Mr. Regan: He agrees on that. That is progress. Then it becomes a question of degree, and if it is a question of degree, the hon. member will recognize that as the price of energy rises and as energy becomes a larger percentage of the entire economy, the amount which the federal government must take obviously escalates because the increasing cost of energy affects to a very great degree every aspect of the federal operation of providing the basic services of the country. This is a legitimate objective, and I welcome the agreement of the hon. member.

Another objective is a larger share of Canadian ownership in energy.

Mr. Wilson: We agree on that, also.

Mr. Regan: It is obvious that as energy becomes a more important and vital part of our economy it is absolutely essential that the very high degree of American ownership in the oil industry be decreased. I will probably lose the hon. member for Etobicoke Centre when I say that it is also important that there be larger government sector ownership in the oil industry in Canada and that, as a consequence, Petro-Canada should acquire greater holdings than it has at present, and follow the pattern of Mexico, Norway, and elsewhere.

Mr. Beatty: Leave that to the NDP negotiators.

Mr. Regan: That is fine because I will stay in the middle, which is a safe place to be. The objectives which I have just mentioned will, unfortunately, incur disagreement with the provinces and the problems of dislocation for industry. The first basic disagreement is whether the OPEC price is a fair world price. As I have said, I visited Alberta last week and people there argue again and again that the OPEC price should be the benchmark price for determining our price. There are few hon. members in this House, as learned as they are, who would, after paying full attention to all aspects of the history of the OPEC price and the actual situation in the world, argue that this is a realistic price. It is a cartel price which is put together by those countries which held a surplus of a commodity which was vital to a purchasing country. The cartel forced up the price by cornering the market and agreeing to a sale price rather than competing in sales. In 1978 and 1979 the price of oil doubled.

There is no doubt that, if this cartel thought it could get away with it, tomorrow it would move up the price to $100 per barrel. I wonder if hon. members opposite would still argue that automatically the Canadian price should relate to the OPEC price, even on a percentage basis, if the price per barrel were moved to $100. The essential, single most telling point which must be remembered about that cartel price is that it is the price charged for oil that is surplus to the needs of the countries forming the cartel. Mexico does not charge Mexicans the OPEC price. In Mexico gasoline can be bought for around 40 cents per gallon. Venezuela does not charge Venezuelans the world price, nor does Saudi Arabia charge Saudi Arabians the world price.

Mr. Wilson: What about Australia?

Mr. Regan: I am talking about the OPEC countries which export oil. Those countries which produce their own oil and which have a surplus to export do not charge the OPEC price for oil and gas to their own people. Why should we in Canada charge that artificial cartel price, or anything like it, to our own people? Surely we can decide in principle that the Canadian price, whatever it should be—and there may be differences—should be based on Canadian conditions and not on some phony comparison to what OPEC happens to be charging this week or next week.

Within the Canadian price there must be incentives for new oil and for frontier oil, as currently being offered by this government. If there are to be incentives, why should we pay the same price for old oil which has been discovered and is simply being pumped out of the ground, when it was profitable at $2.50 per barrel? Why should we push the price of old oil up further to enrich the American companies which own most of those reserves? Every time the price is changed American ownership vastly increases.

Mr. Blenkarn: That is not so.

Mr. Regan: It certainly is so, and I would be very happy to have the hon. member participate in the debate and show me otherwise.

The second disagreement deals with the question of the necessity of increasing the federal take from 10 per cent. I find it shocking that members of the official opposition would side with the government of Alberta on its position. The federal government has taken less of the oil dollar than any government in any federal country, and obviously much less than any government of any unitary country in the world. Yet, as I have said, the percentage of the economy represented by the petroleum industry becomes a larger part of our economy, and the escalating national costs and the program of price equalization require that we have more money. To stay with the ratio of 45/45/10 would be ludicrous in that situation.

I mentioned earlier the figures taken by federal governments in other countries. Again, Australian producers take 37 per cent, the state takes approximately 17 per cent, and the national government takes 48 per cent.

Mr. Wilson: Where is the oil?

Mr. Regan: That applies no matter where the oil is located.

Mr. Wilson: Oh, oh!

Mr. Regan: It will work out to that, as I understand it.

In the United States the producer takes 48 per cent. The great states of Texas, with all the power and authority exercised by Texans in that country, takes only 17 per cent, and the national government takes 35 per cent. I suggest that the question of taxes is not of the essence of ownership. The fact that a province or a federal government owns a resource is not the essence of the question of the need or right of either level of government to tax that resource. I am told that in Australia the resource is owned by the state.

Mr. Wilson: It is offshore.

Mr. Regan: Most of the production is offshore, but that is not the point.

The other point I would like to make is with regard to the large amount taken by Alberta. Hon. members will remember that the government of Alberta took only 22 per cent until 1974. Of course, it receives much more when we include the federal programs. In 1974 the government of Alberta unilaterally changed the figure of 22 per cent and moved it to what works out to be 45 per cent through their involved formula. If the outcry of the industry, that there is an insufficient amount left to the corporations, is correct, it is the government of Alberta which is out of step by the amount which it is taking, not the federal government.

I notice that the hon. member for Etobicoke Centre, the hon. member for Edmonton East, for both of whom I have the greatest respect, and other hon. members, have said that there has been no bargaining in good faith. They said bargaining between the federal government and the provinces was not in good faith. They said the feds did not bargain in good faith. But this second guessing on the negotiation process about who bargained well is not new. All my life I have been accustomed to companies and unions saying that about each other when collective bargaining is under way. The usual expression is that if the other side does not move your way, it means it did not bargain in good faith. I believe that both sides bargained in good faith in this matter. But they have very different responsibilities and a lot at stake. In my opinion, that is the problem.

I am sure the industry feels that government intervention is quite a pain. Industry wonders why it cannot be left alone. But unfortunately if you happen to involve yourself in a business which determines the flow of the entire economy, factors have to be considered that transcend the interests of the company, and even the effect of the policies deemed necessary on the short run level of production or exploration must be considered.

Let us talk about the role of government intervention.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I regret to interrupt the hon. minister, but the time allotted to him has expired. He may continue with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Regan: My thanks to you, Mr. Speaker, and to hon. members. I will try to be as brief as possible. The oil industry, which faces a problem at the present time because of the change in the amount of government take and the new regulations, is an industry which has shown itself over the years to be able to adjust to almost any change one could perceive. For instance, when OPEC took over the ownership of the oil resources a few years ago everyone assumed that this would be an immense problem for the oil industry. Some predicted a breakdown in relation to the way companies operated on an integrated basis, that the majors were ruined because they lost the ownership of these vast resources which were taken over by OPEC. However, if one looks at the profits of the major international oil companies, they digested that with hardly a hiccup. The profits of Exxon, which were about $1,300 million in 1971, have moved steadily upward to over $4 billion by 1979.

If we take the top 31 petroleum companies in Canada for the same period, profits went from $559 million to $3,075 million in 1979.

When Alberta changed its take from 22 per cent to 45 per cent of the dollar, again the industry in Canada was able to adjust to that. The industry has been able to adjust to new conditions and I am sure that will continue.

If the industry considers there is bad news in the budget arrangements, remember that there is also a lot of good news. In the same way Jack Armstrong and Bill Richards have said that they can see opportunities within it, keep in mind that for Canada conversion to gas will mean new markets for gas. Pipelines to be built to the east will mean new markets for western gas. The gas bank will help the smaller companies. There will be greater incentives for Canadian companies and preference for them in future gas exports. All of these things, I suggest, are very helpful signs which are being overlooked by some people in the west at this moment in time.

Any further remarks I have on the matter, I will make on another occasion, but I want to say that the government of Alberta has its priorities and its point of view. But I believe that the government of Alberta is wrong in feeling that it should take so much. It is my hope that understanding and dialogue will reconcile the differences which presently exist between the federal government and the government of Alberta, differences which are harmful to the country we all love.

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Domm)—Parks Canada—Decision to cancel Cornwall to Peterborough move; the hon. member for Parkdale-High Park (Mr. Flis)—Canadian Broadcasting Corporation—Lack of coverage of European conference; the hon. member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill (Mr. Blaikie)—Social development—Renewal of federal-provincial funding—Government position.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

PETROLEUM ADMINISTRATION ACT

PETITION TO REVOKE PROCLAMATION

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Waddell:

That the proclamation laid before the House on Wednesday, November 12, 1980, pursuant to subsection 35(2) of the Petroleum Administration Act, as proclaimed in PC 1980-2915, be revoked.

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, it is with considerable regret that I rise today to speak on the proclamations issued by the government under the Petroleum Administration Act. Member after member from this side of the House for the past two days has described the tragic implications the government's energy policy will have for the economy, energy security, and federal-provincial relations.

Canada is losing companies which provide necessary jobs, expertise and capital and other spin-offs which enable this country to enjoy its current high standard of living. Right across this country, including the manufacturing and service heartland of Ontario and Quebec, the situation is about to change. Economic and political uncertainty is about to engulf Canada at the very time Canadians are seeking ways and means to become more united and less dependent upon the help of others.

Today I want to shift the focus of the debate a little bit. My colleagues in the Progressive Conservative Party have shown the incompetence of the government's policy. They have shown how Canadian families, families in my constituency, will be paying about $300 more for the cost of energy than they would have had to pay under the Crosbie budget. My colleagues have shown how the security of oil supply has been decreased as a result of these measures. Rather than achieving energy self-sufficiency by 1990, as our government proposed, we hear of threats to close down the Cold Lake project. We hear of cutbacks in exploration programs by Canadian independents. My colleagues have shown how employment will be hurt across the country.

The deferral of the oil sands project in Alberta means that Ontario and Quebec will share almost equally the economic hardships of Liberal policy as private companies cut their exploration budgets or move to the United States. Almost daily we hear reports from my part of the country of shutdowns or of lay-offs taking place in industries in Ontario. These industries are affected by the decline in orders from western Canada, which are affected, as well, by the deterioration in the atmosphere and relations in Canada today. Western Canadians are looking for other sources of goods, instead of looking toward central Canada, because of the policies of this government. Yet the government cynically prepares to strike a deal with Saudi Arabia on the grounds, as the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said, "of security of supply". And we find the government is not serious in its dealings with Alberta, a Canadian province.

As Canadians go jobless, OPEC is receiving the equivalent of $900 a year for each Canadian family. Members of our party have shown that the Canadian oil industry, despite the government's claims to the contrary, is being hit seriously, particularly through the 8 per cent de facto royalty. As Canadian companies move south, the only Canadianizing effect of this energy policy is to create more government ownership. By 1983 this may well range between 45 per cent and 50 per cent, not 24 per cent, as the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) would lead us to believe.

I ask the question: will it help national unity? Clearly the answer is no. The invoking of the Petroleum Administration Act will do more than perhaps any other measure taken by the government to damage the country.

Finally, my colleagues have described the impact of the regressive energy policy and the effects that it will have upon consumers and, particularly, on the low-income family. The government has made no provision to allow energy tax credits, like my government's budget did.

I would point out as well that this government has imposed taxation upon heating oils which affect many poorer families in my constituency who do not have the option of converting to natural gas, and yet we find the government is not apologetic about its policies and is prepared to continue in this vein. This is divisive and punitive for the Canadians who can least afford to pay for it.

There is another aspect of this budget that is largely forgotten. In part, it is a consequence of complacency among members throughout the House, but it is also caused by the fact that the party opposite has ruled this country for so long that it has confused governing with government. Over the year the power of government has increased dramatically. Bureaucracy and public ownership now count for over 40 per cent of our gross national product.

I am not of the belief that government need be inherently bad. On the contrary, I think every member of this House would recognize that government has a vital role to play. However, when the elected representatives in Parliament unnecessarily delegate their task of governing to non-elected bureaucrats, or to a few select cabinet ministers, government becomes a monolithic entity, insensitive to the needs of people, subject to incompetency or, worse, deceit. I am not, therefore, inclined to give powers freely to any body or agency that has not been elected by the people to govern for the good of this country. Yet, with the invoking of division II of part II of the Petroleum Administration Act, this is precisely what the government has chosen to do.

I am reminded of the warnings that the long time member, friend and former colleague of mine, Hon. Ged Baldwin, gave at the time of the passing of the Petroleum Administration Act in June, 1975. He warned of a government practice that had grown steadily since the end of the Second World War. The delegation of legislative powers to non-elected government agencies or bodies was increasing yearly and becoming more widespread. Civil servants and bureaucrats were making legislative decisions that were directly affecting the lives of every Canadian. But while Mr. Baldwin recognized that delegated legislation is an historically accepted and necessary method of governing, he warned that it was not a method that should be contemplated unless it was clearly necessary and specific in detail as to the extent of the delegation.

In the past Canada has had dangerous experiences with delegated powers which not only threatened the supremacy of Parliament but also the liberty of the people. In December, 1945, for example, Parliament passed a national emergency transitional powers bill which declared that a condition of emergency still existed in Canada, despite the fact that the war had ended. Very substantial powers under the War Measures Act were delegated to the governor in council until this period of emergency was over. In a few months it was discovered that the governor in council had secretly passed an order giving the minister of justice authority to issue an order to interrogate and detain "in such place and under such conditions as he may from time to time determine" any person whom he believed to be likely to communicate information to a foreign agent. This order provided the authority for the arrest, interrogation, and detention of suspects in the great spy investigation of 1946. The arbitrary nature of this piece of legislation, and the degree to which many innocent citizens' rights were revoked, best illustrate how delegated legislation of the variety found in the invoked portion of the Petroleum Administration Act can be abused when Parliament freely chooses to forsake its role of governing. These emergency powers remained in effect until 1954.

This type of abuse of delegated legislation is by no means the exception to the rule. In my capacity as co-chairman of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments, I have seen literally dozens of cases where delegated legislation has been abused by both the executive and non-elected agencies. In the case of the former, the committee found, and I quote from the fourth report tabled in the House last July that:

> Far too many statutes contain little or no indication of legislative policy and are neutral documents the object of which is merely to confer powers on the executive to act in certain vaguely defined fields. Moreover, these powers are granted in very broad terms so that little or no detail is given as to the content or type of delegated legislation that can be made.

In the case of enabling powers, the committee found that it was:

> Far too great a temptation to departments and to ministers to grant general enabling powers and to rely on their exercise being confined to the 'four corners of the act.' They are certain, and the committee speaks in the light of its predecessors' experience, to be used, and probably abused, in the pursuit of administrative convenience, to make subordinate laws never imagined by parliamentarians at the time of passage of a bill.

