would be for extra research or some other kind of agricultural programs. Spending $15 million on potato stabilization is wrong. For eight years I have not spent a penny of tax dollars on the poultry industry. It is one of the healthiest production entities of all.

Groups in Canada using provincial marketing legislation are also efficient and are not costing either the federal government or their provincial governments very much money, if any at all. If they are using a supply-managed type of system with a pricing cost formula then they are all way below the cost of inflation. They are some of the most efficient production units in Canada. I just want to say to the hon. member who talked about cold storage and that type of thing that we have some programs now put forward by the province of British Columbia involving controlled atmospheric cold storage, jacketed storage, but mostly controlled atmospheric temperature. They have a plan for a two-year program to spend $9 million on cold storage because of the benefits they have received from this program. A member of the New Democratic Party said in the House yesterday that none of these programs were new and that none of them were working. They have taken advantage of that program. At one time, British Columbia used half of our funds. Now they are in a position where they export apples to 34 countries in the world because of that program. We cannot go to British Columbia and tell the farmers that there is no federal participation in their agricultural program because of what we have done to help the food and horticultural industry there. Over half of the moneys received in British Columbia for their agricultural industry are from federal government, and if you added what DREE has put into that area it would practically match what the provincial government has spent on agriculture in British Columbia.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the minister, but the hon. member's time has expired.

I think it was agreed earlier today that two hon. members would share any 20 minutes given. The two hon. members who will share the next 20 minutes will be the hon. member for Portage-Marquette and the hon. member for Central Nova. Each will have ten minutes.

Mr. Mayer: Mr. Chairman, I agree with the minister that farmers in this country do an excellent job of producing food. One of the ways to define a so-called developed country is to measure the amount of disposable income which is spent on food. The lower the amount of money it takes to feed a country, the more developed that country is. A low percentage of disposable income spent on food is obviously a comment on the efficiency of the farmers of a particular country. I think Canadian farmers are testimony to the fact that we in this country do an excellent job of feeding ourselves.

The minister mentioned that over the past couple of days many people have asked the government to spend more. I am not asking the government to spend more, but I would like to talk about the initial price for wheat. I think the minister knows well that the initial price is $4.25 a bushel, and since about November 15 or thereabouts, or for the past month, wheat has been selling at over $7 at both Thunder Bay and Vancouver. There is a big spread between that and the initial payment of $4.25. It seems to me that an initial price increase would be more than welcomed by many farmers in this country.

I have heard the minister and the minister in the other place who is responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board in the past little while say that many producers are asking that this increase be delayed until after the new year. Provincial governments and the federal government have programs in place to assist young farmers to establish themselves and to keep family farms in existence, but many people need increases in the initial price now to pay bills before the end of the year. These are the same people for whom there are government programs in place. These programs are to help young people maintain family farms.

I have also heard it said that it would save the Canadian Wheat Board interest not to have to borrow money to make initial payments. That, to me, is a completely wrong and fallacious argument. In point of fact, the Canadian Wheat Board does not have any money. It holds money in trust for producers. The interest rate at which the Canadian Wheat Board is able to borrow is substantially less than that faced by any farmer in western Canada. Indeed, the information I have is that the Canadian Wheat Board pays interest on money it borrows at prime. Most producers who borrow money to meet commitments such as operating loans and accounts payable pay in excess of prime. It would therefore make good economic sense in my mind if the government were to increase the initial price for wheat immediately and certainly before the end of the year.

I point out further that it is not the responsibility of the Canadian Wheat Board but that of the government to set the initial price for wheat. I urge this upon the minister. I would like to hear his comments on it. I urge him to increase the initial price immediately. I see no reason why he cannot do it before Christmas or before the end of the year about which I have heard him and the minister in the Senate who is responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board talk.

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Chairman, I believe it was the hon. member for Lisgar who asked me a question yesterday in this House with respect to increasing the initial price for wheat. I gave the hon. member a response at that time. In this respect we go by our correspondence with farmers. Our regional offices tell us that the vast majority of farmers are saying that they have sold a lot of grain this year and that they do not want any increase in initial prices until January 2. That is the response I am getting. If the hon. member for Portage-Marquette is receiving any other type of representation, I would like to know about it. I take it for granted that he is expressing a view from his constituency, but I have been in several constituencies in each of the grain producing provinces of western Canada which come under this jurisdiction. I have been to annual meetings and seen many hundreds of farmers, but I have yet to hear one say to me that I should increase the initial price. I am going by the response I get. I do not think there is any intention at the present time, but I will be meeting the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board tomorrow, and I will take this up with him again.

The minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board has been at different meetings in western Canada yesterday and today, and he may have heard a different opinion. Grain producers may now have a different feeling from that which has been expressed to me.

Mr. Mayer: Mr. Chairman, I have certainly been in contact with some producers who favour an increase in the initial price, before the new year. However, I wonder if the minister has spoken to very many young farmers, who certainly are experiencing cash flow problems at this particular time of the year. The end of the year is approaching, and many creditors are asking that their accounts be paid. As I have said, the Canadian Wheat Board is certainly in a position to borrow money at an interest rate which is more favourable than the rate faced by the average producer. During the first 13 weeks of the crop year the Canadian Wheat Board actually sold about three-quarters of a million tonnes of wheat more than it took in in deliveries, so as far as the cash flow position of the Canadian Wheat Board is concerned, it has sold more than it has bought, so it should not be in any trouble with respect to meeting commitments in terms of increasing the initial price. I see no reason why there could not be an immediate increase of at least $1.50 a bushel.

I think that would be reasonable. I know some people have called for a $2 increase. Interest rates have gone up in the past two successive weeks and I think they will increase tomorrow. The Bank of Canada will probably see an increase of some three-quarters of a percentage point. This makes it all the more imperative that we try to get money into the hands of producers so that they do not have to pay this high interest rate on borrowed money. I urge the minister to consider it.

I would like to raise another issue with respect to something with which I am sure the minister is familiar. It has to do with the meat import legislation which has been tabled. Is there any possibility of getting rid of the growth factor which is in the formula for setting quotas? I know this was negotiated with respect to the GATT over a year ago. I think agreements were signed back in June of 1979. This is something which concerns us. It concerns the Americans, too, because we will be letting in more meat from offshore countries on a per capita basis—Australia and New Zealand are the two major ones—than will the Americans. This can cause problems at the American border. Back in 1976 our border was actually closed because of the amount of meat which came into the country and which displaced live cattle which went south across the line. I would like to know what plans the minister has for setting quotas under the import-export permits legislation and at what levels they will be. I think they should be announced fairly soon, certainly before the end of the year.

I have one final question. I think there is some concern that our quotas for beef were set excessively high this year. The quota was some 170 million pounds of beef. There is some concern that that is excessively high and that it will be reflected in the moving average which will be with us for a long time to come. Is there any possibility of lowering the figure we had before 1980 so that that figure will not be used to inflate the quota we allow for offshore meat for the coming years? That is what I would like to have the minister address, if he would, please.

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member mentioned the meat import legislation. I feel I understand what he means when he talks about the import-export legislation. It would mean setting the quota before the end of December. There have been suggestions with respect to what that quota should be. Some have said 141 million pounds. I am sure the hon. member is aware that the oceanic countries have not filled their quota this year.

It does not appear that they will fill their quota because other countries have moved in and offered better prices. Russia has moved in and bought meat from them, so their meat prices have increased to such an extent that it is not enticing to people in Canada who have been using that meat for processing. If they can find meat in North America, they will use it, but production has gone down in Canada.

I will be discussing as soon as possible with my colleague, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, the setting of a quota. There has been some suggestion from the United States—I admit that it is only a rumour and I do not find it altogether authentic—that they are talking about there not being a quota. This is what we are told by our advisers at our embassy in Washington. I am in favour of setting a figure. I believe that the Meat Import Act is something the producers have wanted for a long time. It sets a figure so that the producers know where they are going. The hon. member wants it to be more rigid than it is, as I understand from what he said about the Meat Import Act. He wanted it not to use the population consumption factor. I do not know if we could do that. In essence, the hon. member is asking for a supply-management type of system without a supply-management system. He is asking that it be done by legislation. I would think we would get into great difficulties with our trading partners in GATT if we tried that. That is why we have gone as far with that bill as we possibly can. If the hon. member will notice, in one section of that bill in which quotas for meats are—

The Deputy Chairman: I must interrupt the minister with regret but there was an agreement earlier this day that we should allow only ten minutes to both the questioner and the minister, and that time has expired. We now move on to the hon. member for Central Nova.

Mr. MacKay: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the minister three or four brief questions, and I hope the hon. gentleman will keep his answers short, as I will keep my questions.

I want to bring to his attention primarily two topics. One is the question of tax and the other is the PFRA. I believe the minister indicated in his remarks a short time ago, or left the impression, that research in his department was increasing. According to my information, in 1974 there were 3,890 man-years for research, and in 1981 there were 3,659. So it would appear that in this important area his research capability is reduced. Also, in terms of inflation I believe that the expenditures have hardly kept pace. He might refer briefly to that matter in his answer.

My first question to the minister is whether he has been making representations to his colleague, the Minister of National Revenue, and possibly to the Minister of Finance, as to some way in which tax concessions could be obtained, first of all, for part-time farmers who, in my constituency at least, are having a difficult time making the transition from industrial jobs to being full-time farmers, though many of them have a very real desire and incentive to do so. Has he been exploring any possibilities which would allow more generous tax concessions so that people will be able to build up some capital for farm equipment and livestock and not necessarily be denied tax deductions because they do not show a profit for the first few years?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member spoke about a reduction in man-years. My officials are looking for the figures on man-years as quickly as they can. I was given figures some time ago and I am going by memory, but it seems to me that we did not increase our man-years by very much. However, we did increase them by 14 man-years this year. The biggest increase in expenditures took place between 1977 and 1978 when the increase was $16 million.

The next largest increase took place in 1980-81 when the increase was $13 million. Both those figures show that we were ahead of the inflation rate. They also should show that we were able to maintain our status quo in man-years. Perhaps there were no large increases, but the figures I am given here right now for the end of 1979 show that we had 3,360 planned, continuing employees on March 31, 1980; 3,360 planned and continuing employees on March 31, 1981, and 3,345 total person-years authorized. This will confuse the hon. member as it confuses me, but it shows here the figure of 3,659 for the total involvement for 1980-81. That is the figure as compared to 3,392 in 1978-79, going up to 3,359. I am taking it for granted that this is for executive, scientific, administrative, technical, administrative support, operational and research groups. Those are the figures I have just been handed.

Concerning the national revenue people and the representations for part-time farmers, let me say to the hon. member that 50 per cent of the farmers from the area where I live work some place else. I was one of those myself at one time. I worked in factories, and so on, when I was establishing myself in farming. I find these people do not really look at marketing as much as they should if they have seniority at a good plant or if they are teaching in a school where they have tenure. They market their product without the concern that another person whose sole livelihood was derived from farming would show. The hon. member can imagine the number of representations I receive from my own area, and I think that some way should be found. When I talk to many of the people, they sound very much involved in just writing off expenditures and establishing holdings which will be worth a lot of money in a while. They write it off as farming expenditures. That is the difficulty we have.

Mr. MacKay: I understand those problems, but I am encouraged to think that the minister is looking for ways to make things easier for those who are genuinely interested in becoming farmers, because if they can be allowed to go back to the land, they will open up jobs for others who have no desire to live that kind of life.

I want to refer now to the background documentation which the former minister of agriculture, the hon. member for Elgin, and I have put together in our economic development committee. There was interdepartmental consultation with the Department of the Environment, the department of federal-provincial relations, and the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, with respect to the future of PFRA. I was most interested in the speech given by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain in this regard. As the minister knows, it was only in 1969, I believe, that PFRA was taken away from Agriculture. If my information is correct, the minister made a remark or two at an agricultural task force meeting of the Canwest Foundation in Calgary not long ago, under the chairmanship of Harold Horner, indicating at least some sympathy for getting PFRA back into the Department of Agriculture. My question, in the form of a representation, is the following. I have been following the remarks of the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain who rightly pointed out the number of acres of land which have been abandoned in certain parts of this country, particularly in the maritimes, and who drew attention to the expertise that is available to PFRA—even if you are growing poplar trees, you will have to do some draining. We must remember also that the special agreement which our government brought in for eastern Ontario was largely as a result of the cessation of the ARDA program which covered part of that region. Keeping all this in mind, is the minister seriously considering—I note that there will be a major departmental review and a major initiative—making PFRA a truly national agency in the maritimes—I understand this is also a provincial responsibility—along the lines of the old maritime marshland rehabilitation act? I would be very interested in this. I do not want to go on too long but I would be interested to hear what the minister has to say about this. Would he consider such action, because his predecessor and I were looking at it seriously and we were in the process of setting up an all-party task force under the chairmanship of the hon. member for Medicine Hat?

The Deputy Chairman: Perhaps the minister will be able to answer the question at a later time, but right now we must go over to the hon. member for The Battlefords-Meadow Lake.

Mr. Anguish: Mr. Chairman, I should like to direct some comments to the Minister of Agriculture through you. Agriculture has always been the number one industry in Saskatchewan where my constituency lies. Although it is somewhat overshadowed right now by other developments in the potash, uranium and heavy oil industries, in the long term agriculture will always be the number one industry in Saskatchewan. However, constituents have written to me about several concerns, and agricultural groups have made representations to the New Democratic Party about their concerns in the area of agriculture. One concern which keeps coming up is the Crowsnest rate or the statutory rate for the movement of grain. I very much fear that the federal government will deal rather harshly with farmers and predict that it will make a move to take away that statutory rate. Although some compensatory payments will be made, farmers will have to watch out in the future or they will find themselves absorbing the inflationary costs of the movement of their products.

Another area of concern is the area of energy. I was happy to hear the minister announce that the producers of food would be placed on a high priority list. I thank the minister for that consideration.

I suppose the next area would fall under the Department of Transport rather than the Department of Agriculture. I am referring to the movement of grain. Many Saskatchewan farmers say that they must stand by the siding when the train goes by, otherwise they will not get their grain in on time. They also tell me that quite often the elevators are plugged because of the poor movement of grain in western Canada.

Another area is that of a national beef marketing board which I understand is supported by the minister. Often I questioned why the minister would not implement such a marketing board to assist beef producers, so that they could rely upon a substantial return on their product. After raising their cattle, they should be able to expect to receive something out of it, especially when one considers the money they have invested for their herds and the time and labour they have put into the operations. If their time were counted, many farmers and ranchers would not be receiving much of a return from the beef they sell during the low points of the year.

I should like to be critical for a moment of the agricultural research stations which, through attrition over the last few years, have paved the way for plant breeders' rights to come into existence, a topic with which the New Democratic Party disagrees.

The Battlefords-Meadow Lake is a strong agricultural area within Canada. As the member of Parliament for that area I disagree with plant breeders' rights. I feel we are moving into a very dangerous area when that is taken out of the research stations and put into the hands of a large corporation. It will be gobbled up quite rapidly leaving farmers at the mercy of large corporations such as Dutch Shell, for example.

I am concerned about the number of young farmers who have written me or who contact me while I am in my constituency regarding the amount of work they are required to do off the farm, particularly in the wintertime, to subsidize their incomes. Again I am stressing that they are not receiving a fair return for their work and investment; they cannot maintain a decent standard of living. Some of the people working in lumber mills or in the mining industry are able to provide much more for their families than farmers or ranchers who are working their own land. The farmers might be working much harder, but they do not receive an adequate dollar return. Many young farmers find it necessary to work in sawmills and mines in order to subsidize their incomes. As a result, to a large extent the farms are being hurt because they are not paying the attention they should to their farming or ranching operations.

I think the agricultural industry is dying in some parts of Canada, but I am happy to say that it is not in Saskatchewan. Recently Dr. Boyd Anderson, the president of the Saskatchewan Association of Rural Municipalities, addressed a group of people in Medstead which is in my constituency. He pointed out that less than 8 per cent of farmers engaged in the agricultural industry in Alberta and Manitoba are under 40 years of age, and that in Saskatchewan around 25 per cent of farmers are under that age. I think this is due to some of the programs which were brought in by the Saskatchewan government, namely, the farm start program and the land bank program. It would mainly be the land bank program which enables retiring farmers to pass on their lands to their children or other direct descendants. The minister should look closely at some of these agricultural programs designed to ensure that farmers remain on the land. Food production is vital for the world. It reduces our federal and international deficit. We should try to keep some younger farmers on the farms. It should be made a viable enough operation that they can work full-time at it.

Before my time runs out, I should like to ask the minister a few questions concerning the herd maintenance program. But first of all I should like to ask a question which directly concerns the estimates. How many person-years are included in the estimates under the area of research and development for this coming year as opposed to last year? If the minister will allow me a few more minutes after answering that question, I will have some questions concerning the herd maintenance program.

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member indicated that he had a question for me, but I have written down about five while he was talking. The person-years in research for 1980-81 are indicated at 3,659, which is slightly down from 1979-80 when it was 3,673 or from 1978-79 when it was 3,725. The actual number of researchers has declined, but the number of people with Ph.Ds. have increased by 14; that is, that classification of researcher. It is not very much, but it is a slight increase. We find it difficult to obtain qualified people within the limitations we are guided by. We are limited as to the amount of money we are allowed to pay them.

Mr. Anguish: I did not realize I had asked the minister so many questions, but I would be happy to hear his answers to some of my opening comments.

I should like to ask the minister some questions about the herd maintenance program. I will ask a series of questions, sit down, and allow the minister to answer at whatever length he would like. Under the herd maintenance program, many farmers throughout Saskatchewan were designated as being outside the drought areas, even though in some areas we have substantial proof from the municipalities and private rain gauges that the rainfall within those areas was actually less than fell inside the drought area. We have been told by the minister in the House—perhaps it was not in the House, but certainly it was through correspondence from the minister's office—that these people will be dealt with. Now that cheques are going out to the people who have qualified for drought assistance in drought areas, when can we expect these other farmers and ranchers to be dealt with under the herd maintenance program?

I have a second question concerning that program. I was wondering why PMU horse operations were not included under the herd maintenance program. Would the minister consider including them, so that the people involved in PMU operations could apply through the appeal process to receive assistance?

Mr. Whelan: A decision was taken on Monday of this week which recommended that people involved in PMU operations be included under this program, as well as people with herds of milking goats, and, I believe, one other group excluded from the herd maintenance program. I believe three groups have been included. Perhaps this is not tremendous, but they have suffered hardships and we recognize that they should be included in it? What was the hon. member's other question?

• (2150)

Mr. Anguish: When will the people outside the drought area be dealt with?

Mr. Whelan: I hope that the appeal committee will be set up by the end of this week. It will be publicly announced when they get into operation, which we hope will be as soon as possible. It has taken us longer than normal because it is a new program and a new experience for us. It has taken longer to get all the ramifications out of the way. I believe about 11,000 cheques have been mailed out and that about 35,000 applications have been submitted, some of which are actually being returned to the people. So people who are outside of the area will be able to appeal those decisions. I am not saying how they will be treated. I hope it will be in a very humanitarian way because we recognize that to set that criteria with rainfall—

The Deputy Chairman: I regret to interrupt the minister but his time is up.

Mr. Hovdebo: Mr. Chairman, I wish to continue from where I left off a few hours ago. I would like to spend some time on the marketing structure of the country.

The free market system has been allowed to work in a way that the input into farming has affected the costs of the farmer so that his income has been reduced. In the couple of cases where we do have marketing systems—which we think are pretty good, for example, the Wheat Board—we found that the Wheat Board was not allowed to work well on the international market because of the embargo. It was not allowed to work well in the domestic market because of the feed grain policy which was established by the government. However, there are a number of other areas where the minister has mentioned marketing systems on a national basis which have and are doing a good job. For instance, he mentioned the dairy policy, broiler chickens, eggs and turkey marketing boards. However, I would like to ask the minister about the plans for hog marketing and stabilization. Is the federal government prepared to introduce a national hog marketing commission and an adequate stabilization plan. If so, when does he plan to do so?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Chairman, I am meeting the Canadian Pork Council tomorrow morning for breakfast at eight o'clock. I do not know what we will decide, or if we will decide anything. It appears the program which the provincial and federal officials have been working on has not received the kind of unanimous support which I would have liked to have seen. What I would have liked to have seen would have been participation from the producers and from the provincial governments. Some provinces are in favour of it and some are not. So it appears, unless I find out differently tomorrow, that if we were to go ahead we would have to involve the federal government and the producers. It does not appear there will be that kind of provincial participation. It appears four provinces are ready to go ahead with programs of their own; it cannot work nationally with just four provinces. At the present time I just cannot see a national program working with the income assurance program we are suggesting, like the Western Grain Stabilization Program. We are not getting the kind of input from some of the provinces that we should be getting.

Mr. Hovdebo: The Canadian Wheat Board was established to cover only the prairie areas. It might be possible for the minister to extend this kind of organization to those areas which want the stabilization and marketing board.

I would like to ask an almost identical question with respect to beef marketing. Is the federal government prepared to introduce a national beef marketing commission and adequate stabilization for slaughter cattle? And, again, if it is to be introduced, when will that be?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Chairman, I should clarify one thing. I hope I did not leave the hon. member with the impression that we are establishing a hog marketing commission. That has not been the subject of discussion. What we are talking about is a hog stabilization type and income assurance system. This is something like the one we projected for the provinces about four years ago and at that time the only province which went ahead with it was the province of British Columbia, under the previous administration. I am tempted to recommend to the government the establishment of a beef marketing commission. Even the member who speaks so eloquently in the House on beef may be ready to accept something better than the horrible system we have for marketing beef at the present time. He has been telling us about the bad economics of that for the last five years.

Mr. Hargrave: No way.

Mr. Whelan: We do know there is a stronger movement afoot, and I am not talking about the beef cattle. I am talking about the beef producers in Ontario. I am told they have an organization which has close to 2,000 members. Those members are very active in the promotion of a beef marketing system. They want a better system than we have at the present time.

We talked earlier about the meat import law, Mr. Chairman, and what can be done with it. Some members think we can do with the meat import law what we can do with the supply management type of marketing system. You cannot do that with the meat import law. No meat import law in the world does that.

Mr. Hovdebo: Those of us who live in Saskatchewan do a lot of mixed farming. Our herds are small and we are not able to finance the long-term losses. Some kind of stabilization and market control, which implies some supply control, would be welcome.

My last question to the minister deals with the considerable concern expressed in the last few months as to whether Canada can meet the targets which have been expressed with regard to production in the grain area. In Saskatoon it was recently suggested that production could be increased by the required amount and that one-quarter of that amount could be attributed to research efforts. I have a couple of questions with respect to this area before my time is up. What kind of commitment has the government made to the kind of research which is necessary to bring production up to 30 million tonnes by 1985 or later? To what extent is the government prepared to demonstrate that the results of that research will work? To what extent is the government prepared to get that research out to the farmers? Right now our present growth is about 2 per cent. To reach that target we would have to increase production by 4 per cent per year, which is not typical and which is pretty unlikely to happen. How much effort is the government willing to make in order to get it out to the farmers?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Chairman, all I can say is that if the research I am aware of in western Canada concerning grain were all applied next year you could increase production 25 per cent to 30 per cent in one year, with better fertilization, better seeds and better control of weeds. Of course, the hon. member from Regina East might not want us to do that, but by using herbicides and pesticides in a better fashion, a more conservation-minded method, we know we could do a better job.

There are many areas in which we are carrying out research. I have seen some of the projects. I visited some of the different stations this year. They show a yield which would be 20 bushels above what the average farmer would be producing just with new kinds of conservation, soil conservation and the use of the other commodities I have mentioned.

[Translation]

Mr. Corriveau: Mr. Chairman, it gives me great pleasure to take part in the debate this evening because my constituency is half urban and half rural and especially because agriculture in my area is represented by the dairy industry. I thought my comments would relate mostly to the dairy industry, but the previous speakers have discussed it remarkably well and have emphasized every pertinent point.

I would like to refer to an incident which will remind some of us a time when the dairy industry was experiencing some problems. A great many people had marched on Ottawa. The minister, I and others had been generously showered with free dairy products. We all know now that times have changed since those people had come to criticize the dairy policy, especially your marketing. I would like to add that the policies of the Department of Agriculture, especially as regards marketing, are well considered and devised. However, considering the approach to marketing, there will always be some people to criticize any policy, especially marketing, and when every means is taken to destroy it I think that eventually something comes out of it. Still I can assure you that things have changed. I received a letter from some farmers on November 19 and it reads as follows:

The federal government has recently undertaken an interdepartmental survey of the dairy policy in Canada. That initiative is taken before the government has renewed its long-term commitment to a dairy policy; usually the commitments of the government should now be known. The Dairy Farmers of Canada wish to remind the government that the milk industry is of crucial importance to the Canadian economy and that it must be considered as an important link in the Canadian food chain.

A decision on the part of the government to reduce considerably the size of the dairy industry would have negative consequences not only for milk producers but also for the secondary industry as well as Canadian consumers.

We are presenting you with this short document setting forth the views of the Dairy Farmers of Canada regarding the dairy policy. Our administrators want to stress among other things the importance within the framework of the federal government's commitment, of the revision of the production cost indexation formula and the continuation of the direct subsidy designed to prevent an excessive rise in the prices of the dairy products thereby helping Canadian consumers.

We hope that this short statement will enable you to recognize the importance of the dairy industry's role in the Canadian economy because it enables many rural and urban communities to survive. This issue is of primary importance to Quebec since milk production is the cornerstone of its agriculture and that of the food product industry of that province.

Moreover, some 50 per cent of the volume required on the domestic market is produced in Quebec.

We trust, sir, that you will read with special interest the document which we are sending to you and that you will make sure that the decisions made by the various levels of government reflect the positions expressed in this document by the representatives of the Canada and Quebec dairy industries.

The Canadian Dairy Commission administers the federal subsidy and milk prices stabilization program while the establishment of quotas—and I stress his—and the collecting of levies are the responsibility of dairy producers associations and provincial organizations. Mr. Chairman, I wanted to read this letter into the record because I wanted to prove that it is not the marketing of the Department of Agriculture, together with the Canadian Dairy Commission which is not good. The same people who not so long ago criticized this policy and the marketing system would not accept any change made by the Minister of Agriculture under any circumstances. As I said, my remarks concerning the dairy industry will be limited to these, because my colleagues who have dealt with the government's dairy policy have built a very strong case.

I should like to mention that some of the programs which the Minister of Agriculture has implemented on behalf of the Canadian government have demonstrated that we can provide Canadian farmers with well planned long-term assistance. I should like to explain what the federal Minister of Agriculture means when he talks about long-term planning in agriculture.

I have here a news release, dated November 14, 1980, from the Minister of Agriculture, and I quote:

The Minister of Agriculture today announced a program to assist in transporting about 10,500 tonnes of Ontario juice apples to processors in Quebec and Nova Scotia.

This year's Ontario processing apple crop, estimated at 75,000 tonnes, is about 10,500 tonnes more than the Ontario apple juice industry needs, Mr. Whelan said.

However, apple processors in Quebec and Nova Scotia are experiencing a shortage of juice apples in their areas.

The federal government will pay two-thirds, about $375,000, of the cost of transporting the apples. Eastern processors will pay the remainder of the transportation cost.

I believe this program will help Ontario apple producers dispose of their surplus crop, and it will help processors in Quebec and Nova Scotia meet their need for juice apples.

Mr. Chairman, all those programs the Minister of Agriculture offers us will certainly help Canadian agriculture to develop.

Allow me to quote another announcement the Minister of Agriculture kindly made to the farmers of Canada, and especially those of Quebec:

—May 30, 1980—Today, the Minister of Agriculture announced that a cheque for $5 million was sent the Quebec minister of agriculture, fisheries and food, Mr. Jean Garon, under the Feed Freight Equalization Program.

As a result of the very high demand for assistance from the farmers, the $6.7 million earmarked annually by the federal government for that program have been used up. We are therefore releasing funds previously intended for the coming fiscal year (1980-81) to meet the requests of the farmers during the fiscal year 1979-80. The Feed Freight Equalization Program was set up in 1978 to help increase the production and storage of feed in Quebec, Ontario and British Columbia.

Those funds will also help make up for the cancellation of the Feed Freight program that applied to feed coming from the prairies. Under the agreement reached with Quebec, the federal government will pay $33.5 million over a period ending in 1983. That program is administered wholly by the provincial government; it extends four types of financial assistance: for the storage of feed and cereal on the farm; for the purchase of crop equipment; for the improvement of feed conservation; and for the production of seed grains. The program has already been of considerable assistance to Quebec farmers in helping them meet their feed requirements. The program also fits in well with the over-all strategy of the province for agricultural development.

Mr. Chairman, that, to my mind, is another proof that the Minister of Agriculture wants to set up a planning program to help Canadian farmers stay in agriculture while helping to ensure a viable agricultural sector. Farmers are relatively large consumers of energy, and it was felt that they should be helped.

The Minister of Agriculture said that he was very pleased with the announcement of the Energy Supplies Allocation Board, saying that the primary sectors of production and processing of essential perishable goods will be in category A and that in a national crisis, they would have priority in the allocation of oil products.

According to the oil products allocation program of the board, the various uses for oil are broken down into different categories. Category A is composed of all uses concerning the health, welfare and security of Canadians.

The minister observed that these priorities were in line with the position he took with his provincial colleagues during the meeting on energy matters they held in Brandon, last October.

He also indicated that producers and processors of essential perishable goods will be allocated the maximum amount of fuel in an emergency. Therefore the supply of Canadians in essential goods will not be interrupted.

In consultation with Agriculture Canada, the board will determine what sectors of the agricultural and food industry will be classified in the A and B categories. The minister can rest assured that Canadian farmers did not expect any less from him than this statement giving them the guarantee that in the event of an energy crisis, they will be able to maintain their supplies of oil, which is an essential product for the Canadian agriculture.

I would like to demonstrate once again that the present Minister of Agriculture makes every effort humanly possible to help Canadian farmers. Recently he went to China to discuss market possibilities with Chinese officials. Canada-China co-operation has had a significant boost today with the signature of an agreement between the two countries. The agreement signed by Agriculture Canada and the Chinese ministries of agriculture, state farms and land rehabilitation calls for closer co-operation between our countries in several areas, such as joint projects, information and material exchanges, scientific visits and commercial contacts.

The first activity organized under this agreement is a visit by a Chinese delegation which will come to study our agricultural legislation. This is the first time such an agreement is signed between a Canadian department and its Chinese counterpart. The implementation of this agreement will be subject to yearly consultations between the Canadian and Chinese agriculture departments. The minister announced the signing of this agreement during a press conference in Peking after a meeting with the deputy prime minister and the chairman of the Chinese Agriculture Commission.

Mr. Chairman, we should be happy that the Deparment of Agriculture has taken this approach and these initiatives to help our producers gain access to domestic markets and entertain the possibility of reaching world markets. Under this agreement, there are some projects that could be implemented as early as 1980-81, for example, a joint research program on route management, the setting up of a model ranch in north-eastern China, various seminar-conferences with assorted activities and possibly study and work exchanges. The Minister of Agriculture was the first in that capacity to visit China.

I want to emphasize how important it is for us that our farms are family operations in 95 per cent of cases and that the minister has opted for an agricultural policy that favours such types of operation. Take, for example, the loan policy of the Farm Credit Corporation. Last year 98 per cent of loans were granted to unincorporated family operations, and most of the incorporated operations were controlled by farmers. The stabilization program under the Agricultural Stabilization Act as well as the Western Grain Stabilization Act set the minimum and maximum amounts to ensure that the bulk of the money goes to family type farms rather than farm corporations. Also, agricultural research attempts to find ways to make the family farm more profitable. In the short term, that will boost farm income and in the longer term it will make it possible for Canadian farmers to compete with foreign farmers and to ensure the viability of their operation.

Mr. Chairman, I agree with the minister's position that we must do our utmost to ensure that farms continue to be operated by families. Mr. Minister, I share your concern over the fact that the number of such operations has decreased continually in the last 20 years as it went from 480,000 in 1961 to 340,000 in 1976, yet I do think that the worst is behind us. In other words there are fewer farmers in Canada. I dare hope that the number of commercial farms in Canada is levelling off and I say we have everything we need to increase our production.

With more intensive farming methods there could even be more farms. World population is growing at the rate of about 2 per cent a year. We have the land, the farmers and the required knowledge to produce more food. Economic development did contribute to raise the standard of living in several Third World countries. New markets are now available for Canadian dairy products and meat. There are hundreds of marketing opportunities for a whole range of Canadian products.

Canadian agricultural production, besides benefitting from tremendous export possibilities, can also develop its domestic markets. Do hon. members know that more than half of the $4.7 billion of food imported in Canada last year were competing directly with food we produce or could produce right here in Canada? Therefore we must try harder to make consumers replace at least some imports with food produced in Canada. But that will require the co-operation of farmers, processors, federal and provincial governments. The Minister of Agriculture is already initiating a certain number of projects.

Mr. Chairman, once again I am extremely happy to have taken part in this debate and in conclusion I should like to urge the Minister of Agriculture and his team to keep on giving farmers such good programs. Keep up the good work, Mr. Minister. We like you just the way you are.

[English]

Mr. Greenaway: I am sure the minister is aware that the Canadian livestock industry provides about 50 per cent of the farm cash receipts in this country. He may not be aware that only 20 per cent of the research dollar is spent in this area and only 6 per cent of this 20 per cent is related directly to research in diseases of livestock.

Tonight I would like to talk for a moment about a research laboratory in Saskatoon with which I think the minister is familiar, the Veterinary Infectious Disease Organization, VIDO. Some years back the farm community and veterinarians in the country recognized this gap in research. They were able to mobilize funds and build a $4 million laboratory in Saskatoon on the campus of the University of Saskatchewan. It is not part of the university. It is simply located there because it is close to the college of veterinary medicine, and the university donated the five acres of land on which the laboratory is located. The board of directors is made up of 12 members, five of them producers representing all the main producer groups. Two are members of the University of Saskatchewan and the three are from government, one each from the government of Alberta, the government of Saskatchewan and the federal government. There are also two businessmen on the board.

The producers select the diseases to be researched. They are looking for diseases which cause great economic loss to the producers of Canada. The first one they picked was neo-natal diarrhoea in calves, or calf scours. The minister is probably aware that this laboratory has done some outstanding work. It made a major breakthrough two years ago and has now licensed to Connaught Laboratories a vaccine which is very efficient in preventing scours caused by E-coli in calves.

This vaccine is now licensed in the United States. It is hoped to have it licensed in South America and Europe soon. There will be a good dollar return to Canada from sales of this vaccine.

It is interesting to look where the funding came from for this laboratory. Over 60 producer groups from across Canada have put in money. For example, the Canadian Egg Marketing Agency put in $50,000, the Canadian Turkey Marketing Agency, $200,000 and the Alberta Cattle Commission $90,000. I could read on and on. The government of Alberta put in almost $2 million and the government of Saskatchewan over $1 million. The British Columbia government contributed, as did the government of Manitoba. The drug companies put in about $200,000 and the Devonian Group of Charitable Foundations, located in Calgary, put in approximately $3.5 million.

To date about $8,800,000 has been donated by these various groups along with dozens and dozens of individual producers. It is interesting to note that over the seven-year period this lab has been in existence the federal government has donated $43,000 to this institution, which is less than one-half of one per cent of total capital expenditures and operating costs to date.

The director, Dr. Chris Bigland, a world famous figure, was recently selected by the Ontario Veterinary Association for his outstanding contribution to the science and given an award. I think the last person to get this award was James Herriot. It is an extremely efficient, well run and good research laboratory.

The director has been to Ottawa about 25 times to solicit funds for this laboratory. These trips have cost from $30,000 to $50,000. He has met with Agriculture Canada, the Science Council, the Ministry of State for Science and Technology, the Ministry of Trade and Commerce, the NRC, NSERC, IDRC, EDP, the food and drug directorate of health and welfare, MRC, Canada Manpower and DREE. He has presented three briefs to the minister, one in 1975, one in 1978 and one in 1979.

My question to the minister is this: what is wrong with the federal government? Why can we not afford to put some meaningful funds into this laboratory? It is doing an outstanding job. They are also working on poultry and swine diseases and have launched a major drive on shipping fever in cattle.

I should also add they are getting royalties from Connaught Laboratories, but this vaccine they came up with is not patentable. They will probably lose the lead on that in two or three years, and the money coming in from the royalties will be diffused by other companies getting into the business. I ask the minister to comment on the fact that only 6 per cent of the 20 per cent figure for research is designated in Canada for disease research in livestock and on the fact that the federal government has seen fit so far to only put a piddling amount into this laboratory.

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Chairman, I am very much aware of the laboratory and the research the hon. member is talking about. It is tremendous that somebody else is getting into research. I have the largest budget for research of any ministry in Canada. This year we are spending $155 million on research. There is nothing wrong with what is spent by governments on agricultural research. The federal government pays for 98 per cent of the research and the provinces 2 per cent.

The hon. member mentioned that the money is put in by Alberta. I think that is a tremendous thing to do with their Heritage Fund. If they would give me a couple of million bucks or a little pile of it, I would spend it on research. The hon. member for Vegreville is sitting with a very charitable look on his face as though he thinks that is a good idea. I can see this disease which causes a high mortality rate in calves being controlled by research.

The hon. member for Medicine Hat talked earlier about cattle and increasing the population. I am very much aware of what this disease causes in some areas. Going from memory, I believe we lost as much as 55 per cent of the calf crop in some areas. That was a tremendous loss.

All research done with regard to livestock is done to benefit all parts of Canada. The hon. member acknowledged that. The fact that donations have come from across Canada, including the marketing agencies, shows that they have faith in what is being done. I think more money should come from the private sector rather than the government sector. I would love to be able to say that I have money for them and will give it to them. We have tried to find ways to help them. We are ready to move 12 of our scientists from the laboratory in Guelph to work at the university laboratories in Saskatoon and to work in conjunction with VIDO. That is not exactly what the member for Medicine Hat said he wanted. However, I did mention VIDO when he made representations to me about agriculture research in western Canada. He was making a comparison. He said we spent more in eastern Canada than in western Canada. I saw the hon. member at the B.C. cattlemen's annual meeting in Cranbrook. He made a representation to me there about it.

I think this is one of the most worth-while programs there is. If they can find a cure for this disease, it will be a tremendous breakthrough. I just don't have the funds.

Mr. Mazankowski: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman. The Minister of Agriculture referred to me in his comment. I want to point out to him that one of the reasons the province of Alberta has a heritage trust fund is because it exercises prudent financial management. If the government of which the Minister of Agriculture is a member would exercise such tight fiscal managerial controls over the funds entrusted to them, they would probably have some money to spend on some of the programs to which my colleague is referring.

The Chairman: The hon. member has hardly made a point of order.

Mr. Gurbin: I should like to follow the questions put forward by my colleague and try to spend more time on research and development. I will make my questions short so as to get short answers as well and perhaps cover some of the relationships between agriculture and energy. It is an increasingly important area. If the minister and his department understand this area they certainly do not seem to have been very successful in bringing forward solutions for some of the problems which are developing. From some of the answers given here, the minister seemed to indicate he felt that Agriculture Canada was indeed putting what it should into research and development. However, his own research and development branch, particularly on the basis of the comments they made in front of the alternative energy committee, is well aware their efforts are very much less than they should be. They are now getting $1.5 million to do all the research and development for energy related to agriculture for the whole country in an area where the federal government clearly should be taking leadership. Even to do the basic minimum they would need about $9 million in about 30 man-years. Would the minister comment as to whether he feels that is an appropriate level of funding and of man-years?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member mentions a figure. As early as 1974, Agriculture Canada began funding research on alternative energy for agriculture. The funds invested in contract research are now $4 million. We know that research is very important. Some of our own people point out that for every dollar invested in research a $9-return is received. We have funded over 50 per cent of all research done in Canada. Let us not forget about the amount of money we give to universities. When I first came to Ottawa we gave $26 million to the higher schools of learnings. Last year we gave well over $2 billion to the higher schools of learning and they are doing a lot of research in agriculture. We are paying 50 per cent of all administration costs in universities out of federal taxation moneys. Even the school where the hon. member received his medical education benefits; it cost us $250,000 to put him through school. That is not done for very many young farmers in any fashion or form. The veterinarians who go through school are funded by this tremendous amount of money and we are accused of being the bad financers of the country and the mismanagers of the economy. Alberta takes 45 per cent of the revenue from the resources from under the ground and we did not contribute anything to them, we just happened to be living on top of them. If that is good management then I would like to be part of that good management. Perhaps then I could look after some of those things they want me to spend more money on such as research. I do not have the resources to draw from. It has very little to do with good management as the hon. member for Vegreville said. They do not know what to do with it. They do not know how to spread it around and make it grow.

Mr. Gurbin: Mr. Chairman, the minister has been very ably side-stepping my question. The point of the issue is that agriculture uses about 3 per cent of all of the total energy demand of the whole country. I am not asking him about Alberta or some other province managing its own resources or whether Quebec is looking after its hydroelectric power any better than Alberta is looking after its oil. I do not think that is relevant.

Will the minister provide some leadership at the national level to farmers who have problems with energy costs relating to the operation of their tractors and energy costs related to fertilizer costs. The National Energy Board tells us there is going to be an increase of $4.5 per barrel of oil per year for the next three years. That equates a cost of production going from $3.5 per acre up to about $14 per acre depending on what farmers are growing.

The Canadian Federation of Agriculture came before us and presented a brief asking the federal government to provide some leadership. I am asking the minister to do three specific things and comment on whether he thinks they are appropriate for the government to do at the national level. One is to audit on-farm energy uses so that Agriculture Canada may tell farmers where they can save, where they can conserve and where they can implement proper oil substitution measures. The second is to make an on-farm assessment of what opportunities are available for different farmers to take advantage of alternate energy forms. There are many energy forms but I do not have an opportunity here today to talk about all of them. The minister is well aware of some of them. Even though he has not done anything as yet and even though Agriculture Canada has not replaced one drop of oil on farms for farmers who have to work their fields, there are many, many opportunities. They could be assessed, they could be described, and assistance could be given.

The final thing the minister could do would be to assist at government level to provide the co-operative framework for farmers to put in pilot projects on farms for things such as ethanol plants. Those are three of the things the Canadian Federation of Agriculture asked for. Will the minister tell us if he will help through Agriculture Canada to provide that kind of assistance?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Chairman, if I understand correctly, the hon. member is talking about energy conservation demonstration projects.

Mr. Gurbin: These are three simple things the Canadian Federation of Agriculture has asked the federal government to assist with. I do not think the minister is "with it" as far as energy is concerned. I do not think he has a concept of what energy audit is all about. There is energy in and there is energy out. That is tremendously important in understanding how to manage energy resources. Farmers have energy inputs and energy outputs and Agriculture Canada could help to determine what those are through an energy audit. Then there is an assessment function which could be undertaken; Agriculture Canada, through some of its facilities would provide an assessment of the opportunities on a particular farm scene for taking advantage of different energy forms or for substitution away from oil. This is something his government has put forward as a priority. The final thing is pilot projects. This is clearly the way we have to go—through co-operative efforts and pilot projects to make sure we get some of these alternative energy sources developed.

Mr. Whelan: The hon. member has his view about my understanding of energy input and output on farms and that is his right. We have studied the energy input on farms. For instance, we have produced grain which is going to provide energy, we have assessed the amount of energy collected from the sun to produce crops and so on. We have done a lot of work on that. There is $8 million unused by the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources for pilot projects and submissions have been made to them and considered by the agricultural engineering department. I think there are some 40 demonstration projects of energy conservation and new ways of creating energy in Ontario at the present time, not paid for by my department but by the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources under that special fund. It is not $1.5 million; I believe there is $140 million in that fund for such programs. A lot of farmers are using them. The hon. member talks about the Federation of Agriculture and their farm audits. I do not know where the Canadian Federation of Agriculture got that idea. I have talked to some farmers about it and they are saying, "Are they telling me that I don't run an efficient operation, that I don't know how to run an efficient tractor, that I don't know how to cultivate my soil in the proper fashion?"

The whole program put forth by my colleague, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, takes in a wide sphere of things for conservation of energy and energy use.

● (2240)

I am just a plain ordinary farmer. I am not a highly educated person, but I know that all of the things about which the hon. member is talking are very important.

The Chairman: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. minister, but the time allotted to him has expired.

[Translation]

Mr. Tessier: Mr. Chairman, as you well know, I cannot let the opportunity pass by without mentioning the good battle I am waging with and on behalf of the farm producers of my riding. They all agree our Canadian dairy policy, has been quite sucessful and I am particularly proud to acknowledge the wonderful co-operation we have received from the Liberal government especially the Minister of Agriculture. Mr. Chairman, earlier today we heard the hon. member for Joliette praise and recommend the retention of our policy in all its aspects for which he tried to obtain a commitment from the minister.

However, Mr. Chairman, I would like to remind the hon. member for Joliette who used to boast he was the only real Quebec representative, that the Canadian dairy policy has been based on serious thoughts and hard facts, particularly with the co-operation of members from Quebec. I believe the hon. member for Joliette should be corrected when he claims members on this side do not assume their responsibilities. That policy has not been designed in a haphazard way. It is the result of the combined actions of the present liberal government and the former liberal government whose policies proved very satisfactory to producers over the years.

I do not want to take the time of the House as I think the various aspects of the dairy policy have already been dealt with in many ways. I only would like to address one aspect which has not been discussed so far, and which should shed some light on the whole matter in view of the fact that the Chairman of the Canadian Dairy Commission—and I take this opportunity to congratulate him for his outstanding job—gave us the reassurance that the Canadian dairy policy should be open and clean, but I have a reservation to make on that point as I happen to believe sour manipulations have taken place, which must be brought out into the open. Unfortunately I must, in their respect, blame the attitude of the Quebec Farm Marketing Board which, with the apparent and probable complicity of the present Quebec minister of agriculture, refused to let the board launch an investigation which had proved necessary.

I strongly urge the Minister of Agriculture to provide fair treatment, especially for small producers, so that they may have a marketing board whose operations will be clear and straightforward and of which they can be proud, even though every aspect of its activities must be protected if we want to keep the confidence of producers in all sectors of agriculture.

Mr. Chairman, being certain that the government will be willing to proceed with this investigation, I would like to speak of a matter which has not been neglected until now but which deserves further attention. In the past, the federal government has provided many tools to the agricultural producers of Canada, and it is of one of them that I would like to speak, namely, the Livestock Feed Assistance Act. As you know, Mr. Chairman, there is a Canadian Livestock Feed Board in Montreal. This board is responsible for all Canadian provinces except the prairies. This year, the act was amended to include the Northwest Territories and the Yukon. As a matter of fact, this government initiative was aimed at meeting several needs. Through their farming associations, the producers were complaining of supply problems in obtaining all the feed that they needed for their cattle and poultry. We had been informed at the time that grain inventory transfers at Fort William-Port Arthur, now Thunder Bay, were often insufficient to meet the needs for winter through the seaway before the shipping season came to an end.

Grain suppliers tried to ship all the grain needed for the winter months before shipping closed. Because of insufficient stocks, eastern Canada suppliers had to obtain significant quantities by railway at a surcharge of $13.20 per tonne. This resulted in undue price increases. There were often problems in storing enough grain at the port of Montreal before the shipping season ended because of competition for space between grain for export and grain for the domestic market.

For all these reasons, the Canadian Federation of Agriculture recommended that the government create a special board. This board now has approximately the powers recommended at the time by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, and also by the Standing Committee of the House on Agriculture and Colonization which had examined the issues concerning feed grain prices since March 22, 1965. There were therefore two major problems at the time, a supply problem and a price problem. We cannot say that all problems have been solved, but there is at least an agency which can respond in a case of emergency, find solutions and help livestock producers.

I talked earlier about the territory covered by the board since the promulgation of the Livestock Feed Assistance Act on November 16, 1966. I would like to point out that this territory includes the provinces which report deficits in the production of feed grains. For instance, Ontario still has a deficit even though it has greatly increased its production of feed grains. Naturally, it must be pointed out that part of the Ontario production is used for human consumption and alcohol production. The objectives of the Livestock Feed Assistance Act are very clear. Indeed, Mr. Chairman, the board must ensure, first, the availability of feed to meet the needs of livestock producers. Second, the availability in eastern Canada of sufficient feed storage space to meet the needs of livestock producers. Third, reasonable stability of feed prices in eastern Canada, British Columbia, the Yukon and the Northwest Territories. And finally, a fair equalization of feed prices in eastern Canada, British Columbia, the Yukon and the Northwest Territories. These objectives are of major importance for eastern Canada and British Columbia, and indirectly, for the country as a whole.

Canada is a very large country with a population greatly concentrated in the southern part. Moreover, we have to face an extremely rigorous climate during winter, and the most economic route, the St. Lawrence Seaway, is paralysed for four months of the year, which makes the distribution of grains even more difficult. In addition, Canada has one of the most sophisticated food diets in the world, based largely on protein products. Such a diet means that we have to produce large quantities of the products required by consumers, and as we all know, for many animal products, feed grains represent over 60 per cent of production costs. If we examine more closely the objectives of the Livestock Feed Assistance Act, we realize that the government has acted promptly whenever the normal flow in the transport and handling of feed grains has been interrupted.

I especially recall the enormous difficulties that farmers had in the spring of 1975. The possibilities of interruption are always present because of the size of our country, the complexity of the industry, and the many factors which can interfere with this industry. The act provides the board with certain well-defined powers. For instance, the board can make payments for feed storage costs in eastern Canada and payment for the cost of transport of feed grains to livestock producers or for their benefit in accordance with the regulations.

In addition, the board can negotiate with those who store feed grains to reduce and stabilize storage and handling costs and provide sufficient space for feed storage in eastern Canada. The board can also distribute the storage space allotted for its use among those who need it in eastern Canada. It can direct negotiations to obtain import permits. It can also purchase, sell and store grains with the authorization of the governor in council.

The board also has very specific duties, Mr. Chairman, namely, to provide an ongoing review of the feed needs of eastern Canada, British Columbia and the Northwest Territories, of feed availability and the need for additional storage space for this feed in these areas. It must also make recommendations to the minister concerning the need for additional feed storage space in eastern Canada. As a rule, the board also advises the government on all matters relating to stabilization and fair equalization of feed prices for livestock feeders; as well, inasmuch as it meets these purposes, it consults and co-operate with all departments, ministries, branches or any other government agencies of the federal government or of a province whose attributions, purposes and objectives are similar to those of the board.

The governor in council may occasionally authorize the Board to inquire and do some research on all matters directly relating to transportation, storage and handling of feed grain in eastern Canada and British Columbia, to feed supplies and prices in these regions, to payments made for feed storing and moving expenses under the Livestock Feed Assistance Act. The minister and the board benefit from advice given to them by an advisory committee made up of livestock feeders from eastern Canada and British Columbia as well as the Northwest Territories and appointed by the governor in council.

I am perfectly aware of the fact that Canadians do not always know the important powers and duties of the board, and that is why I wanted to mention them. I should say as well, Mr. Chairman, that we have the responsibility to take advantage of this debate on supply to remind the duties and powers of the board to our colleagues of the opposition who are not only questioning the raison d'être of the Livestock Feed Board, but who also want to see it disappear, as we have been able to hear.

Mr. Chairman, I therefore want to establish beyond any doubt not only the rationale of the board but also its ability to meet the needs of producers in these regions I have mentioned on many occasions. The board is still carrying on several activities. You are already aware of its participation in the area of transportation assistance. You know also that many changes were made to this program in 1976 and that two-thirds of the program have been cancelled in Quebec, and most of it in Ontario. However, funds have been paid to these provinces over five years in order to set up feed grains conservation facilities at the farm level.

When you travel across the country in those provinces, you will note that numerous facilities have been erected, to the point that these farm buildings have changed the scenery. The transport assistance program remains very useful to the maritime cattle producers, and certainly in Newfoundland where there would be no cattle production without that program. It is also very useful in British Columbia, where production costs are very high. The program allows for greater domestic use of western feed grain, and also Ontario corn in some areas of Quebec and the Atlantic provinces.

I would also like to point out that in Quebec, the transport assistance program has been maintained in remote areas such as Saguenay-Lac-Saint-Jean, Abitibi-Témiscamingue and the Gaspé Peninsula. Over these last few years, Mr. Chairman, the government introduced a program to ensure greater storage space in eastern Canada and B.C. This is in three parts.

One program provides for the expansion of flour mill storage facilities. There has been extensive use of that program in the province of Quebec and also, to a lesser degree, in the other provinces. It will improve feed grain storage facilities at the processor level. The other two programs cater to inland elevators. I am told that these programs, especially the new elevator construction program, has met with extraordinary success in eastern Ontario. That program could not have come at a better time, when Ontario was increasing significantly its grain production. I am assured that this increase in the number of inland elevators will be followed by considerably increased corn sowing in eastern Ontario during the next few years. Besides, this program certainly enabled the grain producers to reduce considerably their transportation costs and consequently add to their revenues. Such a program was called for because livestock producers living on their farms were extremely dependent on a few elevators which had traditionally been used mostly for the export trade.

Mr. Chairman, I hope that these few minutes I have taken to deal with the different aspects of the duties of the Canadian Livestock Feed Board will have proved without question not only reasonably but with certainty that the Canadian Livestock Feed Board has a raison d'être and that our government is justified in helping and maintaining it.

[English]

Mr. Reid (St. Catharines): Mr. Chairman, some members might wonder why a representative of an urban municipality should intervene in this agricultural discussion, but all here should be interested in the preservation of first-class soil for future agricultural purposes. The Niagara region is agriculturally a well diversified area; its orchards and vineyards are renowned. It is an exceedingly small part of the country, but it is favoured in many ways. It is favoured by ample precipitation, rich soil and a temperate climate which, together with the determination and the individual initiative of its farmers and growers, has yielded produce far beyond expectations.

● (2300)

However, the concerns of farmers and growers in the Niagara region are echoed all across the country. Issues such as urban expansion into productive agricultural land need to be resolved so that some balance between the two can be preserved. The entire question of what the farmer can expect as an equitable return for his labour must be addressed, for farming is an expensive proposition to undertake. For example, while the consumer price index rose by 95 per cent from 1971 to 1979, the farm price index increased by 130 per cent. For 1979 alone farmers experienced increases of 14 per cent in machinery costs and an additional 7 per cent with respect to labour. These are only a fraction of the total costs which the farmer must bear if he is to remain productive, and many simply cannot meet these costs with the result that every year the number of farms declines by 4 per cent. Canada is losing valuable agricultural land yearly, not through the adversities of nature, but through government neglect and indifference toward the problems of the farmer. Nowhere is this more graphically evident than in the Niagara Peninsula.

The minister knows of this conflict with respect to land use and the competition which exists. So, I want to leave my first question with him: is the minister or the Government of Canada content to leave the preservation and protection of farmlands to provincial and municipal governments and their zoning bylaws, or does the government have a land use strategy which will preserve class one lands, for example, for future agricultural purposes?

Today there are some 900 grape growers working 27,000 acres of vineyards. Capital investment for both vineyards and wine production is now in excess of $132 million, and the goods and services purchased annually by the industry amount to more than $38 million. Also, the grape and wine industry is one of the most heavily taxed enterprises of its size in Canada. While the growers realized $19 million in gross revenues last year, the federal and Ontario governments earn through excise and sale taxes approximately $100 million. In per acre yield this would represent an earning for both governments of $8,500 per acre. But this only touches the surface of the problems confronting the Canadian wine producers and the grape-growing industry.

Beginning last April the government imposed an exercise to increase on table wines, fortified wines and brandies. Wine sales plummeted downward, and in the October budget some relief was given to fortified wines. The tax continues on table wines, which is the most marketable product, and on brandies produced in Canada. Canada is the only wine-producing country which is literally taxing its own industry so heavily that imported products are awarded the advantage. Countries such as Austria, Italy, South Africa, Australia and West Germany impose no tax on their domestic wine products.

In terms of tariff protection, the Canadian government has not only effectively removed the $2 per gallon preferential treatment for Canadian brandy, but it instituted a policy under the Tariff Board decision of March, 1979, whereby the 20-cent per gallon tax grape juice used for wine-making purposes entering Canada was removed.

This allows for the importation of cheaper Brazilian grape juice into provinces other than Ontario for processing into wine which then competes with our totally Canadian-produced wines. Even if the imports are processed into non-alcoholic products, they are successfully closing the door to a market for Canadian surplus grapes.

My second question to the minister is: Why is there the necessity for the continued importation of offshore grape juices when the vineyards of Ontario can supply all the grape juice concentrate required for wine production in the country?

The specific case of the Canadian brandy industry most dramatically illustrates how government taxation has affected grape growers, distillers and consumers. Since 1972 the Rieder Distillery, which is located in my area, has played an important role in the agricultural life of Niagara grape growers. It began operations by purchasing 580 tonnes of low quality and surplus Labrusca grapes. By 1979 it was purchasing 4,000 tonnes of those same grapes. These were surplus and low quality grapes for which the distillery provided the only market.

Growers need this outlet and the Department of Agriculture recognized this need. In 1980 alone the projected purchases are estimated by the Agricultural Products Board at between 4,000 and 5,000 tonnes of grapes. The total cost to the Canadian taxpayer will be in the area of $2 million. The declared objective of this policy is as follows: because of the surplus which became apparent this year as a result of the April tax increase, the federal government will buy the grapes and have them processed by the wine industry into brandy which will be stored until the market is more favourable. It is both a contradiction and a flagrant waste of money to impose an excise tax which has cut the sales of brandy by 50 per cent since April of this year, and to turn around and buy the surpluses to be made into more brandy which will not be sold as long as the tax remains.

Brandy sales from 1978 to 1979 increased by 364 per cent, placing it first in Canada's brandy market. All those gains have been eliminated by the April excise tax increase. Mr. Rieder, the founder of the market for waste and surplus grapes, simply stated that he will stop buying grapes, sell off his existing stock at whatever price the market will bear, and close up shop.

In light of the minister's earlier commitment to the wine industry and to the grape grower of Niagara, I ask him to take such action as is necessary to restore this Canadian product to a competitive position so as to assist the Canadian distiller and provide some market to the Canadian grape grower for his surplus crop. I would be pleased to hear his answers.

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Chairman, I am sure the hon. member is well aware of what we have to do with land resources. I remember when the hon. member was mayor of a certain city and he annexed a large agricultural section of the Niagara area. He knows that it is under provincial jurisdiction, and that the federal government has nothing to do with land resources. I know what I would have told the mayor at that time, if I was a farm representative on a municipal board. I would have said, "You only have so much of that class land, you should not take it for urban development and roads".

With regard to the federal land policy, we have done all the mapping for the provinces, showing the various classes of land. Under the constitution we cannot move in and say that land shall not be used in the way someone is suggesting it should be used; I wish we could.

When the hon. member talked about the tax on grapes, let us be fair about who takes the biggest share on grapes which go into the making of wine. It is the province of Ontario. The province of Ontario takes double that of the federal government. We lowered the tax on wine. We said we would not implement the Crosbie tax.

I know the hon. member did not want the Crosbie tax on wine, and we fulfilled that part of our promise. Somehow brandy was forgotten, but let us be fair about brandy. Who created the brandy industry? It was the Minister of Agriculture for Canada who created the brandy industry and a former manager of the Grape Marketing Board who was later my executive assistant. We developed that program. He made representation to me when he was minister. He did the kind of things, Mr. Chairman, which made it possible for us to start a brandy industry. We are not finished with that yet, as far as I am concerned, and some of the members on this side of the House—

• (2310)

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. minister may have a chance to conclude his answer after the next speaker is finished. The hon. member for Malpeque.

Mr. Gass: Mr. Chairman, I see the time is slipping away and there are so many things I would like to question the Minister of Agriculture about. The hon. member for Carleton-Charlotte raised some questions with regard to the seed potato industry as it affects eastern Canada, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island. It is a concern of mine as well because of the importance of the seed potato industry to P.E.I. I would like to ask some questions on the feed freight equalization program and the feed freight assistance program as it affects dairy producers, beef producers and egg producers in P.E.I. but I am afraid that time does not permit that.

I will move directly to some questions regarding dairy policy. I will be brief. The five-year federal commitment to the dairy program and the forward pricing policy implemented in April of 1975 has not yet been renewed. I understand an extensive interdepartmental review of Canada's dairy policies is under way in the government. The five-year policy has been very successful according to the dairymen. Dairy producers across the country support the retention of this basic industrial and consumer policy. I listened intently earlier this evening when the member for Joliette dealt with the same topic. He was able to extract from the minister the fact that the program, the forward pricing policy, would be in effect in 1981. I am concerned about four years down the road, after 1981. I would like to know whether the minister can assure dairy producers that another five-year federal commitment for forward pricing can be guaranteed. As part of the federal stabilization program a direct subsidy is paid to producers of milk used in the manufacture of dairy products in order to moderate the price of dairy products to consumers. This subsidy, by encouraging consumption, enables Canada to have a larger milk industry than would otherwise be the case. The direct subsidy paid on a per hectalitre basis has remained at the level of $6.03 since April 1, 1975. In the five years since then, the real value of the subsidy has declined to $3.46. This has meant a progressive reduction in the real cost of the direct subsidy program to the federal treasury.

Another question I would like to pose to the minister is: can the minister assure dairy producers that there will be no reduction in the dollar amount of the direct subsidy paid to the producers? And, are there any plans to increase the amount of the subsidy? Dairy producers in Canada have just completed a very successful conference on milk recording. Milk recording involves the measuring of production of each cow in a dairy herd. This aids the farmer and makes for efficient dairy farm management. More money has to be put toward this aspect of dairy farming. Producers realize they will have to pay more, but they are anxious the government should also contribute. Can the minister assure dairy producers that the government will continue to back producers efforts in milk recording and that it will continue its commitment to this important aspect of dairy farm management?

Mr. Chairman, I have four questions for the minister. Can the minister assure dairy producers that another five-year federal commitment to forward pricing will be guaranteed? Can the minister also assure dairy producers that there will be no reduction in the dollar amount of the direct subsidy paid to producers? Are there any plans to increase the amount of this subsidy? My last question to the minister is: Can the minister assure dairy producers that the government will continue to back producers efforts in milk recording, or record of performance, and continue its commitment to this important aspect of dairy farm management? I will allow the minister time to respond because I want his answers.

Mr. Whelan: Can the minister assure the dairy farmers of Canada that they are going to still have the dairy policy which has been the best in the world? I think that was the question the hon. member asked. The answer is yes.

Mr. Gass: For how long?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Chairman, it has been pretty good for eight years. Even when the other government was in power they did not do anything to change the wonderful program which we had developed over a period of time.

With respect to the ROP program, yes, it will continue. It is one of the best in the world. It has developed the best genetic breed lines of cattle in any place in the world. It is the envy of the world. So the ROP test program which we developed over a period of time we will continue.

Will we increase the subsidy to farmers? No, because the pricing formula takes care of the increase which the farmers need to have a healthy dairy industry. It is one of the best in the world.

I think I have covered all the hon. member's questions.

Mr. Gass: One question, Mr. Chairman, which the minister did not answer, and I am sure it was an oversight on his part, was: can the minister assure dairy producers that there will be no reduction in the dollar amount of the direct subsidy paid to the producers?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Chairman, there has been no suggestion by me or anyone that there should be a reduction. We have not lowered it, nor have we increased it for five years. It has remained the same. The pricing formula allows them to get their return from the marketplace, which was the intention, as I said earlier today. Before the disastrous world situation arose, when the European communities threw hundreds of thousands of tons of skim milk powder and other dairy products on to the world market and depressed prices, we had the best managed supply system we have ever had in the history of the dairy business. I do not believe we have any unsold product at the present time. There are very low stocks in our warehouses and whatever is in them is sold.

Mr. Gass: Mr. Chairman, I would like to thank the minister for answering my questions. I have a few others which I would like to pose but I think time limits me. I am interested in what proposals the minister has to assist dairy producers, beef producers and egg producers in the maritimes regarding freight feed, grain freight equalization. I have noticed that from 1973 to the present time the cost has gone up from $16.31 per tonne to $36.70 per tonne of feed grain transported from Thunder Bay to Charlottetown. I have correspondence from the egg producers in P.E.I. which say they are having problems competing with Ontario and that they desperately need more assistance and more consideration in the area of feed grain freight equalization.

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Chairman, I am surprised to hear the member say he has correspondence with egg producers because egg producers are operating on a cost-pricing formula which takes into consideration the cost of feed, their interest charges, taxes, etc, the energy they use and so on. So if their feed is costing them more they are one of the groups which can recoup that cost from the product they sell. He says they cannot compete with Ontario producers but the vast majority of Ontario producers get no feed freight assistance whatsoever. Only in parts of northern Ontario is there any feed freight assistance at all at the present time. In all of southern Ontario, from North Bay southward, I do not believe there is any feed freight assistance whatsoever. There are a lot of people who have this misconception, but all I can say is that poultry producers of any description are properly looked after by a cost-pricing formula.

Those who choose the free market system to market their hogs and beef have no formula. If the market price is high enough to give them a proper return for their product, then they can pay for their feed. But if the market slumps and feed prices go up, there is no pricing formula and if they lose then they must seek support from the federal government under the agricultural stabilization plan if they are beef producers. And if they are hog producers they must ask for support from the provincial insurance program, which I understand went bankrupt last year because it ran out of funds.

Mr. Gustafson: Mr. Chairman, it is a pleasure to participate in this debate on agriculture. I represent an agricultural constituency, Assiniboia, which produces more wheat than any other constituency in Canada. I have listened with interest to the remarks of the minister over the past two days, particularly as they have related to his sabbatical leave. During his short sabbatical, the hon. members who sit in front of me, the hon. member for Elgin and the hon. member for Vegreville, did more for agriculture and transportation respectively in eight months than has been done in this country in 12 years.

The farmers of our area want a chance to produce, and I hope the minister will listen to their demands. The Toronto Star of today has a headline, "Put Canada to Work". The Economic Council of Canada says that we need to produce. What programs is the minister putting into action which will allow the farmers the opportunity to produce, to see their production marketed and to have their produce transported to market should the situation arise?

The minister was fortunate in a sense that production in the west was down because of the drought. I hope the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Transport will not rest on their laurels but continue the work which was begun by the hon. member for Vegreville and the hon. member for Elgin.

Mr. Whelan: What a bunch of nonsense!

Mr. Gustafson: Our farmers have some very special concerns, the first of which is the initial price of wheat. For the past two days the question has been asked again and again, "When is the minister going to announce the initial price increase in grain." We all know it has been selling for as high as $8 a bushel on the Vancouver market. But the minister says the farmers do not want the money. The minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board is saying that one way or another farmers do not know how to handle their money.

Many young farmers who find themselves in a cost-squeeze situation where it is very hard to pay the high interest rates charged for machinery and repairs to equipment; it is affecting production in general in agriculture today. The farmers are asking the government and the minister's department to jolt the minister for the Wheat Board into action in this regard.

A number of other questions come to mind. I received a letter today from a very concerned farmer in Scout Lake, Saskatchewan, who wanted to know what the government was doing about metric conversion. There is real confusion when the Prime Minister says in the throne speech that he will give special consideration to western Canada because his party has no members in that part of the country. What kind of consideration have we received? The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources wants to take over our resources. The minister responsible for metric conversion has caused confusion in the area. What does the Minister of Agriculture intend to do about metric conversion? The farmers and rural municipalities want to know whether the government will be calling acres hectares in the near future. The CBC has indicated that the chemical companies will be going to metric conversion. I would like the minister to answer on this matter, possibly by letter if there is no time this evening.

Another important area of concern to farmers is land ownership. They are concerned about the capital gains tax and the broken election promise on the evaluation day which is to be updated from 1971 to 1974. With regard to land ownership, does the Minister of Agriculture know that the Saskatchewan government has purchased about one million acres of land in Saskatchewan? Does the minister believe in state ownership? Will this socialist government in Ottawa join the socialist government in Saskatchewan and some day develop an aggressive policy on the ownership of land? This is a very important question to Canadians and the Saskatchewan farmer is particularly concerned. The Saskatchewan government bought up 65,000 quarter sections of prime land through a tax system which will eventually enable the government to take over ownership.

As farmers, we ask for the right to be productive. If the farms are owned by the state, Canada will quickly forget what the word production means. This is an important question which any minister of agriculture in a country such as Canada must take into consideration—the direction which the country will take with regard to land ownership.

In closing, I suggest that farmers be encouraged to produce. Production must not be restricted through taxation or in any other way. The government must fall in line with an economic development program so that Canada can become the productive country that it should be.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. There are only 30 seconds left for the minister to answer.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Chairman, I am glad to have this opportunity to discuss agriculture tonight because it is the principal interest and primary concern of many people in my riding. I will be brief because I want to hear some comments from the minister.

● (2330)

Tonight I shall focus very quickly and briefly on two subjects. The first is research and development. We must bear in mind the need for research as well as the need to translate it into farming techniques. The proof of success will be higher quality and production of farm products.

The second concern is transportation, particularly the transportation of farm products to market. It is useless to increase production if the crops cannot be brought to market. They just end up sitting on the farm, costing money.

One of the primary concerns in regard to research and development is rapeseed. The present strains are not adequate to cope with soil conditions and climate. The federal government ought to provide leadership in producing a seed better suited to our area. Another concern is beekeeping. I am sure the minister is aware that the honey capital of Canada, the town of Falher, is located in the heart of my riding and that a lot of residents derive their livelihood from keeping bees. Bees are brought in every spring from California at considerable expense to farmers and with the risk of less. Again, the federal government ought to demonstrate leadership by providing research to develop a strain of bees that could winter in the area.

The third area of concern, not only to people in my riding but to people all over Canada, is the on-farm production of farm fuels. I know that other members have indicated their interest in the subject. I understand that the possibility of using "canola" as a substitute for diesel fuel has been tested and found to be practical, although it is extremely expensive at the moment. We are all aware that energy prices are rising and that at some point farm substitutes should be available as they will be a viable option. I call on the federal government to show leadership in research in regard to this.

On this matter of research, Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the minister if he will consider the possibility of forming an independent joint federal-provincial industry commission which would be responsible for carrying out the policy of the government for the co-ordination of research and development and see that discoveries are translated into action on the farm.

I want to come now to the matter of transportation. The ultimate potential of my area cannot be realized under the present transportation system, which is inadequate. I know the minister will find this somewhat out of his area but I should like to draw his attention to the annual report of Agriculture Canada which states that the mandate of the minister is as follows:

—to develop the nation's agriculture and food system to meet the needs of Canadians for reasonably priced food and at the same time to provide farmers with a fair return for their labour and investment—

I should like to draw attention to three areas in my riding, Mr. Chairman, Valleyview, Worsley, and Lacrete. In these areas farmers are forced to transport their grain an average of 120 kilometres as opposed to the prairie average of 20 kilometres. They face six times the usual cost, and as energy costs rise we know they are going to have a more difficult time maintaining their level of profit. Other farmers enjoy subsidized freight rates but these farmers receive no subsidy.

The minister will realize that there are two possible solutions to the problem. The first is to build a railway to the area but the farmers have ruled this out, as I have. We are aware that it would cost in the neighbourhood of $4 million per year over a life expectancy of 25 years. We know that this is impracticable. There is a second possibility and that is the off-line elevator concept.

There are three conditions that must first be met. The first is to get an elevator built on the site. The second is an adequate supply of hopper cars for on-line elevators to take away the extra grain. The third is simply a commercial trucking subsidy to cover the cost of transportation between the off-site and the on site elevators.

The grain companies have indicated their interest in getting elevators established at these off line points. Therefore, the first concern is taken care of. The second regarding an adequate supply of hopper cars has basically been taken care of. My Liberal supporter has just left the chamber, so I am a bit concerned. On November 19, 1980, the Senator responsible for the Wheat Board said in the Senate, and I quote:

—if and when there is a provision for off-line elevators, it absolutely follows . . . that there would be a fair allocation of hopper cars within that area so as to accommodate the extra grain that is going into those off-line elevators.

We can see therefore that the second concern is taken care of. The third is simply the matter of the trucking subsidy from the off-line to the on-line elevator. To date the minister responsible for the program has clearly abandoned this idea. He has offered no support and indicated no co-operation with people in my constituency.

The former minister responsible for transport, the hon. member for Vegreville, indicated that his government was prepared to use my area as a test area for a pilot project for the off-line concept. We are prepared to move in that direction. In light of that, I would ask the minister the following questions. First, does he agree that farmers in my area are justified in expecting a fair return for their efforts and that, the off-line concept must therefore be implemented? Second, with the implementation of that off-line concept, will he ensure that we will have a federal hauling subsidy. Third, will the minister on our behalf put in a word to the Minister of Transport on the need of an off-line concept—

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order, please. I am unable to hear the hon. member for Peace River. There may be other members who would like to hear him. Could we have a little co-operation in that regard?

Mr. Cooper: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. My last question is whether the minister will give us some indication as to his attitude concerning research and development and the possibility of setting up this independent commission which will be based on federal, provincial and industrial input.

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Chairman—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whelan: I would say to the hon. member for Peace River, and it may come as a surprise, that I have visited his area several times and am very much aware of it. One of the staff in my department owns land in that constituency. I just want to assure him that we have knowledge of his constituency. I will work very closely with the Minister of Transport on the problems presented by the hon. member. If he will put them in writing, we will look into them and he and I can discuss them in a much better fashion than we are doing here in the committee this evening. I am very familiar with the research on bees at Beaver Lodge. We also have a new little busy bee called the Megachile Rotundata. It is a pollinating bee we have developed and we are exporting it all over the world.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (2340)

Mr. Whelan: I just want to say to the hon. member for Assiniboia who made the remarks about the agriculture program that those magic people with the former minister of agriculture and those transport programs they developed—

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for Kindersley-Lloydminster on a point of order.

Mr. McKnight: I believe the time has expired for both the hon. member for Athabasca and the Minister of Agriculture.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: I gave the hon. minister additional time because I had interrupted the hon. member for Peace River. I noted at that time it was the hon. member for Kindersley-Lloydminster himself who suggested my own interruption ought not to count against the member's time. I will allow the minister half a minute to finish.

Mr. Whelan: The hon. member talked about Saskatchewan. He talked about the amazing transport policies the former minister of transport put forth and we know that is a lot of malarkey. The hon. member talks about land ownership, the purchase of land in Saskatchewan and the number of acres purchased. It may be they are watching that great free enterprise to the west of them which owns over 50 per cent of all the land in the province of Alberta.

An hon. Member: Don't mislead the House.

Mr. Whelan: They may be getting some ideas from them at the present time.

Mr. Mackasey: I will be extremely brief because I want to hear the Minister of Agriculture wind up his estimates. I hope the minister will respond to my question at length. As a preamble to my question I want to thank the minister on behalf of the fruit growers of the Niagara Peninsula. To my pleasant surprise when I arrived in the county of Lincoln I found that the farm groups and the farmers unanimously felt the present Minister of Agriculture was the best friend they have had in many years.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mackasey: I also learned from those same Lincoln farmers that without the initiative of the Minister of Agriculture several years ago in buying up fruit there would not have been a Canadian brandy industry in this country. I hope the minister would explain to the House, to myself, to the people of Lincoln and to the Canadian brandy industry some of the initiatives and some of the ideas he has for the development of that brandy industry in the next few years?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whelan: There has been a lot of pessimism put forward about what is going to happen to the brandy industry and the grape growing industry in Canada. I find this very hard to accept, especially when I see the expansion of the wine industry and the grape growing industry in Ontario and also in British Columbia. We are doing research on new varieties of grapes never done before. Under the new crop development fund we have provided the grape growers with funds to do research on their own concerning new varieties of grapes. In the area where I live two new wineries are being established. In the most southerly part of Canada one group has bought 1,200 acres of land to grow grapes which will produce wine on Pelee Island out in the middle of Lake Erie.

• (2345)

Another new winery is being established in the community of Harrow in Colchester South, which is in the constituency of my colleague, the hon. member for Kent-Essex. Hon. members opposite predict gloom and doom for the wine industry, but that is not what the people in the industry are saying. They are saying that this government and this minister care about what they are doing. We are not finished making representations with respect to the brandy industry. That is an industry we want to see stay alive, and we are determined that it will. We fulfilled some of the promises we made about that industry, and we intend to fulfil them all, as far as I am concerned. Canada is a community made up of many different peoples from all over the world, and whether we like it or not—and some of us like it—we are becoming a wine drinking community. Last year we consumed nearly 45 million gallons of wine. Over half of that was Canadian wine.

People talk about what we have done and what we have not done. The hon. member for Elgin wondered what we are going to do about interest rates. I challenge him to take a real look at what we are doing about interest rates.

Mr. Mazankowski: Why hasn't Herb Gray resigned?

Mr. Whelan: The Farm Credit Corporation interest rate is 12¾ per cent. The hon. member for Vegreville is making a lot of noise over there. Alberta has created inequity in the agriculture industry by providing low interest rates for farmers in Alberta who compete with farmers in Saskatchewan, Manitoba, Ontario and the rest of Canada with respect to production. They pay an interest rate of 6 per cent because they have that tremendous Heritage Fund. However, what Alberta is providing is inequity in agriculture in Canada as a whole. Under that system farmers outside Alberta will not be able to compete in a proper fashion.

Mr. Taylor: What about the hog subsidy in Quebec?

Mr. Whelan: When we talk about Canada, unity and equity, we should bear in mind that the agriculture industry could provide equity if it were administered in a proper Canadian fashion.

The hon. member for Elgin also talked about the promise to negotiate import quotas for chickens coming into Canada. When the former government made a decision through the former minister of agriculture on quotas for imports of chickens, it created a much bigger problem than I had ever foreseen. The hon. member made a decision when he was minister of agriculture which was very hard to undo. It was harder to undo than I thought it would be. We had a lot of difficulty trying to arrange meetings with the former administration in Washington. We will be dealing with a new administration, and hopefully we can renegotiate the horrible quota the former government and the former minister dealt with so ineptly.

The hon. member criticized me today for not going to Washington. He did not go to Washington either to deal with a proper quota for Canada. The hon. member wants to know what I have done about chicken quotas and about other things. He wants to know when I will make known the timetable for the meat import legislation. It has been tabled in the House and given first reading. The hon. member for Medicine Hat has said he would allow its very quick second reading in the House and a very quick hearing in committee. He says he has the approval of his caucus for this. Hopefully the former minister of agriculture has been consulted by the hon. member for Medicine Hat. If they want to do that, I am sure I can get the same kind of agreement from the congenial House leader on this side of the House and we can speed ahead with that kind of legislation as quickly as you can say it.

The hon. member wanted to know about the national dairy policy. I believe the Conservative party is spreading the rumour that something is going to happen to the national dairy policy because they cannot find very much wrong with agriculture in Canada. As I said earlier, the Outlook conference—the former minister of agriculture was there and he heard the discussions on the floor—was a positive meeting. Never was there a time when I have heard such positive input from all the farm leaders, the national farm leaders, the regional farm leaders, the provincial marketing boards, and the agro-business sector, about what is happening in agriculture today.

I only wish the rest of our society were as healthy as is the agricultural industry. We were here yesterday and we are here today spending long hours discussing the spending estimates of the government, but most hon. members have suggested that we spend more money. Some of them have suggested that we need more money for research, but only two members made suggestions as to what kind of research we needed. One hon. member from this side of the House and one member on the other side of the House suggested two special projects that we should have, one to control animal diseases, to control the mortality rate in newborn calves; the other member, on this side of the House, suggested that we carry out research in his riding of Timiskaming on beef production in that part of Canada.

So when we talk about all the things we are doing and what we want, I am amazed to find that the same people who criticized this government for its massive spending programs have come in here in the last two days and have said to me, "My God, find money and spend more." One of the things I said was that what I am most proud of is the responsibility I have for the most productive part of our society. Economically speaking, it is probably a part of our society which is one of the best off and probably is the most Canadian-owned part of our society. I say, Mr. Chairman, that we do not have to have huge funds to make a healthy agricultural organization and a productive industry. We know how other countries in the world envy us and our agricultural production in this land of ice and snow, a land which has such a short growing season. Our people have more than doubled their productivity in the last decade over and above anyone else in our society. That is why we are in that enviable position and why our farmers' income this year will be over $15.5 billion, and next year it is estimated to be over $19 billion. Sure, the inflation rate will continue, but they will be ahead of the inflation rate and they will still be able to supply a tremendous amount of food at a reasonable cost to consumers here in Canada, probably better than nearly any other nation in the world.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whelan: I want to say something to the opposition members in the House of Commons. In this terribly important discussion on agriculture, the opposition members—are there 12 of them now in the House?

An hon. Member: Yes, 12.

Mr. Whelan: Shame! We took two days and I have been here nearly all the time for two days while they have run in and out of the House—

Mr. McKnight: You didn't say anything during the time you were here.

An hon. Member: How many Liberals are there?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Whelan: Most of them, although not all of them, made good suggestions, in my opinion, good contributions to the debate on agriculture, but I must say—we made many notes as we went along—that there was not really any severe criticism of the minister or of the department or of the officials here.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whelan: There were some suggestions that perhaps we could do some things better, but that is what we are striving to do at all times. The hon. member for St. Catharines—I will go back to the wine industry, and I do not know why I am thinking about it this late at night, but perhaps a little spirited liquid would not hurt at this stage of the game—spoke about who was taking taxes from the wine industry and who was hurting the grape production industry. He forgot to mention the province of Ontario in which the wine is produced. The province takes more than double the take of the federal government from the wine industry, yet it seems to be fair ball to zero in on the "feds" for what they are taking and let the Ontario Conservative government get away with taking double what we take federally for taxation. It is even more than double what we take.

• (2355)

Mr. McKnight: You are dividing the country, Eugene.

Mr. Whelan: What has the province done to assist the grape industry? It has been insignificant compared to what we have done.

I see the hon. member is back in the House now. He talked about doom and gloom in the wine industry. That is not what I hear from them, and "by their actions, ye shall know them." The expansion of the wine grape-growing industry in Canada has been tremendous. A new variety of grapes will be coming out as a result of the research which has been conducted. Millions of pounds of table wine grapes will be provided for the industry.

The hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain indicated that we were not allowing people to make energy on their own farms. That is not true. There is provision in the ways and means motion that the Minister of National Revenue be authorized to grant a special temporary licence to any person who has complied with the provisions of the act to engage in the manufacture of denatured spirits for use solely in experimentation and development of fuel, for the denatured spirits in fuel are for the person's own use and not for sale or distribution.

Mr. McKnight: What about the next page?

Mr. Whelan: It is there, whether they are aware of it or not. Earlier this evening another member made a speech about energy allocation. I do not know where they are at. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has already made an announcement that fuel for food production, primary production, food processing and transportation, is in the top "A" category. That is what we said we would do, and that is what we have done. That is where it is at.

The hon. member for Elgin talked fuel prices and whether we would cushion them. What about the rock in the Crosbie budget which was given to farmers for fuel? What we have done is a pretty soft cushion alongside what he would have done for farmers in the use of alcohol and various kinds of fuel in agriculture. The benefits for farmers in the budget of the Minister of Finance and in the energy policy will save farmers, using 6,000 gallons of fuel a year over a period of four years, $8,220, compared with the Crosbie budget.

Mr. McKnight: That is untrue.

Mr. Whelan: The hon. member knows it is true. I would say the hon. member for Kindersley-Lloydminster has—

Mr. McKnight: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. The hon. minister mentioned, if I understood correctly, that I said the Crosbie budget was more expensive. I think the minister would recognize that the Crosbie budget—

CALL FOR TEMPORARY MORTGAGE ASSISTANCE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Madam Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43 I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity to every home owner in Canada and to anyone who would like to own a home. Since mortgage interest deductibility and property tax measures were introduced in this House one year ago, and since the Liberals defeated those proposals and have done nothing in the meantime to relieve the burdens of those carrying mortgages in the face of devastatingly high interest rates, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Lewis):

That the government immediately offer Canadians temporary mortgage assistance until the health of the economy is restored.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

AUDITOR GENERAL

STATEMENT OF PRESIDENT OF ELDORADO NUCLEAR LIMITED—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Madam Speaker, the president of Eldorado Nuclear Limited told the Public Accounts Committee last Thursday that his corporation was going to fire the Auditor General and engage a private firm of auditors. Since this action would seriously impair the comprehensive auditing program of the Auditor General and remove the ability of the Auditor General to report directly to this House, I move under the provisions of Standing Order 43, seconded by the hon. member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn):

That this House urge the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources to consult his colleague the President of the Treasury Board and the Auditor General of Canada before putting into effect order in council No. PC 1980-3127.

NATIONAL REVENUE

APPLICATION OF CAPITAL GAINS TAX—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Whereas the Liberals promised during the last election campaign to alleviate the impact of capital gains taxes on farmers and businessmen, but after being elected, instead of keeping their promise, they have continued this iniquitous tax, thus increasing inflation, preventing the expansion of farms and businesses and ruining the retirement plans of our pioneers, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil):

That the government forthwith bring in legislation eliminating this tax or at least providing for a once-in-a-lifetime exemption.

This being the first anniversary of the Crosbie budget and the Liberal party now clearly having won this year's Herbert Hoover look-alike contest, I move, as I did a year ago, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House unreservedly condemns the government for its outright betrayal of its election promises to lower interest rates, to cut taxes and to stimulate the growth of the Canadian economy without a mandate from the Canadian people for such a reversal.

MAINTENANCE OF MONTREAL TÉLÉ-MÉDIC SERVICE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mrs. Thérèse Killens (Saint-Michel): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to ask for the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a motion dealing with an important matter of pressing and urgent necessity.

Considering that the people of Montreal enjoy an excellent emergency service, Télé-Médic, which up to now has enabled us to save human lives and since that service had to suspend operations due to a lack of funds; and considering that such a service is vital for a city such as Montreal, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Chicoutimi (Mr. Dionne):

That the House exert pressure on the Quebec health minister to find an immediate solution to that problem.

Madam Speaker: The Department of National Health and Welfare could be involved in that resolution. I will present it, but I think it deals with a provincial jurisdiction. ECONOMIC COUNCIL OF CANADA

REFERENCE OF REPORT TO STANDING COMMITTEE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Madam Speaker, I wish to move a motion under Standing Order 43. The Economic Council of Canada's seventeenth report is entitled "A Climate of Uncertainty." In view of the fact that the projections in the budget of October 28 differ dramatically from those of the Economic Council of Canada, an agency of this government, and the Economic Council advocates measures significantly different from those set out in the budget, I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Clarke):

That this House refer the report of the Economic Council of Canada entitled "A Climate of Uncertainty" to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs for analysis and investigation, and that the committee be instructed to call before it the Minister of Finance, the governor of the Bank of Canada and such other witnesses as it feels appropriate.

ENERGY TAX CREDIT

CALL FOR INTRODUCTION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Madam Speaker, I too rise to move a motion under Standing Order 43. Having regard to the harsh realities of the recent budget and the energy statement, and in view of the fact that one year ago today the Progressive Conservative Party brought down a budget proposing a refundable energy tax credit to assist lower and medium-income people in Canada meet rising energy costs through an income-tested tax credit amounting to $80 per adult per family and $30 per child, to be paid in full to all those having incomes of up to $21,380, a program which would have helped Canadians save $500 million in 1980 and $1 billion in 1981; and having regard to the fact that the "new democratic-liberal party" has failed to produce any alternative, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Cariboo-Chilcotin (Mr. Greenaway):

That this House direct the government to introduce the refundable energy tax credit immediately, thereby benefiting 7.1 million Canadian families, or 7.6 per cent of the total population of Canada, with over 70 per cent of such benefits going to individuals and families with less than $20,000 of family income.

PRIVATE DISH ANTENNAE—STUDY CONDUCTED BY DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

That the Minister of Communications table this study for the information of this House and interested members of the public and, further, advise this House of any impending legislation affecting foreign satellite reception and the protection of Canadian broadcasting.

In view of the fact that unemployment has risen sharply in the maritime provinces, proof positive that the budget presented by the maritime minister responsible for finance and other programs, such as those under DREE, are failing miserably, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Halifax West (Mr. Crosby):

That the House instruct the government to act immediately to develop new and meaningful programs which will encourage permanent economic growth and jobs in the maritimes.

Whereas the report of the Auditor General which will be tabled today indicates that the Indian economic development account continues to be grossly mismanaged and significant blame for a proposed write-off of $17 million in loans can be put on the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle):

INCREASE IN PRIME INTEREST RATES—REPORT OF ECONOMIC COUNCIL OF CANADA

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. The Bank of Canada rate has just gone up an astounding 1.38 points to 16.14 per cent.

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Kaplan: What is it in the United States?

Miss MacDonald: Shame.

Mr. Crosbie: I point out to the minister that the 16.14 per cent is 4.38 per cent more than it was when he brought down his budget. This means prime bank rates will be going up again very shortly afterwards. In view of the fact that these interest rates are much higher than they were last year, did the minister anticipate such a high increase in interest rates when he prepared his budget just a few short weeks ago? Secondly, will he now agree to refer this whole interest rate question to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, an investigation which was interrupted by the election and the minister's refusal since to look into this question? Apart altogether from that, has the minister now had a chance to make a decision on some new policies? Yesterday he said, "I have not decided to launch any new programs or change any budgetary measures." Has the minister now had a chance to rethink that in view of the alarming intelligence we have had in the last few days?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, in reply to the first question, neither I nor anyone else I know who is knowledgeable in this field could predict with any accuracy last October the movement of interest rates. I doubt whether it is possible to predict that with any accuracy over the next several months, in view of the extreme volatility which exists in this field at the present time, especially in the United States.

In reply to the second question, when I appeared before the standing committee as a witness, I told them that I would like the standing committee itself to reflect whether it had the time, in view of its present workload, to take on another investigation.

In reply to the third question, not since yesterday. No, I have not decided to launch new measures or introduce new policies.

Mr. Crosbie: Madam Speaker, I might point out to the minister that at the moment the finance committee has nothing before it; the estimates are finished and there is nothing of any priority before it. We now have the Economic Council of Canada, an independent government agency which reports to the Prime Minister—I hope it will arouse his interest for the first time—reporting that it has studied the minister's budget. I should like to quote from page 7 of its press release of yesterday:

The general impact of the federal budget appears to be one which increases the rate of unemployment.

It has looked at the minister's budget and raised its inflation forecasts in its annual report up to 11.4 per cent because of the budget. That is 1.2 per cent higher than the minister's forecast. The council has looked at the budget and has reduced its forecast for real growth next year downward from over 1 per cent to .5 per cent. All of these are the council's reflections as a result of the budget and they are the Prime Minister's forecasts; they are the forecasts of his Economic Council of Canada.

In view of the forecasts of this independent agency which reports to the Prime Minister, will the minister now rethink his position and bring in and launch new programs and new budgetary measures?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, there is something very confusing about the interpretation which the hon. member placed upon the press release of the Economic Council of Canada, or alternatively there may be some contradiction between the actual projections presented by the Economic Council of Canada and the press release.

● (1420)

As hon. members know, Madam Speaker, the Economic Council did present certain projections in its annual review. That review was prepared before the budget and before the National Energy Program was prepared. The whole review was written and not changed. It was there before the budget. What was done was to up-date projections based upon the budget. As I look at the actual projections I find, since the hon. member mentioned unemployment, that for every year from 1981 to 1985 the council's projections, made after the budget, show unemployment rates lower than those projected in the budget. If the hon. member will look at those projections he will find that statement is correct.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: Madam Speaker, the minister can squirm any way he wants to squirm. This is a document which is called "An Assessment of the Impact of the Federal Budget on the Canadian Economy". The Economic Council of Canada says in this document:

The general impact of the federal budget appears to be one which increases the rate of unemployment.

Their projections are worse in every respect as a result of the minister's budget.

A year ago the minister was supposed to be the crafty genius who manoeuvred another party out of office. I ask him this question: Why? Interest rates are now in excess of 2 per cent higher. The minister has brought in no new policies and no new approaches. Everything is worse. Why did he put a government out of office last year when he had nothing to offer himself? Would he tell the public that?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, I want to assure the hon. member it was not very difficult to manoeuvre the former government out of office.

Mr. Crosbie: It's harder to govern, is it not?

Mr. MacEachen: I want to return to the comment made by the hon. member about the projections of the Economic Council of Canada. The projections which were made by the council after the budget show the unemployment rate for 1981 to be 8.2 per cent. The projection of the Department of Finance is 8.7 per cent. The figures go down for each succeeding year and the projections—

Mr. Broadbent: What does that prove?

Mr. MacEachen: The Leader of the New Democratic Party asks what it proves. First of all, it proves that the Economic Council of Canada is showing lower projections for unemployment than those which are proposed in my budget. That is the first thing it proves. The second thing it proves, Madam Speaker, is that the hon. member for St. John's West does not know what he is talking about.

Madam Speaker: A final supplementary, the hon. member for St. John's West.

Mr. Crosbie: Madam Speaker, I read from page seven of the release of the Economic Council of Canada:

The pre-budget base case suggests an unemployment rate of 8 per cent for 1981—

However, their post-budget figures, based on the minister's budget, show the figures going from 8.2 per cent to 8.6 per cent, an increase of—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I allowed the hon. member the opportunity to pose an extra question. I expect him to make that question brief.

Mr. Crosbie: How does the minister explain his misinterpretation of the facts?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, what the hon. member fails to understand is that the Economic Council of Canada is updating its own projections based upon what happened.

An hon. Member: It is worse because of you.

Mr. MacEachen: It is based upon the information contained in the budget.

Mr. Andre: Now you have it.

Mr. MacEachen: Even after the update they show unemployment rates from 1981 to 1985 which are lower than those projected in the budget. So I ask, Madam Speaker, how can the hon. member say that they have concluded that the budget itself has a greater impact on unemployment?

Mr. Andre: Because they said it.

Mr. MacEachen: All they have said is that "We have had to up-date our projections, which we found were erroneous". That is all they have said.

CONSERVATIVE PARTY PROPOSALS TO OFFSET HIGH MORTGAGE INTEREST RATES—INQUIRY RESPECTING GOVERNMENT ALTERNATIVES

Mr. Doug Lewis (Simcoe North): Madam Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of Finance. Had the principles of the last Conservative budget been in place in 1981, the average Canadian family of four earning an income under $21,000 would have received $220 as a refundable energy tax credit and $1,125 under the mortgage interest and realty tax credit scheme. These would offset high mortgage interest rates. Would the minister tell the House what he is offering Canadian families as an alternative?

● (1425)

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member fails to understand that in the National Energy Program we provided energy prices which saved about $1,000 for the very family about which the hon. member is talking.

Mr. Blenkarn: Absolute nonsense.

Mr. Lewis: Madam Speaker, Canadian families will understand that they are missing $1,345. With regard to tenants, there are high mortgage interest rates which make it uneconomical to build apartments. Because there is no building, the tight vacancy situation will tighten up even more, and MURBs do not affect interest rates. What is the minister's plan of action?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, I have already indicated to the hon. member for St. John's West that I have not yet decided to introduce any new measures at the present time. Naturally, the increase in interest rates as they affect not only persons who must renew mortgages but persons who wish to buy a house is a matter of very great concern to me and to all members of the government, and it will be kept under very close scrutiny. At the present time I have not yet decided to launch any new program, but I intend to keep the matter under very close scrutiny to see how the burden will be expressed on affected groups in the country.

FINANCE

EFFECT OF INTEREST RATES—PROTECTION OF NEEDY CANADIANS

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Madam Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of Finance whether he agrees with the following statement:

> Interest rates are costs, and costs are a part of prices. They affect everything done by Canadians and their families. The present record level of interest rates . . . cuts back the ability of Canadians to buy goods and services of all kinds—cars, homes, food and clothing, everything people need . . . These high interest rates limit the ability of business, especially small business, simply to operate at basic non-inflationary levels.

Does the Minister of Finance agree with that statement?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, as I said yesterday to the hon. member for St. John's West, I do not intend to express an opinion on every conceivable opinion which has been expressed by any person or body that hon. members can dredge up. But let me say to the hon. member that I have no hesitation in telling him that the present high interest rates, especially the very dramatic surge in rates over the past week or so, is a matter of very deep concern and is bound to affect adversely groups in the country. My concern in examining this situation is to determine where inequities may exist and whether at a certain point it is necessary to take any action.

The hon. member does not have to convince me that in present circumstances high and rising interest rates are damaging to certain groups in the economy, if that is the point which he wanted to make.

Mr. Crosbie: You're changing your tune.

Mr. Rae: Madam Speaker, the minister may be interested to know that the person I was quoting is the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce when he was finance critic while the Liberal party was in opposition. I would point out that we did not dredge him up, the Prime Minister did.

In the Speech from the Throne on April 14, a time when we were undergoing a very severe spiralling of interest rates—a peak which we have almost reached once again—the government said:

> In particular my government recognizes the need to protect those Canadians most affected by unacceptably high interest rates.

Does the minister now consider the interest rates we are currently suffering unacceptably high? Secondly, what is the minister doing to protect those Canadians most in need?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, I remember very clearly the words which were in the Speech from the Throne because at that particular time a very exhaustive analysis was made of the impact, especially on home owners and potential home owners, as a result of the very high interest rates. We did undertake certain steps at that time which were helpful.

• (1430)

Fortunately in the circumstances, the level of interest rates dropped very considerably and the problem, it seems to me, would have been compounded had the government launched a new program to solve a problem which, in the course of the summer, virtually disappeared. Now we are facing the same problem for the same reason.

The problem is not one that originates in Canada. It is not caused by bad policies being followed by the Governor of the Bank of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: Made in Canada interest rates.

Mr. MacEachen: Regardless of the source of the problem, it still affects this country. I want to tell the hon. member that those words are very much on my mind, and I will be keeping them in mind as events develop.

Mr. Rae: Madam Speaker, my final supplementary question relates directly to the minister's answer. He says it is not the fault of the government and it is not events in Canada that are dictating the government's interest rate policy, but that it appears to be events elsewhere. Presumably he means the United States of America, the problems that the economy of that country is undergoing and the policies they are following.

With respect to that, I should like to ask the minister to read an exchange that took place in this House on October 29 last year between the then leader of the opposition, who is now his seatmate as Prime Minister, and the member who is now the Leader of the Opposition. At that time we were looking at interest rates of 11, 12, 13 and 14 per cent and the fact that we were following the American policy. At the end of that lengthy exchange, this is what the then leader of the opposition, now the Prime Minister, said in referring to those policies:

They might have been appropriate at 7 or 8 per cent, but surely at some point one begins to look at new policies.

He also asked:

At what point will the government look at... alternatives, rather than following the American interest rate up to 13, 14 per cent and Good knows how high?

Now, not only God knows how high, Madam Speaker, but they have gone through 20 per cent in the United States. When is the minister going to start looking at some alternative policies?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss MacDonald: Check with your seatmate.

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, obviously the hon. member has failed to ask himself how it has been possible for Canada to maintain short-term interest rates about five points below those prevailing in the United States when the normal circumstance has been for Canadian rates to be about one point above those in the United States.

Mr. Andre: When our dollar was above the U.S. dollar too.

Mr. MacEachen: Has the hon. member asked himself how that has happened? If he has, I hope he has concluded that it is because the governor of the bank and the management of monetary policy in Canada has been such that we are not moving in locked step with the United States but have maintained this disparity much to the advantage of Canada.

BANKRUPTCIES

MEASURES TO PROTECT INVESTORS IN FEDERALLY CHARTERED TRUST COMPANIES

Mr. Peter Lang (Kitchener): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Finance. In view of the fact that some of my constituents in Kitchener and, indeed, many people in south-central Ontario, have lost their life savings because of dealings with Astra Trust, as well as the provincially chartered C & M Financial Consultants and Re-Mor Investment Management Corporation, can the minister tell the House what changes the government is considering to the trust and loan act to ensure that investors and depositors are better protected in their dealings with federally chartered trust companies, and whether any compensation is planned for those who lost funds over and above the $20,000 mark that is protected under the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State, Finance): Madam Speaker, we have already replied in the House to questions concerning the situation of Astra Trust which is federally incorporated and of other provincial corporations in which Ontario residents have lost a lot of money.

Hon. members will know that, as concerns Astra Trust, the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation covers deposits by individuals up to a maximum of $20,000. When the company's assets have been disposed of, certain sums which could make up the difference over $20,000 will be recovered.

As for the much more specific question asked by the hon. member concerning amendments that could be made to the legislation to improve the situation and prevent such situations from occurring, I do not believe that we should look for correctives through legislation, but rather by ensuring that the control and application provisions of the present federal and provincial legislation are appropriate and can prevent reoccurrence of such situations as that concerning Astra and its subsidiaries, including Re-Mor.

FINANCE

MEASURES TO LESSEN EFFECT OF HIGH INTEREST RATES

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Madam Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of Finance who must have noted the economic depths his policies are creating in this country with bankruptcies in the business sector up 22 per cent and personal bankruptcies up an astounding 19 per cent over last year. Translated into human terms, this means that in Ontario, for example, 25,430 jobs were lost in the first nine months of this year as a result of plants having to close down because of the economic climate created by the minister and his government.

Would the minister indicate what plans he has to lessen the impact of the high interest rates on such companies to ensure that we will not have this continuing high level of bankruptcies? For example, has he decided to bring in a type of insurance plan which would insure business loans in the future similar to the way CMHC loans are insured?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, in light of the dire and doleful picture painted by the hon. member of the economy in general, it would be worth pointing out that in this year the Canadian economy has created in excess of 200,000 jobs, and that that employment creation record compares favourably with any country in the OECD group. I do not think there is any benefit, either to him politically or to the country, to distort and exacerbate the situation, as he has in his question. I ask him seriously to consider whether it is fair to address those doleful facts in a distorted way at the present time.

The answer to the question is no.

Mr. Stevens: Madam Speaker, it is not whining; those are Dun & Bradstreet brutal facts of the number of corporate corpses that have been left on the battlefield in Canada as a result of this minister's high interest rate policy.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: Madam Speaker, my supplementary question to the minister as he sits dreaming in this country is, would he explain to the House, if things are going so well in Canada, why Ray Richardson, for example, of the New York state commerce department has gleefully told the The New York Times that Canadians have invested in 35 states in his country, winning in his state alone, the state of New York, 50 companies that have created 3,700 jobs, as a result of Canadians fleeing from this country because of the economic climate structured by his government?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, I cannot believe that an informed commentator would make the kind of statement the hon. member has quoted.

Mr. Crosbie: You had better learn.

Mr. Stevens: I have it here.

NATIONAL ENERGY PROGRAM

POLICY RESPECTING DEVELOPMENT PROGRAMS—NEGOTIATIONS WITH PROVINCE OF ALBERTA

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is also addressed to the Minister of Finance. The minister has blamed today and on many other occasions in this House international economic problems, OPEC oil pricing and high interest rates in the United States for all the economic problems of this country. Yesterday the Economic Council of Canada released its report. Last year its report referred to two driving forces for the Canadian economy, the first of which was the world economy, and the second our own domestic energy development. This year, because the minister has torpedoed that energy development with his budget, we are left with the world economy and he knows that it is in trouble.

This party, the Canadian Manufacturers' Association and many experts, including, for example, the former chairman of the National Energy Board, and now the Economic Council of Canada, have urged him to make changes in the National Energy Program brought in under his budget. What proposals is he proposing to put forward now to unwind the deadlock between Alberta and Ottawa in an area which is completely under his control—no excuses—in the whole area of energy development in this country?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member in the preamble to his question has stated that I blamed this on some force outside of the country. It is not my intention to blame individuals or groups but to draw attention to the fact that Canada is part of an international trade and payment system, that Canada is part of the world economy, and it would be foolish for Canadians to look at their own problems unless they look at them within that international perspective.

That is what I have been attempting to do in explaining the very dramatic increase we have had in interest rates in this country. They do not come from policies pursued in Canada. They are the result of a dramatic impact arising from policies pursued in another country, which have the same general effects in all industrialized countries as they have in Canada. I make that comment in answer to the rather long preamble which the hon. member introduced into his question.

I agree with the hon. member it is important that we have Canada's energy house in order. In the budget and in the National Energy Program we have put out a very comprehensive framework which will achieve that objective. The hon. member asked what we were going to do to discuss matters with Alberta. As I understand it, and I have not been directly responsible for these discussions, they are moving as rapidly as possible and in the tenor requested by the government of the province of Alberta.

Mr. Wilson: Madam Speaker, the government, the minister and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources have been given a heaven-sent opportunity to get our economy rolling in an area which is completely under their control so that we do not have to listen to what is going on in other parts of the world.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Wilson: We are losing job-creating opportunities in many major projects, for instance, Alsands, Cold Lake and now today we had the announcement that the Judy Creek project is being shelved. Conventional oil drillers are moving south. Orders are being cancelled and jobs are being lost in central Canada as well as in the west. The government has been sitting idle for six weeks listening to the advice of the experts in the field and doing nothing about it.

In view of the fact that unemployment is approaching the one million figure this year and we are having a balance of payments deficit in the manufacturing account of $17 billion, will the minister listen to the Economic Council of Canada, which is the primary economic adviser to the Prime Minister and the government, and will he take their advice as to how to unwind this deadlock between Alberta and Ottawa in energy development?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, the government is obviously prepared to study and consider all the proposals made by the Economic Council of Canada in its annual review. I have begun the process of reading and studying that report, which was written prior to the budget and the National Energy Program. I have been greatly reassured by the fact that there is very broad consistency between the budget and the comments and concerns expressed by the Economic Council of Canada. I can hardly turn a page in that review without finding support for a major element in the budget presented on October 28.

FUNDING ASSISTANCE FOR LIGHT RAPID TRANSIT SYSTEM IN VANCOUVER—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Trade. According to yesterday's Vancouver Sun, the minister indicated that any federal funding for the new proposed light rapid transit system for Vancouver had been jeopardized by the premature announcement of the British Columbia government. The minister knows that we on this side of the House have been pushing for light rapid transit development. Would the minister assure us that the citizens of Vancouver will not end up as innocent victims of or bystanders in this federal-provincial dispute? Could the minister also tell us whether there has been approval in principle—I am not asking the minister for amounts—of Government of Canada funding for light rapid transit for the city of Vancouver?

Hon. Ed Lumley (Minister of State, Trade): Madam Speaker, I have been given a mandate by my cabinet colleagues to enter into negotiations with the province of British Columbia and the local transit authorities to further negotiations between our two governments for federal participation in the Vancouver project. As the hon. member knows, we think this is a tremendous opportunity for Canadian industry. It gives us an opportunity to enter into a multibillion dollar industry internationally. It is a great Canadian project and we will do our very best to follow up those negotiations.

Under the chairmanship of the Minister of Employment and Immigration, who chairs the cabinet committee on western affairs, this is just one of a number of initiatives for western industrial development in Canada that are being considered.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Paproski: What about Edmonton and Calgary?

Mr. Waddell: Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his usual loquacious announcement. I remind him that we have been pushing for that for years and I am glad to know he is in favour of this scheme in principle. I want to thank him for that and for taking myself and some of my constituents to see the new project in Kingston yesterday.

Since this is a new project and has not been tried, and although it has advantages for Canadians buying Canadian technology and for east-west relations in Canada, is the minister prepared to assure the House and the city of Vancouver that federal funds will be given directly to the city and that he will not allow the provincial government to deduct from its portion of funding the amount which comes from Ottawa? In other words, that the federal money will go directly to the city of Vancouver. Is the minister prepared to consider that and give the House that commitment?

Mr. Lumley: Madam Speaker, since we have not started any specific negotiations, it would be foolish for me to give that kind of commitment to the hon. member. This is a partnership. The federal government is trying to propose a partnership among the provinces, the local authorities, the private sector and the Government of Canada so as to fulfil its obligations.

NATIONAL REVENUE

RETROACTIVITY OF PROPOSED BUDGETARY TAX EXEMPTIONS

Mr. Bruce Lonsdale (Timiskaming): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. On Tuesday evening, in response to a question from the hon. member for Algoma during the adjournment debate, the minister's parliamentary secretary indicated that legislation would be forthcoming allowing wages paid to spouses by unincorporated small businesses to be deductible for income tax purposes and that the legislation would be retroactive to January 1, 1980. Could the minister assure the House that the other measures announced and tabled on April 21, 1980, in his ways and means motion, and particularly the measure increasing the volunteer fireman's exemption from $300 to $500 per annum, will also be retroactive to January 1, 1980, and that these measures will be implemented in time to take effect for the 1980 taxation year?

Mr. Crosbie: These are my proposals. Admit they are mine when you are on your feet.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): The answer to the question is yes, Madam Speaker. I am glad the hon. member for St. John's West likes these proposals and that when they are brought forward he will ensure speedy passage.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

NATIONAL ENERGY PROGRAM

SELF-SUFFICIENCY IN OIL SUPPLY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. John Bosley (Don Valley West): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. There is another fire we would like him to think about fighting, and that is the unemployment fire in this country. The Economic Council of Canada makes a couple of points which I think the minister will have to agree are not in support of his budget. They are to the effect that if we fail to miss our energy development possibilities, we stand to lose over 753,000 jobs in this country. That situation will occur if the projects which are needed, notably the heavy tar sands and the Alsands projects, are not built. The minister must now face the fact that the Economic Council's proposals for energy development are substantially different. My question, therefore, is this: Will he now agree, with the wisdom of the council to support him, that he should move off the position he has on energy pricing, support the council's position, get Canadians back to work and make Canada energy self-sufficient?

● (1450)

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I have noticed this is one area where the council differed from the budget presentation because it recommended increases in the wellhead price of about $6 a year. That is greater than the amount proposed in the budget. The government has made it clear for quite some time that it would bring in a pricing regime which would have the effect of ensuring Canada's energy future and investment in the energy industry. That is my belief today, even though I have read and will continue to read the review of the Economic Council of Canada.

Mr. Bosley: Madam Speaker, it is precisely the deadlock caused by the difference in opinion between the Economic Council and the Minister of Finance that will cause more and more Canadians to be out of work. The question I must ask is this. Can the minister now tell us why he prefers a policy which says we shall have high interest rates to keep Canadian money in Canada, but we shall have, through his fiscal and energy policies, an energy deadlock which will drive Canadian money and jobs out of Canada? Can he resolve this conflict and will he now see it is no longer appropriate to remain pigheaded about the sharing arrangements with Alberta which the Economic Council of Canada criticizes, when what we need is to get the engine of energy driving this country ahead again?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, the hon. member's question covers a broad field, including monetary policy and energy policy. Regarding energy, the Economic Council of Canada seems to agree very strongly with the Government of Canada in our desire to have an increased share of energy revenues in the country. In fact, one of the flaws they pointed out in current arrangements was the fiscal imbalance which existed between the federal government and especially the rich western provinces. This is one of the problems we are attempting to address in this budget in order to get more of the share of revenues now going, for example, to the province of Alberta. After all, we have reduced that share by about only two points, which is a rather modest amount.

TREASURY BOARD

CRITICISMS OF DEPARTMENT IN AUDITOR GENERAL'S REPORT

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): My question is directed to the President of the Treasury Board. The Auditor General has reported again on some basic deficiencies which have continued over several years. He cites particularly the lack of attention to Treasury Board policies and inaccurate Treasury Board monitoring of compliance with its policies and lack of investigation into non-compliance. When is the Treasury Board going to display some responsible management on behalf of the Canadian taxpayer?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, I have not had the opportunity to study the report in detail but I have had a preliminary look at a number of the comments. I am pleased to report that the Auditor General also indicates we are taking on these problems on a broad front and have demonstrated considerable progress in a number of important areas, such as the IMPAC program and so on. I can assure the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra we are moving forward and improving management practices across the system. I am confident the Auditor General will agree that great progress has been made and we can look forward to more progress.

Mr. Clarke: Madam Speaker, since one of the agreed upon solutions was the appointment of a high level departmental comptroller in all departments, and since the Auditor General again found it necessary to state this was not taking place, can the minister tell the House why he is taking so long to act on this program?

Mr. Johnston: Madam Speaker, it is not a question of delaying that agreed upon program. We consider that a senior financial officer in each department and agency is essential. This is very much a part of the program which has been moving forward. It is difficult in all circumstances to find the adequate personnel to fulfil these functions but I know the office of the Comptroller General is acting rapidly and efficiently in terms of moving forward on this front as well.

ACCESS TO INFORMATION

RELEASE OF PUBLIC OPINION POLLS ON CONSTITUTIONAL PROPOSALS

Hon. Jake Epp (Provencher): Madam Speaker, I direct my question to the Minister of Justice. On November 28 my colleague, the hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe asked the Prime Minister at that time whether he would release the three polls that particularly had polled public opinion on the government's constitutional proposals. At that time the Prime Minister said he would check whether he could release them. I understand the minister has made a decision. Could he now give us the decision as to when they will be released?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, I intend to make public within a few days that part of the poll which covers the constitutional issue.

[English]

Mr. Epp: Madam Speaker, I must admit I did not get the full import of the minister's answer.

An hon. Member: There wasn't much import in it.

Mr. Epp: If I understood him correctly, he did not give us any date. He said he would do it in terms of the committee's work. I suggest to him the committee has been working for some time.

Yesterday a Gallup poll came out clearly showing that Canadians are opposed more than two to one to the program or the plan of the Prime Minister. I should like to ask the Minister of Justice how the government can reconcile a policy where, on the one hand, they are going to restrict the number of expert witnesses to five and they will only be allowed to appear before the committee after they have passed a litmus test as to what they might say.

An hon. Member: Shame!

Mr. Epp: Why is it that the policy of the government when, on the other hand, they are now planning another advertising program, or considering one, to con the Canadian people with their own money and yet will not allow experts to appear?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Madam Speaker, the committee decided yesterday to allow five experts to appear, two to be named by the official opposition, two by the government party and one by the New Democratic Party. This is the decision of the committee and I shall respect it.

As for the advertising campaign mentioned by the hon. member, no decision has been made as yet, but I would like to remind him that the Quebec government has now spent nearly $1.5 million since September for advertising which is sometimes questionable. For example, a parish priest says the proposed constitution is not moral. As for the poll, since the hon. member did not understand my first reply, I shall repeat that I intend to make them public in a short while. And since he did not understand what I said in French concerning the polls, perhaps I could quote this sentence from Cicero: Plus apud nos vera ratio valeat quam vulgi opinio. This means, Madam Speaker, that we should be guided by reason rather than by public opinion.

We therefore intend to make these polls public, but if we are right, we plan on going on in the same way.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

COST OF POLICING SERVICES IN PROVINCES

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General, who recently announced major increases in the shares to be paid by provincial and municipal governments for RCMP contract services—increases unanimously opposed by the eight provincial attorneys general involved—and the shifting of a $100 million tax burden from the federal government on to provincial and municipal taxpayers. I have before me a document prepared by the RCMP showing, for the first time, the actual increases proposed amounting to over 100 per cent in some cases and to an increase of over $2 million a year for the municipality of Burnaby alone.

Why is the government proposing to pass on an extra $14 million in RCMP headquarters administration costs, and how can the federal government justify this totally unwarranted raid on provincial and municipal treasuries of western, northern and Atlantic provinces?

● (1500)

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, let me note first of all that this has nothing to do with the federal policing program. There are over 10,000 members of the force across the country, including those in British Columbia, who are paid for and will continue to be paid for 100 per cent by the federal taxpayers of the nation.

As to the municipalities and provinces which are served by RCMP contracts, every five or ten years for the last 70 years when these contracts have expired they have been renegotiated. The objective has always been to try to derive a fair balance so that the federal taxpayers are paying for that share of provincial and municipal contracting which represents the national benefit. We have made proposals to the provinces and municipalities. We have not yet been given a hearing by them at which I could explain to them the basis on which we feel these amounts are justified. I am fully confident that we can justify them and that RCMP contracting will continue to be a bargain—even with the increases we have asked for—for those municipalities and provinces which continue to use them and which we hope will continue to use them.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, perhaps this is another initiative for western Canada supported by the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Surely of all times this is a time for conciliation and not for provocation of western provinces.

The minister has promised this House many times a long overdue bill to replace the RCMP Act. Will the minister tell the House what has happened to that long overdue bill and specifically how the government will address two concerns? The first is the need for far greater accountability by the RCMP to the provinces. The second is the legitimate demand by the association of 17 divisions and many individual RCMP members for an end to the paternalistic divisional representative system and the right accorded other police forces in Canada to free, full, non-strike collective bargaining.

Mr. Kaplan: Madam Speaker, I do not agree with the hon. member's characterization of the div-rep system, which is an excellent system under which progress is constantly being made. I think it serves very well the needs of members of the force in industrial relations with management.

As to accountability, I think there are ways in which we can make changes and give assurances to the provinces that their full constitutional responsibility can be exercised even though they continue to use the national police force. I am looking forward to meeting with them and discussing ways in which their constitutional integrity and responsibility can be fully assured.

With respect to the bill, it is ready and, if hon. members of all parties could indicate a willingness to deal with that bill expeditiously and refer it to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, it could be introduced very shortly.

ENERGY

FUTURE NEGOTIATIONS WITH PROVINCE OF ALBERTA—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and relates to an article in today's Ottawa Citizen. In this article it is indicated that Alberta treasurer Lou Hyndman has said that Alberta, in effect, is not prepared to negotiate again with the federal government. He used very strong language to the effect that Alberta will not capitulate. In light of this very strong language, I would like to ask the minister what the position of the federal government has been in the past and what it will be in the future with respect to negotiations with Alberta.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I would like to remind the House that there has already been a meeting at the level of officials, and I expect that another meeting will take place before the end of the year. I want to stress that nobody—but nobody—has asked any provincial government, and particularly the government of Alberta, to capitulate. I find this type of language rather regrettable because what is required is a spirit of compromise on both sides. I would like to stress that this type of speech should indicate to all Canadians who are the ones who are throwing out ultimatums and who are the ones who are showing inflexibility in their approach to this important question.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I wonder if I could ask the government House leader if he could inform the House as to the business he contemplates between now and the adjournment for the Christmas recess.

Perhaps while he is on his feet he might indicate to the House when he feels that the adjournment motion might be brought and dealt with, and specifically, if it is possible and if he is in that position, the length of the adjournment contemplated by the government.

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, later on today we will start debate on second reading of Bill C-48. I understand that tomorrow we will be able to deal with the report stage and the third reading stage of Bill S-2, which has just been reported from the standing committee. I understand that we will be able to get through two stages of that bill provided there is only one speaker per party. Following that we will resume debate on Bill C-34 concerning judges.

[Translation]

With regard to the business of the House for next week, on Monday, we will start the debate on the bill concerning fiscal transfers to the provinces, hoping to obtain quick passage; in any event, next week we shall want to continue the debate initiated today on Bill C-48, namely the Canada Oil and Gas Act, with a view to referring it to a standing committee of the House before the Christmas break. In addition next Friday we hope to spend the day completing whatever items I have just mentioned that might still be pending for some reason or other.

We have also agreed, with regard to a bill to be brought in as a result of three notices of ways and means motions dealing with amendments to the Customs Tariff Act, to refer it, after hearing one spokesman for each party, to a standing committee of the House rather than studying it in Committee of the Whole in view of its highly technical nature. To that end, I have here an order of the House confirming the agreement which you will kindly allow me to read, that we might know where we stand for next week, seeing that, contrary to what we discussed earlier, it will not be possible to proceed tomorrow in that regard; however, we could do so at any time next week since it can be done be very quickly.

[English]

Madam Speaker, after consultations with all parties I would like to call ways and means proceedings 6, 7 and 16. In the latter case I understand there is unanimous consent. I also understand that there is unanimous consent that the bill based thereon, the bill relating to the customs tariff, after second reading be referred not to the Committee of the Whole as is usually done in such cases but, because of the unusual complexity of the bill, be referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

[Translation]

I understand, Madam Speaker, that when I have finished my remarks, you will seek the required unanimous consent. With regard to the Christmas break, since the question has been put to me, naturally if the work I have just outlined proceeds with due dispatch, we should be able to consider seriously an adjournment toward the end of next week or, at the latest, early in the following week. But I hope we can make it Friday next week. As for the date or our return, we had discussions on the matter this morning; I feel it would be important to have another meeting early next week when, depending on the progress achieved, we will have a much better idea of whether we should come back before or around January 12.

[English]

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, with respect to the proposed notice, my friend has indicated there is consent with respect to that to which he referred. We can certainly deal with that. That has been discussed and agreed upon.

Mr. Knowles: Madam Speaker, there is agreement to the request for the introduction of the customs tariff bills today, and there is also agreement that the complicated one, after it has been read the second time some day next week, be sent to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

• (1510)

On several Thursdays earlier in the session, the minister made reference to the freedom of information bill. It seems to have been forgotten. Is there any reason why it could not be dealt with and sent to committee before we break for the Christmas recess? That might be a better piece of work than the judges' bill.

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, the hon. member will understand that if we are to adjourn on December 19, there will be only seven days left. I have had discussions with him this morning and with my other colleague from the Conservative party. We discussed the different pieces of legislation which I have just mentioned. It is certain that the access to information bill has our high priority, but I do not think it can be concluded that, because we are not able to deal with the bill quickly before Christmas, we are not giving the necessary priority to that bill.

I wish to state very firmly that this bill is very important to us, but some time last week or a week ago it was mentioned on the floor of the House that it would not be possible to obtain second reading of that bill in one day. That being the case, I think it would not be reasonable for us to take more than one or two days on the second reading stage of that bill, because we would then prevent other pieces of legislation from being referred to committees. That is the reason why we think that in the next seven days it will be difficult to give second reading to the bill. However, I want to confirm to the hon. member that as soon as possible following the Christmas recess we will ensure that the bill is referred to committee, and I will call for the co-operation of all parties on the other side.

Madam Speaker: Hon. members have heard the suggestion of the President of the Privy Council concerning the ways and means proceedings Nos. 6, 7, and 16, which will be called as the first items under government orders and that the bill based thereon, after second reading, be referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs. Is this motion agreed to?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Madam Speaker: It is so ordered.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S.O. 26

FINANCE

EFFECT OF RISING INTEREST RATES

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, I am rising under the provisions of Standing Order 26 as a result of the deeply disturbing news which we heard today that the Bank of Canada is raising its interest rate to a record 16.14 per cent. I ask leave, therefore, seconded by the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae), to move the adjournment of the House under Standing Order 26 for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter requiring urgent consideration, namely, the announcement by the Bank of Canada today with the government's approval that interest rates will be further increased to a record level threatening the economic livelihood of most sectors of the Canadian economy, the ability of Canadian families to cope with the basic necessities of life, and leading to the worst winter in terms of a combination of inflation and unemployment since World War II.

Madam Speaker: The hon. member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent) has given me notice of his motion under Standing Order 26, as is required under the provisions of the order. I have examined his statement and I find that the problem raised by the hon. member is obviously a very important one. It refers to a situation which undoubtedly has a certain character of urgency. At the same time, I am sure that it is a matter of continuing interest to all members of the House.

As everyone knows, there has been a pattern of changing interest rates in recent months, including the announcement today by the Bank of Canada that interest rates will further be increased. The inevitable conclusion is that the problem is of continuing concern. As evidence of this, the Chair need only refer to the fact that recently there have been a number of motions moved by hon. members under the provisions of Standing Order 43, as well as a number of oral questions directed to the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) and other ministers on this very matter. The fact that the House has already been dealing with the situation for some time is an indication to the Chair that we have a problem which is of a continuing nature, and in this sense I feel that it does not fall within the purview of Standing Order 26.

For those reasons, I regret very much that it is not possible at this time to put to the House the motion proposed by the hon. member for Oshawa.

CANADIAN UNITY INFORMATION OFFICE—FOLDER CIRCULATED

Question No. 1,629—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Did the Canadian Unity Information Office circulate with a memorandum dated October 8, 1980, a folder entitled "About our Constitution" and subtitled "Speaker's Kit" and, if so (a) what was the entire cost to the taxpayer for the printing of all such kits (b) does the kit contain essentially, explanations of the constitutional policies of the government?

2. Is it government policy to spend taxpayers' money to promote the policies of the Liberal party?

3. Were the views of other political parties in Canada included and, if not, for what reason?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): For the Canadian Unity Information Office: 1. Yes

(a) $900;

(b) The speaker's kit contains basic information on the definition of a constitution, its usefulness and why it is important to change the Canadian Constitution.

2. The Government of Canada must inform Canadians about their country, its system of government and the services offered by the national government. The objective of the document entitled "About our Constitution" is to make Canadians more aware of the importance of the unity of their country and the need for constitutional reform.

3. The information included in the speaker's kit is factual and deals with constitutional reform, to which political leaders of all parties publicly committed themselves during the referendum campaign.

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence):

(a) and (b)	Total Budget * less Statutory	Capital Program
1970-71 Actual Expenditures	(7.43)	(18.39)

Question No. 1,668—Mr. McKinnon:

What was the rate of inflation, according to the Department of National Defence's "inflation model", for the fiscal years 1970-71 through 1980-81?

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): The Department of National Defence Economic Model was established in 1971-72 and therefore the actual inflation rate for 1970-71 is not available. BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The President of the Privy Council is not here right now but his parliamentary secretary is, so I draw his attention to my point of order. I am a little concerned about my friend's reference to an understanding, as he put it, that there would be one speaker per party speaking on Bill S-2 when the bill comes before the House. I did not quite catch in the translation, what the President of the Privy Council said, so I went out to check it and I found that indeed he had stated that there was an understanding that there would be one speaker per party on Bill S-2. I just want to make it clear, so we do not have any misunderstandings, that the understanding of the President of the Privy Council does not accord with mine, although it is my understanding that the debate on that bill will be very short. I do not believe we ever discussed it on the basis referred to by the minister. I am making this point while the parliamentary secretary is here so that we will not have any misunderstanding of our intentions on this matter.

Mr. Collenette: Yes, Madam Speaker, I concur in the sentiments expressed by the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton. In the discussions which we have had, we spoke about a very short debate on Bill S-2. I do not believe there was any specific agreement to limiting the speeches to one speaker per party, but we hope to get the bill through very quickly tomorrow.

CANADA OIL AND GAS ACT

MEASURE RESPECTING OIL AND GAS INTERESTS

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources) moved that Bill C-48, to regulate gas interests in Canada lands and to amend the Oil and Gas Production and Conservation Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works.

● (1520)

He said: Madam Speaker, when we introduced the National Energy Program on October 28, the government set out aggressively to seek the energy sources and solutions which Canada will need for generations to come. We did so with a determination unmatched by any previous federal government, and we believe we have found a solid way in which to build our energy house.

Our way begins with the clear, strong, nationally-oriented principles of security, opportunity, and fairness. It constitutes a deep commitment by the government to a secure energy future for all Canadians. Also it underscores a basic confidence in this country's ability to confront the world energy situation on our own terms and in our own way.

Today I am pleased to introduce Bill C-48 for second reading. In doing so, I present a key element in the successful fulfilment of the National Energy Program. The Canada Oil and Gas Act will establish a new and modernized regime to govern resources development activity in those immense frontier regions of our country known as the Canada lands.

Two centuries ago, Edmund Burke, the eminent British statesman and political philosopher, wrote the following:

> If we command our wealth, we shall be rich and free; if our wealth commands us, we are poor indeed.

The years have not dimmed the significance nor lessened the impact of those words. Canada is rich in natural resources. Our aim is to allow Canadians from coast to coast the opportunity of sharing the benefits of those riches. Bill C-48 is a significant step in that direction.

I have stated on other occasions that there are three direct action programs essential to solving Canada's energy problems. Members will recall that these include reduced consumption of oil products, rapid substitution of oil by other more plentiful energy sources, and finally, exploration, development and production of domestic oil supplies. It is to this last program dealing with domestic oil supplies that the Canada lands are of vital importance.

Our offshore regions cover an area of some 2.5 million square miles. The territories alone comprise another 1.5 million square miles. Together this is what we call the Canada lands, an area which is almost twice the size of the ten provinces combined.

The promise of this vast frontier region is as enormous as its size. It represents Canada's best prospects for large, new reserves of conventional petroleum. It holds the key to our energy security. If it is true that the future is the most expensive luxury in the world, then there is a substantial downpayment on that luxury, and that downpayment is in Bill C-48.

The existing Canada oil and gas land regulations covering frontier oil and gas rights were promulgated two decades ago. Obviously they are not appropriate to resource development needs today. We cannot continue with a system requiring that holders of rights meet only minimum requirements, particularly minimum work requirements set out in fixed schedules, designed for very broad geographic areas. We must ensure that holders of oil and gas rights pursue vigorous and sustained exploration and development efforts, or relinquish their rights to make way for explorers who will do so.

Oil and gas rights have already been issued for 350 million acres in the Canada lands. Virtually all the area is considered promising in terms of potential reserves. Bill C-48 will convert these existing rights to the new land management regime thereby establishing it in a meaningful way. It will see that this is done within one year of the passage of Bill C-48.

I should like to take a moment to spell out for the House the main elements of the new regime. They can be summarized in seven specific points. First, there will be stiffer work requirements through negotiated exploration agreements which include firm drilling commitments. Second, we will reserve to the Crown a 25 per cent share of oil and gas rights in the Canada lands, to be exercised through Petro-Canada or some other designated Crown corporation. Third, there will be a minimum requirement of 50 per cent Canadian ownership, through the private or public sector, of production from the Canada lands. Fourth, we will ensure optimum employment of Canadians, and use of Canadian goods and services, in oil and gas activities carried out on the Canada lands. Fifth, we will provide ministerial authority to order production to commence and be delivered to Canadian markets, in quantities and at prices specified in the order. Sixth, we will be providing a greater degree of control in the timing, direction, rate, and level of exploration, development and production by various means. These would include drilling and production orders, earlier release of proprietary information, prior approval of transfers and assignment of rights. Seventh, we will ensure that Canadians receive a fair return for their oil and gas resources through a basic royalty of 10 per cent, with an additional royalty of 40 per cent of the net profits of a field.

As I said earlier, the Canada oil and gas act will bring existing oil and gas rights into line with the new regime, but in such a way as to ensure that if these rights are not actively developed they will be relinquished to the Crown. Existing permits, leases and agreements will either be converted to new leases and agreements within a year or will be surrendered to the Crown. Under the new regime, all exploration rights will lead to one type of production rights only, namely, a production licence.

The emphasis in all leases and agreements will be on active development. Even though, as was pointed out in "The National Energy Program", Canada may not need its northern resources for domestic markets until the 1990s, we should press ahead with exploration so that Canadians will know that a secure source of oil and gas is available as our safety net for the future.

As in Bill C-20, which this bill replaces, there will be a basic royalty of 10 per cent, reducible where economically justified, to allow commencement or continuation of production. In addition, there will be a form of profit-sharing amounting to 40 per cent of the net profits of an oil and gas field above a 25 per cent rate of return according to the formula set out in the act. Incorporating the fiscal obligations of holders of frontier rights in the act will provide certainty for industry and make for a stable investment climate.

The thrust of the new regime is on the early assessment of the oil and gas potential of Canada's frontier regions. However, this will not be done at the expense of fisheries resources or the environment. There are provisions for a fund to cover costs of regional environmental studies related to oil and gas activities. This fund will be raised by assessing rights holders proportionally on an acreage basis to cover the costs of biological and physical research designed to ensure safety and to ensure the prevention of pollution. There is provision for catch-up assessments to be levied on parties who acquire oil and gas rights in a region where such environmental work has already been financed.

There are a number of provisions in the new Canada oil and gas act relating to the supervision and control of oil and gas activities rather than to the strict land-management regime. These operational provisions more accurately fit into the Oil and Gas Production and Conservation Act of 1970, and so they are put forth as amendments to that act. Items thus covered include:

1. Operating licence to be prerequisite for carrying out oil and gas activities, with an individual authorization in writing necessary for each activity, as well as deposit requirements to ensure submission of data and reports, and requirements for optimum employment of Canadians and utilization of Canadian goods and services;

2. Authority for the chief conservation officer to order the commencement, continuation and cessation of production on the basis of sound engineering principles;

3. Provision for oil spill liability on the part of operators, in particular providing for absolute liability; and

4. Authority to charge operators for outside consultative advice when evaluating and authorizing oil and gas production systems.

The proposed new regime will involve far-reaching administrative responsibilities for its implementation. Judgmental decisions will determine when, where, and how oil and gas rights should be made available for development. Involved in this process will be such factors as the extent of Canadian ownership, and the use of Canadian goods and services. It is therefore our intention that in order to ensure efficiency of administration, and consistency in application of this regime, there will be one national resource management agency. It will be responsible for implementing the Canada oil and gas act throughout the frontier regions.

The element of Bill C-48 which seems to have attracted the most attention, especially that of industry, is the 25 per cent Crown share. I would like to clear up some misunderstanding about this aspect of the bill. In brief, Bill C-48 grants to the Crown a 25 per cent share of existing oil and gas rights in areas where production has not yet begun. This share, described as a "carried interest", does not constitute a free ride for the Crown.

The Crown share can be transferred by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources to Petro-Canada or to some other Crown corporation. This corporation must convert the share to a working interest, not later than the time at which a production system is approved for the relevant lands. Thus, the Crown share would be in the form of a working interest some time before the expenditure of 85 per cent to 90 per cent of the total cost involved in bringing a field into production. I stress here that this 25 per cent Crown share does not apply to fields which are already in production, like Norman Wells.

This concept has variously been described as "confiscatory" and "expropriation without compensation". I would like to state emphatically that this is not so. Surely the Canadian taxpayer has the right to retain a share in the ownership of his resources.

Mr. Wilson: After the fact.

Mr. Lalonde: As far as the charge of expropriation is concerned, I point out, to the friend of the multinationals on the other side, that a 25 per cent federal cash incentive grant will be made available to all explorers to offset the 25 per cent Crown share.

The Crown share replaces the Petro-Canada "back-in" provision in the current Canada oil and gas land regulations, and it reflects the substantial contribution by Canadian taxpayers to frontier exploration through such incentives as the super-depletion allowance. The new cash incentive grant recognizes the vital need to know as soon as possible what the frontier region may contribute. I would remind hon. members on the other side of the House that in the past Canadian taxpayers have contributed, in some instances, over 100 per cent of the cost of that exploration. It is only fair that today Canadian taxpayers should be entitled to a share, which we have set at 25 per cent, in the development of those resources which have been found through the contribution of the Canadian taxpayers in the past, and which will be found in the future.

I am sure members are aware of the statements made by some industry spokesmen that there will now be a decrease in oil and gas activity in the frontier regions. These spokesmen have said their plans will have to be reviewed and that investment money may have to leave Canada. I doubt that these people have carefully analysed the National Energy Program, especially the positive aspects of such elements as the cash incentive grant program. I can say that in discussions I have had with various representatives of the industry in the last couple of weeks, they have indicated very substantial interest in investing in the Canada lands under the new regime.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lalonde: In any event, I would be hard pressed to name any area of the world today where a more favourable exploration situation could be found, both from the standpoint of geological promise and investment climate.

In the United Kingdom, for instance—and I will not talk about the recent 20 per cent tax which the U.K. government has imposed on the oil and gas industry in England—one would encounter a far more severe taxation system involving, in fact, four levels of taxation of petroleum production. In addition, there is one U.K. state enterprise empowered to purchase up to 51 per cent of all oil production, and another one with a monopoly in respect of all gas production. In Norway, there is a Norwegian state enterprise empowered since its inception in 1973 to be a 50 per cent carried-interest holder in oil and gas rights throughout the exploration stage. The percentage share can go higher on the basis of the productivity of a field with the maximum rate attained to date being 80 per cent.

In the case of producing areas such as Indonesia, where the production sharing type of contract is the general mode of doing business, the rate of return obtainable under that system is considerably less favourable than will be the case under the fiscal terms set out in the proposed Canada oil and gas act. As regards moving south to operate in the U.S.A., the limited extent of the areas that do remain available for exploration in the United States are by no means in the same category as Canada's vast frontier regions. The elements of the new oil and gas regime for Canada's frontier, together with the geological promise of these regions, constitute a situation attractive to a degree difficult to find anywhere else in the world.

For some years now industry has been concerned with the need to establish certainty regarding the tenure of oil and gas rights in the frontier regions, as well as the applicable fiscal regime. Industry reaction following the announcement of the National Energy Program has centred on the timing of the proposed new legislation and the opportunity for industry to make its views known.

I share industry's desire for a speedy resolution of these questions. I am introducing Bill C-48 for second reading today so that we can quickly move to the committee stage where interested parties will have the chance to be heard. I might add that if, after having heard witnesses, the committee feels that some appropriate adjustments are required, the government will be open to the possibility of some modifications in order to meet the justified concerns.

[Translation]

I should like to add a few words in my own language concerning Bill C-48, a bill to regulate oil and gas interests in Canada lands, which I have just introduced for second reading. People are not particularly aware of the wealth and resources which Canada lands mean for all Canadians. These lands include the Northwest Territories and the offshore regions where Canada has submarine mining rights. When we make the sum total of all these areas, we end up with a surface which is nearly double that of the ten provinces put together.

As a matter of fact, it is a huge area which is enormously rich in terms of oil and mineral resources generally. In fact, all geologists agree that the Canada lands are the most promising for the future in terms of oil and natural gas. Following the exploratory work which has been carried out off the cost of Newfoundland, in the Hibernia field, as well as in Beaufort Sea, there are already very encouraging indications that within the next few years Canada may count on major reserves of conventional oil similar to those which are now being tapped in the west.

Up to now, Canada had granted exploration permits for some 300 million acres of this territory which covers some four million square miles. And Bill C-48 which we are looking into today will make it possible for the Canadian government to update all its current regulations governing the exploration and development of oil resources on Canada lands.

In fact, we have several main objectives in mind with this new system. First of all, exploration agreements will contain stricter project requirements and provide for firm drilling commitments. Also, the government of Canada, on behalf of Canadian taxpayers, will keep a 25 per cent share of oil and gas rights in the Canada lands, which will be handed over to Petro-Canada or some other designated Crown corporation.

All agreements will also specify that at least 50 per cent of the interests developing those reserves will have to be Canadian, from either the public or the private sector. Fourth, through these agreements, we will ensure that the projects to develop oil and gas in the Canada lands will employ as many Canadians as possible and use the greatest number of Canadian goods and services. There will also be provisions to guarantee Canadians a fair share of the returns accruing from the resources committed on their behalf in the oil and gas industry through a basic 10 per cent royalty with an additional 40 per cent royalty on the net profits from a particular deposit.

Finally, Bill C-48 contains several other clauses enabling the minister to ensure that the rate and volume of production are adequate to satisfy the future needs of Canada. It also contains a whole series of provisions so that the government can be sure that exploration in the north and offshore is ecologically sound, and that exploration work and the actual projects are respectful of the environment which, as everyone knows, is extremely fragile in those regions.

[English]

I have said that the government wishes this bill to be considered in committee so that it may be considered in detail and so that hon. members may have an opportunity to hear witnesses. We on this side of the House will be very open to suggestions for improvements. I am confident that the members of this House share our concern that the industry should be provided with some certainty as soon as possible regarding the tenure of oil and gas rights in the frontier regions coming under the Canada lands.

I therefore commend Bill C-48 to early consideration in committee, and I commend it to the House generally.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, we are today debating the legislation which will set the framework for energy development in the Northwest Territories, the Arctic Islands and offshore in the north, as well as on the east coast and the west coast, for years to come. It is the framework for what will probably be the most significant area of energy development in Canadian history. Unfortunately, since this bill was tabled on Tuesday for first reading, we have only had two full days to study the bill before we are put in the position of presenting some preliminary views. It is not sufficient time to do justice to the legislation, which is very complex and very far-reaching. Therefore it is important that we have good committee hearings to understand the full complexity and full impact of the legislation.

The results of exploration to date in the Mackenzie Delta, the Beaufort Sea islands, the Arctic islands, and the east coast offshore, have been very exciting to date. There is great promise for the future. It is essential, therefore, that this legislation provide a very positive framework for future development and for increased exploration in these areas. The east coast is a very exciting area, not only because of the size of the potential of the discovery that has been made there to date, but also because of the very strategic location of these new resources in view of our over-all vulnerability to offshore sources of oil, particularly the very volatile Middle East.

Atlantic Canada and Quebec are totally dependent on offshore sources of oil at this time. By 1985 we expect that Ontario will commence using imported oil. Hibernia and other discoveries off the east coast will transform this picture. It will also transform the development of the east coast, not only in terms of the economic development but also in security of supply, and with regard to the regional balance between that part of the country and other provinces, as well as our international balance of payments. It is essential, therefore, to treat Bill C-48 with the utmost respect, to deal with it expeditiously but with great care, because of the impact it will have on our energy development.

The broad objectives of this legislation are worth while and are certainly acceptable. One might go so far as to say they are motherhood; they are intended to increase production and Canadian ownership, as well as to provide a very stable tax environment. I agree with the minister when he says that it is important to have this legislation. We have been waiting for it for about ten years now.

Let me trace the sorry history of the life of this bill, Mr. Speaker. It goes back many years. Until now, the regulations under which the federal government makes oil and gas rights available for development have been the Canadian oil and gas land regulations. These were promulgated under the Public Lands Grants Act and the Territorial Lands Act. In 1970 we were promised new rules under these acts, and in 1973 in the "Energy Policy for Canada, Phase I," the federal government document, it was noted:

—these land regulations are currently under review. No new federal permits have been granted since March 1972.

In May, 1976, the then ministers of energy, mines and resources and of Indian affairs and northern development announced the elements of a petroleum and natural gas bill which was to be placed before Parliament later that year. About a year later we got the Canada oil and gas act and were promised speedy action on it, but 15 months later there was an election so there is still no Canada oil and gas act. Now, almost three years later, we finally see this legislation come to light.

This delay is shocking, Mr. Speaker. It is irresponsible to expect companies to operate in an environment when they have no idea what the ground rules will be. In fact the minister has changed some of the ground rules to the significant detriment, not of the multinationals as he keeps saying in this House, but of the Canadian-owned independent companies that he is looking to, to play an important role in developing the Canadianization of the oil industry. That is the kind of company that is being hurt.

This delay, going back to 1970, has cost Canada valuable years in reaching oil self-sufficiency. It is important that we get on with the job now. If I may say one positive thing, I would commend the minister for finally bringing this legislation forward.

We must study this new legislation very carefully and look at its objectives. It reveals that the stated objectives have been seriously undermined by the specifics of it. Today, I will only judge the legislation on the minister's own criteria, on the over-all objectives to achieve self-sufficiency in this country and to increase Canadianization. These are two of the principal objectives of his National Energy Program. I will also comment on the retroactive nature of the 25 per cent back-in by the Crown, the whole question of offshore jurisdiction for resource ownership, the international implications, and the very important element of ministerial discretion which is rampant throughout the bill.

Let us take the objective of self sufficiency. In the National Energy Program, frontier and offshore reserves are not included in any discussion of the producibility in the industry leading up to 1990. In the program it is stated that conventional sources will produce about 713,000 barrels per day and non-conventional sources will produce about 730,000 barrels per day. These figures are suspect, first of all because of the changed economics brought in by the National Energy Program which altered the degree of production on the conventional side and then because of the current deadlock between Alberta and the government. We have seen the non-conventional projects put in limbo. A third project has announced it will not go ahead today, the Judy Creek tertiary recovery program.

There is a very good reason why we have to look toward these frontier resources. There is also a good reason why they are not included in the supply figures in "The National Energy Program", because they are not assured. Their viability has not been proven. There is great promise but the technical problems of transporting the oil to places where it can be used have not been solved, and the over-all economics of development have not been proven. These are important elements in the bill we are studying today.

It is important to ask whether the provisions of Bill C-48 bring these sources closer to reality. It is important to know whether Bill C-48 encourages increased levels of exploration and development. The initial assessment we have made on this side is that the answer to that question is no. One of the public responses we have seen is by Gulf Canada which has cut its northern exploration budget from $400 million to $270 million for next year—about one-third. I find that to be a very serious decision by Gulf Canada.

We must also examine the change in the tax evironment between the prior position and that proposed under Bill C-48. The royalty position proposed under the previous bill, which was not passed, is the same as set out in this bill. As the minister pointed out, the super-depletion allowance which provided a significant amount, in some cases 100 per cent of the cost of the expensive wells up there, was to be changed and has been changed to provide for exploration grants of between 20 and 80 per cent, depending on the level of Canadian ownership.

Under the previous proposed legislation Petro-Canada was given the right to back in if it met two conditions. One was if there had been no significant discovery, and the second was if the consortium was not more than 35 per cent Canadian owned. Under this new legislation, as well as under the National Energy Program there is a 10 per cent basic royalty plus a 40 per cent participating royalty after a 25 per cent return on investment has been achieved, and 8 per cent gas and oil production tax, and an automatic 25 per cent back-in by Petro-Canada, or another state agency. That back-in is there, whether or not there is a significant discovery and whether or not there is a significant degree of Canadian ownership.

The economics have been changed significantly by the proposed legislation and by the energy program. That is a matter which must be taken into account by the government when it is considering expert testimony here in committee.

I do not quarrel that there is a 25 per cent back-in. If the government feels this is necessary, then we can support that. However, I point out there are very high front-end costs involved in exploration offshore and in the northern frontiers. There is a very inadequate pricing regime relative to other countries in the world. This, too, must be taken into account when the over-all economics are considered, whether or not companies feel it is worth their while to spend the huge amounts of money required for frontier and offshore exploration.

The impact of frontier and offshore exploration and development highlights the inadequacy of the pricing regime of the National Energy Program. In the conventional area, the problem is primarily a dispute between the province of Alberta and the federal government. We have urged the province and the federal government to get on with negotiations to unwind this deadlock. But the problem in the frontier is that we do have expensive drilling costs. If the pricing, together with the tax and other royalty requirements, is not attractive enough, then work will not go on. On that particular aspect, I am not encouraged.

I want to point out the difference in the pricing regime. The minister has referred in a passing way to the tax regime in the United Kingdom and Norway. He has omitted any reference to the pricing regime and he also only mentioned part of the tax aspect. He omitted to mention that in England there is a 150 per cent full cost recovery before there is a royalty and taxes are levied.

The economic adviser to the department of energy has stated:

> A crucial element of our policy of economic pricing is that North Sea oil should be sold at world market prices within as well as without the U.K . . . it would be very shortsighted for us to become accustomed to cheap energy supplies at below world market prices—

A paper on energy policy in Norway states:

> It is especially important to economize with non-renewable resources, such as oil . . . It is therefore the view of the government that, even though Norway has become an oil exporting nation, domestic prices of oil products continue to be based on world market prices.

In the case of The Netherlands we find:

> Since the 1973-1974 energy price increase The Netherlands immediately tried to price their own natural gas for domestic use and export at the OPEC equivalent level.

In the 1980 Venice summit, in declaration 7 the comment was:

> There is no justifiable rationale for subsidizing energy prices domestically—

In a policy speech in Australia, the prime minister stated:

> —the oil parity pricing policy is an important part of the over-all plan. We want Australia to be as energy self-sufficient as possible in future years. We do not want Australia to be a beggar for fuel on the international market.

I mention these items today. While we may have one consideration regarding the question of conventional oil as it relates to the debate between Alberta and the federal government, in the case of offshore production, where the costs are so high, it is important to look at the experience of these other countries which are ahead of Canada in offshore development. Where primary resources are offshore these countries have moved quickly to world price. In Canada, as all Canadians know, we are considering not a move to world price but to about 75 per cent or 85 per cent of world price. Today the Economic Council was proposing 85 per cent of world price and the premier of the province of Alberta has proposed 75 per cent of world price.

It is important to look at what is happening in other countries of the world when we decide how to proceed with very expensive offshore development in Canada. Other countries do not have to contend with icebergs and short drilling seasons. Canada has to, as we all know. The result is that Canada's objective of self-sufficiency has not been moved forward. In fact it has been set back by the provisions of Bill C-48.

There is one other element to which I referred in passing when I was talking about the offshore development on the east coast. This is very strategic as it relates to Canada's supply position. We are relying on the Middle East, Venezuela and Mexico primarily for imports of oil. By taking oil from those parts of the world, security of supply is uncertain. This has been particularly so in the last two or three years. My colleague, the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald), will be discussing this point further in the debate. However, I will comment that Canada has been given a heaven-sent opportunity to free itself from offshore dependency. Other countries would move quickly and aggressively to capitalize on this opportunity. But in Bill C-48 nothing like that is proposed. My initial observation is that the greed of the federal government for revenues and control is likely to set back this very exciting development.

If we are to err, I say let us err on the side of early and full development, to protect ourselves and our future so that we can free ourselves from offshore supplies of oil and thus secure the independence which Canada so richly deserves.

I have stated that we have no problem as far as the 25 per cent back-in for the Crown is concerned. I believe that it is a positive element to have a working interest rather than a carrying interest. I support these two provisions of the bill.

However, I have a very strong disagreement with the retroactive nature of this back-in aspect as it relates to exploration and development in the way it has been done to date. In 1977 the Government of Canada, in order to encourage exploration in these unknown areas of Canada and to understand what we had in the north and in the offshore, introduced a super-depletion allowance and it introduced certain back-in rights for Petro-Canada. These back-in rights would allow Petro-Canada to take a 25 per cent interest if there were no significant discoveries and less than 35 per cent Canadian ownership.

What has been done in this legislation is unfair, confiscatory, and immoral. On reflection, what the government has done is to say the success of the Beaufort Sea and Hibernia is too much to handle. The government has said it must have a part of it, and have it without payment. What happened is that $5 billion has been spent by the various companies in exploration over the years.

Mr. Lalonde: The Canadian taxpayer paid for it.

Mr. Wilson: This amount of $5 billion has been spent, and now Petro-Canada is being given the right to take a 25 per cent share on a retroactive basis without compensation. This is equivalent to a theft of $1.25 billion from these companies which have been operating in good faith.

Mr. Lalonde: Try Norway.

• (1610)

Mr. Wilson: The consequences I see are negative as far as the impact is concerned on existing companies which have been exploring in the Beaufort Sea. It is immoral and it is an embarrassment to this country. We are acting like a banana republic in our relations with people who have operated in good faith.

Let us step back and look at the long-term implications of this.

An hon. Member: Start acting like a Canadian.

Mr. Wilson: If you are going to take things away on a retroactive basis, I ask you to consider for a moment that you have an RRSP. Think what the fellow next to you is going to do about it because it is the same consideration—there has been a tax write-off, the government feels you have received too much and is going to take some of that back after it said you could have it. That is the position these companies are in, and it is totally unfair.

An hon. Member: Gross imagination.

Mr. Wilson: There is no gross imagination there whatsoever. It is there in black and white. It is going to affect us not just in this one area relating to oil exploration and development in the north, but also will affect international confidence in government action of any sort as it relates to foreign investment, and it is going to set back economic development in this country because of that. We have received a black eye in the eyes of the rest of the world and it is bound to affect us in the years to come.

The government has changed the rules in another portion of this bill, and has done so on a retroactive basis. Bill C-20, although it was not legislation, was regarded by the industry as the ground rules under which they would be operating. It allowed for a three-year royalty holiday on production coming from reserves which were proven prior to December, 1982. The purpose of this was to encourage production and exploration in that part of the country. The government, having encouraged that exploration, has shortened the time, making the date December, 1980—which is only three weeks after the bill was introduced. The development programs which had been planned for a period leading up to 1982 have to be cut short. These programs could have been compressed into a tighter time-frame in order to take advantage of the royalty holiday. With only three weeks left, that is impossible to achieve. It is another example of the trickiness of this government.

Let us look at the other primary objective of the National Energy Program, and that is Canadianization. We on this side of the House fully support that objective and will support the government in any realistic way in achieving increased Canadian ownership of this industry. It is imperative to examine the impact of Bill C-48 on that objective. Will Bill C-48 achieve that objective of increasing Canadian ownership?

An hon. Member: Yes, it will.

Mr. Wilson: Mr. Speaker, I do not agree that it will. We want to examine the witnesses very closely when we reach the committee stage to see how it is affecting the Canadian companies we are looking to to take an increased role in this industry. The preliminary indication is that only a limited number of Canadian companies are of the size to participate in the very expensive programs which must be undertaken in the north and offshore. The new economics of the industry under Bill C-48 and under the National Energy Program will not encourage others to participate. There are very high front-end costs, there is tremendous risk and high taxes as a result of Bill C-48.

As I indicated earlier, the pricing regime the companies will have to operate under is not going to be sufficient to attract investment. We had a slowdown in activity before Bill C-48 came into effect. Now with the changes brought in under Bill C-48 and the National Energy Program, I can see a further slowdown in that activity, and signs of that have been indicated already.

My concern is that the approach to Canadianization will lead to a very heavy involvement in the industry by the Government of Canada, either through PetroCan or through some other Crown corporation. The problem is not how to gain greater participation for Petro-Canada in the Canadian offshore. The provisions of this bill provide many opportunities for Petro-Canada to have a very full involvement. The danger of Bill C-48 is that it will result in too much centralization. There will be too much control vested in one central agency. There will not be enough breadth of decision-making so that the decision to move into this or that prospective area of development will be concentrated in one spot, the Government of Canada. That is wrong. Anybody who has followed the development of the oil industry over the years will agree that is wrong, and Canadians will suffer for it.

If Petro-Canada or the Government of Canada has a dominant involvement there will be insufficient diversity of points of view. The oil business thrives on competition and it thrives on different points of view.

I should like to make two proposals which will develop Canadian participation in this industry to a greater extent than will take place under Bill C-48 as it is today. I hope this may be discussed further in committee. The first is to go back to Bill C-20 and consider the approach taken there, and make some adjustments to the approach on how Petro-Canada or the state would have back-in privileges to any developments in the north.

Canada needs all the participants it can get for northern development. I say that because we have to bring to bear the maximum capital involvement as well as the maximum technological involvement and the differing points of view resulting from a wide range of participants. It will strengthen the Canadian industry and will encourage non-residents to seek out Canadian partners. Under Bill C-48 there is no incentive to make a good effort at expanding Canadian participation past a minimal 25 per cent.

I suggest to the minister that rather than make it a compulsory back-in for Petro-Canada, he allow Petro-Canada to back in if there is not 50 per cent Canadian involvement. Canadian involvement would be encouraged in those projects and we would not have the mandatory imposition of the state.

The second proposal concerns an alternative form of royalty not unlike the case in Great Britain and, I believe, in Norway. It is to allow companies to recover 150 per cent of their total investment and then subject them to a higher royalty, allowing them to get their capital investment back in a faster way. This would improve their investment and allow them to reinvest that money in other development in the north sooner rather than waiting for the very long pay-outs which can take place under Bill C-48 as it stands today. This is an approach which is consistent with the high degree of risk which prevails in the north and in the offshore, as well as the very huge size of commitment. It would be much easier for the less well-capitalized Canadian companies to take a stronger and more active participatory role. The result would be a faster development of the north and certainly would result in broader and more extensive Canadian ownership of the oil industry.

Bill C-48 confirms the Government of Canada's unilateral approach in yet another area of policy, and that is in the area of offshore jurisdiction over resources. Our party believes there is a legitimate right for coastal provinces to have the same rights to their resources as those which have their resources totally underground. We have stated many times we believe this jurisdiction should be guaranteed under the constitution in the same way as the inland provinces.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Wilson: The oceans should not be regarded as barriers to these coastal provinces but should be regarded as an extension of their livelihood. This is similar to the position of these provinces as it relates to the fisheries. It is just an extension of that same thought to relate that same principle to offshore resources.

● (1620)

Other colleagues will be elaborating on this fundamental principle, but let me say only that it is essential that this disagreement be settled, and settled as quickly as the disagreement we have with Alberta because, if not, the legitimate development of offshore Newfoundland and Nova Scotia resources may well be delayed for many years, until the companies involved have sufficient confidence to proceed and spend the vast amounts of money required to bring those fields into production.

Let me comment on the economic development we hope will arise out of Bill C-48. We are pleased that provision is made for the minister to approve plans for the employment of Canadians and for the use of Canadian goods and services in projects under the jurisdiction of Bill C-48. We on this side have been pressing for this, and we look forward to the regulations or the business plan the minister or his colleague, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray), will be presenting to companies, so that we can judge the merit of this approach.

We believe this is important because of the job-creating possibilities there are, the increased opportunities to develop technology within this country, and the opportunities to export that technology in future years. The impact of that on our over-all balance of payments can be very significant, and this is something we believe is very important to keep in mind in the development of those regulations. However, it is essential to provide the companies with these ground rules beforehand so that they know what they are dealing with and how to conduct themselves in the development of these offshore resources. It is essential that in the development of these ground rules we limit the amount of discretion the minister has, and give the participants as firm an understanding as possible of what constitutes good behaviour in the use of Canadian people and products in these developments.

While I am on this subject I would like to draw the attention of the minister to a matter which my colleague, the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre), raised in the House the other day and of which the minister disclaimed any knowledge, that is, the question of the purchase by Petro-Canada of a drilling platform which, we understand, has been ordered from Japan.

The drilling platform will cost $150 million. It is a Sedco designed platform, and Thompson Drilling Company, owned by Atco Industries, a Canadian company, has had four identical rigs built in Canada, three in Halifax and one in Vancouver. Now we see Petro-Canada, the Canadian state-owned company, going to Japan to buy this same rig. We have asked the minister to get an explanation of this from Petro-Canada, and we ask him to impress upon Petro-Canada the importance of following the basic policies he is setting forward in this bill in the conduct of its activities. I hope the minister will be reporting to this House in a short period of time as to the reasons which led Petro-Canada to make that decision. It runs contrary to everything the minister has said, and I am surprised that he has not been on top of it prior to this.

Let us step back for a minute and look at Bill C-48 as it affects development in this huge area. If the result of Bill C-48, as I set out in the section of my remarks with respect to self-sufficiency and how we are going to take ourselves to self-sufficiency, is truly a slowdown in activity, the north will be affected in a very serious way. We have seen indications of budget cutbacks already. Job opportunities for native peoples will decline. Manufacturers and suppliers of goods in Alberta and central Canada will see orders to which they were looking forward to receiving, vanish.

I refer again to the Economic Council report which notes that the major opportunity for Canada to get out of the economic doldrums it is in today is through energy development. We do not see a sufficient forward thrust in Bill C-48 to move us in the direction to which the Economic Council refers. Major opportunities for economic development will be lost, and it is very important today at a time when one million people are unemployed and when we have a $17 billion deficit on our manufacturing trade—to say nothing of what this can do for energy supplies—that we err on the side of development and not on the side of greed.

I will not cover the question of the environment. My colleague, the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. McMillan), will be speaking to the House later with respect to the environment, but I wish just to note that that is a very critical element of this bill because of the very fragile nature of the environment and the ecology in the parts of the country which are affected, the north as well as the east coast offshore. We will be looking very closely at the environmental impact and at the regulations to be forthcoming as a result of this bill.

One final matter I wish to discuss is that of ministerial discretion. In reading this bill it is clear that there are many elements of ministerial discretion. This is of grave concern to me and, I believe, would be of grave concern to the people in the industry who have suffered quite seriously as a result of the discretion the minister has used to date in his very heavy-handed approach regarding the 25 per cent retroactive confiscation of the work which has been done to date. Against that background, participants in the industry must query whether there will be other areas in which the minister will exercise his discretion in a negative way. I have identified 23 significant areas of ministerial discretion. I believe these must be reviewed very carefully in committee. Petro-Canada can be designated the operator, and fields can be delineated by the minister and not by the industry. The power is particularly dangerous in the hands of a minister who has the record of this one.

In summary, we are pleased to see this bill come forward. We have waited, as I said earlier, since 1970 for legislation governing development in this part of our country. The objectives of the bill are worthy ones, but the bill is singularly ill-conceived in its structure with respect to the greed of the Government of Canada and its desire for control.

The government is undermining the objectives that the bill and the National Energy Program have set out to achieve. In the two key areas of self-sufficiency and Canadianization, the objectives of the National Energy Program have been undermined. This is a common thread in Bill C-48 and also in the Petroleum Administration Act, and I believe that the committee must give very careful study to certain elements of this bill in order to ensure that these objectives are not undermined.

I urge the Government of Canada to be flexible, as the minister has promised the House today, to be openminded, and to put the interests of the country ahead of the interests of the government in achieving what we want to achieve in the development of these resources. The Government of Canada has a grave responsibility to all Canadians with respect to economic development and security of supply. Its policies in Bill C-48 would lead toward an insecure energy future. We are risking economic development, and I urge the minister to weigh very carefully the advice and the views of experts who appear before the committee.

• (1630)

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased, on behalf of the NDP, to take part in this debate on Bill C-48. Previously the Canadian oil and gas regulations were debated only in the boardrooms of government departments and of oil companies. Some of the provisions in the bill governing the industry in the north and offshore are set out in some detail. As a matter of fact they are set out in so much detail that I agree with the hon. member for Etobicoke Centre (Mr. Wilson), who spoke before me, that it is very difficult, as a result, to deal with this bill in a lot of detail this afternoon, a bill which we received only 48 hours ago.

What I want to do is to discuss major parts of the bill, and later on to deal in committee with some of the other provisions of the bill. I should say right away to the minister that we in the NDP oppose the bill, and I will give some reasons as to why we oppose it. One of the major reasons is that in the past Canadians have really been international patsies with respect to our policy which allowed companies to come in and develop our oil and gas, especially in the north where the Government of Canada, which pretends to know better and which should know better, allowed quite open development.

The hon. member for Etobicoke Centre said we were somewhat like a banana republic in the sense that we seemed to be depriving people of property and investments which they had made in good faith. I, too, am against depriving people of property and investments made in good faith, but when I heard the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre) yell about the "immorality of the situation" being staggering, to use his words, I thought of what my constituents think about the immorality of the situation of, for example, Dome Petroleum in the Beaufort Sea. The fact is that that is a company which has been subsidized almost completely by public moneys, a company with all kinds of tax write-offs, the most incredible tax write-offs, a company which has never paid and is not paying any income tax. That company has admitted it in Victoria at a symposium and a debate which I attended this summer with the president of the company. My constituents think it is pretty immoral on the part of the company and pretty stupid on the part of the government to allow that situation to occur.

I have said that we have had a resource give-away unparalleled in any country in modern times, and I would draw hon. members attention to an article written way back in 1973 by Professor Andrew Thompson entitled "Canada's Petroleum Leasing Policy—A Cornucopia For Whom?", and subsequent articles written on Canada's leasing policies in the north. It is quite clear, if you read some of the work by Dr. Thompson and others, that they talk about a free entry system and about rights that are excessive, which go on and on, that there is no end to these free rights. They talk about a system which does not promote turnovers and does not promote government intervention.

But that is in the past, is it not, Mr. Speaker? In the past we have seen, under Liberal governments by and large, that of the 290 million acres held under permit in our frontier lands, only 110 million acres are held by Canadian-controlled companies, and of the Canadian-controlled companies, Petro-Canada holds 60 per cent. When we look at this bill, when we examine it in detail, we should remember that it is the same old gang, the same sponsor who brought in the previous regulations which I have described as a resource give-away unparalleled in any country in modern times, who is bringing in these new regulations. The question arises as to why they have changed. Is it because we have a new minister, the genial and amicable member for Outremont (Mr. Lalonde)? He is smiling, not because I said that but because he is just back from Paris.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Waddell: Some of my colleagues say that "old iron-clad" is back from Paris.

An hon. Member: Latex man.

Mr. Waddell: In any case, Mr. Speaker, one has to ask why they have changed. If you had listened to the minister speak, as I did a few minutes ago, you would have found it to be, as Mr. Diefenbaker used to say, the greatest conversion since Saul on the road to Damascus. Suddenly the minister proposes a new program of Canadianization. Essentially this is why we oppose this bill.

I want to say something about Canadianization. I have a different word for it. It is not a new word and you can look it up in the dictionary. I call it "lalondization", or "lalonding". "Lalonding" is defined as the illusion of control by Canadians when, in fact, it is the same old control by foreign oil companies. That is what this bill is.

An hon. Member: What dictionary are you using?

Mr. Waddell: It is a west coast dictionary. I say that because many people in the country, many well-meaning people, are really concerned—I think people are concerned in spite of what the Conservative party says—about the large oil companies and the shape of the development through these companies in the future. In spite of what the hon. member for Calgary Centre might say, many people are concerned, and they tend to want to support the government on this because they are in favour of Canadianization. Who is not? The Liberals are, we are, and the hon. member for Etobicoke Centre said a few moments ago that he was. But the problem is that many Canadian people think that Canadianization really means public control. Well, it is not public control, because if you look at the oil and energy policy you find there are no detailed provisions for public control. Which companies will Petro-Canada take over, when, how much are they going to pay, how are they going to do it? There is nothing there.

Mr. Hopper, president of Petro-Canada, when asked those questions, said that there are really no companies for sale right now. So it should be made quite clear to the Canadian people that Canadianization, or lalondization as I call it, does not include right now public takeovers and public ownership. It does not even include Canadian control. That is why I call it "lalonding", because even after this bill is passed and the provision for a 50 per cent Canadian ownership in frontier lands before production is allowed, is in effect, it will still be possible to have control from New York or from other parts of the United States where it has always been.

Let me give you two examples. The previous member for Winnipeg North Centre, before the present member who is in the front row of our party, the first leader of our party in the House, J. S. Woodsworth, used to go around the country with a blackboard, I am told, and he used to explain, through figures on his blackboard, what was really going on. I cannot bring a blackboard to the House of Commons, so I ask hon. members to bear with me when I give a few figures to illustrate my point. I will try to go slowly and make it very simple.

Let us take the case where Imperial Oil and Petro-Canada under this new scheme, if it does not change but goes through as it is, were to go into a project 50-50. Remember that 70 per cent of Imperial Oil is owned by Exxon, the largest multinational oil company in the world, and Petro-Canada, of course, is a government-owned oil company. If there were to be 100 shares in this consortium of Imperial Oil and Petro-Canada, Imperial Oil would take one-half and Petro-Canada would take the other half. I said that Imperial was approximately 70 per cent foreign-owned, which means approximately 30 per cent Canadian-owned. If the Americans laid claim to their share of the 50 shares taken by Imperial, they would get 70 per cent of 50 shares which would be 35 shares, and the remaining Canadian portion would be 15 shares. Then the 50 per cent of 50 shares of Petro-Canada, since it is 100 per cent Canadian owned, would be classified as Canadian.

• (1640)

In order to take advantage of this new act, the Canadian ownership rate is established in a white paper by the Petroleum Monitoring Agency. Judging by that standard, all Canadian-owned shares are classified as Canadian. If we take the 15 shares of Imperial and the 50 shares of Petro-Canada, it would give us a project with 65 per cent Canadian ownership and about 35 per cent foreign ownership. So, it would qualify. We would have 50-50, Imperial Oil and Petro-Canada, and suddenly we have a Canadian project which can produce, even though Imperial will control 50 per cent. I do not call that Canadianization; I call it lalondization. It is the first example of lalonding.

I should like to give a second example which will make it even worse. Let me take a case where Imperial goes in with 70 per cent. It could be Shell, Gulf, Texaco or any foreign company which the government does not propose to touch. They did not win in cabinet or whatever. The government did not have the courage to interfere with the foreign companies. It is still taking all the flack anyway, so it might as well have interfered with them. Returning to my example of Imperial with 70 per cent and Petro-Canada with 30 per cent, it would still qualify for a production licence.

That is strange, but let me explain how it works. We must remember that Imperial is 70 per cent owned by Exxon; 70 per cent of 70 shares would be 49 shares or 49 per cent. The Canadian content of Imperial would be 30 per cent of 70 shares, which would be 21 shares or 21 per cent. Of course Petro-Canada would be 100 per cent of 30 shares, which would be 30 shares, or 30 per cent. The result would be that this project, in which Imperial has 70 per cent of the action, under the new scheme would be 49 per cent foreign-controlled and 51 per cent Canadian controlled. Therefore, it meets the requirements. It is another example of "lalonding". It gives the illusion of Canadianization, but in reality, as was pointed out in my dictionary definition, we would have a consortium controlled by a foreign multinational.

I would ask subsequent Liberal speakers to challenge my figures. I see the parliamentary secretary indicating no. I gather my figures are unchallengeable.

Mr. Lalonde: Don't go too fast.

Mr. Waddell: The minister said that his other chief gem in this bill is that the Crown would get a 25 per cent interest, the radical measure which incensed the members to my right. I ask the minister to read about a little deal which the Government of Canada entered into in 1945 between His Majesty the King and Imperial Oil Limited for the Norman Wells project in the Mackenzie Valley in the Canadian Arctic. In that project, which was a voluntary scheme, the government took 33 per cent. Now, under this radical scheme, which is not a voluntary one, it will take 25 per cent. This is another example of lalonding. It gives the illusion of doing something, it gives the illusion of a progressive policy, but really nothing is being done at all.

This bill affects the NDP concern about multinational oil companies, that they do not operate all the time on the basis of the Canadian national interest. The minister should read some of the literature written about these oil companies. For example, there is the book entitled "The Seven Sisters", which was written by Anthony Sampson. I recommend it to all my friends in the House. The evidence is clear that they do not always operate in the best interests of a national country, to put it mildly. We have seen it in Canada. The hon. member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent) raised it in the House when he brought forward the example where Exxon had an agreement to take Canadian technology from the tar sands and to take the technology from Imperial. There is nothing in the bill which deals with the transfer of technology. There is something in the bill which deals with a fair opportunity provision for Canadian industry, but it is not enough. When that oil runs out we want an industrial base for Canada. That must be examined in committee.

With respect to environmental matters there is very little in the bill. The hon. member for Nunatsiaq (Mr. Ittinuar) will speak in far greater detail about that important matter. There is no mention of native claims in the bill. Perhaps I did not expect them to be included in the bill, but I did not hear the minister mention anything about them or that they were a priority. The drilling and the exploration will just go on as usual, forgetting the legitimate claims of the native people of the north.

We in the New Democratic Party adopt the principle that oil belongs to the state. We say that nothing will change the importance of oil in the next 20 years. So, it is crucial what we do now with that oil.

I should like to make reference, as did the minister, to what was done in Norway and Britain. I should like to quote from the book entitled "Arguments for Socialism" which was written by Mr. Tony Benn. He was the minister responsible in the Labour government for setting up the control over North Sea oil. Page 74 of this book reads in part as follows:

> —our job was to make sure that the resources of the North Sea were exploited for the benefit of the nation as a whole and not solely for the benefit of a handful of multinationals controlled mainly from America.

Bill C-48 ensures that the Canadian north will still be part of the same old regime; it will still be controlled in the same manner.

I should like to compare the manner in which Norway handles it with what the minister is doing in Canada. Even under the new provisions of Bill C-48 we will still have lax rules and requirements. In Norway, special corporate taxes on multinational companies in the offshore mean that the companies pay 85 to 90 per cent of gross revenues in taxes. Despite this and despite what friends to my right say, Shell, Exxon, Mobil, Gulf and Phillips are still drilling in Norway; they are not pulling out. By contrast, Bill C-48, the radical measure brought in by the minister, imposes a royalty of only 10 per cent on oil and gas, compared to 35 per cent for that other radical province, Alberta. Also there is a provision for an incremental royalty of 40 per cent of net profits.

In committee we will be required to go into what "net profits" mean and the various write-offs. Any oil or gas discovered on or before December 31, 1980, is exempt from paying royalty for three years. The 40 per cent tax on net profits, after all these deductions, will be reduced considerably. Past income tax deductions reduced the nominal tax rate of 36 per cent for the petroleum industry to an effective rate of only 10 per cent from 1974 to 1979. Norway's state oil company, State Oil, inherits a 50 per cent ownership in any new oil or gas concession. The equity can rise as high as 70 per cent, and most of State Oil's share of exploration costs is picked up by the multinational oil companies. Bill C-48 provides a 25 per cent interest to be picked up by the federal government through Petro-Canada or another Crown agency. The Crown will not have to pay for previous exploration costs when it exercises this option but would pay 25 per cent of production costs.

Britain's state-owned oil company, British Petroleum, nationalized by Sir Winston Churchill, has first claim to 51 per cent of offshore oil production. The Conservative government in Britain recently levied a 20 per cent surtax on the profitable North Sea oil industry. The industry in Canada now claims that the 25 per cent government interest is a confiscation. But the Canadian taxpayer, in the past, has put up over 90 per cent of the cost of far north and offshore oil exploration.

Under the new National Energy Program the government will give grants up to 80 per cent of the cost of exploration on Canada lands for Canadian companies. I find it incredible that the hon. member for Calgary Centre and the hon. member for Etobicoke Centre complain about the 25 per cent interest when you consider how much money is being put up by the Canadian taxpayer. That is the point, Mr. Speaker—how much will be put up in the new National Energy Program? If you take what will be put up, the 80 per cent of the cost of exploration, this combined with tax breaks means that the taxpayer will put up 93 cents for every dollar spent by a Canadian company, and 72 cents of every dollar spent by a foreign company on Canada lands. Under these terms this 25 per cent interest is a give-away.

There was talk of industrial benefits and industrial spin-off. Norway has strict requirements—the source of supply for the industry must come from Norway. Norway supplies approximately 50 per cent to 60 per cent of all deliveries for offshore development. Their offshore industry now employs 36,000 people, which is 9 per cent of all industrial employment. Rig construction, petro-chemicals and refining have been developed for Norwegians, not by multinationals. Canada has the potential to develop a supply industry. It is only the Davies Shipbuilding Company in Quebec which builds semi-submersible rigs at the moment. Their major equipment components such as draw workers, pumps and large diesel engines are all imported. Our east and west coast industries could be manufacturing ships, pipe, rigs and equipment.

Strict Canadian content rules seem to be necessary and are workable, as is shown in Great Britain and Norway. I could go on and on with this comparison with Great Britain and Norway. The minister raised the subject and that is why I, too, raise it. This is another "lalonding" scheme which gives the illusion of being progressive when in fact it is not.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to say something about the sleeper provision in the bill which needs to be debated in committee. That is the section which defines Canada lands. It defines Canada lands as being lands in the Yukon Territory and the Northwest Territories and those sub-marine areas adjacent to the coasts of Canada. This raises the question of the provincial role in offshore oil and their role and control over resources. Sooner or later the government will have to face this.

It seems to us that the Atlantic provinces are facing economic hardships and difficulties. What Atlantic Canada needs—and I say this as a westerner who can see the real facts around me—is a resource base so that its people do not have to go cap in hand to Ottawa and so that they do not have to rely on the charity of central Canada, as we in the west do not have to do that any more. I woud like to see Atlantic Canada in that position. They need a good resource base. That is why the provinces must have primary claim and ownership over their offshore resources.

Ownership is a bundle of rights. There are many things involved in ownership. For example, it does not mean that the federal government will be completely cut out. The federal government has control over shipping, fisheries, and defence, and certainly it has a strong claim to environmental control and protection in the coastal areas. Basically, the government must recognize—and it is not recognizing it by waving this red flag before the bull—that at some point it must make an agreement with respect to offshore resources. Perhaps this might be better dealt with in the constitution committee, but I raise it at this point anyway.

I wanted to say one special word on my own behalf before I go on to another matter with respect to the environment. It is very important that in this bill and in the committee we go into some detail about the northern environment. It is our last frontier, our last environment. I have been there and I have seen the incredible environment in the Beaufort Sea and the Mackenzie Delta. I do not want to see it spoiled. I think we can have oil and gas production there. I think it can be done, but it has to be done carefully.

I draw hon. member's attention to a speech given by Sam Raddi of Inuvik, Northwest Territories. I will not read it into the record. It is a speech he gave on January 28, 1976, to the Berger commission. What Sam Raddi said was that "for generations we have been told that as go the animals so go us. If the animals, the fish and the whales of the Beaufort Sea and the surrounding area, ever disappear, then we will disappear, the Eskimo people will disappear." That is a thing which we cannot see happening in Canada. That is why we must go very carefully in the area of environmental protection.

I want to discuss one further aspect of Canadianization. I spoke in the House on November 21, and in response to my speech I received a letter from a Mr. Conrad M. Black, who is the chairman of the executive committee for a small company in Toronto called Hollinger Argus Limited, located at 10 Toronto Street. Since Mr. Black did not agree with some of the things I said about Canadianization, and it pertains to what I am saying now, I will read the letter into the record. I do so because the minister also got a copy of the letter. It certainly is not a confidential letter. Mr. Black wanted a chance to respond to some of the statements I had made. He said:

Dear Mr. Waddell:

I have read with some astonishment your reference to me on page 4955 of Hansard, reporting your comments in the House of Commons on November 21, 1980. The statement, "We will simply replace the Rockefellers with the Conrad Blacks or the Bob Blairs", is so demonstrably untrue that I cannot allow it to pass without comment.

I believe it is well known to the government and to the official opposition that I, personally, support the announced objectives of Canadianizing the energy industry, according the federal government a greater fiscal benefit from the operations of that industry, and maintaining Canadian energy prices somewhat below the world price level.

I digress there. I know that the government has the support of the chairman, at least in respect of Argus. So much for their radical policy. I continue reading from the letter:

I part company, however, with the authors of the National Energy Program in so far as that program, if it is not amended, will increase Canada's strategic dependence upon foreign energy sources rather than reducing it and will go a long way toward strangling the domestic private sector in the energy industry, while inflicting serious unemployment and a loss of technological skills upon both eastern and western Canada in the aftermath of the departure of the megaprojects; nor do I, as a citizen, feel that the public interest is particularly well served by gratuitously antagonizing even the most patriotic and least self-serving elements of the private sector, as this budget and energy program and official reaction to criticism of it have tended to do.

He parts company and joins my friends to the right. I am used to that, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but, it being five o'clock, there is now other business with which we must proceed.

Mr. Waddell: Mr. Speaker, I will finish reading the letter and give my reply to it later this evening.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Collenette: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, there have been discussions among the parties concerning Bill S-18, which you just informed the House was passed by the Senate earlier this afternoon. There has been agreement that this bill will be dealt with later in private members' hour, following royal assent and following the conclusion of Bill S-12, and that Bill S-18 will be dealt with in all stages, including Committee of the Whole, this afternoon before six o'clock.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, that is precisely the agreement. We would also be agreeable to not seeing the clock in the event that there should be a few minutes past the normal adjournment hour required so that the matter can be completed.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, we are in agreement.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The House has heard the arrangement as related by the parliamentary secretary and the House leaders of the two opposition parties. Is there agreement to proceed in that fashion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PRIVATE BILLS

[Translation]

CANADIAN MERCHANT SERVICE GUILD

Mr. Pierre Deniger (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State, Multiculturalism) moved that Bill S-12, respecting the Canadian Merchant Service Guild, as reported (without amendment) from the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills and Standing Orders, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Deniger moved that Bill S-12 be read the third time and do pass.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am really pleased this afternoon to introduce to the House and to Canadians on third reading the bill concerning the Merchant Marine of Canada, that is the new incorporation legislation. First I wish to extend my thanks to the member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall) as well as to the member for Comox-Powell River (Mr. Skelly).

When we refer to the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East, we refer to the member of Parliament who probably knows maritime circles better than anyone else. That member has dealt so much with maritime issues in his province and throughout Canada that he has now made a name for himself in maritime circles in Canada, especially in the Atlantic region. As for the member for Comox-Powell River, although he was elected at the same time as I was, I think that already on the Pacific coast his authority in maritime circles has made him a noteworthy member and colleague.

Mr. Speaker, this bill has been requested by Mr. Robert Cook and Mr. Maury Sjoquist, respectively President and Secretary-Treasurer of the Canadian Merchant Service Guild of Canada, who are obviously commissioned by the Guild to this end. The Guild was created in June, 1919, essentially to provide a fraternal union of Canadian seamen and to provide insurance for seamen and their dependants, in accordance with the provisions dealing with the benefit fraternal societies, as provided for in section 2 of the constitutive act.

Madam Speaker, the Guild is a fraternal union of seamen and for a long time its membership has been limited to licensed seamen and maritime pilots. As regards its activities as a fraternal benefit society, the Guild has not issued insurance coverage to anybody for over 50 years.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

Accordingly, Madam Speaker with the House went up to the Senate chamber.

And being returned.

Madam Speaker informed the House that the Deputy Governor General had been pleased to give, in Her Majesty's name, royal assent to the following bills:

Bill S-13, an act to revive Montilac Ltd. and Socam Ltd.

Bill S-14, an act to revive Tremus Industries Limited.

Bill C-47, an act for granting to Her majesty certain sums of money for the Government of Canada for the financial year ending March 31, 1981—Chapter No. 41.

Bill C-49, an act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the Government of Canada for the financial ending March 31, 1981—Chapter No. 42.

PRIVATE BILLS

[Translation]

CANADIAN MERCHANT SERVICE GUILD

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Deniger that Bill S-12, respecting the Canadian Merchant Service Guild, be read the third time and do pass.

Mr. Pierre Deniger (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State, Multiculturalism): Madam Speaker, I have just had the good fortune of seeing again Mr. Justice Antonio Lamer, the representative of the Governor General and a former professor of fiscal and criminal law of mine. I had not seen him in at least five or six years. And here he is the representative of the Governor General and here I am a member of the House of Commons. Who would have thought that possible ten years ago!

As I was saying, there are today 4,693 members of the Guild who can be found all over Canada. Classified by categories, there are 1,197 captains, 1,900 executive officers, 1,200 mechanics and 396 pilots. There are 22 permanent employees.

As of September 30, 1979, the Guild had $344,000 in assets; it had revenues amounting to $1,193,000, and expenses amounting to $1,146,456. Its structure has changed considerably and become much more complex in the process, so that it no longer corresponds to its statutory description. One now has to go by national statutes.

In short, Mr. Speaker, time being of the essence as there are other bills on the order paper, today the Guild needs a new incorporating act for many reasons. It must, by law, be given powers, purposes and aims that conform to the activities it has pursued for a long time and wishes to continue to pursue. In addition, this act must ratify what it has done in the past, and do away with any ambiguity with regard to its legal existence. Finally, the act must be flexible enough to allow it to develop, to expand its field of activity so that it can fully achieve its main objective, namely, the preservation of the interests of its members. This act, as it stands here before us, seems to be most adequate under the circumstances. In closing, Mr. Speaker, I should like once again to express my appreciation for the co-operation of hon. members of the Progressive Conservative Party and hon. members of the NDP in the matter of this bill which I consider important, not only because the bill itself is important but I feel the Guild is of exceptional importance. I really appreciate that co-operation.

● (1720)

[English]

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, first of all I want to say that the matter has been dealt with in an exhaustive way in the other place and I want to conform to my colleagues that several of us have looked at this bill closely. Inasmuch as the charter for the guild dates back to 1919-1920, some 60 years ago, it is not unfitting they would want to bring their charter into line with the requirements of the 1980s.

In reviewing the matter, I have one brief question which I will put at a later stage in Committee of the Whole. It has to do generally with an assurance from the sponsor—

Mr. Knowles: We are on third reading.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. I recognize the hon. member's difficulty because I had the same one myself. We are now in third reading. If the hon. member has a question he wants to put, or if there is some procedure he wants to follow, it might be wise to keep that in mind. When the hon. member sits down, we will finish third reading of this bill.

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Speaker, my apologies. I was not aware we were on third reading. I have only one observation to make. In the development of the sections of the new act I had an earlier concern that there might be a transfer of liability from the association's various chapters, from wherever they may be located in Canada, to the national body, or from the national body back to the various branches. However, I am satisfied that that is not the case. I am quite prepared now to welcome the upgrading of the Canadian Merchant Service Guild charter. I would like to note on the record what an active role the 3,000 or 4,000 members of the Canadian officers guild have played in the last 60 years in the development of this country.

They have demonstrated leadership in many areas, including safety at sea, modernization of ships, care and attention for crews, and care for the men who have served on ships. They have served actively and meaningfully not only at sea but also on shore.

We can do no better in this chamber than to accommodate the requirements of the Canadian Merchant Service Guild and give speedy passage to the bill now before us.

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, as the sponsor of the bill has pointed out, my colleague, the hon. member for Comox-Powell River (Mr. Skelly), represented us on the committee which dealt with the bill. On his behalf I am happy to indicate our readiness to support it on third reading. I do so not only on his behalf, but in recognition of the fact that, although I was not here 60 years ago when the first charter was granted, I did have contacts with the Canadian Merchant Service Guild in the 1940s and 1950s. I know of the good work this organization has done, and I agree with my colleagues who have spoken that this guild deserves to have its charter updated. Mr. Speaker, we are happy to give third reading to this bill.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Earlier the House indicated its intention to consider and pass all stages of Bill S-18 this afternoon. We will proceed in that fashion.

GENERAL INSURANCE COMPANY OF CANADA

Mr. Dennis Dawson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration) moved the first reading of Bill S-18, to amend and repeal an act to incorporate General Security Insurance Company of Canada.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first and second times, considered in committee, and reported.

Mr. Dawson moved the third reading of the bill.

[Translation]

He said: Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the group comprising 1,300 caisses populaires, 11 federations and thousands of members of the caisses Desjardins, I wish to thank hon. members on both sides of the House for the wholehearted co-operation they have given the Desjardins group in this matter. We apologize for the urgency of the situation, and we thank them. We may be sure that the members of the caisses Desjardins will benefit considerably from their co-operation.

Hon. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I see there is excellent co-operation in the House today. In less than a few minutes, two bills have already been passed. I rejoice for my colleagues and the government members in this co-operation and in the apportunity I am given to join in, in view of the urgent need for this act, the sponsor of this bill for the greater good of all the members of the caisses Desjardins, a well-known name back home, which is synonymous with progress.

• (1730)

[English]

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): It is because the request came from the caisses populaires that we are prepared to agree to the speedy passage of this bill. We are happy to give it third reading. We are doing pretty well today.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): In that case I observe there is not very far to go. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The hour provided for the consideration of private members' business having expired, I shall now leave the chair until eight o'clock this evening.

At 5.32 p.m. the House took recess.

CANADA OIL AND GAS ACT

MEASURE RESPECTING OIL AND GAS INTERESTS

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Lalonde that Bill C-48, to regulate oil and gas interests in Canada lands and to amend the Oil and Gas Production and Conservation Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works.

Madam Speaker: When debate was suspended at five o'clock, the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell) had the floor. The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway.

[English]

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Madam Speaker, I will continue to read the letter from Conrad Black to me. Starting with the first paragraph, it reads;

For your information, according to our figures, Norcin Energy Resources Limited—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Waddell: I do not know whether my friends are applauding Norcin, Conrad Black or the Speaker.

Some hon. Members: The Speaker.

Mr. Waddell: It goes on to read:

—the corporate connection that presumably caused you to bandy my name about in the distinguished company of the Rockefellers and Bob Blair, stands to lose in 1981 almost 60 per cent of its projected natural resource income. This represents a loss of about $1.30 per Norcin share, and at the multiples that currently obtain in stock market evaluation, this would mean that my associates and our minority shareholders and I would be called upon to endure an apparent loss on our investment of about $150 million. In exchange for this, no discernible benefit is conferred upon us, and if you can explain to me how this process leads to my own enrichment or elevation to economic parity with the Rockefellers, I will be deeply grateful.

There are now various proposals before the minister and his colleagues which, without impairing anticipated federal revenues or varying the espoused objectives of the federal energy policy, would enable the private sector to participate usefully and to the profit of all Canadians in the achievement of those objectives. I am hopeful that in the climate of construction moderation, our company and most other companies in this industry have observed, and which has been generally reciprocated by the federal government, modifications in the broadest public interest can be achieved.

You will appreciate that utterances such as yours cited above, disparaging me personally and endeavouring to stir antagonism toward prominent industrialists who seek nothing other than the emancipation—

I repeat the word "emancipation".

—of this country from the vagaries and caprices of international oil cartels and influences, are very unhelpful.

If you would like any elaboration from me on our position on these complicated subjects, I would be happy to provide it; and, in any case, without being self-righteous about it, I would ask you, given the importance of the subject to all Canadians, to try to be a little more statesmanlike than you were in your remarks of November 21. It is not my place to rebut all of the inaccuracies in that speech, as this is the job of your parliamentary adversaries, but I feel entitled to object to demagogic and misleading reflections upon myself.

Yours sincerely,

Conrad M. Black

• (2010)

A carbon copy was sent to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde), PC, MP.

First of all, I would say that I certainly would not make any personally disparaging remarks about Mr. Black. Obviously we do not agree politically. I might say that if he were as generous as the Rockefellers, perhaps my remarks might have been considered more accurate. I should like to give him a chance to reply. I will be writing to him. He cannot appear in the House, but perhaps he could run for my friends the Liberals or for my friends the Conservatives. In his letter he expressed support for both their positions. Alternatively, I invite him to debate with me at Hart house at Toronto University. I would be prepared to debate with him any time on these topics.

Mr. Speaker, I want to answer Mr. Black and answer my friends in the Liberal party in this way. I suppose the question could arise: would Canada be better off if her petroleum industry were owned and controlled by private Canadian companies rather than private foreign-controlled companies? In terms of preventing the transfer of wealth to foreign shareholders and having the wealth reinvested in Canada, the answer is obviously, yes, it would be better off. But in terms of developing energy resources for the public interest—and this is what my constituents are concerned about—there is little difference between the methods and objectives of the Canadian capitalist and the foreign capitalist. Each has as his objective the maximization of profit, and to achieve this, the private oil industry pushes, first, for higher prices, second for more sales through exports, and third, for more tax concessions. In reality, the public's long-term interest of security of energy supply at reasonable prices is compromised by a "Catch-22" position of the energy industry. Higher prices and more tax incentives supposedly mean more new discoveries, which mean more exports, which mean more shortages, which mean higher prices and more tax incentives. Unfortunately, we are dealing with a non-renewable resource, and Canadian consumers and taxpayers, not Mr. Conrad Black, not my friends in the Liberal party and not my friends in the Conservative party, end up being the ones who are the losers.

I conclude by saying that this is a complicated bill which should be examined in committee. There are nine major points to it. The first is that it gives the Crown a 25 per cent interest in the production. This has not yet taken place. I have dealt with that matter and shown the weaknesses compared to Norway and to the United Kingdom. The minister himself brought this out. If they can do it rationally and logically in Norway and in the United Kingdom, countries very much like Canada, why can we not do it in Canada? That is what the public will ask. The second is the new production permits. To produce in the north and offshore, 50 per cent Canadian ownership will be required. I have shown in my speech that this is a ruse, they "lalondized" it, it is an illusion, a loophole, and you can get around it. Third, they will renegotiate agreements with existing exploration permit holders to require them to drill. That is a good idea. Fourth, there will be a new royalty system which I have explained. It is not enough, it is too little, it is even less than in Alberta. Fifth, the Crown will require Petro-Canada to be an operator at some points, and I agree with that. Sixth, the Crown can order Petro-Canada to drill after significant discoveries have been made, and that is a good idea. Seventh, payments will be required for a fund called, "The Environmental Studies Revolving Fund." This is not enough. It has to be considered in much greater detail and there must be stricter provisions. My colleague, the hon. member for Nunatsiaq (Mr. Ittinuar) will talk about that later. Eighth, there will be a 30 days' notice on transfers and the government will have the right to block transfers for leases. That is a good idea. Finally, there will be provisions to make information on exploration and what they get out of the wells available to the public. That is a great idea which is long overdue because all the information available in this country on how much supply we have is information coming from the oil industry.

I look forward to seeing this bill in committee. Before I sit down, Mr. Speaker, I want to say one final word. When I have advocated more government involvement, I did that not because I want a big government bureaucracy but because I see it as the proper way to spread the wealth, a way to bring about some justice and equity, a way which would give a break and which would require some co-operation. I see that there could be some problems with it and those problems will have to be examined, but that way wealth could be spread throughout society—to my constituents, for example. A decade ago the people of my generation thought of things somewhat differently than we do now. We thought of sharing and of community values; we talked a bit about those things. A representative of that generation died this week. He talked about values which were different than the private pursuit of happiness and wealth.

● (2020)

In closing, I should like to quote from one of his songs which reflects what I am saying. It reads:

I read the news today, Oh boy
About a lucky man who made the grade
And tho' the news was rather sad
Well, I just had to laugh.
I saw the photograph
He blew his mind out in a car
He didn't notice that the lights had changed
A crowd of people stood and stared
They had seen his face before
But nobody was really sure if he was from the House of Lords.

It was a song which reflected a generation trying to change society into one which did not pursue money and wealth for the sake of pursuing them, but thought of sharing and a better deal for the ordinary person. That is the manner in which we will approach this bill in committee.

[Translation]

Mr. Raymond Savard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, it is with great pleasure that I rise to speak on such an important topic as the energy future of our country. Bill C-48 before us will enable each and every one of us to benefit from new resources and will ensure security and especially fairness for all Canadians. I am privileged to represent here in this House the riding of Verdun. For the most part, Mr. Speaker, Verdun is a working class riding.

Most of my constituents show no concern over the daily workings of international politics and the way in which oil prices are set. They do not follow very closely the technical and complex negotiations regarding pricing, price per barrel, and so on. They are more anxious to know how much it will cost them to heat their house or apartment and how much more than the last one a fill-up will cost. This is a difficult period in which to develop an energy policy which will maintain reserves and satisfy consumer requirements. But that is precisely the challenge.

In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, the energy program we are now discussing succeeds in meeting this challenge. This program treats everyone concerned, namely the consumers, the producers or oil companies, the provinces and the federal government, equitably and fairly. Let us look at the current situation of the Canadian oil industry. We are now importing 20 per cent of our crude oil requirements and quickly eating away at our supply of less expensive western Canadian crude.

In spite of our efforts to develop our expensive domestic sources of crude oil in Newfoundland, the Beaufort Sea and the tar sands, the Canadian Petroleum Association has estimated that we shall still have to import up to one third of our domestic requirements in 1985 before our domestic production can rise to the level of self-sufficiency. As much as we try, our country will not be able to conserve or substitute enough natural gas or other energy sources to replace this oil in cases of shortages. This is why we had to develop a national energy policy which showed courage and which would create the political determination and the national will to solve these problems. First of all, we must ensure that the Canadian people realize that crude oil and natural gas are our two major natural resources. They are the foundation on which we could build a Canada whose social and economic development would be the envy of every other country of the world for decades to come. We could build a Canada which would no longer depend on uncertain oil supplies from foreign countries, a Canada which would show a surplus in international trade and whose main problem would be to fill all the jobs created in new industries from Newfoundland to British Columbia. But this result is not guaranteed, Mr. Speaker. To meet this objective, we must first of all aim for independence in the field of energy, which would make us self-sufficient and place control of our oil industry in the hands of Canadians, as it should be. This means that we must replace the perhaps insecure foreign supply sources for which we pay a price which harms our economy by secure sources of Canadian oil, which would at the same time consolidate our economy. The Canada oil and gas act administered by the National Resource Management Agency will be the main instrument for meeting these objectives.

This act is designed to promote oil and gas exploration in frontier areas to discover the substantial new reserves needed by Canada. The provisions of this legislation will give greater control to the government through its activities, which will also help promote oil and gas exploration and development.

[English]

To answer my friend on the other side in the NDP, and to allay the fears of all Waddellists and environmentalists, let me make it clear that this exploration will not be carried out at the expense of the fisheries and the environment. Our bill is very clear on this point.

[Translation]

It is a simple matter of choice, Mr. Speaker, for which the government must receive the support of the people and that means some sacrifices because of the price increases. Even if those increases are much more limited than those proposed by the Progressive Conservatives, all Canadians and not only oil companies and producing provinces would benefit from that program.

Mr. Speaker, the people in Verdun are all for a prosperous province of Alberta and believe that all producing provinces should get what they are entitled to. But they still find it difficult to understand certain facts. They know that people in Alberta pay the lowest taxes in Canada, that their oil products cost about 25 per cent less than anywhere else in the country and that Alberta has a heritage fund of several billion dollars to ensure its economic future. The people in Verdun, Mr. Speaker, like other Canadians in eastern Canada, think that Albertans are entitled to that wealth. What we fail to understand is to what extent Mr. Lougheed has forgotten the recent history of Canada, complaining as he does of having been cheated and of not getting his fair share.

[English]

But, no, Mr. Lougheed said that Alberta has always been, and is continuing to be, shortchanged. He said Alberta is entitled to the OPEC price for its oil because it is the fair market price. He said he was trying to protect a rapidly depleting resource, and, finally, that the provinces are the sole owners of their resources and should therefore be the only level of government permitted to tax them. Let us consider his arguments one at a time.

While it is true that Alberta's conventional oil production is peaking and will decline through the 1990s, this ignores the fact that Alberta has enormous natural gas, tar sands and coal reserves. According to federal energy estimates, Alberta had the equivalent of 18.7 billion barrels of oil last year compared with 18.5 billion in 1970. This represents oil, natural gas and tar sands designated for the two functioning tar sands plants. It does not even include another 25 billion barrels from the tar sands which can be reached with existing technology. So, Alberta has enormous resources for its future.

Ottawa needs a greater share of the oil tax revenues to offset the harmful effects of rising energy prices, to diminish big differences between rich and poor provinces, and to help restructure the Canadian economy so that it becomes less dependent on scarce oil and more energy efficient.

Mr. Lougheed's demands for higher oil prices would mean more inflation. But that is only the beginning, as our energy paper points out. Because consumers would have to pay more for oil and gas they would have less money for other goods and services. This reduction in total demand in the economy would mean more lay-offs, plant shutdowns and less economic growth. The rest of the country cannot accept Mr. Lougheed's demands for higher oil and gas prices and a bigger share of those prices going into the Alberta treasury and its heritage fund. Even the new federal proposals leave enormous wealth in Alberta's hands over the 1980s of at least $100 billion, with $30 billion going to the heritage fund to earn income for future generations. Albertans will continue to have the highest incomes and the lowest taxes in Canada for many years to come. The federal energy proposals represent an effort to achieve a fair balance between the federal and Alberta positions.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the budget attempts to use the energy industry as a factor of growth for Alberta and the country as a whole. The action considered by Mr. Lougheed, namely, a 15 per cent decrease in oil production and the temporary freeze on a big tar sands development project, would delay this growth, which would hinder industrial development, particularly in Alberta. The people in Fort McMurray and Cold Lake, rapidly developing communities, are likely to be concerned that this legislation will slow down this growth.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, the one newspaper in this country which most closely allies itself with Mr. Lougheed's policies is probably the Edmonton Journal. Certainly it is a paper which most often stands squarely against what Ottawa does with regard to its energy policy. But listen to what it said in its editorial of November 13 regarding the tar sands project:

> What does Alberta gain by delaying approval of oil sands development permits? In a word, very shaky leverage. If the premier abandons his demand for a global agreement on energy pricing, what bargaining power does Alberta have left?
> The risks involved in delaying the oil sands projects are even greater. The Alsands and Cold Lake projects represent $16 billion worth of development, 280,000 barrels of oil a day, capable of replacing $4 billion a year (1980 prices) of imported oil. How long can Alberta reasonably expect Ottawa to stand by while the national goal of energy self-sufficiency by 1990 disintegrates . . . If Alberta shows no sign of movement at least on synthetic oil pricing, is it reasonable to expect the national government not to act in the national interest? How long should Alberta defend its position? What price should Albertans be asked to pay to support that defence? And how long is Canada prepared to wait while we decide?

The Edmonton Journal published that not even one month ago, Mr. Speaker, and still Mr. Lougheed wants to blackmail the people of Canada by threatening to destroy our chance for energy self-sufficiency.

[Translation]

In an eleven-page advertising supplement published in The New York Times, it is reported that according to the Alberta government, the standard of living of Albertans is 25 per cent higher than that of any other Canadian living in the same conditions. The budget deals therefore with the question of sharing among all the regions of Canada.

In 1979, the federal government received less than 9 per cent of total oil revenues, while the Alberta government collected over 50 per cent. In Texas, for instance, the state gets only some 25 per cent of revenues. In Australia, the state get only 15 per cent of oil revenues, while the federal government receives 48 per cent. The National Energy Program's prime objective is to ensure safe supplies and allow Canada to do away with dependence on the global oil market. It also aims at keeping a competitive edge over our American neighbours. This is why the domestic price should never exceed 85 per cent of the American equivalent. Our Canadian industry will derive no benefit, however, if Alberta retains all or an excessive part of oil revenues.

Our aim, Mr. Speaker, is to achieve 50 per cent of Canadian ownership in the Canadian oil industry by 1990, and this is an essential facet of the National Energy Program. Our goal is to ensure that Canadians receive at least half of the direct benefits generated by the growth of an industry whose cash flow will quadruple over the next ten years. Clearly, that objective meets with our economic expectation and can only have benefits for Canada. More important still, benefits should be maximized. A constant supply of "reliable" oil and gas would be ensured long term by a stronger Canadian presence in the oil industry. And this includes a stronger and larger presence of the public sector in the industry.

So this is what we are doing at the government level to improve this country's energy position. But our National Energy Program also calls upon the individual Canadian to pitch in. We are doing this through two major programs that would conserve energy and reduce the costs to home owners. The first one is the well known CHIP program. As parliamentary secretary to the minister responsible for the administration of that program, I am proud to state that it has been one of the most popular initiatives taken by this government over these last few years.

This program is part of a federal scheme designed to check the growth of energy consumption by improving the insulation of homes. Subsidies are granted for insulation purposes to owners and tenants of homes in three-storied or smaller buildings. In April 1979, the terms of the program were amended, so that 100 per cent of the material costs up to $350 and one third of the labour costs up to $150 are now eligible. Related expenses are also eligible, such as those incurred for weatherstripping, caulking, ventilation of roof space, thermal blinds, bedded protection for lighting fixtures. The eligibility date was set at 1961 for all provinces.

[English]

That could happen to anyone; anyone can lose his breath.

[Translation]

Thanks to these changes, this program is in much greater demand.

[English]

I remember the first time I heard an hon. member on the other side do exactly the same thing as I just did.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, up to November 1980, the federal government has paid to Canadians over $261 million in subsidies under this program. So we urge Canadians to conserve energy by converting their oil heating system to electricity or natural gas. In order to inform the people about conversion, I should like to give the following example: The owner of a building with four individual heating systems may, if he so wishes, convert those four systems into one central system and be automatically eligible to a 50 per cent grant up to $3,200, and so on for each individual system. Of course, this federal offer is subject to the federal-provincial agreement.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I sincerely believe that the energy policy put forward by our government is one of the best ever introduced in this Parliament. The people in my riding as well as all Canadians will be able to take advantage of this program. We may rest assured that the future will show that we were right even though the official opposition is critical of our proposal.

• (2040)

[English]

Mr. Friesen: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Savard: No.

Mr. Tom McMillan (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate in the debate on Bill C-48, "An act to regulate oil and gas interests in Canada lands and to amend the Oil and Gas Production and Conservation Act". I do so primarily as the environment critic for the official opposition. My pleasure is not because this bill is a sound one from an environmental principle point of view. The bill is, in fact, an affront to environmental principles. In a few moments I will be elaborating on that point. Other hon. members on this side will be giving learned analyses of the various shortcomings of the bill in total.

For my part I would like to concentrate on those aspects, and there are several, which relate to the environment. Generally, the bill seeks to impose new rules for oil and gas exploration and development on federal lands in the north and the offshore areas. These rules dictate the terms for the leasing of Crown lands for oil and gas exploration and development, for the participation by the federal government in such initiatives, for licences to private oil and gas companies involved in Crown lands, for royalty payments, and for the compulsory production of oil and gas under specified conditions.

Finally, there is clause 49 which concerns the environment. Basically, clause 49 establishes a revolving fund, the Environmental Studies Revolving Fund. As I see it, it is really two funds which are to be composed of mandatory contributions from companies participating in oil and gas exploration or development on Crown lands. The total amount is not to exceed $15 million. Incidentally, the draftsmanship of this particular clause—and, I think, of the bill in general—is terribly shoddy. For example, it is not clear in clause 49 whether there are two funds or one fund; whether the $15 million is for each of the funds or whether it is a total of $15 million for the two funds together. I presume, however, that what we are talking about is a double-barrelled single fund totalling $15 million.

In any event, the purpose of the fund or funds seems to be to finance studies relating to oil and gas-related enterprises on Crown lands, presumably of an impact assessment sort. If I may quote subclause (6) of clause (49), it reads:

The minister may direct payment from the relevant fund of the reasonable costs of such environmental studies of Canada lands as he determines are necessary in order to decide whether or not to authorize exploration or development under this act or any other act of Parliament.

One of the most jarring notes is that the environmental fund is to be administered, not by the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Roberts), but by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) and by the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Munro). Such a provision perpetuates the truly stupid or, if I may say so, even malevolent approach taken by this government as far as the environment is concerned in other areas.

Funds for environmental purposes must be allocated to those who are designated by Parliament to be responsible for environmental matters. The Department of Energy, Mines and Resources is no such agency, nor is the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Clearly, if an environmental fund is to work, it should be allocated directly to two departments. The first is the Department of the Environment. Under the Government Organization Act, 1979, section 14, Parliament directed in part that the powers of the Department of the Environment should extend to and include "the co-ordination of the policies and programs of the Government of Canada respecting the preservation and enhancement of the quality of the natural environment".

The second department which should receive funding for such environmental purposes is the Department of Fisheries and Oceans. The energy initiatives envisaged by the government's recent "energy budget", including Bill C-48, will accelerate activity in the Arctic. Based on current information, much of that activity will impact directly on marine areas. That is the area which Parliament directed the Department of Fisheries and Oceans to handle. Yet, there is no mention of funding for that department either in the budget itself or in Bill C-48.

In the event the government wishes to brush this aside too quickly, let me cite one example of the perilous situation now faced by that department which might well bring them to their collective senses. The Arctic biological station at Sainte-Anne-de-Bellevue is the only government lab doing major Arctic marine biological research. Staff at the station in the fiscal year 1979-80 was reduced by over 20 per cent from the previous fiscal year and there is a further 20 per cent reduction slated for the fiscal year 1980-82.

The initial allocation of funds to the Arctic Biological Station for 1980-81 was $270,000. However, after discounting the costs for Atlantic programs, building maintenance and services, the station was able to devote a meagre $40,000, only $40,000 in total, to Arctic biological studies. This represents about 17 per cent of what was available for the same Arctic projects in the fiscal year 1977-78, the last "normal" year of funding for the Station.

Last spring, just a few months ago, after questions in the House and various front-page exposés in the press, the government did manage to make an additional amount of money available, but that was only $100,000. Arctic marine research in government has been eroding at an alarming rate since 1974. The Arctic research which has occurred has largely been facilitated by industrial proponents interested in oil and gas development. Such support must be commended, but it underlines federal avoidance of responsibility, both nationally and internationally, to govern development activity in the Arctic.

Channelling environmental funds to the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources and the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, as contemplated by Bill C-48, would serve only to further strangle the federal agencies in the execution of their major responsibilities in these matters.

The territorial governments in the north are responsible for wildlife and that responsibility carries with it the need to maintain all wildlife resources upon which native people are so dependent. So they must also be guaranteed sufficient funds to fulfil their mandate—a mandate that will surely get lost in the energy urgencies and development mentalities of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources and the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. In my view, the role of those two departments in environmental areas needs to be greatly reduced as a matter of general principle. The fact is that whole chunks of environmental policy under federal jurisdiction are within the authority of departments other than the Department of the Environment, to the point at which that Department is a secondary player and, in some cases, not even a player at all.

In no place is that more clear than, for example, the Arctic Waters Pollution Prevention Act, passed in 1972. It was introduced in large part to assert Canada's sovereignty north of the 60th parallel, or at least to exercise Canada's extra-territorial jurisdiction there. The main legislative purpose was to control the use of technology in the north so as to maximize the benefits and prevent a disaster. The principal thrust of that particular act was to prevent the pollution of Canadian Arctic waters from shipping, from land-based installations and from commercial activities such as oil drilling carried out on the continental shelf.

I do not want to go into detail about that act; I only want to draw a parallel between the Arctic Waters Pollution Prevention Act and Bill C-48 to illustrate my general point. In essence, the act prohibits, under prescribed conditions, the deposit of waste in Arctic waters, on Arctic islands and on the mainland. It emphasizes prevention, for example by providing for the appointment of pollution prevention officials and so on. It also contemplates the possibility of pollution from accidents or unforeseen causes; it provides for civil liability for damage resulting from the deposit of waste and addresses the question of clean-up costs and damages.

Even that sketchy description shows clearly the parallel between the Arctic Waters Pollution Prevention Act and clause 49 of Bill C-48 which deals with environmental studies. Both are, first and foremost, environmental in their purpose and thrust. Yet neither acknowledges the existence of the Department of the Environment, much less gives that department any authority.

The Minister of the Environment is the forgotten man in this government. Maybe he does not even exist, Mr. Speaker! I sometimes wonder whether he is a phantom. Certainly he is rarely in the House, even at question period, and he is not here tonight. I wonder why neither he nor his parliamentary secretary is present for this most important debate. Just as the minister should be front and centre when a matter of such importance as the Arctic Waters Pollution Prevention Act is discussed, so also should he be front and centre during any debate on Bill C-48. If we are to have a "phantom of the opera" in this House, then the Minister of the Environment should have a front seat.

In the Arctic Waters Pollution Prevention Act, the governor in council is delegated certain powers under section 26. On May 14, 1971, that order in council authorized the powers to be delegated to three departments. The regulation of shipping was delegated to the Department of Transport; control of waste deposits was delegated to the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and to the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, as well as to the Department of Transport where waste is deposited from ships. It might be understandable, perhaps, that the Department of the Environment was left out of the Arctic Waters Pollution Prevention Act because the legislation effectively predated the establishment of that department in August, 1972. On the other hand, the act could have been amended or the order in council could have been changed.

But why, in December, 1980, eight years after that department was established, does it receive the same adverse treatment in Bill C-48, which we are debating tonight? This raises a fundamental question as to the way in which the government approaches—or does not approach—environmental issues, especially in the north. At least five departments are engaged in pollution control under the Arctic Waters Pollution Prevention Act and many more are involved in arctic pollution prevention if other acts are considered.

The situation that is being perpetuated by Bill C-48 has led to confusion about who is responsible for what. It has led to a proliferation of authority which has seriously weakened accountability. Duplication and overlapping of authority and initiative have hampered sound action. Bill C-48 will compound the problem.

Far worse, Mr. Speaker, Bill C-48 gives authority for environmental assessments to the two departments which have a vested interest in the very projects that might threaten the environment. That is like hiring the town arsonist as fire chief. The Department of the Environment was established because the government recognized such a danger in assigning environmental assessments to "proponent" departments such as Energy, Mines and Resources and Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

I should like now to quote something from the 1970 Speech from the Throne, as follows:

> There is an inherent conflict of interest . . . between those who are seeking the exploitation of non-renewable resources and those who are charged with the responsibility of protecting the environment.

How does that ringing statement of principle jibe with clause 49 and with Bill C-48 in general? There is a definite conflict, a contradiction—even a flip-flop.

Considering the kind of conflict of interest between development and protection that is enshrined in Bill C-48 and in almost every other piece of environmentally-related legislation presented by this government: it is no wonder that the government's performance to date in protecting the northern environment has been savagely criticized by environmentalists, conservationists, scientists, the public and even government officials. The most obvious example of this criticism relates to resource exploration and development by Dome Petroleum Ltd. and its subsidiary, Canadian Marine Drilling Ltd., know as Canmar, in the Beaufort Sea area.

The government received applications from Dome Petroleum Ltd. in late June, 1979. Those applications were for harbour facilities at McKinley Bay—I think that was an overwintering harbour—at Tuk Harbour, a deep harbour entrance, and at Wise Bay, a fuelling staging area.

Without getting into the complexities of environmental assessment procedures may I summarize the procedure that is usually followed—at least in theory—in these matters? First of all, an initial environmental screening is done to determine whether the project has significant environmental consequences. Then a formal environmental review and assessment are conducted if the initial screening identifies a significant environmental impact. This assessment is co-ordinated by the Federal Environmental Assessment Review Office of the Department of the Environment.

● (2100)

The office is commonly referred to as FEARO. The catch is that the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development is the federal government's principal operating arm in the Yukon and the Northwest Territories. There is clear evidence that DIAND was successful in getting the federal government to approve the applications without assessments of the environmental consequences—against the advice of its own front-line advisory bodies, against common sense and public pressure, and against any environmental principles one might care to mention.

The two government environmental advisory bodies whose advice was flouted were the Arctic Waters Advisory Committee (commonly known as AWAC) and the Regional Ocean Dumping Advisory Committee, RODAC. The latter, that is the Regional Ocean Dumping Advisory Committee, recommended, for example, that the issuance be deferred of any ocean dumping or associated land use permit for dredging or harbour development at McKinley Bay "until the initial environmental evaluation report has been filed by the company and assessed by the government". Yet that permit—the permit in that particular case—was issued along with others in late August, within only weeks of application.

The Canadian Arctic Resources Committee, in a first-class study by Dr. R. William Rees, published in Northern Perspectives, sums up the situation succinctly. With your indulgence, Mr. Speaker, I will quote from Dr. Rees' report. He said:

> The over-all conclusion pertaining to The Environmental Assessment and Review Process is inescapable. Given the "ludicrous" time-frame, skimpy data base, and direct interference from Ottawa, the best efforts of AWAC/RODAC could not satisfy the minimal requirements of a rigorous and effective screening process.

That is damning evidence indeed. The findings of Dr. Rees, which I have just quoted, are well supported in a confidential report, which I have, of the government's own Arctic Waters Advisory Committee dated February, 1980. I do not have the time to quote this at length, but let me refer to just a few passages which tell the tale. That confidential report of the government's own advisory committee stated "in the past—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but I must advise him that his allotted time has expired. I am sorry. I was mistaken. I am advised by the Clerk at the table there is still some time left and I apologize to the hon. member.

Mr. McMillan: I will continue with my quote, Mr. Speaker.

> Government decision-making processes resulting in approvals for land-based support facilities and dredging for the approach to Tuk and inside McKinley Bay did not meet the minimum standards for adequate environmental review and assessment.

The same report continues:

> It appears that senior officials in Ottawa . . . decided to "avoid any time-consuming and administrative hindrances" in securing the necessary approvals for the proponent (Canmar).

Another quote from the same report reads:

> Recommendations that were specific and required standards of performance from Canmar or more thorough review which might have caused delays were not implemented or significantly altered by Ottawa to make them ineffective.

Finally, we read the following:

> The compromise of the environmental review processes has potentially jeopardized not only the environment but the governmental review and decision-making processes as well.

The AWAC report from which I have just quoted documents the assertion, on page after page, that Canmar—and I use this as but one example—is violating and is being allowed by the government to violate operating conditions set by the government itself. Those violations are outlined in great detail in the February, 1980, draft report of the government's own Arctic Waters Advisory Committee.

In my opinion, the government must be able to manage the total social and physical environment in the Arctic in the face of an influx of southern technology. That geographical area covers something like 40 per cent of the territory of our country. Although vast, it is the most environmentally vulnerable region in all of Canada. Because of the frigid climate, a major oil spill or a well-site blowout here would have disastrous consequences for the delicate ecosystems, as well as the traditional lifestyle of the native people. We cannot wait until the damage has been done in the Arctic or in any other such area because, according to experts, it may well be irreversible. The environmental screening procedures will have to be tied more closely to the development approach concept. There must be a streamlining of the entire process so that industry, and government both—not just industry, but government, too—know how to operate by the rules.

At present, there exist some 23 pieces of legislation to regulate activities like Canmar's. The government needs to examine a process by which a one-window approach to legislation and regulation can be achieved. Bill C-48 compounds the problem. It does not mitigate it.

I wish to draw your attention, Mr. Speaker, to subclause 11 of clause 49. That subclause says:

> The governor in council may make regulations for the administration of the relevant fund.

This much we do know. The section to which I have referred is shrouded in ambiguity. We do not know what the regulations are to be. It is openended. It makes reference to regulations, but it does not define them. It just authorizes that they be made. I ask myself, and I invite the House to consider, the following: given the ambiguity and the openended nature of that subclause, what principles will guide the use of the fund? What is to ensure the maximum access to it by the public and others? Certainly there are examples of funds being established to which, in practice, access is difficult if not impossible. The Maritime Pollution Claims Fund is a case in point.

The government continuously hides behind regulations. It leaves much of the true force and thrust of its legislation—in this case as in so many others—to regulations and to federal bureaucracy. That is not acceptable, in my view. Among other things, such a situation frustrates the purpose of Parliament and the goals with respect to which Parliament is being asked to legislate. In my opinion, there must be a more specific mandate under legislation to government, whether it has to do with environmental funds or any other subject.

Clearly amendments are required; there must be direction to administrators in the public service as to how the funds are to be allocated, along with an accountability system to ensure that such funds are not being institutionally frozen or flushed through senseless programs. Above all, the legislation must recognize the role already assigned by Parliament to various government departments, the Department of the Environment and the Department of Fisheries and Oceans in particular.

• (2110)

More than anything else there has to be the will to honour environmental principles. There has to be some consistency in legislation. There has to be a dedication and devotion to the environment for its own sake. Environment principles should be viewed as ends in themselves, not as a subterfuge for government inaction. This government's good faith in environmental matters, as in so many other areas, is seriously in doubt in my estimation.

To use an example, in 1979 the Environmental Assessment and Review Process panel appointed by the Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment to assess the Alaska highway gas pipeline concluded that because of severe deficiencies in the information put forward by the pipeline company, "it is not possible to complete an environmental impact review at the present time". Despite that conclusion, neither Foothills nor the government's own Northern Pipeline Agency has made any progress toward meeting the deficiencies which have stalled the environmental assessment. Indeed, as if to induce environmental disaster, the government has already approved surveying and other work on the right-of-way through the Yukon, despite the fact that the EARP analysis identified major environmental reservations on that route and requested work on alternative routings. The Northern Pipeline Act passed by Parliament on April 4, 1978 required by law that the pipeline be built according to broad objectives which included "minimizing any adverse effect on the social and environmental conditions of the areas most affected by the pipeline". Clearly, the purposes of that act are not being met. Quite apart from the issue of accountability of Parliament, the situation is bound to create impasses to the eventual construction of a pipeline in the Yukon. Unless the present government has its head completely in the sand, which is quite possible, they will be aware of the mounting legal and other difficulties their actions are generating.

Even within the government, responsible officials are as perplexed as I am and as are my colleagues on this side of the House. Senior officials in Environment Canada's western and northern region have said, according to a confidential memo to which I have been made privy:

> Based on our experience with the Northern Pipeline Agency, on the basis of what we have seen, we would not recommend a single agency approach because, in the case of the Northern Pipeline Agency, it is prepared to expedite construction of the pipeline, rather than to protect the environment. We feel that a more direct involvement by DOE would be better.

This kind of deliberate fiddling, and I use that word judiciously, with important environmental matters in the government's decision-making is all the more astonishing when we compare it to the recent Q & M pipeline decision. In yesterday's Globe and Mail, the National Energy Board chairman, Mr. Edge, referred to the environmental problems which led the board to reject the bid by a consortium of companies to build a gas pipeline into the maritimes. At page 11-8 of their April 1980 "Reasons for Decision" the board said and I quote:

> —the board wishes to stress that Q & M has not satisfied the board that the pipeline could be constructed in an environmentally acceptable manner.

Consistency in decision-making—particularly environmental decision-making—is obviously not something of importance to the government.

I, as a maritimer, wonder sometimes why it is that when a project like the Q & M pipeline, which is so important to my region, is at stake, the federal government suddenly decides it is going to be concerned about environmental matters and to hold up the project on the basis of environmental principles, while other projects which have equal cause to be looked at from an environmental point of view are allowed to go ahead without any environmental assessment required despite the government's own regulations.

We require more than legislative consistency or the removal of conflicts of interest posed when departments engaged in protecting the environment are the very ones involved in promoting major projects which are going to damage the environment. More fundamental than most of the themes I have talked about, there must be a will by the federal government and by the cabinet, in particular, to honour environmental principles. There must be a consistent adherence to environmental principles because they are worthy in their own right. That is what we require from this government.

The government's good faith in environmental questions is seriously in doubt. In my view this government does not care about the environment, and that fact is reflected in Bill C-48. Is it not ironic that the Minister of the Environment should have been given special responsibilities for constitutional matters? He has been asked by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to aid in a major way in piloting through this House the resolution on the constitution. Yet the government's own charter of rights for which the Minister of the Environment has special responsibility makes no mention whatsoever of environmental rights. Is it any wonder, sir, that Bill C-48, by the same token, is such a serious affront to sound environmental principles? It is a shoddily drafted bill; it is a bad bill. Worst of all, as far as the protection of the environment is concerned, it is a dangerous bill.

Mr. Yves Demers (Duvernay): Mr. Speaker. I am pleased to speak on this extremely important matter, Bill C-48, which spells out Canada's energy policies for years to come. Among other things the bill will enable us to reach three aims: security of supplies and subsequently self-sufficiency for Canada, access for all Canadians wherever they live in Canada to wider participation in energy industries, especially gas and oil, and finally fairness of prices and sharing of revenues among governments and industries.

The program is based on Canada's extensive energy potential. The country is already producing more energy that it can consume and it can use its surpluses of electricity, natural gas and other fuels such as solar, wind and tidal energy to make up for its oil shortage. Total demand for oil will therefore be sufficiently restrained to equal domestic supplies at the end of this decade. The prices of natural gas will increase more slowly as a result of negotiations between the federal government and the producing provinces thus remaining lower than the normal prices of heating oil. The natural gas distribution system will also be extended here and there to serve the main cities throughout Canada and the prices of natural gas in eastern Canada will be standardized to promote its use as a replacement for heating oil in residences as well as in industries. The replacement of oil by natural gas, electricity and other energy sources will be supported through federal consumer grants in order to reduce the use of oil to 10 per cent of the total energy demand in residential and commercial sectors before 1990. We propose to subsidize people who convert their heating systems from oil to gas or electricity. We will subsidize those conversions up to a maximum of $800, thus paying 50 per cent of the costs. Still, before going ahead with this program we must negotiate its details with the various provincial governments, but the province of Quebec is being reluctant in some respects. There are no problems, they agree, with regard to conversion to gas but where conversion to electricity is concerned, that is, conversion from oil to electricity, the leaders of the Quebec government are being difficult because they know full well that if a larger number of Quebeckers convert to electricity, the province will then have less electricity to export to the United States. At the present time, the province of Quebec, through Hydro-Quebec, is selling its electricity at roughly the domestic price for other Canadian energies. In other words, in Quebec it now costs about the same, give or take a few dollars, to heat one's house with electricity, oil or gas.

In December, the cost of fuel oil may be a bit higher than that of electricity, but when the price of the latter goes up by about 12 per cent in January, it may cost slighly less to use fuel oil than electricity. Be that as it may, prices are now about the same, and thus electricity is sold in Quebec at the domestic price. But if Quebeckers consume less electricity, then Hydro-Quebec can sell it in larger quantities to the United States at world prices. I recently had a conversation with the Quebec minister who told me he thought that market would bring the province of Quebec about $1 billion in the next few years.

Personally, I feel that opposing the conversion of oil heating to electricity is being dishonest toward the policies of the Canadian government, as well as those of the government of Alberta, because in so doing, Quebeckers will be allowed to use Alberta oil at a cost price by about 50 per cent lower than the world price thereby enabling the province to export electricity to the United States at world prices. That is therefore extremely dishonest and jeopardizes the Canadian energy policy as a whole.

There is also another factor. If we disallowed subsidies for converting from oil to electricity, some areas in Quebec would be greatly prejudiced, areas like Abitibi, Mont-Laurier, northern Quebec, because the people in the larger urban centres like Montreal, Quebec City or Trois-Rivières will have the option of converting to natural gas because the pipeline will be extended to serve those cities, whereas the distribution system will not reach, at least not for several years, the smaller communities. Therefore, if the government refuses to subsidize alternate conversions, the people in those small communities will be forced, if they want to convert, to pay the full price out of their own pocket.

The Canadian Constitution as it now stands gives the Government of Canada the authority to tax energy resources and to set prices. The government intends to maintain that policy in the new constitution. However, Quebec Premier René Lévesque, who wants separation, says: no, the federal government has no right to tax and to set prices for energy because some day it will want to tax the electricity that Quebec sells the United States.

And yet the domestic price of oil is now $19 a barrel and the international price is $38 a barrel. In fact, because of this policy of the Canadian government, in the last five years, from 1974 to 1979, Quebeckers have had to pay $9 billion less for their oil than if they had paid international prices. Moreover, if Quebeckers now paid international prices for their oil, gasoline would cost nearly $3 and heating oil about $2.

This is what Mr. Lévesque is proposing to Quebeckers. He suggests that they should pay $3 for their gasoline and $2 for their heating oil. I believe that any Quebecker who considers the interests, mostly of his province, but also of his country, will understand that the Canadian policy is very good and benefits all residents of Quebec.

We may also wonder why the provincial government would want us to pay international prices for oil. Perhaps the separatist ideology is behind this suggestion. For instance, if Quebeckers were now paying international oil prices, the arguments of those who promote separation would be much more convincing because they would be able to tell Quebeckers: If we go tomorrow morning, the price of gas will stay the same because we are now paying international prices and we shall continue to do so. However, the Liberal policy provides the opposite argument and constitutes an obstacle for Mr. Lévesque and his party, and Mr. Lévesque, who already sees the province as a separate state, is willing to sacrifice the $9 billion that we have already saved Quebeckers over the last five years. Moreover, before the last Parizeau budget, there was a fixed tax on gasoline per litre or gallon in Quebec.

In his last budget, Mr. Parizeau applied what I would call an indexed tax in so far as a percentage is charged, and every time the price of oil goes up, the taxes of Quebec consumers increase in proportion, as do the revenues of Quebec, of course. I therefore readily understand why Mr. Parizeau is not interested in lower prices. He indexes tax revenues to oil prices, but he is not interested in indexing personal income tax, which would benefit all Quebec taxpayers.

I sometimes try to understand the philosophy of the Parti Québécois, and I tell myself that if Quebec separated, it would be an independent country which would not have to ask anyone for permission to do what it wants and which could pass its own laws. Moreover, there would be departmental governments or state or provincial governments because the province would be divided in regions like Abitibi, Lac-Saint-Jean, the Gaspé Peninsula, the Bois-Francs and so on, which would be called departments, as in France, or states, as in the United States, and every one of these regions would have an elected government, in addition to the central government in Quebec City. There would be a constitution recognizing the powers of the central government of Quebec and the powers of the regional governments, and if we follow the philosophy of the Parti Québécois, every one of these regions would have the right to tax its own natural resources. Let us imagine that the Lac-Saint-Jean area finds huge amounts of oil; sure enough the state government or the government of the department of Lac-Saint-Jean would tax its resources and sell them to the rest of Quebec and to other countries as well. Of course they would sell to other countries at world prices, and people from Lac-Saint-Jean would be anxious as well to secure the international price, even for sales made to Quebec. And I am sure that the central government of the province of Quebec would then impose prices for domestic sales, just as we are doing now for Canada. And yet, Mr. Lévesque does not understand our philosophy, when it is applied to Canada as a whole.

The members of the federal government want one energy price, they want a standard price in all regions of the country for all Canadians. It is very easy, to understand, Mr. Speaker, that if oil were sold at $3 a gallon in Quebec, in the maritimes and in Ontario and $1 in Alberta, this would result in a dramatic economic slowdown. We all appreciate, and it is easy to understand, that all new industries would prefer to go to Alberta and we would witness a massive exodus of people from the eastern provinces to Alberta. There would be tremendous unemployment in eastern Canada and a boom and galloping inflation in Alberta. This is why our basic policy has been to maintain stable and fair prices for all Canadians.

Not so many years ago, Mr. Speaker, we had the Borden line legislation. At that time certain Canadian provinces, including the major parts of Ontario, had to buy Alberta oil at a price higher than the international price to promote Albertan oil sales. Today, it is the opposite. Alberta is subsidizing other provinces that use its oil, by selling it at a cheaper price. But who knows if five years from now, with the discoveries in the Soviet Union where huge amounts of oil have been found, apparently more than anything that may exist in the Middle East, the international price may be lower than the price we would pay for instance for tar sands oil. It is my conviction that if this happened the Canadian government would then force other Canadians to pay the higher domestic price for Alberta or other Canadian oil. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, we will continue with a uniform policy for the well-being of all Canadians. I thank you for the opportunity to speak on the matter.

Mr. Dave Nickerson (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, they always save the best to the last.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nickerson: It is rather unfortunate that there is nobody left to hear what I am going to say, at least in the galleries. I do hope that somebody is watching on television.

Mr. Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): What you do mean, there is nobody here?

Mr. Nickerson: I am very pleased that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) saw fit to come back to the House. I have a few choice comments for him in the few remarks which I intend to make. I must say that I have been looking forward to the presentation of this bill for about ten years now. It was originally promised a little over ten years ago by the late hon. Sidney Green—

Mr. Blais: You mean Joe Greene.

Mr. Nickerson: We certainly have good reasons to forget.

Mr. Lalonde: You forgot Sidney Green.

Mr. Nickerson: Members on this side of the House have asked continuously for the last ten years when the government was going to present rules and regulations governing the disposition of oil and gas in the areas referred to in this bill. The answer that we have always received has been, soon. I remember asking the same question earlier this year of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. His reply at that time was "very soon". If nothing else, we now have an interpretation of these Liberal terms. When they say soon, they mean ten years, and when they say very soon, they mean ten months.

Mr. Lalonde: Four months.

Mr. Nickerson: Was it worth waiting ten years? Quite frankly, I do not think so. I was looking forward to this. I was looking forward to something which would get the offshore oil and gas industry back on its feet again. But somehow I do not think we have it here. To understand this we must examine the present circumstances, the circumstances at this time when the bill is being introduced. It comes after ten years of neglect and wavering, after ten years of putting Canada's industrial and energy needs in second place to narrow, partisan consideration. The result is the situation we have today. The situation we have today is one of dependence on insecure, high-priced, foreign sources of energy. There is no denying that. That is the position into which the Liberal government has put this country. It comes at a time of serious conflict between the provinces and the federal government which is intent or imposing at all costs its concept of a centralized and socialized Canada. As we go through this bill we see two concepts throughout, the concept of strong control from Ottawa and the concept of the government ownership of Canada's oil and gas industry, something which it has been trying to promote with the concurrence and at the instigation of our friends to the left for some time.

There are two ways in which we can look at the present energy situation in Canada. First of all, there is the view from this side—my view and the view shared by my colleagues. We recognize that we have problems which have developed over many years of Liberal rule, but we look upon them as a challenge. We know that Canada has the potential resources, or the resources we need; more resources perhaps than anywhere else in the world. Certainly this country is greatly endowed with such resources as oil, gas, uranium and hydro potential. All we have to do is to implement sensible and equitable policies and legislation. Ordinary Canadians, not governments, people in the private sector, will take the initiative as they always have in the past, and they will put us back on the road to self-sufficiency.