That is what our report had to say on the subject. To combat the further abuse of delegated legislation, the committee recommended that the intention of Parliament in delegating powers and the scope of the legislation be explained beyond all doubt and clearly limited.

Ged Baldwin was the first to recognize that the Petroleum Administration Act was a prime example of the type of faulty legislation the committee was criticizing. Members will remember that during the 1975 debate on the Petroleum Administration Act, the government of the day assured the House that the main intent of the legislation was to provide a base for the export charge which had been used for the purpose of funding the compensation program. The objective was, according to the government, to create a single national price subject only to differences for transportation costs.

Almost as an afterthought, the minister of energy, mines and resources at that time, mentioned that the bill provided a mechanism for the setting of oil and natural gas prices in Canada. Ged Baldwin, on the other hand, pointed out during the debate that articles 36 and 40 to 44 entitled the federal government to fix the price of oil, "despite the fact that a considerable percentage of the crude is not exported." Though Liberal members at that time shouted, "What do these comments have to do about the bill?", I think history has justified Mr. Baldwin's concerns, for articles 36 and 40 to 44 are all part of division II of part II, currently being invoked by the Liberal majority in Parliament. Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, not enough members heeded his warning in 1975 and in subsequent amending debates on the bill, so we are obligated to take up his crusade today in the hope that parliamentarians on both sides of the House will come to their senses and reject any recourse to the invoking of the Petroleum Administration Act.

Failing this, I would like the government to take a second look at the implication of articles 38 to 47 of the act. The invoking of the Petroleum Administration Act does far more than give the government the power to set prices unilaterally for oil and gas. If this were not bad enough, sections 38 to 47 give the governor in council the power to delegate broad and sweeping licensing provisions to its regulatory agency, the National Energy Board. Section 38 provides that the "governor in council may, by order, direct that the National Energy Board assume supervision and regulation of the movement of crude oil out of an exporting province."

Section 39 further states that where such an order has been received, the movement of all oil out of an exporting province becomes "subject to a licensing system operated by the board". The governor in council then gives the agency a free hand to impose terms and conditions on licences it issues for, first, selling crude oil for consumption outside the exporting province; second, purchasing any crude oil for consumption outside the exporting province; third, acquiring any crude oil for consumption outside the exporting province; and fourth, selling or purchasing outside the exporting province any crude oil from the exporting province.

These licences may be restricted or limited as to area, quantity or time, quality or kind of crude oil. They may be revoked or suspended under section 84 of the National Energy Board Act when the board, after giving a licensee a hearing, forms the opinion that the licensee has violated or failed to comply with the terms or conditions of his licence. In short, the significance of the licensing system is that once it is in place, all selling, transporting, collecting, and mixing of crude oil for purposes elsewhere than in the exporting provinces, would be illegal unless the person engaged in the transaction was a party to the licensing system. Moreover, the act provides a broad range of penalties for breach of prohibitions under section 45(1) and (2).

While the Petroleum Administration Act would appear to provide a great deal of power to at least a few elected representatives via the governor in council, article 46(B) implies that the National Energy Board may be free of whatever restraining influences that the governor in council may have. Section 46(B) reads that the governor in council may make representations, and I quote:

> Respecting the duration of licences, the quantities of crude oil that may be sold, purchased or moved under licences and the terms and conditions that may be prescribed by the board in respect of licences.

Unfortunately, the governor in council may choose, either intentionally or unintentionally, not to exercise this option. As I understand it, the word "respecting" in the article could lead the governor in council to subdelegate his law-making authority to the National Energy Board or to the minister.

Members can envisage a regulation by the governor in council which stipulates that the duration of licences or quantities shall be such as the minister notifies the board, or, shall be such as the board shall from time to time determine, and so on. That sort of provision is not uncommon. More important, perhaps, the governor in council may exempt, or empower the minister or the board to exempt, particular individuals from the regulatory requirement as to duration, quantities, or terms and conditions. In short, those sections, 38 to 47, that I have just described, postulate the possibility of a tightly controlled licensing system, containing many potentially arbitrary features governing the movement of oil in and without Canada.

Parliament in the first place should never have passed legislation that so limited its powers over actions by the government concerning the movement of oil in Canada so that the possibility of abuse could arise. I have pointed out how, in the past, broad and sweeping legislation of the variety here before us led to infringement of the principle of the supremacy of Parliament and of individual liberty itself. Today, with respect to the articles I have just described, one could hypothesize numerous examples of how the governor in council, or the National Energy Board, or the minister, or all of them together, might well abuse the power Parliament granted the government in 1975.

It is possible, under this act, that the government, in pursuit of its goal of "nationalization" of the oil industry in Canada, might choose to licence only PetroCan for the task of moving oil across Canada. The powers in this act would allow the governor in council, or the National Energy Board, or the minister, to cut short the duration of licences to private companies, Canadian or otherwise. They could determine how much oil was sold or purchased by private licences, and impose arbitrary terms on them.

Moreover, and this is an intent that I cannot believe the current government would harbour, the article in division II of part II of the Petroleum Administration Act could even govern the extent to which all or some exports from a producing province could be curtailed or stopped altogether. Shockingly, whether or not the government realizes it now, a future Liberal administration might use the licensing provisions of the Petroleum Administration Act to force Alberta into an energy deal. It could legally threaten Alberta to compromise on price or suffer the consequences of a cut-off from its export market.

It is important to remove even the temptation of this type of abuse from the hands of a select few members of the cabinet, or an individual minister, or a non-elected board.

I understand the government's policy to establish prices below world levels that has led it to invoke the relevant proclamation of the Petroleum Administration Act. Though I disagree with the policy, if the setting of prices is the only concern of the government, why has it asked that all the licensing provisions in division II of part II be invoked also? A check with the National Energy Board reveals that no orders appear to have been made with respect to regulation by the board under section 38. This is commendable, but not entirely reassuring.

If the government's stated energy goals are to achieve a fair blended price and to achieve a large degree of Canadian ownership, it is vital that the means used to achieve these goals are legitimate and based on the underlying principles of Canada's constitutional order. As such, the means used to achieve the goals of government can be far more important than the ends themselves.

To paraphrase from the standing joint committee's report, it is no exaggeration to say that the evolution of Canada's constitutional system since the Magna Carta has consisted of a series of conflicts over means. Administrative efficiency may be the primary goal of the administrative process, but for the community as a whole the means in this process bear upon an individual's liberties, harmony, and constitutional balance. Since I have heard no public attempt to justify the invoking of articles 38 to 47, balance and fairness in our constitutional and parliamentary system dictate that this section be dropped from the current discussions.

After all, if the government has not even explained why these articles need be invoked, why should Parliament grant these extraordinary licensing powers that delegate these regulations to others and effectively undermine provincial ownership of land, mines and minerals granted under section 109 of the British North America Act? Surely Parliament ought to have a continuing influence over the means by which the government's actions are achieved, and surely the ownership of these lands ought at least to give the provinces some authority to decide to whom their oil will be exported and in what quantity, quality, and time frame. Sections 38 to 47 are over-kill. They are unjustified. They are unnecessary. They are just plain irresponsible, if invoked as the government currently plans to do.

There is more here than meets the eye. I have shown how delegated authority has been abused in the past and described the relevant sections of the Petroleum Administration Act that might be abused in the future. I have cited examples of cases where individual liberties were subverted and the power of Parliament curtailed, and related these to hypothetical situations that could arise if articles 38 to 47 of this act are invoked. I have tried to point out to the government how procedure is the handmaiden of liberty, and the lack of any intent to abuse the powers granted to the governor in council, the minister or the National Energy Board, is no excuse for their failure to drop articles 38 to 47 from the proclamation of the Petroleum Administration Act.

Finally, I have tried to show members of both sides of the House that it is the duty of this Parliament to say no to the minister's proclamation of an act that gives a select few, elected and non-elected members of government, blanket authority over petroleum pricing and licensing in this country. It is about time that Parliament began reasserting its independence and supremacy over delegated legislation that can be potentially dangerous to the underlying constitutional principles and individual liberties of the country.

Member after member who has spoken in this debate so far has dealt with the question of the effect of the government's policies on the unity of Canada and upon energy security in Canada. The minister responsible for fitness and amateur sport, who spoke a few minutes ago, dealt with what he felt was an urgent need to protect the rights of consumers in Canada. I do not think there is a member in this House or any Canadian who is not concerned about the effect of higher energy prices upon average Canadians, but I think it is essential to remind the government that the arbitrary power it is asking for today—and we ask for justification—is having a serious effect on the national fabric of Canada itself.

We hear it said from time to time in Ottawa and throughout the country that Ontarians should be happy with what the government is doing in that Ontarians benefit, conceivably, in the short term from this federal intervention in an area which falls under provincial jurisdiction, and that to the extent to which Ottawa is able to expropriate energy wealth from the producing provinces it is to the benefit of consumers.

The hon. member from the NDP who spoke earlier pointed out that it was not the Albertans who ran up the $14.5 billion deficit which the federal government faces today but that it is the Albertans who find their wealth confiscated by this government to pay for that deficit. My friend from the NDP did not say where he was when there were discussions in this House about high federal deficits and that this money will be used to finance them.

Mr. Benjamin: We were here.

Mr. Beatty: They were here, they were active, and they voted in every single instance to increase spending in Canada and not to decrease it. Nonetheless, I am glad to see this afternoon at least a late-blooming appreciation of the fact that what is happening here is the expropriation of the wealth of one portion of the country to pay for the federal government's inability to control its own spending.

As I said before, Mr. Speaker, some people will argue that Ontarians will benefit from that and that we should be happy to see this happens. If they believe that this is so, they seriously misread the mood of my home province. Since confederation it has been Ontario which has been a central force for the unity of this country, and it has argued in all instances that all portions of this country have to be dealt with fairly and equitably. Confederation cannot simply be there as the thumb upon the scales to benefit one region of the country to the disfavour of others.

Ontarians today are deeply concerned when they see the effects of the policies of this government, which damage the unity of this country and make it difficult for us to live our lives in a feeling of harmony, of common sense and of good will, which is so essential if we are to overcome the centrifugal forces in our country which threaten to tear it apart. Ontarians are not happy to see what the federal government is doing. They are deeply concerned about their country and they deeply oppose any actions taken by this government which pit Canadian against Canadian, and which make more difficult our job of fostering a sense of national unity.

As a member of Parliament from a small town and rural area with many constituents who are not wealthy, I am deeply concerned about the effects of this government's policies. When ministers say these policies are necessary to hold prices down, I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that the effect of the government's energy policies is to drive prices up. It was this government that imposed a tax upon the heating oil which is used by large numbers of my constituents who do not have recourse to natural gas. Yet these are the people who are being hit by the policies of this government, ostensibly brought down to give protection to the consumers and to protect the national interest. It is my constituents who are being deprived of an energy tax credit which was proposed in the Crosbie budget.

Where is the government when it talks about concern for consumers in this country and when it talks about the problems of individual Canadian families? Where are ministers when those families ask for assistance from the government in the form of an energy tax credit which was promised by the former government to help compensate for higher prices? Where is this government when constituents in my constituency and in constituencies like mine across Ontario find their jobs being taken away from them because of slowdowns in the economy as a result of this government's policies?

I do not think my constituents will be fooled into believing that slowdowns in oil exploration and development in western Canada will not have a very serious effect upon their jobs right here in the heartland of Canada, because it is Ontario which benefits most from the manufacturing which is required to supply the oil industry, and a slowdown in that industry affects jobs right here in the industrial heartland of Canada.

This government campaigned against the energy policy proposed by our government, which would have encouraged exploration and development in Canada and which would have given massive assistance to the search for alternative sources of energy, much of that development money going into Ontario. I ask hon. members opposite how they can justify policies which today are costing the jobs of Ontarians.

There is a sense of malaise and uncertainty—which I have not felt before in my constituency over the course of the past eight years—which I feel today when I go around it. Canadians are frightened not just about whether their children will have jobs but also about whether they will be able to hang on to their own jobs because the effect of this government's policies is to take those jobs away. Hon. members opposite would happily pay the Saudi Arabians twice what they would pay Canadians to supply oil for Canadian needs. They would happily see that money leave Canada entirely, as well as industrial benefits going elsewhere instead of staying in Canada where they would provide jobs for Canadians. They would happily see the effects of their policies, which will be to drive exploration and development out of Canada and take jobs from Canada into the United States where development of the oil industry is very welcome.

This is not an issue on which the government can expect to divide Alberta from the rest of Canadians. All of Canada suffers from the consequences of the incompetence on energy issues of this government. All of Canada had a right to expect, after the last election, that the government would keep its promises and bring in measures which would actually stimulate Canadian ownership and do something to encourage employment in Canada, yet what we have found is that promise after promise has been broken. If Canadians liked what was done to them by the Prime Minister with respect to wage and price controls, they will love what he is doing to them with respect to the energy promises and employment promises which he made during the 1980 election.

What the government is doing today is inflicting serious damage upon the unity of Canada and affecting very grievously the jobs of Canadians. I do not believe that a member on any side of the House, whether in the opposition or in the government, has any right to stand here and support such a measure, and I call upon hon. members on all sides of the House to join with the members of my party in saying to the government that these measures may not go forward and that the time has come not to sit down with Saudi sheiks, but to sit down with the people of Alberta, who are Canadians, first, and to work out a regime of pricing and development which is fair to all Canadians and which would put Canadian interests first. That is all Canadians are asking for, and I think they are entitled to no less.

Mr. René Gingras (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I take advantage of the privilege granted to new members in the first session to speak about my constituency of Abitibi. Afterwards, I will deal with the matter before us, that is the proclamation of the Petroleum Administration Act.

The Abitibi area, Mr. Speaker, is more than a riding and more than a province, it is almost a country. Some will perhaps be surprised to learn that it covers an area of 750,000 square kilometres, or 48 per cent of Quebec. My constituency is larger than Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and the Yukon. The southern part is farther south than Thunder Bay and the northern part farther north than Yellowknife. It is a country of contrasts. There are plains a hundred miles long without any stones, and there are mountains and rocks a hundred miles long without any soil. In the south, we grow carrots, potatoes, lettuce, cucumbers, tomatoes, while in the north the soil will not thaw, and all this in the same riding.

There is a place in my riding where the frost is 1800 feet deep, the deepest in the world. As for the temperature, and I am still referring to contrasts in my constituency, it often reaches 40° Celsius in the summer and in the winter it almost always drops to 40° Celsius below zero.

Before 1900, there were very few white men in Abitibi, except Iberville, who travelled up the Ottawa River to Lake Abitibi. It was the construction of the Transcontinental railway which opened the Abitibi area around 1912. When they reached the shores of the Harricanaw the white men discovered an Indian village. How long had it been there? Nobody knows. A little farther north, the Crees remained in the James Bay area, while the Inuit settled on the coast of Hudson Bay and Hudson Strait. In 1914, when the railway reached the Harricanaw, the first camp was set up, only 66 years ago, Mr. Speaker. Several of those pioneers who reached the shores of the Harricanaw founded a village called Harricanaw, now known as Amos. A town was built. As I said a while ago, several of those pioneers are still living. This shows indeed that the region is rather young.

Val d'Or, now a prosperous city, was founded only in 1934, less than 50 years ago. The founders of Val d'Or all came by boat on the Harricanaw River after leaving the railroad. Building materials for the Sullivan mine were also transported by boat. Afterwards, cities grew like mushrooms on the Cadillac fault, as it is called in geology, and this is how such cities as Malartic and Cadillac were born, going toward Rouyn-Noranda, with Senneterre the railway nerve centre, since a railroad had to be built to join these towns. Later on, came Chibougamau, Chapais, Joutel and Matagami, which were mostly concerned with copper mining.

Mines, Mr. Speaker, always mines. Mines which opened and mines which closed. Abitibi produces, or produced in the past, gold, silver, copper, zinc, molybdenum, lithium and asbestos. The substratum contains iron, nickel, uranium and many other minerals. As hon. members probably know, the Vautrin plan in Quebec brought tens of thousands of settlers to Abitibi. They founded dozens of villages. They were heroes, Mr. Speaker. My father was one of them. Newcomers were told, "If you want land, clear it. If you want a house, build yourself one."

Such was the life of the pioneers. Today, there are large farms with cows, beef cattle and chickens. The climate is excellent for breeding, but the land was not, as Mr. Vautrin, the minister of colonization, thought, good only for growing tomatoes. We have a tourism industry. May I call it five o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I thank the hon. member for Abitibi (Mr. Gingras) for having called it five o'clock.

[English]

It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, public bills, private bills and notices of motions.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

[English]

CANADA LABOUR CODE

MEASURE TO AMEND WITH RESPECT TO MATERNITY LEAVE

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): This gives rise to the subject matter of Bill C-206 to amend the Canada Labour Code.

Mr. Knowles: The subject matter? It is the bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Before proposing the question on Bill C-206 to amend the Canada Labour Code, the Chair ought to register reservations and enter a caveat as to the procedural acceptability of the bill. The Chair is of the view that certain provisions of the bill may involve expenditures of public funds, which can only be authorized by way of a royal recommendation. However, since the Chair does not want to take too much time of private members' hour to rule now, I intend to allow the debate on the bill, without prejudice to the decision which may have to be made on the procedural acceptability of the bill at the conclusion of the debate at second reading.

For immediate reference I would refer to clauses 2 and 3 in which there is a suggestion, if I understand the bill correctly, that there may be a requirement for the expenditure of government funds in so far as Crown corporations are concerned. That is the essence of the caveat being entered by the Chair. The hon. member for Regina West (Mr. Benjamin) may choose to raise that point during his own remarks on the bill, but for the moment it seems to be the best way to proceed.

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina West) moved that Bill C-206, to amend the Canada Labour Code (maternity leave), be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I have noted your caveat on the admissibility of my bill in terms of the expenditure of public funds through Crown corporations. When the Chair is considering the matter, I should like it to take into consideration that I do not believe the caveat applies, because in effect my bill calls for leave without pay. I do not know how Crown corporations, any other business, or all employees under federal jurisdiction, would call for extra expenditures.

Bill C-206 has been on the order paper for some time. It would increase the maximum period of maternity leave which is presently in the Canada Labour Code from 17 weeks to 52 weeks. It would provide up to three years of maternity leave for the employee whose child requires constant care. It would allow an employee to credit maternity leave time toward pension plans or any benefits determined by seniority. That means if an employee chooses, when on leave without pay or after coming back to work, to make payments toward her pension plan or contributions to the Canada Pension Plan, then the employer would match the contributions, which I think does not come under the caveat Mr. Speaker mentioned earlier. The final provision of the bill would be that if an employee were to die during childbirth, or after the child is born, the spouse would be entitled to the remaining leave and benefits.

If the bill were to pass, two other things must happen. It applies only to industries and employers under federal jurisdiction; the provinces would have to be encouraged to pass similar legislation. The federal government should amend the Unemployment Insurance Act to increase the length of maternity benefits which at present is only 15 weeks. This change was not included in my private member's bill because of the risk that the entire bill might be ruled out of order in that it would involve the spending of money. I tried to keep in mind the business about a private member's bill calling for the expenditure of money. Where unemployment insurance benefits are involved, it would be up to the government to bring in its amendment to the Unemployment Insurance Act to coincide with the provisions of my bill.

There are a lot of reasons why this legislation is long over due. The importance of bonding in the first year of a child's life cannot be overemphasized. Close ties between parent and child affect the child's behaviour for the rest of its life. This has been verified by experts in the field, and it was pointed out as recently as last October in the Senate subcommittee report entitled "Child at Risk". I invite hon. members to read what the committee reported about good parenting being of overwhelming importance to the developing personality of a child. Extended maternity leave is one of the important means of achieving those close ties.

Maternity leave is no longer a fringe benefit for a selected few who can negotiate it through collective agreements. Women have been entering the labour force in increasing numbers, and can no longer be dismissed as a secondary labour force. In 1979, 49 per cent of the women in Canada, or almost half, were in the paid work force. Between 1969 and 1979 the growth of women in the work force increased by over 61 per cent. The main child-bearing years are between the years of 20 and 44. Last year 63 per cent of working women in Canada were between those ages. There has been concern about Canada's declining birth rate. The 52 weeks of maternity leave could offer further job security to women who want to have children but are reluctant to risk their job security, their pay level, their economic and social well-being.

There have been too many instances across the country where an employee has requested time off from work to bear a child and to spend some time with the child after birth, and after two or three months has been told by her employer, "Well, you have had so much time off; if you cannot get back to work within the next month or two, I will have to hire someone else."

This is not a new provision in other parts of the world. I am asking that Canada catch up with a lot of other places. Also I remind the House that under the Financial Administration Act and the Public Service Staff Relations Act federal public servants are allowed 37 weeks of maternity leave—up to 11 weeks before birth and 26 weeks after. It is an improvement over what is in the Canada Labour Code. So surely the government cannot object to improving the Canada Labour Code, compared to the provisions affecting federal public servants. I should like to mention what is occurring in other countries. Austria, Norway and the Soviet Union provide one-year leave for maternity; Czechoslovakia provides two years; Spain and Bulgaria provide three years. I find it somewhat embarrassing that we are behind these other countries.

There is another reason why I think this matter is important. Just the other day another private member's bill was before the House concerning abortion. All of us in the chamber have been required to go through the agonizing and heart-rending feelings of hon. members on both sides of the question, feelings that are sincerely held and believed in. I think this provision, as well as a number of others, would do more to end the perceived need and demand for abortion. It is one of many measures which I think would reduce a need for abortion that is not only perceived but which also may be real.

It seems to me that people do not resort to abortion because they suddenly do not love babies. It is because they find themselves caught in a frightening and terrifying squeeze where there is no housing, no job, no health, no acceptance or support. I think all hon. members want to do all they can to restructure our society and make it a hospitable place in which to live. We want to reduce substantially the perceived and felt need for abortion. Of equal importance is the necessity for a mother to be with her new baby, and a one year leave of absence without pay would help. Unless she belongs to a union, if she is lucky enough to have one, she can through a collective agreement negotiate some additional benefits. That is fine. Surely the federal law should set out a minimum of 12 months leave from the position that woman held with her employer, and guarantee her right to return to it, or to a better position with the same employer. This is only one of many things we need to do to strengthen the parent or mother-child bonding, to strengthen families and reduce their perceived compulsion or need for abortion, and to make this a more decent, understanding society than it presently is.

I am aware the government is looking at amendments to the Canada Labour Code. I do not care if it is my bill that passes, or a bill put forward by an opposition member, or a government bill, as long as it gets done. Would the minister or his parliamentary secretary at least agree when they bring in amendments to the Canada Labour Code that the subject matter of this bill be referred to the standing committee so that the government can decide whether or not to incorporate the provisions of my bill into their legislation? I will be among the first to applaud and congratulate them for it. This is not the kind of issue for prima donnas or any one person to take credit for. Members from all parties have advocated this and have spoken in favour of it for many years.

I find it difficult to understand why it takes so long to resolve an issue about which there can easily be all party agreement, which can do much to reduce the divisions that occur among members of Parliament, as well as among Canadians, on social and moral issues, abortion being one of them. It seems to me the way to solve divisions is to bring in a number of measures.

It is not sufficient just to guarantee employment and leaves of absence for women to bear children. There is a host of other wide-sweeping reforms needed to strengthen families, to strengthen the love, care and the ability to care for children. A measure of economic security for single parent families must be enhanced. There must be more daycare centres in a massive way, not just through provincial, municipal and federal governments, but employers must and should make significant contributions to women at work for their children to be cared for while at work. So many of them must work because they want a house and to raise and love a family.

Mr. Speaker, chartered banks must be required to set aside a portion of their investment capital into the area of low-interest mortgages—like 8 per cent. This must be done so that mortgage rates will no longer cripple young families or, even worse, prevent them from having decent housing.

Medicare must be universal. It is something all of us are proud of. I will not just brag about Saskatchewan. It must be the norm throughout society so that it, too, can aid in the well-being of mothers and their newborn.

I submit federal funding must be made available to provinces and educational institutions to enable them to provide all forms of birth control and family planning information, not just for students but for parents. This would encourage responsibility and decrease the ignorance which exists on those subjects. It would enable each individual, and more particularly women, to be informed intelligently and it would enable them to adopt a method of birth control which best meets their own religious beliefs, economic, social and family needs. It is a decision they should be able to make in an informed and intelligent manner.

Mr. Speaker, this bill of mine is only one of many steps which must be taken in order to improve our society. I end my speech by quoting a statement released by the Canadian Conference of Catholic Bishops. It has proven of great value to me. It reads:

> To be involved in the task of making this society hospitable to life, is a foremost requirement of social justice. That is why we must take most seriously the rebuke that those who oppose abortion care too little about the special problems of mothers and the burdens of rearing children once they are born. If respect for life seems to end with birth, our perceptions and values are truncated and incomplete. The call of Christ, that we should bear one another's burdens, demands that we reach out in practical ways to share all the burdens of parenthood. The indicated aid and support will include working to change economic and social realities in the direction of justice and respect for life. From doing this, we must not flinch.

Mr. Speaker, whatever one's religious beliefs are, or if one has no religious beliefs, that is a statement that all of us can agree with and support. My bill, in its own limited way, calls for the implementing of one of many measures that needs to be taken to make this a more decent society, one that is more hospitable in which to live for mothers and families in our country.

[Translation]

Mr. Raymond Dupont (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a few important remarks on Bill C-206 now before the House.

First of all, I should like to express my unmitigated admiration for the architect of the bill, the hon. member for Regina West (Mr. Benjamin), who obviously acted under the inspiration of altruistic principles. The hon. member shows an awareness of and an interest in the well-being of Canadian women at work, well-being which often is not protected enough.

Hon. members are probably all aware that in almost all parts of the country federal and provincial statutes apply which give some form of protection to women at work, particularly with regard to maternity leave. To those must be added two international instruments that deal with maternity benefits, namely, the United Nations Declaration of 1967 on the elimination of discrimination against women which stipulates that "In order to prevent discrimination against women by reason of marriage or maternity and to guarantee their effective right to work, steps must be taken to keep them from being fired when they marry or bear children, and to provide for maternity leave with pay and the guarantee of returning to their former job, as well as to ensure that they benefit from required social services, including child care."

Convention 103 of the International Labour Organization on maternity protection, the second international instrument, was never ratified by Canada because it considered it obsolete in several regards. In fact, the ILO itself is in the process of reviewing and reinforcing the provisions now applicable so as to bring them more into line with the current needs of all workers who are breadwinners. Here in Canada, the Labour Code, the basic federal statute in the matter, is also being revised.

The Women's Bureau has played a major role in this regard and the department has used much of its resources to promote work equality. Mr. Speaker, the principle of work equality includes several important components, and the hon. members will undoubtedly be interested to learn which factors are considered essential to define equitable treatment. In the simplest possible terms, the first factor concerns reasonable access to leave for the worker in charge of a family. The second concerns the elimination of inherent obstacles to hiring which prevent women from getting the better paid jobs and from developing fully on a professional level. The third is related to a job-evaluation method which would simplify application of the equal pay for equal work concept. The fourth concerns the elimination of any harassment in the work-place and of any behaviour which perpetuates discrimination and constitutes a threat to the job and performance of women workers. Finally, the setting up of an administrative structure to monitor, if need be, and apply the work equality concept would ensure true equality in the work place.

I have referred to prejudice and discrimination which are unfortunately still present in various aspects of the work place. Work segregation, unequal pay for men and women and sexual intimidation are a few of the practices which create and maintain a climate of inequality in the workplace. Many other factors can also come into play, such as the negative effects on a career of absence from work because of the adoption or the birth of a child. Then, there is the leave forced upon the workers concerned. The list is long and there are still many prejudices. One of the most difficult issues to define in this regard is the responsibility of private businesses in relation to that of the parents.

In that respect, as was previously mentioned, the government recently did an over-all survey of the situation here in Canada and in some other countries, and carefully considered and assessed the rules that apply in the industry, all legal provisions, as well as the latest trends. That survey has now been completed, I believe. Very shortly the government plans to introduce into the Canadian Labour Code a package of amendments based on this survey. I think we will thus be in a position to satisfy the more pressing needs. I am sure that Canada will show leadership in providing equal work opportunity.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I would like to refer hon. members to a recent book published by James Bennett and Pierre Loewe entitled "Women in Business". Its subtitle is: "A shameful waste of human resources." The book shows that in the vast majority of businesses in Canada not only are women treated as second-class citizens but they are also victims of both conscious and unconscious discrimination. I for one can only applaud the fact that at the federal level at least forthcoming serious legislative amendments will be fighting this type of discrimination so that all workers having family responsibilities may work in a more equitable environment.

[English]

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I rise to support this carefully-thought-out bill which would be a real addition to the social legislation of this country. Even though a caveat has been placed on the bill, I urge the government side to let it proceed through second reading so that it may be fully discussed in committee.

I am astounded by the number of excellent bills that are talked out in this House during second reading when only the principle of a bill, not the clause by clause detail, is being discussed. The reasons these bills are talked out are not very apparent. A bill should be defeated only after very careful consideration in committee. This particular bill should not be talked out, for many reasons.