However, the view on the other side, a view shared by the Liberals and the New Democrats, is quite the opposite. What they are trying to do is to exploit the difficulties which they themselves have caused and for which they themselves are responsible so as to pursue their own policies for greater centralized control, as I mentioned before, at the expense of the provinces and territories, for greater governmental presence in commercial undertakings in this country, and a greater use of Crown corporations such as Petro-Canada. They want more regulations and more restrictions placed on the daily lives of Canadians, all at the expense of individual liberty. That is the way I see it. Centralization and socialization go to the very heart of the proposals before us in the Canada Oil and Gas Act.

● (2140)

After that introduction, I want to say a few words on the Canada lands concept which has crept into Liberal terminology in the last little while. It is a new term. We have not been accustomed to using it in the past. We should find out from where it came and what it really means. In order to find out, we must turn to page 43 of the so-called "National Energy Program" which was presented on the evening of October 28. It came in with the ill-fated budget. The two documents quite properly belong together. In my opinion they are both of the same worth and value.

Page 43 contains a map which indicates what is meant by Canada lands, this term which has crawled out of the woodwork of the inner sanctum of the Liberal cabinet. According to this map, it means a huge area of Canada's land and water mass. This afternoon we were told how many more times in area the Canada lands were than the remaining ten provinces. These so-called Canada lands comprise all the traditional offshore areas of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island, Newfoundland and British Columbia.

The hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) was to speak tonight. However, he is indisposed. If he were speaking on this subject, he would put what I am about to say in much stronger terms. Having failed to negotiate any reasonable agreement with the provinces concerned, provinces which have a legitimate case to present, the Liberal government is using its sledgehammer approach and its unilateral technique to impose its will, for the main part, upon those provinces which are least capable of protecting their own interests.

Also Canada lands is defined by this map as including the Yukon and the Northwest Territories. This land was previously known as territorial lands, lands which we can only think of in this manner. It is land which the federal government presently holds in trust for four provinces to be established at some point in time in Canada's north. I stress the trust concept of these lands. There is no argument that at the present time they are owned by Her Majesty in right of Canada, but in time to come, as provinces are developed in the north, as the Yukon becomes a province and as one or more provinces are developed in the Northwest Territories, the resources of those areas must be transferred to those new provinces. They must not be treated any differently than any existing province in Canada.

At the present time it is absolutely necessary for the territories to be given access to resource revenues. The territories are faced with onerous, very high expenditures. The territorial governments are required by law—by federal law in many instances—to provide government services on a par with those of the provinces. It is very expensive to provide educational and social services and hospitals; to maintain the roads and to develop public works.

If they do not have access to some form of revenue in order to provide these services, they will have to approach Ottawa. We must realize that there is no other tax base. The population is such that the government cannot collect the required amount of money from personal income taxes or sales taxes. If they are not able to generate public revenues, territorial governments will always be forced to come cap-in-hand to Ottawa. The rich resources of the territories, which the people there are so anxious to share with their southern counterparts, will be taken out or extracted from the area with no real return. The revenues will be piled up in Ottawa, and the people of those areas will be forced to crawl on their hands and knees in an attempt to get back a few of those sadly-needed dollars to use for the purposes I have outlined.

I refer to page 43 of "The National Energy Program" and the offer which was made by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources to the various provinces adjacent to offshore resources. The Government of Canada offered to provide 100 per cent of provincial-type resource revenues to the adjacent provinces, subject to arrangements whereby when the province reached an agreed level of wealth, the revenues would be shared with other Canadians.

The offer included giving to those provinces a substantial voice in matters of direct concern to them, including the need to minimize social, environmental and economic disruption in the region. This offer was apparently turned down by the provinces. At least, this is what is contained in the official publication of the minister. I do not propose to speak on behalf of those provinces. Perhaps they had very good reasons for doing so, but I would strongly recommend to the minister that the same type of offer should be extended to the Northwest Territories and to the Yukon. I am sure this formula would be completely acceptable as an interim arrangement for the north. If it were put into effect, discretionary revenue would accrue to the territories, and they would not be in the position they are now.

The north would not be stripped of its resources with no revenues coming back to it. They would not be forced to come to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Munro) to ask for federal government handouts. But at the same time the government would avoid the situation of people there becoming too wealthy; any excess over a certain amount would be shared with the people of southern Canada. That seems like an equitable solution for the time being.

I hope the minister will take note of what I am saying and try to negotiate such an arrangement with the two territories.

Mr. Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): He is not listening.

Mr. Nickerson: He does not appear to be particularly interested. He just does not seem to be listening. He is very expert at shutting his ears when such matters are being presented.

Mr. Simmons: He can read it in Hansard; there is no problem.

Mr. Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): He does not listen to the provinces; he does not listen to the territories.

An hon. Member: That is true.

● (2150)

Mr. Nickerson: So that is what we have, Mr. Speaker, this Canada lands concept. It is an attempt by the government, which by and large represents the interests of central Canada, to hang on to its regional privilege. That is what it amounts to.

The natural development of Canada will take place anyway. You cannot hold back the dawn, it will happen one way or another. We see the economic centre of gravity of this country moving westward. Nothing is wrong with that type of thing. It does not mean to say that the people in Ontario and Quebec will really miss out. The hon. member for Etobicoke Centre (Mr. Wilson), who spoke earlier, said that the central provinces of Canada could take advantage of this shift. It could be to everyone's advantage in this country. But the Canada lands concept is designed to preserve forever the pre-eminence of the central areas. What it seeks to do is create in the offshore areas of New Brunswick, Newfoundland and the other provinces I mentioned, and in the territories, a hinterland which can then be drained of its resources so that the people in southern Ontario and Quebec do not have to face economic reality.

In saying this, Mr. Speaker, I am being a little unfair to all those good Canadians who live in Trois-Rivières, Quebec City, Toronto, Hamilton and Burlington. I do not really believe that is the way those people think. It is the way the Liberal government thinks they think. That is why they are pursuing this type of inane policy.

I have dealt with clause one of the bill, the short title, and I will have to go through the remaining 85 sections of the bill a little more expeditiously.

Mr. Lalonde: With more sense would be fine, but take your time.

Mr. Nickerson: We intend to do that. We intend to give you a good going over in the next few minutes.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to examine the objectives which the government says it wants to achieve through this legislation. These are generally agreed objectives between the three parties represented here. First, what we want to do is attain energy self-sufficiency in Canada. In the policies pursued by this side of the House when we were in office, not that many months ago, this was quite evident. Second, we want Canadian participation in the energy industries. We want Canadians to be the investors and to receive the dividends. We want Canadians to be active in the financing of oil and gas exploration, production and marketing. We want to utilize the manufacturing industries of Ontario and Quebec so that their expertise can be brought to bear on energy questions. We want to increase and maximize Canadian ownership within the oil and gas industry. There is already significant Canadian ownership of the exploration end.

The real problems are in the refinery part of the industry. There are some differences of opinion. We on this side of the House would like to see that accomplished privately by Canadian individuals, whereas on the other side of the House they are more inclined to think in terms of public ownership. What we want to achieve by the type of legislation with which we have been presented today is to bring on stream as quickly as possible the frontier and offshore resources of Canada so that we can achieve the goal of energy self-sufficiency.

Given those objectives what type of policy would any sane person—and there are a few on this side of the House at any rate—put into effect? What type of policy would encourage Canadians and Canadian corporations to undertake the risks involved in the job which is before us? First of all, you must give investors secure tenure of their land holdings. If they receive a lease or some form of permit or title to some oil or gas lands from a government they must know that it is secure. That is the first thing they want. So we examine the oil and gas legislation to see where that security is contained therein. We see that the best deal they can get is a five-year exploration agreement. When it comes to production, the best deal they can get is a ten-year lease. And when you read through the rules and regulations you see that there is no end to the discretion which is allowed the minister. He can run them off practically any time he wants to. So they do not have security of tenure in this bill.

Second, you must give the investor a set of known rules and regulations, guidelines by which he can operate. In this way he can pick up the rules and read them in advance to see what he will have to abide by. Again, we examine this bill to see whether that concept is contained in it. We find that, to the contrary, everything is arbitrary. It is left up in the air. The government, the minister, the bureaucracy can at any point in time change the ground rules, so no one really knows what is going on. You cannot invest with confidence. When you want to get into the business you must negotiate what they call an exploration agreement. There are no fixed rules. You do not know what they will be. For each project a separate agreement will be negotiated.

As I have said before, when you examine the act there is nothing in it but ministerial discretion and bureaucratic discretion. Authority is delegated to the minister's staff. They can practically tell you how to run your own life. They can give you an order to drill. They can tell you where to drill and, if you don't, they can throw you off the land. Or, they can say you cannot drill here and if you do drill here we will throw you off. They can tell you how to transport the petroleum product that you are likely to find. They can dictate to what market you can sell your product. They can tell you how to produce, how much to produce, how little to produce or whether to produce at all. It is all left up to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources or the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. You can take your pick; one is as bad as the other as far as I am concerned.

Third, if you are to encourage people to make those investments you need sensible taxation and a sensible royalty scheme. We do not have these either. The rule should be that if you are successful you can make a profit. But when you look at what is in this legislation you see a basic 10 per cent royalty, 25 per cent Petro-Canada backing, 40 per cent net profit. When the product gets to the refinery, you are stuck with another 8 per cent. Then you have corporate income taxes. There is no end to it. I wonder how much the industry can stand.

Mr. Speaker, in every conceivable way this bill falls short of what is needed to encourage people to explore in those areas. I would like to call it ten o'clock.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—CLOSURE OF POLISH BORDER—POSSIBLE THREAT TO WORLD PEACE

Mr. Jesse P. Flis (Parkdale-High Park): Mr. Speaker, I rise to share with you, on this occasion, a matter of deep and troubling concern to all people committed to the preservation of human rights and world peace.

On Wednesday, December 3, 1980, I asked the hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacGuigan) what steps the government planned to take to convince the Soviet Union and its satellite countries to keep their armies out of Poland and to respect the principles of the Helsinki Final Act, in view of the fact that the Soviet Union had ordered the East German-Polish border sealed off, and in view of the fact that the Deutsches Democratic Republic and the Soviet Union have moved military forces along the Polish border, thus threatening world peace and jeopardizing East-West détente.

Further, on Tuesday, December 9, 1980, I asked the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) whether he is prepared to ask the United Nations Security Council, through proper channels, to proceed under the terms of chapter VI, article 34 of its charter, under which it may investigate any dispute or any situation which might lead to international friction or give rise to a dispute in order to determine whether the continuance of the dispute or situation is likely to endanger the maintenance of international peace and security. The Prime Minister indicated that he is in favour of this suggestion and would bring it to the attention of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I trust that the minister, who is in Europe right now discussing this problem with other western allies, will inform this House of any developments regarding these matters when appropriate.

At this point, Mr. Speaker, on behalf of many Canadians across Canada, I thank and congratulate the Prime Minister for the sensitivity he has thus far clearly demonstrated by urging all parties to remain calm and place party politics aside. This is not a time for any to rattle their sabres. What is happening in Poland now is an internal matter, and outside interference of any form must be avoided. The people of Poland have certainly come a long way, since the last ten years when I lived there, during which a lot of bloodshed took place through the food riots of 1970. Today, on the other hand, the workers have achieved miracles in regard to independent trade unions and freedom of the press, without an ounce of blood being shed. For this the people of Poland are to be respected.

I urge us all not to raise any further exaggerated expectations or demands upon the Polish government or, by implication, its Soviet backers. Let us not forget that the Kremlin may stamp its boots on Poland's soil with a clear and sounding reply of tanks and rockets. It is obviously simple to realize that the Soviet Union is determined to limit reforms in eastern Europe and will even accept all of the economic and moral consequences of an invasion of Poland if it feels that the basics of communism are threatened.

This is why Canada must work in unison with other nations to take a unified stand against the U.S.S.R. should it move its military might across Poland's borders. Again, I congratulate the Prime Minister for comprehending the complexities of this situation and for urging the western world to act together in maintaining peace and stability. I trust the Prime Minister will also continue to communicate directly with Mr. Brezhnev of the Soviet Union, in an effort to keep the situation in Poland an internal matter.

The two most important things that Poland needs today are prayers for peace, and food. In fact, it is my understanding that people around the world, from all religious denominations and backgrounds, along with Pope John Paul II, will be dedicating Sunday, December 21, 1980, as a "prayers for peace in Poland" day.

• (2205)

Further, as many members of this House are probably aware, Poland's economic situation is stark and desperate. The people are facing food shortages similar to those experienced in many developing countries. The financial crisis Poland faces in 1981 may have more serious consequences for East-West relations than the political situation.

Poland is in desperate need of food. Perhaps one aspect that could be explored by the Minister of State for Trade (Mr. Lumley) is trade by barter. That is, since Poland is rich in coal and other natural resources and since she requires food and hard currency, perhaps a system of mutal exchange could be established, similar to some of the exchange trade systems used by the Swiss government.

All in all, Mr. Speaker, I trust that as a nation we will do our best to act together with all concerned to maintain peace and stability in Poland. Perhaps the Parliamentary Secretary to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Duclos) could give Canadians an update of the government's plans to help solve this critical situation in Poland.

[Translation]

Mr. Louis Duclos (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member will be happy to learn that according to the information we have the situation has not deteriorated along the Polish border over the past few days. There is no evidence that the Deutsches Democratic Republic has mobilized its forces; on the other hand, even if the Soviet power is in full strength, we have no reason to believe that it has deployed its troops along the border or decided to invade Poland.

On the other hand, in the communique issued following their recent summit in Moscow, the member states of the Warsaw Pact have indicated their determination not to use intimidation or force in their relations with other states, but to seek negotiated settlements to conflicts. Those are key provisions of the Helsinki Final Act and Canada repeatedly emphasized that they should govern foreign relations of all signatories to the Final Act. Those provisions are particularly pertinent to present relations with Poland. Canadian representatives have made known that point at the Madrid conference and in capitals of eastern Europe and in our political dialogue with European countries, we always stand up for the respect of the non-interference principle in domestic affairs of other countries.

[English]

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—POLAND—INQUIRY REGARDING CONTEXT OF PRIME MINISTER'S NOTE TO CHAIRMAN BREZHNEV

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock-North Delta): Mr. Speaker, someone said "He who sups with the devil needs a long spoon." Many Canadians across the country today wonder whether the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has a spoon long enough, if he is going to sup with the devil.

There is growing concern in the country about the situation in Poland, about the manoeuvres taking place on both sides of its borders, and even more concern about the silence of our government in face of that threat to world peace.

Canadians wonder why the Prime Minister is so quiet about the situation in Poland. I am reminded of the situation a year ago when he was leader of the opposition and a member of the Privy Council. At that time we were concerned about the trouble in Iran. As a Privy Councillor, he had been briefed about that situation but he taunted the prime minister of that day with questions and was on the verge of endangering the lives of those Americans who were in our embassy in Tehran.

With that background in mind we wonder what he is trying to pull off concerning Poland. Yesterday in the House I asked him whether it was because of the friendship protocol, that he, as Prime Minister, signed with the Soviet Union nine years ago, that he had finally written a secret letter to President Brezhnev. He replied that it was not because of that. I then asked him whether as a gesture of solidarity between the Canadian people and the Polish people, he would break off that protocol with the Soviet Union, and he declined.

That is not all that concerns me, Mr. Speaker. About a month ago at a news conference he said that as a result of that friendship protocol he regularly briefed the Soviet ambassador in Ottawa if he met with world leaders like President Carter, Prime Minister Thatcher or Chancellor Schmidt.

● (2210)

Mr. Speaker, can you imagine a member of the NATO alliance meeting with other members of the NATO alliance and, having met with them, going to a member of the Warsaw pact and briefing a member of the Warsaw pact about the discussions he had had with NATO alliance members? Can you imagine that? Can you imagine the reverse being true where Chairman Brezhnev would meet with members of the Warsaw pact about concerns they have in their alliance and, after that meeting is over saying, "Now that we, as members of the Warsaw pact, have met I had better brief a member of the NATO alliance about our discussions." That is sheer stupidity. Yet the Prime Minister frankly, openly and gratuitously gives the information at his news conference that such is his regular custom. What in the world does he think he is pulling off? I might add that at the time of the debate in 1971 when the friendship protocol was going on, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) said, the protocol was "like a couple of boys meeting at summer camp and agreeing to continue in close touch after they had returned to their homes". Isn't that sweet? These are like boys coming home from camp. All they do is share the secrets about the alliance.

Let me quote the actual terms of that treaty. It is taken from "Keesing's Contemporary Archives." I quote clause 2 of that protocol:

> In the event of a situation arising which, in the opinion of the two governments, endangers the maintenance of peace or involves a breach of the peace, the two governments will make contact without delay in order to exchange views on what might be done to improve the situation.

There we have the terms to which the Prime Minister signed in 1971. If those are the terms then we can come to only one of two conclusions. First, that there are other secret messages which the Prime Minister has sent to Chairman Brezhnev, which he has not told us about if he was trying to fulfil this protocol, or else he does not think this is a crisis for world peace. It is one or the other. The agreement clearly says that without delay they will exchange views if there is a threat to world peace.

I say all this against the backdrop of 1968 when the Russian tanks rolled into Czechoslovakia and our government made that strong statement about it being regrettable. The question which the Prime Minister did not answer still remains. The Canadian people are looking for a strong statement from our government. The least the Prime Minister could do, without affecting the internal affairs of Poland, without messing around with a quarrel inside Poland and without being accused of interfering with the internal affairs of Poland, would be to demonstrate our concern about what the Soviet Union is doing by breaking off that friendship protocol. After all, that is supposed to be a bilateral agreement. At the time, it was announced, it was trumpeted across Canada as an agreement dealing with technical, scientific and high Arctic exploration. Those were the concerns. Actually, what the Prime Minister does is use that protocol to continue liaison with the Soviet ambassador in Ottawa. That is what he said. That is not what I said; it is what the Prime Minister said. He admitted it freely; he was not even asked to give that information. Mr. Speaker, we have reason to be concerned that the delay in the Prime Minister's sending a communique to the Soviet Union has to be because of this friendship protocol. I believe the people of Canada want to see a clear demonstration of the solidarity of the Canadian people in opposition to what the Soviet Union seems to be planning and want to see a clear demonstration of our opposition to that. One demonstration would be, without interfering with the domestic affairs of Poland, to break off that friendship protocol.

• (2215)

[Translation]

Mr. Louis Duclos (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) stated in the House on December 9 that the government has been seeking to establish a collective attitude within NATO vis-à-vis the events in Poland. That is why the Secretary of State for External Affairs flew to Brussels, to participate in a meeting of Atlantic alliance foreign affairs ministers, during which the Polish situation was reviewed.

I am pleased to announce that those discussions resulted in a unanimous approach concerning urgency plans, but unfortunately I cannot disclose the details of those plans. In addition to that, the ambassadors of member countries of NATO in Brussels have been instructed to follow up the situation in Poland and to review a series of political, diplomatic and economic measures which could be enforced should the situation deteriorate. In the meantime, it would not be appropriate to disclose whether the Canadian government is contemplating any measures.

As for the suggestion that the Canadian government would abandon what has been described as the friendship protocol between Canada and the U.S.S.R., obviously, I cannot for the moment say whether such an action would be appropriate. However, to avoid any confusion, I should underline that the protocol is not in fact a friendship protocol, but rather a protocol concerning consultations during which the Canadian and Soviet governments agreed in 1971 to improve communications between their respective countries, both under normal conditions and in times of crisis. It was never designed as a means of revealing Canadian state secrets or of betraying the confidentiality of communications with allies and friendly countries. Indeed, it was never used for this purpose.

Mr. Speaker, I seriously deplore that there can be such demagogy in this House on such a serious matter as we have had on the part of the hon. member this evening. He behaved the same way when he asked this question a few days ago. Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member really believes that his protocol between the Soviet Union and Canada is not in the interest of Canada, I wonder why he did not rise to denounce it during the eight or nine months when his party was in power. He kept his mouth shut at the time, and I deplore the fact that we cannot in this country do the same as our southern neighbours when serious issues of foreign policy are raised, and act in a non-partisan manner and avoid the kind of demagogy that we have seen tonight.

ENERGY—GASOHOL—INQUIRY WHETHER CONSIDERATION GIVEN TO REMOVAL OF EXCISE TAX

Mr. Charles Mayer (Portage-Marquette): I have a topic of major concern and it has to do with our energy supplies in Canada.

It is well known that our ability to produce liquid portable fuels in this country is declining. We are currently importing about one out of every five barrels we consume and the prospects are that in five years we will be importing roughly two barrels out of every five barrels we consume. I want to stress a question I raised in July concerning encouragement by the federal government of the production of ethyl alcohol with the idea of making this country self-sufficient or bringing it closer to that by making use of some of the renewable resources we have. Ethyl alcohol is capable of being produced by a large variety of the crops we grow. There are two or three areas I should like to cover in terms of dispersing some of the myths presently associated with the production of ethyl alcohol. One has to do with the food myth. Many people think it is immoral to take grain and produce alcohol from it.

• (2220)

In actual fact by producing ethyl alcohol we can add to the total food supply in this country. I think it is well known that many countries around the world are capable of producing a lot of starch and sugar, but that is not what is in short supply as far as food is concerned. What is in short supply is protein, and when we produce ethyl alcohol from grain, we only subtract carbohydrates, the protein remains. If refined properly and produced in sufficient quantities, protein produced in this way is capable of being sold and used for human consumption. I would like to read a quote into the record with respect to that. It is from the proceedings of the Canpac 1980 conference. It was the first Canadian national power alcohol conference, and it was held in Winnipeg back in June.

The largest current producer of fuel alcohol—

That is the United States.

—is shipping much of the protein byproducts from its alcohol plants to Holland, for human food use. This is a brand new protein source for Holland. And it can be a brand new source for other countries.

Those who are saying it is immoral to produce alcohol from grain which can be used for food are in fact missing the point. If we produce ethyl alcohol in sufficient quantities, as I said, and refine it properly, it is certainly capable of being a very good and valuable source of human food.

In addition to that there are many idle acres, particularly in western Canada, lying in summerfallow. There is much concern that with continuous summerfallowing we are losing some of those acres in terms of their capacity to produce. We could get into salinity problems. Summerfallow is not designed entirely as a means of increased production. It is a marketing tool. Because of the way our quota system is set up, people in some areas have to summerfallow as a means of increasing their marketing ability. If we can find markets for this kind of grain at home, we can decrease the amount of summerfallow thereby avoiding some of the salinity problems we are getting into in certain areas of prime land in western Canada.

Another potential problem people see with ethyl alcohol is the energy myth. Some people are saying that it takes more calories to produce a gallon of ethyl alcohol than the number which result. That is not the case either. It is a good, clean-burning fuel. It is a cool-burning fuel. Good engine life can be obtained through its use. Many Indiana racers use straight methanol, which is quite similar to ethyl alcohol. They use it alone in racing engines. It is a good fuel. Brazil is a major producer of ethyl alcohol, and I am told that most of the major farm equipment manufacturers are producing engines for sale to Brazil which burn straight ethyl alcohol. We are not talking about producing very much ethyl alcohol in this country because I do not think we have the capability to produce enough to burn alone in our engines. What we are talking about is a mixture of ethyl alcohol and gasoline, which is commonly referred to as gasohol. The mixture would be approximately 10 per cent ethyl alcohol and to be competitive in terms of price, it would have to be subsidized. I do not think this is the case any more, given the price of fuel in this country.

We are getting very close to the point where ethyl alcohol will be competitive in terms of price. Anyone who follows the energy-pricing situation knows that our prices will probably increase very drastically in the next two or three years. That will make the production of ethyl alcohol even more competitive with conventional gasoline. When we look at the subsidy we are paying now on gasoline presently imported into the country, we find we are paying some $20 a barrel to buy imported oil. If we were to pay that kind of subsidy—and I am not advocating this—to people in our own country to produce ethyl alcohol, that subsidy would stay in the country.

There is another side to this. We pay that amount of subsidy to bring in imported oil and we make use of only some 50 per cent or 60 per cent of a barrel of oil to produce gasoline. The remainder goes into asphalt and other heavy products which we in this country are capable of producing from coal and natural gas. So, by buying a barrel of oil from offshore sources and paying a subsidy on it, we are only making use of part of that barrel of oil to produce gasoline which is in short supply in this country.

What I am saying is that if we would pay any kind of a subsidy to encourage the production of ethyl alcohol, we would get a double benefit. Not only would the money stay in this country, but we would not be subsidizing the importation of things that go to make asphalt, those heavy products which come from the remainder of a barrel of oil out of which we cannot make gasoline. We certainly are capable of producing those other products from coal and natural gas.

What I should like to say in conclusion is that Manitoba, by waiving a provincial excise tax on the production of ethyl alcohol, was able to encourage a plant to start in that province. I would like to see the federal government show some initiative in this respect and remove the 7-cent a gallon excise tax as it applies to gasohol and thereby encourage production of energy in this country from a genuinely renewable resource. It has been done not only in the United States but in Brazil and in Manitoba.

Mr. John Evans (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, over the years there has been increasing interest in Canada, in the United States and elsewhere, especially in Brazil, in using gasohol which, as the hon. member has pointed out, is a blend of 90 per cent gasoline and 10 per cent alcohol, and this would be used to conserve gasoline. The government has indicated its support for the development of this and other renewable energy sources in its national energy program.

In the national energy program, the government identified a number of alternatives to gasoline which warrant consideration. These include the use of propane as a clean and efficient fuel for motor vehicles and the development of compressed natural gas for fuel. The Department of Energy, Mines and Resources and the special parliamentary committee on alternative energy and oil substitution are both studying alcohol as one of these options.

Alcohol fuels present a unique opportunity for the future production of alternative liquid fuels from renewable biomass. This potential, however, requires more research and development to improve on the current economic and technical disadvantages. To this end, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Mac-Eachen) reaffirmed in his recent budget speech his intention to introduce amendments to the Excise Act to facilitate the production of denatured alcohol for use in experimentation and development of fuels. The new provisions will include the creation of special temporary licences, a reduction in the bonding requirements, and exemption from the excise duty on alcohol to enable researchers to produce denatured alcohol for experimentation and development of fuels such as gasohol.

With existing technology, however, there are a number of drawbacks to using gasohol in place of gasoline. First, alcohol is costly to produce, compared to gasoline, even when refined from imported oil. Second, the recoverable energy content of alcohol is lower than that of gasoline. Finally, there are some technical problems still to be worked out, such as the feasibility of using gasohol in Canada's severe winters. For these reasons, elimination of the 7 cents per gallon levy from gasohol would appear to be an unwarranted subsidy, and, indeed, could even be counter-productive, since this fuel is primarily gasoline. I might point out that since it is 10 per cent alcohol and 90 per cent gasoline, the effective subsidy to the alcohol component would be 70 cents a gallon.

For these reasons, subsidization of gasohol by removing the excise tax would be premature. The taxation of alternative fuels for internal combustion engines can only be properly addressed when all the various alternatives have been properly assessed and a viable and efficient substitute for gasoline has been identified.

NATURAL RESOURCES

OWNERSHIP TO BE VESTED IN PROVINCES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Yurko (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. The proposed constitutional patriation and amendment resolution, supplemented by the National Energy Program, has fostered and is continuing to foster apprehension in Canada, giving rise to questioning of the inherent values of the confederation bargain. Much of this apprehension is caused by the repeated suggestion that loss of provincial ownership of resources is at stake. To reduce such apprehension, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor):

That Parliament, through the appropriate action of this House, reaffirm that natural resources within the boundaries of each and every province shall remain the property of the provinces, and furthermore, that the final address to Her Majesty on constitutional patriation shall contain a section affirming that no existing natural resources ownership rights shall be taken from or abridged in any province without the expressed consent of the affected province.

Madam Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for debate requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

AGRICULTURE

ECONOMIC PROTECTION FOR FARMERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Arnold Malone (Crowfoot): Madam Speaker, the value of grain on the market has been down to the maximum allowable limit for each of the past nine days, forcing a 25 per cent decrease in value of grain; the price of feeder cattle this past week has dropped to $10 per live hundredweight; the price of farm machinery may escalate by 20 per cent within the next 12 months; interest rates for farm loans are now between 17 per cent and 25 per cent. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Portage-Marquette (Mr. Mayer):

That the federal government develop economic strategies which will immediately protect Canadian farmers, so as to ensure their survival and to guarantee an adequate food supply for all Canadians.

Madam Speaker: Presentation of this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

BREAKDOWN OF VOTES HELD—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Whereas there have been 38 votes in the House so far in 1980 under the Liberal administration, and keeping in mind the distorted and misleading statements made by Conservative members of the House regarding those votes, let the following figures act as reference points for truth in the future: the Tories have voted with the NDP 14 times; the NDP have voted with the Liberals seven times; the Tories, however, have voted 16 times with the Liberals.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): The NDP are feeling the heat.

Mr. Fulton: In view of the fact that the Tories vote with the Liberals twice as often as the NDP, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this day be recognized throughout Canada as tweedledee and tweedledum day, keeping in mind the dangers for Joe and the gang when caught by the Canadian public marching heel to toe, nose to cheek, and eye to eye with Pierre.

Madam Speaker: I fail to see the urgent and pressing necessity of such a motion.

NEW DEMOCRATIC PARTY

CALL FOR CONDEMNATION FOR ALLEGED MISLEADING OF PUBLIC—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. On December 12, 1979, the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae) introduced a motion which led to the defeat of the Clark government. The motion stated that the Progressive Conservative government was doing nothing about high interest rates, while the NDP-Liberal coalition in fact was participating in an all-party committee called to look into a solution to the interest rate problem. On December 11, 1980, the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) introduced substantially the same motion. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen):

That this House unreservedly condemns the NDP for deliberately misleading the Canadian public into believing nothing was being done by the Clark government regarding high interest rates when in fact they were participating in this all-party committee, and condemn in particular the two socialist hypocrites who introduced the two mischievous motions.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

VALUE OF CANADIAN DOLLAR—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John Gamble (York North): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. When the Trudeau administration resumed office in March the Canadian dollar was trading at 87.2 cents in terms of the U.S. dollar, but is now trading at 83.15 cents, devalued by 4.05 cents, causing an increase in the cost of living of 1.6 per cent as the result of higher costs of imports, particularly of food. Considering that in March the Bank of Canada rate was 14 per cent and is now 16.14 per cent, an increase of 2 per cent, with the prime bank rate now 17 per cent and small businesses and others paying interest rates of up to 20 per cent, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg-Assiniboine (Mr. McKenzie):

That this House request the Trudeau administration to resign, since if they serve their full term in office and the above rates continue at the pace which has been described, the Canadian dollar is likely by then to be worth 16 cents and the bank rate to have gone up to 83 per cent.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

YOHO—PROTECTION OF WILDLIFE FROM STARVATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East-Revelstoke): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to propose a motion of urgent and pressing necessity. Due to the heavy snowfall in southeastern British Columbia, including Yoho National Park, which has caused a serious grazing problem for elk and other wildlife to the extent that many of them will starve if this situation is not corrected, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Kristiansen):

That the federal Ministry of the Environment immediately meet with provincial officials to take steps to protect these animals before they die from exhaustion and starvation.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

In view of the Liberals' disastrous high interest rate policy which will result in the cashing in of billions of dollars worth of Canada Savings Bonds and other government obligations, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Lewis):

That the Minister of Finance be required to make a statement on motions explaining what increases in taxation he plans in order to refinance his government's horrendous public debt.

FINANCE

EFFECT OF HIGH INTEREST RATES—REPORT OF ECONOMIC COUNCIL OF CANADA

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. Since his budget was brought down on October 28, the Canadian dollar has declined in value by 2.07 cents to 83.15 cents, the lowest level since 1933. The Bank of Canada rate has gone up over 4 per cent to 16.14 per cent and the prime bank rate has gone up to 17 per cent. The inflation rate has had to be revised to 11.4 per cent for next year and the unemployment rate has been revised upwards by the Economic Council of Canada. Real wages will decline in both 1980 and 1981. It is the most disastrous budget since Herbert Hoover—a monumental flop.

My question is this. The minister said on Wednesday that he had decided not to launch any new programs or change any budgetary measures. Yesterday he said he had not yet decided—he started to weasel and qualify—and outside the House he said that he was looking again at the adverse impact on potential home owners, small businessmen and farmers.

In view of these statements, would the minister make an announcement on Monday—we cannot afford any more delay—on what his new policies will be to assist home owners, potential home owners, small businessmen and farmers? They cannot afford to wait any longer.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): No, Madam Speaker, it is not my intention to make a statement on Monday.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): That is the first definite statement you have made.

Mr. Crosbie: Madam Speaker, when the Prime Minister said on February 18 "Welcome to the eighties", did he mean to the 80-cent dollar? Is that what he was welcoming us to? I refer the minister to the Prime Minister's report, the report of the Economic Council of Canada, at page 33. They pointed out in their review last year there were two driving forces in the Canadian economy which could help us in the eighties, the U.S. and world outlook and high domestic energy investment. Now they say that only the latter remains, because the world outlook is poor, to move the Canadian economy forward in the period 1981-83. They also said in their pre-budget statement that all that was left was energy investment.

In view of the budget and the fact that the budget energy policy has caused cancellation and delay of the Alsands tar sands projects and the heavy oil project at Cold Lake, in view of the dispute with Newfoundland which prevents the development of east coast offshore oil and gas resources, and in view of the fact that there will not be any massive energy investment in the eighties if these disastrous policies continue, is the minister prepared to announce changes which will start these projects up again so that Canada can have some economic hope for salvation in the eighties?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, I want to repeat the answer I gave yesterday to the hon. member, or at least to an hon. member in the opposition, that we have established in the National Energy Program a comprehensive framework, for energy development in Canada and that we have provided the basis upon which these energy projects can and will go ahead.

Mr. Crosbie: Madam Speaker, my supplementary is this. The Prime Minister, through his agency, has condemned the minister's budget, both in this report and in the report brought down since their annual report was tabled on Wednesday, condemned the energy policies and has shown what will be the effect of the budget. They say that they have had to revise their forecast and that there will only be growth of 0.5 per cent next year.

In view of all this and the minister's weaseling outside the House yesterday that he is considering changes to help small businesses, home owners and the like, would he tell us when we can expect an announcement from him as to some change in policy in order to give hope to Canadians as they approach the Christmas season?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, first of all, I disagree totally with the hon. member when he says that the Economic Council of Canada denounced the budget. In fact, in the review which was prepared before the budget—and it is made quite clear in the introduction that it was prepared before the budget—there is considerable support for a very large number of the main elements in the budget statement itself.

Mr. Crosbie: Where?

Mr. MacEachen: In fact, the only major difference that I can find in the policy thrust of the Economic Council of Canada and that of the budget is that the Economic Council of Canada recommended a considerably higher price for energy in the next several years.

Mr. Crosbie: Read the supplement.

Mr. MacEachen: That is a clear difference, but in terms of macroeconomic policy and in terms of the posture of the budget, the Economic Council of Canada gives considerable support.

● (1120)

The hon. member has asked whether, in light of the impact that higher interest rates will have on particular groups in the community, I will be undertaking any new measures. I want to explain to the hon. member, as I did in the spring when we were facing a similar situation, that we did undertake a very deep analysis of the impact, for example, of those interest rates on individuals in the country who might be renegotiating their mortgages. We had consultations with the lending institutions. As a result of that analysis we were able to develop the conclusion that those cases that were adversely affected would be dealt with and were dealt with effectively by the lending institutions.

Mr. Crosbie: By personal bankruptcy.

Mr. MacEachen: The same process is ongoing at the present time. I am confident that the lending institutions, including banks, will take into account the particular impact of these high interest rates on small businesses and on home owners.

I repeat, while it may be popular for hon. members opposite to relate the high interest rates to the budget, they ought to understand, and do understand deep down, what is happening. I have great respect for the intelligence of the hon. member for St. John's West, and hon. members opposite do know deep down in their intelligence—

Miss Bégin: It is really deep.

Mr. MacEachen: —that what is happening now, not only with respect to interest rates in Canada but with respect to interest rates in most other industrial countries, is the result of policies that are being followed—

Mr. Crosbie: By you.

Mr. MacEachen: —by the Federal Reserve Bank in the United States. I happen to believe—

Some hon. Members: Order, order.

Mr. MacEachen: —that these policies in the current circumstances are causing considerable harm, not only to Canada but to other countries, and that the United States ought to be encouraged to take another look at these damaging policies which are being followed.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Blame the U.S.

THE ECONOMY

INCREASE IN CONSUMER PRICE INDEX—INQUIRY RESPECTING MEASURES OF RELIEF

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, I should like to address a supplementary question to the Minister of Finance. This is the first time that we have heard in this House the Minister of Finance saying that interest rates are not the concern of the government. The economy is in a tailspin. The horrendous interest rates are going to cause serious consequences for low and middle-income earners. The poor in this country will be lacerated. Today we have the news that the food price index has risen 1.05 per cent in November because poultry, eggs, fish and fresh vegetables have increased in price. The consumer price index shows 12.7 per cent for food, 13.8 per cent for home consumption, 29.8 per cent for fresh vegetables and 67.1 per cent for sugar and food preparations. This is an ominous Christmas present from this government to the people of Canada.

I should like to ask the minister what he is going to say to his constituents in Cape Breton when he goes back at the Christmas recess. More particularly, what specific undertaking is he going to give the people of Canada regarding relief from this onerous inflation and the high interest rates that we have in Canada today?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I can assure the hon. member that when I speak to my constituents during the Christmas break I will make more sense than he is making in his question.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Scrooge!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Madam Speaker, the Minister of Finance suffers from delusions of adequacy; that is all I can say about him. Immediate relief is required for a wide spectrum of interests in this country today. For example, farmers and fishermen are required to plan for next year. For taxation and other purposes, they have to make their purchases of equipment and supplies. For small businesses, the high carrying cost of Christmas stock will cause widespread bankruptcies and the quiet closing of over 50,000 small businesses in Canada.

Yesterday the minister promised the press that he would look at the adverse impact on potential home owners, small businesses and farmers. We need action now, before Christmas. When is the minister going to make a statement? When can we expect him to come forward with the promised measures regarding these segments of our economy which are very seriously affected?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, I want to make it clear, first of all, that no such measures have been promised. When any decision is taken it will be announced in the House.

● (1125)

Mr. Nielsen: It will be announced "in due course".

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, what I have undertaken to do is to monitor very carefully the impact of these high interest rates on various groups in the community. The hon. member, in common with all members of his party, each day is calling for immediate relief, for increased expenditures, at the same time as the official critic, the former minister of finance, is calling for a reduced deficit and restraint in public expenditures.

If hon. members will recall, it was a year ago today that they had an opportunity, if they had put their heads together, to stay in office. They ought to get their heads together in their economic thinking and discover whether they want more spending, less spending, a greater deficit or a lesser deficit. Because you cannot have a lesser deficit by launching new spending programs, as advocated by the hon. member.

HIGH INTEREST RATES—ASSISTANCE TO HOME OWNERS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, I noticed the Prime Minister clapping at the reference to "a year ago today". I correct the Minister of Finance; it is a year ago tomorrow.

An hon. Member: A year ago today.

Mr. Knowles: A year ago tonight was the Liberal party.

Mr. Broadbent: A year ago today the Prime Minister, then the leader of the opposition, expressed support for a motion which condemned the then Conservative government for its high interest rate policy. Does the Prime Minister remember that he promised during the campaign "not only to deal with interest rate policy, but to bring interest rates lower". Since interest rates are now 2.5 percentage points higher than they were when the Liberals voted against the Conservatives, what plans does the government have in mind to live up to its election promises, or does the Prime Minister plan just to sit there and completely doublecross the people of Canada who voted for him?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I answered this very question the other day. I told the hon. member that I had no recollection of that statement or the context of it. I asked him if he could perhaps send it over to me and I will refer to it.

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, the quotation is from the Toronto Star. I would have thought the Prime Minister's staff, which is reasonably substantial, would have brought it to his attention by this time. The quotation is there. The people of Canada know how the Liberals voted a year ago. They know the Prime Minister promised to do something about interest rates.

Since the Prime Minister was talking about changing priorities on food the other day, and given the fact that Canadians still want to own their homes and that mortgage rates are now 17 per cent to 20 per cent, I ask the Prime Minister what specific measures does he have in mind for Canadians in terms of their human priorities in regard to being able to buy a home? Alternatively, is he saying to the people of Canada now that they have to give up the dream of buying their own home?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, the hon. member says the statement was in the Toronto Star. I say it was not in our election platform and it was not part of the statement I made based on the election platform. We did not promise that we would lower interest rates and I challenge hon. members to point to any section of our program which said that we would.

Mr. Crosbie: Why don't you do something about it anyway?

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, the Prime Minister was interviewed during the campaign by the Toronto Star; I will send a copy of the article to him.

Mr. Trudeau: You should have done it the other day when I asked.

Mr. Broadbent: He may not consider that a commitment, but most other parties consider when they have an interview during a campaign which is published in the largest daily in Canada that that is part of the campaign. But the Prime Minister has a rather perverse view about what the truth actually is, and we all know that.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: Since bankruptcies are increasing, since farmers' debt loads are increasing and since the cost of living for Canadians coast to coast is going up, does the Prime Minister have any intention of telling the man, who is sitting to his right, to bring in a budget, which recognizes the disastrous state the Canadian economy is in, and do something about it?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, the Leader of the New Democratic Party must be joking. There was a budget brought down just about a month and a half ago.

Mr. Crosbie: It was a joke, and a bad one.

INQUIRY RESPECTING EFFECT OF GOVERNMENT POLICIES—REVIEW OF SMALL BUSINESS DEVELOPMENT BOND LEGISLATION

Miss Pat Carney (Vancouver Centre): Madam Speaker, I would like to address my question to the Minister of Finance. In view of the statements he has made here today, one gathers that he does not grasp the connection between his economic policies and the economic war zone that has been created in the Canadian economy. Is the minister aware that his policies are bankrupting some businesses, increasing food prices, costing some people their jobs and pricing homes out of the reach of people? Does he lack that basic understanding or is it simply a lack of compassion?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member has prefaced her question by linking the current interest rates to policies pursued either by this government or by the Bank of Canada. In that statement she is wrong, because we are not pursuing policies that are bringing about these interest rates. These policies are being pursued by the Federal Reserve Bank in the United States. Everybody who is observing the situation knows that. I do not think it adds to the understanding of the Canadian people of the current serious economic situation to falsify and distort the record in the way it has been by members of the opposition yesterday and today.

Miss Carney: Madam Speaker, the finance minister has just proven that he has no understanding of the basic facts of Canadian economic life. While interest rates are partially affected by outside influences, as the minister has stated in the past, they also reflect the policies followed here with regard to inflation and the budget deficit.

I would like to give a specific example of Canadian policy to the Minister of Finance. I am advised by members of the investment community that the small business development bond, which offers some refuge to small businessmen and gives them some shelter from interest rates, is too inflexible and for too short a period of time to be useful. Will the minister direct his officials to review the legislation under which this bond has been introduced and possibly make revisions to offer more aid to the small business community?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, I should point out to the hon. member that despite the pressure that is existing on Canadian currency and on Canadian interest rates, current Canadian prime rates or short-term rates are about three points lower than they are in the United States.

Mr. Crosbie: So what? They are still intolerably high.

Mr. MacEachen: There is no way the Canadian economy can drop off the planet—

Mr. Crosbie: Why don't you try it?

Mr. Kempling: Without a parachute.

Mr. MacEachen: —or that the Canadian people can drop out of the world economy. That seems to be the sort of primitive economics that we are hearing from members of the opposition who ought to know better and who want to be making repentance on this twelfth of December, 1980, for their misdemeanours of a year ago and their lack of intelligence.

SOCIAL DEVELOPMENT

INQUIRY WHETHER BENEFITS FOR NATIVE PEOPLES WILL BE WITHDRAWN

Mr. John Kushner (Calgary East): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. It has to do with the federal social services program for native peoples in Canada. Is the minister planning to withdraw social services programs, in so far as benefits are concerned, from native peoples who do not live on the reserve, and indeed pass the buck to the provincial governments to pick up the tab, and, if so, why?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, it is not the intention of this government and certainly not the intention of the Minister of Finance to withdraw from a basic priority social programs in Canada. The hon. member will realize that under this government and previous Liberal governments, social programs have been expanded from an expenditure of about $11 billion to $33 billion within a period of ten years, a very dramatic increase which attests to our concern about social development for all groups in the country. I want to assure the hon. member there is no lack of interest or concern in this party about social programs. However, if the former government had been in office, with the 10 per cent expenditure rule that had been espoused by the former minister of finance we would have witnessed deep cuts in social development.

Mr. Kushner: Madam Speaker, I wonder if the minister really knows what is happening in this regard. It is quite clear that the minister is confirming the statement in the Auditor General's report which says that the government has lost control and that the department's bureaucrats do not even know what their role is. What is this government planning on taking away next as a result of its inability to control spending? Is the minister denying that the government is not going to take away the program from those native peoples who do not live on the reserve?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, I have no particular knowledge of that item of our social program. The hon. member ought to address that question to the minister of Indian affairs.

THE LATE JOHN LENNON

EXPRESSION OF SORROW AND SYMPATHY TO FAMILY

Mr. Stanley Hudecki (Hamilton West): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Right Hon. Prime Minister. On behalf of hundreds of thousands of young and not so young Canadians who are sad and grieving the untimely death of one who put into his music and song that yearning for love and peace, would the Prime Minister express their feeling of sorrow and sympathy to the family of the late John Lennon?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for the suggestion. He will recall that a similar motion was put to the House the other day and it was not adopted. I think it would be a nice gesture if we could get unanimous agreement to adopting such a motion. Failing that, I will gladly write a letter in that sense to the widow of Mr. Lennon. I have already written a private letter but I would be glad to write another on behalf of the government and people of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

HOUSING

EFFECT OF GOVERNMENT POLICIES ON PRICE OF HOUSES

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. One of the canons of the monetarist policy which the minister's party has been following, as did the Conservatives in their brief occupation of government, is that high interest rates help to fight inflation. I ask the minister to focus his mind for a moment on the housing problem in Canada and to consider that housing costs have gone up as much as 22.2 per cent in St. John's and 35.5 per cent in Vancouver. The head of HUDAC has estimated that a house which now sells in Toronto for $98,000 will in 1990 sell for $250,000 and in the year 2000 for $750,000. Housing starts are now down to the lowest in 15 years in Canada.

Will the minister explain how policies which have the effect of cutting off supply at the source can do anything other than cause the price of houses to escalate? Will the minister comment on the fact that high interest rates, rather than help to fight inflation, simply pour fuel on the problem and make it much worse?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member made what in essence was a little economic homily and has asked me to comment on it in reply to a question. It is obvious to me and to the hon. member that high interest rates, especially the kind we are now experiencing, are bound to have an effect on the ability of persons in Canada to acquire a home. That is clear. The hon. member now asks me to go on and comment, presumably upon the monetary policy now being pursued by the Federal Reserve Bank in the United States in an effort to control the money supply, which is the object of that policy, and to arrest inflation. I expressed concern a few moments ago about that policy. The Governor of the Bank of Canada has also expressed concern to authorities in the United States about the wisdom of the current policy being pursued in that country, because, in our view, it is not a proper application of monetary policy in the current circumstances. That is my homily in reply to the hon. member's.

● (1140)

Mr. Rae: Madam Speaker, if it takes a homily in order to get the minister to tell us that the Governor of the Bank of Canada has launched a protest to the Federal Reserve Board, that is fine. That is information which I certainly did not have before and nor did anyone else. Perhaps I will continue to ask homilies if it manages to elicit a response from the minister other than the ones we normally get. Perhaps the minister would consider establishing diplomatic relationships with the Federal Reserve Board to make our representations known on a permanent basis.

Given the fact there is now a president-elect of the United States who appears to be subject to this disease of monetarism, and is not going to be able to shake it for a number of years, does the minister not consider it is now necessary for the government to start looking at alternative policies in Canada on a long-term basis, not simply on a short-term basis in response to particular crises and upward waves in interest rates? There is a need to look for alternatives in fiscal policy, in monetary policy, in dealing with capital flows and so on, so we can establish in Canada an independent monetary policy as well as policies which will not strangle the housing industry, small businesses, farmers and the average consumer but will get our economy going again.

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, I have absolutely no quarrel with what the hon. member says. I have been searching in my own mind and among the views expressed by economists of this country for fresh alternative policies. I have not heard them from members of the opposition, members of the New Democratic Party or from members of the economic profession, who have been, in my view, unable to describe a policy which could be implemented and would not worsen current circumstances in Canada. That is my conclusion. I am still waiting for a revised policy from the New Democratic Party. Every proposal it has made with respect to interest rates, if adopted, would worsen inflation and make our difficulties greater than they are at the present time.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

ASSISTANCE TO NORTHERN RESIDENTS TO MEET INCREASED COSTS

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Once again, I want to remind him of the very exceptional and compounded difficulties which Canadians who live in the mid-Canada section, the northern part of the provinces and the northern regions of Canada, are facing with respect to the high cost of living and the energy package. We have situations where people have to walk away from their homes. They cannot afford to buy heating oil at $2 a gallon or to buy gasoline which costs $3 and $5 a gallon in some areas of northern Canada. Does the minister have any compassion for these exceptional problems in Canada? Is there any plan, such as an energy tax credit or any kind of emergency plan, which the government is intending to implement to mitigate against these very serious difficulties in the north?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, obviously the government is concerned about the impact of energy prices on Canadians and, of course, on northern Canadians. It was because of that concern that the government brought in a pricing regime which placed a less onerous burden on Canadian consumers than that put forward in the budget of my predecessor.

Mr. Crosbie: Rubbish. Tired excuse.

Mr. MacEachen: Again, the hon. member has referred, as have other spokesmen in the opposition, to an energy tax credit and a mortgage tax deductibility program as solutions. I remind him that the imposition of the 18-cent tax on gasoline in their budget, which is fresh in our memory because of the anniversary date, would have virtually wiped out all the benefits proposed in these programs.

REQUEST FOR EMERGENCY MEASURES TO RELIEVE HARDSHIP

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Madam Speaker, I should like to address my supplementary question to the Prime Minister, who seems to be very preoccupied these days with the North-South dialogue. I wonder if he could project himself to the North-South problems in our country. Is he aware that there are small children and old people living in the north who are starving, who are deprived in a way comparable to Third World conditions, because of the harsh realities of the economic situation in our country? People of the north cannot transport themselves by way of a transit system. They are restricted to the use of their cars or to aircraft. Most part of the year is very cold, they must heat their homes and the situation is desperate. Will the Prime Minister undertake, with his cabinet, to attempt to work out a program which will address itself to this rather serious emergency situation in the north?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I recognize that life in the north entails many difficulties and even hardship. I have made several trips into the north and have indeed tried to introduce policies and measures which would alleviate some of those hardships. If anyone is actually starving, as the hon. member suggests, I wish he would communicate their names immediately to the government so we could take emergency measures.

ENERGY

INQUIRY RESPECTING CONTINGENCY PLANS TO ASSIST UNEMPLOYED OIL WELL DRILLERS

Mr. Bill Wright (Calgary North): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Canadian oil well drilling contractors reported in November that 120 drilling contracts had been cancelled and that 60 more rigs were scheduled to leave the country. According to the drilling contractors, approximately 10,800 jobs will be lost in western Canada. This information was provided to the government one month ago. Could the minister tell the House if he has any contingency plans to help these workers?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I have had a very fruitful meeting this morning with representatives of the drilling contractors association. During the discussions it became clear that the best solution was an early agreement between the government of Alberta and the Government of Canada. The drilling contractors recognize this requires the willingness of both governments to sit down, negotiate and compromise. They indicated they would make similar representations to the government of Alberta in order to arrive at an early agreement.

Mr. Wright: Madam Speaker, I am sure all these workers will like the minister's answer. In addition to the 10,800 workers who will be out of work this spring in western Canada, there are many workers in central Canada who also will be out of work. Could the minister tell us how many workers will be affected in Ontario and what plans he has to help these workers?

Mr. Lalonde: I have to remind the hon. member that the best solution is one whereby an agreement will be reached that would be fair to the Canadian public in general as well as to the industry. I have to remind the hon. member that every dollar increase in the price of oil means that Canada loses 20,000 jobs; that is, 20,000 more unemployed, on a net basis, result from this increase in the price of oil. This is based on figures provided by OECD which apply to all other industrialized countries. We see the results in the western world of the impact of high increases in the price of oil which have now taken place together with a tremendous increase in unemployment in the whole industrialized world, whether it is in Europe, in the United States or in Canada. One has to bear in mind those factors. The price of oil cannot be increased very much without having a negative impact, both in terms of inflation and in terms of unemployment, and I invite my friends to reflect on that also. That is why we are trying to arrive at an agreement which will provide for fair prices to Canadians, as the budget did at the end of October.

TRADE

CONFERENCE OF PACIFIC RIM COUNTRIES—ABSENCE OF REPRESENTATION FROM TAIWAN

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Madam Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Minister of State for Trade. The minister has recently returned from a Pacific rim conference in Vancouver where he and his officials hoped to make Canadian companies aware of the tremendous economic potential in what is one of the world's fastest growing regions. Therefore, I should like to ask the minister the following question. Since recent statistics show that employment is down by 15,000 in manufacturing, by 13,000 in construction and by 11,000 in finance and real estate, why was Taiwan not invited to the trade conference in Vancouver since the Taiwan Power Company, the country's largest electrical power producer, has indicated it is willing to invite Atomic Energy of Canada to bid on two nuclear reactors which the company plans to buy, the sale of which would bolster our chaotic economy?

Hon. Ed Lumley (Minister of State, Trade): Madam Speaker, as the hon. member knows, we had a very productive meeting in Vancouver at the Pacific rim conference.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lumley: About 200 of the leading businessmen from across Canada were there.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lumley: Probably the most important thing that happened following the conference was that our trade commissioners from the region, when travelling from St. John's, Newfoundland to Vancouver, B.C. had excellent response from the business community in every province.

The reason that Taiwan was not discussed specifically at the conference is that, as the hon. member knows, Canada does not officially recognize Taiwan. However, there were businessmen there who do have commercial interests with the Taiwan business people and their discussions were not restricted at the conference.

GOVERNMENT POLICY RESPECTING TAIWAN

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Madam Speaker, I wish to direct my supplementary question to the Right Hon. Prime Minister. Since Japan's Toyota motors is currently planning to build a 100,000 unit per year car factory in Taiwan, while supplying mainland China with vehicles, and large U.S. multinationals, such as General Motors, Citibank and Chase-Manhattan Bank, are pursuing their own deals with Peking despite an already sizeable commitment in Taiwan, my question to the Prime Minister is whether the Canadian government is considering revamping its policy toward Taiwan, since it is obviously out of date as Peking has made it clear that it does not object to foreign companies doing business with Taiwan?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I did not understand anything said by the Minister of State for Trade to contradict that. Canadian businessmen are free to establish themselves and do business with Taiwan. I believe these are the words the minister used, and that is government policy. The fact that there are no Canadian businessmen building motor plants in Taiwan does not prove that there is anything wrong with our policy. There are no Canadian businessmen building motor plants in Saudi Arabia either. There are many occasions for Canadian businessmen to establish themselves in many countries. The fact that they cannot be everywhere does not reflect on government policy.

ACTION TO CONTROL COSTS OF FARMERS—FUNDING OF FARM CREDIT CORPORATION

Mr. Vic Althouse (Humboldt-Lake Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture. Yesterday the House learned that small business bankruptcies were up about 20 per cent over the previous year. By comparison, farm bankruptcies this year are up 82 per cent over last year, which is clear evidence of the damage being done by the high interest rate policy of both this government and the previous government. It has been calculated that the recent increases in rates will add between $300 million and $500 million to farm costs in 1981. Since this has a devastating effect on food prices as the cost of credit must eventually be returned to farmers, processors and retailers, what is the minister planning to do for the farm sector to keep farmers in business and to keep consumer costs down?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, I am sure the hon. member knows that you cannot isolate the farming community from the same economic factors that the other part of our business community deals with every day. I would rather see the agricultural community able to stand on its own two feet, economically speaking. The hon. member uses figures. There has never been a time when the agricultural community, over all, has been better off, regardless of what the hon. member says. He has referred to interest rates. The rate of interest of the Farm Credit Corporation is still 12.75 per cent, an enviable interest rate for any part of our society at present. Even in the hon. member's own province, the provincial loan program subsidizes interest rates for agriculture. The same is true in Alberta, Quebec and Nova Scotia. They even subsidize our farm credit lending rates at times so that for those farmers who are involved in supply-management types of systems, which we have worked with them to develop, the interest rate is covered in their cost-price formula. They can still supply food to Canadian consumers in a fashion that is more reasonable than in any other place in the world that I can think of.

Mr. Althouse: I think the minister's answer indicates part of the reason why the number of bankruptcies is higher than in other business sectors. In spite of the subsidized rates which are available, it appears that not enough is being done for agriculture and for farm producers. The amount of debt being carried by farmers is estimated by the minister's department to be over $20 billion this year. So it is strange that an industry in such great shape keeps incurring greater and greater debts.

In view of the fact that farmers would welcome more dollars from the Farm Credit Corporation which, as the minister said, is money borrowed at the government bond rate, can the minister explain why FCC has actually reduced the amount of funding available in 1980 over the previous year, especially in light of the fact that it was the Liberal party which promised, in the most recent election campaign, that it would increase the funding to the Farm Credit Corporation?

Mr. Whelan: Again the hon. member uses impressive figures, but he does not go further to say that the vast amount of the money which farmers have borrowed is below the 10 per cent interest rate on long-term loans. A tremendous amount of the borrowings is at that rate. The reason we do not have as much money to re-lend is that the Farm Credit Corporation uses a program whereby as payments come in as farmers pay off their mortgage before it is due the corporation recycles that money. But this is not being done because farmers can get mortgage rates at 7 per cent or 8 per cent, so instead of paying off their mortgages, even if they have only three or four years to go, they reinvest the money in trust companies, credit unions, etc., making 12 per cent to 14 per cent on the money instead of paying back the corporation as some others were doing until last year.

However, if the hon. member has any amazing suggestions to make other than criticism, let him bring them forward. He has made no constructive suggestions even when we were discussing the estimates of my department the other day. He said we have created no new programs. Let me tell him that we have created 12 new programs for farmers in the Department of Agriculture and, as I said, we still have one of the healthiest agricultural industries in the whole world.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

CN EXPRESS OFFICE CLOSURES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Madawaska-Victoria): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport and I shall put it in English.

[English]

Since the Minister of Transport is well aware of Canadian National's decision to cease its express services in many medium-sized Canadian communities, including Edmundston, New Brunswick, can he inform us today if that decision will be revised, revoked, reviewed, retrorsed, retracted or otherwise retired? If not, will the minister order an inquiry into the mess, above and beyond a parliamentary committee examination, with special attention being given to the cosy sweetheart deal between the union leaders and CN Express over pension arrangements?

● (1200)

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I have already stated my position with respect to CN express action, the effort it is now making to retrench away from small parcels. I have already stated what CN intends to do with respect to its employees, and I will not repeat it. It also intends to maintain a good relationship with the communities. This is more difficult than the relocation or pre-pensioning of employees. Discussions are ongoing with communities in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island. It is my understanding that CN Express will try to see what accommodation can be reached in a very difficult situation. In the meantime, CN Express is not going to abandon communities in which it has fulfilled roles that no one else can fulfil.

AGRICULTURAL STABILIZATION BOARD—ASSISTANCE TO POTATO GROWERS

Hon. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture. Yesterday I had the opportunity of advising his parliamentary secretary of a telegram from the Quebec Potato Growers Association asking the minister to recommend to the Agricultural Stabilization Board that a survey be made on the income of Quebec potato growers in 1979-80. Can the minister tell the House today whether or not he will indeed make that recommendation to the board and when he can report to us on whether Quebec potato growers can benefit from the advantages offered by that board?

[English]

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, I can tell the hon. member that several members on this side of the House from la belle province as well as from the provinces of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia have made similar representations. We are now receiving representation from the producers, and I have authorization from the government to go ahead with the stabilization program for the potato crop of 1979-80.

[Translation]

Mr. La Salle: Madam Speaker, the minister advises me that several government members made representations to that effect, but the Quebec potato growers sent me a telegram precisely because they have as yet received no answer to their representations. Under those circumstances, with a view to replying to a serious telegram, I must ask the minister again when he can give us an answer because it seems the producers need a reply on whether or not they will get financial assistance with regard to their 1979-80 crop whose proceeds are inadequate.

[English]

Mr. Whelan: Madam Speaker, the potato growers in eastern regions who have suffered because of low prices should receive some information before too many days or weeks go by. I believe the payment per hundredweight is being tabulated now, but I do not have the figures with me because I do not think they are finalized at the present time. It all depends upon what percentage we use, whether 90 per cent of the average of the last five years using current input costs, or 100 per cent of the average of the last five years using current input costs. That has yet to be decided.

POINTS OF ORDER

MR. BROADBENT—PRESS REPORTS OF STATEMENTS ATTRIBUTED TO PRIME MINISTER

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order pertaining to an exchange which I had with the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) earlier in reference to quotations from the last election campaign. The Prime Minister is correct that I first raised the issue last Friday in reference to the Toronto Star. In the February 11, 1980, edition of the Toronto Star, the Prime Minister was reported as saying:

> I would want to manage the economy in such a way that interest rates would in fact come down—

Two days later they rose by 2.5 points.

Mr. Lalonde: They have gone down.

Mr. Broadbent: I point out to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) that they have not come down. Two days later, just to indicate that it was not a slip, as reported in the February 13, 1980, edition of The Globe and Mail, the Prime Minister was quoted as saying:

> —we would keep interest rates down and we would make sure that they go lower by controlling inflation.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I accept the quotations of the hon. member. I think that the thrust of the interview—and, of course, I will dig it out—was that there was no direct way in which we could promise low interest rates, but we could take various measures such as having lower energy prices and a sound budgetary policy which would work toward lowering interest rates. In fact we had lower interest rates following that election, as the hon. member will recall. The situation since then on the international sphere has developed, as the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) indicated, where there is a very strong upward pressure on interest rates which has nothing to do with our management of the economy—

Mr. Crosbie: Don't be foolish.

Mr. Trudeau: — but with events developing in other parts of the world.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: So, I think the hon. member has established what I said, that we did not promise lower interest rates.

Mr. Crosbie: Why don't you read the report of the Economic Council of Canada?

Mr. Trudeau: We promised to manage the economy in a manner which would tend to lower the pressure on interest rates. In fact, as the Minister of Finance indicated, we have managed in that way—

An hon. Member: Herb Gray promised to resign.

Mr. Trudeau: —and the proof is that the interest rates in Canada are substantially lower than those of our major trading partner.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker: I cannot see how that intervention can possibly be interpreted as a point of order. In any event, there has been an exchange between the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the hon. member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent) which, I imagine, further enlightened the citizens of Canada.

[English]

MR. CLARK—ALL-PARTY AGREEMENT ON EXPRESSION OF CONDOLENCE TO FAMILY OF THE LATE JOHN LENNON

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, I rise on a new point of order. During oral questions the Right Hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) referred to seeking the agreement of the House of Commons to express its condolence and sadness to the family of the late John Lennon. Our party was consulted on this matter earlier this week by the hon. member for Regina East (Mr. de Jong), and we agreed to support such a motion.

I simply want to indicate now that our House leader would be most pleased to meet with his counterparts to arrange a suitable expression of the sadness of the entire House of Commons at the sudden death and passing of a great and creative world artist.

[Translation]

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, under the circumstances, I would like to be allowed to move the same motion which has already been put and with the unanimous consent of the House I take it for granted that the motion will be presented by the Chair and passed by the House.

Committee Report

Madam Speaker: I suppose the minister is referring to the motion introduced by the hon. member for Regina East (Mr. de Jong) and which had not received the unanimous consent of the House. The motion is therefore as follows:

That this House pay tribute to the outstanding cultural contribution of John Lennon and express its condolences to his wife Yoko Ono and his family and friends.

I must again ask the House whether it gives unanimous consent to the motion of the hon. member for Regina East. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

MISS CARNEY—REPUDIATION OF NEWSPAPER ALLEGATION OF SEPARATIST SENTIMENTS

Miss Pat Carney (Vancouver Centre): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order regarding a statement made about myself in the House, when I was in my riding. On December 1, the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell) rose on a question of privilege and quoted from an article which appeared in the Ottawa Citizen on October 11, 1980. As reported in Hansard at page 5195, the member quoted the article as follows:

A few members of Clark's B.C. caucus have come dangerously close to endorsing separatism . . . Vancouver Centre MP Pat Carney has expressed similar sentiments in the House of Commons, despite pleas from some Tories that she hold her tongue.

My dispute is not with the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway, as he was quoting a newspaper article. The newspaper article regarding myself is in error, as I have never expressed separatism sentiments in the House and no members of my party have ever cautioned me on this topic or any other. I should like to establish for the record the inaccuracy of this statement and the inaccuracies it contains.

Madam Speaker: Since the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Miss Carney) was not in the House at the time when this discussion took place, nor at the time when I ruled on it, she is entitled to make these comments for the record.

HAZARDOUS PRODUCTS RECALL ACT

MEASURE TO PROVIDE CONSUMER PROTECTION

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-622, to establish the Hazardous Products Recall Act.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Madam Speaker, the purpose of my private member's bill is to introduce formally the possibility of a hazardous products recall act. It is my view that we in Canada should have legislation in place which would empower the government to require manufacturers and retailers to remove from their shelves and their showrooms products which are demonstrably dangerous to the consumer. I feel consumers must have protection from obvious hazardous products, be they Corningware coffee pots with handles which come unglued, Pintos with rear gas tanks which explode on impact or, the latest example, Cuisinart food processors where the machine can switch on automatically when the high speed cutting blades are exposed.

It is my view that the Canadian government, in the interests of the fundamental protection of the consumer, should seriously consider a limited form of legislation, but one with teeth, to remove products which even manufacturers occasionally openly admit can be potentially dangerous to the health and lives of Canadians.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

TRANSPORT—SEA FREIGHT SUBSIDIES

Question No. 1,528—Mr. Mazankowski:

1. Does the Minister of Transport intend to take action to resolve the discrepancies in sea freight subsidies between Montreal and Newfoundland and, if so, in what way?

2. Does the minister intend to raise subsidies, make subsidies generally available or eliminate them altogether?

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. Yes, the minister has asked that the matter of a direct shipping subsidy on the freight service between Montreal and Newfoundland be examined and discussed within the federal-provincial committee established to review transportation expenditures in Newfoundland.

2. Any adjustments to this subsidy will depend upon this review and discussion.

TOURISTS—ONTARIO—QUEBEC

Question No. 1,664—Mr. Herbert:

In each of the past five years and for the current year to the end of September, how many tourists entered (a) Quebec (b) Ontario from (i) the United States (ii) other countries and what percentage of all tourists are believed to have spent the most of their stay in the two provinces?

Mr. Ralph Ferguson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State, Small Businesses): In so far as the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce is concerned: Following are the number of visitors to Ontario and Quebec from the U.S. and overseas for the year 1976 to August, 1980 (September figures not available). ACT RESPECTING INTERNATIONAL CONVENTIONS

MEASURE TO AVOID DOUBLE TAXATION

Hon. Pierre Bussières (for the Minister of Finance) moved that Bill S-2, to implement conventions between Canada and Spain, Canada and the Republic of Liberia, Canada and the Republic of Austria, Canada and Italy, Canada and the Republic of Korea, Canada and the Socialist Republic of Roumania and Canada and the Republic of Indonesia and agreements between Canada and Malaysia, Canada and Jamaica and Canada and Barbados and a convention between Canada and the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland for the avoidance of double taxation with respect to income tax, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Bussières (for the Minister of Finance) moved that Bill S-2 be read the third time and do pass.

[English]

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Madam Speaker, I would like to thank my colleagues for letting me for once speak first on third reading.

Mr. Knowles: It gives you unlimited time.

Mr. Rae: I have unlimited time, Madam Speaker, but I can assure you that I do not intend to use it on this occasion. Unfortunately, one only gets the chance to use unlimited time on those occasions when one does not want to use it.

However, I want to indicate to the minister and to the House some of our concerns with respect to these particular treaties and the process which the government is engaged in at the present time. Perhaps as an introduction I can say to the minister that we on this side are concerned about other treaties which we feel should be given equal status and equal importance by the government with respect to relations between Canada and other countries. I am thinking, in particular, of the lack of pension and social security agreements with a number of countries. This causes us a great deal of concern. I know the government has entered into an agreement with the government of Italy. I know that this reciprocal social security arrangement is one which works to the advantage of Italians who have come to Canada, and it works to the advantage of Canadian citizens who have returned to their native country.

I can repeat to the minister and the government that it is a subject which gives us tremendous concern. It causes great hardship to Canadian citizens and to landed immigrants from many other countries. I know from discussions I have had with ministers of the government of Greece, when I was in Greece in September, that the question of a social security treaty between the government of Greece and the Government of Canada is a matter of great importance to the government of Greece. It has taken them some effort to finally get the Government of Canada to recognize that this is a legitimate claim. I add that if it is a legitimate claim for the government of Greece then it is of legitimate concern for the government of the United Kingdom and many other countries where travel between us is such a way of life. It is so important, particularly for senior citizens who are coming to Canada to join their families, to transfer their payments readily and to receive the same kind of security and the same type of dignity which we want extended to all our citizens. Concerns and hardships are created by many people having to wait ten years in Canada until, in many cases, they reach the age of 75 or even 80 before they are eligible for a Canadian pension. This is a concern which causes a great deal of hardship to senior citizens who were not born in Canada.

I say to the minister that this is a subject which we regard with the same importance as the signing of tax treaties. I am well aware that the pressure to sign tax treaties comes, as it does, from our largest multinational corporations and it is one that the Liberal government is so ready to listen to. Those louder voices receive greater priority at the cabinet table than the voices on behalf of pensions and social security.

● (1220)

As I have said in private conversations, in correspondence with the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin), on many occasions in question period, and through a motion under Standing Order 43, we regard the signing of social security treaties as a matter of great importance and, indeed, of greater immediate urgency than some of the tax treaties which have been put before us. Bill S-2 contains a number of treaties with a number of countries—Austria, Barbados, Indonesia, Italy, Jamaica, Malaysia, Roumania, South Korea, Spain, and the United Kingdom.

The alleged purpose of these tax treaties is to avoid double taxation and to ensure that companies and private individuals—although we are dealing here mainly with corporate taxation—who have business arrangements in these countries will not be taxed twice for the same income, that is, they will not be taxed once in the foreign country and once in Canada. If that were the only question raised by these treaties, one could hardly object to them, but unfortunately the problem of tax treaties, international corporate taxes, and the avoidance of these taxes is a subject which is a little more complex than these treaties would lead one to believe.

The one-dimensional presentation which is frequently given to this type of legislation is, "It is good for the corporation and it is good for Canada, and what is good for the corporation is good for Canada, and what is good for the corporation and good for Canada is good for the world." This is the sort of argument that has been put forward.

I would like to raise some questions concerning the impact of these treaties. Some of the answers which we received in committee, where we spent some time considering these matters—and I am glad that we spent that time because I am sure we were all educated to some extent by the hon. member for Willowdale (Mr. Peterson), the hon. member for York-Peel (Mr. Stevens), the minister and the officials in the minister's department—did not satisfactorily deal with the main problem. The two aspects which I would like the minister to consider will have a long-term impact.

Many of the countries with which we have signed treaties are countries with which we are in direct competition. We are in direct competition with these countries in a double sense. In many of these countries manufacturing is beginning to take off and, as a result, has become an important source of competition to Canadian manufacturers. For example, in South Korea many North American companies are now establishing branch plant operations because of the fact this is more profitable to them. Of course, these companies are now in direct competition with companies in Canada. This should be a source of concern.

Another source of concern is the fact that many of these countries are countries with which we directly compete in resources. I am thinking in particular of the government of Indonesia, and in some ways of the government of Liberia, which the government has agreed to drop from the list of treaties. But if one looks, for example, at a global corporation like Inco and considers its relationship to Canada, and the fact that it is now engaged in extensive activity in Indonesia, one must recognize that these global corporations are able to play off countries such as Canada and Indonesia and compare the relative tax rates in each country and the fact that we have now entered into tax treaties with these countries. This allows these corporations to deduct from Canadian taxes any taxes payable in Indonesia and, furthermore, it allows them to deduct taxes which are deemed payable. That is the central problem with which we must deal.

As was pointed out very clearly in committee, what has happened with respect to these treaties is that a number of countries, and Canada is among them in terms of some of the tax write-offs which we have allowed here, have very generous tax arrangements with respect to foreign investment. The treaties allow not only deduction of the tax which has actually been paid in foreign countries from Canadian taxation—in other words, it is a form of tax credit for taxes payable in Canada—but it also provides that the tax which should have been paid, but was not paid because of a tax haven arrangement, will have been deemed to have been paid for the purposes of Canadian taxation.

When a global corporation is allowed to play off governments such as the Government of Canada against the government of Indonesia, or the Government of Canada against the government of South Korea with respect to, let us say, electronic investment, it raises some extremely important questions. They are not questions which say that international trade is good or that anything which makes it convenient is good, because the situation is a little more complex.

What we are looking at is the way in which a global corporation can so reduce its effective level and rate of tax in each home country as to be able in a sense to pass on those additional costs, for example, the revenue not paid to the Canadian government, to the average Canadian taxpayer. In committee I referred to several American studies which show that the foreign tax credit has worked to give exactly that effect. The foreign tax credit has effectively reduced the level of taxation which is paid by these global corporations.

A number of studies conducted in the United States have attempted to give an estimate of the precise amount of money lost as the result of these play-offs. When I posed the question in committee to a very able public servant about whether there had been any studies conducted in Canada to compare the effective rate of taxes in countries with which we are signing tax treaties and to determine whether the effective rate of taxation in Canada was reduced as a result of these tax treaties by these global corporations, this public servant, who was the chief witness before the committee, indicated that the Department of Finance did not have that information available and that, while he would like to do those kinds of studies and agreed they would be a good idea, there was no data available with which to conduct such studies. If this is the case, I suggest that we are entering into a number of tax treaties in response to pressure from certain groups and corporations and, indeed, certain governments.

I recognize that there are a number of developing countries which would desperately want this kind of investment, but I believe that we, as Canadians, must be a little bit concerned.

Mr. Peterson: Oh, no.

Mr. Rae: I will come to the expressed views of the hon. member for Willowdale, which he is expounding in his usual constructive way in a moment. We must be concerned in Canada about the effective level of corporate taxation because we need to know how the reduction of the over-all taxes paid by a corporation affects the taxes that are paid by everybody else. The hon. member for Willowdale has said that these countries need investment.

We cannot be imperialistic, and we cannot impose our standards on other countries. The government also has to consider the question of equity among Canadians. All governments in the world have to find a way that goes well beyond these tax treaties of dealing with the power and ability of multinational corporations to make their decisions on the basis of the best tax arrangements possible, and of getting governments to sign tax treaties which work entirely to their advantage.

● (1230)

One could give any number of examples of this. I mentioned Inco. An example which is frequently brought up in committee is that of the Moore Corporation which produces business forms and office equipment. It is the twenty-first largest corporation, by sales, in Canada, has over 28,000 employees, and operates 132 manufacturing facilities in 37 countries. It has subsidiaries in three countries with which we have signed tax treaties, Jamaica, Barbados, and Malaysia. Its 1979 annual report shows that its effective level of taxation is now at a ten-year low. The government must ask itself whether it is in the interest of Canadians to allow this level to continue to decrease. There are other questions as well, such as where some of the Moore Corporation subsidiaries are located.

It seems to me that we have to deal with this whole matter in a way that is not destructive and that does not decree there shall be no international trade or treaties with other countries. We must analyse and understand the impact of these treaties on Canadian jobs and taxation, however.

The hon. member for York-Peel brought up the fact that one of the main companies in Barbados is now the Cooper Corporation, which produces hockey equipment. We are now entering into a tax treaty with Barbados, a country which has particularly generous tax arrangements respecting foreign investment. This generosity will encourage Cooper Corporation to expand its activities there, so we must ask if that means it will not expand its activities in Canada.

I do not raise these questions because I think there are easy answers to them, but because I do not think they can be brushed aside. I do not think it is enough to engage in this kind of international "boosterism" and claim that anything that encourages global corporate trade is good and anything that encourages corporate investment in Third World countries is also a good thing.

To put it another way, I do not think that allowing corporations to play off workers in Canada against workers in Barbados, to play off the Government of Canada against the government of Barbados, the Government of Canada against the government of Spain, or the government of Ontario against the government of Quebec, is very healthy. Unfortunately, however, that is the world we live in. That is why we have these tax treaties, but let us not be under any illusion about the forces to which we are responding.

The other main principle contained in these tax treaties is that they will allow Canadian corporations that invest abroad to bring back dividends—to bring back payments to Canada on which they will not have to pay tax. This is what is called the "exempt surplus". With regard to this payment of dividends, the tax treaties effectively do two things. First of all, they reduce the withholding tax paid to the other country on the dividends leaving that country. For example, when Cooper wants to pull out some dividends from Barbados or Inco wants to pull out some dividends from Indonesia, the governments of Barbados and Indonesia will deduct less withholding tax. That does not work to their advantage, of course, and as far as I can tell there will not be much investment by Barbados or Indonesia in Canada. It is something that works to the advantage of Canadian-based corporations.

The other thing is that it allows these corporations to bring back all this surplus to Canada without tax. I know the arguments that were made so well in committee by the hon. member for Willowdale, who was defending these treaties. He pointed out to the committee what a good thing they are for the international economy, for Canada, and for the corporations concerned. But, Mr. Speaker, the equity problem raised by allowing large sums of what is in effect income to be returned to Canada, on which Canadian corporations will pay no tax, must also be considered.

I know it is claimed that if those dividends are given back to individual Canadian citizens in the form of dividends, then there is a dividend tax credit, a mark-up, and so on. There is an element of taxation there, of course. I would point out to the hon. member, however, that we all know that the dividend tax credit is now generally regarded by people who have studied it as giving an unfair advantage to dividend holders as opposed to average taxpayers. It is not a particularly equitable tax.

The real problem is that from the standpoint of equity between Canadian taxpayers, money that is income and is not being taxed at the corporate level, on which the government receives no revenue, has the unfortunate effect of increasing the load of taxation on the average citizen.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I must say that the government has, in a sense, got its priorities wrong. I am glad the Minister of National Health and Welfare is in the House. I will not repeat my entire opening remarks, but I should like to indicate to her that this party encourages the efforts which she and her department are making with respect to social security treaties with other countries. They are of great concern to us and we would like to see them given a priority as high as those tax treaties that work to the advantage of corporations. I know she has made some progress and that negotiations are under way. We follow those negotiations with interest, and support the efforts to have the treaties signed as quickly as possible.

Miss Bégin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order, since my name was invoked in these financial discussions. On Monday in Toronto we will sign another treaty of reciprocity of all social programs with Portugal.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rae: Mr. Speaker, I say bravo to the minister. I began my speech by indicating that this was a subject of great concern.

Mr. Peterson: It was because of your intervention that she did it!

Mr. Rae: Mr. Speaker, not even I would go so far as to claim that. I would say to the minister, however, that these treaties with countries with which we have such close relationships, and so much travel, and whose people come to live in Canada, are of great concern to all members of this party. I congratulate the minister on her success and look forward to further efforts with respect to other countries with which we have these agreements. They should be given the highest priority. I was not aware of the signing of the treaty on Monday, perhaps because I was not invited to it. I am sure that is something that can be arranged, however.

Mr. Blais: Send your pin.

Mr. Rae: I was invited to the other one, and that is why I was not aware of this one.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the government is entering into these tax treaties without being fully aware of the impact they will have on domestic taxation in Canada, and without being fully aware of the equity problems created by allowing corporations to play one country off against another. There have been a number of American studies which indicate the way in which this has been done and which show the impact the global corporation is having on the domestic American market. It seems to me that we desperately need to have those same kinds of studies done here in Canada. Simply to engage in the signing of tax treaties without being aware of the domestic impact is engaging in what I call a kind of economic boosterism which says that a treaty is good because it aids trade, and it is good if it helps the corporation, and if it helps the corporation it helps a Third World country, and if it helps a Third World country it helps us, and so on. It is slightly one dimensional. It does not deal with a number of problems which are created by our engaging in treaties in this way.

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State, Finance): Mr. Speaker, at the outset of my remarks I would like to comment briefly on the conclusion drawn by the member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae). It is quite obvious that although these conventions are aimed at avoiding double taxation they will certainly contribute to complicate still more the taxation jungle which is already inextricable at times. Still I hardly think that such difficulties should prevent us from using that tool which benefits all Canadians, while keeping in mind the appeal made by the hon. member in committee and repeated here to the effect that the government should undertake a serious consideration of the consequences of such conventions on Canadian taxation, on Canadian business and on employment in Canada.

Mr. Speaker, we are now resuming discussion on third reading of Bill S-2 to implement conventions whose purpose is to avoid double taxation, a treaty which we have signed with several countries. It rests with Parliament to legalize those agreements between Canada and about ten other countries which had agreed or requested to negotiate such conventions.

Some might wonder what is the purpose of these treaties and why we have to sign conventions to avoid double taxation. I believe we should perhaps begin by describing the phenomenon of double taxation. This phenomenon of legal double taxation at the international level can be defined generally as resulting from the collection of a comparable tax in two or more states, from the same taxpayer, on the same taxable item and for the same time period. The unfavourable effects of such a phenomenon on the development of goods and services, exchanges and the movement of capital and individuals are well known, too much so for me to have to underline the importance of eliminating the obstacles laid by double taxation to the development of economic and commercial relationships between countries.

It is vital that bilateral agreements between countries clarify, unify and guarantee as much as possible the taxation position of taxpayers in countries where residents have commercial, industrial or financial activities in several countries. In signing these agreements, the Canadian government has tried to make this clarification and establish these solid and unified foundations, and the House is now called upon to ratify these conventions.

I have just described the general advantages of these treaties. I would now like to say a few words about the special benefits of such agreements for Canada. Many Canadian individuals and corporations do business in other countries and have to compete in these countries with companies from other countries. For instance, a Canadian subsidiary can do business in Austria in competition with a French, German or Italian company. If Austria has a double taxation avoidance treaty with France but not with Canada, the Canadian company will be badly off compared with its French competitor. This is an important aspect of these agreements to avoid double taxation, in the sense that they allow Canadians to compete on an equal footing with other countries which do business abroad.

[English]

Most other developed countries have a substantial network of tax treaties which often provide for substantial reductions in the rates of withholding tax, and which establish conditions under which taxes would be levied. For a Canadian entrepreneur to be able to win foreign contracts, he has to make a bid which is as low as the foreign competitors' and the taxes he would have to pay could be an important element. That is why Canada has sought to obtain as good a deal in its tax treaties with other countries as foreign competitors, and no more.

[Translation]

It will be noted that some conventions are the result of first time negotiations while others are the product of renegotiated treaties. It must be understood, Mr. Speaker, that these treaties cover fiscal or tax systems applicable in the countries that are party to the treaty or convention. Hon. members will remember that in 1972 Canada undertook a major review of its income tax legislation which, by way of consequence, required also the review and often the renegotiation of certain existing conventions.

It has been mentioned in committee that such double taxation agreements could become loopholes and a pretext to tax evasion. The hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood has indeed raised that possibility a few moments ago. I want to make it abundantly clear that it is not in a particular convention that tax loopholes or tax evasion potential are to be found when a commercial or financial institution covered by the convention is guilty of such tax evasion. The faults or weaknesses that make such evasion possible are most often found in the Income Tax Act and it is therefore this act that should be corrected. It has been clearly demonstrated in Canada that our Income Tax Act is impervious to these conventions.

Mr. Speaker, in closing I should like to indicate that consideration of the bill in committee led the government to cut out temporarily the convention with one country. When the bill was referred to committee, it contained 11 conventions which have now been reduced to 10. In view of the objections expressed in committee and the urgency of getting the House to pass the bill giving effect to those conventions, the government agreed to withdraw temporarily the convention with Liberia. During that time, the government will look at the text of the convention very carefully again, and discuss it once more with the other party to it, and if need be, will reintroduce it when a new bill is brought in to implement other conventions for the avoidance of double taxation.

I want hon. members of the House to know that the Liberian government expresses disappointment about this turn of events. It has reiterated its wish and will to see this bilateral convention ratified as soon as possible. The Canadian government is also of the opinion that it is justified but it wants to make sure that the details of the convention meet the requirements of the Canadian people and their parliamentarians. Mr. Speaker, it is in that spirit that we worked in committee. I should like to take this opportunity to thank the members of the committee for their excellent performance on the occasion of the study of this bill in committee and thank all hon. members in the House for allowing us to pass it this afternoon.

● (1250)

[English]

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, this piece of legislation is not greatly contentious. It is not one we are going to vote against. In addition, the minister was quite reasonable and very co-operative, in his usual way. The Minister of State for Finance (Mr. Bussières) is co-operative and diligent. I cannot say the same of the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen). I do not want to imply that the Minister of Finance is not diligent. I am just not going to say that about him. The assistant minister of finance has been quite diligent and co-operative in committee.

My colleague, the hon. member for York-Peel (Mr. Stevens) is not here today and neither is the hon. member for Mississauga, both of whom have been active in this matter. The minister has agreed to delete the treaty with regard to Liberia because of some of their concerns. We appreciate that kind of treatment. That is why we are not going to speak on this bill longer than several days, or at least until this afternoon.

There are other important tax treaties. Perhaps whoever closes the debate on the government side can bring us up to date. These are not unimportant, of course—the United Kingdom, Jamaica, Barbados and the like. Jamaica, by the way, is an interesting one. Since this discussion started there has been a change of prime ministers in Jamaica. There has been some suggestion that we have the last prime minister, Mr. Manley, come to Canada for a scholarship or something like that from some government agency. That will be gone into at another time.

There are some very important treaties negotiated with countries like that, as well as Indonesia and Spain. The one in particular I would like to hear about, from some authority on the other side, is the treaty recently negotiated with the United States. That great coup was finally achieved while I was still a minister, although under heavy pressure during the election campaign last January. That is quite an important treaty, particularly with reference to its effect on the transfer of income from the oil and gas industry to the United States and the effect of taxes on profits in that connection. I presume that is now all signed and concluded and the government will be bringing it forward in short order.

Since this is a treaty to deal with international taxation and the effects on Canada, and taxation in other countries and citizens from other countries, we are dealing here with international finance. I want to spend three or four minutes on an aspect in international finance which the Minister of Finance referred to today. Today in his remarks in the House the minister suggested, with respect to interest rates, which is a matter of international finance, that these questions were not within the power or capacity of the Government of Canada to deal with. He said this government was handcuffed, totally under the control of economic conditions and what happens to interest rates in the United States. He said in this respect Canada is completely powerless, it does not matter what government we have, what will or desire that government has, or what policy it introduces. He said he can do nought about interest rates in Canada, that they must simply follow those in the United States.

Let me point out to the House that the day before yesterday the minister made an exactly contrary point in the House. He said that Canada has little control over interest rates, but thanks to steps taken by the Governor of the Bank of Canada, Canadian rates are not locked to U.S. rates. He praised the government's policy. He said it was successful. He stated that interest rates in Canada are 3 per cent or 4 per cent less than in the United States.

That was the minister's story two days ago. He then looked around in his usual humble way for a kind word or glance from members over here because he had kept interest rates 3 per cent or 4 per cent lower than in the United States. Today he got up in the House and said he had no control over interest rates, that he cannot do anything, that he is powerless that they went up yesterday 1.38 per cent. He said he could do nothing about it.

The minister cannot be right on both occasions. We know that he has tremendous flexibility. He is the most flexible of the Liberals. To be the most flexible of the Liberals is the same as being a boa constrictor greased with vaseline. You are really flexible if you are the most flexible of the Liberals. He cannot have it both ways. If the government can keep Canadian interest rates lower than U.S. interest rates, obviously it could have acted yesterday to keep rates from going up, if that were the policy the government wanted to adopt. There is free will in this area.

What prevents Canada from having the rational possibility of many other choices is the lack of policies of the government over the last 12 years. That is what makes it difficult. There are alternatives, but they do not include wage and price controls. Our flexible Minister of Finance cannot stand up in the House one day, say how, through his efforts and those of Mr. Bouey, our rates are being kept behind U.S. interest rates by 3 per cent and then, a day later, look across the House and ask for sympathy. He will get no sympathy from us. A year ago he acted to get himself back into power. Now that he is there, he does not know what to do. He looks around beseeching the House to grant him a dispensation of mercy.

The minister now wants us to ignore advice that he and the government's financial critic gave last year. Here is what the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray) said last year when he was finance critic. By the way, a portion of his leg is damaged. He is not with us any longer. He has been gone during these trying days. We hope he will get better soon and that the next time he breaks something, it is more important.

He said on March 10 last that he was pleased with the new floating rate approach to interest policy of the Bank of Canada. He was pleased with the new floating rate policy. What was he so pleased about? Is the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce still pleased today with the new floating rate approach? It is not a floating rate, it is a flooding rate. It is too bad he is not here to tell us that.

What happened to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) who, on November 13 last year, page 1251 of Hansard, said the PC government seemed to have "adopted Mr. Volcher's economic Malthusianism approach in the United States". What approach is being adopted now? Mr. Volcher is still in charge of the Federal Reserve Bank in the United States.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please.

Mr. Crosbie: May I call it one o'clock?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): It being one o'clock the House stands adjourned until 2 p.m.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

• (1400)

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. When the House rose at one o'clock the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) had the floor.

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, I want to conclude my remarks by giving a piece of advice to the Minister of Finance, and it is that he stop being the Uriah Heep of western finance ministers and that he stop getting up in this House, wringing his hands, alleging he has no power or control over Canadian interest rates, bank rates, the Canadian dollar, or Canadian economic policy generally. A year ago he tricked and connived his way back into power and it ill behooves him today to try to blame everything that is happening on United States policy. He has the authority in his hands. He can do it if he wants to exercise that authority. He needs to bring in a new budget and put behind him this cop-out which he brought in on October 28.

It is the worst budget since Herbert Hoover. It is the Boulder Dam of balderdash in the financial world. This document he brought in was dictated by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, the sinister Svengali, the Rasputin of the government, who is controlling everything. I commend to the Minister of Finance his companion, the Minister of State for Finance. The Minister of Finance should take notice that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is depending on that gentleman to answer all his questions for him in the economic area. If I were the Minister of Finance I would feel a cold shiver going up my spine at the sight of the Prime Minister so heavily dependent on the Minister of State for Finance. I think this augurs great things for the Minister of State for Finance, and the Minister of Finance might well watch his own back during the next few months.

We have an agreement here. We do not want to hold this up; it has been held up for something like ten years. Now the Liberians are being cast aside for another period of one or two years. I will sit down so my companion from Vancouver Quadra can bring to bear his share of intelligence on this bill.

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): I want to thank my colleague, the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie), for that introductory remark. Mr. Speaker, my colleague is quite right about the length of time the debate has been going on. I suppose one of the reasons it takes so long to consider matters like this is that everybody thinks taxation is confusing, and it is, to a lot of people. When you get to a tax convention, that makes it all the more confusing.

• (1410)

Let us take a look at the history of conventions. The basic purpose of tax conventions was to eliminate the problem of double taxation for individuals who might live in one country and earn income in another. They might thereby become subject to regular taxation in the country where they earn their income, and then if they lived in a country like Canada where world income is taxed, they would be faced with another burden of income tax on those earnings. So the original conventions were designed simply with that in mind.

I do not even know how long ago it was, but it was many decades ago that we had our first convention. There are now, significantly, 24 conventions in force with various countries, and another 13 that have been signed but are not yet in force. A number of those are covered by Bill S-2. There are a further 31 which will be renegotiated. Each of these agreements or conventions has had to be renegotiated, revamped, or at least restudied in connection with the revision to the income tax law which took place here in Canada in 1971.

One of the requirements for other countries which will have a treaty with Canada is that they must have a similar taxation system. I will say a word about that later on when we look at the various countries with which we have treaties. We are having some problems with countries which may not have system taxation similar to ours, and it may be undesirable for Canada to have treaties with countries that are considered tax havens, yet I think I may show that Canada may be considered a tax haven in some areas.

The purpose of the present bill is, as I said, because of the 1971 tax review, to expand the policy and to have more tax treaties than we had in the past. This bill, of course, is quite similar to the one which was introduced by the previous government as Bill S-4, but which never passed the House. In addition to the nine countries in the other bill, we now have Barbados and the United Kingdom included. The treaties will limit the tax rate on income transfers between the countries, that is, the withholding tax, so that individuals and corporations will not have the burden of double taxation upon them. Significantly, I think, the treaties will also deal with methods of amending those treaties in the future so that, when there are changes within a country, the kind of exercise that we are going through here today will not necessarily be required.

It was expected, when we had our tax reform in 1971, that we could have all the new tax treaties in place by 1976. Well, we know now, four years later, that we still have 11 tax treaties to ratify in this bill and another 31 under negotiation. It has certainly taken a lot longer than was expected. We have already renegotiated treaties with France, Switzerland and Belgium. We are also considering Morocco. Liberia and Roumania are being dealt with. The United States, one of major trading partners, is missing from the list today, although we are now considering Great Britain, New Zealand and Austria.

In some of these agreements which are being negotiated, the one with Germany, for instance, Canada is actually on the receiving side from the point of view of being seen as a tax haven. Although in 1976 we did reach an agreement with West Germany, the West Germans had their tax reform in 1977 and our treaty was not ratified. There are a few problems still at the bargaining table.

The problem is that the Canadian tax system is seen by the Germans as offering unfair advantages to some German taxpayers. As an example, there is mortgage interest earned in Canada by Germans. While it is subject to a 15 per cent withholding tax here in Canada, it is subject to no further tax in West Germany. Similar concessions are available on rental income from real estate. There is a tremendous amount of money being invested from West Germany in Canada in the way of exploration for minerals in Canada, because there is a particular advantage to German investors when they invest in mineral exploration in Canada. In fact, I suspect it is another one of the cases where foreigners are actually given a better tax treatment in Canada than are Canadians.

The old treaty with Germany allows Canada to tax capital gains on immovable property such as land but not on other property, so that a West German resident can hold real estate through a corporation and escape Canadian tax on gains realized from the sale of shares of the corporation. Compare that with a Canadian resident holding a substantial interest in a similar corporation in West Germany where he may be taxed by that country. I think it is important that this treaty with Germany which had its origins in 1956, be ratified, but I think there might be some trade-offs.

I am sometimes concerned with the policies of other countries on apparently unrelated issues when we are renegotiating a tax treaty. In the case of West Germany, I refer particularly to the extradition provisions which they have for German-born naturalized Canadian citizens. I had a personal involvement in a case where the German authorities had convinced the authorities in the United States to arrest a Canadian citizen in the U.S. on some outstanding complaint that the West Germans had against this Canadian. You might say, okay, he should have been brought to justice. The fact was that Canada was powerless because this man was being held in the U.S. at the request of West Germany.

It was the United States authorities, without any help from Canadian authorities, who decided that the claim that Germany had on this Canadian national was not valid. They released the Canadian citizen who then returned to his country. When he returned to Canada, he found that he might be in jeopardy again because the treaty which Canada had with West Germany could make him subject to arrest, seizure, and extradition to West Germany. All right, we have extradition treaties with other countries, so why not with that one? The fact is that as part of that treaty and part of the German national law, no German national can be extradited by any other country if he is in Germany. Canadians do not offer the same protection to Canadian citizens at this time.

I am happy to say that this particular individual has not been arrested and extradited and, at the moment, he is safe, but he thinks he should have the protection of his own country. Perhaps when his adopted country, of which he is a citizen, is negotiating with his old country, a balance should be achieved to ensure that nationals of each country are treated equally.

Earlier I mentioned the similarities in the tax systems of the various countries with which we are dealing. One of the countries on the list is Roumania. Roumania has been in the news a lot lately because some of its athletes are very good. It is a communist state, and its citizens are not free to come and go as they wish. Some of them have defected when they have been absent from Roumania on athletic missions. How much do we really know about the tax system of Roumania? Should we associate ourselves in tax treaties with countries such as Roumania when we do not have sufficient knowledge of the workings of their tax systems, although we know a certain amount about their political systems? I think there is room for more study to see whether this is desirable and is the kind of thing we should continue.

Canada appears to be a tax haven for Germans. Canada must be careful about tax treaties with tax havens. It is fairly easy these days to shift large amounts of cash out of Canada into a tax haven from where it can be reinvested, perhaps even back in Canada, and be subjected to a much lower rate of tax even though it is falling into the hands and control of a Canadian resident. This is not the kind of situation which legislators have in mind, but I am afraid it could slip through the system in proposals such as the one before us.

Tax havens are not the only gimmick available to tax planners. For example, the present treaty with New Zealand appears to allow Canadian taxpayers to finance, in large measure, the merchant shipping fleet of New Zealand. One might ask what the tax treaty has to do with that? The existing tax rules have allowed large amounts of money, some $50 million, to be raised in Canada for the Shipping Corporation of New Zealand, Limited. In any event, that money has been used to increase the merchant shipping fleet of that country. Would it not be nice if Canadian taxpayers, investing that amount of money and losing tax on that amount of money, could receive some of the benefit flowing from it to establish a merchant shipping fleet in Canada?

Ever since I came to the House of Commons, there has been much talk about Canada's merchant shipping fleet; how great it would be for Canada to have one and is it not an awful thing that Canada relies on foreign bottoms instead of its own merchant shipping fleet? Yet this tax treaty allows a gimmicky arrangement which sees Canadian taxpayers largely funding the fleet of another country.

I suppose one of the most notorious shipping fleets in the world is the Liberian one. The Liberian flag is always seen as a flag of convenience. If one spots the dirtiest ship in the harbour of Vancouver it is bound to have the Liberian flag and be based in Monrovia. One might say that that is their industry; but I am pleased to say that through the pressures of the official opposition in committee, particularly of the hon. member for York-Peel (Mr. Stevens), the government has agreed to eliminate Liberia from this bill. Before the government considers entering into treaties with countries such as Liberia and other countries carrying on activities of which we would not approve, I hope we will be able to have a close look at them.

Another country on the list is Korea. We do a lot of trade with Korea. A friendship society is being established with Korea, yet there are many differences between Canada and Korea. For example, through the sale of Candu reactors by Atomic Energy of Canada to that country, we know that enormous commissions were paid to non-nationals of Canada and non-nationals of Korea. The explanation given to Parliament, when it was called upon to investigate the situation, was that they do things differently over there. Certainly they do things differently.

I have visited Korea. Its people are very industrious. The people of Korea have done a fantastic job building up the economy through hard work and their different habits. But we must look at its political system as well. Not so long ago the House passed a motion dealing with the sentencing to death of the Korean leader of the opposition, Kim Dae-jung. Mr. Dae-jung is still under sentence of death and his limits, as far as appeals are concerned, are running out. He may be subject to the mercy of President Park Chung Hee before too many days have gone by.

I do not suppose anyone looking at the treaty with Korea and its tax aspects is very concerned about Mr. Dae-jung, but I do not think he is guilty of anything more serious than what the Right Hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) might have been guilty of when he was leader of the opposition, or of what the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) might have been guilty.

There are basic differences in some of these countries. I do not think we are covering any European countries today, but tax evasion is a great sport in Europe. It is not seen as a criminal offence; one can be quite proud if one manages to evade taxes in some European countries. We should be concerned about those things when entering into agreements with these various countries.

Also I must recognize that Bill S-2 has been passed by the Senate. It has received second reading in the House, approval in principle, and the committee has examined it in some detail. Now it is back for third reading, and perhaps this is not the time to make changes. But I appeal to the government and members of the House to ensure, when we negotiate sensitive agreements with countries about which we might wish to know more, that we take a little more care and that the countries have many similarities to our country so that treaties will work in the way expected and in the way they have worked with the United Kingdom, and with the United States, our major trading partner and neighbour to the south.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, I should like to begin my remarks concerning Bill S-2 by complimenting the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) for the very deft manner in which he was able to piggyback a discussion of Canada's monetary policy on to the back of a bill dealing with international tax treaties.

Because the member raised these points, I feel I am quite entitled to deal with them. He attempted to throw stones and bricks at us. They were not bricks and stones, nor pebbles and sand. He was throwing confetti at our monetary policy. I say that because he did not once offer any concrete alternatives to the policies pursued by this government. He might have implied it, but he did not say that we should peg the value of the dollar. He would not say that we should peg the value of the dollar because he knew very well that if we were to peg the value of the dollar it would drive up inflation, it would hurt those people in Canada who must import food and fuel this winter. It would hurt those people in St. John's West and those people in Willowdale who are on fixed incomes. He did not have the courage to say what the alternatives were.

● (1430)

I will give the member for St. John's West credit because he, at least, has risen from his pew to object to the marriage which has been arranged in our country between world economic realities and the Canadian economic realities. But I certainly cannot give him any credit for any more than his weak, plaintive voice. He rose from his pew to criticize this marriage, but it was not the voice of a Lochinvar who was proposing alternatives, it was the voice of a plaintive suitor who had lost out. It was the voice of a suitor who realizes that had he been more understanding, more compassionate, and more realistic a year ago toward the Canadian people, it would be he who was the bridegroom.

I would also like to compliment the hon. member for St. John's West on his comments dealing with the Canada-U.S. treaty. This is a treaty which has been in the making for eight years, and for whatever role he played during his sojourn in government in advancing those discussions, which have now been completed, we compliment him. I also applaud the tremendous work of our own officials. This treaty melds two very diverse and complex tax systems.

I would like to make a few remarks about the myopic, Alice-in-Wonderland view of the world which was expressed by the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae). The hon. member in his remarks again indicated a knee-jerk reaction to business. He seems to think that if it is business it must be suspect, and if it involves international business, shame on it! The hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood is a very intelligent person. We know that he is a lawyer, he is a disciple of Dennis Healey, but just because he joined a socialist party which does not have the courage to call itself by that name—they have gone through a number of name changes and they do not have the courage to put that in their title—it does not mean he must check his intelligence with the Sergeant-at-Arms at the door of this chamber when he enters it.

I would like to refer very briefly to a few of the points he made in his remarks. Number one, he criticized these treaties on the basis that a multinational corporation can use them to reduce taxes by avoiding double international taxation. This is through the foreign tax credit mechanism. I would like to explain it in this way. The foreign tax credit mechanism works so that if a company operating in a foreign jurisdiction pays taxes there, then Canada says it will not tax those profits, it will give a credit for the foreign taxes which have actually been paid. This is the approach of recognizing that the primary taxing jurisdiction must go to the foreign jurisdiction.

I do not know what is the hon. member's suggested alternative. Is it that we should again tax these profits, for example, $100 of profits which have been taxed at 50 per cent abroad, and tax them again, imposing another 50 per cent of tax, thus taxing away all the profits? If this is his alternative, let us discuss it. The approach of recognizing the primary taxing jurisdiction of a foreign country is the proper one. This is the one which is exemplified in these tax treaties.

The second point he made was that these tax credits will enable Canadian multinational corporations to do business abroad, which means they will be exporting jobs from Canada. This, to me, is a narrow view of world economic realities. What makes him think that a Canadian company can manufacture everything in our jurisdiction here, within our own borders, and export it to every country in the world? It is the NDP, of which he is a member, which has spoken most vehemently against the role of multinationals in Canada and what they are doing here. Is he saying, on the one hand, that multinationals in Canada must come here, create more jobs, do more research and development, employ more people and train more people in our country? Then, on the other hand, is he telling us that we must stop our companies from going abroad and meeting these legitimate development needs of other countries in the world? Establishing some subsidiaries in foreign jurisdictions is often the only way we can compete in those markets. We are subject to the competitive forces. We are doing a job there.

The hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood said he also objects to the inequity which arises when dividends can come back to Canadian companies from abroad on a tax-free basis. He says it is not fair. He says it is not fair that foreign income should not be subject to taxes when it comes back here. I do not know on what he is basing his standard of equity. I am sure he realizes that dividends flow tax-free between two domestic Canadian corporations. Is he saying we should discriminate against the company which goes abroad? I do not think he is saying that, but he seems to be raising this objection. So his equity argument is one which I cannot understand.

The last point I want to comment on—and he raised a number of them—is one which bothers me very considerably. It is one which arose from his remarks when he said he objects to these treaties because they permit the deductions for foreign taxes notionally payable in developing countries. This is a concept which is referred to in tax jargon as "tax sparing". What it means is simply this. Foreign developing countries have needs for capital infusion for know-how, development, and industrialization. These are priorities which they set out on their own. Every developing country in the world has development objectives, to industrialize and to create jobs to make their economies less dependent on the vicissitudes of world trade and world fortune, to give their people a stake in their economies to develop. The way they do this is to offer limited tax holidays. They say, "If you come in and establish an industry which will employ people, create new jobs here, give us know-how, train our people and bring them up to western standards, then we will grant you a tax holiday of up to five, or sometimes ten years." These are development objectives. This is the way they do it in the developing countries.

The hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood has objected to us giving a tax break when those dividends come back from those companies dealing in these developing countries. The alternative, if we are to tax the income which comes back to Canada from these new and necessary development projects, would be to wipe out and negative every development objective which is being offered by a host country. It would amount to the transfer of tax revenues from the foreign jurisdiction into Canadian coffers. This would be economic imperialism at its worst. This is the naiveté which was expressed by the hon. member opposite.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, these tax treaties are part of a regime of taxation which recognizes the reciprocal advantages that two countries sitting down together can work out to their mutual benefit from the sharing of tax revenues where business cuts across international borders.

Canada is at the heart of international business, and international trade is part of Canada's lifeblood, even more so than any other country in the western industrialized world. We need to get on with these tax treaties. We need to have more of them. I compliment the minister on what he has achieved, and I ask the co-operation of the House in concluding many more such treaties.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I shall take only a moment or two at the third reading stage of this bill. First, I should like to join with the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae) in expressing the hope that we will soon see an increase in the number of reciprocal agreements in the pension field, along with these reciprocal tax treaties. I am glad that the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) was able to announce today that another one is about to be signed, namely, with Portugal. I know she is working on agreements with other countries such as Belgium, the United Kingdom, France, Germany and perhaps others. I realize that concluding these agreements requires some give and take on both sides, so we cannot always blame the government because it does not get an agreement with another country. These matters are very important to many persons living in Canada, and I hope that she will stay with it.

● (1440)

At the same time, I would like to impress upon the Minister of State for Finance (Mr. Bussières), the urgency of continuing the tax treaty negotiations with West Germany. When this bill was at second reading we had a bit to say about it, and the minister agreed with our contention that something should be done and that the blame should not all be put on West Germany. I am interested in this matter because the tax arrangements between these two countries also have a bearing on the pensions and the pension income of many former German citizens living in Canada.

In view of what the minister said at second reading, I was hoping that by the time we got to third reading a convention with West Germany might be in the bill. I see that it is not there yet. I urge the minister to keep working on the matter as, again, I urge the Minister of National Health and Welfare to keep working on reciprocal pension agreements.

JUDGES ACT

MEASURE TO INCREASE SALARIES OF JUDGES

The House resumed, from Monday, December 1, consideration of the motion of Mr. Chrétien that Bill C-34, to amend the Judges Act and certain other acts in consequence thereof, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, when the debate last adjourned, I was making the point that the bill was abusive of taxpayers and insulting to past, present, and future judges. It is abusive of the taxpayers because the salary increase of up to $16,000 per judge is unreasonable in the circumstances in which the country finds itself, and it is unreasonable with respect to pensions because the 1 per cent contribution rate, considering the richness of the benefits to be conferred, is unreasonable. To put it in stronger language, it is bordering on the obscene, and is what I call a rake-off at the public's expense.

I will attempt to amplify some of these points, but before doing so I would point out that my wife and I, both lawyers, may suffer for this intervention in due course. I believe that what I am saying is true, and I hope that some judge will not in the distant future take it out on my wife if she should appear in court.

Mrs. Appolloni: Oh, oh!

Mr. Kilgour: To the hon. member for York South-Weston (Mrs. Appolloni), I have no doubt that should I go back to court work some judge, and I hope not many, will take it out on me. I am simply making the point that judges should not apply guilt by association to my wife.

The Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien), who is not here today—in fact, looking around I do not see anybody who was here the last time when we had something of a free-for-all on this matter—made the point that I was denying judges what he called "decent increases". The Minister of Justice is also the Minister for Social Development, which is a role which demands some concern for the public at large as to the use of public funds. He should not be here as an apologist for the lawyers or the very few judges who think that the increases should go through in the form which he has proposed them.

I would remind the Minister for Social Development of a couple of things in this regard. First, fully half of the older Canadians who receive the old age security also receive the guaranteed income supplement because they have no other income. The OAS and the GIS together amount to $4,350 which is enough to live in poverty. The OAS plus the CPP, the Canada Pension Plan, in total amounts to $5,296, or almost exactly what is considered to be the national poverty line. In that context, what we are doing for the judges is patently unreasonable. There are many other misjudgments in this bill.

The Minister of Justice appears to think that being a superior court judge is such an unattractive job that these people must be paid very large salaries and pensions in order to attract better people to the job. That is an insult to the 650 men and women who are section 96 judges across Canada. Has the minister found it difficult to obtain first-class men and women to appoint to the bench? With the present salary level, and to this point, I doubt it very much. In fact, I am certain that he is not finding it difficult at all.

But if someone needs $70,000, $80,000 or up to $88,000 per year before they will take a judicial appointment, perhaps that person is not the type who should be sitting on the judicial benches across Canada. It is an honoured position, and salaries do not need to be as high as have been proposed. Members opposite cannot tell me that hockey players, rock stars and businessmen receive salaries in this range, because for one thing, that is money which is earned in the private sector, whereas these increases will come out of the pocket of the Canadian taxpayer.

Second, the pension proposal is altogether too rich. Federal public servants, and I was one once, can receive a pension of 70 per cent of their best six years' salary after 35 years of contributing to the fund 6.4 per cent of their salaries. Under this bill judges will pay 1 per cent of their salaries and will obtain two-thirds of their income in pension after ten years. The premise here is that the judges in receiving an appointment to the bench, at say, age 50, have made no preparation for their retirement and must, therefore, receive supra-special treatment.

I suspect that the vast majority of the 650 judges would agree with me that the contributions in this bill are totally unwarranted. Does it accord with reality to suppose that judges have done nothing to prepare for their retirement? I submit that it does not. Surely the benefits of any pension plan should have a reasonable relationship to any contribution if justice is to be done and to be seen to be done. This principle of justice is cited every day in courts across Canada. It should also apply in the cases of the judges' pension plans.

Somebody may say, "What about a case where a judge is perhaps killed by a bus and his wife has no pension fund?" The answer there is that an order in council can be passed, as has been done, I believe, in all the provinces and at the federal level for many years, providing for an ex gratia payment to help in a difficult situation. Again, I also suspect that the vast majority of judges and lawyers in this country would agree with me on that point.

Third, I am told that salary increases will aggregate about $4.5 million yearly. A one shot payment of $3.5 million is to cover the pension scheme, and $800,000 annually is to cover increases in judges' allowances. This total, as surely as tomorrow's sun comes up, will be added to the $17 billion deficit that is predicted for next year. If past practices are followed, a large part of that sum will simply be monetized, which is a polite way of saying that the Bank of Canada will print money for the amount of the increase in the deficit.

Of course, the government hopes that most Canadians will not realize how this monetized or freshly printed money affects inflation. But I submit, Mr. Speaker, that more and more Canadians know that such gross financial irresponsibility results in ever-increasing catch-ups and ultimately results in what I call "wheelbarrow" money. It has been said that in terms of purchasing power it is becoming cheaper to eat dollar bills than lettuce. I, for one, believe that MPs, judges, business executives and everyone in the public sector, should show a little restraint in such matters.

A retired constituent came to my office last week and told me that he and his wife have a total income of $408 each month from old age security and the Canada Pension Plan. After paying for rent, gas and light, they have $100 left for food, transportation, clothing and everything else for the two of them. He said he is desperate because his wife is ill. Cases like this are one reason why I speak against this bill in terms of equity across Canada.

My fourth point is that the unspoken premise of this bill is that it can be used later as a ratchet for other salaries in the public sector. In fact the salaries of the Auditor General and the Official Languages Commissioner are already tied to it. If things proceed next year as they have in the past, a judge will be appointed to study the salaries of public servants. He will probably decide that they should be paid at least the same as judges. Perhaps MPs will even come under the same brush. This seems obvious, from recent reports. So it goes, Mr. Speaker. Every year someone gets an increase, then someone gets a larger increase. I suggest that the Canadian people are going to become very fed up with this, if they are not already.

The last time this matter came up, two or three members of the NDP asked that it be sent to committee, and they were supported by a few Liberals. Then they accused this party of filibustering. Do those hon. members really think that when this bill goes to committee one comma or one word will be changed? It is similar to what I call the NDP fallacy with respect to the constitution. Do they think that by voting to send the constitutional package to a committee dominated by Liberals—I see the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) nodding in agreement—that one phrase in the constitutional proposal be affected? I suggest that the same thing applies to this bill. There will be no changes in committee if we can judge by past experience, because party discipline applies in committee just as much as it does here.

An hon. Member: What about your party?

Mr. Kilgour: I hear some comments, Mr. Speaker. I am almost at the point where I feel badly if hon. members opposite do not heckle. I enjoyed this much more the last time. I am sorry that they are only starting to heckle because I have come to the end of my remarks.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): That is not a heckle; that is a guffaw.

Mr. Kilgour: In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I intend to vote against this bill because it is unreasonable, and I hope that members on all sides of the House will consider doing likewise.

Hon. Bill Jarvis (Perth): Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a few comments on this bill. I am inspired by the hon. member for Willowdale (Mr. Peterson) who, all of a sudden, is an international fiscal expert. Perhaps I could therefore be considered an expert on the judiciary.

A number of things in this bill bother me, Mr. Speaker, as well as some that are not in the bill. I find it very hard to accept the delay in bringing the bill forward, as it was drafted long before this party formed the last government. It bothers me, as well, to have to go through this exercise every year, or two years, or three years. I find that most unseemly, just as I find it unseemly for us to debate our own pension schemes or pay raises. Surely that tradition is not so firmly rooted in this country that we have to accept it as inevitable.

Mr. Pepin: You are such a gentleman.

Mr. Jarvis: I think I have some support from the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin). At least he is not shaking his head but is smiling at me.

Mr. Pepin: You are such a gentleman, I said, that it is not proper to discuss your own salary.

Mr. Jarvis: I can find much to agree with in the propositions advanced by my colleagues on all sides. There is no uniformity in the approach to this matter. In parts of my riding, in Ontario, it is much easier to attract applicants for the judiciary than in other parts. In the short period that this party formed the government there was an opening in Muskoka and every Toronto lawyer of every political persuasion who had a cottage there, wanted to be the judge. At Thunder Bay and the Lakehead, however, where workloads are heavy and travel is difficult, there was no interest.

It is a little difficult to understand why the legislation recommends salaries higher than those recommended by the various committees and commissions that study these matters. There may be a rationale for this, but it was not contained in the minister's speech when he introduced the legislation, and that troubles me. In a moment I would like to deal with pensions, Mr. Speaker.

I am delighted that the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Defence (Mrs. Appolloni) has remained in the House, Mr. Speaker, because I may have done her an injustice. I interpreted her intervention when my colleague from Edmonton was speaking—although it was not a formal one—as possibly taking his remarks as chauvinistic. I hope I do not do her a disservice, as I have the greatest respect for her, but when my colleague mentioned that his wife might appear in the courts I thought she took it the wrong way.