Many of the points raised by the hon. member for Regina West (Mr. Benjamin), who introduced the bill, are points which can be supported by almost every political party, religious organization, or facet of our society. Since I began my career in federal politics I have always been bothered by the red tape expectant working mothers must go through to obtain unemployment insurance benefits. I am sure all hon. members are acquainted with studies which indicate that the period before the birth of a child is very important to the health and stability of the child. If the mother is worried or ill at ease about what will happen after the birth of the child, it is bound to have an adverse affect on its health and well-being when it is born.

The hon. member who introduced the motion indicated that 52 weeks maternity leave would reduce the incidence of abortion, and I believe he is correct. No matter whether one is in favour of or opposed to abortion, one must be concerned with the increase in the number of abortions in the country, a number which increases every year. While I was a member of the Alberta legislature I asked for a report which would indicate how many women had gone through the medicare program to obtain an abortion more than once. I was astounded to hear that some women had experienced three or four abortions. The first time may have been a mistake or a concern, but some women have experienced three or four abortions. Abortion is being used as a birth control method with which I completely disagree.

When one looks at all of the factors leading to abortion, in my view the economic one is the one that comes up most often. The girl or woman is concerned about how she will keep the wolf from the door or about how she will make a living. I attended a type of profile meeting a week ago. I believe everyone there was opposed to abortion. But a woman came up and spoke to me. She said quietly that she had experienced an abortion herself when she was in her late teens. She told me that the anguish she suffered still awakened her at night when she thought about aborting her child who would now be 19 or 20 years of age. She told me that her prime reason for aborting the child was the lack of livelihood and she could not see how she could keep the child. These reasons were the ones which led her to have an abortion. I believe the economic factor is a very important one in a great number of cases where abortion is carried out. It is not the factor in everyone, but certainly it is in a large number. I do not know exactly what the percentage is, but I would say that about one-third of the abortions are due to economic reasons.

If that is so, this bill, if it reduces the number of abortions by one-third in this country, would be a wonderful thing. Who knows what wonderful children might be born. These children would grow into adults. We do not know what they can do for the world or the genius that we might be killing because of these abortions.

The 52-week maternity leave would be a major factor in changing the mind, or at least eliminating the worry of a girl, who otherwise might agree to an abortion.

We all talk about making the workplace a place where women and men are equal. In many cases, this is not so. In many cases it is impossible to make them equal. In my view, men and women will never be close to being equal unless we recognize that women bear children. If women are going to be penalized when they have a child, either through a reduction in benefits or through a reduction in chances for promotion, then equality goes straight out of the window. This situation happens many times. At a teachers' meeting I heard someone say that Mrs. so and so could qualify as the vice principal if she were not married. They were afraid she might have a child and be absent. Absence in those days was not very much, I can tell you. As a matter of fact, it was embarrassing for those who were pregnant and had to work up to within a month or perhaps even a couple of weeks of giving birth. It was embarrassing to them and embarrassing to all of their loved ones. If we are going to have equality in the work place between men and women we have to recognize that childbirth is something a woman naturally wants. If she does have a child then the woman should not be penalized because of it. Otherwise, we are simply talking about equality with our lips and forgetting all about it as far as our hearts and minds are concerned.

The federal government can be commended for giving 11 weeks maternity leave prior to birth. That is almost three months. The last three months is an embarrassing period of time. This is a time when a woman should not be bothered with the frustrations of the everyday workplace. However, I would like to see that time extended to three months at least and possibly more in some cases depending on doctors' advice. But 11 weeks is certainly far in advance of what many employers are giving today to women who are bearing children.

If the 52-week period were granted, it would bring a sense of stability to married women who want to raise a family. Women should not be denied the contribution they will make through raising a family and looking after a family simply because there may be some inconvenience in the workplace. Inconvenience has to be put down as an item which will lead to a better country and a better community. If the number of children born is reduced through artificial methods or economic factors, then the future of the country is really at stake.

I think a pope said once that the first seven years of a child's life were the most important years. It has been said that if people could have the care of a child for the first seven years they would not worry about what happened after that. The foundation of what that child will do has been established in the first seven years of life. Researchers have indicated that the period before birth is also a vitally important time in the life of a child. This aspect was dealt with quite excellently by the mover of this bill. The welfare of the child should be the predominating thought in our minds as should be the welfare of the mother. Both of these are considered in this bill where the 52 weeks maximum is permitted for a maternity case.

To get more equality in the workplace, we should eliminate some of the discrimination we see today. Women should not be subject to embarrassment because of pregnancy. The number of abortions in this country should be reduced. We should provide for the healthy future of the child and the mother. I think this bill should be supported and I urge hon. members to give it their full support on second reading.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles: Question!

Mrs. Céline Hervieux-Payette (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I hope that my colleague for Regina West (Mr. Benjamin) will allow at least one woman to address this issue. I am not denying him the rights of a father, but I hope that he will at least recognize that I have some rights as a mother.

Mr. Speaker, I would first like to speak of the essence of the matter, of the principle involved, and note that this bill favours parental bonding, and in this regard, I would like to quote for my colleagues one of the statements made in the Senate report entitled "Child at Risk," which was published recently and which is an excellent report, concerning the importance of parental bonding. This report refers to the mother at the time of birth and right after, but I believe that the statement concerning the weeks immediately following birth could also apply to the father. The report says:

Today, women are having terrible difficulties in parenting and in knowing how to parent . . . Therefore, we need those moments that nature gives us, in a sense, to become attached to our infants, to become better mothers, to become more sensitive in relation to infants. It does not mean it won't happen on day three, or two weeks hence;—

I must say, Mr. Speaker, that existing benefits granted through unemployment insurance may not always allow this parental attachment to form or to favour the development of the infant. This is why I must say that I agree with the spirit of Bill C-206 introduced by my colleague from Regina West, which promotes attachment on the part of one of the parents, either the father or the mother, but the emphasis is placed on maternity leave, and in this regard, I must say that the bill may show a certain weakness because I think that it should also apply to the father.

I must say that, as a former administrator of a school board in Quebec, I have had the occasion to apply such a policy of 52 weeks renewable for another year at the request of the teacher. In other words, this policy is already implemented in certain public bodies in the province of Quebec. This is now the policy of the Quebec government, but when we took this initiative, we were able to grant teachers leave so that they might see to the education of their own children, and I believe that a country and a government which allow parents to take care of their own children while guaranteeing their jobs are basically taking their responsibilities seriously. However, I must say that I also agree with the clause which guarantees that the employee may continue to contribute toward his fringe benefits. We all know that the federal government is now reviewing the question of pensions, and I believe that such a provision for workers who leave the labour force to have or bring up children is very positive and would solve some of the problems that now exist concerning pensions, especially for women.

As concerns the three years of constant care for children with special problems, I must say that this legislation seems extremely positive to me. I would like to quote in this regard section 80 of the report of the Senate committee concerning emotional privation:

80. The importance of establishing good, affectionate, early attachments has already been mentioned. If this does not happen, the child has lost an opportunity for the optimal early development of a healthy personality—Normally, this person is the mother—In some cases neither parent is able to fulfil the needed role of a steadfast and affectionate presence in the child's life. Such circumstances have been referred to as "parental deprivation". This is "recognized as a prime cause of delinquency and other personality disorders".

This means that in the case of children who might have special problems, it is even more important to grant leave to the parent while protecting his or her job. Obviously, what remains is to set specific criteria to define the situation and grant such leave for a period which could be extended.

I must say, however, that such a provision cannot be implemented alone without other important measures, namely, an extended program of daycare centres. As a matter of fact, in its report, the Senate committee mentions the case of a child who can secure a love relationship with another person and of the mother who might not be able to afford 52 weeks leave without pay. A child who can have a love relationship with another person can develop in the normal way after the first few weeks. Therefore, I think that this provision to extend the length of maternity leave and to protect the employment of Canadian male and female workers who have a new child is extremely positive.

However, I think that there is a second shortcoming in the legislation. There is no mention of maternity leave in the context of adoption. I think that, in the case of adoption, maternity leave is equally important and that it enables parents to establish that love relationship with the young child they are going to adopt. I should have liked the bill to be more precise in that regard and to allow that alternative to leave because as a champion of equality for women, I think that if, at a certain time, it were possible for the father to look after the child at home, that proposed leave could be equally shared by the father and the mother. In fact, the report of the Senate committee emphasizes the fact that it is very important for the child, even for a young child, to establish that love relationship with the parents in order to develop harmoniously.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I should like to insist that such a measure should be introduced in the context of a global family policy. We often have pieces of legislation which tend to remedy a problem but which finally do not solve the specific problems a Canadian family can have.

[English]

For that reason, I wish the bill could be amended by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Regan), who is responsible for amendments to the Canada Labour Code, so that this measure could be easily accessible to those with a new baby. I would like to see the measure discussed with the Department of National Health and Welfare in order to provide better child care service for those women who do not have enough revenue to stay home after the birth and receive only unemployment insurance benefits. These women should enjoy decent services. This would help avoid the problem of children in their early stages not receiving proper consideration.

I hope the hon. member for Regina West will take into account that we gladly support this measure, but we feel there are a few items missing. I hope the minister will take this as a recommendation and implement it as soon as possible.

Mr. Louis R. Desmarais (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address some pertinent remarks to Bill C-206, an act to amend the Canada Labour Code. The principle intent of this bill is to extend the maximum period of maternity leave to 52 weeks from the present 17. Other amendments would provide for up to three years maternity leave in the case of a child requiring constant care, permit maternity leave to be credited toward a pension plan and, in the case of a mother's death during or after childbirth, transfer to her spouse her remaining leave and other benefits. These, in short, are the main proposals of Bill C-206.

The hon. member's bill strikes a responsive chord, coming as it does on the heels of the settlement of the translators' strike. It would certainly be a wonderful world if the provisions of the kind outlined, such as 52 weeks maternity leave, were generally available. Most legislative provisions across the country today range between 17 and 18 weeks. At the outset, however, I think it would be useful if I were to briefly describe existing maternity leave legislation.

● (1750)

As hon. members will be aware, such legislation appears in virtually all Canadian jurisdictions in various forms. The jurisdiction affected by the proposed bill is, of course, the federal jurisdiction.

[Translation]

The federal legislation maternity leave to be found in part III of the Canada Labour Code was passed in 1971. At that time only British Columbia and Ontario had similar legislation. This legislation provided for 17 weeks leave for employees with 12 consecutive months of service with the same employer. The beneficiary could avail herself of this leave 11 weeks before the expected date of delivery and for a period of six weeks following the birth of the child. The legislation ensured security of employment by providing that the employee had the right to get her job back or any similar position without reduction of wages or loss of benefits. Furthermore, upon her return, employment was deemed to have been continuous with regard to the position she held before leave was granted.

In 1975 the legislation on maternity leave became more flexible thanks to Bill C-16. A pregnant employee then became entitled to up to 11 weeks leave prior to the anticipated date of delivery and to up to 17 weeks after the birth of the child. She could also benefit from additional leaves equal to the difference between the estimated and actual dates of delivery. The leave could therefore cover a period of 26 weeks instead of 17 as was the case before. Three years later. Bill C-8 again amended the legislation by improving the security of employment clause which provides that an employer cannot dismiss or lay off an employee on the sole ground that she is pregnant or has asked for leave.

[English]

As hon. members may recall, the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) earlier this month indicated the board's willingness to offer all federal employees new maternity and paternity benefits. These include the maternity benefits already mentioned, unpaid paternity and adoption leave of up to 26 weeks, some provision for the care of sick family members and medical and adoption appointments.

Following the federal lead, similar legislation now exists in all other jurisdictions in Canada with the exception of Prince Edward Island, the Yukon and the Northwest Territories. The qualification is 12 months continuous service in five jurisdictions, 12 months and 11 weeks in one jurisdiction and 20 weeks in one jurisdiction. Two jurisdictions have no qualification period. The length of the leave period is 16 weeks in one jurisdiction, 17 weeks in five jurisdictions and 18 weeks in three jurisdictions. Only four jurisdictions provide for protection from lay-off or dismissal and, with the exception of two provinces, it is specifically stated that the woman must be reinstated in the same or a similar position. So we can see that the 17-week period is the most commonly applied across Canada.

Beyond these minor differences in legislation there are some jurisdictions which have made some innovative changes to provide the pregnant woman with more job security. For example, in two jurisdictions—Ontario and Saskatchewan—specific mention is made of pregnancy-related illnesses. The legislation in these provinces prohibits employers from discriminating in the provision of sick leave and disability benefits on the basis that the illness is pregnancy-related. The Quebec legislation provides a safety clause which permits the woman who provides a medical certificate to ask for a change of duties if the working conditions are hazardous to her or to the fetus. Also, if the employer does not provide her with alternative employment within eight days, the woman may go on special paid leave up until the commencement of her maternity leave, that is, eight weeks preceding the expected birth.

Provisions for maternity leave also exist in a number of collective agreements in Canada. In 1979 various jurisdictions were surveyed to determine the frequency of maternity leave clauses, and it was found that provisions in existence in various jurisdictions ranged from 10 per cent to 58 per cent of the agreements studied. In general, the clauses followed the provisions of the legislation with some providing for additional leave of up to one year, shorter qualification periods, several weeks of paid leave and continuation of benefits during leave with accumulation of seniority.

However, the majority of union contracts do not provide for any form of maternity leave, relying totally on legislation to provide protection. It must also be noted that of more than four million women in the labour force little more than a quarter are unionized.

[Translation]

In November, 1979, the government of Quebec offered its public and related employees the most interesting provisions regarding parental leave. All agreements are not yet in effect at the present time, but here are some of the clauses they contain: 20 weeks of leave with pay divided as follows: 93 per cent of the salary will be paid to the employee during the two-week waiting period before payment of unemployment benefits; moreover, during the 15-week benefit period, the employer agrees to pay the difference between the amount of the benefits and 93 per cent of the salary and to pay the same portion of the salary during the additional three weeks.

Another provision allows extension of maternity leave without pay for a two-year period. This leave is available to the mother or the father. It can also be split between the two. The employee on leave gets credit for seniority, other leave and benefits.

Countries other than Canada have similar legislation and some have made outstanding progress in that respect. Sweden, for example, extends up to two years of leave with pay to either parent. That country also favours part-time work and flexible working hours for parents with children under six. In Sweden, maternity provisions go far beyond leave for confinement and the subsequent recovery period. In that country the legislation provides that parents may take whatever time they need to look after their children. In other words, Sweden has recognized that women are a vital and permanent part of the labour force, and that they can go on with their careers after their children are born.