This leads me to my main point, Mr. Speaker. It is a minor point, yet I find it absolutely unacceptable that the annuity of a judge's widow is suspended if she remarries. That is a terrible thing to put in legislation. Even in the dark ages when I was practising law and I was asked to put in what we called the dum casta or chaste clause in separation agreements or wills, although I did it on a client's instructions, I found it repulsive. That was in the sixties; now we are in the eighties, debating legislation that provides for the annuity of a judge's widow to be suspended upon her remarriage. What on earth is the rationale for that, Mr. Speaker? I fail to understand why we should inscribe a deterrent to a judge's widow in this legislation. It makes no sense unless we want to return to the dark ages.

I realize this is a minor point and I do not want to take up the time of the House with it, but why in 1980, do we introduce legislation to discourage a widow—young or old, it makes no difference, whether she is 80 or 20—from remarrying?

Mr. Pepin: It is the puritanical concept of punishment.

● (1500)

Mr. Jarvis: The Minister of Transport says it is a puritanical concept of punishment. I think he puts it much better than I do. If the parliamentary secretary wants to do a service, I say introduce an amendment to get rid of that absolute nonsense. I will not go on any longer because we do not want to make a big issue out of that. But surely in the interests of decency, if nothing else, we would reject that kind of a provision in a bill drafted in 1980.

There is one other minor point which troubles me. I do not know why we relate salaries of other public servants in the judges bill. I do not find that acceptable. Why would we relate salaries of the Chief Electoral Officer or the Commissioner of Official Languages in the same legislation as judges? There may be a rationale, but if there is, I would certainly like to know. However, I do not want to stand up here every two or three years and have to debate not only the judges salaries, which is bad enough, but also the salaries of the Chief Electoral Officer or the Commissioner of Official Languages. If there is any sense behind that, why don't we include every other public servant?

Mr. Pepin: They are officers of Parliament.

Mr. Jarvis: The minister says they are officers of Parliament. That begs the question: why are we not debating the salary of the Clerk of the House or the Sergeant-at-Arms and heaven only knows who? I do not accept that as a rationale. I do not understand it.

My chief concern is the pension aspect. The Liberal government got us into this situation in 1975. The government created two classes of judges by its 1975 legislation and now it stands the victim of its own making. You created two classes of judges and now you are coming back to try to restore what was an obvious mistake in 1975.

The Deputy Speaker: I would invite the hon. member to address his remarks to the Chair.

Mr. Jarvis: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry. I was taking liberties on a Friday afternoon which I should not have expected, and I thank you for helping me. More speakers should point out that omission to us because I notice members are slipping into a bad habit by not addressing the Chair. I stand corrected, and I deem it is a pleasure to address you, sir, rather than my colleagues across the way. I deem it a much greater pleasure, I might say.

Having put us into that situation the government is now trying to correct it in 1980. Looking at it in the abstract, I find that non-contributory principle likely unacceptable. Why do we create a distinct class of judges, vis-à-vis the contribution aspect when we compare them, as was done by my colleague, the hon. member for Saskatoon West (Mr. Hnatyshyn) on December 1 at which time he pointed out the same aspects with respect to the armed forces, the RCMP, public servants, members of Parliament and senators? It is very hard to understand and accept the rationale for that. I would think that deserves our serious attention. Do we regard it as a precedent, which we do not want to be adopted in terms of these other classes? We might regard the rationale as unacceptable because of the shifting back and forth from the pre-1975 situation to the 1975 situation to the 1980 situation. Surely in monetary terms the rationale cannot be supported because, as the parliamentry secretary and my colleagues opposite know, that can be compensated for in terms of salary. The pension and the salary are not apples and oranges. They are a package. There is absolutely no difficulty in rationalizing it in a monetary sense. It may mean an increase of a minor nature in the salary effect to compensate for the contributory portion of the pension.

Mr. Speaker, I had only intended to speak for seven or eight minutes and I have already spoken for longer than that. However, I appreciate the opportunity to put some of my thoughts on the record.

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I appreciate your courtesy in allowing me to explain my intervention, which was referred to by the hon. member for Perth (Mr. Jarvis). The hon. member felt that in my intervention I was referring to a chauvinistic attitude. I hasten to say that I was not. With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I would like to explain why I intervened in the first place.

I referred to the speech made a few moments ago by the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Kilgour). I believe the hon. member in his opening remarks—I do not have them before me, obviously, because Hansard has not yet been delivered—he implied that because he was speaking against this particular bill there was the possibility that judges or any judge could retaliate in kind or in any other way against him or his wife, who I gather is a practising lawyer. That statement shocked and appalled me, particularly now when cynicism toward public figures is rampant in this country. I believe that such an impression as left by the hon. member, who is himself a member of the legal profession, is totally unworthy of him. That is why I said it was shocking. I repeat, I still think his statement was shocking.

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, when I have occasion to speak in this House I usually try to develop what I have to say in some orderly sequence. Sometimes I even have a plan, but I am altering that pattern somewhat today. I want to say that I am persuaded to start first in a field to which a fair amount of reference was made by the hon. member for Perth (Mr. Jarvis), namely, the position of widows. I am glad he raised the point that there does not seem to be any place in the 1980s for a provision that a judge's widow who remarries must lose her pension. I support both the hon. member for Perth and the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) in their objection to that.

One of the reasons I want to say this right at the beginning is because in my view that kind of provision ought to be removed from all of our pension laws. For instance, the Public Service Superannuation Act, the Canadian Forces Superannuation Act, and the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act all have the same provision. All through our legislation we find this eighteenth or seventeenth century idea that a woman is taken care of by a man. If he dies, she gets a pension, but if she finds another man to take care of her, out goes her pension.

It really is for the birds and I hope my hon. friend from Perth, and my hon. friend, the Minister of Transport, will agree that it ought to be taken out of all other pieces of pension legislation as well. By the same token I dislike very much another provision in those pension plans. Since the hon. member for Perth spoke, I have been unable to check back to the original act to see whether it applies in the Judges Act, but it probably does—if it does not, we are giving judges' widows preferential treatment. In most pension plans a widow does not qualify for a widow's pension if she married the person of whom she has become the widow after he left the job. That is certainly true in the Public Service Superannuation Act, the Canadian Forces Superannuation Act, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Superannuation Act and the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act.

I have heard from some former colleagues in this House who got married after they left here; they discovered that in the event of their death they had no widow's pension to leave to their widow. How nonsensical can we be that we do not recognize a woman's rights as a woman rather than on the basis of her attachment to a man and as to when that attachment took place. Let us get to the point where we treat men and women equally.

By the same token, there is something else we do to widows which is quite unfair. Like the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Kilgour), I think this whole package in Bill C-34 is too rich. He was probably speaking for himself rather than his party. I may not have the support of all my colleagues in saying this bill is too rich.

Again with the judges, and it is the same with members of Parliament, public servants, armed forces people, retired railway workers or what have you, if the man dies first, the widow gets only a portion of that pension. However, if she dies first, he receives the whole pension, 100 per cent. Maybe that was something to boast about when society first began establishing survivor benefits, but surely it cannot be defended in a day when we insist on equal rights between men and women.

I would like to see all of these inequalities and unfairnesses to widows corrected or removed, not only from the Judges Act but from all our of our pension legislation.

Still on the subject of widows, I am glad to see in this bill a provision to increase the pensions of widows of judges. I support that in principle. However, when I look at the amount, the minimum of $13,900 a year, subject to indexation down the road, I think of the fact that not long ago we passed a bill to provide pensions to the widows of disabled veterans, but the amount is nothing at all compared to this figure. What is worse, and in fact scandalous, is the fact that we provided that in some cases those widows should have to wait six and a half years before they draw the pensions to which Parliament has now said they are entitled.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): Shame!

Mr. Knowles: My colleague says shame. The whole House of Commons ought to say shame.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Shame!

Mr. Roberts: Shame!

Mr. Knowles: Now it is unanimous. I have a "shame" from each of the three parties in the House.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Move a "43" on Monday.

Mr. Knowles: Seriously, when are we going to come up to date? One of the arguments will be that if we give this kind of lead in Parliament, private pension plans will have to do the same. So what? One of the things Parliament should do is give the lead. As I said, the amounts in this bill make it look like something totally different from the normal pension statutes with which we deal. I am glad to see a little something by way of principle for widows, but I wish we would apply that principle in all pieces of legislation.

I urge that throughout the whole gamut of pension arrangements the widow's pension should be the same amount as the husband would get if she had died first. I argue as well that the person who is usually referred to as a second wife—she might not be, she might be the first wife of the old chap—should get the widow's pension despite the fact she may have married him after he left the bench or retired from whatever employment he had.

I know of cases where the so-called second marriage has lasted longer than the first. I know of many cases where in the so-called second marriage the wife had a great deal to do by way of attending to her husband in a period of illness and when the illness ended in his death, there was nothing for her. She may have been married to him for 25 years, but there was no pension for her because she married him after he went on pension.

I am glad the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona said what he did in this area. It prompted the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Defence (Mrs. Appolloni) to make an interjection. That prompted the hon. member for Perth to spend a good portion of his remarks on the question of how we treat these widows.

We have come a long way since I came to this place some years ago. However, we are still so far behind that we do not have the right to say we apply equality between men and women in terms of pension arrangements.

Miss Jewett: Or anywhere else.

Mr. Knowles: As my colleague appropriately adds, or anywhere else. She is on the list to speak in this debate and may have something to say on this score.

Having picked the middle or latter part of my speech out in order to give this matter the importance it deserves and because it followed on what had been said by others, I commend the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona on the statement he made on December 1 and again today with respect to this bill on the ground that it is rather rich. It is. The salary proposals, as I understand them, are such that although at the present time federally appointed judges draw salaries ranging from $47,000 to $69,000 a year, the new range will be $65,000 to $88,000.

I know all the arguments for high salaries—the need to get competent people and the fact that judges are lawyers who could make a great deal more in private practice. I also know that this is a time of restraint. Every day some motion under Standing Order 43 calls for something to be done for some needy group, and the government says no. In the Speech from the Throne, the government said it planned help where help is needed.

Certainly salaries have to go up. That is the course of history. When I first came here on a salary of $4,000 a year and discovered that cabinet ministers of the day were getting an additional $10,000 and Mr. King was getting an additional $15,000, I wondered what they did with it all. I wondered what Mr. King did with a total of $19,000, plus a few other things.

Mr. Pepin: He gave it to the state after.

Mr. Knowles: He gave it to the state to make sure the state would not forget him.

Salaries do increase, partly because we produce a much greater volume of goods and services and partly because of inflation. However, when we talk about increasing salaries, those increases should start where they are most needed. We should not always bow to the proposition that those at the top should get the increases first. If someone says this may have a bearing on what I will be saying about increases for members of Parliament when that piece of legislation is brought in, my reply is that members know where I stood the last few times. I will be taking the same stand again.

I say this about judges. They themselves should say that they could get along and could be given lesser increases than are provided in this bill. I quite agree with the member for York South-Weston, the Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence, that maybe it was a bit of an insult for the member for Edmonton-Strathcona to say that a judge would take it out on him or his wife before the courts. I am sure he did not mean it that way and that no judge would act that way. I think judges have the respect of the citizens of this country because of the positions they hold and because of their impartiality; they do not need high salaries to get respect. I am looking across the way at a friend of mine. I will not name him in case he does not want to own up to it, but he is one who agreed with me in the elevator the other day that position in society is not necessarily marked by the amount of salary one receives.

● (1520)

Mr. Pepin: I also said we should not impose our virtue on other people.

Mr. Knowles: My hon. friend has identified himself and has added that we should not impose our virtue on other people. I do not think it is a matter of virtue. I think it is a matter of fairness, justice and common sense.

Let us go back to the widows of disabled veterans whose pensions were below the 48 per cent level and who have finally been accorded those pensions. Some of them must wait six and a half years. Judges' widows get it right away. I think of the people who are waiting, and who keep waiting, for salary increases. I find in this bill the increases are to be retroactive.

There are two stages of retroactivity but they will be retroactive whenever the bill is passed. As I read the bill, a judge who may have retired will still get the increase for the time he was on the bench, which is quite different from what happens to employees of the public service when there is an increase in salaries; it goes only to those who are on staff at the time it comes into effect.

I am just pleading for some fair play and justice in the whole thing. I know the arguments in defence of salaries as high as $88,000 a year. That is a lot of money. Ian Sinclair of the Canadian Pacific Railway receives a lot more than that.

An hon. Member: Half a million dollars.

Mr. Knowles: The only way we found out the amount of his salary was because the parent people in the United States had to reveal the information down there.

The other day one of my friends mentioned how much school teachers make compared with what members of Parliament make. I said, "Which do you want to be?" He did not hesitate for a moment. He said he would rather be in Parliament. I still believe there is some sense to Edward Bellamy's concept in "Looking Backward" when he suggested that the people who do the meanest, hardest and dirtiest work should be paid or compensated for it because those who are doing the kind of work we are engaged in have far more satisfaction in doing it. Now the hon. member is shaking his head, no doubt in disbelief.

Mr. Pepin: I am virtuous, but not to that extent.

Mr. Knowles: It seems to me the satisfaction that judges, members of Parliament and others get out of their jobs should be taken into account. We do not always have to put them first. There are too many people out there today wrestling with the prices of butter, milk, bread, tea and coffee, prices the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) had to admit the other day he did not even know. These people worry from day to day. People are having to renegotiate their mortgages at 16 per cent, 17 per cent, 18 per cent and 20 per cent and are worrying about how far things will go. Yet, we can do what is in this bill, make it all retroactive and tidy it up.

There is something about all of this I want to propose, and I am going to propose it particularly in relation to the pension provisions in this bill. It has often been suggested in the House of Commons, when dealing with procedural matters and so on, that the practice we have of governments bringing in legislation in its final form, meaning that all the House can do is accept it or reject it, is not sacred. Maybe there are times when members of the House of Commons should have some input before a bill is put in its final form. We have done that a few times. We did it with respect to the National Transportation Act a few years ago; we have done it with respect to our divorce legislation and at other times as well. We have given a bill first reading and then, before it was given a second reading, had its subject matter sent off to committee so the whole thing could be looked over. This ought to be done with the bill before us. Instead of giving this bill a second reading, which is approval in principle, it would be far better if we sent the subject matter off to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs and let hon. members like the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona, the hon. member for Perth (Mr. Jarvis) and the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Defence have some say precisely because there are all these salary figures allowances, widows' arrangements and pension arrangements.

At the end of my remarks I shall seek to move an amendment to the effect that the bill not be read a second time but that we send the subject matter off to committee. I am doing this not only because I think there should be that kind of discussion with respect to these salaries and what we do for widows—and my friend, the hon. member for New Westminster-Coquitlam would like to have something to say about how few women there are on the bench—but I do it particularly with respect to a major principle involving pensions contained in this bill. It is the decision of the government that judges' pensions are now to be non-contributory. I remember well from years ago when the pensions of judges were non-contributory and, incidentally, were paid only to the judge. I remember when judges came along to Mr. Ilsley when he was the Minister of Justice and complained there was nothing for the widow. A very happy solution was reached. The judge's pension was divided into two parts. One part was two-thirds, the other part was one-third. The two-thirds was considered as the judge's pension and the one-third was considered as the wife's pension. If she died first he lived on two-thirds of the pension and if he died first she received the third. They were all happy for a while but not happy ever after.

As they wanted better pensions, the government came in with the proposition that they should be put on a contributory basis and, on that basis, be made better off. Who was the minister who brought that into effect in 1975? None other than the person who is now the Minister of Justice. He was then the President of the Treasury Board. He proposed to put the pensions of judges on a proper basis—on the basis of a principle which was defensible—and mainly that they should be on contributory basis. Now that same individual, having been transplanted or transmigrated from the Treasury Board to the Department of Justice, says we should end the contributory principle. The argument is that it created two classes of judges—some on non-contributory pensions and some on contributory pensions. If you want to put it on the basis of equality, those who are out there should be required to pay for the pensions they received. That is a form of retroactivity which would be a bit rough. But it is really unfair to the whole public to pick out this one group of people and say "Your pensions shall be non-contributory". The bill goes even further than that. It not only proposes that from here on they shall be non-contributory, but that those judges who have contributed under the laws as applied since 1975 should get all their money back plus interest. You do not find very many examples of that in any pension plan.

I urge very strongly that that be reconsidered. I think it is too complicated for us to study here on the floor of the House of Commons, and that is why I think it should be looked at in the standing committee. The hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona objected to our sending this bill to committee on the grounds that once it gets there, it is not likely to be changed by either a comma or a semicolon, and he is right. That is why I am suggesting, not that we send the bill to the committee carved in stone, but that we send the subject matter of the bill to the committee and let the members of that committee go over it before it is put in the final form in which it will come to this House.

I think that there are many aspects of the bill which should be considered, but I think that non-contributory pension provisions should be considered very carefully before they are put before us as something on which to vote in its final form. I believe that many members feel that way. I think the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona in that part of his speech speaks not just for himself but for a number of members in his own party, and I suspect that he and I are speaking for a number of Liberal members on the other side of the House as well. All of the other pension plans in this country are on a contributory basis. The only one I can think of that is not is the pension of the Governor General and the special pension for a prime minister who has been in office for four years. Poor Joe did not make it. There is some defence for that. The Governor General's salary was fixed in the British North America Act way back to begin with, and increasing it has apparently been difficult. The Prime Minister, of course, has provided a rather generous pension for governors general, but the present Governor General, before he took office, said he wants that act amended so that if he leaves that job before he reaches the age of 50, he would not get the pension at that point but it would be deferred until a later date. I believe the Prime Minister promised Mr. Schreyer, before he took the office, that this would be done, but he did want to look at something to protect his widow in case anything happened to Mr. Schreyer while he was Governor General. With these exceptions, and no doubt there are some others, I have no doubt there are big corporations which provide—

An hon. Member: What is that noise?

Mr. Knowles: I thought it was the reference to big corporations which produced that bang. It is not a bing-bong, bing-bong, is it? At any rate, there are so few instances of this that I think we should stand by the principle, and the judges themselves should be the first to want to be in that class.

There was an editorial in one of the national newspapers of this country the other day which said some of the things I am saying now, but it went a little further and I do not agree with that part of the editorial which says that there should not be indexing, there should be no indexing of public servants' pensions, or MPs' pensions or judges' pensions, until we are able to index all pensions. I think we should be going the other way. We have started. We have done some indexing of these pensions. We indexed old age security, the guaranteed income supplement, and the Canada Pension Plan. There are a few firms out there which index their plans, but I think what we should be working for is indexation across the board. So I do not quarrel with that part of it. The only comment I make is that it depends on the base, it depends on where you start. If you start way up in the stratosphere, you hardly need the indexing. These are the things we should consider.

I may be rambling a bit, Mr. Speaker, but I hope I have made the points I wanted to make. I should now like to present an amendment which I hope Your Honour will see fit to accept. It proposes that we do as I said a while ago, that instead of voting for this bill as a bill, and thus entrenching it in the process, we send the subject matter to committee for study and for particular study of the pension provisions. Therefore, I move, seconded by the hon. member for New Westminster-Coquitlam:

That the motion—

The motion, of course, is that the bill be read the second time and referred to the committee.

—be amended by deleting all the words after the word "that", and by substituting therefor the following words:

"Bill C-34, an act to amend the Judges Act and certain acts in consequence thereof, be not now read a second time, but that the subject matter thereof, particularly the subject matter of the clauses relating to non-contributory pensions, be referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs."

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The House has heard the motion. It appears to be in order.

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, I want to speak but I will be very brief, as is my usual fashion in this chamber.

There are good reasons, of course, for this bill being before the House. It is obvious that if we are to have the best people from the legal profession willing to accept positions on the various courts of the country, we will have to give them remuneration which though it may not be comparable to what they could earn in private practice, would give them a standard of living at least roughly equivalent to what they have become accustomed to. It would be a mistake, it seems to me, to fill the courts with the least successful lawyers in the country, and therefore I support—

Mr. Kilgour: Mr. Speaker, I wish to rise on a point of order. Would the hon. member permit a question, a very short point, now, or does he wish to wait until the end?

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): I would prefer to wait until the end. At that time the question might not be necessary. As I was saying, I think it would be wrong and harmful to the judicial system if we were not able to attract the best legal minds to sit on the various courts of the country. Having said that, however, I want to go on to say that I, too, believe it is wrong for us as the Parliament to provide for the judges of this country a pension plan to which they do not have to contribute. I think it is important to remember that when anyone contributes to a recognized pension plan, those contributions are non-taxable and therefore the burden on anyone contributing to a recognized pension fund is eased by the fact that those payments are exempt from income tax.

So I want to make it clear that I support an increase in salaries for members of the judiciary in this country, but I do not support that portion of the bill which would make it possible for them to have their pension plan without making contributions to it. That is all I want to say, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Kilgour: May I pose a question to the hon. member, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Please do.

[Translation]

Mr. Kilgour: At the beginning of his remarks, the hon. member stated that increasing judges' salaries would attract the best lawyers in Canada to the bench. Is he casting aspersion upon the judges who are now sitting on the bench? Does he mean to say that the judges we have now are incompetent?

● (1540)

[English]

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, I am glad the hon. member asked that question. I think it would be an interesting exercise if I were to put it back to him. However, I had no intention of implying any such inference in my remarks. I think one's imagination would have to be very active to come to that conclusion.

Of course, many judges are highly competent, have made great sacrifices upon accepting appointments to the bench and have made great contributions to jurisprudence.

Mr. Roberts: Hear, hear!

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): On the other hand, I actually wonder about some judges.

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I will not occupy the time of the House for long, but I listened to the comments of members on all sides of the House with respect to the question of the pensions of judges, particularly the contributory aspects of them.

Mr. Knowles: Non-contributory.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Well, the contributory or non-contributory aspects of them. Particular concern has been expressed that there is an implication in the bill that they will become completely non-contributory pensions, which the distinguished hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) indicated was not within the purview of what he would like to see; he made that very clear. Also the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi (Mr. Dionne) indicated that it was not satisfactory from his point of view. I know he speaks as a member of the Liberal party. He would not want me to say he was speaking in any other capacity, although I might question him on it. From the point of view of the official opposition, it also concerns us very much.

The reason I raise this at the outset is that in my respectful submission it renders somewhat questionable the necessity of supporting the amendment put forward by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I think his amendment was put forward on the basis that once the position had been completely adopted by the government, if the bill passed second reading stage, there was no hope that it could be changed in committee. As a matter of fact, there is a good likelihood that it could be changed in committee, given the opinions voiced on all sides of the House.

The government House leader is present in the House. He knows I have spoken with him privately about that aspect of the pensions. It is the part which really concerns me, and I pass that comment to him. He has made no comment to me with respect to it, and I do not suggest that the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi is speaking for the government House leader or for the government. But, it is an indication of support on the government side of the House with respect to a concern which we share as well. We should all take it into account when considering the amendment of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

I would not engage myself in this debate if I did not think it was important. A number of opinions were expressed in the House about judges on December 1 and today. As the Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development (Mr. Chrétien) said, sometimes we forget that there is a peculiar responsibility in the Parliament of Canada respecting the appointment of judges to ensure that the emoluments are sufficient to invite or entice the best in the profession to accept an appointment to the bench and not cast some doubt on the independence of judges because their emoluments, salaries and benefits may not be acceptable, having regard to modern day standards in the profession.

We must remember that judges are peculiar. While they are a special class of people by virtue of their work, they are also a special class of Canadians in the sense that when a federally-appointed judge accepts a position on the bench, he loses some of his most fundamental civil rights. He loses the right to speak publicly on a matter of public interest, even with respect to the operation of his own court except in a most peripheral manner. He loses the right to vote; he cannot choose his member of Parliament.

Indeed there is some doubt as to whether he can even approach his member of Parliament. Given that set of circumstances, this Parliament or any Parliament owes a particular duty to those individuals who accept that special brand of public service to treat them appropriately, but not overly kindly or meanly. We should not talk about them meanly because they cannot speak for themselves. It is important to remember that.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre said something in the course of his speech to which I listened and which verified by asking someone else. He admitted that the judges should have some increase, but his quarrel seemed to be with respect to the amount. He thought the package being offered to judges was a bit rich in the circumstances.

Mr. Knowles: Too rich.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): I see the hon. member nodding his head. It is a matter of opinion. I was the member of a government which considered the question of the pay package for federally-appointed judges. While the pay package we proposed during the life of our government was somewhat less than this one, I think it could be argued, if one wished to do so, that there has been a passage of time and that perhaps some adjustment should have been made to it.

But I say to my friends in the House that it is not a matter of principle; it is a matter of degree. When this bill goes to committee, as it is bound to, that issue will be discussed and evidence will be heard which I hope will move the minds of right-thinking members one way or the other as to whether the pay package should go up or down. I have to be honest with this court, the highest court in the land. I do not think the pay package is inappropriate. I am not prepared to quibble with $1,000, $2,000, $3,000 or having it stretched over three years. The fact of the matter is that judges, because of circumstances in this place and other places, have not received an increase, especially when we consider what most of them could earn outside. It is very difficult to arrive at a differential.

The principle which I try to apply in my own mind is that the pay package, the emoluments or the salaries of judges or their families ought to be such that they do not become an attraction for persons to accept appointments to the bench or a deterrent to persons accepting that particular public office. It is a difficult standard.

Another aspect is the independence of the judiciary. It is absolutely important to ensure that Her Majesty's judges are independent, that their minds are not moved by any other consideration than doing their jobs. They sit alone and judge the freedom of subjects, or whether one wins or loses a lawsuit or a dispute between two citizens. I do not know of any higher form of public service, including this House, which casts a greater responsibility on one individual than the responsibility which is cast upon a judge. Given that position, given the position we had when my party formed the government in Canada, and from what I know is happening in the United States, from discussions I have had with officials there with respect to their position, there is some difficulty in attracting the best people to the bench. And government justice ministers must make choices. I know that money will not be the complete attraction to the bench. Of course it will not be. But it ought not to be the deterrent to the excellence which we want to have on the bench. That is the principle which ought to guide us when we are considering this bill.

The hon. member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson) in the course of his speech—some of which I enjoyed and some of which I say with respect to him was somewhat unfortunate—talked about the appointing process of judges. He said there was something wrong with a political party's minister of justice, who must belong to a political party, whether mine or someone else's, making appointments to the bench and that those appointments might be questioned because they might have a partisan ring to them. In other words, a person who has been prominent in the community may be known as a Liberal or a Conservative. That is always a problem. That is the great responsibility which falls on successive ministers of justice in this country, certainly since we have been in confederation. I think generally ministers of justice over the years, whether of the party which now forms the government or my own party, have been very conscious of the importance of attracting the best men and women to the bench—the best that were available. I think the court has excelled itself with the federally-appointed judges, which is what we are talking about now. They have excelled themselves and excelled even the expectation of some of their staunchest supporters in their sense of fairness, justice, impartiality and in the unbiased attitude which they have brought to their work. I do not think there is anything terribly wrong with our process. I do not think there is anything wrong with the minister of justice consulting with the Canadian Bar Association. And I say "consulting" the Canadian Bar Association. I do not think there is anything particularly wrong with the minister of justice consulting the community in which the judge has practised before being considered for an appointment. I think that is appropriate. It is like everything else, it is a judgment call which the minister of justice makes when the invitation is put forward or an application to serve is accepted. I think that kind of discussion must go on.

The fact of the matter is our system has thrown up some fine judges. Our system has also thrown up judges who were not so fine. There used to be a story that every time I lost a case I always thought there was something wrong with the judge and when I won a case I thought the judge was a fine man, that he had a wonderful legal mind. In any event, our system has thrown up some pretty good judges. It is a fine judicial system which ranks with the best in the world. We want to make sure it continues to rank with the best in the world.

Mr. Peterson: Liberal appointments.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): The hon. member missed the implication of what I said just a few minutes ago or he would not have interjected in the way in which he did.

It is exceedingly important that we have the best of the Bar come to the bench. It is in that respect that I commend the Minister of Justice. I commend his predecessors on both sides for the appointments they have made. Unfortunately, we did not have an opportunity to make as many but that was because of the time constraint. I hope that will be remedied as time goes on.

There is one other aspect of the bill which concerns me. I believe the judicial function is so unique that it ought not to be linked with respect to salary or with any other function. I notice the bill includes the Chief Electoral Officer, the Official Languages Commissioner, the Auditor General and other officials who do a great job, but their jobs are different from those of the judges. I think we must deal with them in a separate way. The member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) commented with respect to an independent commission based on the Australian model with respect to the matter of salaries for judges, members of Parliament, senators, senior public servants and others. I think that is something the government should consider. I want to tell the ministers who are here that it is what we were considering when we were in government. I think it is worth while doing it.

Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to take up too much time but I felt, as a member of the Bar, and as a member who feels very strongly about the important responsibility which falls upon a government with respect to the appointment of judges, that I ought to speak in the course of this debate. I want to thank hon. members for the attention they have paid to what I have said.

Miss Pauline Jewett (New Westminster-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, the part of the bill I would like to begin addressing this afternoon, and which I will address at some other time since there are only five minutes left, is the part relating to the provision for 20 additional judges. It occurs to me how desirable and necessary it is that those 20 should be women. This bill gives us a good opportunity to start this process.

Mr. Knowles: It will still be a small minority.

Miss Jewett: Indeed, it would still be a small minority. There are now 657 federally-appointed judges in this country.

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. It is not often that we ask that the rule of relevancy be applied. But there is an amendment on the floor which is asking to send a subject matter to committee. The hon. member wants to speak about the number of women judges to be appointed, which is fine with me. Maybe we could agree to dispose of the amendment now and then speak on the second reading, when it would be more relevant for the hon. member to speak about the number of women among judges. Everyone knows, Mr. Speaker, that the kind of amendment which is proposed is a pure dilatory measure. It has nothing to do with the seriousness of the subject matter to be studied in committee. In committee we can look at the bill clause by clause and discuss every aspect of it, including pensions. I would like the record to be clear, that this kind of motion is a dilatory measure. If not then—

Miss Jewett: They do not want women in the courts, that is all.

Mr. Pinard: —then the hon. member would not object to proceeding in the way I suggest, namely, that we dispose of the amendment and then come back on second reading when she will have the opportunity to make her point. That is the point of order I wished to raise, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Knowles: I am sure that my good friend, the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard), would not expect me to remain silent in the face of his point of order. A week or so from now he would not be talking that way, he would be wishing us all a merry Christmas.

Whatever he may think is the purpose of the amendment, I say to him that we feel very strongly about the things which are in the bill. We think they should be discussed in the terms of their subject matter rather than in terms of being passed at second reading.

As for the amendment, Mr. Speaker, you will note that it calls on the committee to pay particular attention to the subject matter of the clauses having to do with non-contributing pensions. It also refers the subject matter of the whole bill, and since the whole bill includes appointments it seems to me that the member for New Westminster-Coquitlam (Miss Jewett), if there is any time left, has just as much right to speak on that now as she will have when we come back to it next week or next year.

Miss Jewett: I refer you to the speech of the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker).

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The President of the Privy Council is rising on the same point of order.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) did not, in fact, refute the argument I put forward with regard to the dilatory nature of the amendment; I do not hold it against him: he is exercising his privilege.

Now, I want to point out to the House the fact that the hon. member who was scheduled to take the floor on motion for consideration of private members' business at four o'clock is unable to attend. The opposition parties have been advised accordingly and with their agreement we could pursue the debate on Bill C-34 until five o'clock. We would then have a good indication of whether or not the NDP really have any dilatory intentions.

May I offer them, at this point, to sit until five o'clock to study Bill C-34, seeing it is impossible for hon. members to proceed with consideration of private members' business?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. minister has suggested that the House pursue consideration of Bill C-34 until five o'clock. Is there unanimous consent?

• (1600)

[English]

Mr. Knowles: I am sure the President of the Privy Council would be surprised if I agreed. He knows I do not agree. It is four o'clock.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: As it is four o'clock, Mr. Speaker, and as I have explained the absence of the hon. member who was supposed to introduce motion No. 20, it would be very difficult to proceed with another motion on the order paper. We tried to contact at least 15 members at the last minute to replace the one who was to have moved motion No. 20, and it was impossible to find someone who was willing to do so. In all fairness to those who would like to take part in the debate, I believe that it is now quite impossible to use this hour for the usual purpose.

In view of the circumstances, and also of the refusal on the part of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre to proceed further with consideration of Bill C-34 today, I am forced to ask for the adjournment of the House. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker):

That this House do now adjourn.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) has moved that the House do now adjourn. Is the motion of the hon. minister agreed to?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until Monday next at two o'clock p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

SUPERTANKER EXPERIMENT IN STRAIT OF JUAN DE FUCA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. I hope I shall receive unanimous consent for this urgent and important motion which involves the waters off our shores.

In view of the announcement by the U.S. coastguard that a test run involving a huge supertanker is to take place in the Juan de Fuca Strait next month and that the tanker involved is to have a displacement of from 150,000 to 200,000 tons, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Richmond-South Delta (Mr. Siddon):

That the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and the Minister of the Environment withdraw any approvals they may have given for conducting this test run; and, in addition, that a protest in the strongest possible terms be sent to the U.S. authorities indicating Canada's complete opposition to any such project, experimental or otherwise, because if the experiment is successful, using a dummy cargo of seawater, it will be difficult to resist the pressure that is bound to be mounted to carry out real-life tests with the live ammunition of crude petroleum.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

AIR CANADA

ACTION TO ENSURE NO SLOWDOWN OR STOPPAGE OF SERVICE DURING HOLIDAY SEASON—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Prince Edward-Hastings): Madam Speaker, with more Canadians planning to travel by air in the next three weeks than at any other time this year, the urgency of my motion is self-evident. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Richmond-South Delta (Mr. Siddon):

That the Minister of Transport is hereby directed by this House to take whatever steps are necessary to ensure that no slowdown or stoppage of air travel by Air Canada during the holiday season takes place for other than natural causes.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

FEDERAL BUSINESS DEVELOPMENT BANK

CALL FOR REDUCTION OF PENALTY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap): Madam Speaker, I rise under the terms of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent business. Since this government's policies have led to escalating interest rates, many small businesses across Canada have had to turn to the rather weak business development bond as their only solution. Here they find that they are forced now, in many cases, to pay severe penalties to the Federal Business Development Bank. On the left hand the government is attempting to assist small business, while on the right hand those same small businesses must pay a penalty equal to six months' interest at the prevailing rate, or thousands of dollars, which they are obviously not able to pay to the Federal Business Development Bank. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Beaches (Mr. Young):

That this House request the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce to have the six-month penalty clause reduced to ensure that the Federal Business Development Bank assist small business rather than hinder small business.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

DREDGING CONTRACTS—FAIR AND EQUITABLE TREATMENT FOR CANADIAN COMPANIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43, and I am pleased that the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) is in the chamber. On December 4 the Minister of Transport said, as reported at page 5393 of Hansard, in partial response to concerns over dredging tender policies:

I think the hon. member and some of his colleagues raised an important point tonight about the tendering methods with respect to Canadian-owned and foreign-owned companies. The nine questions he raised will give me a chance, particularly in the context of Roberts Bank, to examine those matters properly.

● (1410)

In view of the shortness of time in this regard, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay):

That this House call on the Minister of Transport to make a statement on motions setting forth the procedure government intends to follow in ensuring fair and equitable treatment for Canadian firms, which treatment they are currently denied, with foreign-owned companies competing for dredging contracts in Canada.

Madam Speaker: Presentation of this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

POLAND—DECLARATION OF DAY OF PRAYER—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Hudecki (Hamilton West): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In light of the critically tense situation in Poland, with the country in severe distress due to a shortage of food and supplies and an uncertain economic future, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Lewycky) and supported by the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Kilgour):

That this House declare December 21, 1980, as a day of prayer for peace and security for the citizens of Poland.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

STATEMENTS ON ENDING DISCRIMINATION AGAINST INDIAN WOMEN—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dave Nickerson (Western Arctic): Madam Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I introduce the following motion. Whereas at the same time as external affairs officials were advising the United Nations that Canada plans to end discrimination against Indian women by amending the Indian Act next year, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Munro) was telling a parliamentary committee that no such changes were contemplated, probably until 1985. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Kilgour):

That the Prime Minister be required to inform this House which of his ministers was telling the truth; was it

(a) the Secretary of State for External Affairs;

(b) the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development; or

(c) neither of the above?

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

FINANCE

EFFECTS OF HIGH INTEREST RATES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Girve Fretz (Erie): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Given the fact that the Canadian Federation of Independent Business has predicted 50,000 bankruptcies if the current policy of high interest rates is followed and, further, given that such warnings fall on deaf ears as far as the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) is concerned, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Halliday):

That this House urge the Minister of Finance to visit during the Christmas season with children whose despairing parents are unemployed, thereby gaining an insight into what his hopeless policy means in terms of human suffering, in the hope that, once he has seen the results of high interest rates, the minister will drop his destructive and demoralizing policy.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

SUPPORT FOR INUKSHUK PROJECT AND NAALAGVIK II—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Peter Ittinuar (Nunatsiaq): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that Inuktitut broadcasting is a crucial part of the preservation of language and culture in the north, and that the Inukshuk project is the first Inuit television broadcasting system, officially opened on December 1, 1980, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton):

That this House recognizes and supports the continuing contribution that services provided by the Inukshuk project and the northern Quebec Naalagvik 11 offer to Inuit communities.

HOUSING

REQUEST FOR MEASURES TO OFFSET HIGH INTEREST RATES

Hon. Allan Lawrence (Durham-Northumberland): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Prime Minister, in the absence of the Minister of Finance, in the absence of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, and in the absence of most ministers today, my question is directed to the Minister of Public Works in charge of CMHC who presumably has the duty and responsibility within government of formulating housing policies and programs which affect the purchase of land and the purchase of homes.

In view of the anger that is sweeping this country today and has been sweeping the country since last Thursday regarding the act of helplessness that the Minister of Finance has been putting on in this House respecting the lack of government policy to control the high interest rates, and because high interest rates vitally affect the housing industry, which in turn has a ripple effect through the whole economy, if the government cannot do anything about high interest rates—which we on this side reject entirely—is the minister in charge of housing in this country doing anything to formulate some new policies which would at least ameliorate the high cost of interest, the high cost of building, and the high cost of mortgaging for the people of this country in respect, perhaps, of a new tax deal for those who have to pay high interest rates?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, some of the ministers mentioned by the hon. member are attending, of course, the funeral of a former member of this House who was also a former premier of the province of Quebec. I want to make that point if it does not come immediately to the minds of hon. members opposite generally.

With regard to the response of Canada Mortgage and Housing and the housing ministry to the question of interest rates, of course, that has been a problem and was a problem for this government immediately upon taking office. Some of the actions of the government, of my ministry and the corporation in response to high interest rates are, for example, the increase of 5,000 starts in social housing, improving the eligibility for people seeking to stay in their homes by making rehabilitation improvements in housing, and the redirection of the portfolio. For example, on Friday of this week I announced that looking at the take-up at the year end of social housing units, 1,000 more units were designated for the city of Vancouver. These modest steps, in response to a problem that we appreciate is difficult, have been taken while we look at the impact of the rates to see whether they will come down as they did in May and June.

Mr. Lawrence: Madam Speaker, in view of the fact that the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce also find it necessary to attend funerals when the Prime Minister does—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lawrence: —my supplementary to the minister in charge of housing is this. We know what the situation is and what the minister has been doing. My question was more directed to what he is going to do. With these high interest rates, is the minister going to come up with any measure at all now or in the future, and has he given any consideration to a measure, which will help relieve the high cost of interest for those people, especially young people, who desire and need to buy new housing in this country?

Mr. Cosgrove: Madam Speaker, first of all, I have taken the opportunity in the last few weeks to visit the minister for housing for the province of Ontario and discuss this problem with him, because indeed the major pressure so far as housing is concerned at this time is rather not the opportunity for people to enter the purchase market, but is in effect the tight rental situation in some of the metropolitan areas. That is our first priority.

I have had an opportunity of meeting with the minister from the province of Ontario and I have had a discussion with the minister from the province of British Columbia. These are the two provinces in which the rental situation is the most acute. I have attempted to encourage the ministers, in response to the step taken by the Minister of Finance of reintroducing the MURB provision, to consider whether the response of the provincial ministers, in their areas of responsibility for housing, could complement that initiative of the federal government so as to ensure a meaningful response by governments to those people facing tight rental situations.

Mr. Lawrence: Madam Speaker, I am having a hard time getting through to the minister. Interest rates have gone up 4 per cent since the budget. CMHC is on the verge of bankruptcy, solely and simply because people are turning in their keys and walking out of their mortgaged premises. The construction industry is facing the worst time it has faced since the great depression of the 1930s, if not before, yet the minister has had but two discussions, one with a provincial minister in Ontario and one with a provincial minister in British Columbia.

Mr. Nielsen: What is he going to do?

Mr. Lawrence: Madam Speaker, what is the minister doing now with respect to housing in this country? Will he come up with any new deal? If not, will he say so?

An hon. Member: Higher interest rates.

Mr. Cosgrove: Madam Speaker, the provision in the budget dealing with the reintroduction of MURBs is a provision associated with the ministry of finance. This takes time, in fact some few months, to come on-stream. Therefore, we do not know, for example, how quickly the 10,000 to 15,000 starts expected to be generated by that provision will impact on the market. It does take some time to observe that movement in the market.

Mr. Nielsen: You are monitoring the situation.

Mr. Cosgrove: I am meeting with the corporation and with major players in the industry to see whether there is any movement in the industry and whether that provision will have impact. I would think that 15,000 units in a market where total starts for the year are approximately 160,000 is a significant step by this government, and we are waiting to see what effects do take place.

Mr. Crosbie: Resign. You have nothing to offer.

MORTGAGE INSURANCE FUND—SALE OF VACATED HOUSING UNITS

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Madam Speaker, my question is also directed to the minister responsible for housing. If I understood him correctly, he referred to 15,000 new starts which he hopes will take place this year through the provision in the budget for MURBs. With respect, I cannot see how this can possibly generate that kind of activity; I hope it does, but can I ask the minister this question? With respect to the large amount of units of various kinds in the mortgage insurance fund portfolio which have to be sold, may I ask what progress the minister is making in this sale? Are the units being sold by open tender so that all possible purchasers, of whatever ilk, have an equal chance to buy them? Could the minister give us a brief report? I realize, as I am sure the minister does, that the mortgage insurance fund badly needs to be made more liquid so that more funds will be available for emergency housing measures.

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to relate to the hon. member, who had responsibility in this portfolio several months ago, that indeed the corporation's objective of disposing of some of the numerous claims on the fund is moving ahead according to plan. That is, the corporation expected, with the assistance of the loan made by the former government to the corporation to tide it over during this period, together with its sales program, that this would result in the corporation putting the fund back into a solvent or static position, bearing in mind the run on it in the last two years. The target of having that position established by the spring of 1982 is on course. The sales program is working. The number of units sold thus far this year is around 18,000, I believe. We expect to reach the limit of 20,000 units. It is on a restricted proposal basis, but the real estate boards of the major metropolitan areas have all been canvassed and all are participating in the sales program.

• (1425)

Mr. MacKay: I thank the minister for that information. I want to ask him about another topic in his portfolio which I know he feels is important. What progress is the minister making with respect to bringing in a shelter allowance? I hope that this scheme, which has already been costed and which, according to our calculations, was slightly in excess of $100 million for producing shelter for senior citizens over 65 years of age, will be brought in fairly soon in order to alleviate difficulties in which senior citizens are finding themselves with this kind of housing market and the rental conditions they face.

Mr. Cosgrove: Madam Speaker, the proposal for a shelter allowance, of course, was one of the recommendations of the Matthews report, a document reported to the hon. member in his responsibility for this portfolio in the last government. It is a matter which has interested me from the first day of assuming responsibility for this portfolio.

The costs vary from the amount given by the hon. member and, indeed, if the proposal is expanded to other areas, could be much higher. I have asked the officials of the corporation to prepare a report showing the costs and the possibility of introducing this proposal, bearing in mind the many claims for other types of assistance, such as non-profit co-operatives and our senior citizens program. That report has been made available to other ministry officials in the social area of the cabinet portfolio. It is my hope, with the report back from the other ministries, that these financial implications can be available for the cabinet at about the time the national housing conference is under way in Ottawa, which will be early in March.

THE ECONOMY

EFFECT OF BUDGETARY AND ECONOMIC POLICIES

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, I had hoped to direct my question to the Minister of Finance; instead I will direct it to the Minister of State for Finance. I am sure the minister recognizes that both the budgetary and economic policies of this government are working a great hardship upon the majority of the people. They are destroying any chance of the auto industry recovering and creating a level of personal and business bankruptcies unheard of in Canada in the past. Prices are being driven up at every single level where consumers are involved. They are slowing the industrial expansion and replacement plans of almost every industry and commercial sector in this country.

Mr. Nielsen: And you voted for all of it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deans: The high interest rate policy of this government is making it necessary for Canadians in almost every municipality to walk away from their homes which they had saved for and purchased. They are being faced with having to lose their entire investment. I want to ask the minister how long must this decay go on. At what point in the decay will this government move to create policies which will meet the obvious problems confronting by far the vast majority of people in this country today?

Mr. Crosbie: Ask Bob Rae.

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State, Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member has elected to draw conclusions from circumstances of a single moment, from a single snapshot, as though this snapshot provided the complete picture of the Canadian economy for the forthcoming years. The hon. member knows full well that the country is still at grips with major inflationary pressures, that no one has yet come up with a short-term magic formula to solve these problems which are perturbing not only the Canadian economy but indeed the North American economy as a whole. It is through medium and long-term action as well as the concerted effort and will of all economic agents that we will overcome the inflationary threat, allow our economy some breathing space and contribute to its full recovery.

● (1430)

[English]

Mr. Deans: Madam Speaker, the minister speaks of inflation. How does the minister propose that we solve inflation problems in the long run in this country if one of the primary industries is unable to sell its product because of high interest rates, or if the majority of the manufacturing sector is unable to undertake the retooling and development necessary to meet future demands, both here and outside the country, or if the majority of people who are earning today do not make enough money—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has very long preambles to all his questions. I think I have to ask him to co-operate with the House and ask briefer questions.

Mr. Deans: Let me put it quite simply, Madam Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rae: The higher the interest rates, the longer the preamble!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Deans: The minister indicates that high interest rates are necessary to fight inflation. Inflation continues to rise apace with high interest rates.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deans: What does the minister propose to do to bring the interest rates down in order that people can live in Canada in the way to which they are entitled?

[Translation]

Mr. Bussières: Madam Speaker, I am afraid the problems with which our economy must cope are not so simple. We will know better days only if we put time on our side, as well as the concerted effort and will of all the economic agents I mentioned earlier. In his budget speech the Minister of Finance clearly indicated his intention to support fully the Bank of Canada's policy aimed at gradually reducing the money supply through tax measures which will create the fiscal framework necessary for the recovery of the Canadian economy. I am convinced that these medium and long-term measures will carry us through this critical period.

[English]

Mr. Deans: How does the economy recover if people cannot afford to buy?

An hon. Member: Good question.

NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY ORGANIZATION

SITUATION IN POLAND—POSITION TAKEN BY CANADA AT CONFERENCE

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs who has just returned from the NATO ministerial meetings in Brussels. All the reports from those meetings—the communiques and statements by other foreign ministers as well as the journalistic reports—have indicated that there was unanimous agreement among the NATO partners that if there was to be Soviet intervention in Poland, it would be met by tough countermeasures of a political and diplomatic nature by the members of NATO. I should like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether he gave Canada's support to the NATO response in this regard; and second, I should like to ask him if he views the NATO statement as an intervention in Poland's internal affairs?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, Canada not only fully supported but was in part responsible for the NATO consensus. We support very strongly the consensus which emerged and which was stated in the communique. I think the hon. member might have in mind other comments which have been made subsequently by other governments in interpreting the NATO communique or by the Secretary General of NATO. Those comments are not part of the foreign policy of Canada.

An hon. Member: We were not thinking of that.

Miss MacDonald: I set forward the statement which had been made to which the minister had agreed, that there would be tough political, economic and diplomatic countermeasures taken by NATO. That was the statement made by Secretary General Luns of NATO and by other ministers, and it was to those statements to which the Prime Minister of this country took exception in his press conference last Friday when he said:

> I find it useless to speculate on what we would do if there was an invasion of Poland by the U.S.S.R. I find this type of speculation completely inopportune—
> I find all speculation . . . very ill-advised—

Those were the statements of the Prime Minister of Canada after unanimous agreement by NATO members on the way in which they would meet Soviet intervention in Poland.

Some hon. Members: Question.

An hon. Member: Speech.

Miss MacDonald: I should like to ask the minister whether he was aware of the Prime Minister's view before he agreed with the NATO members as to the stand which Canada would take; and did he communicate the views of the Prime Minister to the other NATO ministers before he agreed with their stand?

Mr. MacGuigan: Madam Speaker, the statement which was expressed in the NATO communique was not the statement which the hon. member had quoted, which was the statement made by the Secretary General of NATO and which was misreported here. The statement which was made by the allies reads as follows:

> The allies would be compelled to react in the manner which the gravity of this development would require.

The other relevant statement which was made was that détente could not survive if the Soviet Union were again to violate the basic rights of any state to territorial integrity and independence.

There was a report on Friday, an entirely erroneous report, that the Secretary General of NATO had stated there would be military consequences, a military reply by NATO to any intervention in Poland. That was not what the Secretary General said, it is not part of the NATO communique, and it was not part of any explicit agreement which was arrived at by the foreign ministers.

Miss MacDonald: Madam Speaker, there seems to be a great deal of difference between the line which the Secretary of State for External Affairs is taking and that of the Prime Minister of Canada. One says yes, NATO agrees that there would be need for action in the event of Soviet intervention—and I understand the minister agrees with that—whereas the Prime Minister says it would be useless to speculate on action of any kind that NATO might take. I want to ask the minister when he will get together with the Prime Minister to find out exactly which line Canada is taking.

An hon. Member: Who speaks for Canada?

Miss MacDonald: Are we going to be backing our NATO allies on this question, or is the government going to be siding with the Prime Minister in his criticism of NATO?

Mr. MacGuigan: Madam Speaker, there is no problem with government policy in this respect. The government's policy is clearly one that there will be a strong and appropriate reaction to any intensification of the crisis with respect to Poland. The position which the Prime Minister has enunciated, and which I myself have repeatedly stated in other forums since the NATO meeting, is that speculation as to the form that those reactions might take is entirely unwarranted. It would not serve the cause of world peace if we were to speculate in that fashion, and in fact it was agreed, because of the large number of scenarios which could possibly occur, that the NATO foreign ministers would be called together immediately upon an intensification of the crisis with respect to Poland. Therefore, in fact, Canada's position is clear. It is the same as that of other NATO states, namely, that the effect on détente would be incalculable, serious and destructive if there were to be any Soviet attack on Poland and that the consequences would be strong and severe; but there is no attempt to detail what those consequences would be.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

FUTURE OF CANFARM—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Jim Schroder (Guelph): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture. Considering that the Canfarm co-operative program is recognized worldwide as the best specialized farm accounting software available to help commercial farmers with increasing business demands of the 1980s, considering that the federal government has already invested over $50 million in developing Canfarm and has provided direct and indirect aid to Canfarm in the amount of over $6 million, and considering that Canfarm has made substantial progress in gaining the support of farmers and accounting firms across Canada, I should like to ask the minister what steps the government is prepared to take to make sure that Canfarm, whose management technologies are in the forefront of this kind of activity, is not lost to the Canadian farmer and is not lost to Canadian agriculture in general?

● (1440)

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, there are 350,000 farmers in Canada, and between 5,000 and 6,000 belong to Canfarm. As the hon. member says, it is a very good program. We had a meeting again this morning with some of our partners in financing. We met with the Canadian Co-operative Credit Society for over an hour and discussed new ways and means of trying to keep Canfarm alive; but if those who applaud Canfarm so generously would encourage farmers to join Canfarm, that would be the simplest solution.

NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY ORGANIZATION

SITUATION IN POLAND—POSSIBLE SOVIET INTERVENTION—INQUIRY RESPECTING COUNTER-MEASURES

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and it is supplementary to that of the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands. Can the Secretary of State for External Affairs tell us whether the NATO ministerial meeting discussed in any detail potential forms of NATO reaction?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, I think the most I can say on that is that there was a very general discussion of all the possibilities of action and reaction and that there was a strong consensus on the part of the ministers.

Mr. Clark: Was it the position of the Government of Canada as represented by the Secretary of State for External Affairs or the Minister of National Defence at these NATO ministerial meetings, as distinct from the very general discussion the Secretary of State for External Affairs indicated ensued, that no specific discussion should be undertaken, and was that a minority position?

Mr. MacGuigan: Madam Speaker, we did not take any minority positions; we were always in the majority. In fact, there was unanimity in all of the questions discussed. I think perhaps the best way I can answer the question of the right hon. member is to say that there was agreement that foreign ministers would be called immediately on the intensification of the crisis and that that would be the appropriate time for decision-making on what courses of action should be taken.

PENITENTIARIES

DORCHESTER, N.B.—ALLEGATIONS OF VIOLENCE—CONFIRMATION IN REPORT OF SPECIAL INQUIRY

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General and it concerns recent very serious allegations of violence at Dorchester penitentiary. The Solicitor General has, up until now, categorically denied allegations that following the tragic hostage-taking incident on the D-4 range at Dorchester, prisoners on that tier were subjected to physical and mental torture, that they were stripped and handcuffed with their arms extended through cell bars and then maced and beaten about the hands for some five or six hours. The minister stated that he was relying upon eye witness reports of the warden and the fact, as he put it, that the RCMP were present at all material times.

Will the Minister now confirm that the RCMP were not in fact present at all material times, as he has stated, and that these very serious allegations of violence have been substantiated by the confidential special inquiry report of his own inspector general; and what action does the minister intend to take as a result of this very serious confirmation?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, my understanding from the information I have is that there was an RCMP officer present at all material times. I know that there certainly was an RCMP officer there for a great deal of the time following that incident. I can and will check into whether an RCMP officer was there for the five hours which the hon. member suggests were material.

As to allegations respecting whether further incidents or any incidents of violence took place, I repeat what I said before. I have the report of the inspector general to which the hon. member referred, and no such incidents following the release of the hostages in that five-hour period have been substantiated.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, I too have a copy of the confidential special inquiry report, and the minister has misled the House.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): The special inquiry report states, for example, and I quote:

> There is little doubt that many inmates were maced because they did not react to commands immediately and that they did not do so because they could not hear properly what was being said through the gas masks.

There was rough and unprofessional behaviour. Many inmates were beaten about the hands for some five or six hours. The RCMP were not present for the critical period of time. That is what this special inquiry report states.

In view of that and in view of the fact that until now the minister has stated that these very serious allegations should be subtantiated by an independent source and that the allegations have been substantiated by his own inspector general, is the Solicitor General now prepared to appoint a fully independent judicial inquiry to get to the bottom of this serious incident and the other serious incidents which have taken place at Dorchester so far?

Mr. Kaplan: Madam Speaker, I have not seen the language the hon. member read. He says he has a copy of the report. I thought I had a copy of the report as well. I took a quick look through it this morning. I would be very glad to see the copy of what the hon. member says is a report, to look through it and make a statement to the House about it.

Oral Questions

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

REQUEST FOR VOTE ON PRIVATE MEMBER'S BILL

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Madam Speaker, last month in the House I asked the Solicitor General a question which dealt with allowing one of the many private members' bills on capital punishment to come to a vote rather than it being talked out by members of the government party. The minister suggested I ask the government House leader that question since it was in his jurisdiction to determine whether matters of this nature should be allowed to come to a vote.

I will ask my question of the government House leader. Would he give serious consideration to allowing one of the many dozens of private members' bills concerning a return to capital punishment to come to a vote in this House of Commons and not be talked out by members of the government party?

Mr. Jelinek: And if not, why not?

[Translation]

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, I am advised that a similar bill was discussed not very long ago. I think it would be advisable to give a fair opportunity to all members who have sponsored private bills. We will follow the order established in the Standing Orders and in the order paper. I am convinced that the hon. member does not want us to violate the Standing Orders and deprive other members who have very interesting bills to discuss and are waiting their turn.

[English]

Mr. Domm: Madam Speaker, it is not giving everyone in this House a fair opportunity if the government will not allow a bill to come to a vote.

My supplementary question is also directed to the government House leader. If he will not listen to the opposition and allow these bills to come to a vote, would he listen to the people of Canada who through three years in a row have been surveyed? Gallup polls indicate that 70 per cent to 75 per cent of the people support a return to capital punishment. If the minister will not listen to the opposition, will he listen to the people of Canada and at least allow one of these bills to come to a free vote in this House of Commons, as promised by the former Conservative government?

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, I am advised, if I am not mistaken, that when the matter was discussed during private members' hour not long ago in this session, it was a Conservative member who indeed talked that bill out. In that case it was the hon. member for Edmonton East.

HOUSING

AHOP—ASSISTANCE RESPECTING SHELTER COSTS

Mr. John McDermid (Brampton-Georgetown): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Public Works who is responsible for CMHC. My question is with respect to AHOP. Under the program 30 per cent of income is allowed for housing for people who are suffering very severely. Mortgage rates have increased from 8 per cent to 15 per cent or 16 per cent. How did the minister inform AHOP owners of this plan, and how many have taken advantage of it?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, I assume the hon. member is speaking about the program change introduced in March of this year. That change guaranteed those people in the program whose shelter costs exceeded 30 per cent that those additional costs would be underwritten by the corporation and not be part of the demand for payment either under their repayment plan or part of their loan forgiveness. My understanding is that at the end of October approximately 420 people had qualified and had taken advantage of that provision. It was administered in the various local offices of CMHC across Canada.

Mr. McDermid: Madam Speaker, I would like to ask the minister, if the program is working so well, why 50 to 75 homes per month in my area of the county of Peel alone are being returned to CMHC. What is the minister going to do about that?

Mr. Cosgrove: Madam Speaker, I am very pleased to advise the hon. member that since the program change was announced in March of last year, the rate of claims against the fund has decreased. The number of defaults against AHOP has decreased. The problem is diminishing. Although it is severe in the hon. member's riding—and I appreciate that—I would like to indicate to the hon. member that when we consider that approximately 139,000 families took advantage of the program, and when there is is a decrease in defaults we are indeed hopeful that the improvement will be to the advantage of all.

SHIPPING

SUPERTANKER EXPERIMENT IN STRAIT OF JUAN DE FUCA—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Science and Technology and the Minister of the Environment. Recently he informed me that there is inadequate equipment on the coast of British Columbia to clean up an oil spill. A recently released United States coastguard report predicts that tanker traffic on the British Columbia coast will cause three major crude oil spills per year. Now the United States plans to bring a very large crude oil carrier through the Strait of Juan de Fuca in January, contrary to the marine mammals protection act and various United States federal regulations. Will the minister tell the House whether he supports this individual project for a crude carrier to come through the Strait of Juan de Fuca and, if so, is he now supporting the Trans Mountain or the northern tier project?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, I have not given my support to this project which, on the basis of information given to me, I understand is one that is taking place entirely in American waters.

NAVIGATION AND EMERGENCY PROCEDURE TESTS

Miss Pauline Jewett (New Westminster-Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Is he aware of the navigation and emergency procedure tests which are being planned for January by this oversized supertanker? Was the minister consulted, and what is he doing to inform the United States administration of our opposition to these plans?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, we have not made an objection to this specific trial run for the reason that it is not only within American waters, as my hon. colleague said, but also because on this occasion it will be carrying sea water rather than oil. So there is no possible danger on this occasion, but we have made it known frequently to the American authorities that we are very concerned about the possibility of tankers containing oil using the strait. Certainly we are not abandoning that position; we are pressing it strongly with Washington.

INQUIRY WHETHER PROTEST MADE TO UNITED STATES ADMINISTRATION

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, the Minister of State for Science and Technology and the Minister of the Environment, or to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Despite the acknowledged fact that these experiments can be carried out in United States waters, there are several related facts which ought to be borne in mind. First, that the currents carry northward from where the experiments will be taking place; second, that if these experiments are conducted without protest, it virtually forecloses any possibility of preventing the real supertankers from coming in. I ask all three ministers if they will rise in unison and say that they will protest—

Miss MacDonald: They would never agree.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): They could not speak with one voice, that is true. Why has no protest been made in this instance? It is sea water being carried, but they are not refining sea water, they are refining petroleum.

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, we have by no means given away our position—

An hon. Member: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacGuigan: No, we have not.

Mr. Nielsen: What position?

Mr. MacGuigan: —with respect to the passage in these waters of oil tankers. Our position is one of great concern which we have communicated consistently and persistently to the American authorities. But we believe we should protest voyages which can cause damage. This trip is an experimental one within United States waters by a tanker carrying a cargo of sea water. I ask my hon. friend how it is possible to make a formal objection to that kind of voyage.

FISHERIES

STRINGENT INSPECTION STANDARDS FOR EASTERN CANADA SEA PRODUCTS

Mr. Alexandre Cyr (Gaspé): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. The quality of fish remains a problem in eastern Canada and several factors are involved, such as the nets that are used and the storage of catches both on boats and on shore. It seems that for several years now the fish industry has shown greater concern for quantity than quality. Does the minister intend to adopt more severe inspection standards to improve the quality of our sea products?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for putting his question: it gives me the opportunity to answer highly erroneous articles published recently. The truth of the matter is that at times the quality of our fish production is not constant; foreign buyers not being advised of this, they do not know whether they are dealing with fish of prime or inferior quality. We intend to introduce a permit system that would set the standards to be respected in processing plants as well as on the boats that deliver fish to the plants. In that way, instead of having a problem in the future, we will, on the contrary, build up the Canadian reputation in the field of fish exports.

Oral Questions

McDONALD ROYAL COMMISSION

SUGGESTED PRO-GOVERNMENT BIAS OF MEMBERS

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton-Strathcona): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General. It deals with the McDonald commission and I shall put it in English.

[English]

The commission has been sitting for four years. One of its members made a $500 donation last year to the Liberal party while the commission was sitting. The chairman is the past chairman of the Alberta Liberal party. Recently it has been indicated that a complaint against his colleague, the minister of energy, was heard in secret and dismissed without hearing the minister. Does the minister not think that perhaps the point of a reasonable apprehension of pro-Liberal or pro-government bias has been met by the commission? Therefore, would he not consider turning over all the relevant evidence to the various attorneys general?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, the McDonald commission has proceeded for a very long time, and in that period of time it has certainly well demonstrated its independence from the government of the day. I am looking forward to its report and we are doing everything we can in government to co-operate with the McDonald commission so that the report will be of maximum use to Canadians when it is available. As I have indicated to the House, it will be received by the government by the end of next March. Shortly thereafter, all relevant findings and evidence will be brought to the attention of provincial attorneys general and to my colleague, the Attorney General of Canada. I hope that in very short order the recommendations of the McDonald commission will speak for themselves to Canadians regarding the independence of its work.

Mr. Kilgour: Madam Speaker, the question of a stale prosecution as a term of law does not seem to be well known to the Solicitor General. My question is one of apprehension of bias. The minister will be aware that Marshall Crowe was found by the Supreme Court of Canada to create such a reasonable apprehension of bias that he was unfit to consider hearing the Mackenzie Valley pipeline inquiry before the National Energy Board. Does the minister not think that the indications of pro-government bias already demonstrated by the McDonald commission are far greater than they were in the case of Marshall Crowe?

Mr. Kaplan: Madam Speaker, I am not aware of any evidence of pro-government bias by the McDonald commission. When members opposite formed the government, they had a full opportunity, if they felt that way, to do something about it. My understanding was that the government, which the hon. member supported, also supported and co-operated with the McDonald commission in the hope that its findings would be forthcoming soon and would be of maximum benefit.

ENERGY

INQUIRY RESPECTING CONTINGENCY PLANS TO ASSIST UNEMPLOYED OIL WELL DRILLERS

Mr. Bill Wright (Calgary North): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Last Friday in the House I quoted from the November report of the Canadian Association of Oilwell Drilling Contractors which indicated that 200 rigs were leaving Canada and that 10,800 workers would lose their jobs. On Friday morning the minister was present at a meeting in which the drilling contractors told him that the total could reach 200 rigs with 12,000 workers losing their jobs. Could the minister tell the House if he has any contingency plans to help those workers?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, we pretty consistently monitor job registrations and vacancies in the province of Alberta. I can report to the member that as of last week the number of registrations in our offices is down from what it was last year, showing that there is less demand for job applications than almost a year ago.

Mr. Crosbie: You have given up.

• (1500)

Mr. Axworthy: The fact of the matter is, Madam Speaker, that there is such an intense demand for labour in the province of Alberta, particularly skilled labour, that where there may be a small downturn in one part of the economy, or in the industrial sector, there is a very major upturn in other parts. There will still be a very intense demand for labour in the province of Alberta without any abatement whatsoever.

Mr. Wright: Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is addressed to the same minister. A recent financial magazine reported that there would be job losses in the following Ontario cities: Stratford, Welland, Hamilton, Sault Ste. Marie and Peterborough. Those were the only cities mentioned. I wonder if the minister could tell us if he is aware of the number of workers who will be laid off due to the downturn in the oil industry, and what are his plans to help these workers?

Mr. Axworthy: Madam Speaker, I think I just pointed out to the hon. member that there is already a very intense demand for labour in the province of Alberta. If the hon. member would look at the proposals and initiatives put forward in the budget, he would see that the kinds of incentives which are being offered major exploration and development and in regard to conversion from oil to gas, amount to approximately $8 billion to $10 billion worth of reinvestment back into the economy, which will create a strong demand in the entire country.

MUNICIPAL AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR EXTENSION OF COMMUNITY SERVICES CONTRIBUTION PROGRAM

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Public Works responsible for CMHC. In view of the concern being expressed by municipalities about the discontinuance of the community services contribution program, will the minister consider extending the program for at least one or two more years beyond the planned termination date of 1982, to allow projects which are now planned and committed to tender to be completed and so that these municipalities will be able to finish these projects?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, the government indicated there would be no extension in terms of the funding committed for this program. The funding is scheduled to terminate at the end of March, 1982. I have had submissions, not only from the hon. member but from many municipalities and other hon. members, to the effect that the time committed for the use of these funds be extended. These groups have asked whether that type of proposition would be available. The corporation officials have prepared a submission to the government and to Treasury Board asking them to consider the impact of such an extension of the period of time of payment, bearing in mind we are attempting to free up time and space for new program initiatives starting in March, 1982. If such an extension were granted it would have to be on the understanding that the moneys paid out in 1981-1982 would be reduced accordingly if moneys are paid out in 1982-1983. I am awaiting an answer with respect to that.

THE LATE JEAN LESAGE

HOUSE OF COMMONS TRIBUTE

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Acting Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I would like to pay tribute to the late Hon. Jean Lesage.

It is not easy to add any original thoughts to those which have been expressed since last Friday about the former Quebec premier whose passing we all regret.

Everyone has spoken very highly about the long list of reforms effected in Quebec during his term of office. This impressive list covers all fields of public activity and includes social, cultural, legal, administrative and economic areas. I do not intend to repeat this list.

We should note, however, the importance given to economic affairs in these reforms: the creation of Hydro-Quebec, of the deposit fund, of the General Investment Corporation, and so on. A former parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance in Ottawa, Mr. Lesage respected budgets and, during his six years in office, he remained his own finance minister. He also understood that the development of Quebec should perhaps be first of all an economic development.

[English]

All the reforms he introduced were not necessarily of his own invention. He recognized that first, before others did. He was a wonderful conciliator, a good orchestra leader, and a fine practitioner of the art of the possible. The best ideas in the world, as we all know, are not worth much if not properly channelled into contemporary realities.

Mr. Lesage throughout his life and until the end of it was keen to combine his Quebécité with his Canadianism, his provincial preoccupations with his respect of the central government. Yes, he did want a modern Quebec, but he wanted it in a Canadian federation. Having two eyes, he refused to close one. Having access to two cultural heritages, he refused to ignore the second. Living under two orders of government, he recognized the importance of both. In that, as in many other aspects, he leaves an important message.

[Translation]

In the tribute he paid to Mr. Lesage last Friday, the Right Hon. Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Trudeau) emphasized the importance given by Mr. Lesage to the renewal of the concept of state, the fact that, partly because of him, this concept had acquired a more positive significance in Quebec and even in the rest of Canada, and also the fact that, through Mr. Lesage, the state had become less an impersonal "it" and more a collective "we", and an instrument for action and progress.

Madam Speaker, all governments have a choice to make: laissez-faire—have it done or do it itself. Mr. Lesage, whom I do not consider a theoretician, believed that a balance could be stricken in this respect, and he gave us a good example of such a balance in harmony with his time.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, it was with regret that I learned last Friday of the death of the Hon. Jean Lesage. I would like today to join with the Acting Prime Minister and Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin), and all my colleagues of the House in paying tribute to Mr. Lesage and offering our deepest sympathy to his wife and the other members of his family.

Mr. Lesage had a remarkable political career. After thirteen years on the federal scene, he chose to direct his efforts more particularly toward Quebec. He became the leader of the Quebec Liberal party and premier of his province. Under his leadership, Quebec entered an era of deep change and intensive development, and he himself earned the name of "Father of the Quiet Revolution."

[English]

Jean Lesage will be remembered particularly for the profound and important changes which he introduced, and over which his government presided in the province of Quebec. As the Acting Prime Minister (Mr. Pepin) said, Jean Lesage always looked beyond his native province to see the country as a whole. He knew that the changes in Quebec must not simply be encouraged and allowed expression there but that they must be understood in the rest of the nation. I remember when I first had the honour to meet him, which was in my own region in western Canada, where he had come in the early days when the question was being asked as to what Quebec wanted in the hopes that he could answer, and with success he did answer that question being asked by Canadians who wanted to build the nation but wanted to understand all of its elements. He worked to bring change to his own province and to bring understanding of that change to all of the nation.

[Translation]

With the disappearance of Mr. Lesage, Canada has lost a distinguished citizen and Quebec a great premier.

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, Quebec has lost a great politician. He had been called, and rightly so, the "Father of the Quiet Revolution". He had promised significant changes for Quebec and he kept his word. He achieved his goal. Within a few years Quebec underwent transformation under his leadership.

Mr. Jean Lesage proved that one could be at the same time a Quebec nationalist and a Canadian. He was proud of belonging to Quebec and to Canada. Under his administration, Quebec became a modern society thanks to the social and economic reforms implemented by his government. Quebeckers today benefit from his important work.

Mr. Jean Lesage will remain in the eyes of all Canadians one of the most progressive and efficient politicians Quebec has ever known. Finally, Madam Speaker, personally and on behalf of my party I extend to Madame Lesage and her family our most heartfelt condolences.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. HAWKES—OFFICIAL REPORT—INVESTIGATION OF ERRORS AND OMISSIONS

Madam Speaker: I am sorry that the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Hawkes) has left the House at the present time, but I think that he will be happy to hear that we did check on the omissions in Hansard on December 8, 1980, which he indicated. He was right. The error to which the hon. member referred was an error in proof reading and the omissions occurred through a misunderstanding as the reporters changed over on the floor of the House. Both matters have been corrected and revised in the final version of Hansard.

HAZARDOUS PRODUCTS RECALL ACT

PROCEEDINGS DECLARED NULL AND VOID

Madam Speaker: Last Friday, through inadvertence, a motion standing in the name of the hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth (Mr. Scott) for the introduction of Bill C-622, an act to establish the hazardous products recall, was introduced. The bill was read the first time and ordered to be printed and ordered for second reading at the next sitting of the House. All this was reflected in Votes and Proceedings of last Friday but, regreattably, while the document with respect to the motion was prepared, the bill itself had not been drafted and, therefore, was not ready for introduction.

Standing Order 69 is very clear:

No bill may be introduced either in blank or in an imperfect shape.

I now find myself required to direct that the proceedings of last Friday relating to this bill be declared null and void and that the notice in the name of the hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth be carried on the order paper until the bill is drafted. The hon. member will then be able to proceed and to ask for leave to introduce the bill pursuant to the Standing Order.

POINTS OF ORDER

MR. PINARD—CORRECTION OF ERRONEOUS STATEMENT

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, earlier during question period I indicated in answer to a question by the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Domm) that the hon. member for York East (Mr. Collenette) was the last one to speak on a bill during private members' hour and prevented that bill from being put to a vote. I have checked and it seems that this was not Bill C-215 on capital punishment, but rather Bill C-216, on abortion. I have therefore inadvertently misled the hon. member for Peterborough. I apologize and I would ask that the report be corrected.

MR. OBERLE—IMPLEMENTATION OF CANADA BUSINESS CORPORATIONS ACT

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Madam Speaker, as you know I was seeking the floor of the House during question period. On a point of order, I would like to raise a matter which is rather serious. I was checking to see whether any of the government ministers would rise today on motions to make a statement with respect to a matter involving the Canada Business Corporations Act. When it was passed in 1975, the then minister said that on December 15, 1980, the act would be fully implemented, and that any Canadian company which was not properly registered by that date could have its assets confiscated by the government, and he outlined other serious possibilities for such companies.

It is my understanding that up to 12,000 companies have not yet registered, for a variety of reasons which are best known to the companies and which are also known to the government. Since today is December 15, what is the government doing to those federally incorporated small businesses in particular which have not registered? Will their assets be confiscated today, or is it the intention that one of the ministers will make a statement on motions, or some kind of statement, to inform these companies, which will be very anxious as to what the government's position will be with respect to this matter so that their anxieties and fears may be allayed? Is the government in a position to say something on this matter today, a very crucial date?

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, I shall check on the question put by the hon. member and make sure that he is given an answer as soon as possible.

MR. CLARK—STATEMENT MADE BY MR. PINARD

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, on a very minor point of order, I believe there was an error in the apology offered by the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard). He delivered an accusation against the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Yurko) and directed his absolution toward the hon. member for York East (Mr. Collenette). I think he will agree that he meant to absolve the hon. member for Edmonton East.

[Translation]

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, I never wanted to accuse the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Yurko). If I said York East (Mr. Collenette), it was Edmonton East that I had in mind, but I never wanted to accuse him. In any case, no such accusation was implied in my answer. In reading my answer in today's Hansard, the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) will note that I said "If I am not mistaken,...". I was indeed mistaken, and I simply corrected myself. I have too much respect for the hon. member for Edmonton East, whose motion on unilateral patriation of the constitution I supported, to accuse him in that way.

PRIVILEGE

MR. ROBINSON (BURNABY)—DORCHESTER PENITENTIARY—STATEMENTS MADE BY MR. KAPLAN

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege of which I have given notice both to yourself and to the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan). It concerns the question which I raised during question period today and it involves certain statements that were made by the Solicitor General to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, on October 30, and also on a number of other occasions.

The question of privilege concerns certain allegations which had been made by a number of prisoners at the Dorchester penitentiary following the tragic death of guard Bill Morrison and alleged violence which took place at the institution, specifically following that particular incident. I visited Dorchester penitentiary shortly after the incident, and both myself, members of the official opposition and, indeed, a member of the government party raised very serious concerns about the allegations which had been made, suggesting that it was only through the vehicle of a full independent judicial inquiry that we could get to the bottom not only of these particular allegations but of a number of very serious matters which had taken place at Dorchester Penitentiary over the past several months.

These include such occurrences as three hostage-taking incidents in the past eight months, one of them resulting in a tragic death of a prison guard at the hands of the IERT, the special team, the escape of four convicted murderers, the suicide of a prisoner, the allegations of widespread destruction of personal property of prisoners, and the substantiated allegation of shooting into the penitentiary gymnasium involving some 137 rounds of ammunition. It involves allegations of violence before the hostage-taking incident in which prisoners alleged they were victims of what was called psychological and physical torture. Finally, it includes the allegations of violence, of physical and mental torture immediately following the hostage-taking incident.

With respect to those allegations the Solicitor General on October 30, 1980, replied to questions by myself on the allegations, questions that following the hostage-taking incident, prisoners were stripped, forced to lie under their beds with their hands tightly handcuffed and their arms extended outside the cell bars, and that for a period of some five hours or six hours they were gassed and their hands were beaten. These are obviously very serious allegations. There were other allegations as well with respect to very serious acts of violence against individual hostage takers. In response to these allegations, the Solicitor General stated:

—I would be interested in holding a judicial inquiry only if an element of credibility were established in relation to that allegation. Otherwise the inmates would run our institutions—

The minister suggests that there was no credibility for the allegation.

At page 8:16 in the minutes of that committee meeting of October 30, the minister stated:

Now, you have referred to a number of specific allegations. You said that the inmates were stripped; that is true. They were stripped and they were searched after the hostage-taking incident ended. They were handcuffed so that the search could take place. Tear gas had been used in the institution during the entry to try to end the incident and capture the hostage takers, but there was absolutely no torture. Now, you say the inmates were beaten and gassed.

We come now to the critical words, Madam Speaker:

I categorically can deny that because independent witnesses were present during the time that took place.

This did not occur!

Now, this has satisfied me that there is no credibility to these allegations—

I should add, if any substance is added to any of the allegations of inmates by this process—

I suppose this refers to the various investigations.

—then a judicial inquiry could well be justified at some point down the road, but it is not now.

● (1520)

In other words, Madam Speaker, at that point in response to calls for a full, independent, judicial inquiry, not only by myself but by representatives of the official opposition, the minister said that these allegations were categorically unfounded, that there was no substance to them, but that if in the future there was some substance to them then indeed an independent judicial inquiry might very well be considered.

The Solicitor General went on and it was very clear that he was relying upon the warden of the institution, presumably, as well as other individuals four days later at the justice committee, when he said:

While the inmates allege that they were stripped, handcuffed to the bars of their cells, tear-gassed and beaten. At all material times the warden was present and members of the RCMP were present and they deny that anything like that happened, that the inmates were tortured at all, so I do not feel that that is an allegation that I should be concerned about.

One final quotation from the Solicitor General on November 4, Madam Speaker, is as follows:

But I feel those allegations have been sufficiently discredited in the last few days by a recent statement of the warden that he was present at material times with members of the RCMP who are, of course, outsiders as far as the correctional service is concerned and that no such gassing and beating took place.

Those statements were simply not accurate. The minister was misleading the committee and, through the committee, was misleading the House. I say that because I recently obtained a copy of the confidential special inquiry report drawn up by the Solicitor General's own officials, including the Inspector General, Mr. Renshaw, another independent person from New Brunswick, and another member of the Inspector General's staff.

There is no doubt that this confidential report is couched in rather careful terminology. That is not surprising. It is an in-house report attempting to put the best possible gloss on the events that took place. Madam Speaker, no matter how one reads this document it is very clear that what the minister told the justice committee, and through it the people of Canada, and this House, was absolutely unfounded.

I should like to refer to this confidential special inquiry report which rebuts fundamentally the statements made by the Solicitor General in which he categorically said, without hesitation, that those allegations were totally unfounded. The report starts out by stating that the staff at Dorchester were interviewed, that inmates on the range were interviewed, and that the hostage takers themselves who had subsequently been transferred, were also interviewed. There is then a chronology of events which took place at the penitentiary.

One of the critical points of the report is that immediately following the removal, the dragging of the hostage-takers out of that particular tier, for at least 20 minutes there were no independent witnesses present whatsoever. There were no RCMP officers—no independent witnesses at all, yet the Solicitor General said that at all material times independent RCMP witnesses were present. This report of his own inspector general says that just in not true, that during the critical period of time, the 20 minutes immediately following the removal of the hostage takers, there were no independent witnesses present and no RCMP officers whatsoever on D-4 range. The report goes on to say that there was absolutely no pre-planning, and I quote:

—there had been no pre-planning as to what was supposed to take place once the range had been secured.

One member of the security squad told everyone to sit on their beds and another one came along and told them to lie under their beds. They were stripped and told to lie under their beds. The report confirms that they were handcuffed very tightly with nylon handcuffs.

On the question of gassing, which the minister has denied took place, I quote:

Systematically, two IERT members—

That is the Independent Emergency Response Team.

—went from cell to cell and cuffed all inmates.

These were the inmates who were trapped on that tier. They were not involved in the hostage-taking in any way. They were innocent victims of what took place on that tier. The report states:

When an inmate did not respond immediately he was maced. An officer would grab the inmate's hands and pull on them to get them far enough out then cuff the wrists together.

For this they used flexicuffs, nylon bands approximately one quarter inch wide. The wrists were very closely bound and the cuff tightened snugly, with the hands in a prayer-like fashion.

The chronology continues. The incident started about 6.40. By 9.19 one of the hostage takers who was down in dissociation was being watched by the RCMP. He was their prisoner. The RCMP were so concerned about what was happening there that an RCMP constable told the IERT officers that he was the RCMP's prisoner and he did not want anything to happen to him. The RCMP officer did not like the way Enman was handled. Then, in an incident which even this special in-house inquiry report has referred to as degrading treatment of a prisoner, there were at least three masked IERT members who dragged one of the hostage takers, head first, across the main dome and down C-1 range to the hospital in such a way that his buttocks and back would slide along the floor. The report goes on to say that the RCMP again said to the guards that the RCMP were in charge and that it was not the guards who were running the prison at that point, because things were clearly out of hand.

Some five or six hours later the inmates on that tier were removed and taken to hospital. I have the reports of the medical inquiry which indicate very clearly that many of these prisoners were bruised on their hands and that they had other injuries. The report goes on to indicate that nine of the prisoners complained of having been maced, and kicked or clubbed on the hands. One complained of having been maced only, and two of having been maced or struck with a night stick.

Then we get to the factual conclusions which are directly at variance with what the Solicitor General categorically stated to the justice committee. This special inquiry in-house report states:

It is clear that the majority of the inmates were maced before they were handcuffed. Inmate Grealey's version is typical. 'My ears were still ringing from the explosion and all that racket when along came this guy with a mask on and he said something to me. I guess he was telling me to lay down but I couldn't hear well through his mask so I said: 'What did you say' and I got maced and went down.'

The inmates were all ordered to the floor (most at gunpoint), cuffed, and told to lie still. This rule was rigidly enforced.

One inmate said—

—'every time you'd move, you'd get maced or hit with a club or kicked.'

Then the report goes on:

The board has little doubt that a few discreet shots of mace were applied unnecessarily despite the presence of RCMP officers.

Of course, RCMP officers were not even there for a period of 20 minutes. The report continues:

There is also little doubt that some inmates were kicked in the hands or had them struck by a night stick—

That was categorically denied by the Solicitor General in misleading the justice committee.

I will come to the conclusion very shortly, Madam Speaker, but there were a number of other concerns that I wanted to point out briefly arising from this report. Another quote directly from the in-house report is as follows:

There is little doubt that many inmates were maced because they did not react to commands immediately and that they did not do so because they could not hear properly what was being said through the gas masks. There is also little doubt that inmates were handled in a rough fashion.

The report goes on to deal with rough and unprofessional behaviour and to express very serious concerns about the fact that all of these IERT members were unidentified, were anonymous. Finally, the report states that one of the inmates was subjected to degrading treatment by being dragged across the prison.

My question of privilege, Madam Speaker, is that the minister, in speaking to the justice committee, and through it to the House, has categorically denied there were gassings and beatings, and has stated that independent witnesses were present at all times. Both of those alleged facts are simply not true. No independent witnesses were present for the first 20 minutes at that tier. The minister's own in-house inquiry report clearly states there were beatings and gassings, that inmates' hands were handcuffed very tightly, that they were held there for five or six hours and at least one inmate was subject to degrading treatment.

In view of this, and in view of the fact the minister has misled the House, I have no doubt the situation had something to do with the warden of the institution having placed his own reputation on the line by saying he was present at all times and that none of this had occurred. Therefore, I assume the minister will take the necessary action with respect to that particular individual, because his own official has said that what that acting warden has stated is not accurate. However this arose, it is clear that the minister has a responsibility to the justice committee, to this House to which the justice commmittee reports, and through this House to the people of Canada, to state that he has misled the House and the people of Canada and that these very serious allegations indeed have substance.

Therefore, if Your Honour finds there is a prima facie case of privilege in this particular instance, I would be prepared to move seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles): that this matter be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections for a full and comprehensive examination.

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, I will be brief in my submission. However, I would like to say a few things about this report, which I confess I had not fully read by the two o'clock period today.

When I appeared before the justice committee and gave answers referred to in the statement made by the hon. member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson), I was relying on the information I had received, as he noted. However, I had been told and was well aware that another investigation was under way. That second investigation is the report from which my friend has read in such a totally distorted way, with no reference to many of the other matters contained in the report which certainly temper the impression which the hon. member for Burnaby has attempted to give to them.

I was quite satisfied, and I remain quite satisfied, that the events which took place following the release of the hostage takers cannot be characterized as a kind of revenge-torture session, which is the impression my friend has attempted to create. There is nothing in this report which indicates there was a revenge-torture situation. My hon. friend has this report. I intend to quote from it, and I know that that means the report will be made public. But in fairness to those who work for the correctional service of Canada I think the report should be made public. I say that because the way in which it has been read by my hon. friend totally distorts the findings, which I will come to, and the observations which were made.

First, I want to comment on the absence of the RCMP officer. The report does indicate, and this is somewhat inconsistent with the information I had, that for a twenty-minute period following the release of the hostages the RCMP officer was not present. But I believe the warden was present at that time. As I said in the justice committee, and as I believe to the present, although I am not certain, the warden was present. I understood he was present. I view him, having met him and interviewed him, as an honest and independent person in such a situation. I believe my friend is of the same opinion, and perhaps that is common ground between us.

I must state that I knew about the handcuffing, but there has been an attempt to create the impression that this is a revelation. However, I indicated to the justice committee that these people were handcuffed and that was a totally legitimate procedure in those circumstances.

I want to come now to the beatings and the macings. Doctors both inside and, I believe, outside the institution examined inmates following this incident. The board interviewed them as well. Although the statements which my friend read are accurate, and members of the House will have a chance to read them for themselves, the hon. member read only half of each paragraph, for example, when the hon. member said 12 inmates were interviewed and nine complained of having been maced, kicked or clubbed in the hands and one complained of having been maced only, and two of having been maced or struck with a night stick. I knew about those allegations, as did my hon. friend, but I indicated to the committee that I believed revenge-torture had not taken place. I shall now read from the same report which my hon. friend relies upon, although he left this part out. It states:

None of the fourteen inmates suffered any serious physical injuries. There were no observations made by medical staff of any injuries at all to the top of the hands, which would have been the case had the officers in fact jumped on the hands.

My friend read the first part of that paragraph but he did not read the medical evidence. He just read the allegations.

I want to read three more portions to which my friend referred in a distorted way. The first is:

—McCready complained of having been burned in the face by mace. McCready's file indicates that he is allergic to dust. As a result, Health Care Officer Gallant feels that the redness about the face was more likely caused by the allergic reaction from lying face down on the floor for a few hours.

Mr. MacKay: How many hours?

Mr. Kaplan: I think four to five hours.

During the question period, the hon. member for Burnaby read another half paragraph which reads:

There is also little doubt that some inmates were kicked in the hands or had them struck by a night stick.

As I said, this was news to me. When I stood up to answer the question, I had not yet read that part. But the report goes on to state:

—the lack of physical injury indicates that these incidents were few and of low intensity.

On that score I feel justified in making the statements I made before the justice committee, relying on the information upon which I then relied.

Coming to the conclusions, we read:

After reviewing the foregoing facts, the Board finds that . . .

(1) The force used to effect the arrest of the hostage-takers and their subsequent removal from D-4 Range to the dissociation areas was, having regard to all circumstances, not excessive.

(2) There is no evidence to indicate that inmates 2579 DESROCHES and 3321 WRIGHT were subjected to excessive force or mistreatment.

(3) Inmate 0592 ENMAN was subjected to degrading treatment while being transported from the dissociation area to the institutional hospital.

(4) The keeping of 14 inmates secured to their cells—

This referred to the handcuffing and the lying on the floor of the inmates. It continues:

—on the D-4 Range, while police were gathering physical evidence was justified.

(5) With the following two exceptions, all inmates on D-4 Range, including the hostage-takers, were guarded by CSC staff under the observation of RCMP officers at all times:

(i) A period of approximately 20 minutes immediately following the removal of the hostage-takers from D-4 Range.

(ii) Inmate ENMAN was transported from the dissociation area to the institutional hospital without police observation.

(6) All remaining D-4 inmates underwent a medical examination upon being moved from D-4 Range. No serious injuries were recorded.

(7) There was a lack of pre-planning for the orderly securing of all remaining D-4 inmates—

The hon. member for Burnaby referred to that.

The final recommendation is:

(8) The total anonymity of IERT members is not advisable.

I can tell the House that we are changing that procedure. We are putting numbers on the IERT uniforms so that an inmate will know exactly who is approaching him from the IERT. This recommendation will be implemented in the next day or so.

● (1540)

When I read parts of the report and my friend reads parts of the report, it sounds like two different reports. The sentences he read are there. In many cases he has just read half sentences. When I look at the findings, I insist in substance no torture or vengeance took place following the freeing of the hostages. The information I gave to the justice committee was justified. I believe hon. members who read this report will draw their own conclusions and will come to the same conclusion. Therefore the motion by the hon. member for Burnaby is ill-founded.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker: Does the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce (Mr. Allmand) want to speak on the same question of privilege?

Mr. Allmand: Yes, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: No. I do not think I can hear him if those incidents occurred under his administration. If necessary, I could perhaps let the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce explain himself. But this is a discussion following a report of which only one person in the House has a copy. I have the feeling that the hon. member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson) has the copy, and the minister himself, of course. At first glance, I think there is a difference in the interpretation of the facts.

Perhaps we do not have two reports, as the minister says, but if there is only one report, we have before us two interpretations of the same report which are very different. Off-hand, I have the impression that it is a different interpretation of the facts, but to make sure, I shall take that question as notice, because it is very important.

[English]

Mr. Kaplan: Madam Speaker, since I failed to do so while I was speaking, I wonder if I might have permission now to table this document.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Madam Speaker: The minister may table the document.

Mr. Kaplan: Madam Speaker, I am in your hands as to one matter. The document is in English only at the moment. A translation can be prepared.

Madam Speaker: That is the minister's choice. If he wishes to table it now in one language only, he may do that. If he wishes to defer, I will accept that, too.

Some hon. Members: Table it.

MR. ROBINSON (BURNABY)—STATEMENT MADE BY MR. KAPLAN

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, I recognize the ruling you have made, but there is another matter which arises from the remarks the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) has just made to which I must draw attention. The minister has again misled the House in the remarks he just made.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. If the hon. member feels he has some reason to rise again, he may do so on a new question of privilege.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): That is what I am doing.

Madam Speaker: The discussion is now closed. The hon. member has had an opportunity to present his point and the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) has replied. I have to close the discussion in so far as that question of privilege is concerned.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): With respect, Madam Speaker, this is a new question of privilege arising out of the minister's response. The minister once again misled the House on a very fundamental question of fact in his reply to my initial question of privilege. The minister indicated that on October 30 he stated:

> Now, you say the inmates were beaten and gassed. I categorically can deny that because independent witnesses were present during the time that took place.

The minister said that at that particular time on October 30 he knew there was another independent inquiry, that a special inquiry was under way into these allegations and on that basis he was giving the response he gave on that point. That simply is not true. On October 30, 1980, this special inquiry had not even been commissioned. For the minister to suggest that he knew this special inquiry report would be forthcoming very shortly and on the basis of certain information which he had, to be supplemented by the special inquiry report, he made the false and misleading statement that he did, is false and is misleading this House. I call upon the minister to admit that a decision was not made to have another special inquiry into these allegations until well after that, in the month of November.

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, my friend was reading from a report of the justice committee. I do not have the report in front of me. I believe I have been before the justice committee three times. Each time I have been asked extensive questions about the incident at Dorchester.

I was under the impression the hon. member was reading from a statement I made during my most recent appearance when I was anticipating this report. At that time I was asked the same questions he had asked me the time before. The answer sounded like the one I gave when, as I say, I appeared there the last time.

Of course I did not know in October that this second report would be justified or called for. Therefore, the hon. member is quite right about that. I will retract that statement if I have his permission to do so. I knew at that time when we were talking on October 30—well, Madam Speaker, I am trying to recall now. I want to be very precise about the times. I cannot be, because on at least three separate occasions before the justice committee I have been questioned about this.

The report of the incidents that took place following the hostage-taking have been made public. You, Madam Speaker, and the public generally can draw conclusions from it.

Hon. Allan Lawrence (Durham-Northumberland): Madam Speaker, I would like to say a few words with respect to the question of privilege. I am not too sure which one we are on. They both amount to the same thing, namely, that the justice committee and this House have been misled by the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) with regard to the contents, the interpretation and the misapprehension he has deliberately attempted to convey to the committee, the House and the public. I refer to the contents of investigative reports resulting from the great tragedy which took place in Dorchester in connection with the death of guard Bill Morrison and the results of the various investigations which have taken place with regard to that tragedy.

I do not know which one we are on. It does not matter much to me. We are on the second one? That's fine. They all fit in together in a pattern in any event. The pattern has been that the minister has intentionally attempted to leave the wrong impression in the committee and in this House as to what happened at the time and since that tragedy, and also with regard to the various investigating groups.

The tragedy in Dorchester Penitentiary took place on a Friday night. On the following Monday in this House, the minister was asked if a report would eventually be made to the House. The minister very deliberately said that within a few days the group he had set up would be reporting to him and, within a few days, that report would be released. That was not off the cuff, nor was it off the top of the minister's head. Exactly the same question was asked the next day, the Tuesday, in this House, and essentially the same reply was given.

Later the minister backtracked and backtracked greatly, in the House, at a press conference and at the meeting of the justice committee, and this obviously affects the privileges of the members of this House. He said at that time that he would not necessarily release the contents of the report when he got it, in direct contradiction to what he had said in the House, because now another group would take a look at it, namely, there was to be a coroner's inquest.

• (1550)

At a subsequent meeting of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, the minister indicated that he had received the report and, after receiving it, realized that the report itself said the same things that had been said at the inquest and had come to the same conclusion. I might have missed something at the justice committee meeting, but at that time I am firmly convinced that the impression which the minister attempted to convey was that that was the end of it so far as he was concerned, that there was only the one report in his hands, and that there had only been the one group set up in his department to take a look at the whole matter.

We now find that that group was reconvened as a result of certain allegations that were made, and that the minister has only now received the second report from the same group, which is quite different from the misleading impression he had attempted to give.

This might be merely semantics, and perhaps the time of the House has been wasted by this because perhaps this is the usual conduct of the minister—I am not sure. In any event, I plead with the minister to take into account that the problem with which the House is faced at the moment, the problem which he has forced members on this side to bring to the attention of the House at this time, is solely and simply the result of attempting to hide things somewhere under the rug and keep them secret.

Quite frankly, we took the heat off the minister in the week after this tragedy because of his absolute commitment to this House that he would be releasing the initial report. The long and the short of it is simply this: he did not release that report to this day, which he should do because he gave that commitment. The only way we found out that the same group was reconvened and has now presented a second report is simply because some of the officials at Dorchester or in the department have leaked it to opposition members. This is the only way in which we can find out these things, and that is part of the continuing tragedy of Dorchester and part of the continuing tragedy of the whole correctional service organization so far as this government is concerned. I also say it is a personal tragedy so far as the minister is concerned because he does not live up to the commitments he gives to members of the House or members of the justice committee.

Madam Speaker: The minister has had a chance to reply to the hon. member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson), but I suppose that had he known at the time that other hon. members would want to speak on this question, he would have reserved his comments and spoken later. I believe I have to give the minister a chance to reply, but now I see that other members are asking for the floor. Perhaps the minister would prefer to be recognized later. I think that would be much better for the Chair because then I will be able to hear what reply the minister makes to the statements.

I shall recognize the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay), followed by the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce (Mr. Allmand), who insists on being heard on the second question of privilege, and then the minister will have the floor.

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Madam Speaker, my intervention will be very brief. I listened with a great deal of attention to what has been said so far, and I would just like to add another dimension, or make a suggestion to my friend, the minister. I shall be very interested to hear the comments which will be made by the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce (Mr. Allmand), the former solicitor general.

I want to suggest to the present Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) that there is ample precedent for making him very skeptical indeed of the quality of information which he receives from the RCMP. I do not know about penitentiary officials, but there is at least one precedent where the commissioner of the RCMP misinformed the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce when he was solicitor general. It is quite clear to me that the results of that particular bit of misinformation had some very tragic effects, which still exist to this day, on a number of members of the force and former members of the force.

I hope that when the minister is replying on this very serious matter he will tell the House whether he is still taking all of the information conveyed to him by the RCMP on blind acceptance because, if he is, he is much more foolish and naive than I think he should be.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Madam Speaker, as a member of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs and a former solicitor general, I had received many letters from inmates of Dorchester Penitentiary alleging provocation, harassment and cruelty on the part of some of the staff against certain inmates following the tragedy which took place. I must say that I was not surprised, because things like that had happened in the past, and, when investigated, were found to be true. I want to make clear that such allegations were not made against all staff, but some staff had been found guilty of such actions in the past, so it did not surprise me that it might take place again. Consequently, when this matter was raised before the justice committee, I also put several questions to the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) about it. He replied to me in much the same way as he replied to the hon. member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson), that he felt there was no evidence to substantiate the allegations.

Now it seems with this report, and I have copies as well, that there is more evidence than there appeared to be in the first place. Once again, as pointed out by the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay), this does not surprise me, because I learned through bitter experience as Solicitor General that you just cannot rely, unfortunately, on much of the information that is given to you about some of the tragic events which take place within our criminal justice system.

I have tried to caution the minister against accepting such flat statements of non-guilt on the part of staff, and have suggested to him that perhaps there should be a more independent and more exhaustive inquiry into this matter. I pointed out that under the Liberal party and with Liberal governments over the past five years faced with similar incidents, we did have independent inquiries.

After the death of Mary Steinhauser at B.C. Penitentiary, we appointed Chief Justice Farris to investigate that matter. Following the terrible riot at Kingston penitentiary, my predecessor, Mr. Goyer, had appointed Attorney Swackhamer from Toronto to conduct an independent inquiry into that incident. During my term of office we had also appointed Judge Ducros of the Quebec Superior Court to investigate irregularities at the Laval Institution, and when there were irregularities at the Millhaven Institution we appointed a board of inquiry made up of four members of the House, the former Mr. Speaker when he was chairman of the justice committee, Mr. Jerome, the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald), Mr. Stuart Leggatt from British Columbia, former NDP member, and one other member, to investigate Millhaven penitentiary, because the prima facie evidence, while not fully substantiated in advance, indicated that there was more serious trouble there than the staff wanted to admit.

My intention this afternoon is not to demand retribution from the minister, because I think he probably spoke in good faith in reporting to the justice committee and in reporting to the House, but I caution him not to rely entirely on what he is told, and what comes up to him through the line, with respect to certain serious incidents of this kind. I hope that he will shortly announce to this House or to the justice committee the type of action he intends to take on the findings in this report, to discipline those who perhaps have misled him. If he feels that a more complete inquiry is necessary, I repeat again that there are many precedents for complete inquiries, some of which I mentioned in the last few minutes. When he spoke before the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, he said he would not rule out a more extensive inquiry if more evidence was brought forward to support the allegations. It seems to me that more evidence has now been brought forward, but he may wish to take definitive action instead of having another inquiry, and that would be acceptable to me as well.

Mr. Kaplan: Madam Speaker, I appreciate the sympathy for me in my job which has been expressed by hon. members. I want to make just a few points in reply to specific comments which have been made by hon. members.

There is very good reason for not making reports of this nature public. Now that one has been made public because of what I want to assert is its misinterpretation, the House once again is given the opportunity to look at a report and contemplate the wisdom of that rule. Names of inmates in that institution have now been made public. In some cases their former offences are described. This may endanger some of them. It certainly could endanger the order of the institution. Similarly, guards may be named. The types of jobs they hold and perform in the institution are described. Certain operational procedures are commented upon. I am not certain as to whether some physical details of the institution are described in this particular report.

Mr. Speyer: We have to rely on you.

Mr. Kaplan: However, for all these reasons and because of the risks involved in those kinds of disclosures, it has always been the practice to keep reports confidential. When the first report was in the course of preparation I indicated, as my friend, the hon. member for Durham-Northumberland (Mr. Lawrence), has pointed out, that I would be prepared to make a statement later. I said I would be prepared to or, if the House wanted one, I would. I do not feel I made a definitive commitment to do so, but I used words of that sort. The reason I was saying that at this time was because wild allegations were being made which in their way are as damaging to the good order of an institution as the other disclosure to which I referred arising from the report as it was tabled.

I thought that if wild allegations were going to be made and believed by the public, it would be better to make a full statement of facts at that time. Subsequently the coroner of New Brunswick indicated that he would be holding a public inquest into the matter, and it seemed to me—and still does—that it was desirable that the facts be brought out through evidence at that hearing. That is exactly what happened. The evidence was given before the coroner. Conclusions were reached by the coroner. I could say that substantially all of the facts which were available and which are consistent with the facts in the internal report were given by witnesses who appeared before the coroner at that public hearing, and they are available.

Mr. Lawrence: Why not release the report?

Mr. Kaplan: Since the findings of fact were substantially the same, I did not feel at that point that there would be much to be gained, if anything, by making the report public, against the risks of the problems of disclosure to which I referred in connection with this special report.

Mr. MacKay: What problems?

Mr. Kaplan: The last time I appeared before the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs I was aware that a second report was being prepared, and I am not certain that I said so, but I indicated, as the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce (Mr. Allmand) quoted, that more information would be coming to my attention.

In any event the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce has quoted me as saying that if more information comes out or more allegations are substantiated to my satisfaction and in a way which justifies taking further action, that action would be taken. That information has come. It has now been made public. I have had the opportunity in the last hour or so to read the details of that report. I feel that the findings of this inquiry are definitive. I would like to take another look at all of the facts. I would like to discuss this with members of the Correctional Service of Canada. In fact the only reason I did not read the report last weekend was that I knew I would be seeing, at my regular meeting, officials of the correctional service of Canada later this week, and I did not see the urgency of reading the report at the precise time it was handed to me.

Mr. Beatty: This is a sad admission.

Mr. Kaplan: I felt I would be doing my job if I devoted myself to preparing for matters which would be arising today, tomorrow and Wednesday, and doing the things necessary to prepare for Thursday afternoon somewhat later during the week. I think the hon. member who just made an observation would know, as a former minister, that that is a very sensible way to organize the use of one's time.

Mr. Collenette: He wasn't a minister long enough.

Mr. Kaplan: I would like to indicate to the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce that I do not automatically believe everything I am told by officials. I do try to establish alternative lines of communication so that when incidents occur I do not have just an official version but that I also have other versions. This was illustrated by the way I handled the Dorchester incident. I called the correctional investigator and asked him to do his own investigation. He is an official whose position was established by Parliament. He is not accountable to the correctional service of Canada. It was intended that he conduct investigations, I called upon him to undertake one, and I had two meetings with him at which we discussed what he had found when he went there and interviewed witnesses.

Mr. Lawrence: But only you see the report.

Mr. Kaplan: I have tried to establish a direct relationship with the inspector general, who conducts these investigations. I do not feel he should report to the commissioner and that the commissioner should report to me. I have been a member of this House for many years, and I have seen the problems which can arise in one way or another. I am well aware of them, and I take this into account and try to have alternative means of obtaining information. I travel to institutions and speak to people on-site. I have spoken to warden Corbett. I spoke to him following the incident on at least two occasions. From what I can see, I think he is a good warden. I think he is a sensitive individual who is very conscious of all the human problems as well as the security problems involved with running a prison. I look forward to continuing to work with him as the warden of Dorchester.

As I understand it, this matter of privilege is before us so that whether there is validity can be determined. I stand by the substance of what I said in the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. Nothing in this report challenges that. No revenge torture took place. It does appear that there was rough treatment following the release of the hostages but, as the report says, that rough treatment was not considered in general, except in the case of Enman's treatment, to be excessive.

At an early opportunity, perhaps in the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, I will indicate the ways in which the recommendations made by the coroner's inquest, in this report and in the first report, are being implemented.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker: That second question of privilege is obviously related to the first one. I shall also take it as notice and I shall render my decision on both of them on the same day.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 1,013, 1,496 and 1,695.

I ask, Madam Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

TELIDON SYSTEM—PROGRAMMING—HEARING-IMPAIRED CANADIANS

Question No. 1,013—Mr. Beatty:

1. Is the government committed to the development of the Telidon system closed captioning of programming for hearing-impaired Canadians instead of encouraging the use of the system designed by the American PBS?

2. Is the government discouraging the use of the PBS system on programming designed for Canadians who are hearing-handicapped?

3. What is the time-frame for having the Telidon system commercially available?

4. What is the anticipated cost to deaf Canadians for the Telidon system and how does this figure compare to the cost of equipment compatible with the PBS system?

5. Will the Telidon system enable Canadian viewers to decode programming employing the PBS system?

6. What specific action is the government taking to increase the amount of programming available for the deaf?

7. What are the government's projections of the number of hours per week of programming for the deaf available over each of the next five years over Canadian broadcasting networks?

8. Does the government intend to make the Telidon system available for deaf Canadians through broadcasting, cable or a combination of the two and what is the timetable for making facilities available if they will not be introduced simultaneously?

9. What discussions, if any, have been held with Canadian broadcasters on the question of captioning or interpreting programming for the deaf and what steps have been taken by the broadcasters to increase such programming?

Mr. Peter Stollery (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): In so far as the Department of Communications is concerned, the answer to the above question is as follows: 1. In the long term the government is committed to the development of a Telidon-based closed captioning delivery system of providing television programming for the hearing-impaired for at least four reasons:

(a) It is felt that the potential value of Telidon to the hearing-impaired is far superior to that of the PBS system, although the latter is already operational while the former is yet to be;

(b) A full-service Telidon system would provide the deaf with a whole range of interactive services in addition to closed captioning, without their having to purchase a separate device which would serve only to provide captioned television;

(c) For the sake of fully exploiting a vast international market for Telidon, it would be preferable to have one system which would provide captioning "plus" rather than two separate and therefore competing ones, which would result only in unnecessary market fragmentation to both;

(d) Telidon technology makes more efficient use than the PBS system of the electromagnetic spectrum, which is a scarce resource, thereby freeing more spectrum to be used for other, non-related purposes.

It is, however, equally important to state, and to emphasize, that the department is actively pursuing with the Canadian Co-ordinating Council on Deafness, the National Film Board, the CBC and others, the development of an interim Telidon-based system for captioning. Indeed, draft specifications for such a decoder now exist and were presented at the Canadian Videotex Consultative Committee (CVCC) this spring. A special subcommittee of the CVCC which was given the mandate to examine the issue of television and the deaf recommended on September 27, 1980, that the Department of Communications establish price and availability for a Telidon decoder of minimal capability with an optional capability for decoding captions from the National Captioning Institute in the U.S.A. The Department of Communications is currently going out to industry to obtain this information.

2. No, the government is not actively discouraging the use of the PBS system. In fact, I am in agreement with the subcommittee on captioning's recommendation to the CVCC that no action be taken that may inhibit the orderly introduction and use of the system such as implementing regulatory, tariff, trade or broadcast barriers, at least until an equivalent Canadian system becomes available. However, the Telidon system is projected to be available in a similar time-frame, and the government wishes the hearing-impaired community in Canada to be fully aware of this goal to enable them to decide for themselves which device they will purchase. From recent information obtained from the manufacturer of the PBS decoder, the marketing of the decoder may be delayed because of the unavailability of "chips" from the manufacturer of the integrated circuits which has a two-year exclusive right to produce them. Also, the Canadian version of the PBS decoder requires an additional "chip" to display the French symbols. This chip has not yet been designed and, therefore, a Canadian version of the PBS decoder may be further delayed. This means that for the deaf to await the arrival of a Telidon terminal next year, should not result in any disadvantage. Moreover, captioned versions of U.S. programs are now being provided in some localities by cable companies allowing subscribers to use only a normal cable converter in the home. There is, therefore, already a low-cost alternative to the PBS decoder in these regions.

3. A "mini" Telidon terminal (comparable to and optionally compatible with the American decoders now available in the U.S.—but not capable of providing the full range of potential Telidon services) should be available on the Canadian market by next year.

4. It is expected that the Telidon terminal will be comparable in cost to the American devices—that is, approximately $350. Ability to decode off-air captioned programming from the U.S. would represent an additional production cost. Exact costs will be volume-sensitive, and the market demand has not been quantified at this time.

5. Yes, but at an optional cost where direct reception over the air is involved.

6. The government has no direct control over the programming provided by broadcasters. However, the government has long been urging and will continue to urge the broadcasters, in general, and the CBC, in particular, to provide for the needs of the hearing-impaired. Ultimately, the amount of programming available to the deaf is a matter of economics, as it is currently estimated (in the U.S.) to cost $2,000 to produce a single hour of captioned television programming. The NFB, the CBC and NH&W are currently putting together a proposal for the Government's consideration to develop a Canadian caption centre from which the CBC and other broadcasters in this country may have captions added to their Canadian programs. In addition to captioned material for the deaf, specially made programs for and by the deaf are currently offered by various cable systems in the country, of which the government wholeheartedly approves and which it urges the cable industry to increase wherever possible.

7. The CBC is proposing to make substantial amounts of French and English captioned television network programming available once a Canadian caption centre has been established, in addition to the interpretation (or "sign" language) provided on such broadcasts as the House of Commons coverage. Beyond that, it is not presently possible to project over the next five years specific amounts of programming that may be offered by private broadcasters. At separate licence renewal hearings last year of both the CBC and CTV networks, before which the deaf intervened, the CRTC urged the broadcasters to provide captioning at the earliest opportunity, but the CRTC recognized the economics involved.

8. The Telidon system will be available both off-air and via cable simultaneously. In the meantime, some cable companies, on their own initiative, have begun to provide American captioned programming which is now being delivered by three U.S. networks off-air in an "open" format (i.e., only the cable head end need be equipped with a decoder; the viewer does not require one at home) in border areas on converter channels.

9. Many discussions at various levels have taken place involving officials of this department, the CBC, NH&W, NFB and the cable industry, as well as with organizations of/for the hearing-impaired over the last two or three years. The response to these discussions to date has been limited by three factors:

(a) the simple fact that until only a few short months ago the technology was not in place, even in the United States, after some nine years of discussion there;

(b) the high cost of producing captioned programming; and

(c) the fact that the government has no authority to compel the broadcasters to provide such programming.

Nevertheless, positive progress is being made, and I am expecting to receive from officials at the NFB, in the near future, a proposal which they are currently collaborating on with the Department of National Health and Welfare. A final note is that an information paper prepared within my department on "Television and the Hearing-Impaired" has been released in the last few months, and is available on request to the public. This document is intended to provide basic information on this matter to all interested parties.

FOREIGN CLAIMS FUND

Question No. 1,496—Mr. MacKay:

1. Did the government contribute to the Foreign Claims Fund or its operations and, if so, in what amount and on what dates?

2. Did any foreign governments contribute to the Foreign Claims Fund or its operations and, if so (a) which governments and what was the amount and the date of receipt of such contributions in each case (b) have funds been sought from other governments and, if so, which ones?

3. (a) On what dates did disbursements to claimants begin in regard to the above governments and on what dates were they completed (b) what was the total disbursements to claimants, by government (c) what were the costs of administering the fund in regard to staff, accommodation, travel and the like?

4. At the end of each fiscal year since 1975, what was the balance on hand?

5. Are payments currently being made in respect to claims against the fund in regard to Algeria and Czechoslovakia?

6. Are negotiations currently under way or planned, with reference to the Foreign Claims Commission, in regard to Cuba, Yugoslavia, the German Democratic Republic and the Soviet Union?

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Departments of External Affairs and Finance as follows: 1. The Government of Canada has made the following contributions to the Foreign Claims Fund in respect of expenses of the Foreign Claims Commission:

$ 1,000	May 1967
30,000	January 1971
40,000	March 1972
20,000	March 1974
36,000	March 1975
31,000	March 1976
47,000	March 1977
55,000	January 1978
36,000	December 1979
39,000	March 1980
$335,000

2. (a) The following amounts have been received by the Foreign Claims Fund in accordance with agreements concluded between Canada and five foreign governments:

Government	Amount	Date
Bulgaria	$ 40,000	August 1966
Hungary	1,100,000*	August 1970—August 1974
Romania	1,400,000	July 1972—October 1974
Poland	1,225,000	June 1972—June 1978
Czechoslovakia	3,250,000	November 1973—November 1979

* In addition amounts totalling $239,912.27 were transferred to the fund under the Treaty of Peace with Hungary in respect of Hungarian assets formerly vested in the custodian.

(b) Funds have not been sought from other governments as voluntary contributions to the fund, however, it is expected that funds received in future from other governments as a result of agreements in respect of claims will be deposited in the fund.

3. (a) and (b)

Payments to Claimants up to September 30, 1980

Country	First	Last	Amount
Bulgaria	June 1967	August 1968	$ 41,296.95
Hungary	May 1972	July 1978	1,500,540.88
Roumania	January 1973	October 1977	1,523,237.26
Poland	July 1973	In progress	1,161,984.30
Czechoslovakia	October 1974	In progress	980,177.39

Payments are complete in the case of Bulgaria but in the cases of Hungary and Roumania small amounts remain to be paid pending advice from the claimants. The interest earned by the fund made it possible to pay claimants more than the amounts received from those governments as shown in answer 2 (a).

(c) Costs of adjudication and administration paid from the fund have amounted to $684,274.62 up to March 31, 1980.

4. Fiscal Year End Balances of the Fund

Date	Balance
March 31, 1975	$2,575,594.72
March 31, 1976	2,874,920.78
March 31, 1977	3,444,100.66
March 31, 1978	3,487,097.80
March 31, 1979	3,676,084.72
March 31, 1980	3,408,045.12

5. Payments are currently being made in respect of claims against Czechoslovakia but not in respect of Algeria.

6. Negotiations with Cuba in respect of Canadian claims have been completed and it is expected an agreement will be signed shortly. The government of Yugoslavia has agreed to investigate Canadian claims and it is expected negotiations will commence when those investigations are completed. Initial discussions have been held with the German Democratic Republic and the latter has agreed to investigate Canadian claims referred to it. There have been no negotiations held with the Soviet Union nor are any planned in the immediate future.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL FISCAL ARRANGEMENTS AND ESTABLISHED PROGRAMS FINANCING ACT, 1977

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. Pierre Bussières (for the Minister of Finance) moved that Bill C-24, to amend laws relating to fiscal transfers to the provinces, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

He said: Madam Speaker, the bill whose second reading we are now broaching is designed to amend laws relating to fiscal transfers to the provinces. The bill now before the House will implement changes to the structure of fiscal agreements between the federal and provincial governments. Under those arrangements, the federal government will transfer over $12 billion to the provinces in 1980-81. That amount reaches almost $17 billion if we also take into account those payments related to the transfer of taxes under the Established Programs Financing Act. The financial effects of the changes provided under this bill are important in absolute terms and are an integral part of our efforts to limit government expenditures. However, they are of little importance compared with the total amount of transfers paid to the provinces by the federal government.

I should like to add that Bill C-24 is identical to Bill C-26 that was introduced on December 11, 1978. Moreover, the minister of finance of the previous government stated on November 6, 1979, before the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs that he intended to implement the provisions of Bill C-26. Bill C-24 therefore implements what has been federal policy for over two years.