Such changes did not come about only due to the pressure of the women's liberation movement. They are also derived from economic factors. This means that working conditions have had to adapt themselves to the changes in the role of man and woman in order to promote a healthier family life. The Swedish legislation is quite wide in its scope, and the philosophy underlying it might very well serve as an example here.

South of the border, an increasing number of employers in the United States private sector are taking the lead in introducing creative employment benefits. The latest move in this direction relates to adoption. A recent study of benefit programs offered by 14 large corporations indicates that adoption benefits were established as an equity consideration. The survey found that the infrequency of adoption made the program inexpensive when compared with other benefits, particularly the amount of positive public relations value generated.

Mr. Benjamin: Good. Question!

Mr. Desmarais: Although the number of firms offering such benefits is still relatively small, it is a step in the right direction.

Mr. Paproski: Question!

Mr. Desmarais: This, then, is a very brief review of some of the highlights—

Mr. Collenette: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. The hour provided for the consideration of private members' business is expiring, but I will recognize the parliamentary secretary on a point of order.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Collenette: Mr. Speaker, I wish to draw the attention of the House to the fact that according to the provisions of section 35 of the Petroleum Administration Act, the question, if any, must be put at 9.45 on the last day of debate on that section, which will be this evening, as agreed in the House order.

After consultation between the parties it has been agreed that the question will be put at 10 p.m. tonight.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The parliamentary secretary indicates that there may be agreement to the suggestion that the vote on the Petroleum Administration Act proclamation take place at 10 p.m. rather than 9.45. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Collenette: Mr. Speaker, in case anyone misunderstands, I should just reiterate that the question will be deferred until tomorrow; the actual putting of the question must be tonight, but the vote will be tomorrow.

Mr. Knowles: The question is put tonight, but the vote is tomorrow.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I do not think I need to repeat. I do now leave the chair until 8 p.m.

At 6.01 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

PETROLEUM ADMINISTRATION ACT

PETITION TO REVOKE PROCLAMATION

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Waddell:

That the proclamation laid before the House on Wednesday, November 12, 1980, pursuant to subsection 35(2) of the Petroleum Administration Act, as proclaimed in PC 1980-2915, be revoked.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): When the debate was interrupted at five o'clock this afternoon, the hon. member for Abitibi (Mr. Gingras) had the floor.

Mr. René Gingras (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, when the House took recess at 5 p.m., I was speaking generally of my riding of Abitibi, which is according to the privilege granted to new members in their first session. I referred to its immense territory, 750,000 square kilometres, that is 48 per cent of the province of Quebec. I dealt with its contrasts, its history and its rural vocation. At five o'clock, I was broaching the subject of tourism in that part of our country.

The Abitibi region, Mr. Speaker, is a marvellous region for those who love nature; it embraces thousands of lakes and rivers, wide open spaces, and plenty of fresh unpolluted air. It is a small paradise for fishermen and hunters. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, I would like to remind you, if I may, that the Right Hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) while a young student in the forties canoed down the Harricanaw River to James Bay. No wonder, Mr. Speaker, that he insists on being in good physical shape while he is at the helm of this country of ours.

The Harricanaw River runs within my riding, Mr. Speaker, and flows into James Bay, site of the project of the century. I would like to give a few energy data on the James Bay project. By 1990, the La Grande complex will generate 11,400 megawatts. With the expected excess water, dams could be over-equipped to produce 4,652 megawatts more. The NBR project proposed in the same James Bay area will include the Nottaway Broadback and Rupert rivers, with a possible production of 2,870 megawatts. When completed, the whole James Bay program will have a total production of 27,632 megawatts.

I would like to take this opportunity tonight to point out how far-sighted Mr. Robert Bourassa was in giving the go ahead to the project when he was the premier of Quebec.

I could not make a complete survey of my riding without mentioning forestry. From the small sawmill of the thirties to what we see today, things have changed quite a bit.

We now have modern plants with an increasing capacity to finish products right here. A kraft pulp and paper mill was established at Lebel-sur-Quevillon, a brand new town in existence since 1965. At Val d'Or, we have a particle board plant, and a newspaper mill is now being built at Amos, at a cost of over $190 million, thanks to the regional development assistance granted by DREE. This is the very first newsprint plant to be built in Quebec since 1938. Moreover, it is the only one wholly owned and controlled by Francophones. The plant will use nothing but locally produced energy, that is coming from the riding of Abitibi, electricity coming from James Bay and forest waste products.

That brings me, Mr. Speaker, to the national energy program, and more specifically renewable energy and energy conservation. With regard to the national energy program, allow me to make a few comments concerning sources of renewable energy and the role the government intends to play across the whole spectrum of those energies.

I want to speak today about forests. I quote from page 67 of the document entitled "The National Energy Program":

> The federal government currently administers the FIRE (Forest Industries Renewable Energy) program, which provides a substantial grant for forest industries that convert to wood waste. To encourage even greater displacement of petroleum by biomass fuels, this program will be expanded to apply to other organic materials such as agricultural and municipal wastes, and to cover all industrial and commercial establishments, in all areas. Grants will also be made available to firms that undertake cogeneration of electricity (the generation of electricity and process heat at the plant site). To provide additional flexibility, and make this program attractive even to the largest industries, the existing $4 million upper limit on grants will be removed.

Mr. Speaker, I have here another document entitled "The Green Gold." It is an article written by Mr. Louis-Jean Lussier and published in Forêt Conservation, August-September 1980. I quote:

> In this world going through an energy crisis . . . could it be possible that the huge Quebec forests, an essentially renewable resource, replace someday the exhaustible oil of the Arab sheiks, the price of which is skyrocketing every year, somewhat as the whim takes them? From time to time, a daily newspaper looking for a good story will tell you about methanol, this precious fluid made from wood which will soon fire your car engine. And don't you dismiss it as a dream: already in Brazil they use as a motor fuel a mixture of gasoline and 30 per cent methanol known as gasohol.

I will limit my remarks tonight to a concept that is more elementary than gasohol, but which still interests me a great deal. I would like to give as an example a public building located in my riding and that building, as everything else in Abitibi, is close to a wood waste burner. In that particular case, the building is close to five such burners.

So, that building uses 250,000 gallons of heating oil or the equivalent of 6,250 barrels of oil. As hon. members know, an imported barrel of oil today costs Canadian taxpayers $21.50 in subsidy to importers. So the heating bill for that building is $175,000. If that oil were paid at the international price it would cost after deductions $134,375 more, that is $309,375 for heating that building.

Mr. Speaker, as I said earlier, that building is very close to five wood waste burners. A simple calculation has shown that one tonne of dry chips is equivalent, as far as energy is concerned, to three barrels of oil. So that establishment would use about 2,000 tonnes of chips a year, the energy equivalent at prevailing prices would be $84 a tonne of dry chips and almost twice that if the cost of oil were estimated at the international price. You will ask me: do we have in the northwest enough chips to heat that building? I mentioned 2,000 tonnes of chips a year for that building.

At the Department of Lands and Forests, in Abitibi, I was assured that natural reforestation represents 1,676,000 cunits. For the laymen, a cunit is 100 cubic feet. It is the equivalent of a cut forest of coniferous trees. In fact, the forest regenerates entirely. One thing is difficult to find: that cut wood represents 55 per cent of the tree. So, to cut 1,676,000 cunits you must cut a volume of trees of three million cunits. Those three million cunits are made up of 12 per cent chips which makes 360,000 cunits of chips. Those volumes have a weight of about 500,000 tonnes which represent, as I said earlier, three barrels of oil per tonne. So, the chips we produce in Abitibi are the equivalent of 1.5 million barrels of oil every year. Furthermore, such energy losses cost us $32 million in oil imports at today's prices. And that, Mr. Speaker, is only the bark; 33 per cent of the tree is still left in the bush.

I am pleased that the government is aiming at energy self-sufficiency by 1990. The example I have given clearly proves there are huge wastes of energy. The CHIP program is oil conservation legislation. The conversion of heating systems, particularly in my constituency, and the incentives to do it, that is up to $800, is a step aimed at reducing our oil consumption. I leave it to my colleagues to deal with the other benefits of the national energy program.

Mr. Speaker, I do not want to go on and on in my maiden speech in the House. I thank you again for allowing me to rise in this debate. This proclamation could have been avoided if an agreement on oil pricing had been possible with the main producing province. I feel, however, that an agreement might be reached before long. However, we must go forward in order to achieve energy self-sufficiency. I hope that these brief remarks on one aspect only of the energy program will bring home to us here, in Canada, our lack of concern about conserving this valuable energy.

[English]

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, this debate is on the Petroleum Administration Act. I think we ought to analyse it to some extent and consider what in fact is happening.

First of all I should like to refer to section 22(2) which reads as follows:

> An agreement for the purpose of this part need not be expressed in any formal document executed on behalf of the parties thereto if the expression of that agreement is contained in reciprocal orders in council issued by the governments concerned.

Mr. Speaker, last December 11 the Conservative government of the day presented a budget which set out the details of an energy agreement. That energy agreement would have been confirmed by orders in council had the budget been passed. The agreement would have been in accordance with the provisions of the Petroleum Administration Act. Members on the government side today say "show me the agreement." Sir, the agreement was expressed and shown to them on December 11. It was not completed in accordance with section 22 of the act simply because the government was defeated and an election called. The government did not feel it proper to go through the order in council procedure with the government of Alberta to complete a deal under the Petroleum Administration Act. Members opposite talk about an agreement and the ability to reach an agreement. Sir, there was an agreement. That agreement would have been reduced to order in council in accordance with the act. Of course it could not have been because of the defeat of the government on December 13. Throughout the election campaign we were criticized for the terms of that agreement.

What happened during that period? When that agreement was made the price of oil on the international market was approximately $22 U.S. per barrel. Today it is approximately $30 to $32 U.S. a barrel in the Persian Gulf. And what has happened about the 18 cents a gallon? Well, it was 21.9 cents per litre for gasoline in my riding in December of 1979. It is now November, 1980, and the price is 29.9 cents per litre. That is 8 cents more per litre. There are 4.5 litres to a gallon and by my figuring the price of gasoline has gone up 36 cents under this government so far this year.

We talk about agreements. The concept of the Petroleum Administration Act is that effort should be made to obtain agreement between the producing province and the federal government. This calls into question the nature of the effort to obtain an agreement. There were virtually no discussions of consequence between the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) and the minister of energy in the legislature of Alberta during this period. Not until July 25 did the minister of energy from this House decided to have one more meeting. I point out that there have been no meetings since July 25 with the government of Alberta. The old agreement under the existing act expired on June 30. We have been without an agreement since that time. There has been no honest effort by the minister of energy or the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to come to grips with the making of an agreement. We are now faced with the enactment of section 35 of the Petroleum Administration Act whereby this government is telling us that it cannot get an agreement. Mr. Speaker, ministers over there have an obligation to demonstrate to this House and to the people of Canada that they have tried.

We have all had the opportunity of seeing Premier Lougheed on television telling us about the letter he wrote three weeks before the budget was handed down asking for another meeting. There has yet to be a meeting between the minister of energy and the Premier of Alberta, or a meeting between the Prime Minister of this country and the Premier of Alberta. Indeed, the Prime Minister has spent more time negotiating with the President of Mexico, Mr. Portillo, and Sheik Yamani than he has with the Premier of Alberta. He is more interested in dealing with the Mexicans and the Arabs than he is with the Premier of Alberta or, indeed, the Premier of Saskatchewan. He has made no honest effort to come to an agreement.

I would like to speak for a moment about this Mexican deal. What do we get from it? He went around talking about the great deal with Mexico. Well, it is a deal that will aggravate marketing of heavy oil to the point where we will have difficulty in refining it. It imposes significant cost burdens on Canadians and Canadian consumers. We are paying an outrageous price for this oil, a price far in excess of what we get for selling equivalent heavy oil, produced in the Lloydminster fields, to the United States. This is difficult oil to refine; it has a high sulphur content. We are buying it at world price plus, yet we cannot even sell our own heavy oil produced in Lloydminster and other fields in the west. Indeed, some of those fields are prorated down to 50 per cent. That is the type of oil deal we have had. That is the kind of effort we have seen to make an agreement—agreements with Mexicans but no agreements with Canadians. What is being said through this act to the people of Canada is: "I cannot make a deal". Well, the Prime Minister has not tried. He has not wanted to.

I could talk about other deals they made with foreigners. Specifically, they made a deal with Roumania back in 1972. They bought 100,000 barrels of oil which was so poor that it could not be refined. They could not burn it, or use it. Whatever happened to that oil we do not know. What have we seen in terms of negotiations with the Prime Minister, the sheik of sheiks, who is going around the world trying to make deals but who is really not honestly trying to put together compromises that will make an energy policy?

I am very pleased to see the Minister of State for Multiculturalism (Mr. Fleming) is here tonight since I want to talk about the philosophy of this government and I want to refer to the speech he made to the Canadian Club in Vancouver, British Columbia, on November 12, 1980. I refer the minister to page 11 of his speech and I intend to quote the whole paragraph, which reads:

> Until the energy crisis, the provinces had almost a free hand in exporting resources as they saw fit. Ottawa didn't want to stand—didn't even appear to want to stand—in the way of western development. It didn't want to weaken national unity while separatism was gaining ground in Quebec. Nor could it afford a confrontation with the combined power of the provinces, the multinationals, and the government of the United States. And power unused is power abdicated.

Who are our enemies? The minister says that the provinces are our enemies. The minister says number two enemy is the multinationals and enemy number three of the government is the government of the United States. That is the way in which this government approaches national unity. Their number one enemy is the provinces. And this is the minister talking, sir, a man who is a representative of the government and of government policy here. Their number two enemy is the multinationals and enemy number three is the government of the United States. "And power unused is power abdicated." That is what this act is all about. Power unused is power abdicated and "—confrontation with the combined power of the provinces, the multinationals—" is what the minister refers to. I would like to read another paragraph from that speech:

> Clearly, the federal government has lost some credibility. But if it can be blamed for Canada's problems, it's not for asserting too much control but too little; not for too much confrontation but too much accommodation.

Where is the accommodation?

Mr. Fleming: Read the whole speech.

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Speaker, I read his whole speech. The hon. minister can speak later and explain it. When he talks about confrontation that is the policy of this government.