This bill is important in at least two regards. First, it proves that the federal government must adapt to evolving circumstances. Fiscal arrangements are not static and must be revised from time to time to take into account new facts of life. Second, the provisions of this bill reflect the will to reduce expenditures and the federal deficit.

We know that all administration levels share that purpose.

Bill C-24 provides amendments to two statutory programs. The first relates to the equalization payments authorized under the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements and Established Programs Financing Act, 1977. The second aspect of the bill has to do with the payments made under the Public Utilities Income Tax Transfer Act. I will deal briefly and specifically with both questions.

Hon. members recall that the equalization program is meant to authorize the transfer of sufficient revenues to the have-not provinces to enable them to provide satisfactory public services without levying higher than average taxes. I would like to point out that the equalization program ultimately rests on the capacity of the provinces to provide those services. And the program performs that role by estimating the revenues which each province would draw through the levy of average tax rates on its basis of assessment and by adjusting upward such potential revenues in the case of provinces below that average.

Thus we make sure that those provinces have sufficient financial resources to finance the main public services. Equalization is one of the most important programs of the federal government and I want to assure the House that we remain firmly committed in that respect. The very substantial payments which continue to be made under the program indicate quite well the federal commitment in that area. Indeed, the payments will be over $3.3 billion in 1980-81 even if the bill is passed by the House. Newfoundland and Prince Edward Island will each receive more than $600 per capita in 1980-81, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia over $500 per capita, Quebec and Manitoba each more than $250 per capita.

The equalization formula encompasses nearly all the revenue sources of the provinces, including those drawn by the provincial government from their oil and gas resources. These revenues from oil and gas resources have increased sharply in the past five years. In particular there has been a spectacular rise in the revenues of the provinces from the sale of exploration and oil and gas development rights. These revenues have gone from $253 million in 1976-77 to $932 million in 1977-78 yet they remain very unstable and varying.

It is obvious that the costs borne by the provinces to provide services have not risen at the same pace as the revenues drawn by the rich provinces from their natural resources. Furthermore revenues coming from the sale of rights differ from the ordinary revenues of the provinces given the fact that they come from the sale of assets. For these reasons it is considered that these revenues should not be included in the equalization formula.

The present bill provides also for the gradual suppression over a period of two years of the revenues from the turning over of Crown concessions on oil and gas fields for the purpose of equalization. Even if we take into account this change, the equalization payments to the provinces will increase by $311 million in 1979-80 and by $130 million in 1980-81. Each of the seven provinces receiving equalization payments will share in these increases. Saskatchewan's shares will go down in 1980-81 by comparison with the previous year, but this decrease will not be due to the provisions of the bill before the House, Bill C-24.

The bill also includes another change in the equalization formula. This change is based on the principle that the provinces in which per capita personal income is regularly higher than the national average should not be eligible for equalization payments. The reason for this change is that such a province can provide for its residents the services which they normally expect. Obviously, it would be inappropriate to make equalization payments to an economically strong province, such as Ontario, simply because Alberta revenues from oil and natural gas are increasing. This is what would happen under the present formula. This would seriously threaten the basic purpose of the equalization program and the capacity of the federal government to finance it. The situation of Ontario within the equalization program will be given priority during the next renegotiation of financial arrangements for the period from 1982 to 1986.

We must also ensure that a province where the per capita income is only temporarily higher than the national average will not be excluded from the equalization formula. This provision would therefore only apply during a year where per capita personal income in the province is higher than the national average that year and the two previous years. We would therefore take into account a period of three consecutive years where the average in the province would be higher than the national average.

If I may, I would now like to speak about the Public Utilities Income Tax Transfer Act. Hon. members may recall that the government announced on September 8, 1978, in the context of the expenditure restriction program, its intention to eliminate the payments made under this act, which allowed the federal government to transfer to eight provinces and both territories 95 per cent of the federal income tax paid by public utilities of the private sector for the production and distribution of electricity and natural gas.

In determining the restrictions concerning tax transfers, the government judged that all provinces, and not only those who receive equalization payments, should play some part in the cutback of federal expenditures. The public utilities income tax transfer program met this objective since it included not only five of the seven have-not provinces, but also Alberta and British Columbia. Originally, this program aimed at eliminating any attempt by the provinces to nationalize for taxation reasons the public utility companies of the private sector. This was the purpose of reimbursing the income tax paid by these utilities. The federal government had also expressed at the time the hope that these reimbursements would be passed on to consumers as rate reductions. In fact, while this program was being implemented, a large number of private companies were nationalized. The only provinces where there are still some private hydro companies left are Alberta, Newfoundland and Prince Edward Island. Furthermore, it is only in Alberta that federal payments were in fact passed on directly to consumers.

When the program was created in 1947, the rate of payments was set at 50 per cent. That reached 95 per cent in 1966 when the Churchill Falls project was launched. However, despite this increase in the transfer rate, which allowed Newfoundland to receive all the income that would have accrued from the federal income tax, the province eventually nationalized these facilities.

After the government announced its intention, on September 8, 1978, of eliminating completely this transfer payment, that is of decreasing it from 95 per cent to zero, representations were made by the provinces concerned as well as by certain public utilities and some consumers. The federal government therefore decided to reconsider its proposal. This bill effects a compromise by reducing transfer payments, as of taxation year 1979 for corporations, from the present rate of 95 per cent to an initial rate of 50 per cent. So instead of dropping from 95 per cent to zero, the rate will go down to 50 per cent.

Mr. Speaker, that summarizes what I wanted to say on the main provisions of this bill. Essentially, it would bring needed changes to the present equalization formula so that it is not unduly affected by the rapid increase in oil and gas prices, and it would also effect a compromise with respect to the Public Utilities Income Tax Transfer Act. Even though these changes are proposed with a view to cutting back expenses, which is an objective all members of this House support, there are no doubt some members who believe that this reduction in transfer payments to the provinces is unjustified. But considering the level and the rate of increase of these transfers, it is absolutely impossible to slow down the rate of increase in federal expenditures without decreasing slightly the rate of increase of these payments. And it is with those goals in mind that I ask hon. members to approve this bill on second reading.

Mr. Kilgour: Mr. Speaker, would the minister allow me to put a question to him about his comments?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Would the hon. minister accept a question?

Mr. Bussières: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Very well then, the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Kilgour) has the floor.

Mr. Kilgour: Mr. Speaker, if I may, I shall ask two questions. First, does the minister approve of the nationalization of electric power companies in Alberta and, second, how much, as of now, is the federal government going to pay the Ontario government?

Mr. Bussières: Mr. Speaker, about the first question, it is a matter of opinion and if I were a member of the legislature in a province where there are private electric power companies, I could say what I thought about it. However, I do not see what purpose it would serve for me to say what I think about a purely theoretical matter that does not concern the federal jurisdiction at all. As to exact amounts, I must say I did not commit them to memory, but I can assure the hon. member that in committee I shall give him readily and in detail the exact amounts involved. I am sorry I do not have them here now.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, this is an omnibus bill which deals with equalization and also the Public Utilities Income Tax Transfer Act. With respect to the equalization problem, this party recognizes the government's concern. Indeed, if this bill were not passed the government's deficit would increase by at least a billion dollars, and probably by the end of 1982 by about $2 billion in total, so that equalization would be payable to the province of Ontario. In effect this bill will remove the right of equalization from the province of Ontario. The province of Ontario, for a number of reasons which I will mention later, is perhaps prepared at this time to go along with the bill.

• (1630)

The second part of the bill deals with the Public Utilities Income Tax Transfer Act. This bill particularly affects a part of our country in which there has been some concern about how the federal government is operating with regard to what might be called crushing individual rights of people, and that is the province of Alberta.

My party has suggested to the minister that if he will withdraw section 3 of the bill, we will make sure that the bill passes all three stages today. But if this section is to remain in the bill, we are concerned that the terms of the bill will be used by those who might advocate the break-up of our country, as another grievance. The amount of money involved is not that much. Our estimate is that at the very most we are talking about some $30 million spread over two years. That is an insignificant amount of money in terms of the government's budget.

Mr. McDermid: They can spend that in ten minutes.

Mr. Blenkarn: Indeed, as my friend has said, the government could spend that money in ten minutes. I am not sure that I could spend it that rapidly, but we are fast approaching that level of expenditure. If the government would indicate that it will withdraw clause 3 of this bill—and we appreciate the fiscal problems of the goverment—then we are prepared to let clause 1 and clause 2 of the bill pass. We suggest that the government, in light of the political climate of today, should not concern itself with the minor amount of money involved in clause 3 and that it immediately indicate that it will withdraw this clause from the bill.

Perhaps the government may wish to introduce that clause later, and perhaps it may be a question of discussion in dominion-provincial fiscal matters as they transpire, but it is a matter which will be used by people who are at this point—perhaps rightly, perhaps wrongly,—inflamed over the actions of this government in connection with the budget, the constitution—

Mr. McDermid: Energy.

Mr. Blenkarn: —and, as my friend has indicated, energy. It may be used by these people as another grievance which might well tear apart the fabric of the country. We are not asking for very much. The minister may wish to reflect on what I have said.

This party has always believed in equalization of provincial revenues. It is a fundamental precept of my party. Indeed, this party, under the hon. member for Yellowhead (Mr. Clark), when he took over the leadership of the party, convened a conference at Kingston at which all Conservative premiers of the day met and fully endorsed equalization. Included among those premiers was the premier of Alberta, who has clearly stood behind the principle of equalization. If it were not for the confrontational techniques of this government, there would not be near the problems which we face today with respect to energy taxation. There would be agreement.

The Progressive Conservative Party, both provincially and federally, is fully behind the principle of equalization. We have a number of concerns about the question of equalization, but I think the principle of equalization was well spelled out by the Hon. Mitchell Sharp in 1966, when as minister of finance he said equalization represents:

> —one of the dividends of Canadian unity, designed as they are to enable all Canadians to enjoy an adequate level of provincial public services. Where circumstances—whether natural or man-made—have channelled a larger than average share of the nation's wealth into certain sections of the country, there should be a redistribution of that wealth so that all provinces are able to provide to their citizens a reasonably comparable level of basic services, without resorting to unduly burdensome levels of taxation.

There are several methods by which equalization could be obtained. Perhaps the easiest method is spelled out in the bill, that equalization should be on the basis of the gross provincial product divided by the number of people in the province. If a province has a better ratio than the average, that province should be deemed a have-province, and if the province has a worse relationship than the average, then that province would be deemed a have-not province. Equalization would be on the basis of equalizing the gross provincial domestic product available for provincial taxation.

Unfortunately our system of equalization is not the one which I have just mentioned. Our system has been described as a representative tax system in which some 29 items of provincial taxation are equalized. This group of 29 includes such diverse items as personal income tax available to the provinces, business tax revenues, tobacco taxes, gasoline taxes, revenues from the sale of beer as opposed to liquor, and so on. There are 29 separate items. Under the current system we try to equalize, for example in the case of personal income tax, by taking all the revenue of the province from personal income tax and multiplying it by the population of the province or the per cent of population.

For example, the province of Newfoundland has 2.43 per cent of the population of Canada. All provinces receive $10.7 billion in revenue. Therefore, they multiply that dollar figure by 2.43 per cent. The average revenue of the province of Newfoundland would be less than the figure arrived at, therefore there would be a claim for equalization, based on equalizing that particular source of revenue. Each province is equalized on these 29 items of revenue. A plus figure or a minus figure is arrived at and the total at the bottom of the pile is determined by adding the pluses and subtracting the minuses.

For example, with regard to personal income taxes Newfoundland would be entitled to $129,000, but since it has certain mineral revenues, water power rentals and so on, these revenues are all taken off as equalization and you add and subtract until you get $343.8 million, which was the figure for the 1979-80 fiscal year. This applies to every province. I might point out that in the case of Ontario, if that formula were used in fiscal year 1979-80, Ontario would be receiving $255 million. The effect of this bill is to prevent Ontario from receiving $255 million to which it would otherwise be entitled if the system was as it is written in the act. The effect of this bill is that it takes that money away from the province of Ontario.

The problem which has developed was set out to some extent by the minister, but I would like to set it out again for the benefit of the House. There are only three provinces in this country which have any significant oil and gas revenue at the present time, and those provinces represent a relatively small portion of the population of Canada. Indeed, the population of Alberta has only 8 per cent of the population of Canada. The problem is that when you add oil and gas revenues into the pot, you wind up with a levering effect.

I want to explain to the House what in fact has happened. Because the province of Alberta has such a relatively small population and such a relatively large revenue from oil and gas, the province of Alberta's revenue is equalized into the totality of what is to be equalized. The effect is that as you increase the revenue from oil and gas and oil, the system would remain the same. A dollar increase in revenue in oil and gas generated in western Canada increases the federal government's responsibility to equalization by 78 cents. That is the kind of relationship you get, whereas if you had an increase in revenue in another source, say, personal income tax in a province, that increase of one dollar would only increase the obligation for equalization by seven cents. In other words, there is a levering up because of the relatively small population of the province of Alberta, and that levering up affects the whole equalization process.

The problem, of course, is that the federal government's revenue does not come, or has not come until this stage, from natural resources. The provinces' and the federal government's revenue has come from the traditional sources of personal income tax, corporate tax, customs duties, sales tax, and the like. In fact, the province of Ontario contributes 43 per cent of the tax revenue that the federal government has. That 43 per cent winds up being revenue used to equalize. As the revenue in western Canada available to provincial parties increases, the demand on the federal treasury increases and, consequently, the demands that are placed on the province of Ontario.

Indeed, sir, if you analyse the tax base you find that of federal revenues, 29 per cent comes from western Canada, that is, the four western provinces; 28 per cent of federal revenues comes from the five eastern provinces, including the province of Quebec; and 43 per cent comes from Ontario. The huge increases in provincial revenues in the west do not cost the west, in terms of equalization, anything like they have cost Ontario.

The result is that the province of Ontario, probably not being as altruistic as one would think, is saying, "Look it, don't give us equalization, because if you do—if this bill does not go through—the real burden on the people of Ontario will be even greater." And so, whereas the province of Ontario, as I said at the beginning of my remarks, might well be entitled over the total period of this bill, and to March 31, 1982, as a result of an increase in oil and gas prices, to as much as $2 billion, it is prepared to forgo that. I think that is a very important thing, that the people of Canada should know that the province of Ontario is prepared to forgo revenue that it would get in equalization. The point of the matter, of course, is that the system is wrong, as the minister says, and this is just a patch-up bill.

What we would really be happy to see is a new bill, because there is a solution. A solution would be to change what you equalize. There is absolutely no reason why we should follow the existing equalization pattern. There is no reason why we are not equalizing on the basis of gross domestic product. There is also no reason why the federal government should attempt to equalize oil and gas revenue when the federal government has no access, or up until now has no access, indeed, constitutionally, has no access, to oil and gas revenues. The federal government has no right to royalties on Crown-owned land. The federal government has no right to rents on Crown-owned land. That is constitutionally not proper. There is no reason then why the federal government should attempt to equalize that type of revenue; it should be equalized separately. It should be equalized by an agreement between the provinces setting up a separate provincial fund to equalize, in some fashion, the fact that some provinces have massive natural resources, and that they do not need to pass that equalization money through the federal government. Indeed, the federal government has no right, sir, to say, "Because we have to have equalization we have the constitutional right to seize resources, seize revenues that are really provincial, because we are going to spread some of them out to the provinces."

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Blenkarn: One of the reasons why people are opposed to the entrenchment of equalization in the constitution is that they view that entrenchment of equalization in the constitution as perhaps a method by which the federal government could seize what is really provincial resource assets, resource revenue, and use that seizure as an excuse for equalization, or use equalization as an excuse for seizure.

What we have to do is go along with the suggestion, without confrontation, but in a sense of compromise, to have the provinces between themselves equalized with their own revenue—the excessive revenue that accrues to some provinces by virtue of their ownership of resources—and have the federal government only equalize that which the federal government receives to equalize.

An. hon. Member: Hear, hear!

Mr. Blenkarn: Sir, we have a problem in the country. Our problem is that one of our provinces is almost a Kuwait. The revenues in the province of Alberta have been such as to almost knock the spots off Canada. Alberta has provincial and local government services that are among the best in Canada. It has no sales tax, no gasoline tax, no residential property tax for school purposes, and by far the lowest individual corporate income tax rates. In its 1979 budget it retired all municipal debt. It is almost a Kuwait. It still has a billion dollars of possible surplus, and its Heritage Fund is increasing, and increasing, and increasing. It is almost a Kuwait.

One of the grave dangers to our confederation is that one part of Canada may become so exceptionally wealthy that it is able to supply services to its inhabitants far in excess of what any other part of Canada can supply, is able to have tax rates far lower, or, indeed, no taxes. Indeed, there was a proposal that Alberta abolish all corporate taxes. There is no doubt about it, that with the revenues that were not diverted to the Heritage Fund, they could abolish all taxes in the province of Alberta and rely on oil revenues. The situation is a matter which must cause great concern to a government which should be trying to keep a country together.

● (1650)

I refer to the Economic Council of Canada report of last year entitled "Two Cheers for the Eighties". One of the great cheer problems for the 1980s is the issue of development and taxes. At page 57 of this report we find:

> The issues this development raises are political rather than economic, although the way in which they are resolved will have a bearing on the nature of economic management in the country. The federal government is in a poor position to continue to play its major role in economic management, equalization of provincial revenues, and the conduct of major national policies. In most areas of economic policy, achieving national objectives will require extensive provincial participation, or these objectives may never be met. There is an urgent need for more co-operation. In the longer run, the fiscal structure of the federation will have to be rebalanced and better institutional arrangements will have to be developed to cope with the challenge of interdependence between the federal and provincial governments.

That is what has to be done.

What do we have from this government? We have confrontation where we should have accommodation. We have a situation where we have Pierre and Peter fighting with each other. We have a situation where we do not get down to brass tacks. We do not make arrangements where provinces could do some sharing without the necessity of the federal government being involved. I point out to you, sir, and to the minister, that every Conservative premier agreed to equalization at the Kingston conference. There is no reason why that cannot be effected. There is no reason why we could not have an equalization bill and an equalization arrangement among provinces with respect to natural resources revenue which would solve the problem this bill is skirting around.

One concern expressed by the province of Ontario is the effect of the present equalization system. In fact in many cases there is overequalization. The reason for that is you wind up using this 29-tax item. Instead of using gross provincial product relationship to population, a study in the province of Ontario shows that this year the federal government will spend $628 million more in equalization payments than it should spend if it used the gross provincial product system with relation to population. I ask the minister why that has not been a policy of this government.

The present system is unfair. It tends to overequalize. It tends also to create a situation where natural resource revenue must be financed and equalization paid out of other revenues. That situation cannot go on. Even though we have reduced the equalization of non-renewable resources to 50 per cent, we still wind up with that continuous problem.

One thing which bothers me about this bill is that it continues to leave the province of Saskatchewan as a have-not province even though that province can afford to set up a heritage fund. It is the only have-not province with a heritage fund. The minister says it gets only $52 million. But it seems strange that when the province of Ontario, which has no oil to speak of, no heritage fund at all, and with a billion-dollar deficit, is prepared to come to the government and say, "Yes, we will forfeit our share to equalization," yet the equalization bill does not refer to the province of Saskatchewan, and allows Saskatchewan to continue to be treated as a have-not province. This is a ridiculous situation. When the minister introduced this bill, I would have thought that that particular concern would have been brought to his attention.

In the last few minutes I have before five o'clock, I would like to speak about the Public Utilities Income Tax Transfer Act. At the beginning of my remarks I said that we are very concerned about this portion of the bill. There are several problems with it. Aside from its possible use by those opposed to our confederation, the bill tends to make it more profitable for a provincial government to set up a Crown corporation. Provincial Crown corporations under the British North America Act, as the minister knows, are not taxable.

When the British North America Act came into being in 1867, there was no intention that provinces should set up businesses as Crown corporations. The situation we have today is that what may have been a service originally has been treated almost as a business. For instance, we have Ontario Hydro selling hot water tanks, electric stoves, air conditioners, and whatever. Consumers' Gas Company, a private utility company, is affected by this act. It pays its corporate tax. The corporate tax money goes back to the province of Ontario and it is kept in general revenues. That corporation is not entirely a public utility. It is a merchant. It sells new gas furnaces, hot water tanks and whatever else it can sell. In my riding the corporation has a display room where it merchandises all kinds of products. In other provinces there are Crown corporations which are certainly intended to be in business. For example, the potash corporation in Saskatchewan is intended to be in business and intended to make a profit. It is not a utility. It could never be described as such and it pays no tax. This bill encourages a province to take gas and hydro companies and make them public corporations under the jurisdiction of the provinces, so they will pay no income tax at all.

The minister must look at whether we can continue having Crown corporations in Canada in business and paying no corporate tax, certainly no corporate tax to the federal government. If the provincial government wants to waive corporate tax for its own entities, that is one thing—and provincial governments can do that if they have the revenue to do it—but as far as the federal government is concerned, every time one of these companies is made a Crown corporation then the federal government's share of revenue becomes less and less.

Does the minister see any advantage in messing around with the Public Utilities Income Tax Transfer Act? All it will do is encourage provincial creation of Crown corporations on which no federal income tax will be paid. The minister may say—

VETERANS AFFAIRS

SUGGESTED EXTENSION OF BENEFITS TO SURVIVING VETERANS OF SPANISH CIVIL WAR

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of providing veterans' benefits to Canadian members of the Loyalist Republican forces who fought in Spain between 1936-1939.

He said: Mr. Speaker, there are few motions which have given me greater pleasure to move and have considered in this House. Basically, what we are attempting to do is have the government and people of Canada finally recognize the contribution made to and on behalf of our country, indeed on behalf of the democratic ideal, by a group of Canadians some 1,250 strong. Without any organized payment by anybody, they decided to take it upon themselves to leave this country, from British Columbia through to Newfoundland, and fight on behalf of the forces of democracy those enemies of democracy who attempted and were eventually successful in overthrowing the democratically elected government of Spain.

As pointed out by my colleague, the hon. member for Regina West (Mr. Benjamin), we are dealing with about 200 surviving veterans of the Spanish civil war whose only mistake, if it can be described as a mistake, is that they were anti-fascists before it was fashionably popular to be so. They were the idealists, from all walks of life across Canada, different backgrounds and of different ethnic groups, who recognized something that other Canadians and people throughout the western world were slow to recognize.

They saw that the forces of fascism and nazism were fighting as one. They saw that Mussolini's Italy and Hitler's Germany looked upon Spain as the first arena in which they were going to fight the cause of anti-democracy. They were going to attempt to subvert democratic and liberal democratic institutions. The vast majority of these idealists fought in the battalion now known as the Mackenzie-Papineau battalion.

Others fought privately and joined other battalions on behalf of the Spanish republican forces.

The first thing the government did in 1936 when these people went to Spain was to declare them illegal. They were made outlaws in their own country by the passage of the Foreign Enlistment Act. In order to get to Spain, they were forced to go hither and yon. They had very little official support from any government or diplomatic agency in Britain, France, or wherever. If they were shot or wounded, they had to rely almost entirely on their own resources and the resources of a number of Canadians who were prepared to contribute to their welfare. Basically, this was a self-help operation.

These people have been described in many ways. One of the most interesting descriptions is by Hugh Garner in his novel "Cabbagetown" which, as many members know, is a description of working class life in Toronto during the depression. At the end of the novel, the hero decides to become one of these idealists who were to fight fascism before it became fashionable. He gives a very good description, a very evocative description, of who some of these people were. In describing these people, Mr. Garner wrote:

They were a ragtag of communists, socialists, trade-unionists, social-reformers, intellectual anarchists, liberals, and the just plain angry, from twenty countries, drawn together by a strange social osmosis, yet each man's reason as individual as he was himself. The Internationals had already proved themselves in the suburbs of Madrid, in University City and Casa Del Campo, these amateurs who sometimes defeated the Spanish regular army, the Moors, the Spanish Foreign Legion, the Carlists, the Falange, the Italian Blackshirt divisions, aided by the German Condor Legion of the Luftwaffe, and the Portuguese. None of them knew it then, but they were already doomed to defeat, not by Spanish fascism, or Hitler, but by the machinators in Whitehall, the Quai d'Orsay and on Washington's Capitol Hill.

The war in Spain was a great and noble cause, a democratic and social democratic cause. It was not, as has so often been described when this matter has been raised as it has in this House on a number of occasions, a private war, with soldiers of fortune going off to fight in it. As I said before, this was the central arena where the forces of fascism decided to become involved. What in fact happened in that war was that Mussolini's Italy and Hitler's Germany—the Luftwaffe, as my friend for Regina West suggests—used that war in order to test their weapons.

Throughout all this time the governments of the west, England, France, Canada and the United States, were following appeasement and the doctrine of appeasement. The notion was that all you had to do was give Hitler a little more, and that was all he would want, it would be sufficient. One had to recognize the principle of absolute neutrality, even though that principle was being breached every day by the fascist powers.

The principle involved here is very simple and basic. The principle is that if the Government and Parliament of Canada can, through the War Veterans Allowance Act and all the legislation which applies to veterans in Canada, provide for pensions and allowances not simply for Canadians, but for members of the allied forces who are now Canadian citizens who fought in World War I, World War II and the South African war, there is no reason why, retroactively, it is not possible to designate those Canadians who fought in the Spanish civil war on behalf of the Spanish forces as equally entitled.

I want to anticipate for a moment the response of the government and of many people. The first statement is that they were simply soldiers of fortune and we cannot go around subsidizing people who fought in any individual war anywhere in the world, that it has to be a war officially declared by the Canadian government. Let me deal with that problem very briefly.

• (1710)

I do not see why, retroactively, Parliament cannot admit that perhaps the Government of Canada made a mistake when it passed the Foreign Enlistment Act. I do not see why Parliament cannot recognize that those people, whose only mistake was to have been unfashionable, should now be granted some recognition by virtue of the fact that the war which they were fighting in Spain was exactly the same cause which so many other Canadians fought and died for only three years after the Spanish civil war began. In fact it was the continuation of precisely the same kind of battle between the same kind of forces. The fight between Vichy France and Canadian troops, the fight between fascist Germany and Canadian troops, and the fight between fascist Italy and Canadian troops was exactly the same fight as the fight between fascist Spain and those Canadians who chose to ally themselves with the Spanish republican forces in 1936.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rae: Indeed, the Spanish government itself has now recognized this by granting pensions to all those who fought on whatever side. If the Spanish government is capable of doing that and capable of attempting to rebuild its democratic institutions, recognizing that retroactively one can attempt to rectify mistakes one has made, I see no reason why the Canadian government should be any less generous and less forthright. We are not dealing with tens of thousands of individuals, because we are not dealing with vast amounts of money, we are dealing with a principle.

Some will say, "Well, if we do it in one case, we will have to do it in every other case." All I can say is that this is a matter for the discretion of Parliament. It is for Parliament to decide that, on balance, those Canadians who were fighting in a given theatre of war were in fact fighting for principles and ideals, the same principles and ideals for which Canadians themselves were officially engaged to fight some years later. I say it is an important act of discretion for us to be able to do this.

Let me say very briefly, Mr. Speaker, that when my colleague, the hon. member for Regina West, raised this matter most recently in Committee of the Whole, as I have been raising it and as our leader raised it last year, he put a question to the minister with respect to the treatment that is being accorded to those 200 Canadians who live throughout Canada, many of them in very difficult conditions. When he raised this question, as reported at page 2731 of Hansard of July 9 of this year, he was told by the minister:

> Mr. Chairman, I planned to make some reference in this regard but I see that time is moving on. The hon. member may not know but this is under consideration by the department. I have no answer for him today other than to say that it is under consideration.

I had discussions about this matter with the minister, the Hon. Daniel MacDonald, when he was alive, and he indicated to me privately that he was considering the matter and that he realized the difficult circumstances in which many of these veterans found themselves. He realized the anomalous distinction between those veterans who fought in the Spanish civil war and went on to fight for the allies and who were receiving pensions, and those veterans who were so ill after 1939 that they were unable to continue fighting, and who are receiving no pension.

I look forward to hearing the government's response because it is a matter of principle, it is a matter which involves, I think, the exercise of collective compassion on the part of this Parliament, and also a question of retrospective political judgment, to recognize that the official wisdom of the time was the wisdom of appeasement. In Canada, the official wisdom was the wisdom of not getting involved in any foreign wars.

If you read the diary of the Prime Minister of the day you will see that when he went to visit Hitler, he was very impressed. He thought that a marvellous experiment was going on in Germany and he could not understand what all the fuss was about in Spain. There were many, many Canadians, not all of whom fought in the Spanish civil war but many of whom fought in the Second World War and worked for the government in different ways, who recognized the fact that the policy of appeasement, the official wisdom of the time, the official policy of Chamberlain, the official policy of Daladier, that policy, was bound to lead, as it inevitably did, to the Second World War because, unless Hitler was resisted in Spain, unless he had been resisted years before in Germany, unless he had been resisted in the 1920s in his country, one could see the writing on the wall in terms of the intentions of the nazi idea, the notion of total domination of Europe by a totally reactionary and inhuman philosophy.

There were many people who were wrong about Hitler, many people who were wrong about Spain, many people who unofficially decided that they would take it upon themselves to do something in which they believed, which was to fight in a war which was not popular. So they were declared effectively to be outlaws by their own government. But when you read the description of the return of the Mackenzie-Papineau battalion to Toronto in 1939, you recognize the fact that this was a popular and courageous thing to do. By that time, in 1939, the public of Canada recognized the fact that indeed these people had a great deal of courage and deserved recognition.

I want to conclude my remarks now, Mr. Speaker, because there are a number of other hon. members who want an opportunity to speak and because I want to hear from the government. I think this is a matter on which it should be possible to achieve some agreement. I want to close by quoting from George Orwell's book "Homage to Catalonia". George Orwell was even more courageous, unofficially, tha others. He decided to fight his own group on the left among whom there was a great deal of in-fighting in terms of which side or which way one would go in the Spanish war. He was wounded and he came back to England. I think his description of England would fit very well the description of Canada by someone who came back from Spain at that time. I will read it because I think it is a good description of the contrast between what Orwell found in England in 1939 when he returned and what he knew was on the horizon. He wrote:

Down here it was still the England I had known in my childhood: the railway-cuttings smothered in wild flowers, the deep meadows where the great shining horses browse and meditate, the slow-moving streams bordered by willows, the green bosoms of the elms, the larkspurs in the cottage gardens; and then the huge peaceful wilderness of outer London, the barges on the miry river, the familiar streets, the posters telling of cricket matches and Royal weddings, the men in bowler hats, the pigeons in Trafalgar Square, the red buses, the blue policemen—all sleeping the deep, deep sleep of England, from which I sometimes fear that we shall never wake till we are jerked out of it by the roar of bombs.

Those words were written before the outbreak of the Second World War. They were written by someone who, having fought in the war in Spain, having seen the awfulness of the political conflict there, recognized that there was a deep complacency within his own country and his own society, a complacency in people who could not come to grips with the fact that a war was going to be fought between those people who believed in democratic institutions and those people who believed in exactly the contrary.

Canadians, perhaps, slept an even deeper sleep than those in Europe who were much closer to the conflict. Canadians who went overseas, who fought in Spain and returned to say "appeasement will not work, this is a force that has to be fought, a force that has to be fought with guns because it cannot simply be fought with words", those who lost their lives—and there were hundreds of them—and those who were wounded—and there were hundreds of them—came back to Canada as official outlaws, but as unofficial heroes to many, many people.

Many of them went on to fight in the Second World War. Many of them were unable to fight any longer because of the seriousness of their illnesses, but all of them have one thing in common, and that is that none of them, by virtue of the fact that they fought in the Spanish Civil War in the battles of Jarama, Brunete, Quinto, Belchite, Fuentes de Ebro, Teruel, The Retreats and The Ebro, will be as well known as those Canadians who "officially" died. But dare one say that their fighting for democracy in Spain was just as important, just as worthy now, finally, of our official recognition as the fighting of those Canadians who sacrificed so much for us in the First World War, in the Second World War and in Korea, and, indeed, who continue to risk their lives in the keeping of peace throughout the world?

Mr. John Campbell (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has made a very eloquent speech and, I must say, for a very worth-while cause. I welcome this opportunity to speak on the motion proposed by the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae). He asked that the government consider the advisability of providing veterans benefits to Canadian members of the Loyalist Republican Forces who fought in Spain between 1936 and 1939. The wording of the motion demonstrates the hon. member's understanding that there are factors to be taken into consideration and that the government must weigh carefully these factors when contemplating the validity of what is proposed.

The government has given this question every consideration, as have previous administrations.

Mr. Benjamin: Well, do something about it.

Mr. Campbell: Before his untimely death, the late Hon. Dan MacDonald gave very serious consideration to this cause, as did the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon) in the previous administration, and as has the present acting minister, the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Lamontagne). These three ministers have all been asked to consider this matter.

I am certain that they all gave it serious, thoughtful consideration, and yet none of them felt they could recommend that the members of the Mackenzie-Papineau brigade become entitled to the benefits available to Canadian veterans under the veterans charter.

One can certainly congratulate those men who went to Spain and waged war on the fascists. One can applaud their bravery in the face of a better manned and better equipped enemy. As soldiers they were superb, and Canadians in general regard the performance of the Mackenzie-Papineau brigade as heroic. Certainly the Spanish people appreciate the participation of the international brigade. The new administration in that country has, I believe publicly thanked all persons who joined the international brigade. However, the indisputable fact is that they were "soldiers of conscience", freelancers against fascism, and by all logic this House cannot say that they should be treated in the same manner as men and women who fought in the uniform of Canada or, in some cases, fought for countries allied with us in war.

Let us just consider the mandate of the Department of Veterans Affairs. First, it has an obligation to commemorate the memory of those who died in the service of Canada. That is why every April Canadians gather on Vimy Ridge to pay tribute to those who lost their lives in the carnage of the First World War.

On November 11 of each year Canadians stop to remember their fallen countrymen. DVA has programs in place and is developing others to ensure that Canada does not forget the sacrifices made during the conflicts in which we participated. Veterans' associations like the Royal Canadian Legion and members of the National Council of Veterans' Associations are active in supporting the cause of veterans and active in commemorating the sacrifices made by veterans.

Just over a week ago the acting Minister of Veterans Affairs led a pilgrimage to the Far East to commemorate the memory of those Canadians either killed in the defence of Hong Kong or the victims of years of captivity.

Mr. Benjamin: Look at the number of years it took to do something about it.

Mr. Campbell: These were Canadian ceremonies, our way of recognizing that our present freedom and prosperity were secured through the sacrifice of those who believed this country was worth fighting for.

The department's mandate includes the objective of perpetuating recognition of wartime sacrifice and achievements and their contribution to Canada. Let us note the words "contribution to Canada". Similarly, the department provides a wide-ranging program of benefits in recognition of wartime service. The objective is, and I quote:

To manage special programs for veterans and other specified persons which will compensate for death or disabilities incurred in the service of Canada.

The words "service of Canada" are the key to the benefits Canadian veterans can receive. With the best will in the world I cannot accept that the veterans of the Mackenzie-Papineau battalion were serving Canada in the full meaning of the department's mandate.

Mr. Benjamin: Change the mandate.

Mr. Campbell: The hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood has detailed the reasons why these men went to fight in Spain, and from the standpoint of history these reasons seem valid and noble. However, at the time these Canadians deliberately chose to ignore the laws of their own country and to join in the conflict raging in Spain. This was an individual decision for which we are now being asked to give a collective reward. Whether the Foreign Enlistment Act was worthy legislation is certainly something which can be disputed over 40 years later, but at the time it was the law of the land. Canada chose to be neutral when Spain erupted into war.

Mr. Benjamin: It is time to admit a mistake.

Mr. Campbell: Over 1,200 Canadians chose to ignore that neutral stance and to take sides against the nationalist forces. Nobody forced them to go. Canada was not at war, but they let their conscience be their guide. Surely such an individual conviction does not entitle them to join the ranks of those Canadians who went to war because their own nation asked them to serve. The strength of the conviction which propelled these brave individuals to fight against tyranny and oppression as it existed in Spain was not shared by the Government of Canada, nor by most other nations of the world. Although we can only see the world order from an historical perspective, I do not believe it would be wrong to say that the Mac-Paps were very alone in their struggle. Canada did, however, offer some measure of welcome when the survivors returned in 1939, and the Department of External Affairs did assist in the return of the battalion to Canada.

As I said earlier, our government has given the requests of the veterans of the Mackenzie-Papineau brigade every consideration. Representations were first made back in 1975. Only last May 22 members of the Mac-Paps met with Dan MacDonald and received an understanding hearing when they voiced their objectives.

Dan MacDonald was aware that the survivors of the Mackenzie-Papineau battalion had seen the horror of battle and shared a common experience with our soldiers who fought Hitler and Mussolini a few years later. During the meeting they asked that the Foreign Enlistment Act be amended. This is understandable because they were still living under the threat of prosecution. While there has never been any intention in recent years of prosecuting them, this symbolic cloud was there, and the minister appreciated this concern.

• (1730)

As a result, the minister of justice was able to give an assurance that the government would not undertake any prosecutions of members of the Mackenzie-Papineau battalion under the Foreign Enlistment Act. A symbolic gesture it may have been, but it was the government's way of putting on record its view that these men were not criminals and should not have to live in the shadow of the act any longer. Also at this meeting the veterans of the Spanish civil war asked for recognition under the veterans' charter. This request was not shrugged aside. It was given a long, serious study. The study reaffirmed the government's conclusion that it could not, in all conscience, give these veterans the recognition they felt they deserved. This decision was not taken out of a spirit of meanness. In financial terms, the cost to Canadian taxpayers would be insignificant. The decision was taken simply of the grounds that these men did not qualify under the provisions and the spririt of the veterans' charter.

This is not to say that their cause was unworthy or that they were not brave and stubborn soldiers. They fought in the company of a man called Norman Bethune whose concern for humanity went beyond geographical boundaries. Certainly the exploits of the International Brigade will live on in literature long after all the members of that gallant group have passed away.

History has proven them right. They were among the first to take on fascism. As has been said, some of them enlisted in the Canadian forces in 1939 and continued their struggle against Hitler and all the evil he represented. Naturally these particular men are entitled to all benefits available to any Canadian veteran. With that said, the House must deny the Canadian survivors of the Spanish civil war the benefits earned by servicemen and women who fought in the uniform of Canada.

I should like to repeat the government's reasons. These men went to Spain in defiance of the laws of Canada at that time. They fought on behalf of their own conscience, not on behalf of the people and the Government of Canada. The fact that they are now regarded as having been on the right side at the right time is not the point. If Canadians were asked whether they now agree or disagree with the action taken by the members of the Mackenzie-Papineau battalion, I am certain that few would disagree.

But that is not the issue. We are being asked to consider treating these men in the same way as we treat those who, in two world wars and Korea, went into combat on behalf of the Canadian nation officially at war. It cannot be said that these men contributed to Canada directly. It can be argued that they attempted to contribute to the cause of world justice, and I believe it is only fitting that they are greeted as heroes in post-Franco Spain. Perhaps any requests for veterans benefits could be directed to Spain.

Other speakers on this side will detail the practical problems which would be involved in processing applications for wartime benefits for men who did not serve in the Canadian forces. Others will point out the consequences which would accompany the precedent of Canada officially recognizing freelance soldiers. Soldiers of conscience are not exclusive to the battlefields of Spain.

The government recognizes the sincerity behind the motion of the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood. This debate gives some of us an opportunity to say to these men that many thousands of Canadians do not regard them as criminals, but as gusty and motivated individuals.

We salute their bravery but simply cannot agree that men who fought in a war not sanctioned by Canada are entitled to the benefits reserved for people who answered their own nation's call to arms.

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I have a few comments to make at this stage, but I do not propose to use the full 20 minutes allotted to me. I think there is another aspect to this problem which ought to be brought to the attention of the House; it is time that it was.

I suggest that the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae) is stretching credibility beyond the point of no return to suggest that there is an absolute parallel between what occurred in Spain and what occurred in the 1939-45 war. There were forces contending in Spain; there is no question about that. They were the forces of fascism, on one side, represented by a fascist group in Spain, supported by fascists from Italy and the nazi forces from Germany. On the other side, however, in that particular operation were the forces of communism. There is no question about that.

Mr. Rae: Rubbish!

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): I was of an age to attend those meetings, and I was aware of the infiltration of communist elements in the recruiting campaigns. What was going on was a contest between fascism on the one hand and communism on the other.

But I should like to make the following caveat right away—this is not to condemn those who out of good conscience were not able to see the particular machinations of the communist recruiters; this is not to question their good will. I am sure many of them went there idealistically believing that the forces they were fighting were the forces of fascism, and that they were supporting the democratic principles of western democracy. They were being appealed to and asked to support international communism. Some of those members of the Mackenzie-Papineau battalion who came back—and I think it was probably the idealists—went on to fight when Canada's call came in the Second World War. Those who came back and who did not put on the Canadian uniform might well have been aware that there had been an entente or deal worked out between the Soviet Union and nazi Germany in 1939 and who, therefore, would not become involved in that particular operation. At that time there was an element which was trying to prevent Canadians from joining, putting on the Canadian uniform.

Mr. Benjamin: What does this have to do with the motion?

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): It has a great deal to do with the motion. I am suggesting that those who went abroad at that time were, to a considerable extent, motivated and urged to do so by communist influences and not in the interests of democracy as I understand it. If there is anyone who is entitled to further recognition beyond that accorded by the Canadian government, I would suggest—and I have suggested this to ministers of national defence for a number of years—it should be those civilians who were posted in the Vietnam conflict to one of the international joint commissions in Saigon, Hanoi, Phnom Penh or Vientiane. The civilians who served on those commissions in Vietnam, Cambodia or Laos, have never been recognized, as those who were wearing uniforms have been. A medal was struck for that service. The military were awarded medals for their duty in that service, for the dangers they underwent at that time. I speak with the thought in mind of the father of the member who introduced this motion, as one who was entitled on more than one occasion, having served on the International Joint Commission in the Far East, and should be accorded the same privileges and the same recognition as those who were wearing uniforms were accorded.

• (1740)

I close on that note. I feel that if there is anybody at all who deserves some recognition it is the civilians who served in that area before all others.

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the three hon. members who have spoken previously on this motion. I want to be brief, sir, and say to you, to my colleagues and especially to the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro), that in what he had to say about the fascists in Spain on the one hand and what he called the communist element on the other hand, he ignores what was called the loyalist cause, made up of the monarchy and the monarchists, the trade union movement, the democratic socialists, the communists and the small business community who had some belief in democracy. The loyalists were a melange of people of all political points of view, except that of fascism and fascist totalitarianism. Those who fought on the loyalist side were often tarred with a communist brush. The fact is, they were in a united fight, men and women of all political stripes from all walks of life from Spain as well as from outside Spain. I do not want to hear any more paranoia held over from the dirty thirties, or any other time, with respect to that particular fight, or subsequent ones.

Mr. Speaker, it took us 25 years to finally do something about special recognition, some special act of discretion by Parliament for our Hong Kong war veterans. It took 30 or more years for a special act of discretion and recognition for other veterans who were prisoners of war in Europe and places other than Hong Kong.

In my opinion, had the rest of the western democracies listened to those who went to Spain, those of all political stripes and all occupations from Canada and many other countries, we might well have stopped Hitler, Mussolini and Tojo sooner than we finally did. They were vilified in their own countries, including ours, and certainly ignored and deserted by their country and by their government.

Mr. Speaker, my colleague, the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae) who moved this motion has asked for an act of discretion. When members of our caucus and members of the caucuses of the other parties met with this organization earlier this year they will recall that they were not being asked for any kind of financial benefits. All they were being asked for was recognition of some historic facts and of history itself. I suppose that without them saying it, they were asking us, as a parliament, to say that in this time-frame, from 1936-1939, our country, our government and Parliament was wrong. That is all they are saying, it was wrong, at least in their case.

This is more than an act of discretion, which is a good way of phrasing it. It is also an act of recognition, of passion and compassion. I remember when I was some 17 years of age working at the shipyards, Burrard Drydock, in North Vancouver, I got to know a veteran of the Spanish Civil War. I saw scars on his body caused from having been in a fascist prisoner of war camp. He has never asked his country for anything. He volunteered, was accepted and went through another four years of the Second World War, which many others tried to do—some were told they could not because they may have had communist sympathies or influences. Some of them tried to join and were turned down. I hope the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich will remember that.

This will do no more than the minimum. It is not changing or attempting to change what has gone on before. The government is only being asked to consider making whatever minimal changes are necessary to provide these remaining 200 or so people with recognition and reclassifying them as veterans. I say this should be done without mentioning the Spanish Civil War or anything relating to it, just as an act of discretion by this Parliament which would entitle those who need it—or those who ask for it, if any of them do—to the same kind of benefits, as well as recognition, as are presently provided under our veterans legislation.

I plead with the House to accept this resolution. It does not require the government to do anything other than consider it, to take into consideration the opinion of the House. One can only hope that thereafter the government will make a decision in favour of these gallant and heroic men.

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Dionne (Chicoutimi): Mr. Speaker, I must regretfully decline to support this proposal. Like all other hon. members, I cannot help but admire those who fought in the Mackenzie-Papineau battalion against the nationalists during the Spanish civil war. Some in the House of Commons have properly called them the soldiers of conscience. The expression is certainly more charitable than the opinion which some hon. members expressed during the Spanish civil war: "Here, in Canada, our own country, there are volunteers who have boarded ships to enlist in the Spanish Red Army, something over which, I must confess, I do not grieve. If only they did not come back, we would be rid of these undesirables".

As I said, this fairly inhumane point of view is symptomatic of the controversy which was raging then in Canada. In his book entitled "The Mackenzie-Papineau Battalion", Mr. Victor Hoar wrote that the Communist Party of Canada had been the main driving force behind the enlistment of Canadian volunteers, and that the members of the brigade have never been recognized internationally as fighters for democratic freedom because they had been trained by Russia.

● (1750)

The Canadian government at the time wanted Canada to remain neutral, as did most other countries. In 1937, it enacted legislation dealing with the enlistment in foreign lands, making it a criminal offence to enlist in the armed forces of a foreign state at war with another state on friendly terms with Canada. In July, 1937, the law was applied to the enlistment on both sides in the Spanish civil war. It is estimated that over 500 Canadians were then already fighting in Spain and that some 700 more came to join them within the next 14 months, although it was then forbidden to travel to Spain. As far as I am concerned, we are not called upon to decide whether history has proven they were right to commit this offence, but whether they should be entitled to the same consideration as the veterans of the Canadian Armed Forces. Doing so, Mr. Speaker, would be grossly unfair to our own veterans.

Canada has one of the most generous programs in the world for veterans and their families, and the Canadian people should be proud of it. But were this House to grant the veterans of the Spanish civil war the privileges recognized by the veterans' charter, we might be accused of granting preferential treatment to those who did not wear the Canadian uniform. Think, for instance, of the formalities the volunteer or the Canadian recruit had to lend himself to on signing up with the forces. First, he had to submit to a complete medical check-up; his medical background was put on file and his physical condition examined. When he was sent overseas, his medical file was kept up to date. He had to undergo regular medical check-ups. If he was wounded, he was usually treated by Canadian nurses and doctors and, upon his return to the country, a large number of services were made available to him, to help him recover.

Wounded veterans were entitled to a disability pension. The Canadian Pension Commission could study their medical background, compare their physical condition at the time of enrolment with that after being wounded in service, and determine what pension corresponded equitably to the degree of physical disability, on the basis of military and medical documents. Any veteran who felt denied his rights in that regard could appeal any decision to the Pension Review Board. Once again, his medical and military files played a determining role in their decision.

The same checks and comparisons apply in matters relating to veterans allowances. The applicant has a file on his military services. Documented proofs are easy to obtain and can be compared with the applicant's present situation. However, how could the organizations associated with the Department of Veterans Affairs deal so exhaustively with the cases of Canadians who fought in the Spanish civil war? At the time, Canadians did not undergo medical examinations before going overseas. There were no service files such as we know them today. How could the Canadian Pension Commission determine the eligibility of an applicant in such a case?

Are we going to tax further still the resources of the commission which considers each year a great many applications by veterans by changing the normal duties of some officers and asking them to analyse in great detail claims submitted by people who do not even have the required evidence? And what about veterans allowance? We have no register. No file has been established during service. All we have is somebody who says: I went to Spain to fight Franco for two years, so I am entitled to veterans allowance.

I think that many Canadian men and women who served in the armed forces and whose claims were rejected after a thorough review of their case would have reason to feel wronged if we were to grant benefits to those who did not wear the Canadian uniform, and who, besides that, were not even subjected to the reviews and conditions applicable to the granting of benefits. This would create an impossible situation, Mr. Speaker. How could an agency determine to what extent the health of someone has deteriorated because of wartime service when there is no evidence to show how healthy this person was at the beginning of the Spanish civil war? This would create a double standard, Mr. Speaker. Such an action would enable the veterans of the Spanish civil war to bypass the regulations and formalities to which every Canadian veteran must adhere to be eligible for benefits.

I believe this would be unfair and intolerable. Moreover, Mr. Speaker, we should think for a few moments about what it would mean internationally if this House recognized officially the fight of these volunteers. Whether we wanted it or not, we would be approving the actions of other people who may want to interfere in the internal affairs of other countries. Canada and most democratic countries do not interfere in the internal affairs of other countries. We do not send observers or volunteers to other countries. Mr. Speaker, the government would create an extremely dangerous precedent by recognizing officially these volunteers as Canadian soldiers. Where would we stop? How could we justify not giving benefits to all Canadians who fight in other countries for what they consider to be a just cause?

Let us examine a few recent examples. There is the case of Canadians who were living in Israel at the time of the six-day war. Let us suppose that a Canadian was wounded while fighting for Israel. Would he not be entitled to assert before the Canadian government that, in his opinion, his cause was as noble as that of the Spanish civil war for the veterans of the Mackenzie-Papineau battalion? If the situation got worse and Russia invaded Poland, would we not have every reason to believe that certain Polish Canadians would consider it their duty to go back to their country and defend it against the invader? Let us suppose that some of them were wounded or killed. If we give the green light to the Mac-Pap, how could we refuse to Polish Canadians the benefits that they would claim and which are now reserved for those who have fought for Canada?

Let us take the case of Uganda. If Canadians residing in that country had joined others in their praiseworthy efforts to overthrow Idi Amin Dada, would they not be entitled to be considered soldiers for a cause? Should Parliament or the Department of Veterans Affairs be placed in a position where they would have to decide whether an Amin is worth a Franco? No, Mr. Speaker. If this House decided to grant these rights to the veterans of the Spanish civil war, we would be opening the door to the claims of other non-recognized veterans and their dependants. We must not allow such a situation to occur. For my part, Mr. Speaker, if we gave to these men the same privileges as to Canadian veterans, it would be like stating that a Canadian injured while working on an oil drilling platform belonging to a British company in the North Sea is entitled to compensation from the Workmen's Compensation Board simply because he was born in Toronto. This is simply illogical and unfair. Canada asked its young men to fight in two world wars—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The hour provided for the consideration of private member's business having expired, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock this evening.

At 6 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL FISCAL ARRANGEMENTS AND ESTABLISHED PROGRAMS FINANCING ACT, 1977

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Bussières that Bill C-24, to amend laws relating to fiscal transfers to the provinces be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): When the debate was interrupted at five o'clock, the hon. member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn) had the floor. In his absence I will recognize the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae).

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, the principle of fiscal transfers or equalization within our federal system is one which all parties agree is of vital importance for the continuation of our country. It has been described by most observers as the very lifeblood of the principle of co-operative federalism. There should be rough and ready equality of service and the provision of services between and among the different regions and provinces of Canada.

The principle of equalization was first recognized as the result of the Rowell-Sirois commission in pre-World War II days, but took on its modern form in 1957-58. At that time, the payments were $139 million representing less than one-half of one per cent of the gross national product of the country. In 1980-81, the latest year for which figures are available, they total some $3.3 billion, well over 1.2 per cent of the gross national product.

The hon. member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn) gave the House a very accurate, lengthy and detailed description of the basis on which the equalization formula is currently calculated. It is not based on the average income in each individual province, but in terms of looking at a number of revenue categories.

In determining the equalization formula, some 29 categories are taken into account. It is important to recognize that the equalization formula is based on the principle that the federal government should be the agency of redistribution. Under our present system, the federal government is the sole agency of redistribution. This is a feature of our current equalization to which I shall return and deal with as to whether it is appropriate now, with the resource revenues, for the federal government to be the sole distributor or whether we should look at another system.

We approach this debate with a number of very real problems in mind. The first problem or challenge is that the fiscal balance within confederation and within the country has dramatically changed since the days when the principle of equalization was first worked out. In those days, there was no question about the federal government being the critical agency in the economic management of the country. The federal government was not simply the primus inter pares of governments, but indeed it was the whole of the economic management of the country.

There are a number of ways of looking at this. One can look at the share of tax revenues collected by the federal government or at the share of public expenditure by all governments which is borne by the federal government. If one looks at it in those years, it is clear that the federal government was far and away the most important and powerful government. Indeed, the provinces were tremendously dependent upon the federal government for provision of services essential to the growth of social services, public education, higher education, research and development and all of the programs now associated with our various provincial governments.

This began to change in the sixties. Perhaps it was personified by the arrival of medicare that the role of the provincial governments was going to become increasingly important and that their share of public revenues had to increase. Other tax points had to be transferred to the provincial governments to allow them to carry out their responsibilities in the fields of medicare, social services, public education, higher education and so on.

If there was a kind of revolution in the sixties in terms of the provision of public and social services by the provinces and growth of government, both at the provincial and federal levels, there has been another fiscal revolution which has deeply affected the balance within confederation. The major factors of the seventies seem to be the economy, along with federalism, the notion of federalism, and understanding of the country. It is this new situation with which we have to come to grips. I am referring to the fact that ever since the OPEC increases of 1973-74, the fiscal power, financial power and resource base of a number of provinces has become so significant as to throw the whole pattern of equalization payments up until 1973 into question.

I am not saying this to single out one province as being peculiarly wealthy or another as being peculiarly poor. Generally speaking, the over-all economic power of the federal government has declined. This has affected the ability of the federal government to redistribute wealth within the country, which is the purpose of the equalization formula. It also affects relations between and among provinces. This problem has been recognized by many people. It has been recognized by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) who, as I have heard him say and as I have heard him quoted as saying a number of times, expressed the view that there is a fiscal imbalance in confederation which poses a very severe problem. As quoted in The Globe and Mail of December 3, 1980, in the first week of the last election campaign, he said:

> We must face the fact that the federal government is not as able as it should be to manage the national economy, to help overcome regional disparities and to conduct major national policies.
>
> There has grown up a serious fiscal imbalance not only among the provinces, but between the federal and provincial levels of government.

● (2020)

That fact has also been borne out at some length by the Economic Council of Canada in its 1979 report, which is called, appropriately enough, "Two Cheers for the Eighties". The Economic Council Report for last year—it seems almost prescient in terms of what we are facing now—points out, for example, that projections of surpluses and deficits are extremely sensitive to the projected path of the economy in assumptions about government actions. It goes on to say:

> But the persistence of the federal deficit and the Alberta surplus are very clear consequences of the current fiscal structure. This situation stands in marked contrast to the one that prevailed up to 1974, when the revenue-generating powers of the federal government made possible a central distribution system to finance nation-wide policies and to supplement revenues of the provinces with a relatively low revenue base, while leaving the federal government enough room for fiscal management of the economy and programs for economic development.
> The issues this development raises are political rather than economic, although the way in which they are resolved will have a bearing on the nature of economic management in the country. The federal government is in a poor position to continue to play its major role in economic management, equalization of provincial revenues, and the conduct of major national policies. In most areas of economic policy, achieving national objectives will require extensive provincial participation, or these objectives may never be met. There is an urgent need for more co-operation. In the longer run, the fiscal structure of the federation will have to be rebalanced and better institutional arrangements will have to be developed to cope with the challenge of interdependence between the federal and provincial governments.

To describe as briefly as possible the problem caused by the exponential growth in resource revenue in the three resource-rich provinces of British Columbia, Alberta and Saskatchewan, and the impact these revenues have had on the principle of equalization, let me say that the principle of equalization has been that the federal government will attempt to bring up all the provinces to a common level of service and a common level of revenue, based on the 29 factors that are taken into account in calculating the revenue base of each province. The fundamental difficulty with the resource question is that the federal government has been obliged—although it is trying to get out of it—to attempt to bring up the have-not provinces to the level of the have provinces without having access to the revenues which would make such redistribution fully possible. That is precisely the nature of the fiscal imbalance in which we find ourselves. The federal government has been expected until the present time—this is the cause of the fiscal squeeze in which it finds itself—to redistribute wealth without having full access to the revenues which are the basis upon which the equalization will take place.

The system of equalization has attempted to take this problem into account in a number of ways. It is a major problem because the growth in revenue from natural gas and oil has been exponentially higher than any other form of revenue one can think of. For example, there is no comparison between the growth in revenue which has taken place from sales tax or from income tax or corporate tax at the provincial level, and the growth in resource revenue. The system has tried to accommodate this fact by, first of all, saying, "We will take out 50 per cent of the resource revenues right off the bat. The provinces can skim that right off. We will not include that in the revenue base". The other way they have done it is to say that only one-third of all equalization can be based on that resource base. There is a one-third cap on the calculation of the over-all amount allowed to be calculated when one looks at the revenue of the provinces of Alberta, Saskatchewan, and so on. In a sense, this is the first shift away from the principle of equalization. It is a very understandable shift because it appears to accommodate two things. First of all, it allows the federal government to get around the dilemma of having to spend money it does not have.

An hon. Member: They can do that anyway.

Mr. Rae: It is an attempt to do that, although it has not been quite successful, as we have seen. The second thing it does is to allow the provinces to establish heritage funds. They are not permanent—it is important to remember this because we are talking about a depleting resource, not a resource which is renewable. The three producing provinces have established heritage funds so as to create a capital base which will allow them to diversify away from a reliance on non-renewable resources and give them an assurance that, in the long run, they will be able to deal with the long-term economic needs of the citizens of their provinces. I think those two principles are very important. If there are people in the country who begrudge Alberta the concept of a heritage fund or who begrudge Saskatchewan its heritage fund, I think they are mistaken because it is terribly important that provinces be able to develop capital funds so as to move away from dependence from a resource base that is very narrow so they can diversify their economies.

The bill before us further accommodates those principles because again it takes out in an aspect of the oil and gas revenues from the base and in this way further protects the provincial heritage funds. Moreover, it further guarantees that the federal government will not be required to spend money which it says it does not have.

When these things happen, somebody always loses. So who loses? The answer is very simple. It is not the federal government, because it is not making equalization payments—we have taken that out of the revenue calculations. And it is not the producing provinces because we have said to them, "We will not put that in the calculation, so you are okay too". The people who lose as a result of this are the have-not provinces. It is not the federal government that is losing, and I can understand the position of the federal government trying to protect itself. The problems that have been caused in the last six or seven years have a great deal to do with fiscal imbalances which are structural in nature. Some of them have to do with mismanagement and incompetence as well, but others have to do with structural causes and I am prepared to accept that.

● (2030)

However, it is important to remember—and very important for the producing provinces to remember—that their fight with the federal government should not be confused with another principle and another problem, that is, the question as to who wins and who loses in the resource game is not simply one between the provincial governments and the federal government; it is between provincial governments which have won the game of geological roulette and the provincial governments which have not. Where do we go from here? One of the reasons I am not happy with the proposal put forward by the hon. member for Mississauga South that we remove the section on public utilities and simply get this bill through in three days is that the federal government is about to engage itself in a process of negotiation and renewal of the equalization formula with the provincial governments. This matter has not been discussed in the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs. We have not had an opportunity, as has the Senate committee on national finance, to discuss the implications which are involved in these transfers and the implications for federalism and federal-provincial relations.

Therefore it seems to me it is important that the Senate committee on finance have an opportunity to discuss more than simply PUITTA, which is particularly important to one province. I do not gainsay the importance of that province and the consumers of that province, but I think it is of too great a seriousness for us simply to get this thing through when this is the only opportunity we will have in the near future to participate, to ask the minister and the department questions and to obtain information from the department as to its perspective on the problems caused by the imbalances produced by the nature of our economic system and the economics of co-operative federalism.

A number of suggestions have been made for dealing with the fact that resource revenues are growing in one part of the country. That is called the recycling problem. One of them has been that the federal government should get a greater share. I think all of us in all parties agree with that principle. It was one of the principles contained, in a slightly blurred way, in the Crosbie budget of last year. It is a principle which was contained in the Liberal budget of this year. Each budget chose to take a different route in guaranteeing that the federal share would be larger, but each recognized that the federal share had to be larger whether taken in the form of taxes on resources at the refinery level or in the form of a tax on gasoline at the pump. I think there has been a general recognition that the federal share has to be larger. I think this feeling is shared by all parties. Not everyone is prepared to carry it forward as a greater principle, but I think everyone recognizes that that has to happen.

We still come back to another problem. That takes care of the federal government, but it does not take care of Nova Scotia necessarily. It does not take care of New Brunswick, Quebec, Manitoba or those other provinces which, as I put it before, have lost the game of geological roulette and which can foresee no real possibility of being able to win it. Suggestions have been made by a number of observers as to how to deal with the problem of the equalization of resource revenues. If we were to agree that money should be taken out of the general formula for the provision of public services, that would not be a bad thing, because it is in a sense almost a separate phenomenon and is so large that it creates a tremendous imbalance in the formula itself. To include it in the formula and simply redistribute it as "gravy" across the country would be unwise and very shortsighted, but if we simply allow it to accumulate in one or two provinces—the accumulations are going to be rather large if we adopt the types of price regimes which are being suggested, even by the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen)—then I should think we would have to look at something else.

A number of other proposals have been made. I do not think there is any need to be ideological about any of them. The Premier of Saskatchewan suggested the creation of a federal-provincial energy bank as one way of dealing with revenue. The government of Alberta has suggested that it simply lend money to those provinces which want it. The government of Ontario produced a paper which was, if I may put it this way, widely drawn on by the hon. member for Mississauga South when he gave his speech. The government of Ontario in its budget of 1980 produced a very thoughtful paper on equalization and fiscal disparities. It has a number of proposals to make. Professor John Halliwell of the University of British Columbia has also made a number of proposals. Professor Courchene, a former Conservative candidate in London and, if I may say so, a distinguished conservative economist, has made suggestions as to what to do about the recycling problem. Professor Scarfe of the University of Alberta has made a number of proposals. What all these proposals have in common is a concern that a proportion of this capital which is growing in the producing provinces has to be distributed in some way. It should not be distributed to the federal government, because it can take care of itself, but it should be distributed to those provinces which do not have as much. I refer to the have-not provinces.

There has been a suggestion with respect to a negative income tax. There has been a suggestion with respect to a distribution between and among provinces which would be separate from the federal government. There have been suggestions with respect to interprovincial transfers. Some of these suggestions are very exciting. They draw on the idea, for example, of capital funds for Atlantic Canada, for Quebec or for the province of Manitoba.

There is the notion that a heritage fund is not something which should be restricted simply to the producing provinces but something to which all Canadians should have access, perhaps not solely through the federal government. There may be other ways of doing it, but all these things point to new adventures in co-operative federalism and new institutions of economic interdependence which require imagination, not the old approach by which the federal government will come down with a heavy hand and take it all. I do not think that is the necessary answer. The answer may be to acknowledge that we have an equalization formula, and rather than see it based on revenue, I would prefer to see it based on gross per capita income and transfer it that way and then deal with the separate problem of resource revenues or, indeed, any other similar revenue which is allowed to grow in some provinces or parts of the country and not shared adequately because of the legal nature of the resource ownership concept. Our present institutions do not allow for those revenues to be shared.

I believe the primary claim on resource revenue has to be with those provinces which have the resources. If we move away from that principle, it seems to me that we move away from the very notion that people who live and work in an area have to possess a greater sense of control over their lives and a greater sense of control over their economies. We do not want governments simply imposing their will on people who live thousands of miles away. The country does not lend itself to that kind of economic system. In my view the principle must be that of socialization and sharing but not necessarily of total centralization. The two things are not necessarily the same.

If I have a concern about this bill, putting it in the broadest terms, the concern I have about the first clause is that it simply buys a little more time for the federal government to get around an immediate fiscal problem. That is to say, unless we take certain items from the revenue base, the federal government will be forced to spend more money which it does not have, although I question this, now that the federal government has increased its share of resource revenues by such a large amount. It seems a rather ironic twist that the federal government would be getting out of it on the one hand and taking money on the other.

I still see the problem, but the federal government does this in a kind of philosophical vacuum. This is why it seems to me we ought to refer this question to the committee so that we can find some way of dealing with this problem, some way of dealing with the very significant fiscal imbalances which have grown up in our economy and which have to be dealt with in a constructive way. They must be dealt with in a manner which is not confiscatory but recognizes the principle of sharing and the fact that certain provinces have simply been lucky. It is not as though Shell Oil and Imperial Oil went out and planted a bunch of oil 50 or 60 years ago and are now reaping the benefit of what they sowed. It is a question of luck and chance as to what geological formations exist in certain parts of the country whether or not certain revenues are available in certain parts of Canada.

• (2040)

Mr. Benjamin: God put it there for the Social Credit.

Mr. Rae: I hear the hon. member for Regina West (Mr. Benjamin). It is possible, but whether or not one believes in predestination, we believe firmly that there must be some way of dealing with the problem other than the evasion which is implicit in Bill C-24.

Essentially Bill C-24 niggles away; it is a buying of time until the renegotiation in 1981-82. But I want the committee and Parliament to have something to say about that renegotiation, because we have a right to be involved in the principles contained in the various federal proposals which will be put forward.

We must be consulted, and we must know what will happen. The disturbing element with which the hon. member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill (Mr. Blaikie) will deal at greater length is that the federal government is attempting to buy economic fiscal respectability at the expense of the have-not provinces and at the expense of the level of services in provinces right across the country. That is why they brought in the fixed programs act in 1977; that is why there has been a decline in medicare services. One can document this from experience. Specialists in the city of Toronto in a variety of fields are practising outside medicare. So, it is virtually impossible to find an obstetrician, a gynaecologist or an anaesthesist in Toronto who practises under medicare or OHIP. One cannot have a baby or an operation without paying extra, which is an offence to the principles which were supposed to have been contained in medicare.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rae: There are two other aspects of the bill with which I should like to deal in the time remaining. Again, it is an improvisation dealing in a haphazard manner with what is going on in the country, with the realities of the economic inequalities in the country.

They say that Ontario will not get equalization payments because its average income is too high. There can be no real objection to that. There is no real objection to the fact that Ontario is not getting equalization payments, but something must be said about a scheme which is inappropriate to the nature of the country at the moment. They say the legislation before us is making minor changes, that Bill C-24 is a minor bill. It is not a minor bill. On the one hand it affects the oil revenues and, on the other hand, they say that payments will not go to the largest provinces in terms of population. These are very major changes in the concept which was first introduced.

Finally, I come to the question of the Public Utilities Income Tax Transfer Act and the fact that private utilities in provinces which still have private utilities for the production of energy now pay corporate income tax to the federal government but public utilities pay no corporate income tax. Previously the federal government agreed that 95 per cent of the revenue from the corporate tax on private utilities would be redistributed to those provinces which had such utilities and that the consumers of those provinces were supposed to benefit. The federal government wanted to eliminate the payments altogether and get out of the formula in that manner. It has finally moved to 50 per cent, which is where it was between 1947 and 1966.

I should like to refer to a press release distributed by the then minister of finance, the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien). Does the House remember him in those days? It is dated at Ottawa on November 24, 1978. It shows how quickly we have managed to move on the principles contained in PUITTA; we are still debating this matter two years later. It was designed to discourage the nationalization of private utilities. That was the purpose of the change, and I presume that remains the purpose of the change.

In 1978, the payments were $7 million to Newfoundland; $1.5 million to Prince Edward Island; $2 million to Quebec; $15 million to Ontario; $234,000 to Manitoba; $64,000 to Saskatchewan; $235,000 to British Columbia; $411,000 to the Yukon; $272,000 to the Northwest Territories; $50.5 million to the province of Alberta.

An hon. Member: Poor Alberta!

Mr. Rae: It is clear that this aspect of the change affects Alberta more than any other province. Again it is a kind of improvisation. Whenever this question has been raised in the House during question period by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor) and others, they have expressed a real concern.

I understand their concern, because unless Alberta gets equalization payments, the rates paid by consumers will not be subsidized, will not come down, and the consumers of Alberta will be paying more as a result of the change in this legislation. We in this party understand that; there is no problem with that. But I suggest there is another issue at stake, that is, whether, at a time when the oil and gas revenues of Alberta are over five billion billion dollars on an annual basis, the federal government should be paying transfer payments at this level to the province of Alberta.

Mr. Andre: How much?

Mr. Rae: That is the nature of the debate. The second problem is: why should we be discouraging provinces from taking over control of private utilities?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rae: The province of Newfoundland—

Mr. Wright: It will not give cheaper rates.

Mr. Rae: There is no black and white in these issues; there is no easy answer to these issues. Of course the rates which consumers pay are important. but I suggest that if the Alberta government were to nationalize utilities, it would be able to get around this problem and have lower rates.

Mr. Wright: We have the cheapest rates now.

Mr. Rae: They have the cheapest rates now partly because they are receiving equalization payments from the federal government. If they were not receiving equalization payments from the federal government, the member would say that the rates would rise, but I say that the problem would be solved partly if we got around the hard fact that, in a sense, we are subsidizing the private ownership of what I always regarded as a public utility. Even the Tories in Ontario have always regarded it as a public utility.

Mr. Malone: Let them do it.

Mr. Rae: The hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Malone) said, "Let them do it". I can understand that. He will say that each province should be allowed to make its own bed in its own way; if it decides to do it privately, then it is up to the province and we should not impose patterns of living, ownership and everything else on provinces from the outside. But I simply say to the hon. member who I know will make that point, it is fine if that is the way he chooses to do it, but he should not expect the federal government, which means the taxpayers of every province, in that instance to subsidize the luxury of private ownership. That seems to be a legitimate statement.

Mr. Wright: When has public ownership been cheaper than private ownership?

Mr. Rae: If the hon. member has a few hours we could go through a number of instances where it has been repeatedly shown that for the provision of those basic services it is cheaper to do it on a public ownership co-operative basis than on the basis of production for private profit.

• (2050)

Mr. Blaikie: Hydro rates in Manitoba are frozen for the next five years. Tell me the name of a private company that will do that.

Mr. Rae: Mr. Speaker, this is a difficult time in our country to talk about any subject which affects federal-provincial relations in a way which does not simply say: you are from Ontario, you are from Alberta or you are from Manitoba, and that is what you think. If I have not succeeded, I am prepared to learn and listen, to take as much abuse as is due to me and that which has been given to me so far. We must be imaginative. We must try and be fair. We must look at all the sources of revenue. We have to pay regard to the problems of provinces which are less able to speak for themselves. We must look to the importance of continuing to provide as high a level as possible of public service in each province. The hard fact is that the policies of the Liberal government, as enunciated by the Minister of Finance in his budget, will lead to a decline in public and social services and a decline in funding for education. I heard the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) quoted the other day as saying that maybe one of the problems which would have to go would be higher education because that was a kind of luxury program—

Mr. Blaikie: An elitist program.

Mr. Rae: She said it was an elitist program. Where does she think our technologists will come from, our skilled manpower, our artists? Where does she think the people who will contribute to all walks of Canadian life will come from? Why should the federal government not be involved in the funding of those programs? Why should the federal government not be concerned about the level of manpower training in the 1980s, the 1990s and in the year 2000? There is no reason for calling it an elitist program. The federal government should continue, and must continue, to be concerned about the level of funding for secondary education—there is nothing elitist about that. That is fundamental to the growth of a democratic society. We will have a poorer country if we take to university bashing, health care bashing or hospital and library bashing. Failure to provide for very basic and essential services, for artistic funding, and so on, will only serve to create a poorer country. We will have a country which lacks the level of services it deserves to have.

I suggest the answer, Mr. Speaker, is to go back to certain basic principles of co-operative federalism and the basic principles of the co-operative commonwealth. We must attempt to create an economy which reflects the regional reality of our country. We need an economy which reflects the need of the provinces for an assured income, a steady income. We must have programs which they can develop in their own way to reflect the needs of their communities—programs not imposed by people from the outside. But to guarantee that kind of system we will also need a federal government which has the ability to lead and the ability to co-ordinate and redistribute. There are new ways of doing this, they do not have to be the old ways. Even the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) has recognized that we must have this. The method does not simply have to be in the form of straight taxation followed by distribution. There are various ways of doing it among the provinces.

Mr. Speaker, the reason we are so concerned about getting this issue to committee is because this is precisely the kind of debate we should be having in committee. We should be looking very seriously at the challenges, not the problems. We talk too much of problems and of the insoluble difficulties which we face. We must look at the challenges which face us because we live in a country which is diverse and rich. Yet it is a country which needs to do so much more to provide for the needs, desires and the wishes of all its people.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, before I get into the main part of my remarks I would like to comment on some of the points raised by the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae).

I am sure he inadvertently stated that the Public Utilities Income Tax Transfer Act was, in effect, an equalization payment from the federal government to provinces which happen to have private utilities. He cited the figures and indicated that the amount of money involved for Alberta is $50 million, for Newfoundland $7 million and for Ontario $15 million. I am sure he would not want to mislead the House with an indication that this is some sort of subsidy for the taxpayers of Canada because the Public Utilities Income Tax Transfer Act simply rebates to the provinces corporate taxes collected from private utilities. All it does is put the consumers, if you will, the provinces which have privately-owned utilities, on the same basis as those provinces which have publicly-owned utilities.

Socialists believe that socialized public ownership is somehow superior to private ownership. I take no offence to them believing that. Where they find the economics to support that belief is beyond me.

Mr. Evans: Alberta owns some companies. Public ownership is not good on one side and bad on the other.

Mr. Andre: The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Evans) is interrupting with some inanities which have nothing to do with the subject at hand.

Mr. Evans: Public versus private onwership.

Mr. Andre: In Canada the bulk of our utilities, certainly electricity, are publicly owned by the provinces. For example, there is Ontario Hydro, which we in Alberta like to think of as the Ontario heritage fund. It is about equal to the value of the fund, as a matter of fact.

Mr. Rae: I do not think of it that way.

Mr. Andre: Obviously not. There is also Quebec Hydro which could also be equated to a heritage fund, if you will. It is approximately of the same magnitude.

Clearly, one of the principles of taxation should be that it is fundamentally equal and fair in its application, that is, that a person of similar circumstances in one part of Canada should not be taxed more heavily than a person of the same circumstance in another part of Canada with regard to the federal government. I am sure everybody in this House accepts that fundamental principle. If you are a farmer living in southern Alberta your power is supplied to you by Calgary Power. Calgary Power is a privately-owned, widely held Canadian-owned utility. It is not foreign owned, it is Canadian. It is an efficient and well-managed company. For example, if you lived in Irricana, Alberta, your hydro bill might have been, as this typical bill I have in my hand shows, for the month of September, 1979, $81.37, less a $15.05 income tax rebate for a net cost of $66.32. This puts you on an equal basis with a farmer in Ontario and Quebec who receives power from the provincially-owned utilities. Of course, these utilities, such as Ontario Hydro and Quebec Hydro, and the other public utilities, do not pay income taxes. So all PUITTA did in 1966 was restore into our income tax system that sense of equity and fairness which everybody, socialists included, would favour.

What is so offensive about this cancellation of the Public Utilities Income Tax Transfer Act—

An hon. Member: Not a cancellation, a reduction.

Mr. Andre: That is right, it is not a cancellation it is a reduction. The original intent was to eliminate it altogether, but as a result of pressure the government said it should be made a saw-off, 50 per cent instead of a total cancellation. It is still unfair. The principle still applies. It is unfair because if you are a consumer supplied by a privately-owned utility, through your bill you will be paying income tax to the federal government. If you are a consumer supplied by a publicly-owned utility you will not be paying that federal income tax. That is unfair. I am sure the hon. member said inadvertently that PUITTA is an incentive to private ownership and that we should not offer that incentive to private ownership.

• (2100)

It is not an incentive to private ownership. PUITTA puts on an equal basis publicly and privately-owned companies and is a disincentive to private ownership. It puts private and public ownership on an equal basis. Therefore, it is a misrepresentation when the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood suggests that PUITTA unamended is somehow equalization for Alberta, which is so rich that it does not need equalization. It is not equalization to Alberta at all.

Mr. Rae: That is not what I said.

Mr. Andre: I am sorry, I heard the remarks.

Mr. Rae: It is a difference of opinion.

Mr. Andre: We will examine the blues. The existence of PUITTA—and I believe these are the exact words of the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood—discourages provinces from taking over private utilities, and we should not discourage provinces from doing so. It does not do any such thing.

Mr. Rae: I was reading from a government press release.

Mr. Andre: The hon. member is right, he was reading the minister's remarks which were totally wrong.

This matter first arose in December, 1978. The Minister of State for Finance (Mr. Bussières) said it was part of a restraint expenditure program which is a twisting around of words. It is not an expenditure restraint program at all. It is a new tax. The government will be able to tax private utilities which it did not tax before because it did not want to tax only private utilities and not public utilities which it was not allowed to tax because of the constitution. Now the government will be able to tax private utilities. It is not restraint. It is new revenue; it is a tax, a tax which was contemplated simply because, fortuitously, it affects primarily the people of Alberta.

When the gurus in finance look for new ways to raise money, this is where they look.

Mr. Evans: Oh, oh!

Mr. Andre: The hon. member should examine the consequences before he shakes his head in the negative. Let him take a look at the bill. I am sure he cannot imagine this government or any government saying, "We are going to tax Ontario or Quebec, but not the rest of the country." Not on the hon. member's life, would the government design a tax which hits hardest at Ontario and Quebec and not the rest of the country. But since this tax will hit Alberta, it is fine. Members opposite are shaking their heads.

Mr. Benjamin: You can hear them rattling over here.

Mr. Andre: Yes, I can hear them. I wonder when somebody over there will take the time to stop and look at their policies and the things which they are doing and think for a minute and say to themselves, "Gee, are all those people who are joining separatist parties and talking about alienation out west bananas? Is there something in the air out there, or do they, perhaps, have some complaints at which we might take a look?"

This bill is nothing more than fuel for the next West-Fed meeting. This national government, which represents all of Canada, has simply found another way to tax Alberta more than the rest of the country. The government is merely giving more fuel to the West-Fed movement. When does it intend to stop and smarten up and become a national government for the whole country? It is pathetic in the extreme.

I would think that the Minister of State for Finance who has fought separatism in Quebec and who must feel strongly about this country in the sense that he would like his constituents and the people of his province to feel a part of the national whole, would have some understanding of the feelings which exist now in the west when, time after time, including again today, this government in Ottawa comes forward with a proposal designed to hit Albertans a little harder than the rest of the country. It is not the money, because the amount involved is not that large. I agree with the hon. member who just spoke in that regard.

The principle embodied here should not apply. Albertans should not have to beg for fair treatment; it should come as a part of being Canadian.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Andre: We are getting tired of begging for fair treatment, tired of trying to explain why we feel frustrated, alienated and angry. We should not have to explain. Any national government concerned about the whole country should be aware of the situation automatically, but apparently it is not. After all, it does not need votes from Alberta when it can form a national governement without the votes of that province. So, why the hell bother being fair? What the government needs is money, so it can buy more votes where it counts, here in central Canada. That is the principle behind this bill.

We from Alberta have a minister in this government, Senator Bud Olson. On June 27, 1966, when Senator Olson was a member of this House he said with regard to PUITTA, as reported in Hansard at page 6893:

> I suggest that the purpose of this bill, for which I commend the Minister of Finance—is simply to provide a measure of justice to those citizens of Canada in areas that are served by privately-owned utility companies, because certainly the only way in which privately-owned companies can get the money with which to pay the federal corporation tax is through the rates charged to their customers.

Where was the Senator when this bill was discussed in cabinet? Where was this minister who comes from Alberta and is presumably the member of cabinet who should represent Alberta? Where was he when he let this bill get through? Where are his principles? I guess that is something one gives up when one crosses the floor in exchange for the remuneration one receives for being a minister; he must forget about all his obligations and responsibilities and the things he might have said in the past.

We in this party cannot accept the PUITTA provision. We cannot accept such discrimination. We cannot allow the government to carry on in this way. The bill itself is very short, containing only three clauses. The first two deal with the question of equalization and the ramifications of resource revenues as affected by equalization. By and large I share many of the views expressed by the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood with regard to the problems which exist in arriving at a more modern way to reflect the reality of Canada today considering the changes in income patterns, and revenue patterns of individuals and provinces.

Perhaps a better way of dealing with this bill would be to refer it to the finance committee. The current equalization regime runs out at the end of the next fiscal year, March 31, 1982. Certainly at the rate we work around here, it is not too early to begin talking about what might be done in the future. It is a very worthy subject for that committee to debate and discuss over a considerable length of time. I say this in the context of the bill before us because if we were to get that subject discussed in committee, the bill would not come back until next June, July or August, so extensive is the subject.

Since we are all presumably in agreement with clauses 1 and 2 of this bill, I think I can speak on behalf of my party and say we are quite prepared to let clauses 1 and 2 pass. For that matter they could be heard in the House and passed very quickly through all three stages and receive royal assent. If there is insistence on tying all three clauses together, then I am afraid we cannot give our commitment to that kind of co-operation. We would certainly support any suggestion by the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood to have the subject matter referred to the finance committee, since it is a subject worthy of consideration. It deserves a lot of discussion by this House and I agree with the hon. member it is a subject with which this House should be seized. It is not something to be worked out exclusively by officials in the federal and provincial governments and finalized at the time of some first ministers' meeting.

I want to outline just a few things with regard to the remarks made by the spokesman for the NDP. One pertains to his comments on the question of recycling revenues from oil and gas. Listening to him, one gets a notion that somewhere in Alberta there is a huge vault full of currency called the Heritage Fund, or a huge pot of gold. That money is being recycled today by the banking system. Alberta is in the money market. The bank is buying that money daily, weekly and monthly. It is using it within Canada in the normal way by responding to the normal economic situation in the country. People borrow from the bank, the bank borrows it from the Heritage Fund and that is how the money is in the system today. Without that Heritage Fund, I think the federal government would be having a terrible time financing its deficit.

Mr. Lang: That is the problem.

An hon. Member: Sit there and listen.

Mr. Andre: I heard the hon. member for Kitchener (Mr. Lang) say that is the problem.

An hon. Member: The problem is economics.

Mr. Andre: The problem resides right here in Ottawa. The deficits were not caused by provincial governments, I can assure the hon. member of that. The deficits were caused by this government.

The question of redistribution of the capital funds needs some discussion. It is illusory to claim that somehow it is not being redistributed today. Frankly, I worry about some of the suggestions being made. The banking system has the benefit of operating according to economic principles which have served this country very well. If all of that money is to be recycled by governments, you are talking about it being recycled by bureaucrats. You are talking about decisions being made—whether through an energy bank or some other development funds—by bureaucrats deciding whether such and such is a good investment or a bad investment and so on. So we are getting into the question of philosophy again. But there is precious little evidence anywhere in the world that bureaucrats make better decisions than do people in the marketplace who borrow these funds against their own assets and are, therefore, obliged to repay them. Because of that, they are guided by constraints which, in my view, make for better decision-making.

The other slogan which the hon. member used and upon which I must comment was "geological roulette." He said accurately that Shell did not put the oil there and that it was therefore a matter of geological luck. I suggest to the hon. member that he might profitably use some of his Christmas break by taking a trip to southern Saskatchewan. One of the biggest plays in the United States today is a play called Williston Basin. At Williston, North Dakota, there is a large deposit of sedimentary rock. The sediments extend into Wyoming and well up into Saskatchewan. In North Dakota, there are wells being drilled everywhere. There are wells so close to the Saskatchewan border that a roughneck on the top of a rig with a wad of chewing tobacco in his mouth could spit into Saskatchewan. There are drilling rigs on the Canadian side. I can assure hon. members that the geology does not stop smack right on the 49th parallel.

An hon. Member: Let the NDP deny that.

Mr. Andre: What happens at the 49th parallel is you change politics and thereby political systems. You change countries; you get into Canada, and if you happen to be in Saskatchewan, it actually costs money to produce oil today. For every barrel of conventional oil produced in that province today, the combination of federal and provincial taxes means it costs money. One actually has to pay 75 cents to produce a barrel of oil. The hon. member for Kitchener says it is all the province's fault. But what kind of a system is that?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I did not comment on what the hon. member was saying. I hope he will make that clarification in his speech.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, any member who wants to speak on this bill is welcome to join us.

This question of geological roulette is not quite the whole answer. It is not exclusively a question of geology. It has much to do with questions such as royalties, taxes, price and many other things.

Mr. Evans: Royalties, taxes and price will not put oil there.

Mr. Andre: I grant you, you are not going to be able to find oil if there is no sedimentary rock underneath. But what it involves is an awful lot more than just running outside and poking a hole in the ground.

Mr. Rae: I did not say that.

Mr. Andre: I am not suggesting the hon. member said that, but the term "geological roulette" implies it. His exact words were: "It had a lot to do with luck". It is not just luck. It is what was done with the opportunity which was available to those provinces.

I have one other comment on the question of revenues and the necessity of developing new equalization schemes. It concerns the question of approaching this from an honest point of view. There is no hope of us reaching an accord in this country as long as the government and members opposite keep talking about needing a more equitable share—that it is unfair for the federal government to get only 10 per cent and the provinces 45 per cent. That figure is just a blatant lie.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Andre: The more often that statement is repeated as the truth, the deeper the resentment, the deeper the resistance, the more alienation—call it what you like—will occur. We have to approach this thing from an honest point of view. We must be honest.

Mr. Lang: When are you going to start?

Mr. Andre: The member who rose on his fallacious point of order asks us when are we going to start.

I would advise the hon. member to read the bible—the Sunday Star. By reading George Bain's column, the hon. member will note a few of the inaccuracies in "The National Energy Program". I suggest the best way to start would be for members opposite to challenge the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) in caucus by telling them that these facts are being denied by people out west, and with some legitimacy.

An hon. Member: Even the Ontario papers are doing that.

Mr. Andre: Hon. members should ask whether there is some basis for that. That is the way to start. As long as hon. members keep repeating in mailings, in speeches, etc., the demonstrably false information contained in "The National Energy Program" and given to hon. members by the minister and his officials, the more difficult it will be for this country to come together and resolve some very difficult problems. I say this in all sincerity. It is necessary to demand more integrity from that minister. It is a situation which is extremely important to the long-term future of this country. It cannot be understated.

Before closing, I would like to say to the minister that we are prepared to see clauses 1 and 2 of Bill C-24, dealing with equalization, receive very rapid passage. We support the view of the NDP that the subject matter of equalization is worthy of considerable discussion and a reference to that effect should be given to the finance committee. That might be a better way of doing it than using this bill exclusively as a means of addressing ourselves to those questions.

With regard to clause 3 dealing with PUITTA on the basis of equity and reasonableness, it is absolutely fundamental that the federal tax system be fair in its application to all Canadians, no matter where they live. This proposal is patently unfair and we will resist it. Therefore, we make no commitment to rapid passage of this piece of legislation.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg-Birds Hill): Mr. Speaker, I want to take this opportunity during the discussion of Bill C-24 having to do with federal-provincial fiscal arrangements and transfer payments to make a few remarks about how this topic bears on the subject of health care, for which I am responsible in the NDP caucus.

However, one never debates in isolation, and before the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre) leaves the chamber, I would like to respond to part of what he said. I begin by assuring him that as a fellow western Canadian and a member of a party which stands, to put it mildly, in critical relationship with many of the ideas he espouses from time to time, we do not think that the streets of Alberta are paved with gold or that somewhere in Alberta there is a large vault which Albertans are greedily hoarding and protecting from other Canadians in an inappropriate way. We understand, as do all Canadians, that the anxiety of Albertans about a non-renewable resource is legitimate and has to be taken very seriously.

Having stated that I know the streets in Alberta are not paved with gold, the hon. member and I part company for philosophical reasons. I have talked to many Manitobans who have gone to Alberta to take part in what is perceived to be a great surfeit of riches and have come home broke, partly because the great wealth being created in Alberta is not being properly distributed by the Alberta government among ordinary Albertans. Many have gone to Alberta and come back because of the high cost of housing and everything else. Many ordinary Canadians are not able to afford the cost of such wealth. But that is somewhat beside the point of our debate this evening.

I want to make another point in response to what the hon. member for Calgary Centre said about a remark made by the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae) concerning geological roulette. It cannot be denied that much of the good circumstances in which certain provinces and people find themselves has only to do with the fact that they happen, through no virtue of their own, to be in places under which very valuable resources are found. When speaking about the undeserved nature of the wealth which accrues to certain people in certain places at certain times, we must realize that none of those resources belong to any of us. They belong to the whole world. Many Canadians are guilty of acting as though the only debate that is important is whether the resources belong to the provinces or to the federal government. We forget we have another responsibility.

In the final sense, none of us are owners of the resources. We are the stewards or trustees. We ought not to act as if the only game in town is the game we play with each other to determine who will get the most benefit from these resources. We must begin to act in a way which reflects the wider knowledge and larger picture. These resources may be put to better use in the future by other people in other places. We should have the wisdom to use the resources wisely so that more alternatives might be open for the future. That is what we must keep in mind during the interminable debates in this House which more often than not leave out that kind of global perspective.

This morning I attended a meeting of the Canadian Health Coalition, a national coalition of various groups which came together because of their mutual concern about the state of Canada's medicare system in 1979. It became obvious to people across this country that federal-provincial fiscal arrangements, as they pertain to health care and had been determined in 1977, were not working in a way that was beneficial to the maintenance and improvement of the kind of health care system which Canadians regard as normal and have come to expect.

In 1977, the Established Programs Financing Act came into being. This recognized that there were certain programs such as medicare, post-secondary education and hospitalization which were regarded as established. The logic behind it was that these programs were written into the social and political fabric of Canada and did not have to be worried about any more. The provinces were to be given a certain amount of money through block funding and tax point transfers, and because these programs were thought to be beyond the pale of political debate, it was believed the money would be used appropriately.

However, it should come as no surprise that programs such as medicare, considering how young they are, turned out to be not all that established. Indeed, many of the social programs which have come into being since the war have never really become established. They might be better described as "never safe programs". As soon as economic times become tough, the inherent philosophical compromises which existed at the time in which these programs came into being re-emerge.

● (2130)

Mr. de Jong: That is why they should be in the constitution.

Mr. Blaikie: The hon. member for Regina East (Mr. de Jong) suggests that that is why they should be in the constitution. Indeed, witnesses before the constitution committee have suggested that one of the basic conceptual inadequacies of the constitutional proposal now before us is that it elaborates no such thing as social rights; it merely delineates the limitations of the state and goes no way at all toward delineating the responsibility of the state to its people for quality of life, for health care and for any other thing that we might regard as a social right.

Nevertheless, since 1977 we have had this problem with medicare. At the time when the provinces were, in fact, given a great deal of autonomy over how they spent their health care moneys, an ideological phenomenon occurred whereby at least seven out of the ten provincial governments, Conservative governments, came to see government spending as the greatest demon with which they had to deal, and they chose health care as one of the progams where they could fight the demon of public spending. So we found that coincidentally with bloc funding, we had this neo-Conservative trend, and health care was one of the first programs to suffer.

What has happened in the course of this debate about health care, the first rumbles of which began in the early part of 1979, is that the federal government got off scot-free. I think it is time for this to end, not just for the sake of accuracy but because the federal government itself in its most recent budget has indicated its real commitment, or lack thereof, when it comes to some of the social programs, health care in particular, about which it has been so virtuous in lecturing the provinces. Let us remember that the original intention of the federal government in setting up the established programs' financing was restraint of its own. It wanted to put the lid on the amount of money which it was spending in this area, and it wanted to enable the provinces to restrain themselves in this area. The federal government did not want the provinces to feel penalized every time they saved a dollar, as they did under the former program, because every time they did not spend a dollar, that was another dollar they did not get from the federal government. So, in effect, restraint was, both federally and provincially, one of the motivations for the Established Programs' Financing.

It was a situation of which the provinces took full advantage. In effect, they took too much advantage of it and they spoiled what could have been a good system, although we in our party are not convinced it could yet be a good system. We would prefer to return to some kind of cost-sharing system, so that the federal government would have a positive role in health care, not just a negative one where the health minister is reduced to threatening the completed withdrawal of funds. The provinces have spoiled what could have been at least a worth-while experiment, one which has proven worthwhile in some provinces, particularly in the province of Quebec where freedom was used to develop and to expand the health care system.

Now, because the provinces took advantage of the federal government in some ways through the Established Programs' Financing, either out of resentment toward the provinces or out of a further move toward restraint, the Minister of Finance, as stated in the budget, expects that significant savings will be made by the federal government in the upcoming renewal of federal-provincial fiscal arrangements in the social development area, which of course involves medicare.

We think the federal government should be tough in its negotiations with the provinces. We do not think it should just go in there and say, "Don't worry about it, boys, we will continue to put lots of money into medicare, it does not matter what you do." We are not suggesting that the federal government be a patsy for the provincial governments. We think steps should be taken in the course of renewing these arrangements to put in place structures which would prevent the provinces from acting in the way they have recently.

We do not think, however, that the federal government should go into those renewal negotiations with the intention of saving money. Its intention should be to ensure that both the provincial governments and the federal government put in as much money on a shared basis, whatever the details might be, as is needed to maintain and to improve Canada's health care system. That should be the goal of the federal government in the upcoming negotiations with regard to the renewal of federal-provincial fiscal arrangements. To go in there with only the goal of saving money is, I think, starting off on the wrong foot. What is needed is not for the federal government to compound the stinginess of the provincial governments with regard to health care by exhibiting the same quality.

It is bad enough that the provincial governments have been pulling back on health care. What are Canadians to expect as far as health care and social services are concerned when saving money becomes the primary goal of the federal government? All Canadians agree, even people who do not otherwise agree with each other such as, for instance, the Canadian Medical Association and the NDP, that one of the fundamental problems of the medicare system is that it is drastically underfunded. Now it appears that this underfunding is to be compounded by the federal government in its intention to save money in the forthcoming negotiations.

If, indeed, the problem is underfunding, there are only two options available. One is that the money which will be needed to maintain the existing level of services, the money which will be needed in the poorer provinces to bring them up to a level of health care enjoyed by some Canadians in some provinces, the money which will be needed right across the board to fulfil the original vision of Mr. Justice Hall in his royal commission report of 1964, the money which will be needed to instal a comprehensive health care system in this country, both preventive and curative, will either have to come from public or from private sources. Of course, the argument of the Canadian Medical Association is that this money should come from private sources in the form of extra billing, deterrent fees, ward charges, premiums, and various other ways. This is really not private money but public money coming from citizens on a selective basis, coming sometimes from the sick and sometimes from people in general. For instance, with regard to premiums, that money comes on a regressive basis. There is no notion there of the kind of fairness which we expect, at least in theory, from our tax system.

• (2140)

The other alternative to solving this problem of underfunding is, of course, to solve it by public means through increasing the commitment of governments, both federal and provincial, to our health care system. That means finding political will. That means closing tax loopholes. That means taking seriously the other side of the restraint question, which is the revenue question. There is another approach to restraint other than cutting back services, and that is to raise the necessary money by going out and appealing to the best in Canadians, by appealing to their notion of a fair and just society in which health care, for instance, is something about which people do not have to worry and which they can expect without regard to their economic circumstances. That is the direction in which we want to see the federal government move in this whole area of concern having to do with federal-provincial fiscal arrangements. The federal government should maintain its role as redistributor of the national wealth. However, it should maintain that role for the right reasons and see itself as the guarantor of the quality of life of all Canadians.

If the federal government enters the negotiations with that spirit and if any further amendments which come before us are put before us in that spirit, we could see our way to supporting that kind of principle.

Mr. Bill McKnight (Kindersley-Lloydminster): Mr. Speaker, I enter the debate on Bill C-24 because coming from Saskatchewan, a province which still relies on equalization from the federal government in order to obtain revenues, I feel it is important to do so. The first two clauses of this bill do not really cause me much concern, but what does concern me is the idea of equalization. In order to equalize there must be something to begin with. If there is nothing to spread about Canada in terms of dollars, equalization really does not mean much, despite all the high sounding words spoken about it.

In the brief time allowed me I would like to talk about some of the policies of the present government and what they are doing to stifle funds in Canada. I refer not just to the western part of Canada but to all of Canada. When funds are stifled there are fewer funds to equalize. There are fewer funds to give to other Canadians to provide the joys of a better life and a higher standard of living.

My constituency is basically agricultural, but in the constituency there is a considerable amount of heavy oil and sweet oil. A considerable amount of experimentation has been going on in my constituency to enable the people in the business to extract the heavy oil from the ground. I do not want this to sound like a maiden speech, but in my constituency there are several small rural communities of anywhere from 350 to 3,000 people. As a matter of fact, a town with a population of 3,000 is large. If I wanted to go on like the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) I could do the "I've been everywhere" act and refer to Kindersley, Eston, Maidstone, Naymont, Marsden and Lloydminster. I could go on, but I am sure not everyone is interested in the number of towns in my constituency.

I would like to talk about something which is not manufactured in my constituency, the automobile. There have been great debates in this House about the support given to the Chrysler Corporation. There have been great debates about supporting the industry in central Canada, and I agree with that. However, I will tell the House what this government's policy has done to some of the small—and I mean small—owner-managed companies in my community which employ anywhere from five to thirty employees.

Let us talk about the energy policy and what it has done. Ackerman Chev-Olds of Kindersley had plans to expand to a daily rental service. It had plans to expand its leasing division. It was going to hire three more people, and in a small community that is an asset. The company was asked to do appraisals, before the budget was brought down, by companies in the oil industry, but now those requests have been withdrawn. The company feels that in the next months it will lose vehicle sales amounting to $300,000. Those vehicles are not manufactured in Saskatchewan.

Let us talk about Tisdale Ford in Kindersley. That company will lose 20 potential sales which it had planned for over the next three months into the oil patch. The company will have lost sales of approximately $200,000. It will lose sales of $75,000 at the gas pumps because of the reduction in the number of vehicles coming in to fill up. That is how drastic the reduction in my area is.

Let us talk about Dodsland, Saskatchewan, which is a small community of 350 to 400 people. One small company lost the sales of four units, which amounts only to $40,000. But those trucks are not made in Saskatchewan. They are made in Ontario.

An hon. Member: It all adds up!

Mr. McKnight: Let's carry on. Look at Cavalier Chev-Olds in Lloydminster. One company has cancelled four units. The sale of four units at $10,000 amounts to $40,000, but Cavalier Chev-Olds has had orders for four semi-tractors cancelled, and they cost about $80,000 to $100,000. And they are not made in Saskatchewan.

An hon. Member: What about equalization payments?

Mr. McKnight: An hon. member opposite asks about equalization payments. I am telling hon. members opposite that the problem is that they are destroying part of their Ontario industry by the energy policies they are creating. Those policies are destroying the Ontario industry they propose to support. It is not hurting the people of Saskatchewan. We do not manufacture trucks and cars, but we would like to buy them from the good people of Ontario. We would like to support our friends in Ontario by purchasing vehicles, and if we can purchase them and continue in our area of expertise, which happens to be in the oil patch, we will support the industries of central Canada.

I would like to go on to say that Cavalier Chev-Olds in Lloydminster has spent a quarter of a million dollars on expansion, and now the company is wondering if it will be able to maintain its dealership.

Regal Motors in Rosetown took a look at its projected sales after the budget and reduced them by $1.2 million. Stuart Ford-Mercury in Lloydminster has reduced its potential sales by one-third. These are sales of trucks and heavy trucks.

Let us talk about what has happened to the companies which would have bought these vehicles and which would have contributed to equalization. They would have purchased goods from central Canada, Atlantic Canada and, indeed, western Canada. Let us talk about Husky Oil. Husky has not decided to take its goods out of Canada. It has not decided to drill elsewhere, but it might cut its exploration budget by 60 per cent. It still has faith in this country. It would be its intention to offer help to this government in any area this government might wish so that it could continue to explore for oil and heavy oil in my part of Canada.

Just a few months ago United Canso, led by Canadians, took back control of United Canso from the Buckleys of New York, from Cataba, an American company. United Canso fought a very expensive battle to bring back Canadian control to this company, but let us see what is going to happen. Do hon. members know what will happen after January 1 at $16.70 a barrel?

The Saskatchewan oil well income tax of $7.47 is taken from that. Freehold and overriding royalties amount to $1.11. Petroleum and gas revenue tax is $1.07. Operating costs, direct with no overhead, amount to $3.35. Federal income tax amounts to $3.34. Provincial income tax amounts to 67 cents. The total is $17.01. They will lose 31 cents per barrel. One cannot expect a company to produce at a loss of 31 cents per barrel.

• (2150)

An hon. Member: No, they will not.

Mr. McKnight: I hear a socialist saying that they will not. They say they should produce oil and lose 31 cents per barrel because it is a Canadian company. They say, "Please do that." I do not think it is proper, and I am sure most members of the House would agree.

At least 60 per cent of this company's exploratory budget will now be moved to the United States. In other words, they have doubled exploration in the United States. These people are responsible to shareholders, and they have nothing else to do but to try to protect their shareholders. The policies of the government opposite have shut down the market. When the energy policy of the government comes into effect on January 1, it could create more equalization money; but when a valve freezes, they will not send a man out at $8 or $12 per hour. They will leave the valve frozen. Why would they go out when they lose 31 cents per barrel? Nobody would go out. But the government imports oil from Mexico at approximately $40 per barrel. One cannot understand this, unless one talks to the people who have spent a long, long time in the business.

I should like to talk about Home Oil and run over its operating costs. In Saskatchewan, from a well which pumps less than ten barrels a day, they get $15.15. Their operating costs are $4.80. Their net return is $10.35, less the royalty of $5.15, net provincial tax of 77 cents, federal tax of $2.79 and a petroleum gas revenue tax of zero. They will get $1.64. But let me deal with heavy oil and a well which produces more than ten barrels a day. After January 1 they will get $16.15. Their operating costs will be $4.80. Their net return will be $11.35. Their royalty will be $6.61; provincial tax, 87 cents; federal tax, $3.06; the petroleum gas revenue tax, 91 cents. They will lose ten cents per barrel. There is no point in producing oil at losses of ten cents per barrel. This is in Saskatchewan. If a company loses ten cents per barrel on heavy oil, why would it continue? It will only continue to do maintenance. The net result of the 8 per cent petroleum gas revenue tax is that earnings will drop by 50 per cent in 1981 and by 75 per cent in 1984.

I should like to refer to Big Hart Oil which was started by a Canadian individual who worked in the oil patch, became an expert in it and went ahead on his own. Does the House know what has happened? He stopped. He will not spend any more money in Saskatchewan because he would lose six cents on the dollar. The Saskatchewan government takes 68 cents out of $1 and the federal government takes 38 cents. If Big Hart quit today, it would end up owing $5 million to the bank five years from now. They cannot quit; they say they cannot quit. He obtained a bank loan for $15 million for 1980-81 to be paid back in September, 1985. If all his cash flow was applied to reduce the interest and loan expenses, Big Hart would still owe $5,127,000 at the end of five years. His total income for 1980-81 will be $64 million, but he would still owe $5 million if he did not spend any money. What has the government's policy done? Big Hart is forced to stay in Canada with its wells, but it has gone into the United States and has purchased 55,000 acres in Texas. It has spent $4 million, which would have been spent in Canada, in order to obtain the drilling rights on 55,000 acres. The company is gambling that the Texas production, if it is lucky, will pay off its investment in Canada. Is that not terrible—a Canadian company has to go to the United States and gamble that its oil production there will pay off its investment in our country?

Yet, hon. members opposite wonder why the people of western Canada say, "What you are doing is not fair, what you are doing is not right."

Mr. Whelan: Tell us how they share the oil in Texas.

Mr. McKnight: I hear the Hon. Minister of Agriculture talking about sharing. If he was not such a tired Minister of Agriculture and had more heart and spirit, he would stand up for the farmers of western Canada. He would stand up so that they are not crippled by the energy policy of the government, so that some day equalization payments would not have to be paid to the farmers of western Canada. That will happen if the energy policy of the government continues without some support for agriculture.

I should like to continue dealing with the same Canadian company which was started by an individual. In the last two years he spent $20 million. He cancelled next year's program which means that he has cancelled 15 wells. Does the House know to what it has come? The government of Saskatchewan has a better understanding of the oil industry than the Liberal government here in Ottawa. At least the government of Saskatchewan understands that producers must negotiate and receive some return on their investment. They are willing to go an extra mile. They went in 1973 and 1974, the province of Alberta went an extra mile in those years. The federal government hopes the provinces will dig it out of the hole, so that these companies will be able to continue finding oil for the people of Canada.

Let me turn to Francana which indicated that after tax it made 12 cents per barrel. With the budget and its 8 per cent revenue tax, the federal government will take $1.02 per barrel and Francana will lose 12 cents per barrel. It will lose 12 cents per barrel on producing wells. Before the budget and including reinvestment on new oil, it was netting 30 cents per barrel, assuming that it costs $5.60 per barrel to find it. But after the budget, it will lose 90 cents per barrel on new oil. There is no way to equalize payments when a company goes 90 cents per barrel in the hole.

Turning to Buttes Resources, it has ten out of 40 wells which are marginal. They will shut them down. They will have to pay an 8 per cent wellhead tax and have indicated that they might as well shut the valve. They have two service rigs under contract, but if they do not use these wells, they will let one of the service rigs go. There goes employment! Buttes is another company which has indicated that the province of Saskatchewan is talking to them, assisting them and trying to give them a deal so that they can stay in production, because the heavy hand of the federal government has removed any incentive at all.

I am just at the end of my time, but I should like to talk about heavy oil. The budget papers indicated $30 per barrel for heavy oil, but the hooker or the snag is that it must be sold in Canada. How can one sell heavy oil in Canada when there isn't a refining plant? Where is the refining plant for heavy oil in Canada? How does the government expect people to take oil out of the ground at $30 per barrel? That is what they are being told, but there is no refining plant in Canada. If there is no plant in Canada to handle the refining, where do they sell it? Do they sell it across the line? They could sell it across the line, but there is only one plant across the line. There is one refining plant but it must have a guaranteed supply, and the government refuses a guaranteed supply, by saying that it must be sold in Canada. Equalization means that one must generate funds so that they can be equalized. Government policy in the energy field and other areas has stifled the growth of Canada, reduced the incomes of people, and reduced the outflow of cash from any part of Canada.

Therefore, if there is nothing to equalize, why do they talk about equalization?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

● (2200)

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Could the government whip or an hon. member on that side tell us whether we will stay with this bill tomorrow or whether the government would rather switch.

Mr. Turner: Mr. Speaker, I am advised we return to Bill C-48, the oil and gas bill, tomorrow and possibly Wednesday.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[Translation]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

PUBLIC SERVICE—INQUIRY WHETHER RETIREES WILL BENEFIT FROM INDEXATION

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Mr. Speaker, on December 9 last I directed a question to the President of the Treasury Board dealing with two matters which I consider important. First, it had to do with the pension system in the public service, especially the indexing rate for 1980, and second, I tried to learn the number of public servants who were retiring this year before December 31, and perhaps after December 1, because it was implied in my question that I wanted to know whether some public servants were waiting till the end of the fiscal year to retire thus taking advantage of an indexation measure to enjoy an indexed pension immediately in the year in which they retire.

Hon. members will remember that since 1970 a public servant can retire, subject to some restrictions of course, with full benefits at 55 years of age. Over the years, the benefits have been standardized by removing any sex discrimination and the contribution rate of the employee has been raised from 5 to 6.5 per cent. In 1970, partial indexing of benefits was adopted and contributions of both employer and employee were increased by half a point. Finally, full indexing of benefits was recommended in 1973 and implemented by this government in 1974. A second increase of half a point was also provided for, to be collected from both employer and employee, as of January 1, 1977.

The President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) recently told me in answer to a question that he had not yet set the rate of indexing but that he would write to me; I received his letter today; I should like to read it to you. I quote:

Dear Mr. Gauthier:

Further to the question you put to me in the House of Commons Tuesday last with regard to the rate of indexing that will apply from January 1, 1981, to the benefits received by former members of the civil service, I am pleased to advise that the rate will be 9.7 per cent, as announced publicly last Friday.

I was not aware that he had announced it last Friday. I resume the quotation:

The 9.7 per cent increase will apply to the benefits paid at any time in 1980, that is, to the pensions of those persons who retired or became disabled in 1980 or earlier, and those of surviving spouses and for dependent children who were entitled to pensions in 1980 or earlier. The 9.7 per cent increase will be paid former employees of the civil service, the armed forces, the RCMP, former members of Parliament and senators, former judges—and the letter lists all those who are entitled to that increase in pension. Mr. Speaker, I believe we all agreed, some years ago, on the need for indexing pensions, to protect our pensioners against the thief that inflation is. And I am pleased to learn that the President of the Treasury Board announced today that one hundred thousand retired civil servants and dependants will be entitled this year to a catching up increase which, while not giving them an edge in terms of real income, will at least enable them to maintain their purchasing power for the coming year. I think, Mr. Speaker, that no active and industrialized society is immune from a certain level of inflation nowadays.

Inflation, as we know, is detrimental to the various types of pensioners and widens the income gap between those who work and those who are fully retired on a pension. The debate on public service pensions has been at times quite acrimonious and it has been going on for at least over ten years. I witnessed the attempts made by the government over the past eight years to set the indexation rate, to put a ceiling on it, to make it above all flexible and geared to the ability of the fund to pay the indexation of pensions. We have seen Bill C-12 being violently opposed by certain groups from the private sector, I am referring here to the Coalition for Citizens' movement which lobbied to prevent the indexation of public service pensions under the pretence that they were getting very good salaries and were collecting highly generous pensions.

While in fact, Mr. Speaker, the truth could not be further removed from what certain groups opposed to indexation portray it to be. It has often been repeated in the course of this debate that on the average public servants get an annual pension of $7,000 or less, which is certainly not a high income. Indexation of this pension would only allow them to survive a little above the poverty line. After all, public servants cannot be blamed for all the economic ills the country is going through today and all the economic hardships we are faced with.

On a final note, Mr. Speaker, I would simply like to remind the President of the Treasury Board that it is imperative that we deal with some of the problems concerning indexation. At present, for example, public servants are allowed to retire at the end of the year, just before December 31, so as to benefit from indexation for the last year and again, on January 1, to be eligible for indexing for the coming year. I think the question could be solved by an amendment to the superannuation legislation, an order in council, a regulation or otherwise. I think the President of the Treasury Board is in a position to act. Three past presidents of the Treasury Board have told us: "We will look after it." I hope to see improvements in 1981 and I hope that the legislation will be amended so as to achieve some kind of equity, some kind of fairness in the area of pensions.

[English]

Mr. Roy MacLaren (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, on December 9 the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston), stated that he would soon be announcing the rate of increase applicable to public service pensions on January 1, 1981. The necessary calculations under the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act have now been completed. The rate will be 9.7 per cent. This figure represents the average of the increases in the monthly Consumer Price Indices from October 1, 1979, to September 30, 1980. The 9.7 percentage increase will be applied to update pensions which were in pay during 1980; that is, the pensions of persons who retired or became disabled in 1980 or earlier and those of surviving spouses and children of pension plan members who died in 1980 or earlier with a pension entitlement.

The hon. member asked specifically whether those who retire before December 31 of this year will receive a full increase in their pensions on January 1, 1981. The answer is yes. The Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act provides for annual updating of pensions on January 1 for all pensions in pay in the previous year. This means that no matter how short a period of time the pensioner was drawing pension in a year—even a few days—he or she will receive a full year's cost-of-living increase on the next January 1. Until such time as legislative amendments are made to the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act, this provision of the law must continue to be applied.

As the President of the Treasury Board advised the House, it is his intention to bring before Parliament proposed amendments to the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act in respect of that specific feature. In Bill C-12, the public service pension amendment bill introduced in the Thirtieth Parliament, which lapsed when that Parliament dissolved, changes were proposed which would have prorated the amount of pension indexing to which a pensioner would be entitled in respect of his or her first year of retirement.

Under the proposals contained in Bill C-12, a person who had been retired only a few days prior to January 1 of any year, would have to wait a full year until the next January before receiving any pension adjustment. These proposals seem quite reasonable and fair to public service pensioners. I believe I am correct in stating that there was no opposition to this feature of Bill C-12, either from members of Parliament or from pension plan members.

NATIONAL ENERGY PROGRAM—ALSANDS PROJECT—REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE OF COMPLETION

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, I rise at this time as a result of a question I put to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) on December 4. In my question I asked the minister whether any discussions had taken place to ensure the Alsands consortium—the project north of Fort McMurray—would proceed on time. If it did not, it would be a catastrophe for the nation. At a time when money is waiting from private sources to be invested in the heavy oil industry or tar sands and is sitting idle when we are at such a crucial stage in our development waiting for oil to come on-stream down the road.

The minister replied by saying:

> I can tell him that if he looks at the record, particularly with regard to tar sands plants, he will find the federal government has always been very forthcoming and ready to make sure those projects will take place.

I have had a chance to look at the record. I ask hon. members, what is that record? In a press release two weeks ago Imperial Oil announced that at $38 a barrel with future increases tied to the consumer price index, the plant at Cold Lake is not economically viable. The Alsands consortium has announced that the same pricing agreement, $38 a barrel, with future increases tied to the consumer price index, does not make it viable to proceed with their plans.

I went home this weekend and I found that the Syncrude expansion is stalled. This expansion was to bring a second train on to the plant to increase production from 140,000 barrels a day to 200,000 barrels a day. The syncrude press release reads in part:

> The point we're trying to get across is that it is not economically applicable under the current federal policies to go ahead with the expansion. It has reduced the attractiveness of expansion and increased the risk involved.

Of course, Syncrude was referring to this government's misguided energy policy. The spokesman for Syncrude went on to state:

> Imperial's message is that the opportunity from an economic standpoint is just not there.

That is the record. I know the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources in all honesty is not trying to mislead the Canadian people or this House in replying to the questions which I put to him the other night. But the situation becomes absolutely ludicrous and it can only be explained if one examines carefully what is really happening.

Alberta conventional crude oil reserves will be reduced by half in five years. Conventional crude oil reserves will be reduced by two-thirds, 66 per cent, in ten years. While the reserves decline, we are being told that this oil will be used.

The policy of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources now appears to be to use the energy in Alberta first while seeking to bring in production from Crown land, the high Arctic and offshore.

● (2215)

I reiterate my feeling that the tar sands and heavy oil plants in northeastern Alberta are absolutely crucial to the economy of this country and to our security of supply. An injection of $9 billion to $10 billion for each plant, approximately $20 billion in total, into the economy of Canada would do nothing but increase employment. The policy of the department must be reconsidered and efforts made to get those two vital plants on stream.

Mr. Roy MacLaren (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to state the government's position relative to the concern expressed by the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Shields) regarding the importance of bringing the Alsands project into production as soon as possible.