● (2030)

The policy of the government is to beat down the provinces and the companies which have been trying to develop this country. That is the reason the Petroleum Administration Act was proclaimed. It is not for want of agreement, but for want of confrontation, because that is the way in which the government approaches, and has always approached, such issues. I first spoke on this matter in 1973 during debate on a bill to bring about the Energy Supplies Emergency Act. I spoke in this House on December 12, 1973. While preparing for this debate I thought I would take a look at what I had already said in this House with respect to energy, so I dug up that speech. I was most interested in some of the remarks contained therein, and I would like to quote from my own speech.

An hon. Member: Oh, God!

An hon. Member: Are you that hard up for material?

Mr. Blenkarn: Perhaps some members of the New Democratic Party were here at the time, but most of them were not because they do not last long in this House. I would like to quote from page 8690 of Hansard of December 12, 1973:

> The government does not really care about those provinces. It has simply told them what it intends to do: it has operated on a principle of confrontation.
> Mr. Speaker, in a situation like that, when one person declares unilaterally that he will tax the resources of your province, the next thing that happens is that the person who has been treated in this fashion acts, or reacts, in the same fashion. It is impossible to develop a spirit of community in Canada on the basis of the concept of two lawyers engaged in a lawsuit, or of two businessmen competing with each other at an auction. This whole atmosphere of confrontation in dominion-provincial relations, is one which ought to arise and did not arise before this Prime Minister became Liberal leader. This has been the climate over the past four years and it is about time it changed because it is not doing Canada any good.

I will not read my entire speech. My friend for Edmonton North (Mr. Paproski) was here and he will remember his comments. I went on to say at page 8691:

> If we continue to tweak their noses, and continue to push the interests of central Canada against the resource provinces, we are not going to keep confederation together—and that is a pretty serious matter.

I made those remarks in 1973, and since that time the government has continued to carry on in that fashion. It is no wonder there is no agreement. Its policy is confrontation and further confrontation. What has happened since 1973? We eventually arranged the passage of the Petroleum Administration Act and there was agreement for $1 half yearly increases in oil prices. A portion of that increase went to the federal government, 45 per cent went to the provinces and 45 per cent to the companies. It became apparent early in 1979 that it was necessary to renegotiate that deal.

As a result of that necessity to renegotiate, the Clark government proceeded through the summer and fall of 1979 to renegotiate the deal and settlement which became the subject of the Crosbie budget of December 11. The question is, could we have continued with the negotiations this year which were terminated as a result of the defeat of the Crosbie budget and as a result of the fact that the arrangement under section 22 of the Petroleum Administration Act could not be completed.

Ronald Anderson in his column in the Toronto Globe and Mail recently reported that a company called Data Resources of Canada has suggested the probability of a compromise does exist, that a compromise can be reached. Compromise is essential to this whole question of dominion-provincial relations, of fairness and of the way in which one part of Canada perceives the tax levied on its resources. The suggestion in the article is that while Alberta has been asking for a $4.50 increase in the price of oil, under the current split in increases the province would probably reduce that claim to approximately $3.25 per barrel. Indeed, the Premier of Alberta indicated that he sees no reason why oil prices in Canada should be any more than 75 per cent of the world price, to be phased in over a period of time.

There have been all sorts of efforts at compromise, but because this government perceives the provinces, the companies and the United States as its enemies, these efforts have not been effective. When I spoke in the House in 1973 this country was a net exporter of oil. The problem then was moving oil from our surplus region in western Canada to our deficit regions in eastern Canada. It was difficult to move oil then because there were no pipelines or other systems of easy delivery to the east.

It was also apparent in 1973 that Canada had to become self-sufficient in oil because OPEC had been organized and oil prices had escalated to $4 a barrel. These events were seen to be disastrous. Of course, prices have escalated many times since, but at that point we understood the potential of the tar sands and what could be done. We knew that in the bituminous sands of the west there was buried heavy oil—more oil than in the whole of Arabia. At that time the government of Alberta along with Imperial Oil and other companies put together the Syncrude project. It was suggested that instead of a royalty they would take 50 per cent of the profits. It was suggested by the then leader of the New Democratic Party that there probably would not be any profits from the Syncrude project for a long time and that the province of Alberta would get very little out of it. All of this has happened since 1973, and 18 months ago the Syncrude project came on-stream. However, there have been no further projects of that nature since.

As a nation, we have really done nothing to mobilize the resources of our country. We have witnessed confrontation and fights, but there has been no need for these antics. We have the greatest land in the world and resources which are unmatched by any other country. We have long known about our potential oil resources in the north, but we have not taken a single drop of those resources to market. We have known about the gas reserves in the north, but again, none of that gas has gone to market. Again, we have had nothing but regulation, confrontation and the government going after the multinationals because they are bad boys—they might conceivably make a profit and we might become self-sufficient.

Mr. Speaker, we could become self-sufficient and we should be self-sufficient now. The tragedy is that we have left it so late. If it was to take ten years to be self-sufficient, we should have started in 1973. The crime is the responsibility of competing governments, particularly of this government which views as its enemies, the provinces, the multinationals and the United States. It is unfortunate we should wind up with this kind of attitude. Look at the way this government views one company which some years ago experimented in the tar sands. That company was called The Great Canadian Oil Sands. It has since amalgamated and been renamed Suncor. It is largely foreign owned by Sun Oil Company which owns 98 per cent of it. It is a multinational company and therefore an enemy of the government. But that company invested and built the technology on which we can now rely for oil self-sufficiency in the tar sands development. How does this government treat that company? It says to that company, to the explorer, the developer of the technology, "You are no better than any other Joe who drills an easy well. The price of your oil is $16.75—or whatever—a barrel. That is what you get. You do not get the $38 plus change and the CPI on top which your competitor Syncrude gets or any other person who goes into developing heavy oil or tar sands recovery. You have done all the work. You have developed all the technology but you will not get the price because that is the way we treat the risk investors. Besides you are a dirty multinational and enemy number two." They are not enemy number one. Enemy number two is good enough, but maybe they could be enemy number three because their head office is located in the United States.

There are all sorts of possibilities in this country in terms of energy development. We hear from this side about the lack of employment for people in the north, the lack of employment for native people, and so on. How will we ever put people to work if we do not develop the resources we have, resources capable of putting them to work? How can we put them to work? What do we do? Do we put them on welfare forever? Can we not put people to work? Can we not give people opportunities to be part of this world in this century? Would hon. members rather pay these people off? Do they want to look after them in the welfare cage forever? That is the NDP attitude. That is the attitude which says our enemies are the multinationals, the United States and the provinces. That is the attitude of the confrontation which this group to my left, the red rump of the group over there, would like to develop and push on. The hon. member for Comox-Powell River (Mr. Skelly) talked about making sure the private companies do something. Then he stopped and said he had said something wrong; he meant public companies. He knows perfectly well that public companies will never produce anything really worth while. They never have before, nor will they in the future.

I do not normally repeat what I have said on other occasions in this House but I have talked about some of the things we should be doing. We have the potential for being energy producers and energy exporters of petroleum and natural gas. But what do we do? We do not use that potential to negotiate tariff reductions with the United States. The U.S. is our enemy. We just sell that country natural gas at whatever price we can get. But we do not use the ability to negotiate to make sure that we sell plastics, oil in tin cans and all the things one can make with the resins from the petrochemical industry.

We have a concept that it is wrong to make a profit. I do not know of any successful business yet—that did not make a profit. A profit is the motivating force behind doing something. If people organized in a business do not make that activity profitable, they will not do it. If people are asked to invest their money and they do not see a return on it, they will not make that investment. These fellows over here do not understand that, Mr. Speaker. Presumably the government does not understand it either. Presumably the government is going to make sure it is not profitable to be in the oil business. In other words, the government is going to make sure it will be exceedingly unprofitable to do so.

I shall read a short letter which was delivered to the Minister of Finance. It came from a small oil company in Alberta called Gladstone Petroleum Ltd. and it reads:

I am forwarding under separate cover to the provincial government, applications to abandon six oil wells. This decision to abandon oil wells has been made necessary due to the onerous taxes and royalties to which have been added the terms of the presently proposed budget.

Admittedly, these wells are marginal, each capable of yielding 40 to 60 barrels of light gravity oil per month. In a favourable royalty, taxation, and pricing climate, these wells could operate at cost, or at slight profit.

That is the kind of attitude this budget has presented to these small companies. They say to themselves, "Better that we do not invest our money." Or else they say, "We cannot make any profit pumping 40 to 60 barrels a month from a well which costs a lot to operate. It is better to turn off the taps and not doing anything." That is the incentive given under the pricing system imposed under this act. The refusal, the unwillingness and the absolute disregard for the interests of the provinces and the people involved in the oil industry in determining the price formula demanded under this proclamation are what is wrong with the proclamation.

The concept has been developed in the ivory towers here in Ottawa by people far away from drilling rigs. These people over in the EMR building, the Taj Mahal, are the ones who have figured out what they think is a proper rate of return for someone going into a risky business, what they think they can get away with in terms of an imposed pricing structure. But this attitude is not working. Companies are abandoning exploration and development opportunities. Companies have decided they cannot make enough money here, so they will go somewhere else. Members from this side of the House talk about rigs leaving Canada. They know about it because they happen to come from western Canada. They talk about the industry not going ahead the way it should. We all know the industry is not going the way it should. We all know that under this government there has been no new tar sands project started since Syncrude. We all know that no new development has gone on.

The efforts of this government have been directed to the Sheik Yamanis or the Portillos. Those are the kinds of people with whom this government wants to negotiate. It does not want to negotiate and settle with Canadians.

Mr. Rae: Thank Exxon.

Mr. Blenkarn: We have a situation where productivity in this country this year has declined 3.3. per cent on the basis of individuals employed. While employment has gone up 2 per cent, we are producing 1.1 per cent or 1.2 per cent gross less goods and services this year than we did last. In other words, we are employing more people this year to produce less goods and services. Yet there is opportunity to make this country great. We have the resources. We know there is a world out there demanding our petroleum and gas resources and the chemicals we can produce from them. All of this means employment for Canadians. When we have 8 per cent of Canadians unemployed—and maybe more pretty soon—and when businesses are slowing down and there is a drop in productivity, something is wrong.

I want to mention a concern that I and others have with respect to what is happening in Canada and the effect the invocation of the Petroleum Administration Act has on the unity of this country.

Normally speaking, an ordinary statute setting the price of a commodity would not cause much concern. However, we have witnessed a period of constitutional debate and increased concern about oil, oil pricing and resource policy. On top of that, we have seen the unilateral imposition of a pricing formula which is clearly not satisfactory to any of the producing provinces or even the potential producing provinces.

As a result, when speaking in this House, my colleagues have said there is a bit of a prairie fire developing in western Canada. That prairie fire has been fanned by a confrontation attitude on the part of this government. It is not the first time a prairie fire has developed there. Members of this House will realize that at one point the old line parties—an expression used by my friends to the left—were totally frozen out from the UFO, the progressive movement, the social credit movement and the CCF movement. These political movements developed in western Canada because of true economic reasons.

There is today a political movement developing there, led by many people. I have known for quite a while—and I wish I could call him a friend again—the former leader of the opposition in the province of Saskatchewan, Dick Culver. There are people in politics seriously advocating that a part of this country leave and join the United States or leave and become some other country. That is serious. While the poll taken prior to the budget may have showed only 10 per cent separatist leanings, there was a significant indication of unhappiness and of a feeling that the west could go it alone. As a result of the policies of this government, confirmed in the proclamation of this act, we could very easily wind up with no honest attempt to obtain an agreement. This could cause a disaster, a unity problem and the separation of our country.

Mr. Roger Simmons (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to see my good friend from Edmonton North (Mr. Paproski) so much in anticipation. I shall not disappoint him. I thank him for coming out tonight, braving the weather, sacrificing to be here. My good friend from Portage-Marquette (Mr. Mayer) is here tonight in body and spirit. I thank him as well. I want to especially thank my good friend from Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn). I want to say something to him before he leaves the chamber, as he is about to do, to indulge in one of his weaknesses.

Mr. Wilson: Explain.

Mr. Simmons: I say to him there was no agreement. He really should not mislead the Canadian people about that. I remind him that a day or so before the budget came down, indeed, I think the day after the Tory budget came down on December 11, a senior governmental official in Alberta said quite candidly and publicly there was no agreement. I know there are those who want to rewrite history and say it was otherwise, but the public record is quite clear that there was no agreement.

I concede to the hon. member they may well have been near an agreement. After all, they are bedfellows, being of the same political stripe. They should have been able to get their heads together, given the seven or eight months they had. However, the hon. member should not mislead the people of Canada by perpetrating this motion of agreement. There was no agreement.

While I have the ear of the hon. member for Mississauga South, may I say he did some rather interesting arithmetic when he talked about the price of gas in his riding last December compared to now. He said it had gone up 32 or 36 cents. He tied that somehow to the Tory gas tax. What he did not tell his listeners was that under the Tory administration, had it continued beyond December 13, the price of gas would have gone up by perhaps an equivalent amount. One can argue about whether it would have gone up 32, 34 or 36 cents, but it would have been roughly an equivalent amount. In addition, there would have been an 18-cent tax on top of that. That is the point he should have made to his listeners.

I thank the hon. member for his wisdom and his arithmetic. The last time he treated the people of Canada to his considerable wisdom, he was telling them what he thought of Canada's native people. As we did not share his views on that subject, we do not share his arithmetic either.

I am told the Chinese have a set of symbols or a word in their language which not only means crisis, but opportunity. They use the same word or set of characters for both crisis and opportunity. There are those who tell us that the oil controversy is reaching a crisis. Whether that is the case or not, it is certainly at the point where it is an opportunity for us to do something in this country that should have been done a long time ago. It is time for some planning and determined action. That is what brings us to "The National Energy Program" tabled in this House two weeks ago.

There are three elements in the program I wish to mention briefly tonight. Before doing so, I want to reflect for a moment on a point I was making in response to the hon. member for Mississauga South. No national government, Liberal or Tory, and I am not deliberately omitting my friends from the NDP, because it is not a worry they have to contend with in the foreseeable future—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Simmons: My good friend from Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae) is always worth mentioning. We are delighted to see him out this evening. As a matter of fact, the opposition is out in force tonight. There are at least a dozen or 15.

Mr. Wilson: How are you doing over there?

Mr. Simmons: We are doing very well over here.

Mr. Wilson: Some are, but not you.

Mr. Simmons: No national government, whatever its political stripe, is going to be able to get an agreement easily. The hon. member for Yellowhead (Mr. Clark) found that out when he was prime minister. He came close, but he did not quite get the agreement. We have reached the conclusion that the time has come, if we intend to build something of a heritage for those who come after us, to cease doing things on an ad hoc basis as far as energy matters are concerned.