When the minister responded to the hon. member's questions on December 4, he explained that the federal government is fully committed to this project, but that he alone could not give absolute assurance that satisfactory negotiations would be completed to ensure that the project would proceed, simply because he could not speak for the government of Alberta. However, he reminded the House that the record showed that the federal government has always been ready to join in making certain that oil sands and heavy oil projects will take place. In this context, hon. members will recall that the federal government took the initiative in February, 1975, to save the Syncrude project. At that time, the governments of Alberta and Ontario, and the three private participants responded, and the project went ahead on schedule.

The National Energy Program reflects the emphasis being placed on oil sands and heavy oil development through such measures as the maintenance of the depletion allowance, the provisions of special tax incentives for heavy oil upgrading plants, and the application of reference prices at or close to international prices to encourage the opening up of these resources. Indeed, under the National Energy Program, we are offering incentive prices well above the level which project sponsors could have foreseen when any of the projects now in a planning or implementation phase were initiated and we are continuing our discussions with them.

I should like to emphasize the position always taken by the federal government, that the opening up of all new potential energy sources is a matter of high priority. The oil sands certainly do not take second place to Arctic resources or offshore discoveries. Canada needs to have all these projects brought into production as soon as possible.

We are continuing to seek an agreement with the Alberta government on both the Alsands and Cold Lake projects either as part of a comprehensive pricing agreement or separately to establish a stable and attractive regime for high cost oil projects. The Alberta government has, however, chosen to withhold its approval of the new tar sands plants until a comprehensive petroleum agreement is reached. Canadians are relying on a fair and reasonable response on the part of the government of Alberta in support of this highly important resource development project.

ATOMIC ENERGY OF CANADA LIMITED—DISPOSAL OF NUCLEAR WASTE

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg-Birds Hill): Mr. Speaker, a couple of weeks ago I asked the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) a question about whether he approved of a policy of Atomic Energy of Canada which I found in an internal document of AECL written by the Director of Public Affairs for Waste Management at the Whiteshell Nuclear Establishment. With regard to the approvals process for waste disposal sites, it was written, and I quote:

> —initiatives have been undertaken at both provincial and federal levels to have the approvals process changed in order that research areas may be obtained without forcing local councils (perhaps miles removed from a potential research area) to express their opinion by way of resolution.

The minister did not seem to know what I was talking about, particularly when I mentioned Lac du Bonnet, which I had to tell him was in Manitoba. This is forgivable, and I expect to hear tonight—although I do not really expect it because I know the parliamentary secretary will drone on as usual reading the statement prepared for him—whether the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources approves of this policy of AECL whereby it is trying to circumvent the democratically expressed will of communities like Lac du Bonnet which in this case is to be the site of an experimental waste disposal vault.

When the minister replied to my question, he talked about federal and provincial processes of approval. He never said anything about the approvals process as it pertained to local councils. I ask whether this recommendation had anything to do with the fact that a candidate for reeve in the rural municipality of Lac du Bonnet, who was critical of AECL in the most recent election there, beat the incumbent who was not as critical, to put it mildly, of AECL. I think it does, and I think it underlines the extent to which the public affairs aspect of AECL's program is just public manipulation and intimidation and little else. A company which really respected the public's mind and was really into public affairs as such would re-think its project or would re-think itself rather than the approval process when faced with this kind of circumstance.

I want to make myself clear. I support research into how to dispose of nuclear waste which is already a fact. If Lac du Bonnet is suitable for such simulative research, tell us about it, but do not sign hard-to-see contracts with provincial governments, do not only vaguely hint at more projects down the line for the same community and a demonstration vault which would actually contain nuclear waste. Do not just consult the public only as a last resort and do not patronize your opponents with the increasingly embarrassing, empty vanity of technocrats who operate under such a veil of secrecy that it is no wonder people are suspicious.

The Canadian people can handle the facts, they can handle the truth. That is why I ask the minister's parliamentary secretary, when we are going to get a full-fledged public and parliamentary debate on nuclear power in this country, and if we are not going to get it, why not? If AECL is really the servant of the people and not possessed by its own internal technological imperatives, then it should welcome such a debate. The people who work for AECL and its management should welcome, as well, their retraining for the solar technology, if that is what the public chooses.

The time has come to sort out the conflict of interest whereby AECL is not only responsible for protecting the public against the risks which are inherent in nuclear technology, but is also the major proponents of that technology in this country. I think it is high time the government recognized, first, that a debate is necessary; second, that the democratic process must be respected in every aspect of development of this technology; and third, that the time has come for some sorting out of the conflict of interest in which we continually find AECL whereby the public is put in the horrible position of having to take the word of the very people whose self-interest it is to instal the projects, the safety of which they are worried about.

Mr. Roy MacLaren (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, for a moment I shall try not to bore the hon. member opposite by reading something but, rather, I will draw to his attention that perhaps he is confusing, to some degree, the procedure in the province of Ontario with that in the province of Manitoba.

Recently there were press releases in Ontario concerning some preliminary research regarding, for example, groundwater and fly-overs in the Crown lands of Ontario where there are no incorporated townships. In those areas that type of preliminary research has been carried on with the agreement of the Ontario government and with full public notice.

With regard to Manitoba, the situation is somewhat different because there, of course, the plans are to build an underground research laboratory, at the Whiteshell Research Establishment.

● (2225)

That laboratory will conduct research—I hope the hon. member will excuse me for reading this passage—"in geology, mining techniques, hydro-geology, heat transfer through rock at depth and pressure, performance of potential repository backfill materials and other related work."

The plans to proceed with that research work which is being developed in consultation with the Manitoba government have been extensively described to the local community, and there has been a series of consultative procedures to ensure full public knowledge and the opportunity to participate in the detail of those plans.

With reference to the hon. member's final point, the final authority for nuclear safety matters in Canada resides with the Atomic Energy Control Board and not with Atomic Energy of Canada Limited. The board's procedures, which are well known, will be fully observed by the Canadian government when it proceeds, in consultation with the Ontario government in the case of Ontario and with the Manitoba government in the case of Manitoba, with the further development of research into the safe disposal of spent nuclear fuel.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, the House stands adjourned until two o'clock tomorrow afternoon.

At 10.27 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

NORTHERN PIPELINES

Q AND M PIPE LINE CONSTRUCTION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Whereas the construction of the Q and M Pipe Lines is essential in order to get gas to the people of the Atlantic provinces, and whereas Premier Lougheed, in Alberta's package on July 25, 1980 to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), offered on behalf of the government of Alberta to provide equity and debt financing so that the Q and M Pipe Lines could be constructed forthwith, but the Prime Minister rejected this offer, apparently preferring to borrow the money from abroad in the same way he is buying oil from foreigners at world prices, therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Annapolis Valley-Hants (Mr. Nowlan):

That this House require the Prime Minister to appear before the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs to explain why he rejected this offer that would create employment, keep our natural gas in Canada and provide tremendous benefits to our maritime people.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

FISHERIES

EXPERIMENTAL SQUID STUDIES BY JAPANESE VESSELS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Madam Speaker, in view of the fact that the Department of Fisheries and Oceans has recently allowed two Japanese fishing vessels, the Tenyu Maru and the Tomi Maru, to enter Canadian waters to explore the possibility of establishing a commercial squid fishery, and in turn each vessel has received an allocation of 100 metric tons of black cod after the black cod fishery had been closed—I repeat, after the black cod fishery had been closed—to Canadian fishermen, I move under the provisions of Standing Order 43, seconded by the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro):

That the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans be required to reverse his deplorable decision which allows Japanese fishing companies to conduct experimental squid studies in Canadian waters, when such studies should have used the services of the Canadian owned Callistratus, or any number of other Canadian vessels which are capable of test-jigging for squid and, further, that the minister be required to explain why he has chosen to reward the Japanese by giving away 200 metric tons of black cod which Canadian fishermen were not allowed to catch.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

HOUSING

MORTGAGE RENEWALS—REQUEST FOR EMERGENCY INTERIM FINANCING—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In light of the fact that mortgage rates for people purchasing new homes or renegotiating their mortgages are beginning to approach the 20 percentile range and the fact that all of us as parliamentarians are receiving letters outlining the problems people are facing as they must renegotiate their mortgages, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Beaches (Mr. Young):

That this House express its will and the will of the Canadian people in requesting the major lending institutions of Canada to provide emergency interim financing to those Canadians faced with mortgage renewals to help them get through this period of devastatingly high interest rates.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

F-18A FIGHTER AIRCRAFT—ECONOMIC BENEFIT TO CANADA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Marcel Dionne (Chicoutimi): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to ask for the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion concerning an important matter.

In view of the fact that the American government will purchase 168 F-18A fighters, or 24 more than the number suggested by the Secretary of Defence of the United States for the year 1980-81, and in view of the fact that this authorization confirms that the F-18A is the best fighter in its category and that the Canadian government made the best possible choice, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine (Mr. Bujold):

That it be reasserted that these latest developments will have beneficial effects in terms of industrial fall-out throughout the Canadian economy as a whole.

Madam Speaker: Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, presentation of such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

THE MINISTRY

CALL FOR RESIGNATION OF MINISTER OF ENERGY, MINES AND RESOURCES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Doug Lewis (Simcoe North): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the lack of confidence of the members on this side of the House in the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) because of his unreasonable bargaining approach with the oil producing provinces, and in view of the fact that all provinces, those that manufacture petrochemical equipment as well as those that have the oil, are facing huge job losses as the result of the minister's untenable position, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Burlington (Mr. Kempling):

That the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources resign immediately so that the economy of Canada will go forward.

Madam Speaker: Does the hon. member have the unanimous consent of the House for the presentation of this motion?

PENSIONS

CALL FOR LEGISLATION TO PROVIDE PENSIONS TO HOMEMAKER SPOUSES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, and seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mrs. Mitchell), I move:

That this House urges the government, in view of its often-stated recognition of the role of spouses working in their homes, to bring before the House legislation to provide pensions for all homemaker spouses,—

The emphasis is on the word "all".

—not just for the minority at the top who could afford to pay a double premium to the Canada Pension Plan, it being the view of this House that all homemaker spouses are entitled to pensions equivalent to those earned by contributors to the Canada Pension Plan, it being clear also that only such a universal plan will fully recognize the contribution to our society made by those who work in the home.

EXTERNAL AID

SCHOLARSHIPS—CALL FOR WITHDRAWAL OF ASSISTANCE TO FORMER PRIME MINISTER OF JAMAICA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of recent news report indicating that Michael Manley, the recently defeated prime minister of Jamaica and long-time friend of Canada's Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), has been invited to apply for a Canadian foreign aid scholarship worth up to $60,000, and that there are many worthy Canadian and foreign students whose philosophy and ideals are closer to those of the majority of Canadians than the radical ideals espoused by Mr. Manley, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Gustafson):

That the government instruct Ivan Head, president of the International Development Research Centre, to withdraw the offer to Mr. Manley and to search out and fund students whose philosophy and goals are in line with Canadian and western thinking.

Madam Speaker: Does the hon. member have the unanimous consent of the House to introduce this motion?

BANKRUPTCIES

ASTRA TRUST—CALL FOR JUDICIAL INQUIRY INTO AFFAIRS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Kempling (Burlington): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. The bankruptcy of Astra Trust has caused massive losses to depositors and shareholders alike. Re-Mor, the mortgage arm of Astra Trust, has bilked millions of dollars from the public through business practices which can be classed as misrepresentation, fraud, deception, bait and switch, and other thoroughly dishonest practices planned and carried out by the management and directors of Astra Trust, Re-Mor and C & M Financial Consultants. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. Catharines (Mr. Reid):

That the Minister of Finance initiate a judicial inquiry into the Astra Trust affair and include in the inquiry the affairs of Re-Mor and C & M Financial Consultants and require that in particular the inquiry dwell in some detail on the fact that the trust licence for Astra Trust was turned down three times by the Department of Insurance, as well as the province of Ontario, before it was finally issued on November 17, 1977.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

CALL FOR ASSISTANCE TO ATLANTIC PROVINCES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy-Royal): Madam Speaker, another blow to Atlantic Canada as a result of the maritime minister's financial fiasco of October 28, and subsequent indifference to the miseries which are accruing in a compound fashion, has been struck. The Canadian Gypsum Co. Ltd. will close its operations in Hillsborough, New Brunswick, as of December 31 due to a lack of markets, throwing approximately 60 people out of work. The government railway, the CNR, has made application to abandon its line from Salisbury to Hillsborough. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Prince George-Bulkley Valley (Mr. McCuish):

That this government either move immediately to alleviate the desperate straits of Atlantic Canadians typified by communities such as Hillsborough, or level with the people and tell them they do not give a damn about Atlantic Canada so that Atlantic Canadians will realize the hopelessness of their situation and make plans to starve to death.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

ECONOMIC COUNCIL OF CANADA

FORECAST RESPECTING WAGE LEVELS—PROGRAMS TO CREATE JOBS

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance who will know that the Economic Council of Canada is forecasting that real wages of Canadians will drop more than 4 per cent this year and next. Will the minister tell the House whether he intends to introduce any new policy to stop that dramatic cut in the ability of average Canadians to buy what they need?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, without commenting upon the validity of the forecast made by the Economic Council of Canada, it is not my intention to alter at the present time the budget policies which were introduced on October 28.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, the minister has indicated that he does not at the present time—whatever that means—intend to do anything about the fact that the real income of Canadians, their ability to earn enough money to buy the things they need, will be dramatically cut. He would know that his government's policies are also cutting out the ability of Canadians to find work. He would know that the number of people who are not even seeking work now, because they feel hopeless and desperate as there is no work for them to find, is up 25 per cent over a year ago. Does the minister intend to introduce any new measures to create the hope of jobs for Canadians who want to go to work?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, I know that over the past year the number of jobs in Canada has increased significantly. The last statement from Statistics Canada shows that the seasonally adjusted unemployment rate in Canada over the month had decreased, and that it had decreased in every region of Canada but one. I know these facts as well, Madam Speaker, but despite these facts I did lay out in the budget a series of programs which, in my view, will contribute significantly to the quality of the recovery which Canada needs over the medium term.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, the people of Canada are tiring of this bafflegab from the Minister of Finance. They know even if the Minister of Finance intends to ignore it that the number of unemployed in Canada is up and the number of people who are so hopeless about the prospect of getting a job is up dramatically over the last year.

The minister repeated again today that he had no plans "at the present time". Last Wednesday he had no plans at all. On Thursday he said that he had not yet decided to introduce any new measures "at the present time." On Friday he was blaming Canada's economic problems on the U.S. federal reserve system. I am intrigued by the minister's indication that he has no plans "at the present time". What is he holding back from Parliament? Does the minister have any intention at all to bring in in the foreseeable future any new economic measures? If so, will he tell us when we might expect those measures and what specific problems they are designed to address?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, if the answer would be more agreeable to the hon. member if I deleted the phrase "at the present time", I would do so. It is not my intention now, nor will I decide within a week, two weeks or three weeks, to bring forward a new economic strategy for the country, because in the budget on October 28 I formulated an economic strategy which, in my view, is suited to the current economic climate in the country. I do not propose to change that unless there are some factors down the road which would necessitate change. I do not want the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition to draw any conclusions from the use of the expression "at the present time" or the word "yet".

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, if we have learned one thing about the Minister of Finance, apart from the fact that he has no economic policies, it is that he chooses his language deliberately. This is the third day in five in which he has quite carefully said "no policies yet; no changes at the present time". Now he says there will be no changes unless there is development of some factor down the line.

We want to know whether the government is going to take the budget as its last word. Is it going to ignore the increasing difficulties that his economic policies have caused for the ordinary citizens of this country, or is there going to be a change of heart? Is there going to be a rediscovery of the principles of Father Cody? Is there going to be some willingness on the part of the government to show some compassion for the people of Canada? Are there going to be some new economic measures brought forward by this government within the next three to four months?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, the current difficulties, particularly those facing the Canadian exchange rate and interest rates in the country, have nothing to do with budgetary policies. They come from other sources. The right hon. gentleman ought to draw some distinction between the impact of policies which are included in the budget and other forces which affect Canada because we are part of the world. It is not my intention to have the country drop off the planet, even though that was his policy when he was prime minister.

FINANCE

POLICY RESPECTING MONETARY EXPANSION—EFFECT ON CANADA OF UNITED STATES POLICY

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, the minister's slogan is "Stop the world, I want to get off". He has done nothing to help economic conditions in Canada today. On Friday the minister disclaimed all responsibility for interest rate policy. He blamed our troubles on the U.S. policy. He said that "it is not a proper application of monetary policy in the current circumstances."

Since the Bank of Canada and the U.S. Federal Reserve Board have both been restricting growth in the money supply and both use higher interest rates because of the inflation threat in order to do that, will the minister now tell us whether he is abandoning his statement in the budget that the Bank of Canada will have his continuing support in holding down the rate of monetary expansion? Has he given a written directive to Governor Bouey that interest rates are not to go up any further in Canada, and has he made any official protests to the United States about the fact that they are pursuing the same monetary policy as he has been pursuing here in Canada?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member obviously has misunderstood the point of my comments on Friday. No one is complaining about the effort of the United States government to control inflation. No one is complaining about the effort of the United States to control the money supply. What I have complained about are the very wide swings in interest rates or the volatility in interest rates which have been part and parcel of the administration of the Federal Reserve Bank since last spring. That is the point to which I take exception and to which I believe other countries undoubtedly take exception as well. Since this fluctuation or volatility in short-term interest rates is having a very adverse effect on Canada in a number of ways, I believe it is appropriate for a country like Canada, when such a development is evident, to make its views known.

The hon. member asked me whether I have made an official protest; maybe that is not the expression he used. I regard the word "protest" as too strong, but I have under consideration making my views on this matter known directly to the relevant officials in the United States.

Mr. Crosbie: Madam Speaker, under this finance minister Canada has the worst of all possible worlds. We have sky-high interest rates, a rapidly foundering Canadian dollar and a floundering government. I have not seen reported any statement by any other finance minister complaining about the U.S. policy with reference to the Federal Reserve Bank.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: The political nyphomaniacs on my left want to be in bed with the government. They cannot stop themselves. They try to interrupt my questions.

Mr. Nielsen: They do not want to do it legally.

Mr. Crosbie: That's right. They want to go all the way. My question for the Minister of Finance is this. What advice does the Minister of Finance have for the incoming Reagan administration? What economic and monetary policy does he advise them to take? Does he want them to let monetary expansion grow apace? What does he want to do with interest rates and the money supply? Does he want them to increase their deficit? What advice is he prepared to give the U.S. to direct them as to action they should take? When he tells us that, will he also tell the House, if he is not prepared to take responsibility for some policies himself, whether he and his government will resign and make way for those who will take responsibility?

● (1425)

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, the only value I see in answering the hon. gentleman is perhaps to put before him one or two facts which may influence his thinking. He constantly accuses the government of being responsible for the current situation.

An hon. Member: It is.

Mr. MacEachen: I would draw to his attention that today in the United States prime commercial rates have been raised to 21 per cent; the equivalent rate in Canada is 17 per cent.

An hon. Member: That is until Thursday.

Mr. MacEachen: The hon. member knows there is a very close link between capital markets in Canada and in the United States, and that discrepancy, that gap, that differential in interest rates between the two countries, is bound to have an effect on interest rates in Canada and on the exchange value of Canadian currency.

If the hon. member does not accept my analysis, all he has to do is refer to the statement issued last week by the Governor of the Bank of Canada, in whom he had considerable confidence and whose reappointment he recommended, and in that regard I supported him, as did members of our party. In the statement made last week by the Governor of the Bank of Canada, the governor stated that this very problem about which the hon. member is talking and with which the Bank of Canada has been trying to deal in recent weeks does not originate in Canada. I would at least ask the hon. member to try not to confuse the Canadian public by questions which are falsely based and which add nothing to public understanding of what is a very difficult situation that both the governor and the Government of Canada are facing at the present time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

POLICY RESPECTING INTEREST RATES

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Madam Speaker, my question is also for the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance. I should like to ask him to reflect for a moment on the difference between the statements he has made, and again repeated today, in respect of Canada's interest rate policy and statements which have been made by the Prime Minister as recently as December 5. On December 5 the Prime Minister was taking pride in the fact that the Canadian government was following what he described as "an independent interest rate policy", yet both last week in the House of Commons and again today the Minister of Finance has ascribed all of our interest rate woes and policies to those being currently followed in the United States. I should like to ask the minister to come clean on this and simply tell us, is the interest rate policy, currently being followed by the government and by the Bank of Canada, which he supports, an independent interest rate policy which reflects conditions in Canada, or is it a policy which is simply following that of the Federal Reserve Board of the United States?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member obviously knows the answer to that question which in the main is rhetorical. He knows you cannot have a differential of four points in interest rates in Canada and in the United States, when the two capital markets are interlinked, without that influence spreading into Canada. There is no way to avoid that.

● (1430)

To say that, however, is not to say that the Governor of the Bank of Canada and the Government of Canada are not following an independent monetary policy, just as we follow an independent foreign policy, an independent trade policy—you name it. However, all these policies are influenced by forces activated in every other country in the world. I hope I do not have to explain that elementary fact to the hon. member who has just asked the question.

Mr. Rae: Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is equally simple and equally non-rhetorical. I would like to remind the minister that on May 27 last the minister said, and I quote:

> —when this government took office, the bank rate was 14 per cent; today it is 11.83 per cent . . . That is quite a result.

On June 19 his colleague, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, said that due to the floating rate policy of the Bank of Canada the rate was coming down. Why is it that when the rates are coming down it is somehow the miraculous result of the policies of the Liberal government, whereas when the rates go up it is because of what is going on in the United States?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, I suppose one could ask hon. gentlemen opposite why it is that when interest rates go down they disappear from the question period and why they return when they are going up. That would be the question to ask.

Mr. Rae: Madam Speaker, the definition of a Liberal is clearly someone who does not even know how to blush because he has lost the capacity to be embarrassed. That answer was unbelievable.

I would like to ask the minister a final supplementary question. Precisely what protests has Governor Bouey made to the United States? When and where did they occur, and precisely what was the response of the American government and the American Federal Reserve Board chairman as a result of the protest made by the Governor of the Bank of Canada?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, I will try to give the hon. member as much information as I have at my disposal. The Governor of the Bank of Canada attended a meeting of central bank governors of several countries last week, and at that meeting he expressed the concerns which he later made public in Canada about the volatility and wide fluctuations in the short-term interest rates in the United States. That is the information I have and which I am very happy to convey, in an unblushing manner, to the hon. member.

ATOMIC ENERGY CONTROL BOARD

AMENDMENTS TO STRENGTHEN HEALTH AND SAFETY REGULATIONS

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Mines. In view of the recommendations contained in the report of the Ontario legislature's select committee on hydro affairs concerning the Atomic Energy Control Board and the meeting which was held on December 4 here in Ottawa with representatives of the board and the United Steelworkers of America from Elliot Lake—

An hon. Member: Caucus.

Mr. Foster: —can the minister assure the House that amendments to the Atomic Energy Control Board regulations will be made to strengthen the health and safety sections of those regulations?

Hon. Judy Erola (Minister of State, Mines): Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for Algoma for his question, although I had great difficulty hearing it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mrs. Erola: However, I do believe I got the gist of it. Yes, I too share the hon. member's concern about the health and safety of workers in Elliot Lake. I would like to enlarge upon the question, if I may. As the hon. member knows, the select committee also made some recommendations, and I concur with many of them.

Mr. Clark: Order, Madam Speaker.

Mrs. Erola: I should like to add that I too feel that the AECB regulations do lack teeth. I will suggest to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources that we give the AECB the proper measures to put teeth into its regulations.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. The mere fact that the hon. member is sitting next to the minister is no reason—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Madam Speaker: —for me to deny the question. The hon. member is entitled to a public answer to his question.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

HOUSING

ASSISTANCE TO FIRST-TIME BUYERS—STIMULATION OF CONSTRUCTION INDUSTRY

Mr. Doug Lewis (Simcoe North): Madam Speaker, since interchanges between seatmates are in vogue, I would like to pose my question to the Minister of Finance. He has suggested that interest rates are tied to problems in the United States and to international money markets, but on December 5 his seatmate said, and I quote:

> Madam Speaker, the formula introduced by the Minister of Finance is precisely that, an independent interest rate policy. It is set by the free market in Canada. It is not tied to an automatic index of United States interest rates.

During the election campaign we were accused of levying an 18-cent tax to pay for a mortgage interest and property tax credit, but since—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Lewis: It is coming; hon. members opposite just do not like the preamble. The minister has increased the price of gasoline. He has levied his own excise tax on gasoline. He has levied an additional tax on home heating fuel. What has the minister done for home owners?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, it is not what I have done for home owners; it is what the House of Commons did for home owners last December when it stopped the former government from implementing that inequitable tax deductibility plan.

Mr. Lewis: Madam Speaker, if we can swing to another topic which is related, I suggest to the minister that there is one method he could use to free up the tight vacancy rate situation, and that would be to give first-time home owners an incentive which would stimulate the construction industry. What is the minister's policy to help first-time home owners in Canada?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, that is a question of such dimensions that it could not be answered on the orders of the day.

Mr. Paproski: Why not?

Mr. Nielsen: So much for home owners.

NATIONAL ENERGY PROGRAM

INQUIRY RESPECTING AMENDMENT OF PRICING PROVISIONS—ACTION TO STIMULATE DEVELOPMENT AND CREATE JOBS

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, I would like to direct the attention of the House to a policy which is completely within the control of the government, and that is energy policy. At the weekend the chairman of the Economic Council of Canada said that Canada will not reach the goal of self-sufficiency in oil and gas by 1990 without a bigger effort in cutting down oil demand or expanding supply. He also pointed out that we would be in a better position to achieve that goal if Alberta and the producers received a little more revenue than provided in the National Energy Program.

My question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the increase in the price of oil imposed by Saudi Arabia this morning of some $2 per barrel, and in view of the proposal by the Economic Council of Canada of providing 50 cents to $1.50 more per barrel in price—that little bit more the chairman talked about—is the minister considering amending the price provisions of the National Energy Program in order to break the deadlock between Alberta and Ottawa and to help get the economy on the rails again?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, we have indicated our willingness to undertake negotiations with the government of Alberta. These negotiations have started at the officials level. We have indicated that we are willing and ready to meet with the government of Alberta at any time and anywhere.

With respect to the proposal made by the hon. member, if he can give me some indication that the government of Alberta is ready to consider an increase of 50 cents to $1.50 per barrel and would be satisfied with it, obviously this is a matter we will have to discuss. However, as far as we are concerned we are available for negotiations.

Mr. Wilson: Madam Speaker, I had understood that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources was the one responsible for negotiations with Alberta. I would be very happy to take over his responsibilities if he wishes to give them to me.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

● (1440)

Mr. Wilson: Last Thursday the Minister of Finance stated that the National Energy Program did provide a comprehensive framework to get the major energy projects in Canada under way. At the same time, however, the chairman of the Economic Council said that the National Energy Program is a severe inhibition to our economic performance, particularly in the area of energy development. In view of that and in view of the action which has been announced by the industry of cutting back their exploration budgets by some 50 per cent, the cancellation of major projects such as Cold Lake, Alsands and Judy Creek, plus the Calgary Herald's estimate that some 350 oil rigs will be moving to the United States next year, does the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources feel that the statement made by the Minister of Finance indicates a woeful misunderstanding of the chaos which has been caused by the National Energy Program? If so, what action is the minister proposing to take to get energy development going again and to create jobs, not just in Alberta but in Welland, Ontario, Hamilton, Stratford, Orillia, Mississauga, Ste. Thérèse, and in many parts of eastern Canada?

An hon. Member: Nothing.

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, I welcome the indication from the hon. member that he is ready to cross the floor, and I understand him.

An hon. Member: Answer the question.

Mr. Lalonde: I am sure that if he wants to make special representations to the Prime Minister, the Prime Minister will listen to him attentively.

An hon. Member: You are unbelievable.

An hon. Member: He is Wilson, not Horner.

An hon. Member: We are all crossing together.

Mr. Lalonde: I understand that some others would like to apply also, but they will have to come after the hon. member.

Mr. Crosbie: You are a bunch of shipwrecks.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I am glad that the Christmas spirit has invaded the House and this is very good for us, but we must have a question period.

Mr. Lalonde: I would invite the hon. member to quote the president of the Economic Council of Canada accurately. The president of the Economic Council has indicated that the lack of an agreement was creating serious difficulty. We share that view and we said that we would prefer to have an agreement with the government of Alberta. We have indicated our willingness to negotiate. I deplore the fact that we have been able to have only one meeting to date with the government of Alberta in spite of our indication that we are available to discuss the agreement. We are still available and I hope that we will be able to reach an agreement which will be satisfactory to all parties concerned.

Oral Questions

AIR CANADA

FLIGHT ATTENDANTS' DISPUTE—REQUEST FOR IMPROVED OFFER

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina West): Madam Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Labour. It has to do with the dispute between Air Canada and the airline flight attendants. In view of the fact that representatives of the union have requested a meeting and Air Canada has agreed to meet with them on Thursday morning and again on Friday morning, the union hoping that Air Canada will come forward with an improved offer over what the conciliator recommended, but the only thing on the agenda on Thursday morning is a discussion on shutdown procedures and on Friday morning the union is to advise Air Canada about the results of the strike vote, would the minister request the president of Air Canada to be in attendance at those two meetings and to agree to an improvement of the conciliator's offer so that flight attendants receive parity with those of other airlines with regard to wages, vacations and guaranteed days off, with a view to reaching an agreement on Thursday or Friday morning?

Hon. Gerald Regan (Minister of Labour): Madam Speaker, the hon. member, of course, asks a question about a matter which is of grave concern to a large number of Canadians, and that is the possibility of a strike by airline stewardesses of Air Canada during the Christmas season.

Some hon. Members: Flight attendants.

An hon. Member: Sexist.

An hon. Member: Another Harry Hays!

Mr. Regan: Flight attendants.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Regan: I might say that the present situation is that the commissioner, Stanley Hartt, has reported and the recommendation in the conciliation report has been accepted by Air Canada. The flight attendants' union is voting on the recommendation at this time. The result of their vote will be known late Thursday night or early Friday morning.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Regan: I am certain that hon. members are, despite their sense of levity in the Christmas season, concerned about the fact that strike action should be avoided if at all possible in this serious situation. However, the hon. member will recognize that the necessity for any further negotiation between the parties is not evident until the outcome of the vote, which is at present being taken, is determined. I think it would be highly inappropriate to prophesy just how that vote will go. It certainly is the hope of the Department of Labour, and I believe of most Canadians, that an agreement will be achieved without a work stoppage.

Mr. Benjamin: Madam Speaker, the minister has about 72 hours, regardless of what the results of the strike ballot are, to act, but he must assume that the ballot will be in favour of a strike.

In view of the fact that one of the problems is the length of the contract, and in view of the fact that that problem could be solved if parity between Air Canada air flight attendants and those of other airlines were achieved, which would result in a settlement, will the minister persuade the Minister of Transport to instruct or strongly advise the president of Air Canada to be present, and will the minister himself make himself available at the Thursday and Friday morning meetings to obtain a parity settlement, preferably with a 24-month contract or even with a 29-month contract?

Mr. Regan: Madam Speaker, I must say to the hon. member that the one thing I will not do is to try to carry on conciliation efforts here on the floor of the House. I do not suggest that that is in the best interests of collective bargaining, as the hon. member is well aware. I want to say to him that if he wants to conciliate, I think he should study the facts a little more in relation to what constitutes parity and whether he would also be seeking parity in relation to the hours of work, because that might cast another light on the situation. However, it is the role of the Department of Labour not to take sides but rather to provide assistance to the parties, as we have done throughout this struggle, in an effort to help them achieve an agreement. I think it is wrong for the hon. member to assume that there will be an adverse vote on Thursday night when the report on the vote of the flight attendants is made.

THE BUDGET

EFFECT OF MEASURES ON SASKATCHEWAN OIL PRODUCERS

Mr. Len Gustafson (Assiniboia): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. Given the very serious situation which exists in western Canada in the oil industry, particularly in Saskatchewan where his budget is having such a devastating effect that companies are telling us now that the production of every barrel of oil in Saskatchewan is costing them from 25 cents to 70 cents more, to the point that they are considering shutting down production at a time when we should have a booming oil economy in western Canada, will the minister look into the situation, given the fact that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources seems to sidestep the issue, is unable to reach a pricing agreement and is not serious about the problem which exists in western Canada, and in Saskatchewan in particular?

● (1450)

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has stated on a number of occasions that we are prepared as a government to negotiate and have discussions with the province of Alberta, and with other western provinces, in an effort to reach a solution or agreement that would remove any concerns which may exist.

That offer still stands. It seems to me the best way to achieve the good results the hon. member has in mind is to create an atmosphere which will make it possible to begin these discussions and to reach a conclusion satisfactory to both sides. Until that happens it does not seem to me that the hon. member can have his concerns entirely removed.

Mr. Gustafson: Madam Speaker, again my question is for the Minister of Finance. The situation in Saskatchewan is so serious that rigs are leaving, service rigs are facing problems and there are no new contracts for the new year. We must have some immediate action in Saskatchewan and in western Canada. Will the minister reconsider his position? Will he bring in a new budget or a mini-budget? Will he jolt his colleague into action?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, the hon. member is speaking about the province of Saskatchewan and tomorrow I shall have an opportunity, at a meeting of finance ministers, to discuss the situation in Saskatchewan with the minister for that province, as well as with ministers from other provinces. I will check with him my own impressions that the prospects for economic growth in Saskatchewan are very strong. The growth in that province has been strong in the past year, and from what I know the growth in 1981 in the province of Saskatchewan will be among the best of any province in the whole country.

FINANCE

MEASURES TO ASSIST ATLANTIC PROVINCES

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy-Royal): Madam Speaker, my question is for the member of Parliament from Atlantic Canada who is responsible for the portfolio of finance. As the minister is aware, the Economic Council of Canada, since the budget, has revised its forecast of inflation from 10 per cent to 11.4 per cent. Since the minister's party has taken office the value of the dollar has declined by at least 5 per cent. The minister knows that every drop in the dollar adds four-tenths of 1 per cent to the cost of living, which is about an increase of 2 per cent altogether since they have taken office. Interest rates continue to soar. It is said that a 1.5 per cent increase in bank interest rates adds 4½ cents to the cost of a pound of pork and 1½ cents to the price per pound of beef—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. The preamble to the hon. member's question is rather long and it has been made by several other members. It is all right to hear it once, but after that hon. members should restrain themselves. Could the hon. member come to his question, please?

Mr. Corbett: Madam Speaker, you can rest assured that Canadians are interested in what beef, pork and eggs will cost them.

The hon. member from Atlantic Canada should know that Atlantic Canadians have the lowest per capita income in the nation. My question is: In view of the fact that Atlantic Canadians like to eat, what will the Minister of Finance do to ease the crushing burden which Atlantic Canadians are facing today and to get them back into the work place?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I refer the hon. member to the budget—

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. MacEachen: —which was put before the House on October 28 and which, in my judgment, was probably the most favourable budget to the Atlantic provinces ever introduced. If the hon. member could possibly remove those partisan blinkers, he would recognize the value of that budget to the Atlantic provinces.

Mr. Corbett: Madam Speaker, I point out to the minister that Atlantic Canadians have the highest unemployment as a result of that budget. These are his own people and we are talking about a meat-and-potatoes issue in Atlantic Canada. What meat-and-potatoes action does the minister plan to take to help Atlantic Canadians face a very bleak winter?

CANADA LABOUR CODE

VALIDITY OF REFERENCING OF ONTARIO LEGISLATION— PROTECTION OF URANIUM MINERS

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Labour. It is not the question of which I gave him notice earlier today; I thought he would like to know the difference between the two.

Given the fact that the Ontario select committee on hydro affairs has suggested that the referencing of Bill 70, the Ontario health and safety act, to part IV of the Canada Labour code has no legal validity and that the report recommends this practice be tested in the courts within three months, can the minister tell this House if the opinion expressed by the counsel for the Ontario select committee is shared by his advisers? If this is indeed the case, does the minister agree that Ontario's uranium miners have only the goodwill of the company to protect them and no legal recourse to enforce health and safety regulations?

Hon. Gerald Regan (Minister of Labour): Madam Speaker, the hon. member will, of course, recognize that the question of the validity of the referencing or of any other legal action by the government is a matter which does not fall under my jurisdiction but that of the Minister of Justice.

Mr. Blackburn: Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister. Is the minister intending to follow one of the recommendations of the Ontario committee on hydro affairs which would give the AECB the power to impose penalties and bring prosecutions, thus ensuring that all uranium miners in Canada have occupational health and safety protection backed by the law? Just a few minutes ago the minister responsible for mines said she would agree with this. I would also ask the Minister of Labour, if he agrees, when we can expect that legislation.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, we have received the report at the Department of Justice and we will review it immediately. As soon as we are ready to propose changes, I shall be happy to announce them in the House.

TOURISM

RELAXATION OF UNITED STATES TAX PROVISIONS RESPECTING ATTENDANCE AT FOREIGN CONVENTIONS

Mr. David Smith (Don Valley East): Madam Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of State for Small Businesses, who is responsible for tourism. In view of the passage of a bill by the U.S. Congress which relaxes the tax provision for U.S. citizens attending foreign conventions, can the minister advise the House of the impact these changes will have on large metropolitan areas in Canada, particularly metro Toronto?

[Translation]

Hon. Charles Lapointe (Minister of State, Small Businesses): Madam Speaker, I believe that is extremely—if the crows of the New Democratic Party would keep quiet, I might be able to answer.

Madam Speaker, we are very happy to note that, following representations by this government, the American government has decided to amend its taxation policy governing American conventions held abroad, and I believe this is the best news we could give the hotel industry ot Toronto, Montreal and every other city in Canada before the holiday season.

AIR CANADA

FLIGHT ATTENDANTS DISPUTE—PLANS TO AVERT POSSIBLE STRIKE

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Prince Edward-Hastings): Madam Speaker, since I do not want to go the negative route which the hon. member to my left took, I would like to ask the Minister of Transport if he has any plans to ensure that Canadians wishing to fly on Air Canada during the holiday season will not be faced with the threat of a strike and all the problems which that entails.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, as my colleague the Minister of Labour said, there are good hopes that the strike will be avoided. Everybody who has read the press reports in recent days knows that Air Canada is taking action in order to cope with a strike situation if need be. That action entails giving priority to long-haul trips over shorter ones, since it is easier for people to make shorter trips than long ones by other modes. The action also entails the training of some people to replace flight attendants if need be.

Mr. Ellis: Madam Speaker, since this government is obviously run by polls, and since current polls indicate the public is unwilling to accept strikes in this sector, why will the minister not accept his responsibility and ensure that all Canadians who wish to travel have a reasonable holiday?

Mr. Pepin: The flight attendants are in a better position to do that than I am. What I want to tell the House is that Air Canada is taking all necessary steps to do their very best to accommodate the employees in this matter. The Minister of Labour has already referred to what had been done. Let us all hope together that the story will end well.

BANKRUPTCIES

ASTRA TRUST—REQUEST FOR JUDICIAL INQUIRY

Mr. Bill Kempling (Burlington): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. It is obvious from a recent article in The Globe and Mail that a number of Liberal party workers made a bundle out of the Astra Trust shares and benefited from inside information. They are being protected and shielded while hundreds of innocent people have lost their life savings. Will the minister initiate a judicial inquiry into the Astra Trust mess, particularly into allegations by the investigators that a highly placed person in the Liberal party put pressure on the Department of Insurance to issue a trust company licence to Astra Trust after it had been rejected by the province of Ontario, and had been rejected three times by the Department of Insurance following investigations by departmental officials and the RCMP?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State, Finance): Madam Speaker, I had several opportunities to answer questions about this case and the affiliated companies which come under provincial jurisdiction. I have already indicated that the Ontario Provincial Police economic crimes division has made a serious investigation into the shareholders' activities of Astra and Re-Mor companies. The Department of Insurance is co-operating with the investigators and so is the government. We would all like to see the courts condemn individuals guilty of discreditable deals in Astra Trust or Re-Mor.

[English]

Mr. Kempling: Madam Speaker, I address my supplementary to the same minister. Why did the Department of Insurance request the Ontario Securities Commission not to issue a stop-trading order on Astra Trust when the department was trying to get on top of violations of regulations by Astra Trust? Surely, a stop-trading order would have saved the loss by innocent people of millions of dollars?

[Translation]

Mr. Bussières: Madam Speaker, I would like to get some information from the Superintendent in connection with the specific question put by the member to give him an adequate reply.

PRIVILEGE

MR. COSSITT—ALLEGATION OF EXISTENCE OF GOVERNMENT GUIDELINES RESPECTING ANSWERS TO WRITTEN QUESTIONS

Madam Speaker: The hon. member for Leeds-Grenville (Mr. Cossitt) has produced a two-page document entitled "Sensitive Topics—2nd Session, 30th Parliament" which includes as item (z), "Any question in the name of the honourable member for Leeds". The hon. member alleges that the document "is a copy of a document originating in the Privy Council office" and that the same instructions have been issued for this present Parliament.

However, there is no evidence on the face of the document which could lead to the conclusion, let alone indicate, that it is an emanation of the Government of Canada, although it contains the following words at the top right-hand corner; "Secret—Not to be photocopied or reproduced". The hon. member's question of privilege is to the effect that such alleged instructions interfere with his ability to perform his parliamentary work and other official work.

On the other hand, the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard), speaking for the government, advises the House that "no instruction has been given not to reply to the questions asked", but that "on the contrary, instructions are to try to provide to the hon. member the most complete answers possible to as many questions as we can."

At the outset, let me assure hon. members that a contempt against one Parliament may be raised and is punishable in another Parliament. While it is correct to say that the government is not required by our rules to answer written or oral questions, it would be bold to suggest that no circumstances could ever exist for a prima facie question of privilege to be made where there was a deliberate attempt to deny answers to an hon. member, if it could be shown that such action amounted to improper interference with the hon. member's parliamentary work. In any event, I am not now called upon to determine this. In fact, it is far from clear that the document has any official aspect to it, let alone that it amounts to improper interference.

Under the circumstances, I am compelled to find that there is no prima facie case of privilege. Of course this is without prejudice to the matter being raised in some other way or in the light of further and additional facts being raised again under the heading of privilege.

MR. FRIESEN—RESERVATION OF RIGHT TO RAISE POSSIBLE QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock-North Delta): Madam Speaker, on just returning to the House after speaking on the adjournment debate of Thursday evening, I have looked at Hansard. After studying the answer given to me by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Duclos), I would like to reserve my right, while I determine whether or not I have a question of privilege, to raise a question of privilege.

Madam Speaker: Since the hon. member was not in the House over the past few days, I would remind him that he must give me proper notice and a written statement on the object of his question of privilege.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

PROCEEDINGS ON PROPOSED BILL C-51

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, following consultations with my counterparts in the opposition parties, I rise on a point of order to call your attention to a bill to amend the Clean Air Act, of which notice was given and which appears in today's order paper. We have agreed that we would see the bill through the three stages today when government orders are called, that one representative for each party would deal with it on second reading, following which the bill would be referred to Committee of the Whole, and then returned to the House for adoption on third reading. All of which, Madam Speaker, should require little time. With the consent of my colleagues, therefore, this bill should be the first item to be considered when government orders are called later on today.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

CHRISTMAS RECESS

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, I am pleased to move the following motion, and after consultation with my colleagues on the other side, it would appear that there is consent to having the motion put immediately and carried without debate. This of course is the motion which is in my name on page 4 of the order paper, and I quote:

That, when the House adjourns on Friday, December 19, 1980, it shall stand adjourned until Monday, January 12, 1981, provided that at any time prior to that date, if it appears to the satisfaction of Madam Speaker after consultation with the government, that the public interest requires that the House should meet at an earlier time, Madam Speaker may give notice that she is so satisfied, and thereupon the House shall meet at the time stated in such notice, and shall transact its business as if it had been duly adjourned to that time; and

That, in the event of Madam Speaker's being unable to act owing to illness or other cause, the Deputy Speaker, the Deputy Chairman of Committees or the Assistant Deputy Chairman of Committees shall act in her stead for all the purposes of this order.

Madam Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Since August 1, 1978, how many (a) administrative (b) policy consultants were under contract to the Department of Justice and/or any boards, commissions or corporations reporting to the department and, in each case, what amount was paid to them?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): The Department of Justice: Seven.

Bureau of Management Consultants	June	15/79 — July	6/79	$ 2,357.00

ELECTRIC VEHICLES

Question No. 1,616—Mr. Robinson (Etobicoke-Lakeshore):

1. Is the government concerned, because of the U.S. Electric and Hybrid Vehicle Research Development and Demonstration Act, which provided $160 million for the development of an electric vehicle that such an industry in North America will replace a part of the existing motor vehicle industry the result being of little benefit to Canada?

2. Do the government energy and transportation authorities support the aims and objectives of the Electric Vehicle Association of Canada, to reduce transportation total dependence on oil by substituting electric vehicles in those segments of the market which they can satisfy?

3. What is the government's policy with respect to electric and hybrid road vehicles and which department is tasked with preparing and implementing such a policy?

4. Will General Motors' commitment to bring out electric vehicles in the 1984 model year provide any industrial benefits in Canada and, if so, what will be such benefits?

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. The degree to which U.S. electric and hybrid vehicle technology will benefit Canada or replace the existing Canadian motor vehicle industry is unknown at present. U.S. initiatives are being closely monitored by the federal government.

2. Yes.

3. The government does not have an explicit specific policy with respect to electric and hybrid road vehicles. The scope and size of federal initiatives with respect to electric and hybrid vehicle technology cuts across the policies and mandates of three major departments: Transport; Energy, Mines and Resources; and Industry, Trade and Commerce. Transport Canada through the Interdepartmental Panel on Transport Research and Development co-ordinates the work of various government departments in this area.

4. The federal government is not aware of the precise details of General Motors' commitment to bring out electric vehicles in 1984. The issue of industrial benefits will be pursued in ongoing discussions and negotiations between the U.S. and Canada on the Auto Pact, and, of course, with Canadian industry.

TRUST FUNDS

Question No. 1,721—Mr. Stewart:

1. Are funds comprised of contributions from Canadians held on deposit in general revenue by the government and, if so, what are the names of the trust funds?

2. What, if any, rate of interest is paid by the government to each fund?

3. What, if any, amount is saved by the government, because it is required to borrow less, by using the trust funds?

4. What interest earnings have been denied, where interest is not paid, to contributors using current commercial interest rates and what are the names of the trust funds?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): 1. The following trust funds comprised of contributions by Canadians are administered by the government:

—Strathcona Trust Fund

—Mackenzie King Trust Account.

2. The interest rates on each fund in 1979-80 were:

—Strathcona Trust Fund: 11.31per cent (average)

—Mackenzie King Trust Account: 9.28 per cent.

3. Nil.

4. None.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, if questions Nos. 15, 407, and 536 could be made orders for returns, those returns would be tabled immediately.

I should like to draw the attention of the House, in particular of the hon. member for Leeds-Grenville (Mr. Cossitt), to question No. 15 which has been on the order paper for a number of years and is now being answered.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Cossitt: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. In making my point of order may I congratulate the parliamentary secretary and the government on the fact that, after almost four years, they have managed to answer a question, namely, the one concerning Martin Goldfarb and Goldfarb Consultants Limited. Not having seen the answer I cannot really say whether they answered it, but something is coming forth.

I should like to raise a point of order in regard to three other questions which have been on the order paper for quite some time. One concerns a very simple matter: How many members and who on the Canadian Transport Commission—this is a rough paraphrase of the question—have passes on Air Canada? That question has been on the order paper for approximately two years or more, and still no answer. Perhaps it is because it falls within guideline (q) of the document which I mentioned last week as the guidelines the cabinet uses for answering questions. In any event, I do not know why it should take two years to find out who with the Canadian Transport Commission holds Air Canada passes.

Question No. 121 is a very simple one: How many former Liberal candidates, defeated Liberal members or retired Liberal members, have received various appointments since the last election? It is pretty straightforward. Every day we see one or two more in the newpapers. There must be a total list somewhere, but for some reason for eight months they cannot answer the question. Perhaps there is such a backlog of appointments to come that they would rather wait until we could get the whole list. Seriously, I think we should know that answer.

There are other questions, but I should like to mention only one more. Question No. 29 concerns Michael Pitfield, who seems to be the untouchable. It is in regard to the Taschereau papers and certain details concerning why he sent them back, and on whose authority, to the Privy Council office. That has been outstanding for quite some time, and it falls within guideline (f) of questions to be treated sensitively. I should like to know when the government will do something about this question.

If I may be permitted, in closing I should like to indicate that I accept the ruling of the Chair today on the question of privilege which I raised. I fully realize that, unless I name my sources and provide more information, it would be very difficult for Madam Speaker to go further with the matter. I hope the House will understand that I cannot name the sources because, with a government such as the one in power today, they would be hanging from the Peace Tower about ten minutes from now.

Mr. Collenette: Madam Speaker, just briefly on the serious aspects of the hon. member's comments, I should like to assure him that I will do my best to answer those questions. I am sorry, with the Christmas spirit to which you referred earlier in the question period, that the member is not satisfied with the present I just gave him.

Mr. Towers: Madam Speaker, I put a question on the order paper on May 8 which concerns metric conversion. In that there have been rumours that the government may be making a metric announcement during the Christmas recess, I was wondering whether the parliamentary secretary would see fit to answer this question prior to the recess.

Mr. Collenette: Madam Speaker, I cannot guarantee to answer any particular question on any given day, but I will look into it.

Madam Speaker: Is it agreed that the questions enumerated by the parliamentary secretary shall be made orders for returns?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

MR. MARTIN GOLDFARB

Question No. 15—Mr. Cossitt:

Since April 20, 1968, what is a list and the nature of each item of business received from the government by Mr. Martin Goldfarb, or any companies with which he is associated, including Goldfarb Consultants Limited and, in each case, what was the amount of money paid and, what was the over-all total amount paid for the full period involved?

Return tabled.

FORMER DEPUTY MINISTERS OR ASSISTANT DEPUTY MINISTERS—CONTRACTS

Question No. 407—Mr. Orlikow:

In the past three years, how many former Deputy Ministers or Assistant Deputy Ministers had contracts with a government department, agency or Crown corporation and, in each case (a) what are their names (b) for which department, agency or Crown corporation were such contracts undertaken (c) what compensation did they receive?

Return tabled.

CONSUMER AND CORPORATE AFFAIRS—CONTRACT FOR PROFESSIONAL SERVICES

Question No. 536—Mr. Orlikow:

1. For the fiscal year 1978-79, what contracts for professional services were let for studies, surveys and analyses into (a) present or future policies, programs or information analysis and their efficiency and effectiveness (b) the examination of the administration or internal operation of the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs?

2. How much was committed on each contract and to whom?

Return tabled.

Mr. Collenette: Madam Speaker, I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Madam Speaker: The questions enumerated by the parliamentary secretary have been answered. Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

CLEAN AIR ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment) moved that Bill C-51, to amend the Clean Air Act, be read the second time and by unanimous consent be referred to Committee of the Whole.

He said: Madam Speaker, the purpose of the amendments to the Clean Air Act now before the House is to provide the United States with essentially the same legislative protection as that offered Canada under section 115 of the United States clean air act. Such reciprocal protection is needed under the terms of section 115 to enable United States federal authorities to initiate a process to require state governments to reduce emissions adversely affecting Canada. This is of particular importance to us in relation to acid rain, but also it could be applied to more localized concerns.

The proposed amendments contain four basic elements. First, they provide the governor in council, on the advice of the Minister of the Environment, with discretionary authority to regulate individual emission sources or classes of sources which cause or contribute to air pollution, which, in his opinion, is endangering or may be anticipated to endanger the health, safety or welfare of persons in another country.

Second, they require the Minister of the Environment, before providing advice to the governor in council, to receive through appropriate channels and to take account of related representations from the foreign country adversely affected or likely to be adversely affected by pollutants from Canadian sources.

Third, they require the Minister of the Environment, before providing advice to the governor in council, to consult with the province or provinces concerned and to seek the application of provincial law to control the source or sources to a level judged adequate by the minister.

Fourth, they specify that the authority provided in these amendments would be exercised only on behalf of a country which, in the opinion of the governor in council, provides Canada with comparable legislative protection.

It is my view that an objective analysis of Canada's response over the years to incidents of transboundary pollution originating in Canada would show clearly that, working with and through the provinces involved, we have acted in the spirit which is represented by these proposed amendments. To put it another way, we have traditionally taken full account of United States' concerns, and the provinces have generally been willing to modify their pollution control requirements where good evidence of actual or likely damage to the United States has been forthcoming. I have no reason to believe that this responsible attitude on the part of the provinces will change in the future. Indeed, it is my hope that the pollution control authority provided to the federal government under these amendments will never need to be used. That is the message which I instructed my officials to convey in their conversations with provincial officials about these amendments, and which I subsequently underlined personally in letters to each of my provincial counterparts.

Having said that, I am aware that historic good practice does not, in a strictly legal sense, provide the reciprocity called for in section 115 of the United States clean air act, nor does it address a serious perceptual problem which we have encountered among United States political figures and officials. Bluntly stated, that problem is that the apparent imbalance in legal protection afforded by one country to the other reflects in the minds of a number of influential Americans a difference in our commitment to provide the consequent physical protection. However unfair that perception—and I think it is unfair—it is one which must be overcome. I believe that these amendments, if accepted by the House today, will greatly assist us in that effort.

There is another important benefit to be obtained from these amendments. The speed and unanimity with which this House is prepared to pass them reflect very clearly our collective view, representing the people of Canada, that the need to control acid rain requires extraordinary and rapid measures. That is a message which we in this House are sending to the administration, Congress, and people of the United States.

Hon. members will recall that the Canadian ambassador to Washington and I signed, last August, in company with the United States Secretary of State and the Administrator of the United States Environmental Protection Agency, a memorandum of intent which, in addition to calling for the negotiation of an air quality agreement, specifically called upon each country to use its existing legislation to abate international air pollution. The passage of these amendments to our Clean Air Act will now enable the United States administration to use section 115 to honour this pledge.

In closing, I want to pay tribute to several members of the House. Bringing forth this legislative proposal today has been an exercise in consultation and co-operation by parties on all sides of the House. It recognizes the importance which all parties attach to dealing with these matters as effectively as we can. Often we are divided by partisan differences, but frequently as well we find ourselves united in dealing with a problem which faces our country.

I want to pay tribute particularly to the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. McMillan) and to the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton) who, as the critics for their respective parties in the area for which I am responsible, have shown friendly and forthcoming co-operation so as to accomplish something in a short period of time. I would also like to thank all three House leaders for their efforts in ensuring expeditious and prompt action on this proposal before the House.

Mr. Paproski: And all other members.

Mr. Tom McMillan (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to participate in this short debate on a bill to amend the Clean Air Act. Both on my own behalf, as environment critic for the Progressive Conservative Party, and on behalf of my party, I welcome the initiative which the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Roberts) has taken to have Canada's Clean Air Act amended.

On the surface, the proposed amendment appears minor but, in fact, it would greatly strengthen our country's ability to co-operate with our United States neighbours in attacking the long-range transport of air pollutants, of which the most serious for both countries is acid rain.

As the minister has just pointed out, the United States clean air act allows the relevant authorities in the United States to take certain actions against polluters in that country who are damaging the health or welfare of another country. Such action, however, can be taken by the United States government only if the other country offers reciprocal protection to the United States. At present, because Canada's Clean Air Act does not offer that reciprocal protection, the American government cannot act as expeditiously as it otherwise could against interests in the United States who are polluting the Canadian environment. This bill we are debating, and which I hope we will pass this afternoon, is designed to establish the required reciprocity.

In my view the action we are taking in Parliament today is important on at least two counts. First, it demonstrates, as the minister has pointed out, both to the Canadian public and perhaps more important to the American public, that all political parties in the Canadian Parliament are united in a resolve to deal with the growing problem of acid rain as it affects Canada and the United States. So concerned are we, that Liberals, New Democrats and Progressive Conservatives alike are willing to set aside our legitimate partisanship to make possible the speedy passage of this bill. If all goes well, the House will proceed through all three stages of the bill in this afternoon's sitting, although the normal course might have taken weeks, if not months.

Second, apart from the symbolic importance of the passage of the bill, our quick action today will increase pressure on the United States federal and state governments to abate acid rain-causing emissions in the United States that harm not only their country but our country as well.

As the minister and hon. members of the House know, other members and I are members of a special subcommittee on acid rain established a few months ago by the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry. The subcommittee has been conducting public hearings across Canada, as well as meeting with legislators and experts in Canada and in other countries.

In the fall we visited Washington, D.C., where we met with Republican and Democratic senators, and members of the House of Representatives, perhaps a couple of dozen in all, who were concerned about acid rain. The clear message that we got from our American colleagues—and I echo the sentiment expressed by the minister—was that the United States public is largely unaware of the acid rain problem either in the United States or in Canada, and that most politicians in the United States have yet to treat the issue with any real degree of seriousness. Yet, in Canada, acid rain has been described variously as the "killer pollutant", the "rain of death", an "environmental time bomb", the "worst environmental hazard Canada has ever faced", and an "international emergency". I am sure the minister will agree with me that there is no reason to believe the problem is any more severe here than it is in the United States.

In the two countries some areas now receive precipitation five to 40 times more acidic than natural rain. Some readings have been shown to contain 400 times the normal amount of acid. In Canada and in the United States that lethal pollutant is killing lakes, rivers and streams. It is devastating forests and crop lands. It is even harming human health.

In northern New York state, for example, all of the fish are gone from more than 100 Adirondack lakes. The air pollution on White Mountain, which is 5,000 feet high, is commonly worse than that of mid-town New York City. By the same token, in Ontario some 2,000 to 4,000 lakes have been declared biologically dead, that is, unable to sustain fish or plant life. Some 48,000 more lakes are said to be threatened.

A recent Canada-United States scientific survey, in which the minister can take pride, has documented that the problem of acid rain is more geographically widespread and more severe than even the worst assessments had previously indicated. The study has determined that all of North America, east of a line between Hudson Bay and New Orleans, is suffering from acid rain, and that trouble spots have been identified in the west.

In my region of the Atlantic provinces, acid rain has wiped out salmon fishing in some 12 rivers, and in my own province of Prince Edward Island, which had hitherto been considered relatively invulnerable to the effects of acid rain, concern about the problem is fast approaching one of alarm. Not only is acid rain a serious problem in both Canada and the United States, each country is responsible for a substantial part of the acid rain that falls on the other. Acid rain often drops miles, even countries, away from its original source. We know that every year about four million metric tons of acid rain-causing sulphur dioxide cross from the United State into Canada. For its part, Canada emits about five million tonnes, of which one million tonnes cross into the United States.

I do not intend to speak at any length this afternoon, Mr. Speaker, but in my concluding remarks I want to stress that neither country can afford to be complacent if the other fails to act against the acid rain-causing emissions within its borders.

When members of the subcommittee to which I referred were in Washington, D.C., United States Senators and Congressmen urged our committee on acid rain to consider seriously ways in which our parliamentarians at all levels might make direct representations to the United States federal and state legislatures to heighten their awareness of the acid rain problem. Although such an approach might not conform to diplomatic niceties or protocol, in my view and in the view of my party it is one which the minister might want to consider and is a worthy one. It cannot be denied that dramatic, perhaps unprecedented action is required to promote public awareness of the problem among the United States public and U.S. government officials. It is to be hoped that passage of Bill C-51 is a step in the same direction. I urge upon hon. members that no amount of preaching by Canadians will do any good if we in this country do not take strong measures to deal with the problem within our own borders.

I commend the Minister of the Environment for his vigorous opposition to the United States' multibillion dollar plan to convert power plants from oil to coal, which is a major source of sulphur dioxide that contributes to the acid rain problem. The head of the United States environmental protection agency, Mr. Douglas Costle, has estimated that acid rainfall may well increase by 16 per cent to 20 per cent in the northeastern tier states within the next decade if the plan for coal conversion proceeds. He has conceded that the spillover into Canada will be serious. This has been documented by Canadian scientists.

How can we Canadians be effective in opposing that kind of development in the United States if we ourselves are embarking on identical measures in Canada? The finance minister's budget provides for the establishment of a $175 million fund to finance, on a grant basis, up to 75 per cent of the cost of conversions of oil-fired electricity plants to high sulphur content coal in the Atlantic provinces, my region of the country. To be fair, there is a proviso in the program and in the budget that those conversions must be accomplished in an "environmentally acceptable" way. The minister confirmed that in this House and in other forums. However, neither the federal government nor the relevant provinces have made known how the conversions will be proceeded with in an environmentally acceptable fashion. No specific strategy has been enunciated, articulated, or made known to this House as to how those technologies will be required, or at least encouraged.

Meanwhile, a spokesman for the Nova Scotia Power Corporation was quoted last week in the Halifax Chronicle-Herald as saying that, in the coming year, Nova Scotia will generate more power from coal than from imported oil for the first time in many decades.

Coal conversions in the Atlantic region and in other parts of Canada is a welcome prospect in terms of energy self-sufficiency, but an alarming one from an environmental point of view. Our failure to instal proper environmental technologies in new and converted coal-fire plants is an open invitation to our American neighbours to be similarly negligent themselves.

My party believes that federal and provincial governments should exercise caution in their efforts to revive the coal industry in Canada and to encourage the substitution of high sulphur coal for oil. Certainly the wider use of coal is one way we can lessen our dependence on foreign energy sources, so we support those conversions. Nonetheless, without appropriate safeguards, the costs of that option, especially the damage to our natural environment, could well outweigh the benefits.

As for the provincial governments, my party, and I in particular, believe they should vigorously enforce their control orders on acid rain-causing emissions. Equally important, the provinces should, at regular intervals, reassess whether those control orders are tough enough in light of advances in pollution control technologies.

Together, the federal and provincial governments should put as much pressure as possible on the United States to curb their sulphur dioxide and nitrogen emissions, especially from coal-burning thermal power plants. A bilateral agreement on the abatement of acid rain on both sides of the border must remain the principal target for Canada and the United States. Negotiations toward that end, however, must not be used by either country as an excuse for inaction in the meantime. Many interim measures, including a virile enforcement of existing regulations, can and should be taken.

Funding for acid rain research must remain a priority for Canadians. I welcome the recent announcement by the Minister of the Environment of greatly increased funding for such research. Four million dollars was originally earmarked for 1980-81, and now the amount will be $7.5 million. By 1984 the amount will be up to $29.5 million. Nevertheless, let us not overestimate the scope of the planned research effort. The total amount of money the federal government will be devoting to acid rain research scarcely exceeds its advertising budget for telling Canadians about the splendors of its constitutional package. Far too little is known, for example, about the effects of acid rain on forest growth, on agricultural crops, and on human health. Nor has enough scientific research been focused on the mitigation of the adverse effects of acid rain.

Only by devising and implementing a total strategy against acid rain can we in Canada demonstrate to our American friends that we are serious in our efforts to deal with the problem. I am proud to be associated with Bill C-51 as an essential component of that strategy. I congratulate the minister for the initiative he has taken today and urge him to continue to follow through with the other elements of the required program.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of the amendment which is intended to give Canada reciprocal legislation to that provided by section 115 of the United States clean air act. I agree with the previous speakers that the unanimous parliamentary support given to this bill today should indicate to our neighbours how seriously Canadians view the issue of trans-boundary air pollution.

This reciprocal legislation is required so that the Canadian and American federal authorities can start to move to control acid airborne pollutants produced in one country which affect the other.

The United States legislation limits the formal review process for modifying state control of offending pollutants to those countries which offer reciprocal protection to the United States. Canada does not at present offer such equal legislation, and we must have appropriate legislation protection for the United States from air pollutants emitted in Canada. In fact, Canada does not at present have an international agreement with the United States, as required under section 7(1)(b) of the Canadian Clean Air Act. One is under discussion, but unfortunately progress is slow.

Provincial requirements and restrictions regarding long-range transportation of air pollutants vary across Canada. Pollution sources in Canada which affect the United States can be subjected to emission standards under this legislation. It is certainly the hope of the New Democratic Party and, I am sure, of all members of this House, that the speedy passage and importance attached to this amending bill will be viewed with due recognition by the United States. Comparable action is available under section 115 of the U.S. clean air act.

Of course our long-term goals must be to reduce acid emissions and precipitation to benign environmental levels. Hopefully the U.S. Congress will consider amending the American legislation in the very near future, to deal with long-range transportation of air pollutants.

I note, particularly, that provinces must first be consulted where the source or sources of pollutants are located. This, I am sure, in most cases will cause the diminution of pollutants to acceptable, benign, environmental levels, thus providing for better relations with our neighbours to the south. I am confident that neither the provincial nor federal legislatures wish to have incidents such as the Trail smelter case of 1930 recur. I quote briefly from the most recent issue of the Environmental Law Reporter:

● (1540)

The first formal recognition of the atmosphere as a resource requiring international protection was the 1962 Treaty Banning Nuclear Weapons Tests, which prohibited nuclear testing "if such explosion causes radioactive debris to be present outside the territorial limits" of the state conducting the explosion. Since then a broad range of programs involving research, monitoring, and the tentative development of international air pollution guidelines have been undertaken to promote international protection of the atmosphere. In particular, the European Economic Community, the United Nations, and the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development have been active in this regard.

I go on and quote again:

Several international organizations have attempted to formulate general principles concerning the responsibility of states for the extraterritorial damages caused by pollution. Probably the most influential of international statements on this subject is the 1972 Declaration of the United Nations Conference on the Human Environment in Stockholm, which provides that:

Principle 21

States have, in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations and the principles of international law, the sovereign right to exploit their own resources pursuant to their own environmental policies, and the responsibility to ensure that activities within their jurisdiction or control do not cause damage to the environment of other states or of areas beyond the limits of national jurisdiction.

Principle 22

States shall co-operate to develop further the international law regarding liability and compensation for the victims of pollution and other environmental damage caused by activities within the jurisdiction or control of such States to areas beyond their jurisdiction.

I believe the amendment to the Canadian Clean Air Act today goes some distance in moving toward those two principles. Let me quote again:

Also pertinent is an earlier application of this doctrine in the course of resolving a United States-Canada air pollution dispute during the 1920s and 1930s. Fumes from a smelter at Trail, British Columbia were causing damage in adjacent areas of the State of Washington. As part of an extended United States-Canada dialogue on the dispute, a tribunal was created to rule on several of the key issues. In a widely quoted dictum the tribunal stated that:

"No state has a right to use or permit the use of its territory in such a manner as to cause injury by fumes in or to the territory of another or the persons or property therein, when the case is of serious consequence and the injury is established by clear and convincing evidence."

Significantly, the tribunal required both payment of damages and the establishment of a regime to abate and monitor pollution from the smelter.

Certainly I hope that is the direction we are going to move following the speedy passage of this bill.

Let me now deal briefly with just how serious the acid transport and precipitation problem is to both Canada and our neighbour, the United States.

Many areas of Canada and the United States now experience precipitation, as pointed out by my colleague, the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. McMillan), from 25 to, at times, 400 times more acidic than natural rainfall.

The minister is on record as estimating required abatement costs of at least $400 million per year over the next few years. Experts appearing earlier this year before a committee of this House estimated costs in Europe to range between 2 per cent and 3 per cent of their gross national product just in terms of damage to crops, natural resources, buildings, cars and so on.

The difficulties of low-level acid pollution are exacerbated by many factors; for example, various acid compounds can be deposited over the years and accumulate, causing serious environmental and often irresolvable damage, as we see in respect of many of our lakes in Canada.

A case in point is acid precipitation in Canada during the winter months. The acid is released cumulatively from the snow into creeks where sudden high acidic levels damage fish eggs, smolts and aquatic organisms, and now we find as well, bird and mammalian life.

In Canada sulphur dioxide is largely produced by the smelting of sulphite ores, whereas in the United States it is produced by the burning of fossil fuels in electrical generating plants. In both countries nitrogen oxides are produced by the combustion of fossil fuels, primarily in the transportation sector. In Canada sulphur dioxide is produced at a rate of about five million tons per year, whereas in the United States it is about 25 million tons per year. In Canada nitrous oxide is now being produced at the rate of about two million tons per year, whereas in the United States it is now about 22 million tons per year.

The Canada-U.S. research consultation group, which recently released its report, estimates that both SO_2 and NO_2 emissions will increase dramatically in the future if we do not soon do something about it. With thousands of lakes now dead in Canada, and that is throughout Canada—for example, even in my riding of Skeena there is a serious acid rain problem in the Terrace area from smelters in that area, so it is a broad geographic problem in Canada and is very graphically becoming a global one—and with tens of thousands of lakes dying, and we are now just starting to get an accurate record in respect of trees, crops, buildings and health—this is again a relatively unknown hazard to us at this point—it is surely time to move on this legislation and also on strong financial budgetary moves to keep our environment healthy and industrial development benign.

In my view, I do not think it is good enough for us to know how much it costs to make the effects of acid rain and nitrous oxide benign in our environment. I think it is incumbent upon legislatures and on the Parliament of this country to deal effectively with it, either by introducing legislation such as "user-pay" so that the producer has to absorb the majority of those costs or, if necessary, to do a complete economic evaluation and move forward in the budget to provide the funds necessary to scrub those very dangerous and harmful oxides from the stacks prior to their being emitted into the atmosphere.

Dr. Leonard Hamilton, head of environmental assessment at the Brookhaven National Laboratory in New York, suggests now that acid rain may be killing 5,000 Canadians per year.

This legislation before us will make source control possible, so let us look at a few costs. The United States Environmental Protection Agency estimates the cost of a limestone scrubbing system for a new 500 megawatt power plant, which would remove 90 per cent of the sulphur from 3.5 per cent sulphur content coal, at only $135 per kilowatt, or $67.5 million for the entire plant. That is not exorbitantly high for the sort of protection at which we are looking.

The Canadian Environmental Law Association recently estimated that a retrofit for a similar plant would cost about 30 per cent more.

In concluding, three scenarios have been proposed by consultants to Environment Canada for existing plants, and taking this up to 1990. The "lax" scenario which would see 45 per cent reduction of sulphur dioxide would cost $1.3 billion; the "moderate" one which would see 55 per cent reduction in sulphur dioxide would cost $1.5 billion; and the "strict", which would reduce SO_2 emissions by 87 per cent, would cost some $2 billion. In looking at it, as my hon. colleague, the member for Hillsborough has pointed out, the United States is dumping approximately five times as much long-range transported air pollution on us as we do on them, in terms of it being between four and five million tons per year coming north from the United States and about one million tons of pollutants going from Canada south. In eastern Canada about one half of the SO_2 deposited there is coming from the United States.

However, in giving final support and speedy approval to this bill, let us consider that it is the first step in moving toward a healthy global policy, and that the next step is that we hear from the minister an allocation of funds to clean up our "collective polluting act" in Canada. We have long awaited a response from our neighbours to the south but hope they will soon do the same.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, considered in committee, reported, read the third time and passed.

CANADA OIL AND GAS ACT

MEASURE RESPECTING OIL AND GAS INTERESTS

The House resumed, from Thursday, December 11, consideration of the motion of Mr. Lalonde that Bill C-48, to regulate oil and gas interests in Canada lands and to amend the Oil and Gas Production and Conservation Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): When debate was interrupted, the hon. member for Western Arctic (Mr. Nickerson) had the floor. Is he prepared to continue?

Mr. Dave Nickerson (Western Arctic): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I understand that I have a little less than ten minutes.

When I was speaking earlier on this matter I was engaged in what might be described as a general castigation of the rather inane policies of the government contained in the legislation before us, but for a few minutes I would like to zero in on an area which has not really been addressed by other speakers on this bill. That area covers certain legal concerns I have about the bill.

The first is that if any prosecution is to take place under this legislation, and if any appeal from an administrative decision by the minister or one of the people he might appoint to a position of authority is taken, that appeal goes to the Federal Court of Canada. In fact, with respect to all matters under this legislation, the Federal Court of Canada is the court of competent jurisdiction. I would like to know the reason for the change because, prior to this legislation, oil and gas rights in the territories have been deeded pursuant to regulation made under the Territorial Lands Act. In that respect I believe the court of competent jurisdiction is the Supreme Court of the Northwest Territories and, were an offence to be committed in Yukon, the case would be heard before the Supreme Court of the Yukon Territory. I am rather suspicious of the motives behind this change in the bill.

Why would the government want to transfer that jurisdiction from the territorial courts to the Federal Court of Canada? Why does the government want people to come down to argue cases in Toronto, when those cases should be heard in Frobisher Bay, Inuvik or Whitehorse?

An hon. Member: Good point.

Mr. Nickerson: I am glad somebody agrees with me.

I think the people of the territories should be in a position to see justice being done in these matters, and I hope that concern can be reviewed.

With respect to my second legal point, I refer to clause 57 and the ensuing clauses concerning various punishments. This is the offences and prosecutions section of the bill. If Your Honour will permit me, I would like to read clause 57(1) because this is the most important of those clauses. Clause 57(1) states the following:

> Every person who contravenes or fails to comply with any provision of this act or the regulations or any final decision, declaration, determination, direction—

Whatever that means, and whoever it is who will give that direction.

> —or order that applies to him under this act is guilty of an offence and is liable
> (a) on summary conviction, to a fine not exceeding one hundred thousand dollars or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding one year, or to both; or
> (b) on conviction on indictment, to a fine not exceeding one million dollars or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding five years—

Of course, again the option is for the court to impose both sanctions.

Where an offence is continued for more than one day, those fines apply with respect to every day, so in effect we are talking about a $1 million per day fine.

It appears to me that there are two things wrong with this. First, the Crown has the option with respect to any offence under this legislation, regardless of how minor it might be, to proceed by way of summary conviction or by way of indictment. Not too long ago in this chamber my colleague, the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert), gave a very good dissertation on this same subject with respect to the Income Tax Act.

Second, it appears to me that the penalties contained in this clause might be described as vicious. They might come under the definition of cruel and unusual punishment, when we consider the offences to which they apply. Without looking into this legislation one might think that the offences involved would be such things as deliberately endangering the lives of people working on an offshore drilling rig, but that is not included in this legislation. That would be dealt with under the criminal negligence provisions of the Criminal Code, or under the Canada Shipping Act.

The offence of deliberately and negligently allowing major oil spills to occur, or this type of offence, would not be prosecuted under this legislation. It would be dealt with under the Arctic Waters Pollution Prevention Act, so what we are really talking about here is the payment of royalties and taxes to the federal government and the provision of certain types of information.

I think we should review the penalty provisions because they seem to me to be very harsh, especially when we look at clause 58 which, contrary to the usually accepted Canadian legal way of doing things, says that one is guilty unless one can prove one's innocence. It is sufficient for the Crown to prove that an offence has been committed, and then the accused has to prove that the offence was committed without his knowledge or consent. Otherwise the opposite is presumed. This applies, under clause 59, to officers, directors or agents of the companies involved. This clause is extremely punitive, and when we get to committee I certainly hope we will be able to make some improvements to the offences and prosecutions section of this legislation.

I wonder if Your Honour could advise me of how many minutes I have left.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Four.

Mr. Nickerson: So much for that subject.

In my remaining few minutes I will give the House my concept of the vision of hon. members opposite with respect to the oil and gas industry in the north and offshore areas in the years to come. We see embodied in this bill the Liberal philosophies of centralization, socialization, and rigid central control. I think I have mentioned this before. With respect to bureaucratic control, I can see that this legislation was drafted largely within government departments. I do not know how much actual influence the minister has had on the drafting.

I wonder why there is a split in jurisdiction contemplated under this legislation. I wonder why, for certain areas within the so-called Canada lands, a term to which I take great exception, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) has jurisdiction, and in the other parts the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Munro) has jurisdiction. It is the recommendation of the special representative on constitutional development in the territories of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) that the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development get out of that particular area of administration, and what is more natural and what makes more sense than to have the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources look after energy, mines and resources?

● (1600)

In this bill it seems that everything has to be run from Ottawa. What I would like to see established is administrative offices in the Northwest Territories similar to the ones that the government of Alberta has in Calgary, and similar to the ones that the government of Saskatchewan has in Regina. If everyone has to come to Ottawa to get exploration agreements and leases, we in the territories will never develop proper oil centres on the scale of the one in Calgary. It would make sense to me if we were to make Inuvik, which is in the centre of the rich delta area, into an oil centre. Some day I would like to see a second Calgary established in the Mackenzie Delta.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: That is vision, although they do not have any over there.

Mr. Nickerson: That is for sure. You can see that when you read through the act.

Finally, I should like to register my objection to what I see as the future of the oil and gas industry in the north, as it is controlled by Petro-Canada on the one hand and by large companies on the other. There does not seem to be any room in this bill for the little guys, for the people who reside in the Northwest Territories. It seems that the northerners will be sitting on the sidelines while Petro-Canada and its associates do the work and take the credit for it, make all the money out of it, and leave us with very little to get out of it. At present I do not know of one lease or permit held by a resident northerner, and if this bill is to pass I do not think there is a likelihood of that occurring in the future.

In conclusion I should like to repeat that I am pleased that this legislation was brought before us so that, after ten years, we can look at it and we can recommend changes. In its present form it does not seem to do very much for Canada, either in the long or in the short term. Certainly it does not seem to do very much for the north. I hope that when it goes to committee we will have the opportunity to make our objections known, and we hope that the government will listen carefully to them so that a legislative and a tax environment can be created which will make it attractive for people to invest in the north and in our offshore areas. We hope that in the near future production will be started in those areas which will do much to help Canada's oil and gas self-sufficiency.

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Welland): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to engage in the debate on Bill C-48 because I believe that this bill, as much as any other we have seen since this Thirty-first Parliament opened, will affect all the people of Canada. Many issues are at present of concern to Canadians, not the least of which are the economy, inflation, and unemployment, and I recognize that each and everyone of us here is in some way affected.

In discussing the energy bill before us I have chosen to try to point out some of the underlying causes of the misunderstanding or the insensitivity of one region of this country with regard to another. I do not propose to use many figures and percentages, because I believe we have been almost figured to death by people like ourselves going out west and trying to show conclusively that our proposals are best for the whole of Canada, as well as by people coming from Alberta and telling us in their great ad campaigns that indeed their figures are the right ones. One fellow even made the ungracious comment that the guys in Ottawa are "nuts".

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Parent: I think that throwing such barbs back and forth is uncalled for, and I think it is time that we reasoned out the whole problem together. It is my feeling that the deliberations which have taken place between the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) and their provincial counterparts, while receiving widespread coverage in the media, seem to be viewed by many Canadians as if they were some kind of a game of tug and pull. Pretty soon we will start engaging in political fisticuffs, if we have not reached that point yet. It appears that these fisticuffs will be observed by a captive audience which will be called immobile, freezing in the dark, or bankrupt, depending on the part of the nation from which they come.

As I mentioned before, it is my intention to bring a voice of understanding and calm into the loud rhetoric flying back and forth across our airwaves and, indeed, in this House. I propose in some small way to try to articulate my point of view of what the government is trying to do here for Canada as a whole, not only for people in the east, west or north of Canada, but on a global scale, and to try to achieve communality among Canadians.

Someone said that the needs of man to survive are probably fourfold. Food is one, shelter is another, warmth is the third, and love is the fourth. Ottawa has been involved in the first two for some time, that is, food and shelter. We have marketing boards to take care of our food, and we have the minister of housing taking care of our shelters. I see the minister in the House with us right now and I compliment him for the policies he has brought forth, because I think they are great policies.

I hope that the subject of love is not one which will provoke a debate as to whether it is the federal or provincial responsibility, because God help us if it is ever left for us only to decide.

Warmth is fast becoming part of the federal-provincial volleys because of the energy crisis which began in the 1970s. Ironically enough, this crisis started out in countries which, in the worst of times, have never had to worry about warmth. I refer here specifically to countries in the Middle East. In my opinion we do not have an energy crisis per se, similar to the crises being experienced, for example, in Japan, Turkey, Germany, or even by our neighbours to the immediate south. We have been assured and reassured that this nation holds within its boundaries sufficient natural resources to satisfy all our domestic needs, not necessarily in conventional oil but in natural coal, uranium, heavy oil, the tar sands, and our ever-growing tough technological capacity to find new energy producing and saving resources.

It was out in Alberta for some three weeks in the summer of 1979 because I wanted to see for myself just what we had in the area of natural resources, and I wanted to speak to the people involved in the production of oil in western Canada. I wanted to hear what they had to say, and I did. I went there not necessarily to preach the gospel, in the sense of the good news from the people of Ottawa and what we are doing, but I wanted to hear what they had to say. I wanted to see for myself what they were doing for their fellow citizens in Alberta, in the west, and their fellow citizens right across Canada.

Mr. Speaker, I was happy to note that these are hard-working people in the west. They ask no great favours of us. They asked for the chance to work and grow in this country. This is basically what all Canadians are asking for, a chance to work, to grow, and a chance to be a part of Canada. The more we become wrapped up in 10 per cent of this and 3 per cent of that, the more we lose sight of the fact that we are a nation joined together by common ideals and common goals. Those goals, I believe, are for the betterment of every man, woman and child in Canada. Our crisis, therefore, is not one of energy or of potential energy. Our crisis is one of the conflict, of disagreement and, in a good many cases, mea culpa for all of us. It is a case of insensitivity and misunderstanding.

The crux of the matter, of course, is the stand of the three major producing provinces and the federal government. These three provinces are considered to be what I will call "western Canada". They are in conflict with the stand of the federal government, which appears to me to be sometimes considered like a mythical fiefdom whose importance, authority, judgment, capabilities, ebb and flow, are based sometimes on how they are perceived by the provinces and their wishes and, yes, many times by their whims. To ensure fair, equitable, and reasonable access to the rest of the provinces which make up central Canada, the maritimes along with the territories, I believe we must develop a policy which is fair and equitable to the people of the producing provinces as well as to the people of the industrial heartland of Canada and, indeed, to all the consumers in all of the provinces. I include here the maritimes and the territories.

Because current world prices have escalated to such dizzying heights, Mr. Speaker, and in such a relatively short period of time, the federal government is once again trying to apply what I call "some special treatment to exceptional circumstances". That is what we have now, exceptional circumstances, to which we are trying to apply some special treatment.

Canada was built because people were willing to share with one another. Once again we are trying to establish domestic prices, this time domestic prices for our energy resources. These are prices which will be different from world prices, not in order to benefit Ottawa but in order to benefit all Canadians. This is not a new procedure, it has been done before. Based on other exceptional circumstances the federal government established pricing structures which were lower or higher than the world price to protect the needs of Canadians, not western Canadians necessarily, and not eastern Canadians, but all of us.

Remember that international copper prices rose sharply in 1969. But we kept the Canadian prices low and we restrained exports to ensure that Canadians were supplied first, and adequately. To me this was a sensible policy in order to take care of our own citizens. The year 1969 was a bumper year for these types of problems. When the international price of wheat plummeted, we legislated a minimum price per bushel of domestically consumed grain to protect the Canadian supplier. This was wheat which was produced primarily in the west. At that time it was a reasonable policy.

I note here that the 1969 experience with copper involved mainly copper from Ontario. So once again it was one part of the country having to carry the burden for another.

The energy issue has raised many questions in Canada about the rights and privileges of being a Canadian, about the responsibilities of governments at every level, and the wisdom of federal policies related to energy. I add here that this Canadianism, as I understand it, is one where we say we are willing, at some time in our development, to share those things which we have with our fellow citizens. Where is the conflict with respect to that? Is it because we want to be at each other's throats? Is it because we want to say that what is mine is mine and what is yours is mine? No, not that at all. What we are trying to say and what we are trying to do is to build this nation.

We have lived through 113 years with conflicts. We have just come through one of the most heart-wrenching periods in the history of Canada, and I refer to the Quebec referendum. Many of my colleagues on this side of the House were there for that fight, and were there for many heart-wrenching experiences where families were split. We went through it together. We, the members of Parliament who are here, and those people in Quebec who had to be part of this, came through it. As a result, I believe we came out of it a little stronger.

I pray that this growing phenomenon, this growing sickness which we have now of separatism, whenever we disagree with the government, will come to an end. Surely we cannot expect everyone to agree with everything all the time. That does not make sense. This is a democracy, and strong men and women will have different opinions and different ideas about different subjects at any given time in our development. So now, when we have a bit of disagreement why is it right away we say, "Separate. Let us get out of here"? Where will these people go? Where do they want to go? Do they want to set up their own little kingdom? Do they think they can live alone better than they can with a commonality, with a family which is Canada made up of Canadians?

When we were in conflict during the Second World War I never heard of anyone saying that they were fighting for Ontario alone, or fighting for Alberta alone. When they went over there they wore the uniform of Canada and, yes, when they made their sacrifices they made them for the whole country, not for just one little part. It is now left to us, in our heritage, to come face to face with the problems we have and to look at them squarely in the eye. For God's sake, it is not for us to say, "Separate, because we do not agree with you." This does not make sense. It is not reasonable. Surely we have come far enough together that we can reason together.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, if we cannot understand one another or share what we have now, what chances have we got in the years ahead? What can we tell our children and our grandchildren? That we could not talk to each other? That we could not reach agreement? That we were more interested in owning things than in having a country of our own? Mr. Speaker, one must always ask oneself what is most important. What is more important today: to have a few dollars, to own more cars, more television sets and so on, or to have a country we can call our own, a country for us and our children? I say, Mr. Speaker, the time has come to talk to each other and to say: Now, listen: that's enough whining, enough shouting; time has come to listen and, as my hon. colleague said, to take positive steps for our country.

• (1620)

[English]

There is no argument that each province regulates natural resource activities within its borders. This has never been under dispute. The BNA Act delineates this fact very clearly. However, oil and gas are vital commodities. The well-being of the Canadian way of life is very dependent on both, and every consumer and every activity depend upon them. Because of this dependency, the federal government believes that all Canadians are now faced with exceptional circumstances which call for special treatment.

The special treatment really involves the federal government asking the people of the energy rich provinces to share their good fortune to ensure that adequate supplies of energy are available to all Canadians at reasonable prices and with reasonable surety. It seems to me that we should consider this kind of sharing as a privilege which is attendant on being a Canadian.

If this means we have to wave the flag, then I will wave the flag, because both in this House and outside this House and from the roof tops, I am not ashamed to shout that I am a Canadian nationalist. Many people are asked whether they are French, English, Ukrainian or whatever. I speak French, but I am not French; and I speak English, but I am not English either. Basically, I claim to be a Canadian, and I claim the right to go anywhere in this country. I claim the right to speak in the language of my choice wherever I am, and I claim the right to share in the good fortune of my fellow Canadians. In return, my fellow Canadians have the right to demand that I share what I have.

Mr. Thacker: Reduce the tariff.

Mr. Parent: Immediately we hear people shouting "reduce the tariff", or reduce this or that. Rather than getting involved in reducing this or that, I would prefer to get involved in sharing more of what we have here in the east, the industrial heartland. This industrial heartland could easily shift to the west, and why should it not shift to the west?

Mr. Crosbie: Why are you stopping it?

Mr. Parent: Many hon. members from the other side right away jump in with their cries of suppression and their cries that the government does not understand this or that. If these hon. members wish to join in the debate, then they are more than welcome. Let them bring their vindictiveness, their hatred, and their divisiveness, but I do not wish to get involved in that kind of mud. I do not want to have to climb to the top of this—

[Translation]

—"manure", one might say, and join them in saying, "We must shout, we must fight." Why fight all the time? Why should we always be at one another's throats? That is not what Canada is all about. Mr. Speaker, we must take time to listen to one another, and increasingly so.

[English]

What are some of the responsibilities of the government in times of exceptional circumstances such as we now face? Should the federal government be involved in more than trying to ensure self-sufficiency and leave oil companies and the west to do the job? We are already self-sufficient in total energy. We export more gas, coal, heavy oil, uranium and electricity than we import oil. But our reliance on the oil we do import leaves our national economy vulnerable and that is why initiatives are being planned which will help to increase the Canadian production of oil. This will occur in the west, offshore Newfoundland, Baffin Island and in other areas. All this collectively is ours. That is why we want to make better use of the oil which we produce, and why we want to convert some oil users to other more plentiful resources which will do the job just as well as the oil which we import.

We do not think that all oil used in future should be measured by the cost of current production. Oil that was found years ago is cheap to produce and should be cheaper to buy. Oil which was found later is more expensive to produce and should be higher priced.

There is no question that we will continue to pay world prices for imported oil, at least until the day Canada becomes self-sufficient which, I hope, with all members in this House, comes before the end of this decade. At that time we will no longer require the oil produced in other nations. That is what we are talking about in this so-called blended price—cheaper prices for the old oil and higher prices for the new oil.

We have said to our colleagues in the west that we will pay $38 per barrel for the development of the oil sands, a price which is above the world price. In addition, every time the cost of living rises, the increase will be added to the price. Surely that is reasonable, and should be considered by our colleagues. As I see it, the government is intent on accomplishing three things in the field of energy—ensuring that all Canadians have fair and reasonable access to energy, ensuring that the producers of energy receive fair and reasonable payment for their goods produced, and ensuring that Canada starts toward self-sufficiency in energy through a number of initiatives funded through the federal government.

Many times I have heard hon. members say that we are trying to stick it to the west again, that we are trying to take too much from the oil companies and from the provinces. If the people of Canada, through their federal government, have paid for 50 per cent, 50 cents out of every dollar that has ever gone to exploration for oil in Canada, is it too much to ask that those people receive 24 per cent off? I do not know where the logic is. It is interesting to note that the federal government has paid in excess of 95 per cent of the exploration costs of Dome Petroleum.

Mr. Siddon: They have not.

Mr. Parent: Yes, they have, my friend. If the hon. member will check the figures he will see that I am right.

Mr. Siddon: You are talking about tax policy.

Mr. Parent: All we are asking for is 25 per cent which would go to the people of Canada who have paid the whole shot. Is that too much? I do not think that it is.

Mr. Waddell: Why don't you take the other 5 per cent and take control?

Mr. Parent: We have hon. members on the far right saying that we should take it all. They happen to believe in nationalization.

Mr. Waddell: You have already paid out for 95 per cent.

Mr. Parent: Those in the official opposition believe that the Canadian people should get nothing. I believe that there is a middle ground where, while we will not be able to get all the people to agree, surely the mass of Canadians will be able to see that by understanding, sharing, and perhaps by giving a little on either end, we should be able to arrive at an answer which will be good for all Canadians.

Mr. Blaikie: Not by listening to you.

Mr. Parent: Now we have the man who, it was said the other day, has trouble with his sphincter muscle. He looks like that.

Mr. Blaikie: I am responding to the anal quality of your remarks.

Mr. Parent: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, that I have been drawn down to the hon. member's level. I had every good intention when I started my speech. The eventual resolution of the domestic conflict on oil, plus the establishment of new and expanding industries in western Canada, will serve to create a continuum that will cycle and recycle benefits to all Canadians, be they easterners, westerners, northerners, southerners, or centralists.

• (1630)

The heritage of Canadian oil and gas in the west will aid competitiveness in the total industrial and manufacturing base by providing energy at less than world prices, a position and advantage which no doubt are strongly envied by other industrialized nations. Not only will our citizens in the west gain prosperity—and I really believe they will—from their own resources, but their growing manufacturing base will enjoy the same competitive edge.

The heritage of Canadian oil and gas in western Canada will also provide all Canadians with help and assistance to make the transition to a more secure energy future. This is the responsibility of those who possess the tools with which to accomplish the transition nationally, thereby creating our secure energy future. I have no doubt that when history is written we will find that Canadians responded to that responsibility with understanding, logic, and common sense.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Kilgour: I rise on a point of order. Will the hon. member for Welland (Mr. Parent) allow me a question?

Mr. Parent: Certainly.

[English]

Mr. Kilgour: The hon. member for Welland indicated, if I heard him correctly, that we need a hydrocarbon policy which is both open, "fair, and acceptable". Would the hon. member tell us if he has a scintilla of evidence to indicate that the policy proposed in the budget is acceptable to any of the four western provinces?

Mr. Parent: In response to that question, when the hon. member says "a scintilla of evidence", on what would he rely for evidence? Would he say, if we spoke to enough people and they seemed to be in favour of those policies, that this would be evidence? Would he say, if the leaders of the provinces come to an agreement and say "yes, what you are doing is reasonable", that this would be evidence?

Mr. Siddon: The majority of the people.

Mr. Parent: The problems in what the member referred to as the west, the four provinces, are different. There are many people in the four western provinces who are more than receptive to our policies.

Having said that, also I know there are many people there who believe that the policies should be more generous. In trying to please everyone, we do the best we can with what we have, always keeping in mind that what we are trying to do is the best thing for the country as a whole.

In direct response to the member's question, my evidence is my own empirical evidence from the people with whom I have spoken, the things I have read, and my own convictions. If I may share with the hon. member, Canadians generally in the western provinces and in all the provinces are willing to share what they have so that we can build a better nation.

Mr. Peter Ittinuar (Nunatsiaq): Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the hon. member for Welland (Mr. Parent) for his wise, fine, and eloquent criticism of Bill C-48. Also I congratulate for once the hon. member for the Western Arctic (Mr. Nickerson) for his astute observations on this bill and what it does not mean for the people of the north. Some day—perhaps during this term—I should like to address the House on what would be a comprehensive energy policy for the north. Certainly I do not think Bill C-48 is such a policy.

Briefly I should like to address what is only vaguely referred to in the bill, the environment and the people. The government's budget, the National Energy Program, and the recent report of the Economic Council of Canada indicate the extent to which economists are relying on energy investment to stimulate growth in the Canadian economy. It is commonly agreed that the slowdown in economic growth in the United States and OECD countries makes the search for solutions to Canada's economic problems even more urgent. However, the government's commitment to huge energy projects as the salvation of our economy is more than a little disturbing to northerners.

The government appears to think that in an atmosphere of economic crisis it can push through legislation to accelerate exploration and development on "Canada lands" and abdicate its responsibility to northerners. I say that the government has not practised its responsibility as well as it should have.

The federal government is supposed to act as the trustee of territorial lands. It now appears that it regards that role lightly, in the face of possible short-term economic benefits. The bill does not address several very important issues related to pushing ahead with exploration and development in the north.

As the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell) said on Friday, Canadians should benefit from a bigger share of resource profits as compared to the exorbitant profits taken by multinationals operating in the country. However, steps must be taken to ensure that obvious problems of conflict of interest are avoided. It seems potentially dangerous that the 25 per cent shareholder of resources is also charged with granting licences and leases, while at the same time purporting to protect the interests of the environment and northern residents. The potential for a conflict of interest cannot be overlooked. It is a problem which must be faced as the state becomes more and more involved in the resource sector.

Legislation such as Bill C-48 should contain specific provisions which reflect the government's commitment to the interests of its northern residents and the environment. Even when the federal government had no direct stake in northern resources, its record has been poor, to say the least, when it came to protecting the environment and northern residents against the negative impacts of development, and there are negative impacts. Northerners cannot be blamed if they are skeptical of the government's latest scheme, when it stands to profit directly from accelerated exploration and production of non-renewable resources in the territories.

One way the government could demonstrate its good faith would be to provide us with a comprehensive plan for development of both renewable and non-renewable resources. Such a plan is absolutely essential if we are to avoid a continuation of ad hoc exploitation of northern resources, and create an atmosphere of security and confidence in the future. Rapid development of non-renewable resources in the north poses a serious threat to the traditional land and sea-based economy which is in existence today. I cannot think of anywhere else in Canada where people are asked to sacrifice their present economic base for short-term benefit of the residents in other parts of the country. Northerners are being asked to do that, trusting in blind faith that somehow the future will be assured.

A comprehensive plan for northern development should not be an afterthought; it should be the foundation on which to build legislation. Environmental protection should have a high priority in northern development plans. The need for more environmental studies has been repeated time and again. On last Friday the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. McMillan) proved that point very succinctly and clearly. The recent EARP report on the Arctic pilot project is one example among many I could mention. The Environment Assessment Review Panel report stated in its over-all conclusion that:

> Without further research on marine mammals guided by the advice of Inuit and of government scientists . . . the panel is unable to recommend that the project is environmentally acceptable.

However, it is still unclear when such studies will be completed, and by whom.

Although the need for studies is recognized by government, the provision for an environmental studies revolving fund in clause 49—a misguided clause, I might add—does not go far enough in solving the problem of producing environmental research, and its proposed operation is unsatisfactorily vague. The environmental studies revolving fund is to be administered by the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources and the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, the two departments with direct interest in development. Clause 49(6) gives the two ministers of those departments total discretion as to what kinds of studies are to be done, and by whom.

● (1640)

As far as government research is concerned, the Department of the Environment, whose mandate is environmental protection, and the Department of Oceans and Fisheries, seem like more logical choices to perform the role of environmental watchdog but I do not believe they are very interested in this case. Furthermore, there is no indication in this section that native groups and independent public-interest research groups will have any opportunity to have a voice in environmental decisions, or a hand in those funds.

In any case it seems rather pointless to keep gathering environmental data on individual projects outside the context of a rational and comprehensive long-term plan for northern development. There is another oversight in this section which is rather disturbing to me. The north holds more than energy resources. There are people living in the north. Studies of the socioeconomic impact of development are just as important as environmental impact studies, since the two are inextricably linked.

In view of the magnitude and critical importance of environmental and socioeconomic studies, the $15 million ceiling set in proposed section 49(10) seems rather arbitrary, since the document does not state whether the total is $15 million, or $15 million for each separate fund, so one is tempted to think numbers were picked out of the air. This entire clause requires closer scrutiny in committee. I believe this point has been mentioned by other speakers from both sides of the House.

Another objection to this bill is to be found in the government's failure to acknowledge the issue of native claims as they relate to non-renewable resource development. The document does not say whether the federal government would be prepared to remove from disposition those areas where native people have unextinguished aboriginal title. Neither does it say whether the government is willing to negotiate certain minimum economic rights, such as equity and employment, through a land claims negotiation about which the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development is now negotiating with the northern people.

The document does not say whether native people, having unextinguished claim to the land, will be eligible to collect a share of royalties earned from development, although, this was done last Friday through equities and an equity formula for a mine in the Keewatin region.

Similarly, this document fails to acknowledge the provincial aspirations of the territories. In the interim period prior to obtaining provincial status, will the territories have an opportunity to share in revenue accruing from non-renewable resource development? How can the territories be expected to evolve to a position of relative economic self-sufficiency without any substantial revenue base?

The 25 per cent interest in resources which this bill proposes provides a pretty strong incentive for the federal government not to relinquish control over any land in the north. The territorial government and native groups are united in opposing large-scale energy projects at this time. They do not want exploration and development to press ahead until there are some guarantees that they will not have to pay the socioeconomic costs and reap none of the benefits.

On June 20 of this year the Northwest Territories legislative assembly passed a motion on deferral of the Norman Wells pipeline. The motion stated:

There is a growing consciousness and concern amongst all people in the Northwest Territories about the merits of large development projects which take resources from the north without proper benefit and compensation to residents of the Northwest Territories.

"The National Energy Program" document characterized northern aspirations as legitimate and rightful, and stated "the need for frontier resources is not so great that it must override our social goals and obligations". These principles must be applauded, but I do not believe the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) has ever read them. However, phrases take you only so far. What is required now is some evidence that the government abides by the principles it espouses.

Bill C-48 does not provide evidence northerners require to feel secure in their future. What we would like to see are some provisions that guarantee northerners a share of the resource riches in their lands, and also guarantee some control over development. The federal government movement to strengthen its control over Canada lands jeopardizes the potential for increased northern control. It is ironic the residents of Canada's "energy storehouse" pay the highest energy prices in Canada. This document offers no guarantee that, with the depletion of northern energy resources, energy supplies will be available to northerners at cheaper or southern prices.

It should not be the case that northern interests are sacrified for the interests of "Canadians". We are Canadians, and as such our interests should be considered as part of the whole. The government can demonstrate its respect and consideration for northern Canadians by including our interests and our proposals when it proposes major policy initiatives such as the National Energy Program and Bill C-48.

Mr. Peter Lang (Kitchener): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to participate in the continuation of the debate on the National Energy Program, in particular Bill C-48, an act to regulate oil and gas interests in Canada lands and to amend the Oil and Gas Production and Conservation Act.

In view of the continuing claim of both Newfoundland and Nova Scotia to jurisdiction over lands off the east coast, it is important to refer the matter of ownership quickly to the Supreme Court for resolution. Uncertainty over the legal control over such areas is not conducive to the early development of resource potential. Discussions with the Atlantic provinces in the past have reviewed revenue-sharing arrangements and the according to the provinces of a substantial voice in matters of direct concern to them including, in particular, the need to minimize social, environmental, and economic disruption in the region. It is imperative that we take these needs into account in the management of offshore resources.

In spite of earnest discussions, most recently in the context of the constitutional talks, this issue has not been resolved. In the north it is necessary to provide strong incentives for exploration, in keeping with our need to know the location, extent of resources and development proposals. It is especially so for those which involve export of resources, that might otherwise offer a safety net for Canada's energy future. These will be critically examined in view of their anticipated social, environmental and economic effects.

The purposes of this new legislation are to establish a modernized, regulatory regime for the management of the Canada lands; to ensure active development of oil and gas rights; to increase Canadian ownership; to ensure that a high level of Canadian goods and services is employed in oil and gas activities carried out on the Canada lands, and to ensure that Canada receives a fair share of the economic rent.

Mr. Mayer: You don't know the definition of economic rent.

Mr. Lang: The main elements of this legislation are stiffer work requirements, involving vigorous and sustained exploration efforts to be negotiated through exploration agreements. A minimum of 50 per cent Canadian ownership will be required for any production from the Canada lands. Applicants for exploration and production rights will have to show how their operations will bring industrial and employment benefits for Canadians. In addition to a basic royalty of 10 per cent, a progressive incremental royalty will be established, based upon the profitability of each producing field.

The Oil and Gas Production and Conservation Act will be amended to impose more vigorous requirements for environmental protection, to confirm the responsibility of operators for the costs of evaluating production systems, and to reserve for Petro-Canada, or some other designated Crown corporation, a 25 per cent carried interest, which will be convertible to a working interest at any time prior to authorization or production. Although this 25 per cent interest has received considerable criticism, this quarter interest is not unreasonable if one considers similar arrangements elsewhere in the world which regulate development on the one hand and foreign ownership on the other.

• (1650)

Four oil producing western bloc nations, Great Britain, Norway, Mexico, and Australia all have more stringent development and foreign ownership regulations than we do in Canada. Great Britain, for instance, has first claim on a 51 per cent share of oil production, subject to negotiation of purchase at market prices. It also takes part in joint ventures with foreign-owned oil companies. But again it retains control of all projects.

Norway is another case in point. Its public company, Statoil, is authorized to take up to a 50 per cent interest in any block of land it does not already hold. It does this after an oil or gas find has been located, and makes no payment for past exploration expenditures. It can also increase its option to 70 per cent at its own discretion.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, as the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) has already pointed out, this 25 per cent provision is simply one way of getting back for the Canadian taxpayer a fair share of what he or she has contributed over the years for exploration in these areas of Canada. In many cases this has amounted to 93 per cent, 95 per cent and sometimes 103 per cent of the cost of that exploration.

The National Energy Program is designed to free us from dependence on OPEC, leading ultimately to independence in terms of imported oil, and hence energy self-sufficiency. Second, the National Energy Program offers Canadians the opportunity to participate in the energy industry in general, expanding the role of public sector companies and encouraging the growth of Canadian companies to allow all of us to share in the benefits of energy industry expansion.

The National Energy Program also establishes a petroleum and revenue sharing system that stresses the need for fairness to all Canadians no matter where they live in Canada. The government has moved very decisively toward implementing the National Energy Program. Its aim is to encourage the discovery and production of Canadian oil and gas, and to protect the consumer and the economy by having a gradual increase in prices that is less than the Conservative proposals, and that does not exacerbate inflation as would the Crosbie budget's rapid progression toward world prices. The pricing structure, along with the numerous incentives, also provides the economic climate necessary for the development of our resources of natural gas, oil, and alternate energy resources.

In many ways this debate has followed a predictable course. On one side the NDP is saying to the government, "You are not doing enough, we need more government intervention, nationalize the industry." The position the NDP has taken on this question and on many others would leave our economy and deficit in such bad shape there is no way we would be able to support the social programs for which the NDP is so fond of trying to take credit. As you know, Mr. Speaker, the vast majority of our social programs have been put through by Liberal governments.

This brings me to another point, the posturing of the Conservative party with regard to their rhetoric of concern for the little guy. If they were so concerned about the little guy, then why did the Conservative party, exactly one year ago last Thursday, introduce a budget that would have cost consumers $40 billion more than the Liberal budget and energy policy? They talk about their energy tax credit, but the Liberal energy program saves the consumers 12 times more than the amount provided by their energy tax credit.

In light of that budget of one year ago, which most of the Conservative members here voted for, how can these same individuals, and particularly the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Crombie), now be talking in a self-righteous manner about protecting the little guy? Furthermore, when one looks at the facts, it has been Liberal governments which have acted for the little guy. It has been Liberal governments that have introduced old age security, the guaranteed income supplement, the Canada Pension Plan, family allowances, medicare, and many other programs.

The Conservatives do a lot of talking, but where was there any social concern in their budget of last year for the little guy, and where is their track record of social legislation? Where was there a GIS in the Crosbie budget? It is a very sad track record indeed. I would suggest to the hon. member for Rosedale that he is living in a glass house and throwing stones made up of inaccurate information. This government, the Liberal government, fulfils its social responsibilities in balance with an economically realistic budget and National Energy Program.

Much of what has been said by the Tories concerning the industries' reaction to the Canada lands initiatives and many other aspects of the National Energy Program is, to say the least, exaggerated. They have, for instance, chosen to highlight instances of drilling rigs leaving the country, and have said that this has resulted in a slowdown in the industry. The facts are quite the contrary.

Before the National Energy Program was announced, the president of the Canadian Association of Oilwell Drilling Contractors, Mr. Selby Porter, was quoted in the Globe and Mail as saying that the use of drilling rigs in Canada was expected to drop to 59 per cent of available capacity over the next 15 months. The reason he gave was that the equipment market was oversupplied. The reason they are oversupplied is because we have a surplus of gas, with capped wells, and no immediate incentives for drilling. This was before the budget. With the National Energy Program and the budget, we have a gas bank and this problem has been taken care of. With 572 rigs in western Canada, and 475 operative, our rig deployment rate is 83 per cent. Five years ago the deployment rate was 48 per cent. Interestingly, Mr. Porter also added that the long-term outlook for the industry was optimistic, and that the demand for services would continue to grow. So, as you can see, there is very little actual substance to the Tory arguments.

Generally speaking, when the government brought down the National Energy Program we did not expect industry to be overjoyed, since we have increased the national government's share of revenue largely at their expense. What we did expect from the industry was a realistic appraisal of the situation, and this is what is currently transpiring. It does not take a financial wizard to understand that there is money to be made in oil and gas in this country, and slowly but surely the industry is coming to realize that the federal government has a national responsibility for our energy and economic future, and that this responsibility requires a greater slice of the revenue pie.

An hon. Member: Want to bet?

Mr. Lang: Somebody says, "Want to bet?" The hon. member for Etobicoke Centre (Mr. Wilson), the Conservative energy critic, was expounding in the House the other day on how this government is the national government and has the national responsibility for energy development. I suggest members opposite get their lines of communication straightened out so we know where they stand on the energy issue.

The government is flexible on oil pricing, is aware of the concerns of the west, and is open to negotiation. It is extremely important that both sides co-operate in these negotiations for the energy and economic security of all Canadians. I was in the west four times last summer. I spoke with Bill Richards, the president of Dome, Bob Blair of Nova, Jim Grey of Canadian Hunter, and Bob Pierce of Nova. I am well aware of the entrepreneurial spirit and the spirit of productivity that exist in Alberta and throughout the west. It is the purpose of the National Energy Program to foster a climate so that this can continue for the benefit of energy exploration and development for all Canadians.

I see my time is running out. I have further points to make, which I will do at eight o'clock.

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENT RESPECTING PARENTAL ABDUCTION

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock-North Delta) moved that Bill C-219, to amend the Criminal Code (parental abduction of children), be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, Bill C-219 is essentially the same bill I tabled first in the fall of 1976. One of the sad commentaries on our society is that there is an increasingly alarming trend to marriage break-ups. In far too many of these situations there is growing acrimony, and the victims of the acrimony are the helpless children of those marriages. It is becoming increasingly apparent also that it is the parent who does not have custody of the child who will frequently take issue with the other parent by snatching the child who has been assigned in custody. The hopeless victim is always the child.

It seemed to me when I first encountered this problem that we do not have protection for children by way of the Criminal Code under that section dealing with kidnapping. There is protection from this kind of violence for those children in what we might call a normal, wholesome marriage, home and family life, yet there is no protection under the law, at least no adequate protection, for those children who are the potential victims of a marriage break-up. For that reason I tabled what was then Bill C-221 in the fall of 1976. That bill was debated in March, 1977. At that time there was growing acceptance of the principle of the bill; that is, that kidnapping under the provisions of the bill should no longer be a matter dealt with under the civil code but should be dealt with under the Criminal Code. In this way there would be real substance to the protection that ought to exist for children.

At that time the subject matter of my bill was referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs for further study. The subject of the bill was supported by all parties, and I think the principle has unanimous support now in the House. I must say, to the credit of all hon. members, the subject matter has never been dealt with in a politically partisan way but has always been seen as a social issue which has to be dealt with outside party politics.

If there is an awareness in the House about this issue, there is also a growing awareness in the country. There are thousands of cases of the kind I have described occurring in Canada. I have had many representations received in my office regarding this type of case. These are cases involving virtually helpless parents who have had their children snatched from them by the other parent, usually, but not always, the father. The parent with custody granted by the court becomes a helpless victim while the child, on many occasions, becomes the subject of abuse at the hands of the parent who snatched the child. There seems to be no elementary or emotional security for these children in their formative years. They sometimes become scarred for life through such an experience.

Four years ago when we first debated this issue I mentioned the first case that had come to my attention involving the son of one of my constituents, a Mrs. Lois Preston. Her son was snatched away and carried about from pillar to post across Canada, mainly throughout Ontario and sometimes into the United States, for a period of about three years. During that three-year period he had something like 12 aliases. By the time he was found three years later the poor child hardly even knew who he was. That boy has been scarred for life as a result of that experience. Cases of this kind have occurred over and over again across Canada and throughout the world. To this day my office is receiving notices of additional cases which have come to light.

There has been some progress made since the introduction of this bill four years ago. Across Canada, with the exception of two provinces, there is reciprocity regarding the matter of child custody. If a child is abducted in British Columbia and taken to Manitoba, the Manitoba courts will now recognize the custody order granted in British Columbia. The big problem is in finding the children. As the law stands now it is not strong enough to support custody orders.

Several organizations have come forward to give approval to the provisions of this bill, and I might mention the National Council of Women as well as a new organization called Abducted Children's Rights of Canada. Mrs. Lilia Karu of Ontario has formed this new organization to advocate this kind of protection. I believe one of the members on the government side who will speak in support of this bill is that lady's member of Parliament. The organization sponsored by Lois Preston, Parents of Kidnapped Children, has been advocating this principle for a number of years.

Just about a year and a half ago I attended the Interparliamentary Union Conference in Caracas, Venezuela. At that time I spoke to a motion asking that union to pass a motion urging governments to grant reciprocity of custody around the world. That motion was unanimously adopted by the interparliamentary union. Just a month or two ago Canada became a signatory to The Hague Convention by which western European and North American countries are to grant reciprocity of custody. So there has been some progress.

There has also been some stagnation. As I have pointed out several times, this matter is now four years old, and since I first introduced the subject matter in the form of a bill there have been countless more children kidnapped by parents, and their security has been jeopardized in those intervening four years because of our negligence in passing this kind of protective legislation.

I might add that most of the cases involving these abducted children on our flies four years ago have still not been resolved, specifically because of this lack of protection. Consequently the security needs of the most vulnerable children of our land are not being met. The irony is that at this time the constitutional committee is debating a charter of rights and freedoms for our people, yet the most vulnerable in our land really do not have security of person because of our failure to put teeth into the legislation.

It seems to me all we lack in this country is the political will to resolve this problem and end the inherent anguish in these human tragedies scattered across our land. There is great torment to those parents who wonder where their children are, and there is great anguish on the part of those children who wonder if they will ever see their other parents again and where their next home will be. It seems to me what we need is some political resolve to end the anguish these children are experiencing.

• (1710)

Mr. Ron Irwin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a few remarks to Bill C-219, a private member's bill sponsored by the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock-North Delta (Mr. Friesen). This is a very important bill which has been put forward in similar form in the past by the government but for one reason or another has never been passed. It was first introduced on May 1, 1978, as Bill C-51, but lapsed because of the adjournment of the House. It was reintroduced on November 21, 1978, as Bill C-21, but again was not dealt with because an election was called.

As I have indicated, both Bill C-51 and Bill C-21 were government bills. It is apparent that the government and the hon. member are of similar mind when it comes to the problem of child abuse. On two occasions this subject matter was sent to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs. These were in March of 1977 and February of 1978. In May and July of 1977 the committee heard several expert witnesses.

I have read carefully the wording of Bill C-21 and the hon. member's Bill C-219, and they appear to be identical, right down to the explanatory notes.

One of the most traumatic, if not the most traumatic experience is the breaking up of a family. Usually the most difficult part of separation is not the division of money, of the furniture of the house but, rather, the access to and custody of the children of the marriage. In most cases the desire of each parent to keep the child or, at the very least, to have regular access, is motivated by deep affection for the child. Notwithstanding the rancour and the time involved, the overwhelming majority of cases are solved either by mutual consent and a separation agreement, by a court order, or a combination of both. Notwithstanding the difficulty and tension involved in reaching a mutual understanding, which often continues even beyond the formalization of an agreement, very seldom is there child abduction.

Although we are dealing here today with situations which technically would include denial of access, or prolonged access where one parent denies access to the other parent or keeps the child too long, these matters can still be dealt with in the civil courts.

What the hon. member's bill would do would be to go a long way toward alleviating the tragic experience of having a child kidnapped by one of the parents, to the utter despair of the wronged parent. I hope once we pass a measure similar to what the hon. member is proposing—and I am sure we will—the deterrent alone, namely, making child abduction a criminal offence, will be sufficient to prevent most extreme cases.

What we have now, in both legal and technical terms, is a situation which is quite unsatisfactory. Without a civil court order there is nothing that can be done quickly, unless one has a lot of money, to return a child who has been abducted, notwithstanding that it is in the best interests of the child. To act in a civil action is both expensive and lengthy and, if there is a question of jurisdiction, in many cases ineffective.

Moreover, the wronged parent does not have access to police investigation under what we have now, and the parent who has abducted the child can move very short distances, especially in large metropolitan centres, and virtually disappear. The parent cannot disappear forever, but in the interim period there can be serious effects on the child.

In the interim—and that is what we are talking about—there must be more protection than there is now. We must be concerned about the welfare of the child, and we must be much more concerned about the parent who loses that child. I doubt if what my hon. friend is putting forward will keep any more marriages together, but it will certainly ensure more fairness in those cases where abduction occurs.