Mr. Paproski: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member from Come-By-Chance just mentioned that there are a number of members in the House. I do not think he should begin to reflect on the attendance of this House when we have different committees meeting in other places.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. With all due respect to the hon. member for Edmonton North (Mr. Paproski), I think he has made his point.

Mr. Simmons: I am proud to tell my good friend from Edmonton North that my riding is Burin-St. George's. His good friend from St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) actually represents Come-By-Chance. He will learn that if he stays around long enough.

There are three elements to the program, Mr. Speaker; security of supply, the opportunity for Canadians to participate in the oil industry and some fairness in pricing and revenue sharing. I should like to spend a little time on each of these. I submit they cannot be obtained if we are to depend on OPEC, if we are forced to allow circumstances half way round the world, the vagaries of political life in a politically unstable part of the world, to determine one of the basic economic facts of life here in Canada. If we continue to do that, we are fooling ourselves. We will have difficulty in planning the economic and industrial development of this country. How can a farmer or a fisherman build his enterprise over the next few years if he does not know what the price of oil will be two, three or five years from now?

We are fortunate in this country that we have enough petroleum for our immediate requirements. We do not need to worry of being deprived of winter heating oil because there has been a sudden change of government half way round the globe.

In this we are more fortunate than most countries. It would be immoral if we let slip by this marvellous opportunity to plan the energy supply and pricing mechanism for Canada and to secure for our fellow countrymen some measure of security.

The second part of the government's energy program is opportunity, opportunity for Canadians to participate in the energy industry. It is difficult to achieve this as long as the greater part of our gas and oil industry is under foreign control and ownership. These resources are finite and they are the heritage of the people of Canada. The federal and provincial governments are the custodians, the trustees of that particular heritage. The people of this country should in the end be the prime beneficiaries of the resources of the oil industry. As long as the greater part of this country's oil and gas industry remains foreign owned and foreign dominated, that is impossible.

The foreign companies export capital from this country at an alarming rate. Between 1975 and 1979 the total outflow of capital was $3.7 billion. That is a monstrous transfer of wealth from Canada to foreign shareholders. It is a state of affairs tolerated by no other nation in the world.

Mr. Thacker: Ten million dollars?

Mr. Simmons: I know my friend for Lethbridge-Foothills (Mr. Thacker) might not want to hear this because his party has adopted the position of being the spokesman for the multinationals. I know the truth is hard to bear but this has to be said. I say to him, this outflow of capital has to stop.

I am not surprised that the oil companies have begun to squirm, that the large multinationals have reacted so violently to the national energy program. This does not surprise me at all because our proposal means they will not make quite as many dollars as in the past. They can afford to cut back on their profits. For example, for the six months ending August 18, 1980, Gulf Canada's net income rose 74 per cent; for the second quarter of 1980 it rose 76 per cent to $95 million.

Is that an isolated example, Mr. Speaker? Let us look at Imperial Oil. Their income rose 52 per cent. What about BP Canada? I promise my friends in the NDP I am not going to mention Husky Oil tonight. I have too much respect for my good friend Tommy Douglas. I am talking about the companies the other opposition party supports.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Simmons: Mr. Speaker, the net income of BP Canada for the six months ended June 30, 1980, more than doubled to over $59 million. That is the group the hon. member for Mississauga South defends. That is the group he is worried about lest they slip back from $59 million to $58 million or $57 million. What nonsense! Of course, the multinationals are going to squirm, they are going to react. They are going to lay out their public relations millions. They are going to put the steamroller into action to see if they can stop all opposition to anything but the carte blanche they have been given in this country for too many years.

The third part of the national energy program is the thrust for fairness, fairness in pricing—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Simmons: —fairness in revenue sharing. The present distribution of revenue from oil and gas is 45 per cent for the provinces, 45 per cent for the oil industry and 10 per cent for the national government.

An hon. Member: Who owns it?

Mr. Simmons: Who owns it, the member asks. The people of Canada own it, the same people who own this government, the same people who sent the members to this Parliament. We are not owned by the multinationals. We do not have to bow to the multinationals. We do have to bow to respect the wishes of the people of Canada and we make no apologies for that, Mr. Speaker. The federal government bears the financial brunt of the exercise—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Simmons: The federal government does bear the financial brunt of the exercise of financing the tax expenditures. The national government has borne 63 per cent of the costs of exploration programs. The Canadian taxpayer has underwritten 63 per cent of the cost of these programs. The federal government, representing all Canadians, has an obligation to cushion regions from the sudden effects of price rises and fuel shortages. These activities are expensive and they must be paid for. What we are doing is not unlike what is being done in many other countries. This afternoon the Minister of Labour (Mr. Regan) drew attention to the situation in Australia and United States, where the state administration or the provincial administration is receiving far less under the programs in these countries than is the case under the national energy program.

This government recognizes that while resources must be utilized for the benefit of all citizens in this country the first claim on the benefit of these resources must be by the people who live in the provinces where the resources are located. It is not the intention of the national energy program to increase the federal government's share substantially at the expense of the provincial treasuries involved but rather to do so at the expense of the multinationals. For that we make no apology.

I wish to speak now on fairness in pricing. Why should the price of oil be determined by OPEC in circumstances that are completely beyond our control? Why this sudden urge to pay world prices for a commodity we produce in this country? Where is the precedent for it? Does this mean we should rush out and pay the world price for other items? If we found the Arabs were paying $2 for a litre of milk, does that mean we too should pay $2 for a litre of milk? Should we not say instead, what does it cost to produce a litre of milk and what is a reasonable return on the investment? Should we not add these two figures together so as to determine a consumer price? That is the way we do it.

That is the way we are determining the price of oil in this country. We are asking what it costs to produce and what is a fair return on investment in the first place. Add those two together, and you will have our price of oil this year, next year and five years down the road. It seems eminently sensible to me that we should arrive at the price of a commodity based on what it costs to produce that commodity, keeping in mind that the person who invests the dollars to produce the commodity should get a reasonable return on his or her investment.

Mr. Laniel: That is what the people voted for in the last election.

Mr. Simmons: What has been the practice in this country when the world price of a commodity shoots dramatically upward or dramatically downward? That is a fair question. What has been the practice when the price of wheat, copper or oil has shot dramatically upward or downward? Let us consider those three examples, oil, copper and wheat. What have we been doing?

Is this made-in-Canada price for oil about which we are talking some new scheme we have cooked up over here to aggravate the Alberta government and the oil companies?

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Yes.

Mr. Simmons: I know that is what the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro) would like to believe, but what he believes is not necessarily true, as I found out from reading his Householder which I tripped over getting out of the elevator this morning in the Confederation Building. Having read it, I say to the hon. member instructively that I did not understand hate mail until I saw that Householder. It is a terrible piece of stuff. Should my tax dollars be financing that?

Mr. Rae: That's all right. We pay for yours.

Mr. Simmons: Hon. members may ask which governments were in power between 1960 and 1973. There were three, a Tory government under Mr. Diefenbaker and a couple of different Liberal administrations, one under Mr. Pearson and one under the present Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau).

Under three separate administrations of two party stripes from 1960 to 1973 all of Canada west of the Ottawa River paid about a 25 per cent premium on oil in order to protect Alberta against low oil prices outside this country. There is a precedent. This administration and two or three before it have cushioned Canadians against the effect of dramatically changing prices of oil on the international stage. In the example I gave it was a case where the price of oil went dramatically down, or at least below levels required to continue the production of oil in Canada on an economic basis.

For another example why not look at 1969 when international copper prices rose sharply? What was the action taken of the federal government of the day then, led by the same gentleman who leads it today? The federal government kept the Canadian price low and restrained exports to ensure sufficient supplies for Canadian consumers. That is a precedent in the copper industry for what we are doing with the oil industry today.

Do hon. members want a further example which again relates particularly to the western provinces? In 1969 international prices for wheat dropped drastically. The federal government legislated a price higher than world prices to protect the western farmer with regard to grain sold in Canada. The price was higher because the international price dropped so drastically.

Those are just three examples involving parties of two different stripes in government and initiatives which those administrations took to cushion Canadians against rapidly rising or falling prices, as the circumstance may be. These are examples which go back a full 20 years. What we are talking about is not particularly new or novel.

Who will benefit? Let us suppose for the purpose of my argument that tomorrow morning the price of oil were allowed to rise to world levels.

Mr. Thacker: What does Canada charge the United States and the world?

Mr. Simmons: Who would benefit? The multinational oil companies would certainly benefit. Their profits would go up more tens of percentage points, and that would make the official opposition happy, but it would not make me very happy. It would not make my constituents very happy.

An hon. Member: They have enough problems with taxes.

Mr. Simmons: Of course the oil companies would be happy, but we have not been sent here, and I have not been sent here, to represent multinational oil companies. I do not make any apologies to them. It surprises me that the official opposition spends so much time defending multinational oil companies.

Mr. Nielsen: That is a crock of crude.

Mr. Simmons: The hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) has come in.

Mr. Nielsen: I just woke up.

Mr. Simmons: It looks as though he has had an interesting evening. He has obviously dined well.

Mr. Blenkarn: It doesn't look like you are exactly starving.

Mr. Simmons: I remember when my good friend from Yellowhead was elected leader of the Tory party. The following week a national news magazine, Maclean's, had printed across the front cover "Joe Who?" The accompanying article went on to raise some questions about who this new leader was and what he stood for. During the last few weeks when there has been this energy controversy it has become clear what "Joe Who What" means.

It means "Joe XX". The unknown. Those are the two Xs in Exxon. Joe Exxon.

An hon. Member: Who gave them $40 million?

Mr. Simmons: He represents the multinationals. He is the unwitting spokesman, together with his band of Tories, for the multinationals. We heard tonight from the hon. member for Mississauga South. He was quite blatant about it. Most Tories are much more coy in the way they put forward representations on behalf of those companies, but the hon. member for Mississauga South at least deserves credit for being frank and up front about it. If we read the transcript of his address, we will find he was exactly that, very up front about his support for what I think he termed the "poor multinationals" at one point.

We know the multinationals will benefit, but who else will benefit? What about the millwright out in Drayton Valley Alberta, the welder in Brooks, Alberta or the pipefitter out there? Will he benefit if the price of oil now being produced at $16.50 a barrel were to shoot up to $38 a barrel tomorrow morning? How would he benefit? Would the companies rush to the unions and say, "We are going to double the rate for that man"? Would we suddenly see him get twice as much per hour for his work?

Mr. Waddell: He would have to go back to Newfoundland.

Mr. Simmons: What would it mean to that worker? Would he pay more for items from the plastics industry which he has to purchase? Would he pay more for gas for his car? Would he pay more for food from the farm because of increased farm prices which would be the result of increased oil prices? The answers are yes, yes and yes. He would pay more. His cost of living would go up if oil prices went up. But let us not suggest for a minute that that welder or that pipefitter would suddenly get more money. Let us not be so naive to think that the companies would rush in and say, "Mr. Union Leader, we want to negotiate a new agreement; your man is not getting enough."

Mr. Mayer: He might be able to keep his job.

Mr. Simmons: He might hang on to his job, and he might get as much as he is getting now, but the "might" that he would get a little more is a pretty long "might". He would have to work pretty hard. His union would have to do some very tough bargaining before it would convince those "poor" multinationals that somehow a doubling of the price ought to be reflected in his paycheque. Who would benefit? The multinationals.

Mr. Mayer: Should we pay more to Saudi Arabian workers?

Mr. Simmons: I ask the hon. member in the official opposition who is shouting now to bear with me. When I am finished, he can rise and answer that question himself. Who would benefit, other than the multinationals, if the price of oil suddenly went up? What is all this shouting and screaming about rushing out tomorrow morning and declaring the world price for oil? What would be the benefit for the constituents these members are supposed to be representing in this chamber?

Mr. Mayer: Isn't the purpose of this act to raise the price of oil?

Mr. Blenkarn: Isn't that the purpose of this proclamation?

Mr. Mayer: The Liberals want to raise the price to the world price; that is what they are saying.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

• (2120)

Mr. Simmons: Who is delaying the Alsands project and the Cold Lake project? Let me talk about those projects for a moment. The federal government is not delaying these two projects.

Mr. Blenkarn: That is nonsense, absolute nonsense!

Mr. Simmons: I wish the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Shields) were here tonight. I read the speech he made last night with great interest. Also I read the comments he made in Fort McMurray last Friday night. The disappointing thing is that he did not say in the chamber last night what he said in Fort McMurray last Friday before his constituents. He made two contradictory statements, and I invite him to correct the record on that. Before his constituents in Fort McMurray he indicated what I just said a moment ago, that it was not the fault of the Government of Canada that these projects have not proceeded. He laid the blame squarely upon the government of Alberta.

Mr. Wilson: Say that again.

Mr. Simmons: I will say some more things which might clarify the point for the hon. member for Etobicoke Centre (Mr. Wilson). I refer to a Canadian Press story published a couple of days ago. It reads as follows:

> Cold Lake businessmen want Alberta Premier Peter Lougheed to let Imperial Oil Ltd.'s $9-billion Cold Lake heavy oil project proceed.

They ask Premier Lougheed to let the project proceed. I am sure it is clear who is stopping it in the minds of the businessmen of Cold Lake. It is not this government, but the government of Alberta.

Perhaps I should refer to a recent editorial which appeared in The Edmonton Sun, a paper which has not been known to agree with everything the government has done in the energy field, but which nevertheless calls unequivocally on the Alberta government to stop delaying the projects. In part it reads:

> There is simply nothing to be gained by such an approach. The megaplants will not produce oil of any quantity to speak of until 1987, long after the current energy war. The plants will thus have no immediate impact on oil supplies to eastern Canada.
> Mr. Lougheed's stance on the plants is totally punitive and totally negative.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his allotted time has expired. He may continue only with the unanimous consent of the House.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, the speech we have just heard was very interesting and entertaining. After hearing it I think I finally understand the Liberal policy on energy. Basically they are very strong socialists and very strong nationalists when it comes to the empty wells, but they believe in subsidizing the multinationals when it comes to the full wells.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Murphy: A number of areas in Canada will be adversely affected by the government's energy decision. The government has refused to recognize the effects of its energy policies on the north. Last month in northern Manitoba, in the constituency of Churchill which I represent, there was a 29 per cent increase by Steelgas which provides the gas for most northern Manitoba communities. This happened before the budget increase. It is owned and supplied by Dome Petroleum. Dome Petroleum will not give us its cost figures in setting the price to its wholly-owned subsidiary.