Although it is difficult to estimate the number of abductions in Canada, there are some figures as to propensity, and there are figures which show potential abductions by reason of the increase in the number of family breakdowns. As I indicated, I do not have Canadian figures, but I suspect that per capita percentage increases are similar in Canada to those in our neighbour, the United States. The recent paper "Parental Child Stealing: Participants and the Victimization Process", presented August 20 to 24, 1980, by Michael W. Agopian, assistant professor in the administration of justice department of the California Lutheran College, points out, and I quote:

> Divorce is rapidly increasing in America. In 1978 Americans divorced 1,122,000 times.
> The rate of divorce has increased steadily, and from the 1960 rate of 2.2 divorces per 100,000 population, the divorce rate peaked at 5.1 per 100,000 in 1978.
> The number of children involved in divorce has nearly tripled between 1960 and 1976, increasing from 463,000 to 1,117,000 children.
> Today almost two million children live in one-parent families.
>
> And recently, more fathers have become desirous of custody of their children.
> Single fatherhood increased 32 per cent between 1970 and 1978 in America, with nearly one million children under the age of 18 living with their male parents.
> Such a rapid increase in the divorce rate signals the potential for an epidemic of parental child stealing.

These changing and fluid times make legislation such as the hon. member is proposing that much more imperative. In looking back over the years during which I practised law, it was more the problem of parental abduction within Canada, from province to province, than abduction from Canada to a foreign country, that concerned me. When this occurred within Canada, the repercussions of returning the child were staggering, even from province to province. Facing abduction from country to country was like facing a brick wall. Almost invariably the wronged parent would have to go to the other country and, in essence, kidnap the child back. One can well imagine the effect this tug of war between two persons the child loves would ultimately have on the child, and both parents would love the child because both would be trying to get custody.

To ensure some international order, I am pleased to say that Canada is at the forefront of countries pushing for international rules. At The Hague conference of 1980 and The Hague conference of 1979 Canada forcefully put forward suggestions for international rules. Twenty-three nations worked to prepare "The Hague Draft Convention on International Child Abduction", and from this draft a formal convention was approved. On October 25, 1980, Canada, France, Greece and Switzerland were the first countries to sign this international convention.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, may I say that I have been with parents who have experienced parental child abduction. I have witnessed the utter frustration and utter helplessness of these parents. I have seen how ineffective our courts have been in these cases, simply because we have not given them the tools, I have spoken to Crown attorneys and police officers who wanted to help but could not.

Having seen this and experienced this, I applaud the hon. member's efforts. I hope it will be the prod that prompts the government to move quickly.

Mr. Bob Ogle (Saskatoon East): Mr. Speaker, I would like to add my remarks to those which have been made by the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock-North Delta (Mr. Friesen) and the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Irwin) on this modern social problem which has such devastating effects upon innocent children. I suspect that pretty well every hon. member in the House at some time has been approached by somebody in his or her constituency, or by some other party, with respect to this problem.

● (1720)

As a member of Parliament I have had the problem brought to my attention on numerous occasions, and speaking from my pastoral experience as a parish priest, I know how profoundly devastating is the situation in those cases which were brought to my attention. Our society has changed radically, as I think most people will agree.

As is indicated in the statistics given by the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie, what has changed most profoundly in present-day society in Canada, and in north America as a whole, is the stability of marriage. It is marriage breakdown, and marriage instability which occurs so frequently nowadays, which bring this problem to our attention.

I can say that in my pastoral experience I have officiated in 1,000 marriage ceremonies, which is many people and many new marriages. Each time that I prepared myself for that very serious moment in people's lives I always stood back in my own mind and asked myself whether a really good thing was happening, whether the two people being married were really ready to be married. Of course, one could not answer that with absolute certainty.

I know from close personal experience that many young people today approaching marriage—I make a clear distinction between the word "marriage" and the word "wedding" because people prepare themselves for weddings but sometimes they are not prepared for marriage—are not approaching this very serious moment in their lives with the full understanding that they are taking upon themselves a commitment, a contract, an agreement or a covenant for a mutual, exclusive, permanent union in which, with hope and love, they are preparing themselves to give to each other as responsible adult people ready to confront the difficulties which are part and parcel of every human marriage. As the statistics which were given in the House would indicate, many marriages today are not staying together.

Before I go on to speak about the act of kidnapping, let me question whether or not our society is helping to prepare young people for marriage. It is easier to get a marriage licence than it is to get a driver's licence, the reason being that before getting the latter licence you must take instructions and learn how to drive. However, all you need before getting a marriage licence is to be old enough, to have the $5 or whatever is required, and to have taken a blood test.

Becoming married could be the beginning of a journey into a lifetime of happiness, or it could be the beginning of a journey into a lifetime of hell. So I think that society should take a close look at the requirements before a marriage licence is given and perhaps require some counselling before a licence is granted. I have had a good bit of experience in marriage preparation courses, marriage counselling, and so on, which is sought by many young people. On the other hand there are many young people who do not seek to have answers before they start on the road of married life.

I should like to say that I have had the privilege, as have many others, of coming from a very happy home. I think that this has had a great deal to do with everything I have done in life. It was through no choice of my own that I came from a happy home, it was just my good fortune, a blessing, or whatever we want to call it. I can never remember my parents saying a word in anger to each other, and I can well remember the day my mother died when my father said, in his grief, "This is the only thing she ever did to hurt me." It is a privilege to have come from such a home, and I appreciate the fact that many, many people have not had that privilege.

Today, we as legislators have the serious responsibility of having to face the problem of marriage breakdown and of having to face the problem dealt with in the bill put forward by the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock-North Delta, namely, that after a breakdown has taken place and marriage has finally come to an end, if children are involved there will always be heartache, sorrow, pain, and distress. No matter how the family courts, the lawyers, the priests or the ministers, and the social workers involved, deal with this, pain and agony will be present. But we still have to do something to protect people against extra strain, extra sorrow, and extra pain.

Now I would like to read a section from some material which tells us how the law we now have, imperfect as it is, has improved since the time when English society decided to pass a law to protect children. It was written by E. G. Ewaschuk, director, criminal law amendments, Department of Justice. He wrote:

> Since the common law misdemeanours of kidnapping and forcible abduction required an element of force, which is usually not required to persuade a young child to go somewhere, the statutory offence of child-stealing was created in 1814 by the enactment of "An Act for the More Effectual Prevention of Child Stealing".

He went on to explain that even in those days it was not uncommon for children to be kidnapped.

In the section of the act of that time there was the following provision:

> —That nothing in the act shall extend, or be construed to extend, to any person who shall have claimed to be the father of an illegitimate child, or to have any right or title in law, to the possession of such child, on account of his getting possession of such child, or taking such child out of the possession of the mother thereof, or other person or persons having the lawful charge thereof.

● (1730)

The act simply said that the father, notwithstanding whoever happened to be taking responsibility for the child, was free to go and take the child at any time. Since then, as other speakers in this debate have indicated, there has been a growth in the notion that in the settlement which follows a breakdown of marriage, this may not be the best way to handle the matter. Now there are stipulations which permit the mother, at times, and the father at other times, to be responsible for the children of the marriage. In my experience, this act of stealing the child is almost invariably strongly linked with the abuse of alcohol, or alcoholism, which might have accounted for the breakdown of the marriage in the first place. In these cases either the mother or father has become addicted to alcohol. As a result they are no longer able to maintain a happy home, marriages break down, separation follows and divorce results. As might be expected, children are frequently given to the spouse who is not the alcoholic. However, in the strange love-hate relationship which follows, the person who has not been given custody, in a kind of revengeful mood, finds the child and somehow or other steals it away. Frequently, as has been indicated already, the one who steals the child runs away with it and disappears.

Many people are aware of how the movie industry in this past year attempted to bring this case home in a very real way, in the academy award winning movie called "Kramer v. Kramer". I think in that movie the stress and strain of the marriage, the change in the personalities of the people involved, the breakdown, the separation and the change in attitude toward the child from both parties was well demonstrated. I know of many cases which have the elements of the problems demonstrated in that movie.

One commendable feature of this bill is that it attempts to deal with the problem of jurisdiction. Now there is a sort of cure which is available in some instances, as the speaker from Surrey-White Rock-North Delta pointed out with respect to the issue of custody and jurisdiction. Karen Weiler of Osgoode Hall pointed out in an article:

> The issue of custody, difficult to determine at best, is rendered more complex when interjurisdictional problems arise. Basically, one parent will be seeking to regain custody of the child which has been "snatched", while the other will attempt to obtain judicial sanction for his or her actions. The extent to which a court will intervene in settling the dispute is often unpredictable by virtue of the fact that a court may assume jurisdiction on several different bases.

The author of the article goes on to explain the complicated reality of who is able to treat the matter when the child is in one place, one parent is in another and the other parent is somewhere else; when both of them have moved, or when a move to another country is involved or when two states in the United States are involved or different provinces in Canada. It is a very complicated situation.

In summing up, I support the general notion which has been proposed by the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock-North-Delta and supported by the hon. member from Sault Ste. Marie in this area of protecting children. They are the ones who really do suffer from the breakdown of marriages as we know them. It is essential we find a way to make it possible for these children to have freedom to develop with the least possible destruction to their personalities and their future.

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock-North Delta (Mr. Friesen) for the very excellent bill which he has presented to the House. Apparently, this bill has been receiving widespread publicity, as I have received letters from my constituents urging me to support it.

I support this bill and I congratulate the hon. member for putting it before the House. I urge hon. members on the government benches to not talk this bill out. This bill will not embarrass the government. It will help boys and girls. It will not cost any money. It will give boys and girls a chance to live a reasonably normal life—how many boys and girls I do not know. So I urge all hon. members not to talk this bill out but to give it their full support in order that it may become the law in this country.

Some 30 years ago I found that the same type of procedures were going on as those described today. In those years probably seven out of ten cases were caused by the use of liquor. Liquor has the property of breaking down principles and morals in a home. When liquor becomes so necessary in the life of a man or a woman, it gradually takes precedence over their own offspring and then, as one hon. member has already said, that love, which is so wonderful, turns to hate, which is so terrible. But the child is the one I really worry about.

I had a boy come to the boys' camp which I have operated for a number of years. When he arrived I was told he was a bad kid and that we should not really take him. I asked the chap who spoke to me, "Is the lad having another holiday?" He said: "No, he will never get a holiday. His dad is a drunkard and his mother is a drunkard. He will never get a holiday." I said, "We will take him into camp. That is what our camp is for." During the week he was there I found that the boy was a splendid lad. He was a lad who co-operated and enjoyed the sports. He would say thank you to the cooks after almost every meal he had. The day before he went home I called him over and said, "Bobby, tomorrow we all go home." He said, "I hate the thought of it." And that, Mr. Speaker, from a ten-year-old boy. I said, "Well, Bobby, the purpose of this camp is to make you appreciate your home, your mother and your dad. We have a good time out here but we cannot replace mother and dad." He said, "Well, I hardly ever see my mother and dad. They are always in the beer parlour."

A year later that boy was in the position mentioned by the hon. member who presented this bill. His parents separated, neither one of them wanted the boy. He was a splendid boy. He was hustled off to another relative. I do not have much sympathy for the parents. I can understand their dilemma when they are obsessed with liquor and when they lose all sense of decent living. But I can never forgive them for ruining the childhood of a boy who could have been a tremendous asset. I do not even know where that lad is now. I hope he has overcome the terrible handicap with which he was burdened.

During my first 20 years in public life, liquor seemed to be at the root of 80 per cent of such cases. During the last 20 years, while liquor is still a predominant factor, the use of drugs has come into the picture. These drugs are being used by both the parents and the children. I have no use whatever for any adult who tries to make his fortune by selling drugs to teenagers, in some cases to children who have not yet reached their teens.

While I was the minister of youth for Alberta, I received a call from a doctor at the University Hospital. He told me the story of how drug peddlers were trying to sell drugs to students at Victoria High School. Because the students had taken some courses on drugs and had learned what drugs could do to their minds, their reproductive organs and their lives, the drug peddlers found a wall of strong young teenagers who told them to clear off. The drug peddlers cleared off and went to an elementary school and talked youngsters around the ages of nine years, ten and 11 into taking that particular drug, which was a mixture of grass and a few other ingredients.

As a result of taking these drugs, three youths found themselves at the University Hospital. Two of them will never be the same again because the drugs completely ruined their minds. In my view the chap who sold the drugs is a murderer in the worst degree. Such people should be punished and removed from circulation when they try to ruin the lives of young people.

Making abduction an offence will be helpful. Approximately four years ago I spoke to some 40 or 50 teenagers at a correctional institution in Edmonton, at the invitation of the principal. These children were of Indian extraction, Metis and coloured extraction and most of them came from broken homes. The majority were slow learners and could not read. Many of their teachers and fellow students in public school, felt that they were dumb and made fun of them because they did not learn fast. As a result, these children stopped asking questions and trying to learn how to read. As they went from grade to grade, they found that they could not keep up because they could not read.

The correctional school was beginning with the fundamentals and teaching these boys and girls, some of whom as old as 17, how to read a primer and books of grades two, three and four levels. In order that the children would not be embarrassed they put a detective cover on the outside of the book, which was a grade one primer.

I asked one boy of Indian extraction why he had not learned how to read. He replied that his mother had taken him and run away from his father, that while he was at school everybody called him an Indian and thought he was dumb and that he could not learn how to read. He cited an incident in which a teacher was talking about the abacus and he could not understand any of what was being said. The word was unfamiliar to him and the whole thing sounded like a new language. Apparently the teacher was using the phonetic system. That system, if taught properly, is a good one, but it does not compare, in my view, with teaching children how to read by the sight method or by a combination of both methods. The child went on to say that because he could not read he ran away from school and his mother and got mixed up with a bad crowd.

If we look in our prisons today, we will probably find that 50 per cent of the so-called criminals therein are there because they were ostracized, were slow learners or had some other defect which kept them from moving ahead in school. They became self-conscious and embarrassed and finally left the school system altogether.

It is sad when one parent takes the child from the other parent. The child cannot help but be affected by the court case and the fight as to who will receive custody. An hon. member to my left said that he came from a happy home. I came from a happy home as well. There were ten of us and we were poor. It was difficult feeding ten mouths during the depression years, but there was love and understanding in my family, and I am thankful for that. We never had to face the agony of taking sides between our father and our mother.

Later, as a teacher, when I learned there was a custody fight over one of my students, a big lump would come to my throat because this student would need help. The best help that could be provided comes from the parents, if they would just stop and think about the fact they brought this child into the world. Surely parents should wait until the child is of mature age before they begin venting their spleen on one another.

I had dealings recently with a case in which a mother had abducted her children after the court had given custody to the father. The court heard testimony, although the mother claimed that it was false. I do not know whether it was false, but the court believed the testimony. The mother kept tabs on the children as to where they were being kept and so on. She found out that they were being mistreated, abused and were not being fed properly. Her sister told me one evening that her torment was so deep that she had decided she would steal those youngsters and take them away so that she could look after them properly.

Later the sister of the mother phoned me and I told her to have the mother bring the children back, that she could only get into deeper trouble for defying the law even though she had run away with them to B.C. She did not bring the children back. She was eventually caught, and as a result she is now facing trial. Her chances of getting the children through court have been dramatically reduced. Perhaps the court will find under section 250.2 that there is a maternal reason for her stealing these youngsters. I hope so for the sake of the children.

But if the parents of those children would forget their differences and realize that they both have a responsibility to them because they brought them into the world, then everybody would be in a better position.

I congratulate the hon. member who introduced the bill. I hope it will cause those who are considering breaking up their home and those who are stealing youngsters, for whatever the purpose, to stop and think. Many youngsters are being stolen in our larger cities as well as our smaller cities. When a person steals a boy or girl in order to make money from the flesh of that youngster, the punishment for the offence cannot be too great. Imprisonment for ten years, five years or two years is not enough.

I hope the bill will help to prevent such occurrences and that we in society will do our utmost to prevent such things from happening. We must realize that at the base of many such occurrences is the excessive use of alcohol and drugs.

Mr. Maurice Bossy (Kent): Mr. Speaker, I would like to speak for a moment on this most important matter, and, more specifically, on the area of international abduction. One such incident was brought to my personal attention by the Abducted Children's Rights of Canada representative in Chatham, in my riding. It has impressed upon me the futile complexity involved in securing the return of a child when removed not only from the home and the custodial parent but from within the confines of Canada.

● (1750)

In a situation where a child is abducted from his home and taken to another area of Canada the consequences are irrefutably traumatic. Consider, however, the implications of a totally different lifestyle forced upon the child and the hopelessness for the custodial parent in trying to ascertain its whereabouts, possibly in the context of a foreign culture and language.

Since the problem is one which has international dimensions, it is important to address the question of what measures can be taken not only within Canada but in the international area which will have the result of discouraging child abduction and effecting prompt return of a child who has been removed from his accustomed environment.

Ministers of justice have stated on a number of occasions that the abduction of children across jurisdictions must cease. As a result of these concerns the issue was included in discussions with the provincial attorneys general as early as October, 1975.

The then minister of justice asked provincial attorneys general for their suggestions as to how the situation might be improved by changes in federal law such as the Criminal Code. Because the matter of child welfare falls primarily within provincial jurisdiction, he also actively encouraged the provincial attorneys general to enact provincial legislation which would provide for mandatory recognition and enforcement of extra-provincial custody orders by all Canadian provinces. To date, eight provinces have adopted the uniform extra-provincial custody orders enforcement act. The aim of this act is to prevent abduction across jurisdictional boundaries.

In August, 1977, the then minister of justice presented a paper on international abduction of children by parents at the commonwealth law ministers meeting, aimed at emphasizing the importance of the growing social and legal problem and developing co-operation amongst commonwealth countries in the enforcement of foreign custody orders and the return of abducted children.

The commonwealth law ministers agreed that concrete early action was required and that examination should be divided to greater co-operation in the enforcement of custody orders. The law ministers were also conscious of the potential for the commonwealth to use its collective influence in other bodies such as The Hague conference on private international law so as to take a lead in developing this law to the benefit of the world community.

As a result of Canadian representations, the matter of international abduction of children by a parent was placed on the agenda for consideration by The Hague conference on private international law which was held in October 1980. A special commission on kidnapping established by the conference, and in which the Department of Justice participated, met in March and November of 1979. A provisional draft convention on the civil aspects of international child abduction was prepared by the special commission and was discussed and adopted at the October meeting.

I am pleased to note that on October 25, 1980, Canada, France, Greece and Switzerland became signatories to the convention. The convention is designed to solve the problem of international abductions by the imposition of jurisdictional rules which require civil courts to decline to hear the merits of custody applications and to restore the children to the proper court. It covers the situation where no court order is in existence and the situation where the child is retained in breach of permitted access. We are hopeful that the provinces will move quickly to put legislation in place implementing the provisions of the convention so that Canada may become a party. Enforcement rules would then be effective for the return of children abducted across international borders.

The proposed amendment to the Criminal Code by specifically criminalizing parental child abduction will clearly announce to the international community Canada's appreciation of the significance of the problem and our resolve in meeting it.

As we become aware of an increase in these unfortunate happenings—as I have in my riding—and as the government works toward a resoslution of these problems as evidenced by what has been accomplished, the message is clear that we must strive to put an end to child abduction both interprovincially and internationally. We must also work toward the return of these children to their accustomed environment and established custodian so that they may look forward to a safe and secure future.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. W. Kenneth Robinson (Etobicoke-Lakeshore): Mr. Speaker, indeed I am pleased at the opportunity to once again speak on this very important matter. At the outset I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock-North Delta (Mr. Friesen) for bringing this matter before the House once again. I recall that he did so through Bill C-221 in 1977, and so I remember speaking on the bill at that time. I know he feels somewhat frustrated in the bill not going before the standing committee for further consideration, but perhaps he will be happy in the thought that it will probably be considered carefully in the Criminal Code amendment which I hope will come before the House shortly.

I welcome the opportunity to address this important question. The abduction of children by a parent, often in defiance of the court order, is a growing social and legal problem in Canada. The abduction of a child by a parent can occur in several situations—removal of a child upon marriage breakdown or after, contrary to a court order, and so on. My colleagues have adequately addressed this question. I merely want to put a few more points on the record. The current law, section 250 of the Criminal Code states the following:

> Everyone who, with intent to deprive a parent or guardian or any other person who has lawful care of a child under the age of 14 years of the possession of that child, or with intent to steal anything on or about the person of such a child unlawfully, (a) takes or entices away or detains the child or (b) receives or harbours the child, is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for ten years.

The section has caused major problems, for example, in the "good faith" defence. This defence has been used historically as a legal excuse for parents who abduct their children in the honest belief that they are entitled to custody whether or not they are legally so entitled.

I should like to address the specific question of how the government would deal with this problem. Government initiatives would propose to abolish the good faith defence. There would be a defence based upon the other parent's consent to the removal of the child or on the court's conclusion that the removal was essential for the child's welfare.

The court would not be entitled to find the removal was essential for the child's welfare simply because the abducting parent is subsequently successful in obtaining a custody order over the child in his favour.

Also, the government proposes to create two new separate indictable offences—one in section 250.1(a) for abducting a child in violation of the terms of the court order, and another in section 250.1(b) for abducting a child with the intent to deprive the other parent of the possession of the child where no court order exists. These would be punishable by up to five years and two years of imprisonment respectively. Section 250.1(b) is designed to meet the situation where the removal of the child takes place after marriage breakdown, contrary to a formal written agreement by removing the child from the established custodial parent and the removal of the child after marriage breakdown contrary to a formal written agreement by keeping the child beyond the stated period in which visitation is permitted.

• (1800)

Section 250.1(a) is designated to meet the situation where the removal of the child occurs after marriage breakdown contrary to a formal order by removing the child from the established custodial parent or by keeping the child beyond the stated period in which visitation is permited. Thus, a detention of the child beyond the time permitted in the access provisions of a court custody order would be a specific offence. Likewise, detention of a child beyond the time permitted would be an offence without a court order where there is intent to deprive the other parent of possession of the child. Refusal to give the child up for access would also be an offence under section 250.1(a) or section 250.1(b) depending on whether the access is exercised pursuant to the terms of the court order or pursuant to a de facto arrangement.

Mr. Knowles: Question!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. It being six o'clock and the hour allotted for private members' business having expired, I do now leave the chair until 8 p.m.

At 6.03 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

CANADA OIL AND GAS ACT

MEASURE RESPECTING OIL AND GAS INTERESTS

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Lalonde that Bill C-48, to regulate oil and gas interests in Canada lands and to amend the Oil and Gas Production and Conservation Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When the debate was interrupted at five o'clock the hon. member for Kitchener (Mr. Lang) had the floor.

Mr. Peter Lang (Kitchener): Mr. Speaker, when debate on this motion ended at five o'clock, I had given the majority of my speech and my thoughts on this topic. I had covered the purpose of the new legislation, Bill C-48, and had discussed some of its main elements. I would just like to round it out a little bit. I see there are seven members of the loyal opposition present, including—

Mr. Paproski: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I do not think it is wise for a member to start commenting on how many members there are in the House of Commons—

Mr. Knowles: Especially when there are only ten Liberals.

Mr. Paproski: Not only that. There are committees meeting and other places where members meet in the evening. That is something this young member should be aware of.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With due respect, this appears to be a routine that the House might better avoid on future occasions.

• (2010)

Mr. Lang: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I was about to say that I noticed the former minister of finance, the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) was here. I am glad he is here to participate in this debate. The energy critic for the Conservative party is here and I am glad to see his attendance during this very important debate.

In many ways this debate has followed a predictable course. On the one side, members of the NDP have been saying to the government it is not doing enough; we need more government intervention so we should nationalize industry. The position the New Democratic Party has taken on this question, as on many others, would leave our economy and our deficit in such bad shape there would be no way we could support the social programs the New Democratic Party is so fond of trying to take credit for.

Mr. Knowles: You read that part before five o'clock.

Mr. Lang: Members of the New Democratic Party are very fond of trying to take credit for these social programs.

Mr. Knowles: You read that before five o'clock. We have already heard it.

Mr. Lang: In response to the hon. member let me say that I think it is worth while repeating. Members of the New Democratic Party have been trying to take credit for many of the programs previous Liberal governments have put forward. As you know, Mr. Speaker, the vast majority of our social programs have been put forward by Liberal governments. I think it is important, with all due respect to the hon. House leader of the New Democratic Party, that we discuss this and bring this fact to bear.

We have seen some facts brought forward by members of the Conservative party which suggest members of that party take the side of the little guy. The posturing of the Conservative party with regard to their rhetoric of concern for the little guy I find difficult to understand, particularly in view of the fact that one year ago last Thursday the same group of members put forward a budget which contained no social measures and no social concern at all. If they are so concerned about the little guy then why did that Conservative government introduce a budget that would have cost the consumer $40 billion more than will the Liberal budget and its energy policy?

Mr. Knowles: Haven't you got any new pages to that speech?

Mr. Lang: Hon. members opposite talk about their energy tax credit. The Liberal energy program will save the consumers 12 times more than the Conservative energy tax credit. In light of that budget of one year ago, for which most of the Conservative members here voted, I really find it hard to understand how these individuals, particularly the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Crombie), can now talk in such a self-righteous manner about protecting the little guy. When one looks at the facts—

Mr. Taylor: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. What has this to do with the bill we have under discussion? In addition, the hon. member has already said all that this afternoon.

Mr. Lang: That is obviously not a point of order, Mr. Speaker, but a point of debate or an attempt to interrupt. I would be glad to enlighten the hon. member as to my reason for mentioning this. The hon. member for Rosedale has been continually trying to posture and present the concern of your party for the little man when in actual fact in your budget there were no measures at all, none whatsoever—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I would invite the hon. member to address his remarks to the Chair.

Mr. Lang: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I want to enlighten the hon. member about his concern as to why I was putting forward this discussion about social welfare. In light of the fact that when that hon. member's party presented a budget containing no measures whatsoever for the little guy. The hon. member for Rosedale—

An hon. Member: You have said that three times.

Mr. Lang: It is worth saying ten times, Mr. Speaker. That party is trying to present itself as a party with concern for the little man yet that is the party that presented a budget which socked it to the consumers and had no concern at all for the little guy.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I recognize the hon. member for Saskatoon West (Mr. Hnatyshyn) on a point of order.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: May I have order, please?

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, I think the record should be made clear that while the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Crombie) may be small he is a lot larger than that speaker.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With all due respect, that is not a point of order.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I am glad you have seen that this is not a point of order. It seems that when the truth is spoken hon. members opposite get a little excited and try to interrupt debate with their frivolous points of order.

An hon. Member: You are the guy that is yelling.

Mr. Lang: I would like to make a point. Let us examine the track record. Let us see who put through social programs in this country.

Mr. Taylor: We are not talking about social programs. Get on the right bill.

Mr. Lang: This bill is concerned with the energy policy being put forward in Canada today. That has a lot to do with the social programs in place today, because this energy policy has much to do with our economy and much to do with the financial stability of the national government and its capability of financing social programs.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: There have been a number of so-called points of order which have not really been points of order. I recognize the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock-North Delta (Mr. Friesen).

Mr. Friesen: Have I ever raised a point of order that was not a real point of order, Mr. Speaker? I wonder whether the hon. member would permit a question?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, if hon. members opposite would stop their frivolous points of order I would attempt to speak on this policy so they might be enlightened. I will try to clear up their confusion. If the hon. member still has a question at the end of my discussion I will be happy to answer it.

We should look at the facts. The hon. member for Rosedale and a number of other members in the opposition have been trying to make the point that this government does not have a social conscience, as seen by its energy policy and its budget. For a new member of Parliament, a backbencher such as myself, it is very difficult to sit back and listen to this kind of posturing and rhetoric particularly when one knows the track record. Let us look at the track record. What social programs were contained in the budget presented one year ago last Thursday by the hon. member for St. John's West? I suggest that in fact there were none.

What social programs have the loyal opposition put forward? What social programs of significance has that party put forward? I suggest it has put forward none at all. What is the track record of this party in government? We have old age security, we have the guaranteed income supplement.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The Chair is reluctant to call on the rule of relevance, but the bill before us is Bill C-48 and I would like the hon. member to address his remarks to that bill.

Mr. Lang: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I am aware that you did not have the opportunity of hearing the first 15 minutes of my speech during which time I tried to outline the purposes of the legislation and the main elements contained in it. I have been trying to deal with criticisms put forward by the loyal opposition on the National Energy Program and on Bill C-48 during the question period and during the debate in the House. This is why I have been trying to express these social concerns that are relevant to the energy and economic policies of this government. I do think this is relevant although I am aware you were not here for the first part of my speech and would not have heard those remarks.

As I was saying, past Liberal governments have introduced old age security, the guaranteed income supplement, the Canada Pension Plan, family allowances and many other social programs.

An hon. Member: What about oil and gas?

Mr. Taylor: What bill are you talking about?

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Give us the number of it.

Mr. Lang: Is the hon. member suggesting this is not a serious bill?

An hon. Member: What you are talking about is not serious.

• (2020)

Mr. Lang: If hon. members opposite had been here in the afternoon, they would have heard about it.

Mr. Paproski: We were here.

Mr. Lang: I will go on to the next topic. The oil and gas industry in Canada is in good financial shape. Between 1977 and 1979 the petroleum monitoring agency reported that the industry's cash flow increased by 67 per cent in two years. A further increase of one-third is projected for 1980. In 1981 it is estimated that including the incentive payments the industry's cash flow will rise over and above that of 1980 by 7 per cent. Even if one excludes those incentive payments, the industry's 1981 cash flow is expected to be 28 per cent higher than in 1979. The government's pricing and revenue-sharing arrangements are tied very closely to our thrust toward energy self-sufficiency and to the process of Canadianization.

In terms of security of supply we in Canada are in a fortunate position compared with those who rely heavily on imported oil. We produce more energy than we consume in terms of hydroelectric power, thermal energy and natural gas.

Our problem is one of substituting for the oil we currently use other energy sources that we have in relative abundance. One of the chief substitutes will be natural gas since we have a surplus supply, and to allow the vast majority of Canadians the opportunity to switch over from oil the government will be extending pipeline service to Vancouver Island, Quebec and the maritimes. Half a billion dollars has been earmarked for this purpose. To encourage the process, as we all know, the price of oil will be allowed to rise so that other fuels will be attractive on the basis of price alone. The objective is to reduce the use of oil in the residential, commercial and industrial sectors in every province to no more than 10 per cent of the energy total. To follow through on its drive to get us off oil, the National Energy Program's Canadian oil substitution program is proof of the government's commitment to energy self-sufficiency and security of supply. Increases in oil and gas prices are also important to generate the funds necessary to develop our more expensive heavy oil, oil sands, tertiary oil and tar sands.

Canadianization remains a vital element in the government's strategy. Oil and gas revenues from now until 1984 are expected to be in the range of $90 billion. To expect the federal government to take a back seat in sharing the revenues is clearly unrealistic based on our national responsibilities. Further, the vast majority of Canadians favour the government's commitment to at least 50 per cent Canadian ownership of oil and gas by 1990. This involves increased Canadian control of a significant number of oil and gas firms and a greater portion of the oil and gas sector being owned by the Government of Canada and the people of Canada. Fair prices, secure supply and increased Canadian participation in the oil and gas industry will cause benefits to rebound through our entire economic system. If we look at virtually any sector of the economy, we will find that the benefits are evident. A sensible price for oil and gas combined with the substitution program minimizes the effect that massive price increases would have on our economy. A one dollar per barrel oil increase adds an estimated half a percentage point to the inflationary rate. If we were to let prices rise indiscriminately toward the international price level, consumers would have to spend more on energy and would have less income to spend on goods and services. Thus, there would be less demand in our economy and, hence, lower economic growth and increased unemployment. This is what would have happened if this party had allowed the budget of one year ago last Thursday to go through.

An hon. Member: We did not do it. We stood firm.

Mr. Lang: The Liberal party did stand firm. We did not allow higher unemployment and higher inflation. We did not allow oil prices to go toward world prices, which would have been the result of the budget of December, 1979.

The National Energy Program creates a climate for less inflation, less unemployment and greater economic growth than the Tory budget and so-called energy policy would have allowed. It was a two-bit budget. A bit of it was devoted to an 18-cent increase, which would have socked it to the consumer. Another bit of it was devoted to an insignificant amount paid back in the form of an energy tax credit.

Mr. Siddon: This is Bill C-48.

Mr. Lang: Our National Energy Program is aimed at economic strength for all sectors in the economy. It is aimed at strength for the lumbermen of British Columbia, the ranchers and oilmen of Alberta—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lang: —the prairie farmers of Saskatchewan and Manitoba, the resource and manufacturing industries of Ontario and Quebec and the farmers and fishermen and other industries of Atlantic Canada.

An hon. Member: Ours was a Canadian budget.

Mr. Lang: In conclusion, the National Energy Program is vital to our economic future. In an age of uncertainty it is a national game plan which provides for energy security and economic security through an off oil conservation process, development of our natural resources and alternate renewable energy resources through incentive programs.

Mr. Taylor: Louder. That is a pretty weak point. Pound your desk.

Mr. Lang: It shares the wealth for the total benefit of all Canadians. It allows the private sector and the provinces a fair share of the wealth and permits the west to develop its resources and to industrialize. It is a major program which will affect all Canadians. It is similar in many ways to other great Canadian endeavours of the past. I refer to the trans-continental railway, the St. Lawrence Seaway and the interprovincial pipeline.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: What about double tracking?

Mr. Lang: In addition, it highlights the same aspects of sharing and co-operation which we have come to know and expect in Canada such as the two-price system for wheat and, up until 1973, the two-price system for copper in Ontario. Every Canadian has a role to play in the National Energy Program and a benefit to be gained from it. Such a role might be switching off oil, improving one's home insulation, investing in a Canadian company or actively practising conservation.

Hon. members opposite have been raising many objections and criticisms, but when we look at the facts we find that there is not much substance to what they have said. I would very much like the hon. member for Etobicoke-Centre (Mr. Wilson) to clear up with his leader whether his leader agrees with him that the energy policy of this country is the responsibility of the national government or of the provinces. I would like him to clear this up because I have heard him say that it is the responsibility of the national government, but I do not hear the same thing from the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark).

Mr. Siddon: That does not mean steal the resources from the provinces.

An hon. Member: You should worry about your leader!

Mr. Lang: We have natural resources in this country, we have technology and we have people. We have a grand future with respect to energy and with respect to our economy. I think a little optimism more directly based on facts would be appropriate in this House.

Mr. Friesen: Mr. Speaker, Sean O'Sullivan used to say, "It's a Lang, Lang way to trick the prairies." I think we have seen that again tonight. The hon. member said he would entertain a question at the end of his speech. Earlier in the evening the hon. member quoted statistics—

Some hon. Members: Question!

Mr. Friesen: I am coming to my question. The hon. member quoted statistics indicating that only 40 per cent of the drilling equipment was operating in 1975, five years ago, whereas some 80 per cent or 85 per cent is operating today. He made the point that that is a growth factor as a result of the government's policies. Is the hon. member aware that in 1974 this government brought down a budget which made rigs pull out in 1975? The government is doing the same thing now, and the hon. member is trying to make that look like a growth factor. Did he deliberately mislead the House, or was he just ignorant?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I will treat that question in the best way I can. It is obviously not a question. It is an attempt to misrepresent the facts. I have never stated that it was a policy of the government which resulted in an increased percentage of rigs being employed in Alberta.

● (2030)

I think it was the policy of the government, plus the entrepreneurial spirit of the oil and gas industry in Alberta and in the rest of the west. It was the work of the individual people in the oil and gas industry, members of the labour unions. It was all those elements which resulted in success, as well as the fact that Canada has natural resources. The hon. member does not have a concern. He is trying to misrepresent facts. I have presented facts, which were presented—

An hon. Member: By research assistants.

Mr. Lang: No, Mr. Speaker, I presented facts which I gathered from my trips out west, from Bob Blair the president of Nova, from Bob Pierce, vice-president of Nova, from Bill Hopper of Petro-Canada and from Bill Richards, the president of Dome Petroleum. I obtained these figures from people who are involved in the oil and gas industry. These are facts, not just opinions and bellicose rhetoric. I hope I have enlightened the hon. member, Mr. Speaker.

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I am hoping tonight to appeal to the intelligence of central Canada, but my task looks formidable after listening to the last speaker, the hon. member for Kitchener (Mr. Lang). If the heat is too great, he should get out of the kitchener.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, let me speak for a moment on the budget of December 11. We are not bringing it up, it is the hon. gentleman opposite who did so. It is irrelevant now who was defeated, and it was unfortunate for Canada that it was.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: The hon. gentleman said that there was no social content in the budget of December 11. This is the budget which had the energy tax credit to help lower-income Canadians meet the inevitable higher costs of energy. The budget of October 28 does nothing for lower and middle-income Canadians. I do not have to give my own authority for the budget of December 11. In the Canadian Tax Journal—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Kitchener (Mr. Lang) rises on a point of order.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) says that I am bringing up the previous budget. This is what has been coming from the opposition since this Parliament was presented with the last budget.

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. This is a point of debate, not a point or order.

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, we only have to look at the Canadian Tax Journal, volume II, issue 2, put out by the Osgoode Hall Law School and the Canadian Council of Social Development to see their analysis of the budgets of the last ten years in the 1970s. I will send the hon. member a copy, although I do not know if he can read these kinds of articles. He will see the conclusion there that the Crosbie budget of December 11, 1979, was the most progressive in the last ten years, and it was the most progressive because, for one reason, of the energy tax credit. The article says that it changed the flow of income for the first time in ten years from upper and middle-income Canadians to lower-income Canadians. That is what the budget did and that is what hon. gentlemen opposite voted against, and that is what the hon. gentlemen to our left voted against, the political nymphomaniacs who cannot wait to rush into bed with the Liberals every chance they get. That is what they voted against, the most progressive budget of the 1970s.

I will not spend any more time on the hon. member for Kitchener. He said the Liberal party stood firm. The Liberal party has never stood firm in its life. It is the party of vaseline, it is the slipperiest party that Canada has ever seen, it is a party of flexibility. They are so flexible that their principles have flexibility. They are the original India-rubber men and women. They will double track the railway, we heard last January from the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), and all they have done is to doublecross the country!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to appeal tonight to people of reason. There may be a few on the opposite side, but I am not worried about the opposite side. I am speaking to the people of Canada who watch this House on television.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: We are opposing this bill, Mr. Speaker. Why? Because it is part of a process that threatens Canada as a viable, continuing democracy.

There are three things necessary for a viable, functioning democracy. The first is that we have an effective parliamentary system which keeps the government and the executive accountable. We no longer have that. We can see that in this House when we hear the jackasses braying whenever their masters on the government side tell them to bray. We have committees in this House that have no power, that have to haul the government by the sleeve to ask a question. This House no longer has any independent power. So long as there is a majority, the House will have no power, and so long as this majority is slavishly devoted to keeping their noses and their mouths in the trough of patronage, and keeping the government in power, there will never be any—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The Chair has been listening attentively and would again like to call attention to the fact that we are debating Bill C-48. I invite the hon. member to address his remarks to the bill.

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, if you will be patient with me, I am just about to elaborate that point. We have before us Bill C-48 and we see in it why the House has no power. Just look at page 1 of Bill C-48 where you will see that:

"allowable expenditures" means expenditures made in relation to an interest that are approved by the minister;

The minister has total power under this bill, not the House. Then let us look at page 8, clause 20, where you will see why this House has no power, why this Parliament is as ineffective as a tame tabby, a toothless, tame tabby, a pussycat without any claws. That is what this House is. Let us look at page 8, clause 20, which reads:

The governor in council may make regulations for determining the level of Canadian ownership for the purposes of this act—

It is not this House. There is no one in the oil and gas industry today who knows what the governor in council will decide tomorrow, or next week on what will be the criterion for Canadian ownership. This House has no say because the government has a blind, tame majority, interested in nothing but keeping themselves in power.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: Let us just go on to look at clause 22, which reads:

Where it appears to the minister that a matter relating to the Canadian ownership rate cannot reasonably by determined by applying the applicable regulations or rules in any case or class of cases, he may make the determination or authorize it to be made in accordance with such criteria as he considers appropriate.

Is this what will govern the oil and gas industry in Canada in the future, with all the power in the hands of the minister? Who is the "he" in the clause? It is the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde). He is the one who will have the control in the future over the rules that decide whether or not you are Canadian-owned. Tomorrow he can say it is 48 per cent, or 55 per cent, or 30 per cent, or 75 per cent. Can you wonder that the oil and gas companies are leaving this country in droves? The reason is that this Parliament is no longer effective because all the power has been given to the minister and to the government. I will not go on much longer reading clauses in this bill but there are 100 instances there. Just look at clause 45 to see if this carries on throughout the act. Clause 45 reads:

The minister, at any time after making a declaration of significant discovery, may order the drilling of a well—

The minister? What does the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources know about the drilling of wells? He knows as much about that as he knows about drilling a tooth. He has the responsibility under this bill for ordering where a well is going to be drilled. On and on it goes through this act. You think that as members of Parliament you decide? You no more decide than Mickey Mouse decides what goes on in the government. Clause 46(1) reads:

Where the minister is satisfied that a commercial discovery has been made on Canada lands, he may, by order subject to section 56, make a declaration—

It goes on like that throughout this bill. So, Mr. Speaker, one of the three safeguards of democracy has gone. This Parliament is no longer a safeguard for democracy and the bill before us exemplifies that. What is the second safeguard needed for a democracy? It is a division of powers in a federal state between the federal government and the provinces. That will go if the government's constitutional proposals ever get through to the United Kingdom and get passed in the United Kingdom. No longer will we have a federal system in this country. Who do I quote for my authority? I quote Sir Wilfrid Laurier, back in the days when they had Liberals who had some principles and guts. They do not have them any longer. Sir Wilfrid Laurier was one of the few good Liberals. He said this:

The only means of maintaining confederation is to recognize that within a sphere assigned to it by the constitution, each province is as independent of control by the federal Parliament as the latter is from control by the provincial legislatures.

● (2040)

Well, that goes out the window if the constitutional proposals are passed. That goes out the window if these energy proposals ever effectively become law in this country, because they can only effectively become law by crushing the province of Alberta and the western provinces. That will terminate and end this country. So, Mr. Speaker, there is the second safeguard of democracy that the Trudeau administration is determined to block out with its constitutional proposals and its energy proposals.

The third safeguard of democracy is to have a viable, strong, operative private sector. That is what is necessary for a viable democracy. Where you do not have a private sector you have no democracy. You have no democracy in Russia. You have no democracy in China. You have bills of rights, charters of rights, the rights are coming out of your ears in those countries. But do you think anybody has a right to anything in those countries? Not at all. Why not? Because they have no economic base from which they can exercise rights. It exists not only in those countries but in Chile and in many other countries. What is happening in this proposal and in the others of the energy policy? A savage smash and grab raid on the private sector of this country starting with the oil and gas industry. It is a massive interference by the state, a massive interference by the bureaucracy into the most free enterprise, the most risk-taking of all the industries we have in Canada—the oil and gas industry. An industry where you have to go looking. You look at a hundred thousand square miles and you say: I am going to put a well down here. That is not the decision of some bureaucrat here in Ottawa. They do not know where the hell to put a well. No, that is the decision of the people who are putting up millions of dollars and hundreds of thousands of dollars. They have to use their brains and the instincts they have gained from 20, 30, 40 years of scrabbling in the wilderness—the geologists, it is they who decide where to put the well. Now, hereafter, they will be put under the jurisdiction of Mr. Lalonde and the bureaucrats as functionaires. They will tell him where he is going to put his well and what he will get if he puts his well there. They will say: If you put your well here we will give you a grant in the frontier or the Beaufort Sea, but if you put your well here we won't give you a grant. Before, with the system of depletion allowances everybody knew where he stood. "All right, you go and drill your well. You will get a certain amount of depletion and you will get certain benefits. You will receive help from the system." You made the decisions. But from now on, when this is passed, that will be no longer. No, some functionaire from the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources will tell you: "You put your well here, brother, where I tell you and then you might get a grant." That is, if he does not decide, when you come back looking for your grant later on, that you are not 50 per cent Canadian-owned, you are only 49.6 per cent or only 49.99 per cent or you are only 74.5 per cent Canadian-owned. That is all to be decided by the civil service and the bureaucracy of this country. Do you wonder that they are bailing out, Mr. Speaker, that they are leaving this country in droves? What else does the government have to offer them? They have got the Hon. Herbie Gray and FIRA to offer to them. We are told the Foreign Investment Review Agency will supervise what goes on here with the foreign-controlled companies in the future. They will bring legislation before the House so Herbie can come in once you get into Canada and you invest your money. All right. You are found to be of significant benefit to Canada. That is not enough. No, now, in a year's time or two years' time, the Hon. Herbie Gray will come to look over your shoulder and say: You jerk, you do not know what to do with your own money. You are not doing the right thing here. This is not of significant benefit. I, Herb Gray, the great free enterpriser, the great expert in everything, am going to tell you how your business is to go in the future. You have got to get out of this country. That is what they are being threatened with. Now do you wonder, Mr. Speaker, why the dollar is weak? The dollar is not weak because of interest rates being higher in the United States and lower here in Canada. It is weak because anybody with any brains in their head can see that their money is not welcome in Canada. We are supplicants to the rest of the world as a result of 12 years of that government over there. We have had deficits in the balance of payments and current account for the last seven years. The minister estimates that this year it will be $6.2 billion—$6.2 billion we Canadians must get from outside Canada. We have to ask them to lend us the money. We have to ask them to invest the money in Canada. And this government here is flexing its muscles and saying: We do not want your money. That is what it is pretending to say: We do not want your money. If you put your money in here you will have to pass our tests and you will have to pass Herbie Gray. Is it any wonder the dollar is down? It is the lowest it has ever been in 47 years.

The hon. member for Kitchener had the gall, the audacity, the knee-jerkery to even mention my budget. When we look at what has happened since October 28, Mr. Speaker, what do we see? The Canadian dollar on October 28 was worth 85.22 cents. The Canadian dollar yesterday was worth 82.71 cents. I am not sure what it is today. That is a 47-year low. On the week ending March 5 you had to pay 114.25 cents to buy a U.S. dollar. Yesterday you would have had to pay 121.2 cents to buy a U.S. dollar. That is a difference of 7 cents Canadian. The Canadian dollar has lost 7 cents in value since the hon. gentleman opposite got into power last March. Do you know what that is costing us for oil today? Perhaps the public would be interested in knowing that it has cost us $109 million to date, because of the fall in the value of the dollar since the beginning of March, for the purchase of oil, for purchasing 425,000 barrels a day. And today, because of the drop in the dollar alone, it costs us a million a day more than it did last March through the mismanagement, through the mistaken policy, the blind inflexibility and the stupidity of hon. gentlemen opposite. And they do not even realize yet that $109 million to date is what it has cost us.

Look at interest rates, they were 11.6 per cent at the time of the budget. Now, the Bank of Canada has set the rate at 16.4 per cent to 17 per cent and it is going up again Thursday as surely as the hon. Mr. MacEachen gets up tomorrow to rub the sleep out of his eyes and wonder how he will survive another day with the responsibilities he has, which he does not want to accept. Just as surely as that will happen the interest rates will go up again next Thursday. Interest rates are 21 per cent in the U.S.; God knows what they will be here. The Economic Council of Canada, the government's own agency, says that because of the budget they have to put their inflation rate forecast for next year up from 10 per cent to 11.4 per cent. They have to put their unemployment forecast up from 8 per cent to 8.6 per cent. They have to reduce their real growth forecast from over 1 per cent real growth next year down to one half of 1 per cent. The government's own agency says this is the result of their study of the government's budget. Ye Gods, why is the minister not made to resign? Do hon. gentlemen opposite not read anything which is put out by the Economic Council of Canada? For example, "An Assessment of the Federal Budget on the Canadian Economy." Read it. What a document! And the hon. member dares to bring up my budget in this House. My God, he should never have done it. Just let him get this document and read it. Page four says that the federal budget impact reduces the growth rate in 1980 from—I am reading right from the government's document:

> minus 0.4 per cent to minus 0.6 per cent. Using the budget projections for energy investment further lowers the growth rate to minus 1.1 per cent.

That is what the budget did to their forecast. The differences in 1981 are also clear. The assessment goes on:

> Adding the alternative energy investment assumptions of the Department of Finance further reduces the growth rate to .5 per cent.

This is the body that reports to the Prime Minister. He is guilty of criminal negligence for not firing out MacEachen.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: If the Prime Minister reads his own report to him from the Economic Council of Canada he would fire out the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) tomorrow. It is the most fantastic denunciation of the effects of the budget ever given by an independent government agency to a government.

Go on to page seven of the assessment. What does it say with respect to inflation? It says inflation is above 11 per cent because of the new projections. I read:

> This compares with the Department of Finance projection of 10.2 per cent.
> The general impact of the federal budget appears to be one which increases the rate of unemployment. The Prebudget Base Case suggests an unemployment rate of 8.0 per cent for 1981—

Remember the minister squirming here the other day in question period, trying to get around this. Their estimate was 8 per cent. I go on to read:

> —bur our budget alternatives show the unemployment rate lying between 8.2 per cent and 8.6 per cent.

This is as a result of the budget. And the document goes on and on to deal with the national expenditures, estimates and so on. It is a savage denunciation. Now get this, Mr. Speaker, at page 11. It says:

> —one of the hidden impacts of the federal budget is its compositional effect on savings. It will have a tendency to reduce the percentage of savings accruing to provincial governments, the corporate sector, and the personal sector, and at the same time to decrease the proportion of dis-savings or increase the proportion of savings accruing to the federal sector.

It will change the whole nature of Canada. It will take savings from the personal sector, the private sector, the provinces and transfer them to the federal government. It is a massive attempt at a power grab by the Canadian government. If the Minister of Finance had the courage and the conviction of a garrotted gerbil, he would resign tomorrow. He is worse than a castrated lemming today, he is a garrotted gerbil. Every possible avenue of escape for the minister has been eliminated. It is a most a savage experience, it is a—

● (2050)

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The Chair is listening to the hon. member and having some difficulty relating his remarks to the bill which is before us.

Mr. Crosbie: What is the effect, Mr. Speaker, of this bill on the market economy in the private sector? I have been outlining how, under this bill and the other bills which will come with it, the government is attempting to amass and concentrate power from the provinces, the private sector to Ottawa and from the Canadian people. That is what this bill does. I have outlined three reasons why I and my party are against this bill and why we will fight it and every piece of legislation that accompanies it to the last dot and comma as it goes through this House.

Although nothing could be more convincing than those three reasons, there is still a fourth reason. On page one, clause two of the bill, it reads:

"Canada lands" means lands that belong to Her Majesty in right of Canada—

And what does that include? It goes on to say:

(b) those submarine areas adjacent to the coast of Canada and extending throughout the natural prolongation—

In other words, this bill assumes that all the offshore area off the east coast of Canada is Canada lands owned by the Government of Canada. I say that it is not owned by the Government of Canada.

Mr. Peterson: Why don't you take us to court.

Mr. Crosbie: If hon. members opposite think that there will be an Hibernia oil development, one whiff of gas from off Labrador or Newfoundland or one "tinch" of oil above a jar from that area while the Government of Canada pretends that it is Canada lands, they can think again because the people of Newfoundland and Labrador will not give up their only chance to be self-sufficient economically. Never.

The government of Newfoundland and Labrador will not bend or be flexible on this matter. It will be completely inflexible. We did not come into confederation in 1949 with a declaration in the terms of union that the resources were to stay with the province which would then hand them over to the federal government, no matter what the courts say. We do not care what the courts say. The Supreme Court of Canada can declare that under some technical, legal ground the ownership of that resource lies with the federal government, even though the ownership of resources under land lies with the provinces but offshore it lies, for some technical, legal, picayune reason, with the federal government. That will not solve the question at all. It is not a question of law, it is a question of justice, of what is right and fitting and the fact that Canada is a confederation.

If the provinces do not have resources, they have nothing. That is why we must oppose this bill—because it is an attempt to take away the resources owned by Alberta, the resources owned by Saskatchewan and the resources owned by British Columbia. I have a report from Ralph Hedlin Associates. It is a first class piece of work and I would like to quote from it.

He says that "The commercial centre has never wished to prejudice the west; it has just wished, in a too human way, to maximize the interests of the centre, but the west has suffered as a consequence". This bill is an attempt to take the resources back from Alberta and the west which they were given in 1930 after a tremendous struggle. What I do not understand is how hon. ladies and gentlemen opposite can be so blind. They were not blind when it came to Quebec. They seemed to get it through their skulls with respect to Quebec that the French Canadian minority there—

An hon. Member: A majority.

Mr. Crosbie: —a minority in Canada but a majority in Quebec. They felt that they would always be subject to the tyranny of an English-speaking majority in Canada and that their interests would not be recognized. This is what has been going on in Quebec for the past 40 years. Presumably the matter has been settled, largely in the past few years when this government finally understood that there was a problem. Now, I do not believe the French Canadian minority in Canada feels that it will be subject to the tyranny of the English-speaking majority.

The government fails to recognize that there is a minority in western Canada and a minority in eastern Canada which fear that they will always be subject to the tyranny to the central Canadian majority. The fear is no different from the fear of the French in Quebec. Just when the people in the west believe their day has come, they see central Canada, mobilized through the worst kind of political self-seeking by the experts in political self-seeking, the Liberal party of Canada elect, that Liberal party on a raw, crude basic appeal to central Canada to put them back in power so that they can keep the west from taking its rightful place in confederation and receiving rightful value for its resources.

Until the ladies and gentlemen opposite understand that the country is a "no show" and a "no go" with that kind of blind policy, we will be in desperate trouble. We will fight the government tooth and nail here in the House of Commons and on every stage in the country from St. John's to Vancouver. What did the Prime Minister say during the election campaign? He did not have to say much. He was lucky because he caught the swing of public opinion at a particular time. In another two or three months, the result would have been entirely different, but he was lucky in his timing.

Mr. Peterson: Don't condemn the electorate for your own failures.

Mr. Crosbie: The hon. member will not even have a look-in with the electorate next time because it is already sick of this government which fought and schemed to get into power, but has since done nothing to justify its winning the election. The Prime Minister said in Sudbury, Ontario on February 2, 1980, that "We, the Liberals, will not try to pit one province off against another. We will have responsible negotiations with the provinces and we will work out a price". That is the impression the Prime Minister tried to leave with the electorate. But ever since then, he has tried to pit one province against another. That has been his entire policy.

Our policy with respect to offshore mineral rights was contained in a letter of September 14, 1979, from the then Prime Minister Clark to Premier Peckford of Newfoundland. That letter outlined four principles, two of which were that the province of Newfoundland should own the mineral resources of the continental margin in so far as Canada could own them, that ownership and legislative jurisdiction would be consistent with and subject to the division of legislative competence as between Parliament and the provincial legislatures under the Constitution of Canada. The other two principles are that the Government of Canada would continue to have legislative jurisdiction in certain areas such as the environment, shipping and so on and that those principles would be confirmed by the signing of an agreement between the two governments and by appropriate legislative action and constitutional change.

A similar letter was sent to every coastal province in Canada. That is the "Magna Charter" of Newfoundland. That is the "Clark Magna Charter" for Newfoundland, and Newfoundland will accept no less. Confederation without this agreement will be a very dubious proposition and the government might as well get that right through their heads. It is a very tenuous proposition until the government recognizes that this is how it must be. Considering that Newfoundland is the poorest province in Canada with only 53.6 per cent of the earned income of the average Canadian and with unemployment insurance representing one-twelfth of all the personal income in Newfoundland as compared to one-fortieth in the rest of Canada, there is no way Newfoundland and Labrador will give up this opportunity. That is the way it is going to be, or it ain't going to be. That is the fourth reason why we are opposing this bill.

What principles should govern energy policy? Any energy policy in this country must be governed by two overriding principles. One is that if a proposal does not lead to self-sufficiency in oil sooner, then it should not be implemented at all. The second principle should be that if it does not contribute to national unity it should be a no show. Those are the two overriding principles, but they are not the principles which are contained in this bill or in the energy policy because Canada will never reach self-sufficiency in oil under the policies which have been put before us by the government.

And why not? We see it around us every day—the Alsands tar sands plant being cancelled by next June if the government does not change its policy because they cannot make a go of it with the present pricing regime. This is an $8 billion project. It could be completed by 1987 if the project starts in June. It could produce 147,000 barrels of oil a day if the project went ahead in 1987. But these projects, the oil sands and the tar sands plants, will not go anywhere unless the policy is changed. Take the $9 billion Cold Lake heavy oil recovery project. Imperial has stopped that. It would provide 140,000 barrels a day if it were completed. The present government has had to pony up $20 million of $40 million just to keep the engineers and support staff together while another few months go by to see whether the project will go ahead or not. The Judy Creek oil field $400 million advance recovery project would give 15,000 to 20,000 barrels a day of advanced or tertiary production. That project is now stopped. On and on the story goes. Oil drilling rigs and machinery are leaving the country in droves, Mr. Speaker. If we look at an analysis of capital investment for next year, we see, according to the Conference Board of Canada, a distinct drop in planned investment since the budget. Over all, 45 per cent of the respondents said government policy had an adverse impact on their capital spending. Higher interest rates affected another 35.5 per cent. Over 45 per cent of the respondents are having their investment decisions adversely affected by the government's energy policy. On and on it goes because the private sector can see there is no room for them in this game unless it is willing to put itself under the thumb of increasing state bureaucracy and control. The private sector companies are not the type of companies who will buckle down to that. They will buckle out before they buckle down.

On November 28, I sent a letter to the provincial treasurer of Alberta. He replied to my letter on November 30. We had an agreement in principle about what was to happen on energy pricing in Canada. We were not agreed on the form of the energy tax we were to impose to take all of the revenue from the oil and gas industry in excess of the revenue they would get from increases of $2 a barrel a year. We were not agreed on what kind of tax there would be. There were some minor disagreements such as that. Our policy was outlined in the budget and it was agreed to by them. If they did not agree with the rest of it, we could have imposed a unilateral solution, but it would not have endangered Canada because we had a large measure of agreement by then on the essentials, that is, on the most important things. We did not cause a crisis on confederation because we knew the susceptibilities of the west. We knew the west had to have a decent deal. We had to bend over backwards, just as the government opposite has had to bend over backwards in the past to satisfy other areas in the country. But this government across the way did not want an agreement with Alberta. This government wants to crush Alberta. It wants to use its powers to take over the tar sands. The government wants to use its disallowance power. The government wants to use the powers it undoubtedly has to crush Alberta. Well, to crush Alberta is a pyrrhic victory. There will be no tar sands plants. There will be no heavy oil plants. There will be no Judy Creek. There will be no offshore oil and gas when the government starts trying to crush Alberta and trying to crush Newfoundland, because those provinces will not be crushed. We will crush back. There will be no development. There can be no development in the tar sands. There can be no development at Cold Lake if the province of Alberta will not put up the infrastructure. The federal government can exercise its rights and get title, but how will the government be able to develop all of this if it cannot find a town and if there are no sewers, no pipes, no roads and no people because Alberta will not provide the infrastructure? I say, drop this nonsense. I say just drop the central Canadian smugness that you are so guilty of here. You should start to realize there are other parts of Canada and you will get a lot further with a conciliatory, reasoned approach than you will with the present overbearing approach that you are trying to take at the moment.

Mr. Paproski: Get rid of Marc Lalonde!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Would the hon. member please address his remarks to the Chair.

Mr. Crosbie: Yes, Mr. Speaker. This whole policy directs itself toward state ownership. It does not even provide opportunities to private Canadians to own more, it is for the state to own more. I want to read into the record two quotations for the benefit of my friends on the left, that noisy class, the political nymphomaniacs who are so anxious to jump into bed with the government majority. Here is what one of their former leaders, Mr. Tommy Douglas said in 1960, 20 years before he became a director of Husky Oil. This is what he said then:

It's possible to plan an economy without owning it.

I wish the neophytes on my left would understand that. You can plan the economy, you do not need to own it. Why do we want to own all the oil and gas companies in Canada and use tens of billions of dollars to buy assets which are already here in Canada. The assets are already here. We do not need to buy them. We control them anyway. Imperial Oil had to say they have to bow to the government. No one is mightier than Imperial Oil, yet it has to bow to the government. We do not need to own its assets. What we want to do is spend tens of billions of dollars creating new assets in Canada in the frontier areas, in the Beaufort Sea and off Newfoundland. We need to develop the heavy oils and the tar sands. The amount needed is $1.4 trillion over the next 20 years, according to the Royal Bank, of which we have to get $300 billion from outside of Canada. This is about $16 billion a year. Do you think, Mr. Speaker, that this kind of policy is the way to get $16 billion a year from outside of Canada? I say, some hope! You can forget altogether what you are trying to get from within Canada.

To come back to Tommy Douglas, Tommy Douglas was good back in 1960. He was sensible. He was a rational socialist; a contradiction in terms. But in 1971 he was just as sensible. In a discussion on the transfer of power to the federal bureaucracy from the provinces, he said the following in 1971:

Canadians do not want to escape from the clutches of big business only to fall into the clutches of big government.

Could anything be more sensible? Both of those principles, gentlemen and ladies on my left, are being violated by this document which is before the House tonight, and the others that will come in. The leader of that party is out. He is spouting the most errant nonsense. Thank God he is not doing it in the House. We have enough to fear here without fearing his foolishness in the House about buying up the three largest oil and gas companies and not paying them what the value is, just pay them what we say they are worth, and so on. That is the end of Canada as a repository for any investment from outside of this country. I recommend Tommy Douglas to you. I say, forget Mr. Broadbent. He is passé. Go back to reading Tommy Douglas and perhaps get some sense. We hope that you might have some sense.

I will not give just myself as an authority for some of these statements. I have dozens of other authorities I can offer. On December 13, 1981, in The Globe and Mail we can see the effect of this policy by reading the following under the heading "Alberta fears revenue losses".

The Alberta government could lose more than $400 million in provincial revenue from the sale of oil and gas licences next year—

The "Sale of exploration rights drops by almost half in Saskatchewan". That is the socialist paradise. It has had the boots put to it by this policy. Mr. Broadbent crawls on his hands and knees to try to get a little concession from the Prime Minister when he should be fighting for the rights of Saskatchewan. We read in The Globe and Mail of December 13 the following:

New federal taxes are unbearable for operating companies in Saskatchewan, where oil well production rates are lower than in other provinces, he said.

Who said that? It was the mineral resources minister John Messer. Who is he, hon. members might ask. He is an NDP minister in Saskatchewan. That is what he said, and the gentlemen here are supporting that kind of action in Saskatchewan. On this same page of The Globe and Mail for December 13 under the heading "B.C. oil, gas leases cut", we read:

Profit from the B.C. government's next sale of oil and gas rights will be drastically reduced because of the federal government's threat to impose resource development taxes—

That is just one example of the tremendous damage.

In another magazine, the Executive, Peter Cook, an economist, has written an article. I am being kind to the Minister of Finance and his budget compared to this impartial article in Executive magazine for December, 1980. What does Mr. Cook say? In part, his article reads:

What the government has clearly done is to create greater uncertainty about where the economy is headed in the next 18 months, and not just for the oil and gas industry. MacEachen has also, through his energy measures and tax changes, managed to push back the recovery from recession and promote inflation in the period ahead.

That is no John Crosbie. Some people might say I am partisan. I am not, but someone might say it. This is the impartial writer of this article. We read on:

The toughness and universality of the MacEachen measures will act as a further restraint on the consumer sector.

Hon. members might ask why. It is because no tax credits were provided to cushion the impact of rising energy prices for low-income families such as I proposed. Where is the member for Kitchener when he can learn something? He has scuttled off to the scullery somewhere, but he will not learn much there. The article continues:

The effect of the MacEachen budget has been to knock 0.5 per cent off growth in the economy for the whole year, bringing it down to the finance minister's own forecast figure of just 1 per cent.

The shock effect of food and energy prices will push the Consumer Price Index ahead by 11 per cent in 1981 (without the MacEachen energy and tax changes, the rate would have been 10 per cent).

• (2110)

You should drum him out. Get him at that Christmas party tomorrow night and drum him out before he does any more damage.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie:

The government's concern with ownership and taxation in the energy industry (rather than with the real issue of energy supply) is causing major projects to be stalled . . . Outlays by oil and gas companies were projected to about one-third of total business investment in 1981.

That's knocked on the head.

One estimate by Data Resources of Canada is that business investment will show no growth at all in 1981; before the budget, the firm was forecasting a 1.4 per cent advance.

In the history of Canada there has never been such an abortion of a budget, never a budget that has done so much damage to the economy. You don't have to take my word. I am just passing on the opinions of other respected economists.

Obviously, an increase in energy prices had to come at some point (though the disappointment is that, under the Liberals, it carries with it no promise that energy supplies will be increased).

Am I getting near the end of my time? In that case, I cannot go on with the other quotations. The scenario is a grim one. I recommend that all hon. members read it in the December 1980 issue of Executive. I say to members opposite, go to the Christmas party tomorrow night. Put MacEachen out, fire Lalonde and perhaps in this country we will then have a chance to get a rational and sensible solution to these problems.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: In conclusion, in introducing this bill, the minister said he was acting on principles of security, opportunity and fairness. There is no security in this bill for Canada, none at all. With this bill, there is no opportunity for anybody. There is no fairness. Gentlemen, for heaven's sake, go to your caucus and change this policy before it is too late.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to have this opportunity to say a few words on Bill C-48, the Canadian Oil and Gas Production and Conservation Act.

It was nice to see the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) in full flight tonight, with his very conciliatory and non-partisan approach and the bombastic rhetoric in which he excels. I certainly hope whoever is negotiating on behalf of the federal government, whether it be the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) or the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), with the Premier of Alberta or the energy minister of that province will be much more conciliatory than that in their presentation of the federal side. Otherwise, I am not sure we would ever reach an energy agreement.

If those discussions go forward in the next few months, I hope there will be agreement. I agree with most members of this House that an oil and gas pricing agreement is essential. Those of us who work on the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works are very aware of the urgency of getting on with the heavy oil and tar sands plants. We know that between $8 billion and $10 billion is involved in each of those projects along with seven or eight years lead time. From our discussions and presentations by Alsands and Esso Resources group last fall, we have learned this.

Many members on both sides of the House want to see those discussions get under way as soon as possible. They are not only in the interests of Alberta, but of all parts of this country. I am confident, with the conciliation and compromise, that we have seen over the past years in this country, it will be possible to reach an agreement.

In the 12 years I have been a member of this place, I have found that the higher up the level of government in terms of municipal, provincial or federal, the blame always ascends. Whether it is a small municipality not able to get a grant for a sewage treatment plant, or whether it is a problem with the provinces, the tendency is always to blame the higher level of government.

The federal government often gets lambasted for problems that may not be of its own making. It has to swallow its pride and get on with the job because it has a national responsibility. It cannot make the policy for only one part of the country. I believe the Prime Minister and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources wanted to reach an agreement last May, June and July when they met with representatives and the Premier of Alberta. There were a number of long negotiations and discussions. It may be argued that they were both coming at it from a different approach. Alberta certainly sees its resources as its own and believes it should have complete control right to the gas tank. The federal government is trying to balance the needs of the producing provinces, especially Alberta, Saskatchewan and British Columbia, against the needs of the consumers.

Every dollar added to the price of a barrel of oil represents a one half of one per cent increase in the consumer price index. We are facing the worst inflation since 1975, when wage and price controls were put on, with the 10 per cent rate this past summer.

Speaking on this bill a few days ago, the hon. member for Etobicoke Centre (Mr. Wilson) said we should be rapidly moving to 85 per cent of the world price. I do not know what he means by rapidly. When talking about a move to the world price, we are talking about at least a $20 increase which would represent an additional 10 per cent inflation over and above the 10 per cent we now have.

The federal government is mindful of that need to try to control inflation and think about the consumer as well as the producing areas. At the same time, we have high unemployment in this country. We are told by economists that every dollar added to the price of a barrel of oil represents a loss of 20,000 jobs. The oil producing areas will argue that if the price does not go up and the projects do not get rolling, we will lose jobs there. When we consider a dramatic $20 per barrel increase we are looking at between 300,000 and 400,000 jobs being lost because an oil price increase causes a drag on the economy. The federal government is trying to match the needs of the producing areas with the needs of the consumers.

I hope that a spirit of good will prevails in the negotiations when they get under way. We face a very serious time in this country because we are witnessing a polarization of the political parties such as we have never seen before. The governing party has no representatives west of the city of Winnipeg and the Progressive Conservative Party has only one representative from the province of Quebec. It is a time for responsible representation by the members of this House. It is very easy for opposition members from the west to exploit the situation and say the feds are trying to grab their resources. At the same time, it is easy for a Liberal government member from Ontario, Quebec or any of the eastern provinces to say Alberta is demanding too much. In such a situation, we have the two arguments by members, each supposedly a hero in his back yard. The problem will not be resolved in that way. There needs to be conciliation, serious consultation and discussion on this.

The bill before us tonight, C-48, is a very important part of the national energy program announced recently by the government. Regardless of what opposition members say, it is designed to reach some of the objectives set forth in that policy.

The three main things are to ensure the supply of oil and gas and its efficient utilization, and that is a part that often gets overlooked. Some say we cannot reach the target figure for reduction in consumption of oil during the 1980s, some 300,000 barrels a day as outlined in the program. That may be true, but I think it is worth a try. The kind of initiative announced by the minister last May when he said we have a scheme to upgrade the residual oil which is now either being used wastefully in many parts of eastern Canada or being sent out of the country to the United States is worth while. If upgrading of the residual oil were put in place, along with the other aspects of conservation and improved utilization, I think we would save something like 150,000 barrels a day, and that is the equivalent in production of a tar sands plant which would cost at least $6 billion, although the price of that is escalating up to $8 billion or $10 billion.

The second measure is designed to strike a degree of equity in pricing between the producing and consuming parts of our country. I have already mentioned that aspect. The program is also designed to provide a maximum opportunity for Canadians to participate in the oil and gas industry of our country; this bill looks toward that objective because it sees a major role for Petro-Canada. I want to deal with that in a little more detail later in my speech.

This bill will replace the Territorial Lands Act and the Public Lands Grants Act in respect of oil and gas rights. It will put in place a new oil and gas exploration and development regime for federal lands in the area north of 60 and in the offshore areas. These are areas to which we are looking for the future. Development may not come soon but the potential is surely there whether we are looking at the Arctic Islands or Hibernia offshore on the east coast, or other areas in the far north. This involves a massive region, some four million square miles in total.

The really important thing from the producers' point of view is that this bill will end the uncertainty which has existed. The old oil and gas regulations were withdrawn many years ago. The industry has rightfully been very concerned and disappointed that definite legislation was not put into place. I think it is really urgent that this bill be passed.

When the bill goes to the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works it is important that it be studied in great detail. The argument made by opposition members that the minister has too much power is one which I believe members of the committee will want to re-examine. They will want to make an examination to see whether that fear is real. Whether we are talking about ministerial power as it relates to failure to cause production to take place, or drilling to take place by Petro-Canada. Members will wish to assess whether those powers given to the minister are necessary. Certainly we will be looking at that aspect with an open mind in order to arrive at the best possible legislation not only for Canada but in the over-all context of the industry, and to ensure that production takes place. Nobody likes to be doing business with a government when the rules can be changed at someone's whim. There should be a firm legislative base from which to work.

The bill does a number of other things toward reaching the objectives of a national energy program. It will give the Crown a 25 per cent interest in all Canadian lands where production has not taken place other than for testing purposes before January 1, 1976. The bill requires a minimum of 50 per cent Canadian ownership before actual new production of oil and gas can begin, with such production licences to be valid for a ten-year period from the start of production.

The bill provides a new royalty system consisting of a basic 10 per cent royalty and an additional royalty of 40 per cent of net profits from each oil or gas field after the 25 per cent rate of return has been realized by the producer. The bill allows the Crown to order the drilling of a well following a significant discovery, and it allows the government to require oil and gas to be produced on federal lands by order if needed for use in Canada. The bill requires that information be made public in two years on exploration wells following the completion of the well. The measure contemplates a number of other actions relating to oil and gas exploration and development in the frontier and offshore regions of our country. It will also make amendments to the Oil and Gas Production and Conservation Act which will make tougher safety and environmental management provisions for frontier oil and gas activities, including a provision for absolute liability on the part of operators for any possible pollution damage.

The legislation is designed to promote exploration for frontier oil and gas and to ensure that holders of oil and gas rights get on with the exploration of their holdings to create maximum new oil and gas reserves for Canada.

It is designed to promote frontier oil and gas exploration and will be supplemented by the new system of incentives called the Petroleum Incentives Program which will promote Canadian ownership and help smaller companies, especially those which do not have a big write-off base. They will have this incentive program and it will be especially helpful to Canadian companies.

With this bill geological and geophysical information will be made public earlier than in the past, thus promoting exploration by interested parties who would not otherwise have access to this knowledge.

The National Energy Program foresees a gradual rise in the price of oil during the next four to five years, with a more rapid rise during the last half of this decade. Thus it would provide a period for the country to adjust our lifestyles and our economy to the higher energy prices which will be coming our way during the last part of this decade. So, during the first four or five years of this decade we will see a doubling in the prices proposed. During the last half we will see a doubling again, so in effect we get a quadrupling of the price of oil, and that is likely a minimum. It provides during that gradual build-up period for a mechanism to reduce the use of oil. It allows the consumer to adjust by improving insulation in his home. CHIP program funding has been increased from $80 million per year to $260 million. It provides a system of incentives for the home owner and for business to convert away from oil to natural gas, to wood, to electricity and to solar heat. There will even be legislation in this session to ensure that the auto makers meet special standards in order that drivers can experience better gas mileage.

• (2130)

As we work through the first three or four years of this decade, we will adjust to a reduced use of oil in our lifestyles. This reduced use will be the result, we hope, of conservation and conversion from oil to natural gas. Right now in the province of Alberta the consumption of oil in residential, commercial and industrial applications is some 5 per cent. The target of the government is a 10 per cent maximum use of oil in commercial, industrial and residential use during the course of this decade. If we could reach that target, we could save 375,000 barrels of oil a day. Part of the strategy for moving away from the heavy use of oil is to bring the consumption of oil in residential, commercial and industrial uses down to that target of only 10 per cent. The province of Alberta is already at the 5 per cent level. Surely we in the rest of the country can move toward that and save our country literally millions of barrels of oil every year and at the same time avoid the tremendous cost of constructing tar sands and heavy oil plants.

The message is very clear. In the National Energy Program we have a period of three or four years to get off oil, but the price is definitely going up.

The price of oil will quadruple. If crude oil costs $16.75 today, it will cost about $70 a barrel by the end of this decade. Hopefully we will adjust our consumption of it dramatically during the first three or four years when the price does not increase so steeply.

Likewise, the moderate increase in the price of oil during the three or four years of the National Energy Program is important to our economy generally because there is a recession in the United States. There is no growth in our economy. If we impose dramatically high energy prices on the Canadian economy at this time, we will see our country go into a recession. We will see higher unemployment, higher inflation and so forth, so I think that aspect of the National Energy Program with respect to a moderate increase in the price of oil during the first three or four years is important because we still have a large number of young people coming into the labour force. This will be especially the case during the next three or four years. Surely the jobs created for hundreds of thousands of young people during the last six years since the OPEC crisis of 1973-74 would not have come about in such a dramatic way in Canada if we had not sheltered the Canadian economy from the fifteenfold increase in the world price of oil which has shellshocked every western economy.

During the late 1960s and the 1970s the Canadian labour force grew by 50 per cent, from some 6.7 million people to about 11 million today. Responding to the rapidly increasing number of people coming out of schools and the increased participation by women in the labour force we experienced the highest rate of job creation in the western industrialized world. The German economy and other economies are mentioned by members in the opposition, but if we look at that period during which Canada experienced a 50 per cent rate of growth in the labour force, we find that countries like West Germany actually experienced decreases in their labour forces. They did not have to keep their economies growing as fast as we did during that period. During the period from 1973 to 1980 I do not believe the Canadian economy actually did go into a recession whereas most other economies did. Part of that was due to the fact that we were able to moderate increases in energy prices.

Even in the price of food and in the price of diesel fuel proposed in the budget of last December 11 compared with the situation under the National Energy Program we see a dramatic difference. For an agricultural producer, whether he is in western Canada, Ontario, Quebec or the maritimes, using some 6,000 gallons of diesel fuel a year, the average difference in cost of diesel fuel over the next four-year period will be some $2,000 per year. This represents either a considerable hardship for the agricultural producer who has to take that out of his profit, or a considerable cost to be passed on to the consumer. That is another reason we suggest a moderate increase in the price of energy during the next three or four years or the first half of this decade.

That same pricing problem would have affected municipalities, which would have had to pay higher excise taxes and higher energy costs under the previous budget. The same would have applied to loggers, northerners and others using diesel fuel.

Doubtless the opposition will be very opposed to one provision in Bill C-48, under which there would be a carried interest to the federal government of 25 per cent with respect to federal lands. I am sure their animosity will grow when opposition members see that that provision might be exercised by Petro-Canada on behalf of the people of this country. Those of us who were here in 1975 remember how hard the Tories opposed the establishment of the national petroleum corporation. They forecast doom and gloom for the industry if we were to establish such a corporation. Dozens and dozens of meetings were held in the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works. Hon. members opposite said that a national petroleum corporation was not needed, that it was too costly, that it would be harmful to the existing industry and that it would only deflect public attention away from our supply needs. There were better ways, in their opinion, to reach the goals set out in the Petro-Canada bill.

I invite hon. members to look at the comments made at the second reading stage of the Petro-Canada bill in the spring of 1975. Let us just consider this "demon" which the Tories seemed to see coming over the horizon in the spring of 1975 and compare it with what has actually happened in the first five short years of the life of this corporation. As is provided in this bill, some 25 per cent of the interest in new wells operated on Canada lands in the north and the east coast offshore will probably be held by Petro-Canada.

PetroCan is the largest Canadian petroleum corporation, and it is the only Canadian corporation in the big ten. All the rest are foreign owned. If the Tories had had their way at the time of the Petro-Canada bill, there would not be a single Canadian company among the big ten petroleum companies in Canada.

Petro-Canada is a fully integrated oil company which produces, refines and markets. Its assets approach some $4 billion today. It is the only Canadian company which has a stake—a 25 per cent interest, by the way—in the Hibernia oil discovery off Newfoundland. The hon. member for St. John's West was talking about that oil discovery. Petro-Canada is owned by the Canadian people, and its assets and benefits belong to the Canadian people. Surely that is worth while and desirable.

Besides, it is good that PetroCan will have access to information about wells so that it can judge accordingly and make the best stake in the east coast offshore which, after all, has a great potential for future energy discoveries. It is good to have a petroleum corporation which has a large piece of the action there. Likewise, the Sable Island discovery of natural gas which we hope to see proven in the coming year, has great potential. PetroCan has taken a very active part in that venture. I think it is safe to say that the interest it has shown and the capital investment which PetroCan has put into that project have moved up the discovery by a few years at least. If that discovery is proven, the impact on Nova Scotia and on all the maritime provinces will be tremendous in the years ahead. From being an energy deficient area in terms of natural gas, it will become a source of natural gas. Likewise, in the Arctic islands, PetroCan and Panarctic have one of the largest investments of any Canadian-owned corporations. The initiative which Petro-Canada is taking in the Arctic islands project costing some $2 billion to ship liquefied natural gas from the eastern Arctic by tanker is a tremendous research and development project. Not only will it provide us with an efficient transportation system from the Arctic islands, moving up incrementally as markets are developed, but they tell me that the spinoff technology for transportation of other valuable minerals in the Arctic will equally be of value. This benefit will accrue to all Canadians through PetroCan, a corporation which the official opposition dramatically and vehemently opposed. I think they opposed it with even more vehemence than the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) showed when he opposed the national energy program tonight.

During the 1975 debate, speaker after speaker was vehement in his opposition to PetroCan. I am just suggesting some of the things which PetroCan has been able to do in a matter of only five years. It has a major stake as a partner in the Syncrude project. It is also doing research in heavy oils and the tar sands. As I said earlier, it will take an active part in upgrading the facility for residual oil in Montreal, gathering it together and processing it at a great saving compared to the cost of a tar sands plant. It will be participating in a heavy oil upgrading plant in Saskatchewan, probably taking a 50 per cent interest in that project which is estimated to cost at least $1 billion, giving us much more access to heavy oils in the Lloydminster area and other parts of the province. This represents a tremendous resource for the country, but we have to unlock the technology to make it happen. PetroCan is there working on behalf of all Canadians.

I think the most important thing about PetroCan is that it is an integrated oil company operating in all spheres of exploration, production and marketing. The revenues and the profits which are generated in the western basin from conventional oil are being spent on exploration and development in the risky areas of the far north and the east coast offshore. That is in marked contrast to the contortions the official opposition went through when they were the government. They were going to sell Petro-Canada although they knew Canadians did not want that. So they backed off. Then they proposed to sell just the parts which made money and keep the parts which did not make money. I knew, and so did the president of the Treasury Board in the previous cabinet, that that proposal would never see the light of day. Finally, they decided to keep some of it, to sell some of it and to give some of it away. And ultimately they did not have to make any decision because the government was defeated.

I think Canadians across the entire country support to concept of Petro-Canada. They want to see projects such as the Arctic islands project go forward. In contrast to what the official opposition said in 1975, Petro-Canada has operated very well with the private sector. As a matter of fact, practically every one of their projects that I can think of operates on a joint ventures basis. What I find interesting, Mr. Speaker, is that one gets the impression that the private sector likes to have PetroCan taking part in its projects. If you look at the Sable Island drilling, if you look at the activity in the far north and the experience of Panarctic, you find that the private sector seems to work very well with PetroCan. I cannot cite the exact number, but I know that a large number of projects is being undertaken by PetroCan together with Nova, a major petroleum corporation in Alberta, possibly involving one of the various pipeline projects in which they are engaged. Opposition members said they would never be able to do that. So I think their vehemence against the national energy program now may be like their vehemence against PetroCan in 1975. As the program is developed and the bills go through the House and through the committee, I believe we will see their attitude change. There may be differences of opinion as to the actual price of a barrel of oil in any one year, but I think the broad outlines of this bill and the program are good because we are moving toward greater Canadianization, not just because it sounds nice but because we know that if the value of the reserves in western Canada now is a hundred billion dollars, by the end of this decade the price of oil will quadruple and the value of those reserves will be $400 billion. We know that if they continue to be mainly American owned, as they are now, to the extent of 71 per cent and 82 per cent being controlled by foreign companies, which are mainly U.S. companies, then we will have to pay dividends and interest to the United States, whereas if they are owned mainly by Canadians, those dividends will accrue to Canada and thus the balance of payments problem will be lessened.

So I think there is a great potential for this program. Bill C-48 will play a very important part in that development because Canadian lands in the north and off the east coast have a great potential. Therefore, I hope the bill will be passed on second reading and sent to the committee where a detailed study can be made of the complicated technical aspects of the bill. I hope members of the House will send this bill to committee.

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Mr. Speaker, in my remarks this evening and hopefully tomorrow I would like to expand on this concept of Canadian ownership which the party opposite tends to use so loosely, as if Canadian ownership, state ownership or citizen ownership are all one and the same thing. Indeed, they are not one and the same thing. I would also like to say to the hon. member who has just resumed his seat that although we all respect that there is a place for Petro-Canada and a role for it in the future of Canada's energy development it is not a panacea. It has become a security blanket for the Liberal party, a promise as to how they will resolve all Canada's problems in the energy field in the future. I think the next few years will prove that recourse to Petro-Canada as a solution for all these problems will have been a wrong one.

It is most appropriate that we now have the opportunity to debate Bill C-48, because it gives us on this side of the House another opportunity to expand on the inherent dangers of the government's budget of October 28 and the implementation of the Petroleum Administration Act a few weeks ago. I believe these are actions which will have tremendous negative effects on energy development in this country and our potential to achieve energy self-sufficiency by the end of this decade. It is important, after some ten years of promises from the opposite side of the House, that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) has finally chosen to introduce legislation which will provide a new regime for the management of petroleum production on the so-called Canada lands, that is, the lands which we expect will bear large amounts of hydrocarbon energy in the frontier and offshore areas of Canada, the territories, the Arctic islands, the Beaufort Sea and off the Atlantic and Pacific coasts. However, the means to be used to this end give cause for serious concern. Indeed, on my part they give cause for alarm.

There must, indeed, be serious guidance from the Government of Canada in order to hasten the development of petroleum resources in these hard to reach and difficult to develop areas of our hinterland. But any policy of a government which does not hasten the development and accelerate the development of these resources will, in the long run, be detrimental to our national interests. This leads to what I consider to be the most important deficiency of Bill C-48. I believe we are now faced with a proposal which in all likelihood will inhibit rather than accelerate Canada's quest for oil self-sufficiency. I think that is the nub of the argument which my colleagues in the Conservative party have been offering. I would like to expand upon that point of view in my comments.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): They are not listening over there.

Mr. Siddon: They will have a little while to listen to me yet.

The long delay in providing an appropriate substitute for the Canadian oil and gas lands regulations is reprehensible indeed. But at least we now have a proposal to debate. I hope it will be a lengthy debate. It is my hope that the merits and pitfalls of this legislation will be scrutinized thoroughly in this House, as set out by my colleague, the hon. member for Etobicoke Centre (Mr. Wilson), and others who have followed him. I hope these pitfalls will also be scrutinized thoroughly at the committee stage before this bill is enacted in final form.

Mr. Speaker, I believe the committee should be calling expert witnesses from the petroleum industry and from the provincial governments, people who have decades of experience in managing petroleum resources. This is experience which the bureaucrats and politicians opposite lack—lack in spades. I believe that a number of important amendments would be required to this legislation if we in this party are to support it.

In a nutshell, four essential elements are lacking in this legislation and in the over-all energy program of the government. What we find is a lack of trust, a lack of co-operation, a lack of consultation and a lack of realism. With respect to trust, I believe that a trust has been violated by the way in which this bill proposes to deal with the privately-owned petroleum companies of Canada. It is all well and good for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources to say that the government is merely taking back something which it gratuitously gave by way of development incentives and depletion allowances to the industry over the years. But the means by which those interests are being reclaimed by the government are totally dishonest and immoral, as my colleague from Etobicoke Centre pointed out. The government's approach represents the breaking of a firm contract and as such it is an aspect of lack of trustworthiness which must make private industries in this country, not just the petroleum industry, shudder each night with anticipation of where this trend toward nationalization is leading our country.

Second, Mr. Speaker, there is little indication either in the government's energy program, the budget or this bill that the government has taken a co-operative approach with the industry in coming to grips with some of the quantitative questions which underlie the philosophy of this bill. I refer to a couple of quotes from the budget document. In the first paragraph on page nine of the October 28 budget speech the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) said:

> In the absence of changes in the fiscal regime, rising prices for oil and gas would generate inappropriate balance between governments.

Further down that page, in the fourth paragraph, the Minister of Finance said:

> The federal taxes reflect the capacity of the oil and gas industry to pay and bring its contributions more closely into line with what other industries are required to pay.

I submit the government has presented not one tot of evidence which shows that profits are excessive in relation to the risk which is required to develop petroleum resources in this country. It is most untimely and improper of this government to take a position of distrust toward the petroleum industries of Canada and, indeed, to refuse to co-operate with them in seeking their guidance and consulting with them as to their operating economics before producing a piece of legislation such as this bill.

Third, Mr. Speaker, in the area of consultation, it seems a travesty to me that experts within the industry are held in an atmosphere of mistrust rather than in an atmosphere of confidence as being able to provide insights, knowledge and experience, which government bureaucrats in Ottawa definitely lack.

This leads to another of my concerns, the lack of realism on the part of the government opposite and its bureaucratic socialistic advisers—lack of realism in the department, because they do not sit down and total the figures and consider that in the national interests of developing our much-needed high risk resources in the offshore and frontier areas, we must have competition and reward risk with a proper return on investment.

May I call it ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker? I would like to resume my remarks tomorrow.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT—JOB-CREATION PROGRAMS—POLICY OF DEPARTMENT

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, on December 10 in response to a question to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) concerning the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Roberts), who also serves as the Minister of State for Science and Technology, the parliamentary secretary pointed out a few things which are not usual in this House. I am not sure who will respond this evening, as I do not see either the Minister of the Environment or his parliamentary secretary in the chamber, but I would like to relate to the House exactly what did take place.

I quoted from a news release dated November 17 put out by the Department of the Environment which stated in part:

> Mr. Roberts pointed out that Canada faces a similar energy dilemma to that of the United States. "We, like our neighbours to the south, have to achieve energy self-sufficiency," he said. "We too are looking for alternatives to our dependence on foreign oil which will involve increasing our use of domestic coal. However, we are going to develop these alternatives in an environmentally sound manner. The political will to do this in Canada is strong and we must demonstrate this to the United States".

Subsequent to that, I moved a motion under Standing Order 43 which in effect supported the Minister of the Environment's statement of November 17. I asked this House and members of the opposition to support the minister in his statement that we have an environmentally sound program developed for the future of the nation. My motion asked the House to express unanimous support for the principle stated, when referring to Canada's increasing use of domestic coal in an environmentally sound manner, that the political will to do this in Canada is strong and that we must demonstrate this. Those were the words of the Minister of the Environment.

I was asking for unanimous support for the minister by having this principle adopted. The motion was put according to the provisions of Standing Order 43 and was turned down. However, it was not turned down by any members on this side of the House, but by members of the government and supporters of the Liberal government, the Minister of the Environment's own colleagues. I find it rather astounding, that a minister responsible for two very important portfolios would be repudiated by his own colleague. That is a shame because in this particular instance what the minister was attempting to do was in the best interests of the nation.

It is unfortunate that the minister does not have the support of his colleagues. It is incredible that a minister of the Crown would continue to occupy a seat on the front benches of the Government of Canada without the support of his caucus colleagues. How on earth can we hope to survive as a nation if the government cannot get its act together? What can Canadians expect when ministers of the Crown do not receive the support of their caucus colleagues?

Contradictions of this nature can only call for the resignation of the minister in question, certainly if not from both portfolios, then from the portfolio in which he does not have the support of his caucus colleagues. I put this to the parliamentary secretary and stated that I hoped that the Prime Minister would adopt the suggestion which had been earlier stated by the hon. member for Scarborough East (Mr. Gilchrist), that of splitting this particular ministry. The hon. member and I wanted this in order to ensure that jobs are created in this country and in order that the Prime Minister might make certain that both these departments, under new ministers and new direction, are funded properly. The parliamentary secretary's response to that was:

Madam Speaker, we will.

● (2205)

That is the candidness I spoke of when I first raised the issue. The parliamentary secretary has stated that the government intends to create two new ministries as distinct from the current situation, so that one minister would be looking after science and technology and another would be looking after the Department of the Environment.

Canadians, and certainly members on this side of the House, would like to know who these new ministers will be, what the new funding programs are to be and what new programs the government intends to put in place to create these new jobs for Canadians so that Canada will have the opportunity to continue its growth and we can look forward to a brighter and more prosperous future than we have had in the past.

Mr. Doug Frith (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. member opposite is aware that my departmental responsibilities lies in the area of health and welfare and I am sure he is having some difficulty understanding the concern the health and welfare department has in his question this evening.

Part of the question the hon. member has raised deals in an indirect way with health and welfare when he talks about the problems Canada has experienced in terms of pollutants which will be added to our atmosphere from the conversion program announced in the budget document of October 29, 1980. The hon. member says he feels the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Roberts) should resign because he does not have the support of members on this side of the House. We are in full agreement with what the Minister of the Environment has attempted to do over the past 12 months. The Minister of the Environment has been in the forefront of the battle with the United States, vis-à-vis the effects of acid rain on our environment. He has visited Washington, D.C. and we are now in the process of negotiation with the U.S. government. We are hopeful that in future negotiations over the next three months with the new administration in the United States we will be able to come up with a global program for North America which will deal with the acid rain problem. It is no surprise to me that the actions of the minister, who has been in the forefront of this battle on acid rain, come directly into question with respect to the measures placed in the October 28 announcement in the budget.

I want to reiterate in response to earlier questions which the hon. member has raised that the government is committed to ensuring that any coal conversions which we encourage and foster will require the observance of strict environmental control. In that respect we have a total commitment on behalf of this government. The conversion program, which is so instrumental to reducing eastern Canada's dependency on oil will, first, decrease our dependence on imported oil and, second, result in immeasurable economic benefits for Atlantic Canada. That is why the government in the energy package of October 28 attached prime importance to the extension of the natural gas pipeline from Quebec City through to the maritimes, which will take that region off oil dependency. Second, the budget document itself contains a major program to use the coal which is available in Atlantic Canada to produce electricity. This will create jobs in Atlantic Canada for the industry, as well, in terms of the technology and the construction of the pipeline and the conversion of the existing plants to coal-fired plants, it will create jobs for others who live in that region. This will not be done at the expense of the environment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the parliamentary secretary but I must inform him that his time has expired.

ENERGY—INQUIRY RESPECTING CONTINGENCY PLANS TO ASSIST UNEMPLOYED OIL WELL DRILLERS

Mr. Bill Wright (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, last Friday I asked a question of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) about the large number of jobs related to the drilling industry which will be lost in Alberta.

● (2210)

The drilling industry said approximately 180 rigs were fast coming to a halt in terms of drilling and this would affect the jobs of 10,800 people. His simple reply was that he did not have an oil agreement with Alberta yet and, therefore, he could not do anything.

Last Monday I asked a similar question of the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy). I reminded him that he had been present at a meeting last Friday where the drilling association told him the figures were even worse than I had quoted—that 200 rigs were coming to a halt, most were leaving the country and the job loss would total up to 12,000 in Alberta. What I did not say to the minister, though he had been told, was that the figure could be three times as bad in Ontario. All he could tell me was that job registrations in Alberta were down from last year. Of course they were.

Alberta is a prosperous province. These people have not yet registered. This has only happened since the budget. The rigs are gradually coming to a halt. Their contracts are not being renewed. Of course these people have not registered for jobs.

The point is, the minister knew this but did not state it in his answer. He had been given a briefing by the drilling industry where they laid it on the line to him, telling him how desperate it was going to be in Alberta. However, both the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and the Minister of Employment and Immigration are ignoring what is happeing in western Canada as well as in eastern Canada.

Opposition members on this side are united in their condemnation of the government's National Energy Policy. We consider it a deliberate raid on western interests, and the government should reopen negotiations with Alberta and the other producing provinces. There is no question but that this policy is detrimental to the Canadian economy. The proposed oil and gas pricing schedule was unilaterally arrived at and will lead to further confrontation and division with the producing provinces.

Why are all the members on this side opposed to the national energy policy? Why do the members on this side not believe what they are told? There is a document which spells it out very clearly. It is at page 8478 of Hansard for December 6, 1973. I quote from that:

> My immediate task is to place before the House proposals which will set the basis for a new national oil policy. The objective of that policy, to be reached before the end of this decade, is Canadian self-sufficiency in oil and oil products.

That statement was made by the present Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). That is why we do not believe him and that is why the only solution for Canada as a whole is the resignation of that man.

It is not only this party which is against the national oil policy. What are the provinces saying? British Columbia will lose approximately $1.2 billion between now and 1983 and they estimate some problems in selling this higher priced gas to the United States. The B.C. finance minister has called the National Energy Policy proposals a blatant money grab and power grab by Ottawa. The Alberta treasurer called the national energy policy a massive discrimination against the province of Alberta and an attempted takeover of the ownership of the depleting resources owned by the people of Alberta.

● (2215)

Premier Blakeney of Saskatchewan indicated that he was unhappy with the 8 per cent production tax on oil and gas and also the gas export tax. Ontario treasurer Frank Miller stated that taxing the Canadian people to buy the existing oil industry is a misallocation of resources and a complete waste of time. Premier Lévesque of Quebec condemned the unilateral nature of the federal government move in respect of oil and gas policy. In the maritimes the Premier of P.E.I. stated that the national energy policy will not benefit the people of P.E.I. Lastly, Premier Peckford of Newfoundland called the National Energy Program stupid.

The chairman of Dome Petroleum, Jack Gallagher, referred to the federal energy policies as shortsighted, ignorant and contrary to the nation's energy needs.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his allotted time has expired.

[Translation]

Mr. Dennis Dawson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I should like to point out that the hon. member touched upon several points in his speech on the energy program of the government. In the three minutes allowed me, I could without a doubt defend that energy policy and refute his stand because it is to be expected that the provinces which wanted to derive maximum benefits from the energy resources of the Canadian government should resent the fact that the federal government is assuming its responsibilities in attempting, as it is doing, to share this wealth around.

But I shall limit myself, Mr. Speaker, to that aspect dealing with job creation and unemployment both of which are directly and indirectly related to the energy program of the government.

[English]

While industry estimates of the total downturn in oil well drilling activity for 1980-81 now run as high as 40 per cent, the impact this will have on employment in western Canada is not yet clear. For example, of the 587 rigs in Canada as of December 9, 1980, 458 were drilling. This compares to the 436 that were drilling in December, 1979, out of a total of 510 rigs in Canada at that time.

At the present time our Canada employment centres in Alberta, where most of the rigs are located, report some employment enquiries from oil rig workers, but no apparent trend is apparent at this stage. This situation is being monitored on a monthly basis and it is expected that any unemployment impact will be more accurately reflected in our records in the coming months. This will be followed closely by the department.

Given the high demand for labour in Alberta, it is anticipated that alternative employment will be available to any oil rig workers who are laid off. There will not, of course, be a perfect match of skills and benefits. We shall be trying to do our best in that regard. However, the regular programs and services of the commission which will be immediately available to these workers are considered fully adequate to meet the demands anticipated.

In so far as the downstream effects on suppliers in central Canada are concerned, and the effects in eastern Canada, I expect they will be fully compensated by the megaproject we are developing with the government in the west. That may well be the prebuilt pipeline in Alberta and I am sure it will certainly compensate for those ill effects.

HAZARDOUS SUBSTANCES—SHIPMENT OF VITAVAX PESTICIDE TO NEPAL AND INDIA

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina East): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I wish to deal with the answer to a question I received on November 26 concerning the export of some tonnes of a chemical called vitavax to Nepal, a shipment that occurred earlier this year through CIDA.

● (2220)

I was concerned when I raised the matter in the House, considering that a product with a similar name, vitavax, was under investigation in Manitoba because of the death of a Manitoba farmer. While the question was addressed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacGuigan) or his parliamentary secretary, the answer I received was given by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin), and I was somewhat surprised that the Minister of National Health and Welfare answered that question. The minister misinterpreted my remarks, and I never did receive an adequate answer to the questions I posed. The minister assumed that the death of the Manitoba farmer was related to the product which was being shipped to Nepal which she assumed contained lindane. Lindane is a chemical which is at present under review in the United States. This review was recommended by the scientific panel of the American Environmental Protection Agency which has advised severely restricting use of that chemical. I understand that the chemical which was shipped to Nepal did not contain lindane. However, it did contain two other chemicals about which very little is known. Spokespersons from the company itself, Uniroyal, have indicated that very little is known. The two active ingredients of vitavax 200, the product which was shipped to Nepal, contains thiram and carbothiin. Very little is known about either of those two active ingredients.

My concern essentially is that we are shipping from western developed countries to underdeveloped countries technology which has not been adequately tested here. Perhaps we are using underdeveloped countries almost as a testing field.

I understand that this product vitavax 200 is not registered either in Canada or in the United States. When we telephoned CIDA to request further information, CIDA suggested to us over the telephone that vitavax 200 was approved by the American Environmental Protection Agency. A telephone call to that agency confirmed that vitavax 200 is not registered in the United States, and that the agency is not aware of it. vitavax is on the Canadian list of chemicals which were tested by International Biotest Laboratories. There exists no conclusive proof that this product is safe for extended human use. It has been on the IBT list, and the government has not indicated as yet that it has reviewed the available data about that chemical. There is nothing which indicates that this chemical is not harmful to the user and to the consumer.

An American toxicologist was brought here by the company, Uniroyal, to testify in the inquest which continues in Manitoba. This toxicologist suggested that the man did not die from lindane poisoning. In fact, he might not have died from lindane poisoning. He might have died as a result of poisoning by other ingredients in the product called vitavax RS flowable. I understand that Uniroyal has not made available to the inquest the exact chemical composition of that product. The company has been hiding behind the notion that it is a trade secret, and I find this somewhat objectionable. I was really concerned that the minister should jump so quickly to a conclusion with respect to the testimony of this one toxicologist as opposed to the testimony of the attending physician, and the coroner in Manitoba reached other conclusions.

I was particularly surprised and appalled at the minister's attempt to answer my second question. There have been some problems with respect to the product vitavax in the west. There are repeated cases in which the germination of seeds treated by vitavax is very low.

● (2225)

In fact, I pointed out in my question that the Saskatchewan wheat board has over 500,000 pounds of rapeseed, treated with a product called vitavax, that has a germination rate of only 10 per cent. In other words, of all the seeds that are planted, only 10 per cent sprout. This is a very serious problem, and there are, I understand some court cases in Saskatchewan where farmers are suing the company Uniroyal for passing on to them seeds which germinate only up to 10 per cent. If this is also a problem with the product we are shipping to Nepal, I think it is very serious for a country like Nepal. If only 10 per cent of the seeds they plant will come up, in a country that is so low in food and so desperately needs food as does Nepal, this could be indeed a very serious matter. I received no answer whatsoever to the concern I expressed about the germination rate of the product which we have sent to Nepal. It is as though the minister had totally ignored my question and went on rambling—and I emphasize the word rambling—about her opinions of what is happening in the inquest following the farmer's death in Manitoba.

I am amazed at the reaction of the government. I was asking for some honest technical answers. I think these are legitimate concerns. For the government to suggest that I am needlessly frightening people, that I am being paternalistic to the people of Nepal, are red herrings. The government should take a good, hard look to see what it is doing, particularly when it exports technology from this country which has not been satisfactorily tested and ships it to underdeveloped countries—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

Mr. Doug Frith (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I will try to deal as best I can with the question the hon. member for Regina East (Mr. de Jong) has raised, to which the Department of External Affairs feels it can reply, and then, if I have time in the three minutes allowed me, I should like to address some of the other points he has raised with respect to the health question of vitavax 200.

Vitavax 200 is one of 20 different formulations of the chemical and does not contain the ingredient lindane around which the inquest into the death of the Manitoba farmer has centred. However, that is not to say that vitavax 200 is not a chemical which should be handled properly with the necessary precautions. The bulk of the chemical in Nepal is used in one of several modern government seed treatment plants to coat wheat seed for the government's national seed program. Approximately two tons of the six to eight ton annual requirement is repackaged into small five gram packets by the manufacturer's agent in Katmandu for distribution under the government's program to individual farmers. vitavax 200 is not registered or licensed for use in Canada although it is produced here for export. This is because of the different seed, climatic and soil conditions in Canada for which other vitavax formulations are more suitable, and formulations similar to vitavax 200 are marketed here. However, my information from the department is that vitavax 200 is licensed and registered for use in the United States and exported throughout the world.

As an agricultural chemical developed and produced in Canada, vitavax has made a significant contribution to the control of cereal crop diseases and increased production.

Field trials of seed treatment chemicals were begun in Nepal in 1966, and following field testing of several variants of vitavax in 1974, Nepal procured its first requirements of vitavax 200 in 1975 and 1976 on a commercial basis. Pleased with the good results and increased production which has been reported between 10 per cent to 20 per cent, Nepal requested the chemical from Canada in late 1977 and it was approved in early 1978. This chemical is considered vital to Nepal's seed treatment and wheat production.

The hon. member for Regina East spoke earlier about the problem we have had with the treatment of some vitavax formulations with respect to the production of certain seed variants in western Canada. I want to point out that the incident he raised earlier was in connection with a small sampling of rapeseed which had been treated with vitavax RS flowable. And yet vitavax 200 is used in Nepal for wheat.

Mr. Speaker, it seems that my time has expired. I thank you for allowing me time to make the response I have been able to give so far.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

MENTALLY HANDICAPPED—CASE OF EMERSON BONNAR—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Over 800 Canadians, many of them mentally retarded individuals, are being detained in institutions for long periods subsequent to being charged with committing a crime. Being found not fit to stand trial or not guilty on account of insanity, they are committed to those institutions under the Lieutenant Governor warrant provisions of the Criminal Code for indefinite periods.

That this House request the Minister of Justice to investigate immediately the case of Emerson Bonnar with a view to securing his release from this cruel and unusual treatment, and that the minister bring before this House legislative proposals based on the recommendations of the 1976 report of the Law Reform Commission of Canada so that mentally handicapped and mentally disabled Canadians charged with an offence are entitled to a fair trial before the law.

CALL FOR LEGISLATION RESPECTING UNION BARGAINING—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Otto Jelinek (Halton): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that the fragmentation of union power within each essential service sector contributes dramatically not only to airline strikes, as presently seems to be the case with Air Canada, but affects other essential services like the Post Office and so on, and because of this government's inaction in this regard causing an unprecedented 55,041,600 man-days lost as a result of strikes and walk-outs since the Finkelman report was tabled in 1974, which report recommended, among other things, sector bargaining, I suggest the time is long overdue to take some specific action other than to just hope, as the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) said yesterday. That, of course, is not enough. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Murta):

● (1410)

That the President of the Treasury Board be instructed to introduce forthwith legislation requiring union groups in a single public service sector to bargain with the government on a joint basis only, in order to avoid situations such as the pending Air Canada strike, and in the meantime take all necessary and immediate precautions that will assure the hundreds of thousands of Canadians strike-free air travel during the forthcoming holiday season.

Mr. Pepin: Flight attendants are not civil servants.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

FORESTRY

FUNDING OF FOREST MANAGEMENT PROGRAM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Vince Dantzer (Okanagan North): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Forest resources are being depleted faster than they can be replaced in north Okanagan, and indeed throughout British Columbia. Since this government annually collects more than $500 million from the forest industry in British Columbia and yet reinvests what amounts to only one cent for each of those dollars, and because this appears to be a further example of Ottawa's concept of sharing—that is, taking from the west and giving nothing in return—I move, seconded by the hon. member for Okanagan-Similkameen (Mr. King):

That this government recognize the contribution of over one million Canadians who owe their livelihood to the forest industry and act immediately to return some of the plunder to western Canada to fund, in co-operation with the province, the establishment and maintenance of an effective forest management program.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

CN EXPRESS OFFICE CLOSURES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina West): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. It concerns the abandonment of CN Express service by Canadian National Railways. In view of the fact that the hon. member for Restigouche (Mr. Harquail) told a public meeting in Campbellton on Sunday that the Liberal caucus is 100 per cent behind saving CN Express, but the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) is refusing to use existing federal authority to make CN and CP live up to their commitments to provide express service, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Murphy):

That the Minister of Transport tell the House either that he is no longer a member of the Liberal caucus or that he is going to do something to stop CN from abandoning its express service.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

INDUSTRY

SITE FOR PROPOSED DE HAVILLAND AIRCRAFT FACILITY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Walter McLean (Waterloo): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. There was an announcement that the government will decide shortly on a site for the expansion of the de Havilland Aircraft facility in order to assemble the Dash-8 aircraft. Since the government's objective is to create jobs outside of metropolitan areas, and since there is a pool of skilled labour available in the Kitchener-Waterloo, Cambridge and Guelph area due to lay-offs by suppliers to the automotive industry, and there is a receptive community there, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Cambridge (Mr. Speyer):

That this House direct the government to instruct de Havilland officers to meet with elected business and labour leaders in the Waterloo region fully to explore the feasibility of this expansion at Waterloo-Wellington airport.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

THE MINISTRY

CALL FOR RESIGNATION OF MINISTER—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy-Royal): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Atlantic Canada has the highest unemployment and the lowest per capita income in the nation. When asked what he intended to do about it, the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) responded with the curt answer: "Read the budget". When asked what he planned to do to help his neighbours and fellow maritimers to put meat and potatoes on their tables and feed their families, the minister showed his disdain, contempt, arrogance and certainly his lack of concern by not even giving Atlantic Canadians the courtesy of a one-word reply: "Nothing". Rather, he sat and sulked. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Howie):

That in view of the minister's shameful performance and his callous attitude toward his fellow Atlantic Canadians, he resign immediately.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): He is the "incredible sulk."

Madam Speaker: For presentation, such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

NATIONAL ENERGY PROGRAM

PREDICTED LOSS OF JOBS AND INVESTMENT

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. It concerns Canadian jobs and Canadian investment that are being unnecessarily lost as a result of this government's policies. The Prime Minister will know that Canadian-owned drilling rigs in an industry which is 80 to 90 per cent owned by the people of this country are lining up at the Canada-U.S. border to leave this country. He will know that a survey by The Calgary

Herald estimates that some 376 Canadian drilling rigs will move to the United States, causing at least 22,500 Canadians to lose their jobs. The drilling association says that this flight of jobs and investment from Canada is a direct result of the government's energy policy.

● (1415)

Will the Prime Minister tell the House whether his government is considering any change in that policy to stop this loss of jobs and Canadian investment?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and his officials have been meeting with various representatives of the industry. We have been asking them to give us their figures indicating what degree of loss, if any, they pretend will happen as a result of the national energy policy.

Some hon. Members: Pretend?

Mr. Trudeau: We have been having these meetings. Our figures show that predictions by the industry that they will suffer drastic losses are not justified. This is a matter which can be established by statistical analysis and by facts. We are still expecting from several of them the submission of their failures and the magnitude of drilling which had been projected and so on. When we have these figures, we will be able to see if in fact the new national energy policy does have these dire consequences, which they are naturally talking about because nobody likes to pay increased taxes. If our figures are correct, and we believe they are until they are contradicted with contrary submissions, the petroleum industry and the drilling section of it, and the exploration section of it in particular, will be in a position to have ample cash flow and funds to continue their policy.

I repeat, this is a matter which is trying to be established by the minister and his officials. If we have the co-operation of the industry, which many of the members of it are giving now, we will be able to see if any adjustments are necessary; but as of this date we have no evidence that such adjustments are necessary.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, it might be hard to see that evidence from Saudi Arabia. However, it is very evident when one is in western Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: The Prime Minister talks of pretence. The fact is that at least 66 drilling rigs have already left. If he wants to find more, he can go to Coutts—that is the town in Alberta, not his assistant—and look at the line-up of other rigs standing there ready to leave.

Let me deal with another dimension to this problem because it is not simply in western Canada that jobs are being lost; they are being lost right across this country. I received information this morning that in the rubber industry in southwestern Ontario, if present economic and energy policies continue, there will be a job loss of some 300 to 400 jobs in that industry alone in Kitchener-Waterloo and throughout southwestern Ontario. That will also occur in the automotive industry, in the service sector and in other Ontario and Quebec industries which count on the oil industry as a customer.

Does the Government of Canada intend any changes to protect the industries of Ontario and Quebec which are being damaged right now, to protect the jobs of central Canadians that are now being lost as a result of the energy policy of the Liberal government?

Mr. Trudeau: Naturally, Madam Speaker, the policy proposed by the government in the budget will attempt to take more money from the industry than it has been giving in the past to the Government of Canada. As hon. members know, in the past the take from that industry was shared, with 45 per cent going to the government of the province of Alberta, 45 per cent to the industry and only 10 per cent to the Government of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Not true.

Mr. Trudeau: We told the government of Alberta that we intended to reduce its take from 45 to 43 per cent. Naturally, nobody likes to receive less money. But we have also told the industry, and we were supported in this by the Premier of Alberta, that the industry itself would have to pay a larger share. Naturally the industry is unhappy and is screaming about it.

● (1420)

The difference is, Madam Speaker, that we are not necessarily falling for the line that they are putting out, as the Leader of the Opposition is apparently doing. He is already, and is always, prepared to cave in to any suggestion by anyone but the federal government that they are right and that the government is wrong. The figures we have show that as of now there are no drastic changes in the situation. I have some figures here indicating that of 587 drill rigs in Canada as of December 9, just last week, 458 were still drilling. If you compare that with a year ago, as one hon. member opposite asks me, there were 436 drilling in December, 1979, at the time of the Tory budget, out of a total of 510 rigs in Canada.

An hon. Member: What about next year?

Mr. Trudeau: The hon. member from Toronto keeps asking about next year. I am showing that at the present time there is no drastic departure of rigs or stopping of drilling and there is no drastic increase in the number of people at unemployment offices in Alberta from that industry asking for new jobs.

An hon. Member: You must be in the Sahara. Get your head out of the sand.

Mr. Trudeau: Hon. members talk about the Sahara desert. I do not think they have ever been there. I have not been there myself in recent years, but it seems to me to be the kind of dryness that is bringing their own minds to rot.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, if the Prime Minister believes that no rigs are leaving, he believes there is no snow on the ground in Ottawa.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: He should free himself from his own propaganda and realize that the problem here is not with the provincial governments and not with the multinationals. The companies which are being driven to leave Canada are small Canadian-owned companies, exempted from the taxes in our budget precisely to keep them here in Canada, but having to face a tax as high from the Liberal party as the multinationals face. They are faced with the choice of going bankrupt or going south, so they are going south and going in large numbers. The Prime Minister apparently does not care about that loss of jobs and that loss of investment.

INQUIRY RESPECTING POSSIBLE REPERCUSSIONS OF PROGRAM IN UNITED STATES

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, let me address a supplementary question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, who will be aware of the provisions regarding reciprocal discrimination of GATT, of OECD and of the United States mineral lands and mining act. Has the Government of Canada yet received, formally or informally—and I emphasize "formally or informally"—any indication that the Canadian energy package is causing the United States to consider actions which might lead to an even greater loss of jobs in Canada in industries other than simply the petroleum and related industries, or which might affect Canada's bargaining position on the fisheries treaty, on the Garrison project, on the "Buy American" program or on any other question?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, to the best of my knowledge, and I think it is fairly complete on this matter, we have not received any kind of representations from the U.S. government, and we believe our action is fully in accord with our international undertakings. I might say it was within this atmosphere that the U. S. Congress has just allowed us the convention tax exemption which we have been seeking for so long.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

SHUTDOWN OF DRILLING RIGS IN SASKATCHEWAN

Mr. Bill McKnight (Kindersley-Lloydminster): Madam Speaker, I should like to address my question to the Prime Minister. Is he aware that his 8 per cent wellhead tax, which in real fact will be much higher, will cause the shutdown of low-producing wells in western Canada, which will cause the manufacturing industry of service equipment to come to a complete stop? If he wants a specific example, Zoron Krac Manufacturing in Kindersley has shut down a contract of 11 service rigs at over $1 million and laid off 14 workers. What is he going to do about it now?

● (1425)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, unfortunately I have not been given notice of this question, so I cannot comment on this particular point. The point I was making in answer to the question by the hon. member's leader is not that there were no rigs leaving. The point I was making was that there is not a fundamental difference between the situation this December, as of last week, and 12 months ago. I have conceded that the national energy policy obviously does expect the Canadian government and the Canadian people to receive more money from the industry.

In so far as the particular case pointed out by the hon. member is concerned, I can look into that. I said, once again in answer to the hon. member's leader, that we are looking at all these problems case by case and testing our national energy policy as it would apply to particular industries and particular corporations. If we have their co-operation, as we have in the case of some of them, it is possible that we will be able to take corrective measures.

Mr. McKnight: Madam Speaker, if the Prime Minister does not care about the 15 workers in Kindersley, Saskatchewan, maybe he cares about the workers in Ontario and Quebec—

An hon. Member: He did not say that.

Mr. McKnight: —who are going to be done out of their jobs in the auto manufacturing and heavy truck manufacturing industry because of the policies of his government, which are arrogant and inflexible toward the energy area of my part of my country, and also the Prime Minister's country. The Prime Minister is causing unemployment in Ontario and Quebec, not just in western Canada.

What is the Prime Minister going to do about the potentially unemployed of Ontario and Quebec, if he does not care about the unemployed in Kindersley, Saskatchewan?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I fail to see how the hon. member can draw from my answer the conclusion that I do not care about the unemployed in Saskatchewan. On the contrary, I indicated that if he had given me notice of his question I would perhaps have been able to look at that particular case and, with the assistance of the Minister of Employment and Immigration and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, indicate if there is anything we can do about that particular case.

For this, we must, first of all, have the co-operation of the industry itself and, second, we cannot assume that any threat by any taxpayer to leave if his taxes are increased is necessarily based on fact. It is certain that all taxpayers—and the petroleum industry is no exception—do not like to pay a higher share of their profits to any government.

The point I am making to the hon. member is that we have to see if our energy policy is good not only for the particular industry about which the hon. member seems to indicate concern, but also if it is good for the taxpayers and consumers of Canada. This is the main concern we have expressed in our national energy policy.

FINANCE

RISING INTEREST RATES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. Contrary to what he promised during the election campaign, the Minister of Finance made it clear yesterday that the Canadian interest rate policy will remain inextricably linked to that of the United States. Today a number of major banks in the United States predicted that the prime rate in their country will rise to 25 per cent, an astronomical figure. If this government continues its policy of linking our rate to the American rate, that will mean mortgage rates going up beyond 20 per cent. It will mean that businessmen will suffer. It will mean an increase in debt loads on farmers. Is there any limit which the Government of Canada will set for itself, or will it inextricably follow the United States to the economic disaster which it is establishing and import that disaster to Canada?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, if the hon. member concludes from the answer given yesterday by the Minister of Finance that our policies are inextricably linked to those of the United States, I suggest he return to Hansard and read the answer given by the minister. Because the minister said exactly the contrary yesterday. He said that our policies were not set by the United States. He said that the Canadian government was following its own policy, but that naturally the money markets in the world do have an influence on each other. That is not saying that we are linking our policies to those in the United States; rather, it is saying that all the money markets in the world will be inevitably influenced by each other unless a particular country chooses to embark upon exchange controls.

● (1430)

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, the Prime Minister promised an independent rate during the campaign. Yesterday, the Minister of Finance said that the rates between Canada and the United States are inextricably linked. If that is not saying that we do not have an independent policy, I do not know what one would have to say to make that assertion.

Considering that the Minister of Finance has already acknowledged that his budget forecasts are wrong, that we now have more than one million unemployed—and the Minister of Finance has acknowledged that that number will go up—and that interest rates again are shooting up in both countries, will the Prime Minister recognize that the budget which was brought down a while ago is now completely out of date, will he acknowledge that we have an economic crisis, and will be promise a new budget will be brought down in the new year when Parliament returns?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I am not sure whether I can convince the hon. member, but there is a difference between being influenced by the monetary situation in the markets of the world, particularly the market in New York which is so important to Canada, and linking our monetary and fiscal policy directly to that of the United States.

I appeal to the hon. member to read again what the minister said yesterday in reply, because he will see that what the minister said is that unless we want to have exchange controls—and the minister has made the point that he is not looking in that direction—any budget made in Canada will necessarily be affected by the economy of the United States, which in turn will have an effect on the Canadian economy. No new budget brought down in January, as suggested by the Leader of the NDP, no matter how perfect, even if it had the approval of the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood and were countersigned by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, could be absolutely detached from any impact of the American economy, without going the route of exchange controls and a host of other controls. So the hon. member should understand that when he returns, day after day, to the same question and gets, day after day, the same answer which he refuses to understand.

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, for a minute the Prime Minister was getting near to accepting some good ideas, but I notice that finally he reverted to his old answer. The Prime Minister also knows that there are a number of economists, who are unaffiliated with any political party in Canada, who say we can have an independent interest rate policy which does not entail exchange controls, and the Prime Minister should admit that.

Since in the past few weeks the government has ruled out a fair prices commission, has ruled out income tax cuts for low and middle-income Canadians and has ruled out special programs to assist home owners with mortgages, can the Prime Minister announce one program, one policy, which the government will bring in before Christmas and which recognizes the fact that we have an economic crisis in this country?

Mr. Trudeau: As the Minister of Finance has repeatedly pointed out to the leader of the NDP and to the members of his party, every suggestion they put forward—and this may be true of the economists he pretends he is quoting—entails new spending and frequently vastly increased spending by the federal government. It is our view that increasing the deficit by new spending at this time, which would involve borrowing or higher taxes, which the hon. member also rejects, would lead to higher inflation and to higher interest rates, which is precisely what the hon. member is lamenting.

HEALTH CARE

MEDICARE—REQUEST FOR COMMITMENT THAT FUNDING NOT CUT BACK

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the threat in the budget to cut back on federal funding of social programs, which can only mean the Canada Assistance Plan and funding for medicare, and in light of the failure of the minister to deal in any substantive way or in any way whatsoever with the recommendations contained in the Hall report, thereby creating an air of uncertainty around federal funding under medicare, prompting the provincial ministers meeting in Toronto yesterday to call upon the federal government to make a commitment, I now ask the minister whether she is prepared to give a commitment to the House and to the provinces today that there will be no cutback of federal funding for medicare?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, the hon. member has made several mistakes in his question, if I may suggest. First of all, he alleged inaction with regard to Justice Hall's report to restore medicare to its full integrity. His allegation is unwarranted. I have begged the provincial ministers to let me know if the immediate implementation of the recommendation of Mr. Justice Hall to the federal government to ban extra billing and to give the medical profession a fair process of negotiation would at all restore medicare. I have asked them to let me know what we can do to strengthen their hand to carry out their responsibility. Their answer was no to that question. They asked me to wait and to consult with them fully, which I promised to do.

I believe that we will not want to disrupt the services to the public given under medicare, and that is why I know that the provincial ministers will come to the same conclusions as are contained in the analysis of Mr. Justice Hall, namely, that there are problems in certain parts of the system and that we must address these problems.

I also read the press release of the provincial health ministers which was put out yesterday. I am very pleased that they recognized the role of the federal government in medicare. They know very well that moneys are being paid fully every month, that the program is up for renegotiation, and I hope that we will strengthen the conditions and their control in these renegotiations. That has nothing to do with cuts.

Mr. McGrath: Madam Speaker, I note that the minister avoided very carefully making any commitment on the part of the federal government. The ministers of the provinces did let her know yesterday because the press release said:

> If the federal government follows through on those plans when the current arrangements come up for renegotiation next year, provincial medical insurance programs will face severe restraint, the joint statement warned.

That language could not be clearer. In light of the fact that she is about to enter into negotiations and the provinces must be prepared to make budgetary plans, given the fiscal situation of the country today, especially in the poorer provinces, is the minister prepared to give an unqualified commitment on the part of the government that there will be adequate funding over the next five-year period to cover inflation and improvements in the medical insurance program? Can she give the general assurance right now to the provinces so that they can get on with their planning?

Miss Bégin: The analysis of Mr. Justice Hall is very clear as to the funding of the medicare system in Canada. If the hon. member would take the trouble to read the report carefully, he will see that Mr. Justice Hall does not consider that there is underfunding by the federal government. On the other hand, the CMA issued a press release only a few days ago which speaks of underfunding in some of the provinces which led to the erosion of medicare. That is the analysis on which we base our work.

I said just now in my previous reply that we are not talking of any cuts. The hon. member makes a mistake if he thinks that only CAP and medicare are social programs in the broad sense. We are reviewing our programs with a view to focusing on those most in need. It is obvious, and we have repeated it often, that no cuts are being made to medicare in any way, shape or form, but in the renegotiation we will want more control and compliance with the conditions.

NATIONAL ENERGY PROGRAM

NEGOTIATIONS WITH ALBERTA—REPORTED FLEXIBILITY IN OIL PRICING PROPOSALS

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, yesterday the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources suggested that I should speak directly to the Prime Minister on the question of oil negotiations, so I will address my question to him today. Yesterday his minister indicated some slight flexibility on the whole question of oil pricing in connection with the energy deadlock between the province of Alberta and Ottawa. Since the Minister of Finance previously indicated absolutely no flexibility on this subject, my question for the Prime Minister is: which minister is speaking for the government? Is a price increase of $6 per barrel under consideration, as seemed to be indicated by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources yesterday, or is there a further increase of $6.50 to $7.50, including the petroleum compensation charge, as indicated by his former colleague, Donald Macdonald, in a speech yesterday?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I doubt whether Mr. Macdonald is privy to the kind of negotiation which the federal government would be prepared to embark upon with the government of Alberta. My understanding is that there have been meetings between deputy ministers and officials in the relative departments, but at the ministerial level the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources merely indicated that we were prepared to resume talks, as I believe I indicated two or three days after the budget.

That is still our position. We are ready to discuss various aspects of the new energy policy, as I indicated in answer to an earlier question, both with the industry and with the province. However, what must be understood is that in its fundamentals, in the attempt we are making in that new energy policy to get a larger share of petroleum revenue for the federal government, and to ensure this share is employed throughout Canada to develop self-reliance in energy, particularly in the petroleum industry, the policy will not be changed. These are principles upon which the government fought an election campaign, obtained the support of the people, and these are the principles with which we intend to push forward.

An hon. Member: You are dividing the country.

Mr. Wilson: Madam Speaker, I understand from that answer that the flexibility on the question of price, as indicated by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, is not under consideration and that the minister was offside in the statement he made to me yesterday when he indicated there was some possibility the government would accept a price increase of up to $1.50 per barrel.

My supplementary question is directed to the Prime Minister. In the event the government decides, to use the Prime Minister's own words, to cave in to the industry, would he make a firm commitment to the House today that any increase in price over and above the price indicated in the energy program would be accompanied by some form of support to low and middle-income earners? I am thinking of something similar to the energy tax credit included in the budget of the hon. member for St. John's West.

Mr. Crosbie: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, just responding a moment to the preamble of the hon. member, I should say no, he is not justified in drawing that conclusion. I indicated that the minister and the government were prepared to embark upon new negotiations. I did not exclude or include any particular area of negotiation. I do not see why the hon. member says that there is a contradiction between what the minister said yesterday on prices and what I said today.

As for his second point or his question concerning support to the Canadian consumer, I repeat what has been pointed out by the Minister of Finance, that compared to the previous government's budget and energy policy, which did not even have the agreement and accord of the Premier of Alberta—

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Wrong.

Mr. Crosbie: Wrong again.

Some hon. Members: Table it.

Mr. Trudeau: I think this is a matter of disagreement on fact. If an agreement has been reached, I wish the party opposite would establish it by tabling that agreement, or at least would contradict the position taken at that time by Premier Lougheed that there had been no agreement.

An hon. Member: Ask Merv Leitch.

Mr. Trudeau: The failure of the Clark government to reach an agreement with Alberta is something which I understand Albertans themselves are trying to forget. But those are the facts as we know them. If there has been an agreement, I wish the Leader of the Opposition would establish that agreement by tabling the text.

Mr. Clark: The tax credit, Pierre, which helps the poor.

HOUSING

SUGGESTED LOW-INTEREST BANK MORTGAGES FOR YOUNG CANADIANS

Mrs. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Finance, I should like to direct my question to the Prime Minister. Last week the Minister of Finance stated that he wanted to see how the burden of high interest rates will be "expressed on affected groups". Canadian banks last year made over $1 billion in profits as a direct result of the escalating "made-in-America" interest rate policy of the government, and surely the Prime Minister knows that the group most affected is young people who will never own homes under this policy. Will the right hon. gentleman now take positive action and instruct his minister to ask the banks to put aside $1 billion of their lending portfolio for stable, low-interest mortgages so that young people under the age of 35 will finally have a chance to own homes?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State, Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member is drawing somewhat hasty conclusions about the relationship which might exist between bank profits and fluctuating interest rates. She should know that a close evaluation should be made over a rather long period to draw direct conclusions between this phenomenon and the revenues or profits of banks. Moreover, I would suggest to the hon. member that the difficult period which we are now going through should not provoke any panic and make us to jump to extreme conclusions or try to introduce short-term programs which would have only temporary effects and could even cause problems with the long-term projects proposed in the budget speech.

[English]

CALL FOR DIRECT LENDING ROLE BY CMHC FOR RENTAL ACCOMMODATION CONSTRUCTION

Mrs. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Madam Speaker, certainly the young people of Canada would not see it as a short-term, temporary program; what they want is a chance to purchase homes.

My supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Public Works who is responsible for Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation. According to the latest CMHC survey, St. John's, Toronto, Regina, Saskatoon, Calgary, Vancouver and Victoria suffer below zero vacancy rates in rental housing. Since the only rental program offered by the government is MURBs—and even CMHC experts admit that high interest rates have discouraged rich investors from using MURBs—will the ministers, instead of apologizing, act now to reinstitute a CMHC direct lending role for rental construction and public housing in the cities I have mentioned where tenants are on the streets or actually sleeping in cars?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, the announcements of CMHC and the government's addressing of the problem indicate that social housing start increases, which address the same market group, have been in direct response to the question of the tight rental market. That non-profit social housing response is directed toward that very market. I do not believe the hon. member was in the House when I indicated that nearly 1,000 additional units were redirected to the city in British Columbia with the lowest vacancy rate.

I think the hon. member put her finger on the problem when she identified in two questions, first, her priority for young people owning homes, and second, a priority in the rental area. If I had the $1 billion to which the hon. member referred in her first question, I would probably respond to a number of priorities rather than the identification of the one she just mentioned.

FISHERIES

BIOLOGICAL STUDY OF QUEBEC RIVERS

Mr. Alexandre Cyr (Gaspé): Madam Speaker, my question is for the hon. Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. At the subcommittee on acid rain, Mr. Schmut, chief of the chemical products hazards division of his department, stated that there are five rivers in Nova Scotia where salmon can no longer reproduce. My question is as follows. Is the minister aware of the number of rivers which are threatened in Quebec by high PH levels, and if not, does he intend to make a biological survey of all Quebec rivers in 1981?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Madam Speaker, I do not have the exact figures before me, but there is no doubt that many rivers in eastern Canada are threatened. As a matter of fact, that is why we have considerably increased the funds allocated for research and control efforts. The problem is less serious in rivers with a large flow, but for smaller rivers, there is no doubt that this problem is becoming alarming.

SMALL BUSINESS

REQUEST FOR INITIATIVES TO ASSIST ATLANTIC PROVINCES

Hon. J. Robert Howie (York-Sunbury): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Small Businesses. Where high interest rates, high energy costs and severely restricted credit are shattering the resource and service-based economies of the Atlantic provinces, putting small producers and small businesses, which are the backbone of the Atlantic economy, out of business, will the minister tell the House if his government will propose any new initiatives to alleviate this very serious situation and, if so, when?

[Translation]

Hon. Charles Lapointe (Minister of State, Small Businesses): Madam Speaker, I believe a few initiatives have already been taken such as, for instance, extending to the end of March the small business development bond programs, and introducing the bill allowing non-incorporated small businesses and small entrepreneurs to deduct the salary of their spouses from their annual earnings. Finally, under the Small Businesses Loans Act small businesses can now borrow up to $100,000 at a rate of interest of 1 per cent over the prime rate. To my mind, Madam Speaker, those measures have been implemented precisely to help small businesses cope with this difficult period caused by high interest rates.

[English]

Mr. Howie: Madam Speaker, I thank the minister for his answer. I suggest to him that, while those measures are very important and are certainly respected, they are infinitesimal compared to the problem which exists in the Atlantic provinces. More dramatic measures with a greater economic impact are required. Will the minister take this matter up with his colleagues in an attempt to give us some real action soon?

[Translation]

Mr. Lapointe (Charlevoix): Madam Speaker, as I have already had occasion to mention in the House, there is no doubt that we are concerned about high interest rates and their harmful effects on small businesses in Canada. As I have already said, we are in the process of revising completely all means available to small business to finance itself; this revision is being made in co-operation with banks and non-banking financial institutions. We are also in the process of reviewing the activities of the Federal Business Development Bank. I shall endeavour to speed up the study on the financing of small businesses to be able to do something about the concerns of the hon. member and those of all other hon. members in the House.

AGRICULTURE

HIGH INTEREST RATES—MEASURES TO ASSIST FARMERS

Hon. Bill Jarvis (Perth): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture, who will know that while we in this House talk in terms of 17 per cent interest rates, the farmers of Canada, when they go to borrow working capital, find themselves faced with rates of 20 per cent and more. He will know further that these rates are impossible and that, rather than borrow to finance the purchase of cattle and hogs to finish and fatten for the Canadian market, our farmers are selling off their feed grains. The minister's constituents and mine are selling off their corn and western producers are selling off their feed grains.

What does the minister propose to do about these prohibitive interest rates in order to permit Canadian farmers from coast to coast to produce food in reasonable quantities at reasonable prices for Canadian consumers?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, the hon. member gave a story on interest rates and what they should be, but he did not complete his story. The interest rate of the Farm Credit Corporation, for which I am responsible, is 12.75 per cent. It has been at this level for several months and it will stay there for several months more. We may run out of money in that area due to the high demand and, in fact, in some areas we may have run out of money already.

Many farmers belong to farm organizations, such as the marketing boards, and their cost structure and cash flow is such that they do not need to borrow as much money as the hon. member has suggested. The hon. member has mentioned two groups of farmers, the hog producers and the beef producers, who do, but they have not looked after themselves as have other groups of farmers through organizations which have the cash flow. I just had dinner—

An hon. Member: Order.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Whelan: —with one of the largest and most successful turkey producers—

An hon. Member: You're the turkey.

Mr. Whelan: —in Canada and North America, a man the hon. member knows very well, and he said that there has never been a time when there has been so much stability in the agricultural economy and it has never been so healthy.

Mr. Jarvis: Madam Speaker, that is either hogwash or cattlewash, whichever the Minister of Agriculture prefers.

Mr. Whelan: Ha, ha!

Mr. Jarvis: Not one hog, heifer or steer is purchased through farm credit financing. It is the chartered banks of Canada to which Canadian farmers look for their financing.

What does the minister propose to do about a situation, current and serious, where Canadian farmers who want to produce meat for Canadians are prevented from doing so by this government's policies or lack thereof, who find themselves forced to sell the feed grain that they would otherwise be feeding their livestock for the Canadian market, and who cannot sow feed because they cannot afford 20 per cent interest rates?

Mr. Whelan: Madam Speaker, the hon. member has omitted the fact that we are giving interest-free loans to farmers for storable crops, as we have never done before, through new programs which we initiated some time ago. The interest-free loans for storable grains such as soybeans and other products which are put on the market also helps the consumer. When the hon. member talks about hogwash, that is about all he is expert on.

Mr. Jarvis: What are you going to do? You are the minister.

Mr. Whelan: The hon. member may not be very closely associated with agriculture. He has made no real suggestion with regard to interest rates and what should be done. He should check farmers' incomes, the stability in the agricultural economy and the products which they are putting on the market at the present time. Turkey producers in Canada are making money on the sale of utility turkeys at 79 cents per pound in 1980, and I challenge the hon. member to find the same situation anywhere else in the world.

HEALTH CARE

REPORTED REJECTION OF HALL REPORT BY PROVINCES

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg-Birds Hill): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare, and it deals with the erosion of medicare, a concern which we in the NDP have been voicing for over two years now and which we were concerned about as far back as 1977 when the Established Programs Financing Act was passed in this House over the worried objections of the father of medicare, Mr. Douglas. The minister has been vocal on the subject, but has done nothing concrete to stem this erosion. Instead, she first hid behind the fact that the Hall report had not come out; now she is hiding behind the fact—

An hon. Member: Question.

Mr. Blaikie: The question is coming—that she needs to consult. In view of the fact that the provinces have consulted among themselves without the minister and have decided, with the exception of Saskatchewan, not to endorse the Hall report, what does the minister plan to do to stem the erosion of medicare?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, I do not know from where the hon. member draws his conclusion because no such communication has been given to me by any health minister of any province. There was quite a difference in the stand which was publicly taken yesterday. I consider it very normal for health ministers to defend their budgets the day before all the provincial finance ministers are meeting here in Ottawa with the federal Minister of Finance. It is very normal that they would be in favour of medicare and require a full budget for medicare.

When the hon. member suggests that we have not done anything, it indicates that he refuses to understand the complexity of the medicare system in Canada. The hon. member wants the usual simplistic answer in black and white, which does not apply here. I have explained more than once that the same Justice Hall report tells us to ban extra billing provincially first and to correct our federal legislation accordingly, to give doctors a fair process of negotiation but not to withhold payments. We are working together, slowly progressing toward an understanding of the medicare erosion.

There are several provincial ministers of health who are new in their portfolio. They were not even ministers when the Hall commission was established by the previous government. These people must go through the process of understanding the problem.

Mr. Blaikie: Madam Speaker, it is a sad day when we come to expect it as normal that provincial ministers of health do not want to do anything about things like extra billing. Perhaps the minister herself does not realize the human reality behind this. The fact is that because extra billing happens in clusters, both geographically and in terms of specialties, there are many Canadian women who cannot find an obstetrician who is not using extra billing.

My question to the minister is this: When will she show some leadership in this country and bring in legislation to stop extra billing?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss Bégin: I suppose there are some types of flambuoyant leadership, but there is the more modest type of daily leadership in the fight for ideas. This is a case where we are trying slowly, but I think surely, to convince Canadians that they have already paid for their full universal free medical care services. They are understanding and they are pushing through the various layers in the system to make sure that is what they get.

The hon. member does not understand the complexity of an institution which we want to keep alive. He does not understand that, because of the explanations we have given to participants on panels, on hot lines, in discussions and replies to letters, the public has now obtained in some provinces complete withdrawal of financial barriers and degrees of extra billing in Ontario.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

PRIVILEGE

MR. ROBINSON (BURNABY)—DORCHESTER PENITENTIARY—STATEMENTS MADE BY MR. KAPLAN

Madam Speaker: I would like to give my decision now on a question of privilege which was raised on Monday by the hon. member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson). The hon. member's question of privilege was based on allegations of misleading information being offered to the House and to one of its committees by the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan).

It seems most appropriate that of the three hon. members who also spoke, two were former solicitors general, that is, the member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce (Mr. Allmand) and the member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence). I am grateful for their contribution to the debate.

While the substance of the matter is of very grave importance, that is to say, the treatment of penitentiary prisoners, I must be guided by the practices and procedures of the House. Allegations of misleading the House affect order in the House rather than the privileges of members, or contempt. However, where an hon. member alleges that the misleading is done deliberately, the member must really "charge" the other member with that offence, because to allege that one hon. member deliberately misled another is, of course, quite unparliamentary. There is no suggestion that the House was deliberately misled in this case.

I suggest what we have before the House in this matter is the following: First, the Solicitor General made statements in the House and in one of its committees regarding certain events which occurred in Dorchester Penitentiary. Second, there was a departmental report relating to these same events. Third, the hon. member for Burnaby alleges that in light of, or in his interpretation of that report the Solicitor General misled the House. Fourth, the Solicitor General denies that he misled the House or one of its committees and he states that his construction of that same report does not lead to that conclusion.

Quite obviously this is really a dispute about facts involved in the unfortunate events in Dorchester Penitentiary, and the interpretation of a report based on these events. It is a matter of order or debate. Certainly, on its face it is not a question of privilege, nor, as a matter of fact, is there a valid point of order.

MR. FRIESEN—RESERVATION OF RIGHT TO RAISE POSSIBLE QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock-North Delta): Madam Speaker, the hon. member who created the situation which has made me rise to speak to a question of privilege is not here today. I would prefer to wait until that hon. member is here.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. WHELAN—ADDITIONAL INFORMATION

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I would not want to leave the House with lack of information. When the hon. member for Perth (Mr. Jarvis) asked me a question, I forgot about the $67 million which was given for drought assistance in the west.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

AMENDMENT TO PROTECT INNOCENT HUMAN LIFE

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-623, to amend the Criminal Code (protection of innocent human life).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Blenkarn: Madam Speaker, this bill would provide that abortion cannot take place unless there is a danger to the life of the mother, and not just the health, and that a person be appointed by provincial authority to hospital therapeutic abortion committees for the sole purpose of being an ombudsman for the unborn child.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

ADMIRAL ROBERT FALLS

Question No. 1,367—Mr. Cossitt:

1. What is the annual salary, to the nearest dollar, received by Admiral Robert Falls from the Canadian Armed Forces?

2. What is the annual salary, to the nearest dollar, received by Admiral Falls as special adviser to the Prime Minister on defence matters?

3. How many times since his appointment have he and the Prime Minister been in touch with each other, directly or indirectly, on matters of defence?

4. For what reason was it necessary to appoint Admiral Falls as special defence adviser to the Prime Minister rather than making use of one of the senior officials of the Canadian Armed Forces?

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): 1 and 2. $60,900—$79,300.

3 and 4. See reply to question No. 1,641 answered December 9, 1980.

COMPUTERS

Question No. 1,514—Mr. Herbert:

Does any problem arise within a department or between departments attributable to the use in various geographical regions of computers that are not compatible?

Mr. Peter Stollery (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): In so far as the Department of Communications is concerned, the answer to the above question is as follows: Though there are many actual and potential incompatibilities between computers, particularly when they are of different manufacture and different generations, no problems raise within or between departments that cannot be solved operationally. The major difficulty that does arise occurs when there is a need to transfer or communicate data between computers, and this problem is not confined to government departments or to different geographic regions. The operational solution usually involves standardizing the format of the stored data that would be used by different machines, and then transferring magnetic tapes containing the data between the computers, or obtaining a printed "hard-copy" report and re-entering the data into the other machine. The data transfer could be more efficient. The preferred long-term solution to this data transfer problem is to develop a set of interconnection standards or protocols for electronic communication that will be applicable to all types of networks, computers and terminals. A great deal of work is being done at the international, national, industry and government levels to develop such a solution. In particular studies are under way and solutions being developed by the committees of the International Telecommunications Union and the International Standardization Organization. Canadian manufacturers, telecommunications carriers, government departments and the government electronic data processing standards committee are directly involved in this work. An effective solution to the incompatibility problem, in Canada, will be resolved when solutions are adopted as national standards, and services available to all Canadians are implemented.

"SPECIAL FRIENDS" LETTER

Question No. 1,690—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Did the Secretary of State for External Affairs write a letter dated October 20, 1980, to what he referred to therein as "Special Friends" and, if so (a) was the letter written on the letterhead of the Secretary of State for External Affairs? (b) what is the name and address of each person who received the letter?

2. Did the letter advise recipients in part that the Windsor-Walkerville Federal Liberal Association was to hold a meeting on Saturday, November 1 at 110 Tecumseh Road East to select delegates "for the upcoming convention of the Liberal Party of Canada (Ont.) which will be held on the weekend of November 28, 29 and 30 in Toronto" and, if so (a) under what authority was the letterhead of the Secretary of State for External Affairs used to advise persons of Liberal party meetings (b) was postage paid on the letters and, if not, were they sent postage free by the minister?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): The letter described in the question was sent out by the Secretary of State for External Affairs on October 20, 1980, and by error it was sent on departmental letterhead. When the Secretary of State for External Affairs saw and signed the original letter, it was on blank paper with no letterhead. It was subsequently reproduced by accident on departmental letterhead. As the letter itself states it was the first such letter and office procedures have now been established to ensure proper handling procedures for the future.

Ninety-nine such letters were sent and the Secretary of State for External Affairs has personally repaid the government for the stationery, envelopes, and postage.

Question No. 1,691—Mr. Cossitt:

Did the Secretary of State for External Affairs write a letter dated October 20, 1980, to what he referred to therein as "Special Friends" advising them in part "the government . . . has eased the requirements for claimants of Unemployment Insurance benefits in the auto industry, a condition which applies only to Windsor" and, if so (a) what is this special treatment being received by Windsor (b) is similar treatment being received in regard to UIC by other municipalities where automobiles are being produced such as Oakville and Oshawa and, if not, for what reason?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): See reply to question No. 1,690 answered this day.

THE VALLEY OF ARCHES

Question No. 1,719—Mr. Blenkarn:

1. What was the cost of installing certain spring steel structures on the west side of the Airport Parkway, described as art by the Minister of Public Works, entitled "The Valley of Arches"?

2. Who is the person in the government who decided this effort by Mr. Louis Stokes was art in the first place?

3. Did Mr. Stokes receive a grant from the Canada Council and, if so, what was the amount?

4. What was the total cost to the NCC or the government generally for this art work?

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Canada Council and the National Capital Commission as follows:

1. The installation cost of Valley of the Arches along the Airport Parkway was $1,800.

2. The work was selected by the National Capital Commission's advisory committee whose members are regarded as experts on Canadian art, and approved by the executive committee of the commission on the basis of their advice.

3. Mr. Stokes has never received a grant from the Canada Council.

4. $9,032 for a period of three years.

Mr. Beatty: Madam Speaker, two weeks ago today the parliamentary secretary indicated in response to my notice of motion for the production of papers No. 24 that it was acceptable to the government. When I spoke to the parliamentary secretary following that, he indicated to me that the document was not ready to the tabled at that point, although my notice of motion has been dropped from the order paper as a result of the agreement by the government to table the document. The parliamentary secretary indicated at that time that the government wanted to get a French translation of the document, which was the contract between the government and the Canadian Media Corporation, which is to act as an agency of record on behalf of the government.

The parliamentary secretary indicated that he had hoped to be able to make this document available by Monday and, as the House is adjourning for a Christmas recess on Friday, I wonder whether I can obtain the assurance from the parliamentary secretary that indeed that contract will be available to me and other members of the House before the adjournment for the Christmas recess.

Mr. Collenette: Madam Speaker, the facts as outlined by the hon. member are correct, and I shall try to get the copy for him. We have made the commitment that this motion is acceptable to the government. It is a question of paper work, and I must admit that I am sorry that the translation is taking a little longer than necessary, but I will try to obtain it by Friday.

Madam Speaker: Shall the remaining motions stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

CANADA OIL AND GAS ACT

MEASURE RESPECTING OIL AND GAS INTERESTS

The House resumed, from Tuesday, December 16, 1980, consideration of the motion of Mr. Lalonde that Bill C-48, to regulate oil and gas interests in Canada lands and to amend the Oil and Gas Production and Conservation Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works.

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Madam Speaker, when the House rose last evening at 10 p.m. my remarks were just getting warmed up with respect to the bill which is before this House, Bill C-48. I had indicated that there were a number of defects in this bill, on which I propose to expand further this afternoon. These defects are in four areas, in particular. This bill reflects a lack of trust in the private sector petroleum producing industries in Canada, a lack of consultation, a lack of co-operation, and an absolute lack of realism with respect to the challenges which lie ahead for this country in achieving the very important goal of oil self-sufficiency within the balance of this century.

In particular, the government's actions in relation to this bill and its so-called energy program and budgetary policies are destroying our quest for self-sufficiency in oil, and I would like to expand upon my reasons for making that assertion.

In the offshore and frontier areas of Canada it is anticipated that there will be something in excess of 100 billion barrels of oil and corresponding very massive quantities of natural gas. The oil alone in current dollars would have a value of something in excess of $3 trillion. That is a magnitude which is almost impossible for any of us to comprehend, but the bill before this House provides the foundations upon which those resources, worth something in the order of $3 trillion, will be managed and administered for many years, and perhaps decades to come.

An astonishing feature of this bill is that there is no technical content, and there is no consideration given to the economic criteria which bear upon the producibility of various deposits, whether they be in the high Arctic, off the coast of Newfoundland, or in the Mackenzie Delta.

There are no technical criteria, and the minister is given no tools under this legislation with which to ensure that we achieve optimum rates of production from these deposits. I refer not merely to maximum production but to optimum rates of production in accordance with our national goals. In fact the bill, being titled "an act to regulate oil and gas interests in Canada lands and to amend the Oil and Gas Production and Conservation Act", leads me to astonishment that the tools are not provided to the minister in the quest for these very important goals. There are no tools to ensure that we conserve that resource and use it wisely, or that we develop those areas which are most cost effective and most desirable to develop first. There are no means for consulting with industry experts or provincial government experts, who have decades of experience in managing oil and gas resources.

● (1520)

There is no statutory requirement for ministerial advisory boards or groups. It is an empty shell in that regard, in that the government will not consult expertise before making many important decisions. The bill does, however, set out penalties and procedures for dealing with cases where there is a clear lack of compliance with government rules.

Coupled with this lack of technical and economic guidance are vast areas of ministerial discretion. Many clauses in the bill grant discretion to a minister who is not required to consult. For example, I quote from clause 14:

> The Minister may select any proposal submitted under this section for the purpose of negotiating an exploration agreement and in making the selection may take into account any factors he considers appropriate in the public interest but is not bound to select any proposal submitted.

There is a huge loophole in that type of power being granted to a minister. Similar areas of ministerial discretion are reflected in clauses 12, 14, 44, 46, 48, and in ten or 20 other clauses granting the minister tremendous powers of discretion. When the minister has these powers which are not guided by proper and thorough technical and economic advice, there is the potential for political abuse, indeed the potential for patronage and political favouritism, and for incompetence by the minister, such as the case with the present Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) who is totally unschooled and not versed in the realities of the oil and gas producing industry. He is a lawyer, and there is no requirement in this bill for him to consult industry experts before making decisions.

This same minister will have power to allocate an interest held by a corporation which is perhaps not reaching the 50 per cent Canadian ownership requirement; to allocate that shortfall to some other company which is Canadian owned to the tune of 75 per cent or more. One wonders whether that minister could make millionaires of certain industrial interests in this country which happen to be friends of the political party in power. For example, there are several very well-known corporations with which some front bench members are affiliated or have connections. They could become the oil companies of the future by stealing the resources of existing interests and using them to their own personal advantage. That is one of the principal inherent dangers in these immense powers of discretion which are granted to the minister responsible, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Coupled with those deficiencies, we have to address the punitive financial factors inherent in this bill, punitive compounded taxation which is driving industries and capital from Canada, as we heard once again in today's question period.

In the conventional oil and gas area, the industries of Alberta, Saskatchewan and British Columbia are now to be subjected not only to a 9 per cent federal excise tax on gasoline, an 8 per cent producer tax on gas and oil, a new natural gas tax on export and domestic consumption, an oil export tax and import compensation charge, but also a Canadian ownership charge. There is also the compounding effect of provincial taxes both at the producer and consumer end of the chain. That is the burden of taxation that the conventional oil industry has to contend with in this country.

Under the provisions of this bill, that imposition upon the industry is compounded. There is also written into this bill a requirement for a 25 per cent back-in privilege of Crown ownership in any industry which chooses to seek, explore, and develop hydrocarbon resources in Canada lands. There is that 25 per cent back-in privilege, or an outright confiscation of 25 per cent of the ownership of the production rights of those resources, under the confiscation powers granted to the minister by this bill.

In addition, there is a 10 per cent base royalty on gross value of production of oil and gas in these lands, plus a 40 per cent progressive incremental royalty on additional earnings after costs have been deducted. Those costs include the 8 per cent producer tax, federal excise tax, natural gas tax if natural gas is being produced, plus federal income tax. Those industries are being taxed to death in a way that is totally unrelated to the realistic demands for a reasonable rate of return on capital to be invested in these industries. This form of socialism is killing the petroleum industry. We increasingly see evidence of that as each day passes.

These unconscionable levels of taxation and state intervention are going to lead to a very bleak future for all Canadians. The spin-off effect of this is severely impairing our whole economy.

As we approach the end of this century, oil and gas are becoming increasingly elusive. They are increasingly hard to find. One only finds scarce resources by prospecting, and prospecting has always been a very competitive business. It requires healthy competition and adequate rewards to risk-taking. These are essential prerequisites if we are ever to achieve self-sufficiency in oil supply. The price has to be right to reward that risk-taking. Exploration must be encouraged. The high costs of exploration in Arctic ice, on the Grand Banks of Newfoundland and elsewhere, and of this very sophisticated technology must in the final analysis be borne by the consumer.

What is Canada faced with today? What are the economic consequences of the policies of this government? I want to say a few words about how that is linked to the world situation. Again yesterday we had an announcement of increases in the price of oil by OPEC countries. That will make it more attractive for investment capital to go to other parts of the world where that price can be realized and a fair rate of return earned on investment in those sorts of ventures.

We are faced with escalating interest rates. The consequences of that, which result from Canada's dependency on imported oil, and the consequences for our national debt are horrendous. This must be coupled with the fact that our oil imports will be paid for with our collapsing dollar. It is now worth 82 cents. I believe that some time in January it will drop to 80 cents if this government does not take immediate action. Oil and gas stocks are declining in Canada. In spite of the denial by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) that investment capital, drilling rigs and jobs are leaving this country, this is what Canada faces.

If the interest rate is 20 per cent in the United States, that is because there is a shortage of investment capital and of oil. Intense exploration is under way within the continental United States for hydrocarbon resources which are dearly needed to replace their dependency on high cost imported oil. If investment, in searching for those resources, brings a return of 20 per cent in the United States, there is no way that investment capital is going to stay in this country, even though we may have many more vast deposits and potential in the long-range future.

All of these factors are signs of movement in the wrong direction. We in Canada are doing something wrong. It cannot be denied, nor can it be blamed upon the Americans. I wish to refer to a graph found in the report released this past week by the Economic Council of Canada, entitled "A Climate of Uncertainty".

In chart 1-1 on page 8 of that report it is clear that growth in Canada's output or gross domestic product has been in a state of decline since 1967. In the period 1977-79, the growth rate was 3 per cent. When we compare with the other major industrialized countries shown on that chart, we find that since 1976 the United States has had an economic resurgence, as have Japan, France, West Germany, Italy, and the United Kingdom. They all reached a low point in growth rate from 1974 to 1976, as a consequence of the 1973 oil embargo. However, Canada's growth rate did not bottom out. We are still on the decline. In spite of all the accusations by the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) and others, about the Americans and the fact that their economy is the source of our problems in Canada, the facts are quite clear. We have a different kind of regime in this country, a socialistic, isolationist regime which does not understand how a free enterprise economy must work and how a government must conduct itself in support of that economy. We cannot blame the Americans for this serious economic difficulty we are having to face in the next few years.

I want to come to the question of Canadian ownership because this is a very central theme to Bill C-48. The desire to achieve increased Canadian ownership of our petroleum industry, indeed, of all our industry, ought to be an important objective of this nation. Therefore, it is with no reluctance that I give my total support to the objectives of clause 19 and other references in this bill which suggest we should try to achieve at least 50 per cent Canadian ownership of our oil and gas industries in all parts of Canada, including the Canada lands.

I want for a moment, however, to address this question of ownership. Who will own these resources, the people of Canada or the Government of Canada? We hear a lot of talk from the other side of the House to the effect that the government paid 95 per cent of the cost of developing projects like Hibernia, therefore it is only "just" the government should reclaim that, under the presumption that the government is the people. In fact the government is but the servant of the people. Nothing the government spends is earned unless the people earn it. Let us not forget that! We hear too much talk of this great generous government which is doing all these great things for the people.

We know by the provisions of Bill C-48 that the government wants to take an interest or a 25 per cent share of the carried interest in all exploration rights and permits approved under the provisions of this act. When those exploration efforts bear fruit, the government will automatically claim a 25 per cent working interest as a condition of approval for commercial production.

I want to ask where the money is to come from to pay for that interest. We hear of federal grants up to 80 per cent of the exploration costs, if that particular industry has achieved at least 50 per cent Canadian ownership, but where is the money to come from? And by what right is the government to be involved in every commercial effort, in every company exploring for oil in our offshore and frontier areas? That destroys the spirit of competition. No one in this House is today opposing a 25 per cent exploration initiative by Petro-Canada or any other government agency, working in competition with private companies or consortia, but by what right does the federal government feel it should take a share, a piece of the action in all these initiatives, even those which are totally or largely Canadian owned? That destroys the spirit of competition.

It seems to me we should be providing incentives for ordinary Canadians to invest in share equity in these petroleum companies. We should provide those incentives as a means of inducing Canadian participation, rather than imposing the government upon the board rooms and policy decisions of private companies.

Why won't Canadians support high risk ventures? Why can they not be enthusiastic about taking the risks involved in looking for oil 100 miles offshore under 400 feet of water, in the midst of icebergs and the like? Why will Canadians not participate? First of all, the return on investment is too low. Profits are not adequate to provide an attractive return, when you have to pay capital gains tax on the marginal return you do receive. Capital gains tax in this country has been a disincentive to investment in high risk ventures.

In order to finance the major portion of the federal government's debt, Canada Savings Bonds are outbidding the private sector for investment capital. Some $40 billion or $50 billion are recycled in order to offset the accumulated debts of this government, in the form of Canada Savings Bonds. Canadians like that guaranteed assurance of 10 per cent, 11 per cent or 12 per cent from CSBs. They will not take the risk. Then we tell oil industry investors that it is not proper if they want to make a profit in the order of 8 per cent on their investments. We are kidding ourselves.

The financial resources, in the final analysis, if we want Canadian ownership, have to come from the people and from nowhere else. But instead, we have people in this country who put their money into secured term deposits, if they do not buy Canada Savings Bonds. We have a lot of money in the residential housing market. How are we going to find oil, with all our money in housing, and how did it get there? One of the reasons there is so much capital money tied up in housing today is because, after 1971 that became the only form of investment which was exempt from capital gains tax. Where did people begin to speculate? They began to speculate in housing and there was a tremendous drain on the available capital to pursue other higher risk initiatives.

I am not for the moment advocating that we now impose a capital gains tax on housing. I think the converse is true; we should eliminate capital gains tax, and we should provide special investment incentives and special tax credits to people who will put their money into high risk oil and gas exploration initiatives. That is how we will achieve Canadian ownership.

Another great area of capital waste is in the area of public service pension funds. There are some $20 billion now accumulated in these funds, but merely accumulated on paper because the government has spent it all, to do all these grand and glorious things like printing bilingual games, converting Canada to metric, doing all those things that the people, particularly in my part of the country, reject, and over which they are in a rage. They were frills, and non-essential to our economic security and prosperity.

The government takes this $20 billion of pension money, writes it into a book, and then spends it. In fact the employees of the RCMP, the Public Service of Canada, and the Department of National Defence should be in a position to know that those funds are secured by some form of equity investment. Why are those funds not invested in oil and gas, in a dedicated way, rather than squandered by the Government of Canada? Why are the union pension funds not being invested in Canada in oil and gas, and why are incentives not provided for that to occur, instead of having those funds invested in the United States and elsewhere? Why are the Heritage funds of Alberta and Saskatchewan, and the heritage fund that we should begin to accumulate in the north, why are these not invested in trust in the name of the people who own those resources which are being exploited? They should be selectively invested to secure our long-range energy potential.

This bill and the budget provide little in the way of tax incentives to get capital flowing in a different direction, to get people's money out of their pockets and into those high risk areas that will guarantee our economic prosperity in the future. The government says it will finance these initiatives, but it will merely continue to compound our national deficit. Where will the government get the money?

We only have to look in the budget to see that Petro-Canada will be empowered to go to New York, to West Germany and anywhere else, to borrow money. What is the interest rate in the United States today? We pretend in this country that it is better to borrow from foreign sources, where there is no risk required on the part of those lenders, so that the government can have a flag on the side of some Crown corporation and pretend to be doing all the good things Canadians want. The government prefers to borrow, rather than to encourage the people to invest their own money in Canada, taking the risk in Canada and producing jobs in Canada. To say that foreign investment is bad, but foreign borrowing is good, is really at the ludicrous heart of the dilemma this country faces. Yet it is a typical philosophy of the government opposite which must be changed.

Foreign borrowing that makes us ever-increasingly dependent on the whims of those people who lend to us is going to put this country to its knees. Canadian foreign borrowing in the period since 1976 has exceeded that of any other country in the world, and the annual reports of the World Bank show that. Canada has borrowed more money, not per capita, but more money in total than any other nation in the world to finance the extravagances of this government opposite, and that is a travesty!

Why does Canada have such a good credit rating? Why are we able to go out around the world and borrow all this money? This may be embarrassing to some members opposite, but it is a true fact that the equity against which that money is being borrowed is the natural resources of this country, particularly the resources of western Canada, the north and the offshore areas of our country. To finance the lifestyle to which we have become accustomed, we are selling out the future of our country, our children's future and their children's future, because we are borrowing far beyond our means to pay. But when the piper calls the tune we will pay, brothers and sisters. I tell you, do not ever think otherwise.

There is another clause in this bill which puts important stress on ensuring Canadian content in these drilling and exploration ventures in the frontier and offshore lands. Clause 10(3) gives the minister power to ensure Canadian content. That is a very high-sounding objective. But I ask why is Petro-Canada going to Japan to buy a drilling platform which could have been produced here in Canada? Why is the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cosgrove) going to Holland to contract with dredging companies to dredge the Miramichi canal, probably Roberts Bank, and to dredge in the high Arctic? Why are we going to Holland, and why are we going to South America and elsewhere to furnish the lavish Petro-Canada office in Calgary? Where is the Canadian content in that, Mr. Speaker? It is high time this government woke up to what is going on in this country, and it is high time that the government woke up to why the people in my part of the country are in such a rage with the absolute incompetence of this government.

I shall now speak about the concept of resource ownership to destroy some of the NDP and socialistic myths as to who owns these resources. The provinces, as a condition of confederation, own those resources under setion 92 and section 109 of the British North America Act. That is a matter of legality. It cannot be changed unless we change the constitution. The NDP and the Grits seem to accept these guarantees, but only with great reluctance. I suspect they would like to roll back the clock and revert certain provinces to territorial status. As Mr. Lougheed indicated the other night, that will not happen, if Canada is to remain united.

One wonders why, under section 51 of the government's constitutional resolution, the guarantees under section 91 of the British North America Act, which gave the power to provinces over certain listed areas of jurisdiction in section 92, why is that guarantee to be removed? What is the motive further down the stream? Will we have a national referendum whereby Ontario and Quebec will be faced with a referendum question empowering the federal government to take control of wellheads or take possession of offshore and high Arctic resources? Will we have that kind of a referendum question in this country? If we do, we will not have a country left after it is over.

The provinces were granted the right to resource ownership because these resources are the building blocks of regional economies. The revenues from those resources from the time of confederation have been used as a tool to build roads, schools, communities, and services, and to create employment opportunities in those great reaches of the country which the Ottawa bureaucrats cannot understand, because they do not know much about what lies beyond the Ottawa city limits. These bureaucrats are 2,000 or 3,000 miles away. There can be a much more efficient use made of the capital accruing from those resources, if those revenues are administered on a local basis. That is at the heart of our confederation. Therefore it is an accepted principle and I hope it remains in perpetuity that the provinces own their resources.

What about the offshore areas of Atlantic and Pacific Canada? Why cannot the coastal provinces and the far-flung regions of Canada develop their regional strengths? Why cannot Newfoundland anticipate having not merely control or a share of the return from those offshore resources but also ownership of them? Why cannot the province of Nova Scotia or British Columbia anticipate ownership of those resources?

Bill C-48 attempts to confirm the federal claim to ownership of offshore resources on the east and west coast. This is wrong. The proceeds from those resources, given the generosity of all Canadians, will in any event be recycled through the Canadian economy and will be shared with all Canadians. But the control cannot be centralized in Ottawa and entrusted into the hands of a political system and ministerial powers of discretion which are wide open to political abuse and discrimination.

This brings me to the question of the Canada lands in the north. I know that my colleague, the hon. member for Western Arctic (Mr. Nickerson), has made that aspect very clear but I want to reiterate what he said yesterday. The resources in the offshore areas and in the Mackenzie Delta in the north in the long run should be expected to become the owned resources of those areas, when they achieve provincial status. The federal government should not merely look at this as a land to be raped, as I have heard members opposite claim, including the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) who spoke on this subject a week or two ago. Those resources should be held in trust. The earnings from those resources should be used for the benefit of all Canadians, but through the mechanism of a heritage fund.

This heritage fund should bear interest and be reinvested in development of those resources. But the basic heritage should remain for those people who will populate the north in the years to come, when we come to realize the great future and potential which lies in that part of Canada.

Let us not kid around about it. What we are talking about here is nationalization of the oil and gas industry in those frontier lands and offshore areas of Canada. It was ironic that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources in his speech the other night quoted Edmund Burke, who was a small "c" conservative of some two centuries ago. The minister quoted the following statement made by Mr. Burke:

If we command our wealth, we shall be rich and free; if our wealth commands us, we are poor indeed.

What is the point of being free in a country if your wealth is commanded by a centralist government in Ottawa which takes away the individual spirit to compete, to drive, and to advance in accordance with our own sense of priorities and goals?

The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources had it all wrong when he quoted that phrase. Burke was suggesting that a country's wealth should be entrusted to individuals to be used for the good of all, but that individuals should enjoy the right of ownership, just as provinces enjoy the right of ownership. If we take the position that the federal government should own all, or should own 25 per cent of the interest in every oil and gas producing company, then we are taking that right of freedom away from individuals and we are heading down the road toward becoming a communist society.

Miss Aideen Nicholson (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, this bill before us, the proposed Canada oil and gas act, is a key element in Canada's National Energy Program. It is a bill which evokes strong feelings. There are deep differences of opinion between those of us who think in terms of a National Energy Program and those who think in terms of a regional oil program. There are different aims to be reconciled between the producer and the consumer. This is a bill which needs to be approached with cool heads and considerable good will, rather than with rhetoric.

In introducing the bill the minister said that he would be prepared to consider amendments at committee stage. It is a technical bill which should be carefully studied at the committee stage, and since it will be some weeks before the committee hearings start, there will be time for interested parties to prepare briefs and submissions, which I know will be examined in detail by the standing committee.

There were three main objectives listed in "The National Energy Program", first, security of supply and eventually energy independence; second, the opportunity for Canadians to participate in energy industries, especially oil and gas; third, fairness in pricing and in the sharing of revenues among governments and industry.

There were a number of measures announced to achieve these objectives. Five of these were: first, energy substitution away from heating oil to natural gas, electricity and other energy sources with federal grants to encourage this process. The goal is to reduce residential, commercial and industrial use of oil to 10 per cent of those sectors' total energy use by 1990.

● (1550)

Second, energy conservation measures will be further expanded, including acceleration of home insulation programs to ensure that 70 per cent of Canadian homes will be upgraded by 1987.

Third, renewable energy technologies will be further stimulated through research and demonstration programs and supported by a new alternative energy Crown corporation called Enertech Canada, so their contribution to the total Canadian energy demand will be doubled to 6 per cent by 1990.

Fourth, Canadianization of the petroleum industry which is now dominated by foreign interests will be actively pursued through programs designed to achieve at least 50 per cent Canadian ownership by 1990, Canadian control of a significant number of larger oil and gas firms and an early increase in the share of the oil and gas sector owned by the people of Canada.

Fifth, direct incentive payments for oil and gas exploration and development will supplement reduced depletion allowances and will be structured to favour investment by Canadian companies and individuals anywhere in Canada, with added incentives for exploration on Canada lands in the north and offshore.

Since those measures were announced on budget night there has been a considerable degree of progress. The extension of the natural gas pipeline system to the maritimes is now before the National Energy Board. The renewable energy Crown corporation, Enertech, has been established in Winnipeg, and negotiations are well along with the provinces about off oil energy substitution grants to consumers.

The Canada Oil and Gas Act sets the legislative framework for energy development in the Canada lands. The Canada lands, the lands making up Canada's frontiers, those vast expanses covering a total area almost twice as large as that of the ten provinces combined, comprise some 2.5 million square miles in the offshore and 1.5 million square miles in the Yukon and Northwest Territories. They represent Canada's greatest hope for significant new reserves of conventional petroleum.

In introducing the bill on December 11, the minister summarized the measures in the bill in seven points. He said: "First, there will be . . . work requirements through negotiated exploration agreements which include firm drilling commitments. Second, the bill reserves to the Crown a 25 per cent share of oil and gas rights in the Canada lands, to be exercised through Petro-Canada or some other designated Crown corporation. Third, there will be a minimum requirement of 50 per cent Canadian ownership, through the private or public sector, of production from the Canada lands. Fourth, there will be requirements for "employment of Canadians, and use of Canadian goods and services, in oil and gas activities carried out on the Canada lands." Fifth, there will be "ministerial authority to order production to commence and be delivered to Canadian markets, in quantities and at prices specified in the order." Sixth, there will be a greater degree of control "in the timing, direction, rate, and level of exploration, development and production by various means," which might include "drilling and production orders, earlier release of proprietary information, prior approval of transfers and assignment of rights." Seventh, to "ensure that Canadians receive a fair return for their oil and gas resources" there will be "a basic royalty of 10 per cent, with an additional royalty of 40 per cent of the net profits of a field . . . The emphasis in all leases and agreements will be on active development.

Even though, as was pointed out in "The National Energy Program", Canada may not need its northern resources for domestic markets until the 1990s," most people would agree that "we should press ahead with exploration so that Canadians will know that a secure source of oil and gas is available . . . for the future—"

The emphasis on early assessment of the oil and gas potential of Canada's frontier regions, however, also includes recognition of the fact that the ecology of the north is fragile and there are measures to protect the environment and fisheries and to fund environmental studies.

This bill does provide indeed a large amount of government control, and one can understand to some extent some of the concerns expressed by the opposition. However, it has not been done without notice. It is now ten years since the industry was informed that the regime for the disposition for oil and gas rights in the frontier regions, the offshore and the territories, would be extensively revised. A bill was introduced earlier, the Canada oil and gas act, but it died on the order paper in 1978. The new act is needed, both from the industry standpoint and from the regulatory standpoint. From the point of view of the industry, there are certain advantages in having clear and firm guidelines. Granted that the industry at the moment is not satisfied with what is being proposed, but there is room for presentation of their point of view in committee. Regulations will be important, and it is important that they should not only be fair but that they should be seen to be fair.

Words like "nationalization" have been used in this debate so far to imply that the government is prepared to act in a very harsh way. The word "confiscation" has also been used, but the whole tradition of Canada's dealings with the oil industry has in fact been based on negotiation and on attempts to conciliate. As a matter of fact I notice that our socialist friends consider that the Liberal government has been too easy with the oil companies.

Why are we talking now about more Canadianization? Well, for one thing not enough research and development is now carried out in Canada. Profits and capital are flowing out of the country. No other country tolerates as much foreign control of its resources. Norway automatically gets 51 per cent of profits. In Mexico, the total resource picture is a nationalized one. The British national oil corporation has first claim on 51 per cent of oil production at market price.

One must ask whether Canada's interests are best served from New York, London, or Houston. Of every dollar that we now spend on energy, 82 cents go to foreign-controlled companies and 18 cents go to Canadian-controlled firms. I was a member of this House in 1975 when we had similarly heated discussions about Petro-Canada. Many members opposite predicted dire things if Petro-Canada were established. But, in fact, we have found that Petro-Canada has been able to work constructively and amicably with the private sector, and has delivered distinct advantages to Canada.

● (1600)

Finally, I should like to talk briefly about the place of the energy policy in industrial strategy. This is of particular importance to me as a member representing an urban constituency in an industrialized area. Surely the province of Alberta, which is interested in increasing secondary manufacturing, must have some similar concerns.

Last February during an election speech in Toronto, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) promised that if he formed the government again he would capitalize on Canada's energy base in order to build a world competitive industrial sector. The Canadianization measures which are a large part of the National Energy Program will not only increase the percentage of Canada's oil and gas industry owned by Canadians from 25 per cent to 50 per cent within this decade, but must also have some major secondary benefits for Canada's over-all industrial development.

As we retain in our own country a larger share of the profits of the oil and gas industry for our own use, and as our oil and gas sector comes under Canadian control, the traditional linkages between multinational petroleum companies and their foreign suppliers of machinery, technology and equipment, can be changed to the benefit of Canadian business and jobs. In the new legal framework proposed in the bill there are provisions to guarantee that a high level of Canadian goods and services is employed. Applicants for exploration and production rights will have to demonstrate how their operations will bring industrial and employment benefits to Canadians. This will be monitored by the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources and the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce in order to provide maximum employment and industrial benefits.

Some members opposite have expressed a fear of this amount of government control, but what is the alternative? The alternative would be control by multinationals which have no commitment to Canada and no particular interest in advancing Canada's aims. I am not one of those persons who greatly believe in extensive government controls. Certainly I would like to see these controls put in place with limits, with appeal procedures, and in ways which make it very clear that they are fair, but I think that we cannot quarrel with the aims.

Once again I should like to quote from the February 12 speech of the Prime Minister as follows:

> We need to use Canada's resource base as the fundamental building block of a vigorous industrial sector and to revitalize Canada's industrial capacity so that our industrial sector is better able to create jobs at home and be competitive abroad.

Mr. Nickerson: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I should like to draw Mr. Speaker's attention to paragraph 309 of the latest edition of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms. Therein it is indicated quite explicitly that it is a rule of both Houses of Parliament that a member must address the House orally and not read from a written, previously prepared speech. Of course there are certain exceptions respecting statements by ministers, members giving their maiden speeches, or members speaking in a language other than their own. I respectfully suggest that none of those exceptions was the case as the previous speaker gave her presentation.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The remarks of the hon. member are well taken. I think it is a custom that all members do not read speeches, but they can refer to notes during their speeches. This is a common practice in the House. Perhaps the hon. member has noticed something which the Chair has not noticed, but I only saw the hon. member quoting from notes. I could not say that the hon. member was reading her speech, therefore I did not interrupt the proceedings at that time.

Miss Nicholson: Mr. Speaker, I had notes to which I was referring. The hon. member is most welcome to look at them. If he can find a speech written there, he will have done more than I, because I did not have a written speech.

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to speak on Bill C-48, the supposed culmination of what is now 10.5 years of effort by diligent, able, intelligent, knowledgeable public servants and their ministers who have been working on this problem.

As indicated by the previous speaker and other spokesmen on the other side, the purpose of this bill is to give Canadians, specifically the Canadian government, more control over the oil and gas industry particularly in regard to the Canada lands. One must ask why for goodness sake, given the record, would any sane individual want to give that bunch of incompetents more say.

We must consider the history. The oil and gas regulations pertaining to the Canada lands, north of sixty and offshore, were withdrawn by the Liberal government, by the minister of the day, J. J. Greene, in April, 1970, or 10.5 years ago, with a promise that they would be replaced immediately by a more up-to-date version which would be more appropriate to the modern era. For three years we waited with bated breath while the government struggled internally to come up with the promised national energy policy. The current Senator Austin from British Columbia, was the deputy minister who assured us through his mouthpiece, the then minister, that it was coming.

Finally in July, 1973, an energy policy for Canada was produced. It was a marvellous document representing three years of tremendous labour by the government. It was abandoned six weeks later when the government took unilateral action in response to political pressure from its bedmates, the NDP, on September 4, 1973. Then they went back to the drawing board, struggled, and so on, and produced what ultimately was in the budget of 1974 of the Hon. John Turner, the minister of finance; the Hon. Donald Macdonald, the minister of energy; and assistant deputy minister of finance, Mickey Cowen, who is now the deputy minister of energy. It was a budget which brought the oil and gas industry to its knees. Hundreds of rigs, thousands of Canadian citizens, and billions of dollars departed because of the energy policy which arose out of the budget of May, 1974. However, it produced the necessary majority Liberal government, which was its intent; never mind that it did dramatic and drastic harm to Canada.

Then they laboured mightily again. The minister of energy, Mr. Macdonald, having been chastened for the disaster he and his friend, John Turner, perpetrated on the country in 1974, produced a new energy strategy for Canada. Ultimately the document was tabled by Alastair Gillespie, and it was called "A New Energy Strategy for Canada—Policies for Self-Reliance". Finally, six years after the old policy was withdrawn, the new one was introduced. The new document said that we must move to world prices, that we cannot live in a never-never world of trying to have prices that are some fraction of world prices, that we must have equitable revenue sharing, and so on and so forth. However, it never did produce any legislation. We were still without any oil and gas regulations for Canada lands.

What it did, though, based on the philosophy within this document, was that it resulted in an agreement with the producing provinces, and consequently there were two years or three years of stability in federal-provincial relations with regard to energy, substantial growth in the industry and, in fact, a country working toward self-sufficiency. But the temptation to abuse and misuse the regional nature of this country and again stomp on the producing provinces was too much. So the Hon. Alastair Gillespie broke a written agreement which had been arrived at as the result of consultations which occurred when this document was produced.

Still there were no oil and gas regulations for Canada lands. Finally, in August, 1977, there were some tentative oil and gas regulations brought down, seven years and three months after the original set of regulations had been withdrawn. These regulations were put to the industry to determine if there was any interest within the industry to operate under them, and they failed dismally. The industry said that it was not interested. Finally, the federal government produced Bill C-20 in 1978, the proposed Canada Oil and Gas Act. The government was convinced that Bill C-20 was the cat's meow, that it would do the trick.

In June, 1979, the government opened up for bids some northern land and said that it would welcome companies which asked for exploration permits on those northern acreages. One company replied and requested a permit for a small portion of the total available land. That company was Dome Petroleum and the land was close to its existing acreages which it had held for many years. No company was interested in taking on the obligations of maintaining an exploration permit in the north based on the rules outlined in Bill C-20.

Apparently that was not enough of a message for the government because, I believe, just two or three months ago it again opened up some acreage for exploration permits in Canada lands and the number of companies which replied was precisely zero—not one single oil and gas company, Canadian owned, foreign owned or any other type, was interested in exploring under the rules of Bill C-20. As a result, the government produced "The National Energy Program" from which Bill C-48 originates and which we are discussing today.

Bill C-48 is the same as Bill C-20, except it is worse. It contains all the negative portions of Bill C-20 which have already been rejected on two occasions by people who are expert in this area, plus some additional, totally offensive provisions under the guise of Canadianization, which is the Liberal-NDP way of nationalization. "The National Energy Program" document is one of the most dishonest, deceitful documents of which I have heard and certainly read produced by any government in this country or, so far as I am aware, by any democratic country in the world.

The National Energy Program document is full of inaccuracies, distortions, information which has no bearing on the truth, and projections which were fished out of nowhere and designed to back up a philosophy and a policy that are clearly untenable. I could use up my entire 40 minutes outlining the errors and inaccuracies in this document. It was drafted by officials and a minister who are either dishonest or incompetent. I do not think these people were deliberately dishonest, but that it is merely a case of incompetence. I do not say a lack of intelligence. I would like to think that it is not from lack of motivation, although I am not so sure. Perhaps it is the fact that they just do not know and they do not know that they do not know. The sad part, though, is that they think they know.

For example, I take the topic of revenues as outlined in the document. The central thrust of the budget and the energy program is to have a more equitable revenue-sharing program. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) once again today in question period repeated the totally erroneous, totally inaccurate percentages and information that existing oil and gas revenues are shared on the ratio of 10 per cent for the federal government, 45 per cent for the provincial government, and 45 per cent for the industry. Those figures are wrong and inaccurate.

I do not blame the Prime Minister because what does he know? He knows how to dance the moozmaad, but he relies on the advice of his officials. Presumably it is the same officials who advise the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde), who produced the disaster of 1974 which brought the oil and gas industry to its knees, and who are giving the same advice today. They are doing it again. I wonder how many times we will have to go down that path before someone says, "Bring me somebody who knows something about the industry".

The Minister of Fisheries, I understand, is sending an assistant deputy minister to British Columbia in order to learn about the west coast fisheries. That is about the most sensible thing this government has done. Why does it not put an assistant deputy minister in Calgary so it can learn about the oil and gas industry, if it is so determined to take over the industry? If the government is so determined to take over the industry, for goodness sake it should learn about the industry and obtain some advice from people who know.

The employees of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources are intelligent and are motivated in terms of public service but, believe me, they do not know what they are doing. They are causing this country incredible harm. Of course, the Minister of Energy cannot be expected to know that. I am sorry that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) has left. I noticed that he was muttering yesterday about the percentage of oil revenues taken by the State of Texas. He said that it is only 20 per cent as compared to 45 per cent in Alberta, and he made some other international comparisons which indicated that we in Canada are not nearly as equitable in the field of energy as in the United States. Once again the Minister of Agriculture was repeating figures which were given to him by the Minister of Energy which were given to him by his officials who produced this inaccurate document, so it is not surprising that he repeats these inaccuracies.

The fact is that today the state of Texas collects more dollars per barrel of oil produced than the province of Alberta. Moreover, the state of Texas does not own the oil because in the United States land surface rights and land mineral rights go together. Therefore, the owner of the farm and ranch also owns the minerals underneath the land. That is not the case in parts of Canada. In Alberta 85 per cent of the oil and gas-producing properties have mineral rights which are owned by the province. The surface rights may be owned by the farmer, logger or somebody else, but the mineral rights beneath the land belong to the Crown. Therefore, when the provinces of Alberta, British Columbia and Saskatchewan collect oil and gas revenues, they collect revenues in two capacities, one as the owner, and one as the operator of the government.

● (1620)

By way of analogy, if the Minister of Agriculture were here he would appreciate the differences between what you earn on land which you lease and what you earn on land which you own. There are two levels of earnings. One, as a farmer you should expect a return on the money you invest by way of seed, plowing, labour, fertilizing and so on. Second, you should expect a rate of return by virtue of the fact you own the land. That is the situation in 85 per cent of Alberta. They are the owners as well as the government. They are the owner through the Crown or Her Majesty in right of Alberta. That is never acknowledged in looking at these numbers and making these international comparisons.

So if you look at the state of Texas and add up what the government collects, plus what the owner of the land collects, you get a net back which is much larger than the province of Alberta gets. Yet that does not prevent the Minister of Agriculture from saying, as he did all around the country, including Olds, Alberta, "Gee, we have to change the system because, after all, even in the state of Texas they do not collect as much as they do here in Canada. We need more equitable revenue sharing".

I have not even dealt with the fact that the government has, in essence, taken half the price of oil, the difference between $17.75 and $40, the going world price, and distributed that to the consumer. It is exactly the same as if it collected a tax and then had a subsidy. Ministers chose not to do it because then it would end up in the accounts of Canada, in the "Blue Book," and the public would look at it and they might ask questions. Instead, they caused the same thing to happen through the Petroleum Administration Act, but then they do not have to acknowledge receipt of those revenues. They can then say, "We are only getting 10 per cent; we need more." That is plain deceit, plain dishonesty, and not the kind of posturing which will lead this country to work together in a unified way for the benefit of all Canadians.

As long as the Government of Canada feels it must make war on the provinces and on the private sector it will, as people in wartime do, cook the books and adjust the facts to suit its argument. We will then continue to live in interesting times, the kind of times mentioned in that old Chinese curse, "May you live in interesting times."

Mr. Speaker, this Bill C-48 will be a disaster for Canada if it goes through intact. I acknowledge the minister did say he would consider amendments at committee stage. I hope he means that and that he was not genuflecting in the usual way. I have had experiences with ministers of this government saying they want to be flexible and then finding out such statements are intended more for public consumption than a statement of their intention.

One of the most disturbing aspects of this bill is the amount of discretion allowed the government. There are 86 sections in the act, 32 of which provide for ministerial or cabinet discretion—32. That is almost half of the clauses in this bill which provide for discretion. That does not fit any definition of democratic government that I know. That is a kind of executive dictatorship. What the bill says is that we, the House of Commons, should grant to the minister in 27 of the clauses, and to the cabinet in four of the clauses, the discretion to do whatever suits them. Why are we here? Why is there a Parliament? Where is there a legislative assembly? We could end all of this nonsense, this time-consuming business of having debates, discussions, committees and what not if we would just pass one clause which reads, "The governor in council shall do whatever it wants." That is the most simple thing you could do. The public might wise up to that.

It is easier if you can sneak things through in bills like this, especially if you disguise it as some sort of Canadianization, some sort of attempt to bring under control these ugly multinationals, those parochial premiers, and those awful people in the oil and gas industry.

Let us look at some of the clauses. Clause 12 reads:

> The minister may enter into an exploration agreement without a notice calling for the submission of proposals where he does not consider it to be in the public interest to give such notice—

The minister may, whenever he chooses, enter into exploration agreements. So if company XYZ made a good, healthy contribution to the Liberal party last year and the company president is a good guy and well known for his connections in the party, and he has been helpful to some friend, well, why not? They could say that under the authority granted by clause 12 they can look after the president of XYZ. He is a nice guy, and why not? It is legal, and we know from this Prime Minister that if it is legal it must be moral. His moral code is the criminal code and nothing more. So if we made it legal we have made it legal for the minister to do that. Mr. Speaker, do you think that is a hypothetical case? It is not hypothetical.

I know of an oil company whose president is a staunch Liberal, who, prior to the promulgation of the manuals and regulations by the Conservative government in 1961 did get a land position in Canada's Arctic through his political connections. This has made that man a millionaire.

Clause 14 reads:

> The minister may select any proposal submitted under this section for the purpose of negotiating an exploration agreement and in making the selection may take into account any factors he considers appropriate in the public interest—

In other words, he can do whatever he wants.

Clauses 22, 23, 26 and 27 grant ministerial discretion. He can do whatever he wants. The same is true with clauses 30, 31, 36, 37, 38, sections 1, 2, 3, 8, and on and on it goes.

Clauses 44 and 45 are the ones which are the real dandies. Clause 44 reads:

> Where the minister is satisfied that a significant discovery has been made on Canada lands, he may, by order, make a declaration of significant discovery in respect of those lands—

So if the minister is satisfied there is an oil and gas discovery he may declare it is a significant discovery. So what then? If you look at clause 45 you will see why. It reads:

> The minister, at any time after making a declaration of significant discovery, may order the drilling of a well or wells on the relevant Canada lands in accordance with such directions as may be included in the order, to commence within one year after the making of the order—

In other words, the minister sitting here in Ottawa being advised by the same people who wrote this bill may declare a significant discovery and order a company to drill a well. He can do that with no regard given to the matter that the company may have committed its exploration budgets to exploration in the offshore, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba or British Columbia. It does not matter that it may not be the choice of the company geologist, who is expert enough to have made the discovery in the first place, to drill a well. No matter what the circumstances are, the minister can order that a well be drilled.

Mr. Speaker, I ask you to imagine a situation, granted it is a hypothetical one, but one which is very real in the minds of people in the oil and gas industry in Calgary who are looking at potential investments. Imagine the situation in which your company has a piece of land and next door to it is Petro-Canada. Petro-Canada will be in the Arctic, not just as a 25 per cent participant with you but as an independent operator. So, Petro-Canada can have not only 25 per cent of your action, they can have 100 per cent of the action next door, on another piece of land. Petro-Canada and you share the same geology underneath and Petro-Canada says: "Gee, I would like to know what is going on down there but it will cost me about $5 million or $10 million to drill that hole." Petro-Canada would ask why it does not have its neighbour drill the hole. The minister will ask that neighbour to drill the hole. He can, under clause 45, and Petro-Canada gets about $10 million worth of free information.

● (1630)

If hon. members do not think that will happen, I remind the House of the fact that the vice-president of Petro-Canada was seconded to Ottawa to draft part of the budget and "The National Energy Program". If hon. members do not think that kind of conflict will occur, I suggest they live in a never-never land.

Under clause 46 the minister may, by order subject to clause 56, make a declaration of commercial discovery. Under clause 48 the minister may require any interest holder to commence production of its well notwithstanding what the company involved may feel in terms of its priorities or its financial situation. The clauses go on until we come to clause 55, which says that if the minister has reason to believe—just reason to believe—that an interest holder is failing or has failed to meet any requirement of this legislation—which means if any company fails to obey these arbitrary powers of the minister—the minister can take away his permit and cancel his interest.

So far there has been a total of $5 billion invested in Canada's Arctic offshore. A particular company may be one of those which has invested $20 million, $30 million, $50 million or $100 million, but the minister can come along and say that he wants that company to drill a hole in a certain place. The company might say that it already has its funds committed for the particular year involved. It may be drilling in British Columbia or Saskatchewan and may not feel that to drill where the minister directs would be in the interest of the company.

The company may feel it could find more oil in Saskatchewan than on the property indicated by the minister. The minister can say, "That's too bad," take away the company's licence and say, "You have just lost your investment of $100 million". And there is no appeal to the courts. The minister has that kind of authority, and there is no appeal. Surely hon. members opposite have some sense of justice and fairness and I ask them if it is moral to vest in a minister the power literally to take away investments without recourse. Accumulatively these investments amount to $5 billion. Colonel Quaddafi can put in place those types of regulations, but surely that should not be so in Canada. Surely we have not arrived at the point in Canada where we sit by and allow that kind of executive authority and that kind of executive dictatorship.

If the morality of this matter does not bother anybody, then let us think about it pragmatically. Let us remember that we are not talking about nationality. A minister could do this to a Canadian company as easily as he could to a foreign multinational. Companies make investment decisions based on money required, risk, and rate of return. One of the factors in risk—and this is increasingly so in today's world—is political risk. Heretofore Canada has a triple A rating in terms of political risk. Anybody making an investment in this country did not feel that he faced the threat of confiscation, nationalization, retroactive punitive aciton or arbitrary discretion on the part of bureaucrats which would cause him to lose a part or all of his investment. Suddenly, as a result of this bill, we put Canada down among those other countries where political risk is a very real thing.

I am sure some hon. members opposite have been reading articles in magazines, as I have, which tell of a new consulting business. It is called assessing political risk for these multinational companies. These consultants try to assess the political risk in countries like Brazil, Indonesia, Tanzania and so forth. Now they will be making their money assessing political risk in Canada. We have the great distinction of joining countries in which there is significant political risk with respect to making investments.

If there is any doubt about these arbitrary clauses which give the minister such discretionary power, the fact that it might be used and the fact that Canada's government is heading in the direction along the lines of the Colonel Quaddafis of the world, we need look no further than the provision in this bill which provides for 25 per cent retroactive seizure of the assets of companies which have explored on Canada lands. My colleague, the hon. member for Etobicoke Centre (Mr. Wilson), pointed out the other day that $5 billion has been spent on exploration on Canada lands. With this little bill the government has come along and seized $1.25 billion of that without compensation. I have done as much research as I can in this respect, and there is not a democratic country in the world of which I am aware which has seized private assets without compensation.

With the apparent blessing of the some 145 Canadians sitting on the benches opposite we are now taking the step of acknowledging and accepting the seizure of privately-owned assets without compensation. I really wonder about the morality of that. I am afraid that hon. members opposite will be justifying this with some of the arguments used by the minister. For example, the minister said in his speech as reported at page 5670 of Hansard for December 11, and I quote:

> In any event, I would be hard pressed to name any area of the world today where a more favourable exploration situation could be found, both from the standpoint of geological promise and investment climate.
> In the United Kingdom, for instance, and I will not talk about the recent 20 per cent tax which the U.K. government has imposed on the oil and gas industry in England, one would encounter a far more severe taxation system involving, in fact, four levels of taxation of petroleum production. In addition, there is one U.K. state enterprise empowered to purchase up to 51 per cent of all oil production, and another one with a monopoly with respect to all gas production.

If we believed that, we would say that we are not as bad as the United Kingdom, that the United Kingdom is obviously exploring in the North Sea and that therefore perhaps this is not so bad. I do not know if the minister is just badly advised or distorting the facts, but the real facts are that in the United Kingdom there is a state company, British National Oil Company, which comes in for 51 per cent. However, a private company drilling in the North Sea gets 175 per cent of its capital back before any taxes are collected. This British National Oil Company was created in 1975 and, yes, indeed, from 1975 onward it has been a 51 per cent partner after that private company gets its 175 per cent back. However, there is no participation in leases made before 1975. These was no retroactivity with respect to the British National Oil Company. Only in Canada do we have retroactivity where the state comes in for 25 per cent retroactively with no compensation. That happens only in Canada, not in the United Kingdom, as the minister stated in this House or implied in this House in an attempt to justify this immoral act.

Not only is the government not being honest with the Canadian public and with its own backbenchers, in terms of comparing what we have done with what has been done in the rest of the world, but it has not even informed other members of the government. For example, the Department of External Affairs was quite shocked when it saw the document the same night the rest of the country did on October 28, as was the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, because we will be hit with retaliation for our intention to seize 25 per cent of privately-owned assets. If we have not received it yet, we will very soon be receiving a very stiff note from the United States pointing out that it has an act called the mineral lands mining act of 1920 which states that if Americans are treated in one fashion in a foreign country, then nationals of that country will be treated the same way in the United States.

I quote from the act of 1920:

> Deposits of . . . oil, or . . . gas and lands containing such deposits owned by the United States, . . . shall be subject to disposition in the form and manner provided by this chapter to citizens of the United States, . . . or to any corporation organized under the laws of the United States, . . . Citizens of another country, the laws, customs or regulations of which deny similar or like privileges to citizens or corporations of this country, shall not by stock ownership, stock holding, or stock control, own any interest in any lease acquired under the provisions of this chapter.

That means a whole lot of Canadians are going to find their assets seized in the United States in retaliation for this seizure of assets in Canada under the provisions of the lands and mining act of 1920, unless the government changes its mind and backs off on this provision, which I think it will have to do.

Also, we are in violation of agreements with the OECD. Member countries are required to notify the OECD within 30 days of the introduction of measures which restrict new investment by foreign-controlled enterprises already established in their territory. We neglected to do that. Therefore, we are in violation of our agreement with OECD. American law compels them to retaliate against Canadian companies in the United States. We are also in violation of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade. That is all right, though. We have good friends in the sands of Araby. We can all learn to be the muezzin, and we will be very happy.

Mr. Cullen: Are you still harping on that?

Mr. Andre: I find it absolutely and totally offensive and immoral that the government of my country would act in a way that would win the applause of Colonel Qaddafi.

Mr. Cullen: You are unbelievable!

Mr. Andre: Morality aside, pragmatically I would ask the members of the government to think what they are doing in terms of future investment and Canada's credibility. Think what they are doing to the credibility of this country if they sanction and support this kind of action, the seizure of assets retroactively. It cannot be rationalized, as members opposite have attempted to do, on the basis that because there were tax incentives in the past the Government of Canada has somehow contributed to the exploration and is, therefore, only taking back that which it already paid for. The reality is that the rules under which companies and individuals operated were established. Those were the rules. We cannot now turn around and say those rules which allowed them to make a successful investment are going to be changed, and we are now going to seize part of your assets and become a 25 per cent owner of what you accomplished under those rules.

Talk about credibility! How can anybody trust this government in the future? If a company which received a DREE grant succeeds, it will now be open to having some of its assets seized by this government because of that grant. What is even more offensive is the notion that tax incentives represent a gift from the government to the individual who takes advantage of that incentive.

I do not think of my registered retirement savings plan as a gift from the government to me. I do not view a dollar of taxes not collected as a gift from the government to me. The money does not belong to the government. It belongs to those who earn it. Governments have to collect money to operate those things we decide have to be operated on behalf of all of us, but the fact that they do not collect some money does not turn that money into a gift from the government. To define a tax not collected as a bequeathment is, at least, intellectually dishonest.

I again ask hon. members to think long and hard about the ramifications this will have on our reputation, not just with foreigners but with Canadians. Capital cannot be kept captive. It goes where it is wanted and rewarded. It is not foreign multinationals that are now leaving Canada. All the foreign multinationals are doing is cutting back on their growth plans. All the government has done to them is restrict their growth potential. In some cases it has seized part of their assets, but it is not driving them out of the country. They have no place to go. Imperial Oil cannot go to the United States.

Mr. Cullen: They have a good deal here; that's why they are staying.

Mr. Andre: The hon. member for Sarnia (Mr. Cullen) should be aware of this. The United States is reserved for Exxon, the North Sea is reserved for Esso U.K., and the Middle East is reserved for another Exxon subsidiary. Imperial Oil has nowhere to go. It is stuck here. You cannot drive them out of the country. They cannot go to any other country, but the Canadians can, and they are going in droves. Louis Rukeseyer, an American analyst, wrote an article in the Houston Chronicle entitled "Thank You, Canada". In it he talks about what a great boon to the United States this national energy policy has been.

Skilled geologists, geophysicists and engineers are going to the United States in large numbers. They are taking with them billions of dollars, all kinds of machinery and rigs, and talent. Walking around Denver today is like walking around Calgary five years ago. Several large office buildings are under construction, being built by and filled by Canadians. This government has done more for the economy of Denver than the United States ever has. It has done more for the economy of Denver than it has for the entire eastern half of this country.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his allotted time has expired.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): I have the honour to inform the House that a message has been received from the Senate informing this House that the Senate has passed Bill C-51, to amend the Clean Air Act, without amendment.

CANADA OIL AND GAS ACT

MEASURE RESPECTING OIL AND GAS INTERESTS

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Lalonde that Bill C-48, to regulate oil and gas interests in Canada lands and to amend the Oil and Gas Production and Conservation Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works.

Mr. Roy MacLaren (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to comment on the speech of the hon. member who spoke immediately before me. There will be opportunity to deal with some of his points when the bill is before the committee. However, I should say that it is inappropriate in this House, and not in accordance with the traditions of either this House or of the provincial legislatures, to attack public servants, and especially to do that by name. The policies which are embodied in this bill and more generally in the energy policy are policies of the government. The minister, the cabinet and the government generally are responsible for those policies. We do not need to have public servants named and attacked in the House of Commons.

● (1650)

Speaking to the bill itself, Bill C-48, which we have before us, we are dealing with the development of Canada lands, an area of Canada which is more than twice the size of the ten provinces combined, an area of approximately 1.5 million square miles in the territories and the Arctic, and 2.5 million square miles offshore.

Those areas are essential to the energy future of Canada because they contain, or are thought to contain, much of the oil reserves which will enable Canadians to enjoy an energy security that is unparalleled in the industrial world.

We have before us a bill which recognizes the importance to move more decisively and more rapidly toward the development of those new and additional resources. We have before us a bill which takes into account and further elaborates the previous practices developed during an earlier period of Canada's energy history.

Members will recall that when the question of the development of our offshore and Arctic resources was first brought forward, there was an abundance of cheap energy, an abundance of cheap oil. At that time it did not seem to any Canadian that there was any particular urgency to develop the Canada lands. Those were areas of Canada largely unknown in terms of their energy resources. The practices of the government of the day were to permit the licensing of exploration in those areas in what today would seem to be an unnecessarily leisurely fashion.

More than 20 years ago we had exploration practices in place which would allow the interested companies to take licences which enabled them in effect to sit on the land indefinitely, at very little cost, and with no real commitment to exploration or development. Clearly that situation, as the world energy problems increased, became more and more unsatisfactory. Recognition was given to that unsatisfactory state of affairs by the government through developing, in consultation with industry, a new policy which would have accelerated the rate of exploration and development in the north and offshore. That concern found expression in Bill C-20 to which reference has been made during this debate.

Some members may recall that under the old system companies applied to the federal government for permission to explore on a block of Canada land and, if an application was approved, an exploration permit with a duration of as much as 12 years was granted. In addition, companies which were entitled subsequently to convert the exploration licence into a development permit or lease had the opportunity to sit on that land for as much as 21 years and, in fact, even renew their opportunity for a period beyond that.

In such circumstances, the public control was limited and scrutiny was weak. Many of the most promising Canada lands, those with the greatest potential for oil and gas development, were effectively alienated from public control and from more vigorous competitors who might have been expected to bring on-stream the resources more rapidly.

Additionally, there was in both the former practices and in Bill C-20 inadequate provision for the protection of a fragile environment both offshore, Atlantic and Pacific, but especially in the high Arctic. There was little in the old act to minimize environmental disruption because that too was not then a subject of great public concern.

Finally, in regard to Bill C-20 and to the practices of two decades or more, there was little recognition given to the situation of small Canadian gas and oil companies. They were few in number at the time and were without any real incentive to participate in the challenging exploration and development possibilities in the Canada lands.

It was as a result of the growing concern that the previous practices were inadequate, that they were not leading to the development which was increasingly recognized as important to Canada's energy future, that the government published a policy statement in May, 1976, which undertook to provide for the governance of oil and gas rights in the frontier lands. That policy statement sought to increase exploration and development, to accelerate the flow of accurate information, of which there was little enough, and to encourage greater Canadian content and participation in the resource development.

The minister of the day noted when referring to Bill C-20, and I would like to quote for a moment from him:

> These changes will update the regulations to provide Canadians with increased control over and participation in frontier exploration—

The minister brought that bill forward at the time to do a number of things: to increase the required levels of exploration work; to reduce statutory land tenure; to increase land rentals; and to provide Petro-Canada with an option for a 25 per cent working interest in special renewal permits or provisional leases and an option to acquire existing Crown lands as well as 25 per cent of lands returning to the Crown.

In addition, Bill C-20 provided for a 10 per cent royalty plus a progressive incremental royalty on field profits. The confidential periods of exploration information were reduced, or would have been reduced by that bill, and the minister would have been empowered to do a variety of other essential things to ensure the more rapid and orderly development of our frontier lands. The minister would have set prices, taken royalties in kind rather than in cash. He could have ordered drilling on permits or leases where no such drilling was going forward. He could have ordered production to begin or production into specific domestic markets. The minister could have, where discovery had been made, set a minimum level of Canadian ownership as a condition of production and indicate the manner in which that level was to be obtained.

I have spent a moment on those aspects of Bill C-20—which died on the order paper some three years ago—because many of the features of the present Bill C-48 have been before the Canadian public, and before this House of Commons for that period of time. Certainly there are additional features in the new legislation, but the broad outlines of Bill C-48 were adumbrated in Bill C-20. They were also subsequently set forth during the election campaign and in our more recent National Energy Program. Our party indicated during the election campaign that if elected we would move to strengthen the role of Petro-Canada and that we would accelerate the drive toward self-sufficiency in petroleum products. For the same reasons that motivated us then, we believe the reform of our oil and gas regime in Canada lands is even more pressing today.

Those who wanted to anticipate the aspects of Bill C-48 pertaining to Canada lands would have done well to refer to the national energy policy where the commitment is made to accelerate the development of our frontier resources and to enable Canadians to participate in that accelerated development to a degree which has not been the case in the past.

Among the most important provisions in Bill C-48 not included in the former Bill C-20 is one relating to the concept of a 25 per cent Crown share, an aspect of the bill to which reference has been made during this debate. That provision replaces one in Bill C-20 which provided for both a 25 per cent back-in option for the Crown and a special Petro-Canada land selection preference. I believe members of the House will be familiar with that former back-in option. However, with regard to the special Petro-Canada land selection preferences, members may recall this took the form of Petro-Canada's right to select up to 25 per cent of all lands reverting to the Crown during the period of seven years. Neither the 25 per cent back-in or the preferential selection rights are included in the bill because they are being replaced by the 25 per cent Crown share concept.

One or two opposition members have suggested that while it would be fair and just to ask companies applying for new permits to abide by these new and, in our view, welcome rules, all existing permits should be exempted. To me that is a little like saying we are going to increase the income tax but only for new taxpayers and that we will exempt all previous taxpayers. I would suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that that would be an unfair and unjust policy.

As other members on this side of the House have mentioned, Canadians, through Petro-Canada or another Crown agency, will participate through the 25 per cent Crown share in the exciting new prospects that await all Canadians in the development of frontier lands. One member in the opposition has described this as confiscation without compensation. I would suggest that his statement is merely rhetoric without reality. The resources found on Canada lands are 100 per cent Canadian owned since oil and gas underground is 100 per cent Canadian. Surely it is not unreasonable to expect a 25 per cent share above ground when, in return for the 25 per cent Crown share, the government is giving a minimum 25 per cent cash grant for exploration costs to all companies, whether foreign or Canadian. For Canadian companies of at least 75 per cent Canadian ownership, the incentive is especially encouraging. The grant will increase to 80 per cent for every exploration dollar spent. In other words, the federal government will give a company 80 cents on every dollar spent.

The 25 per cent Crown share is nothing new. It recognizes and replaces the earlier practice of securing a 25 per cent back-in for Petro-Canada. By making the legislation applicable to all permit and leaseholders, we are giving expression to the laudable goal of equal and universal treatment. I might add that companies will have between six months and one year to renegotiate their current leases. If that is not sufficient time for a company and the government to reach a satisfactory agreement, then the company can opt for a provisional lease of up to five years. In essence, the 25 per cent Crown share is in fact a long overdue catch-up for the Canadian people. The taxpayers of this country have paid more than their share of the development costs to provide us all with energy security, which all Canadians have a right to expect.

I might further add that in a policy development as necessarily complex as that in the case of the 25 per cent Crown share in the frontier lands, there will be anomalies. It is our intention to explore, as we have already begun to do with some of the companies involved, any potential situations which would give rise to particular hardship, should such hardship arise unintentionally. It is not our purpose here today to speculate on such problems. I am sure that when we are at the committee stage of our proceedings there will be opportunity to hear those most directly involved in the industry and so benefit from their descriptions of anomalies or particular difficulties which may arise as a result of the legislation before us.

With regard to the development of the exploration permits in the north, should Petro-Canada decide that it is in the best interests of Canadians to become actively involved in production prior to the approval of leases for production, then Petro-Canada will, of course, pay its fair share of production costs, just like any other partner.

As part of our commitment to the greater Canadianization of the petroleum industry, we require by this legislation that companies in a production lease must develop a level of Canadian ownership of at least 50 per cent, including, of course, the Crown share which I have just noted.

• (1710)

The principal purpose of the bill is to encourage Canadian private oil companies to form a consortia necessary for offshore and frontier projects, and equally to encourage private foreign oil companies to enable Canadians to take part in their activities in the frontier lands. We seek from those foreign oil companies greater opportunities for Canadians to participate. The bill encourages large multinational corporations to share their experience and expertise with smaller, less experienced Canadian companies which will gain accordingly from their partners' universal experience. We believe that with the incentives which we are offering in this bill, Canadian companies will be better equipped to take a leading role in the development of our frontier resources.

The final aspect of our Canadianization objective is that companies which apply for exploration and development rights will be required to demonstrate how their operations will bring industrial and employment benefits to Canada. I believe that all of us on both sides of the House are conscious of the enormous benefits which will flow to every region of Canada through the further development of the energy sector.

We have been reminded, during the course of this and other debates, of the fact that the energy industry will act as a major motor for our further industrial development. In this bill, members will find a specific requirement for those participating in exploration and development in the Canada lands to seek the supply of goods and services from Canadian companies rather than from foreign or offshore companies. This means more jobs for Canadians and increased demand for Canadian goods and services.

I want to turn for a moment to the Petroleum Incentives Program which plays a major part in the encouragement of Canadian exploration and development in the frontier areas. Under the program, a generous cash allowance or grant for petroleum exploration and development expenditures incurred after December 31, 1980, will be available to all those entering the frontier areas. It is estimated that the incentives involved may amount to $1 billion annually. These incentives are heavily oriented toward Canadians so that we can all, directly or indirectly, participate more in the development of our Canada lands. The incentives also are intended to replace the so-called super-depletion allowance of the past which the previous government had moved toward reducing and shortly thereafter toward eliminating altogether, and which we in this bill are doing as well. We are replacing the super-depletion allowances by the new Petroleum Incentives Program.

Under this program, enterprises which are at least 75 per cent Canadian owned will receive, as I noted, incentives ranging from 80 per cent of exploration costs on Canada lands to 25 per cent for development costs in the provinces.

The program is self-assessing, that is, industry will be able to calculate the incentives on their eligible expenses according to regulations. An applicant, who may be a corporation or an individual, may submit claims as soon as the program has been formally established by legislation. Eligible expenses under the program will be those incurred on oil or gas projects where the applicant already has an interest or will earn an interest as a result of the expenditures. These and other definitions will be elaborated to provide the industry with the opportunity to discuss the detailed provisions which will flow from Bill C-48 and which are intended to encourage Canadians to negotiate better deals in order to be eligible for maximum incentives.

The program as a whole will be administered by the proposed Petroleum Incentives Board which, I am pleased to say, will have offices both in Calgary and in Ottawa to assist applicants.

I have noted already that the intention of the earlier legislation, Bill C-20, was to help to ensure that companies did not simply sit on resources indefinitely. Under the legislation before us now, those companies will be required to meet more vigorous work or development conditions. The active leadership provided by this legislation will ensure that the projects in our Territories, in the Arctic and offshore will proceed much more quickly than would have been the case under the previous legislation. So, too, will the projects proceed in a more orderly manner as a result of the terms of Bill C-48. The government will be able to direct the rate of exploration, the timing and development and the level of production of oil and gas on Canada lands for the benefit of all Canadians. The minister will have the authority to ensure that leaseholders commence production of oil and gas and continue to produce at specified rates and quantities for the duration of their permits and leases.

Some hon. members have expressed some concern about the possible abuse of ministerial authority because of the discretionary powers which are necessarily entrusted to the minister in the legislation. I would remind the House that any careful reading of the bill will reveal that discretionary powers of the minister can be challenged in the courts and reviewed by the courts. There are appeal mechanisms built into the legislation.

Finally, there are tough new controls provided in the legislation for protecting the environment. Companies will be required to contribute to a fund to provide for the basic knowledge needed to analyse any possible environmental degradation. In addition, should any oil spill occur, the government does not have to prove negligence or fault to secure funds for clean-up or compensation.

These stringent provisions of the legislation provide for the absolute liability of the lead operator of any consortium for any damage caused by any oil spill. I might also add that any development, as is made plain in the legislation, will necessarily reflect the social and environmental concerns and the legitimate aspirations of the native peoples of the north and of the residents of coastal provinces.

In conclusion, I want to note that the legislation before us does provide for more opportunities for Canadians, not only to participate directly or indirectly in the development of our Canada lands, but also more opportunities for Canadians to provide the goods and services to sustain the growth in our petroleum sector. We have no doubt that, given the opportunity, smaller Canadian companies will measure up to the opportunities and challenges embodied in this legislation.

As the minister said, we shall welcome the referral of this bill to the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works to review this legislation. We are eager to see the bill come before committee. It will provide an opportunity to hear the comments of those persons active in the industry, of those persons with environmental concerns, or the interests of native people, so that we can proceed expeditiously to develop the great new opportunities which face us all in the Canada lands in the north, in the ocean areas and in the territories.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Mr. Speaker, Bill C-48, to enact the Canada oil and gas act will govern the exploration and development of the so-called Canada lands. What is equally important is that the bill represents the government's implementation of "The National Energy Program" first revealed on October 28, 1980, on the occasion of the budget speech.

It is claimed that the National Energy Program has two basic goals: first, to develop Canadian energy resources so that energy self-sufficiency will be achieved across Canada, and second, the National Energy Program adopts measures intended to Canadianize the nation's energy industry. At face value these are laudable goals, but closer scrutiny reveals a plan and a policy which, if implemented without regard to the realities of the worldwide energy complex, will at best nationalize and socialize the energy industry.

If that were only my own opinion I would not expect it to be taken too highly, but I notice that an editorial writer in the Halifax Mail-Star took much the same position. He commented upon the remarks of the parliamentary secretary, who just spoke in the House, at a press conference when he said that the new bill was an affirmation of the government's view that offshore resources belonged to the people of Canada. The commentator said that this was quite an interesting statement for many reasons. He indicated that, for one thing, it almost sounded like a socialist battlecry. "Workers of the world unite", said the commentator. Also he said, "It seems to me that the legislation means I own a part of the resource just like Russian citizens own their energy resource". He went on to say that certainly the ownership of a resource like oil is really not the question; the question is how the resources of the country can develop these assets to the benefit of Canadians. Finally he went on to say that while he had not yet seen the details of the new legislation, the press reports were very disturbing. He said that the Trudeau government seemed to have viewed its election mandate as support for the nationalization of an industry and the further socialization of the country as a whole. Those were the remarks of a commentator as reported in the Halifax Mail-Star.

The other real possibility is that the National Energy Program will bankrupt Canadian-owned energy producers in the oil and gas field and drive away from Canada those non-Canadian Corporations and syndicates which, until now, have spearheaded energy exploration and development on land, on the frontier and offshore. This possibility could well become a reality under the National Energy Program.

The new Canada oil and gas act must then be examined both on its own merits and in the context of the government-sponsored National Energy Program which may well be designed to nationalize and socialize Canada's energy industry under the guise of Canadianization. If this covert action is taken by the federal authority, it is in the face of a constitutional provision which clearly vests ownership and control of natural resources, the life blood of the energy industry, in the ten provinces of Canada. Yet the Government of Canada has the unmitigated gall to treat legitimate provincial concerns and complaints with scorn and cries of disloyal disregard of our natural purpose. What calumny, what cynicism, what naked lust for political power!

Why does the federal authority trammel provincial rights and regional interests in its grab for power and control? The answer is clear—so that it can finance the national works, undertakings and services which have been installed and established. In the years the Liberal government has held office, all these services have taken hold. We can look at the St. Lawrence Seaway with its $600 million write-off of debt. What about Mirabel airport with its $192 million loss? Also there is the Canadian postal service with its $500 million annual deficit. We must not forget the $500 million bribe to obtain the votes of our senior citizens while contributing little or nothing to their general welfare. The list goes on and on.

Let me talk about energy. This very day the Government of Canada is spending $10 million to subsidize the importation of 400,000 barrels of foreign oil for use in eastern Canada. This very week Saudi Arabia, the major source of our foreign oil, increased the cost of its crude oil to $38.50 per barrel to bring its prices in line with other OPEC nations. That means the Canadian government will spend on an annual basis over $4 billion on oil imports which approaches 10 per cent of all government spending. Canadian consumers should realize that a $1 per barrel increase in crude oil can result in a four-cent increase in the price of gasoline at the pump. Gas produced in Canada from Saudi oil will cost almost eight cents more per gallon when delivered to an automobile at a Canadian service station.

Why is there this massive financial problem? It is because the Liberal government did not establish a national energy program in the early 1970s when it became obvious that dependence on foreign oil would result in disaster, nor did the Liberal government recognize the error of its ways when in late 1978 the revolution in Iran further disrupted international oil supplies. It was not until 1980 that the government came forward with a national energy program and any government commitment to Canadian energy self-sufficiency.

It is no wonder that the National Energy Program announced on October 28, 1980, will have to take from the provinces of Canada and the private sector in order to remedy the financial damage and discord created by the total lack of an effective energy policy in force in the 1970s. Is that what the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) meant when he said, "Welcome to the 1980s". What is the price of this decade of disenchantment for the provinces and the private sector? We have already experienced some very practical aspects and application of private sector disenchantment. Recent announcements indicate a very serious situation in Canada. Today it was disclosed that 60 or more oil-drilling rigs have left Canada to drill elsewhere, with a resultant loss of more than 2,000 Canadian jobs. There are more drilling operators and oil rigs posed to leave Canada for greater opportunities elsewhere.

I have before me a report which indicates the Ottawa Association of Oil Well Drilling Contractors said recently that a survey of its members indicated that some 70 drilling rigs now in Canada are committed to leave the country by June 30. That figure was based upon a December survey. I have another report before me indicating that troubled Canadian oil firms are finding exploration in the United States more attractive. Also it indicates that after five years the western Canadian exploration business seems to have lost its sparkle, and more and more Canadian oil companies are concluding that exploration in the United States looks far more attractive.

The report goes on to indicate that the southward move is well under way and it includes nearly every Canadian-controlled oil company, with the possible exception of the state-owned PetroCan; also the largest multinationals such as Canada's biggest oil company, Imperial Oil, which is 70 per cent-owned by Exxon Corporation, appear to be remaining in Canada, and that by custom such companies do not venture outside Canada. So, that is the strange paradox of Canadian-owned companies leaving Canada for more attractive prospects in the United States and other countries, and the multinationals staying here. What has the Canadianization of the oil industry accomplished for Canadians?

There is another serious difficulty which is caused by this matter, that is, the dispute between federal and provincial authorities over the ownership of offshore oil rights. I will speak more about that later on, but it has resulted in a slowdown in the operations and exploration of the oil fields off the coast of Nova Scotia and in gas exploration off the coast of Newfoundland. We must review this Canadianization and this dispute between the Government of Canada and the provinces on the east coast, with very serious concern.

● (1730)

Let me outline our problems on the east coast with respect to the federal government and its National Energy Program by indicating the extent of the land grab that is represented by this new legislation called the Canada oil and gas act. An editorial writer in the Halifax Mail-Star has pointed out that one of the major disappointments of the constitutional talks which have dominated government concern this year is Ottawa's refusal to recognize the maritime provinces' legitimate claims to ownership of the undersea land around them. What makes the matter particularly appalling is that the federal government has summarily ignored a unanimous request from the other ten partners in confederation, the provinces, that the territory be formally recognized as the property of the provinces by the sea.

What makes this question particularly galling for maritimers is that the federal government intends to ask parliamentary approval, which it has now done, for constitutional change which it deems necessary to redress the grievances of one part of Canada. Toward one of the most manifest examples of injustice in Canada's history, however, Ottawa over the years has demonstrated no concern whatever.

The editorial writer referred to the big giveaway of land in the first half of the century to Ontario and the western provinces, and the big take-away of land in the second half of the century. He referred to legislation like this bill which, in effect, expropriates the offshore lands and mineral rights which are contained therein from the eastern coast provinces and particularly from the maritimes. The writer went on to say that he believed that the maritime members of parliament have an obligation to insist that the national government abandon its negative attitude toward the offshore claim and recognize the merits of the case which, as I have said, is supported by all the provincial governments.

In trying to detail and document this land-grab by the federal government I will review very briefly some of the modern legislation which has been passed by this House with respect to offshore interests. In 1964 the Parliament of Canada enacted the Territorial Sea and Fishing Zones Act of Canada. That act was very modest in its intent. It simply established an offshore zone that ran to three miles for certain purposes, and to 12 miles for other purposes. It caused no great concern to anybody.

Later in 1968 Parliament enacted the Oil and Gas Production and Conservation Act. That act applied to the oil and gas in the Yukon Territory and the Northwest Territories. Clearly these lands of Canada were under the control of the federal Government of Canada. It again caused no concern. But subsequently the Parliament of Canada, acting, of course, under the authority and carrying out the intentions of the Government of Canada, amended the Oil and Gas Production and Conservation Act and said that the act applied in respect of oil and gas to any of the areas which it then described as those submarine areas adjacent to the coast of Canada to a water depth of 200 metres or beyond that limit to where that depth of the super-adjacent waters admits the exploitation of natural resources of the seabed and subsoil thereof.

That was the beginning of the federal land grab, the extension of the provision of the Oil and Gas Production and Conservation Act, which formally applied simply to the Yukon Territory and the Northwest Territories, to the submarine lands off the coast of the maritime provinces and the province of British Columbia.

That provision was prompted by a ruling of the Supreme Court of Canada on a case between the federal government and the government of British Columbia involving offshore mineral rights. The case was decided in favour of the Government of Canada and that, I assume, was what prompted that legislation.

Now the federal government is asking the Parliament of Canada to enact quite a different provision in Bill C-48 as part of the new Canada oil and gas act. That piece of legislation not only applies the provisions of the act to the offshore and submarine lands, but it claims that those lands are the property of Canada. That is where the expression "Canada lands" assumes much more significance than in the past. If the Parliament of Canada enacts Bill C-48, it will be saying that those lands off the coast of the province of Nova Scotia, historically claimed by the province of Nova Scotia, will be and are the property of Canada. That is a matter of grave and great dispute and one which will not be let go very simply by the passage of a bill by this Parliament, when Nova Scotia has traditionally laid claim to those lands for years.

I would like to cite an experience I once had. It stems from my employment in the department of the attorney general of the province of Nova Scotia back in 1957. I can recall very vividly in 1958 being asked, as a legislative draftsman, to prepare a statute which involved the exploitation of the seabed adjoining the southwestern shore of Nova Scotia for the purpose of extracting seaweeds, including Irish moss and kelp. I had occasion at that time to correspond with the Department of Justice of the Government of Canada with respect to its attitude to Nova Scotia enacting legislation to control these submarine seaweeds.

At that point in time there was absolutely no objection from the law officers of the Crown to Nova Scotia enacting such legislation to control the harvesting of seaweeds off the coast of Nova Scotia. In fact in 1958 legislation was passed to institute the sea plants harvesting act, which claimed for Nova Scotia the right to deal with those seaweeds off the coast of the province on the basis that the province owned the land and had authority to deal with matter growing on the land.

This attitude on the part of Nova Scotia extends from traditional involvement in the coal mines which run under the submarine lands off the coast of Cape Breton. For years Nova Scotia had, by legislation, controlled the operation of the coal mines, which in some cases extend six or more miles out under the seabed and, with the development of new mines recently, may now extend even further. To my knowledge the Government of Canada has never challenged Nova Scotia's right to legislate in that area, and that legislation is based upon the claim of ownership.

Clearly, under the British North America Act, Nova Scotia has no other claim to enact legislation of that kind apart from its claim to ownership. Let me review very briefly Nova Scotia's claim to ownership of offshore lands. Nova Scotia has always been a seaward-looking province. Fishing, shipbuilding, and ocean trading were the province's lifeblood from the start. More recently the province has become a centre for ocean-related manufacturing and technology. Now there are strong indications that offshore resources will make Nova Scotia an oil and gas producing province as well.

The origins of Nova Scotia's claim to the offshore go back to the sixteen hundreds. The first colonists were utterly dependent on the bounty of the ocean for food and transportation, and for that reason King James I in 1621 granted the Royal Charter of Nova Scotia to Sir William Alexander which included as part of the territory of Nova Scotia a band of sea stretching about 120 miles southward from the coast. This band easily encompasses Sable Island and much of the Georges Bank and the Scotian Shelf. I would point out that it is the Scotian Shelf which is of great interest in terms of oil and gas exploration. These boundaries were observed for many years, despite numerous conquests and treaty settlements.

● (1740)

Without reviewing all the details of the Treaty of Utrecht of 1713, and without going into all of the historic data related to published maps and charts, I would like to say that the boundaries were redescribed in a major settlement between England and France—the Treaty of Paris of 1763. That description remained fairly constant through the various royal commissions of the nineteenth century, until confederation. The southern boundary was the Atlantic Ocean from Cape Breton to Sable Island, including all other islands within 40 leagues of the coast, with all the rights, members and appurtenances whatever thereto belonging.

Before confederation Nova Scotia exercised its offshore responsibilities and passed many laws regulating piracy, navigation, shipwrecks, and criminal activity at sea. The British North America Act of 1867 provided that Nova Scotia's limits would be exactly the same after confederation as before. These historical references might well cause the Supreme Court of Canada to decide the question of offshore mineral ownership in favour of Nova Scotia because, Mr. Speaker, in the reference to the Supreme Court of Canada made in relation to the British Columbia offshore lands and minerals, the court found no evidence of any kind that the boundaries of British Columbia ever extended west of the Pacific Ocean, or that British Columbia ever exercised legislative jurisdiction offshore. But Nova Scotia, as I have indicated, has quite a different claim based on historical facts.

I would like to say very quickly that legal confrontation is not the route for settling offshore jurisdictional questions. Provincial-federal agreement is an alternative which most favour. Instead of relying wholly on events predating 1867, a negotiated settlement recognizing the needs and means of Canada and the province of Nova Scotia in the 1980s seems a more sensible way to resolve any matters in dispute.

Mr. Speaker, how can this dispute be resolved? Please bear in mind the tremendous effect this dispute can have on reassessing and retrograding the kind of offshore exploration that ought to be taking place right now off the coast of Nova Scotia and off the coast of Newfoundland. In that respect I refer to a November 20 article in The Globe and Mail in which a spokesman for the Mobil Oil Company, which is one of the principal companies involved in the exploration of the Hibernia oilfield, was reported as saying that the federal-provincial dispute could hinder production and exploration on that site. It is said in the article that a production plan for the promising Hibernia oil site in the Atlantic Ocean, off Newfoundland, is now being drawn up but a bitter dispute could cloud the actual start of production. Of course they are referring there to the dispute between the Government of Canada and the government of the province of Newfoundland with respect to the ownership of the submarine lands, which are the site of the Hibernia drilling operations. Mobil Oil has threatened to slow down or stop its operation if the dispute is not settled.

A more recent piece in the same newspaper of December 17, 1980, says that Ottawa, meaning the Government of Canada, has vowed to support the firms which are involved in the Hibernia exploration in any dispute with the government of the province of Newfoundland. I see the hon. members from Newfoundland wince when they hear about this, because what the Government of Canada is saying is that we will use the strength and authority of the Government of Canada to beat down a claim of the government of Newfoundland regardless of the legitimacy of that claim. I say that is not the way in the 1980s to resolve disputes of this kind between governments. It is not the way to resolve disputes, simply to use the power and might of the federal authority against a province like Nova Scotia or Newfoundland without regard to the needs and means of those provinces, and without regard to the historical facts which make up their claim.

How can we then resolve the dispute between the provinces which are interested in offshore development like Newfoundland and Nova Scotia, and the Government of Canada? There is a simple way to do it, Mr. Speaker, and that is to pass legislation in this House extending the boundaries of the province of Nova Scotia and the province of Newfoundland and any other provinces which claim offshore and submarine lands, extend the boundaries of those provinces to include those lands. This is a completely opposite course to that which the government has taken in the introduction of Bill C-48, which extends not the boundaries of the provinces but the boundaries of Canada. In defining Canada lands clause 2 says that included are:

> (b) those submarine areas adjacent to the coast of Canada and extending throughout the natural prolongation of the land territory of Canada to the outer edge of the continental margin or to a distance of two hundred nautical miles from the base lines from which the breadth of the territorial sea of Canada is measured, whichever is the greater;

Mr. Speaker, I have introduced in this House a private member's bill which does exactly the same thing for the province of Nova Scotia. But it does it legitimately by extending the boundaries of the province of Nova Scotia, and not in this illegitimate course of action which the government has chosen to follow, by simply extending the boundaries of Canada without the consent and concurrence of the province of Nova Scotia, or any other province.

There is another, second method, to settling the dispute between the provincial governments and the Government of Canada with respect to offshore ownership, and that is a reference to the Supreme Court of Canada. I was quite pleasantly surprised to see in "The National Energy Program", introduced in the budget on October 28, 1980, a reference to just that problem and an admission on the part of the Government of Canada in that document called "The National Energy Program" that the federal-provincial dispute could retard the development of offshore lands. I thought, Mr. Speaker, that the Government of Canada had finally agreed to refer this matter to the Supreme Court of Canada and have it resolved, at least at the legal authority level. But I have since found out that that is not the case. The Government of Canada has no intention of referring the dispute to the Supreme Court of Canada for resolution, and the statement in "The National Energy Program" is only intended to mean that if somebody else wants to go to the trouble of bringing the matter before the courts the federal government will not object. We all know the federal government has no right to object in any event. So it is giving us nothing in this gratuitous statement with respect to reference.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I think because of the way that the National Energy Program and this Bill C-48, will reflect on offshore development, and on the provinces which claim offshore resources, we will see the matter go before the courts very soon. It may have, in the case of Nova Scotia, different results than the Government of Canada might have contemplated, particularly when the historical facts relating to the long history of Nova Scotia, its long involvement with offshore activities and offshore mineral exploration, fisheries, aquaculture, and all those things by which Nova Scotia exercised jurisdiction offshore, are brought out. All of these things may add up to a very strong case before the court and the result may come as a surprise to the Government of Canada.

The third and most effective way to resolve the dispute is by agreement, as I have already indicated. The federal government in 1978 proposed an agreement in which it said that the federal government would own and have control over offshore resources through ownership in land, as well as through jurisdiction under the British North America Act, but would return to the provinces involved 75 per cent of the revenues derived from the ownership of offshore resources. The federal government, of course, retains the other 25 per cent. This appeared to be a sensible agreement, but I am sure it was not the ratio which was offered that gave rise to the concern on the part of the provinces. It was what the federal government intended to do with respect to the development of those offshore resources. Would our federal government exercise its control so as to retard development, perhaps in the interests of some other part of Canada? Would it contribute funds and services of the kind which are required to accelerate development? The provinces involved simply could not leave this whole matter to the control and concern of the Government of Canada. So the agreement failed in 1978 when the Liberal government in Nova Scotia was defeated for just those kinds of reasons, that it was dabbling with the rights of the province of Nova Scotia in a manner unacceptable to most of the people. Any hope of an agreement based on a 75-25 split of revenues was abandoned.

So we are left with the problem. The problem must be resolved, Mr. Speaker. It cannot be resolved by simply bringing before this House a bill which in effect expropriates the interest of the seacoast provinces, and particularly Nova Scotia, in their offshore resources.

● (1750)

Let me speak more generally of Nova Scotia's energy problem, which is very much related to offshore resource development. In Nova Scotia we are still dependent to a large extent on foreign oil, not only for our transportation fuels but also for heating homes and for other purposes. Part of this problem would be resolved, of course, by the discovery off our coast of gas or oil resources, but in order to take full advantage of those kinds of possibilities we must have certain things in place, and work on those projects must start now.

First and foremost is the natural gas pipeline now extended to the city of Quebec by virtue of permission granted by the National Energy Board, but not extended to the province of Nova Scotia by virtue of a refusal to grant permission by the National Energy Board. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) has said in the House that an extension of the natural gas pipeline is a matter of national priority and, if the current application before the National Energy Board is refused or delayed, he will introduce a bill in this House to ensure that the natural gas pipeline will be extended to the east coast. To the extent that we can rely on government undertakings—and I sincerely hope we can—that part of the problem is resolved.

The next hope for the future in Nova Scotia is the development of a petroleum-based industry, and that involves the location of a liquid natural gas terminal on the Strait of Canso. This project, too, would be related to the natural gas pipeline and, more important, to the Arctic pilot project which involves the transportation of natural gas from the Arctic to a point on the east coast. Again the matter of the Arctic pilot project is before the National Energy Board, and that board, so we are told, will decide the appropriate location for a liquid natural gas terminal as between the Strait of Canso and Gros Cacouna on the St. Lawrence River.

Let met just say in passing that the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen), as a representative from Nova Scotia, has assured Nova Scotians that this decision respecting the location of a liquid natural gas terminal will be made on the merits of the two locations on the Strait of Canso and on the St. Lawrence River. There are some who would doubt that. We in Nova Scotia take him at his word when he says that decision will be made on the merits.

I remind the Minister of Finance that his colleague, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, on November 26, 1980, in Montreal, said something which might be differently construed when he said that things looked very favourable for Gros Cacouna. I think the Minister of Finance might take a look at what his colleague said because he has made it clear that the National Energy Board is a quasi-judicial body which operates on the basis of facts and information before it, and not on political considerations. One would wonder and question how the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources would know at this point that things are very favourable for a location at Gros Cacouna. When he has time available to him I hope the Minister of Finance will make that inquiry and tell the members of the public, who are very much concerned about this matter and very much relieved by his public announcements, that the decision will be made on its merits.

There is one other project which is very much a part of Nova Scotia's energy future and it is dependent upon the support of the Government of Canada. And that is the development of the Donkin Coal Mine. This matter has been before both the government of Nova Scotia and the federal government for years now. Report after report has been filed. But so much of the resolution of our energy problem in Nova Scotia is dependent upon the development of the Donkin coal mine that we would be in very difficult straits if any change in policy were adopted by the Government of Canada and the necessary aid was denied, because the conversion of our oil-fired electrical energy plants to coal is an essential element of the solution to our energy problem in the future.

There are several other matters I would like to draw to the attention of this House with respect to Bill C-48. One in particular involves the provision with respect to oil spills. As hon. members know, legislation was previously enacted under which the Government of Canada established a fund.

An hon. Member: Black Rod is here.

Mr. Knowles: The Tories have no respect for the Crown.

Mr. Crosby: Madam Speaker, would you prefer that I call it six o'clock?

Madam Speaker: There is a message, so we should deal with that.

Mr. Crosby: Madam Speaker, do you wish me to carry on?

As I was saying, the provisions of Bill C-48 respecting—

Mr. Taylor: Black Rod is coming in.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

[Translation]

A message was delivered by the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Madam Speaker, the Honourable the Deputy Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable House in the chamber of the honourable Senate.

Accordingly, Madam Speaker with the House went up to the Senate chamber.