There was another action in the last couple of weeks, with CN Express announcing that it will be closing down its operations which will increase the cost of food and other items going to northern communities. Food is already flown into many isolated communities in northern Canada. The higher cost of fuel increases the cost of each and every good to those communities. There are communities in my constituency where gas already costs over $5 per gallon. In other northern communities the price of gas and other items is even higher.

I read with interest an article which appeared in The Globe and Mail earlier this week. It pointed out that the Port Severn Indians, most of whom are on some form of welfare, pay $2.22 for a dozen eggs, as compared to $1.29 in Toronto; $4.02 for two kilograms of sugar which sell for only $2.49 in Toronto; $1.57 for a loaf of bread which costs 80 cents in Toronto; $3.44 for a pound of hamburger which costs $1.98 in Toronto; $1.75 for a fresh quart of milk which costs only 75 cents in Toronto. The price of goods in northern communities is extremely high.

In Saskatchewan the provincial government implemented a program of subsidizing the shipment of these foods into northern communities. The federal government has no program for its northern residents. The cost of transportation over the long distances involved has worked against industrial development in each and every one of those communities. This was the situation prior to the budget.

Now we must add the increased cost of energy imposed by the government, not because of any increase in the cost of production, but because the Liberal government, like its Tory predecessor, is increasing prices in order to enrich its own coffers and those of the multinationals. As the hon. member for Comox-Powell River (Mr. Skelly) said, it might be a smaller slice but it is a much larger pie. The multinationals will benefit from the budget, even without the blackmail and the strikes we hear about in the press at this time. Because the government is weak by nature and by tradition, it will give in to the multinationals eventually. The history of the Walter Gordon budget and the entire Liberal machine has been to talk tough but to carry a very small stick.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Murphy: No consideration was given to the increased costs of living faced by the residents of northern communities. There were no new programs. There were no new subsidies to help low-income natives and other Canadians who live in isolated areas. There were no programs to compensate for the high cost of running a business in the north. Steelgas, the Dome controlled and owned company about which I spoke earlier, after receiving a 29 per cent increase three weeks ago, is asking for another one.

Throughout the west there is dissent because of what the government has presented in the budget and the energy package. In return for losing potential revenue, the west received a western development fund. It is the old story—the Liberal government takes away with one hand and gives with the other. What does the west receive? It receives a $4-billion fund, of which only $2 billion will be given in three years; no date was given for the other $2 billion. It will be a program controlled by Ottawa bureaucrats. There are no guidelines to ensure that these funds will be used for needed development. There are no guidelines to prove that this money will not be used just to replace existing federal funds which go to the west. There are no guidelines to ensure that the minister responsible—not the minister responsible for DREE, the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. De Bané), but the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy)—will not use this fund as a slush fund to rebuild the Liberal party in western Canada. When there is $4 billion for economic development in the country, it should be used where it is needed. The guidelines should be set by Parliament, and as the DREE committee unanimously agreed, it should be under the control and co-ordination of the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion.

The Minister of Employment and Immigration loves to make controversial remarks, only because he needs the press. Last week he was out west and he said that Liberals are born-again westerners. I cannot find anyone in my constituency who evens admits to being a Liberal. If hon. members opposite were born-again westerners, they would not have issued this energy proclamation. It would never have taken place because they would understand the resentment and the hatred which they are provoking by this kind of action. I will talk more about the west later.

Right now I would like to talk about the impact of the energy program on the Atlantic provinces. Prices are traditionally higher in the Atlantic provinces. Prices of oil and gas are higher whether or not there is a subsidy. The prices of goods in those communities are higher. The prices of goods shipped to those communities are higher. Communities in the Atlantic provinces are not eligible for the conversion subsidy which other provinces will receive if people convert from oil to gas heating. This region was discriminated against because it was supposed that a number of oil fired generators were being used and, therefore, the program would not save people or the federal government any oil. It would save some in the other provinces. This does not mean that people in Atlantic Canada should not benefit from a program like this. Those people will have to pay the higher costs of oil and gas. They should benefit from a program of this nature.

In addition, the Liberals, as usual, did not get their facts straight. New Brunswick does not qualify for this program yet if you look at the facts you will find that only two of their eight power stations presently use oil as a source of energy—only two. What happened to the Liberal members of Parliament from New Brunswick? Were they quiet? Did they not have any influence on their government? Incidentally, Mr. Speaker, of those two power stations one is in the process of being converted to coal at the present time. So in the future seven of the eight power stations will be using coal, hydro power or nuclear power. But the people in New Brunswick will not qualify for this conversion program.

Obviously in setting their budget, as in setting their energy policy, this government did not know what it was doing. Statistics will illustrate that for every dollar increase in the price of oil there is a 1 per cent increase in the rate of inflation. Inflation is already higher in the maritime provinces than it is in the rest of Canada. This energy package will only increase the cost of living for people in that region.

The national energy policy said some nice things about the future of the Atlantic region. I would like to quote:

> As for opportunity, the Atlantic region, long disadvantaged in a number of ways, stands on the verge of an energy boom—oil and gas, electricity and coal—that could provide the basis for a new sustainable prosperity. The national energy program can—and does—provide the framework to ensure that this happens.

Those were lovely words but if you take a look at the energy program they are hard to believe. Things do not happen for the Atlantic region, they happen to the Atlantic region. As I said, unemployment there is already high but with higher energy costs it will only increase. The cost of living is higher. The cost of heating is higher. The cost of transportation is higher. And as a result of this national energy policy those costs will double by 1984.

What will happen with respect to regional economic development? Nothing. There is no co-ordination by the minister responsible for DREE because the cabinet will not give him that power. There is half an effort to do something for that region through the industrial tax credit but that will not work very well for a number of reasons. The most promising industries like lumber, fishing and farming are excluded from benefiting from this tax credit.

As I mentioned in an earlier speech, this program was implemented retroactive to the night of the tabling of the budget. Even though it is supposed to be a tax incentive plan to attract industry into the Atlantic regions and other parts of Canada which are so designated, it is retroactive to the night of the tabling of the budget. Obviously, companies which were already building in the Atlantic region on October 28 and 29, November 1 and 2, did not come to the Atlantic region because of this tax incentive. For those corporations it is strictly another rip-off. That tax incentive will be given to every corporation which develops in various regions of Canada that are designated, regardless of need and regardless of other subsidies they may be receiving. In other words, if you look at what was supposed to be an effort at regional economic expansion you will find another tax rip-off by the very same people who are now talking in such strong socialist and national tones. Again, the words sound nice but when you examine the actions you find there is nothing there. More important, any positive effects which would have taken place because of the industrial tax credit will be nullified by the huge increases in energy costs predicted in this program. A corporation that is considering developing in the Atlantic will not come in if it knows that its cost of energy will double in the next four years and rise even higher after that. Any benefit from that tax incentive will just not be there.

I would like to say something now about the western development fund to which I was referring earlier. This $4 billion boondoggle is not for Atlantic Canada yet in the west, with the exception of the province of Manitoba, there are booming economies. There is growth in that region of Canada yet they are to receive this $4 billion. It is amazing that the Liberal government should have decided the Atlantic region does not need that kind of money. In the west there are only two Liberal members of Parliament and the west receives $4 billion. I suspect we now have a new definition of political patronage. It used to be the case that the Liberal government would say in a mild, suggestive manner that it would be really good to have a Liberal MP from your region because it would ensure that money flowed back to those constituencies. With the $4 billion plan the opposite is true. What we now have is a benefit for not voting Liberal—the west is being rewarded for not voting Liberal.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Murphy: Just imagine what $4 billion could have done for Nova Scotia. Imagine what it could have done for New Brunswick, Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island—

Mr. Skelly: Where are their MPs?

Mr. Murphy: Not only that. Where are the cabinet ministers from those regions? I ask the Minister of Labour (Mr. Regan), who is unusually quiet today about the effect of higher energy prices on Nova Scotia, what $4 billion could have done for Sysco? I would ask the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) what $4 billion could have done for Devco, Sysco or other corporations which are in need in Nova Scotia? Can you imagine the benefit if the Minister of Finance had allocated that money to eastern Canada, the provinces that are really in need? We would not find him studying a business plan for Sysco at this time. He would be running out there in order to hand out the cheque, especially with a byelection coming. Well, we in the west have learned our lesson. We found that it pays in many ways not to vote Liberal. The people in Atlantic Canada will be finding out the same thing in the future.

Because of the government's lack of planning the boom they talk about as a result of the national energy program, may not happen. There is no guarantee that the ownership and development of our offshore oils will be Canadian. There is no guarantee that the jobs provided will be for Canadians. Last week the Economic Council of Canada released a report pointing out that offshore exploration does not necessarily mean the Messiah has come.

It will take action by both the federal government and the provincial government to ensure that the people of that region are trained to take the jobs which will be available. My party is on record as saying we believe that offshore resources should be controlled by the provinces. We also recognize that there is a strong need for a federal presence in determining the future of those resources. But that will not come about under the Liberal government because it does not really believe in planning when it gets down to the nitty-gritty, hard-core decision-making. It believes in putting out pamphlets, advertising and the glitter of progress, but when we get underneath that shell, we find it is the same old game. The whole country is suffering from the government's lack of policy.

Never has there been a strong energy program in this country. To give an example, I refer to my province of Manitoba where there is great potential for the development of hydroelectricity. Indeed Manitoba has a surplus in this resource. It also has a number of power plants which could be brought on stream in the near future, yet that power goes unused. The federal government, however, is encouraging the people of Manitoba to switch from oil to gas. The program does not allow for the development and use of Manitoba's hydro power. It does not set up a western grid or a grid into Ontario to enable that power to be used; it simply ignores it entirely. The program does not look at the alternative sources which are available and which could be developed in the future.

There is no energy shortage in Canada. There is certainly misuse and underuse of resources. The government has set up a paper tiger, something which it can tackle rather than a program which would tackle the real problems which we face. The New Democratic Party believes that oil prices should go up but only in certain circumstances and only at a gradual rate. It believes there must be a cost of living allowance so that consumers who are hit the hardest would be cushioned against the higher prices. We believe that the extra revenues from increased prices should not go to the multinationals as they would under the present policy, or to the federal-provincial coffers but that they should be put into a special fund which would be set up to look into the alternative energy schemes and innovative ways of providing rapid transit.

The NDP also believes in an over-all industrial strategy which must be flexible enough to adapt to any increases in the price of oil and gas. These proposals are not provided for in the Liberal energy program. The Petroleum Administration Act is a last ditch effort by the government to take over the control of resources. The Liberals have failed to try to achieve any agreement with the provinces. Their ability as negotiators is a real problem. The Conservatives might also listen because they are not so good at negotiating themselves or they would still be in power. The Liberals' record of negotiation is a record of failure.

For example, in negotiating the fisheries treaty with the United States, the government was too weak to develop and conclude an agreement. It was well aware that the agreement must be ratified by the U.S. Senate, because it is written in the constitution of that country, but it did not negotiate from a position of strength and say, "If the treaty is ratified, there is something more for you". Instead the government gave them the whole package after one week's negotiation in the hope that the Senate would graciously give us the treaty we wanted.

The same thing happens when the government negotiates with its employees. The government does not know what it wants to do so it delays by making unrealistics offers which only result in increasing the anger of the employees. Had it given some reasonable offers in the first place and had it known what direction it was going to take, there would not be the militancy about which the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) is so concerned today.

Nor could the Liberal government negotiate on the constitution. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) managed to range all ten provincial premiers against him. Those fellows—there are no ladies yet, but there should be one in Nova Scotia soon—particularly the Conservative premiers, had never agreed on anything in their lives until the Prime Minister made his proposal. We recognize that it is not easy to get agreement with the premiers, but I cannot understand how the Prime Minister could not get at least three or four of those premiers to agree with him on his package, which he would then present to the House.

It is not just a matter of arrogance, it is a matter of the lack of negotiating skill. The Prime Minister does not have to be a hard-core, well-trained unionist, but unfortunately he has none of the skills of negotiation, and as a result the government is in a position of confrontation at this time.

Mr. Nielsen: He negotiated an agreement with your leader.

Mr. Murphy: We negotiated, he accepted. For the benefit of my friend, I would also point out that it is not easy to negotiate with each and every premier. Sterling Lyon of Manitoba has the ability to make Ronald Reagan look like a Liberal. The Liberals have failed to present a package to the provinces. Instead of healing the wounds which are tearing this country apart, the Liberals have increased the division. Alberta has found itself on the losing end of the constitutional debate, the budget proposals and now this energy plan.

The people of Alberta love Canada just as much as any group in any part of this land, but the government cannot continue to shove things down their throats and expect those people to love and respect it. Just as I suggested that the Liberals did not know how to negotiate on the constitution, they did not know how to negotiate on the energy package and they refused to accept that there are people in western Canada who believe they have a right to some voice as to the future of their resources. The people of the west should be consulted as a part of the negotiations, not treated to the old method of newspaper debating of which the Liberals are so fond.

The Tory party has taken a very destructive attitude toward the constitutional package, and the Liberal party has taken a very destructive attitude in its energy package. They have failed to recognize that there must be some form of national unity and that people must be made to feel good about the way in which they are being treated. Canadians want a united country. They want co-operative federalism as mentioned by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell) yesterday when he quoted former prime minister Pearson.

Canadians want a government which will rise above the interests of the factions, as prime minister Pearson mentioned so many years ago, but that is not the attitude of the Liberal government today. We recognize that the government has the right and duty to present the federal alternative, but it can only do this if all the people are willing to work together as citizens of a country in which the governments are openly and honestly negotiating with each other, a country in which the federal government can claim to represent all the regions. Imposition of this measure will serve only to divide Canadians. This government must change its mind. It must open up negotiations. It must open up the hearts of Albertans and others in the west. It must really try to bring Canada together.

Mr. Doug Lewis (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, first I wish to refer to remarks made by the hon. member for Burin-St. George's (Mr. Simmons). I have been fortunate enough to hear him explain the theory of supply and demand twice. The first time I heard him was a week ago at Queen's University. At that time he explained to third-year business students that the theory of taking your costs, adding reasonable profit and calculating your sales price accordingly was all out of the window. These students had spent three years learning this. It was amazing to see the look in their eyes when his theory of taking the cost, adding a reasonable profit and then selling your product for whatever you can gouge out of people hit home. That may come as somewhat of a surprise to members in this House, but I have had the benefit of hearing it once before. The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell) was there as well. One of the employees of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce left the room during the exposé of costs and sales. He could not handle it, but the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway and I had to stay and listen.

I was interested to hear the New Democratic Party explain tonight that the Liberals are not supporting the multinationals. Does this mean the $40 million loan has been recalled already? Last week this place handed out $40 million to the multinationals with no strings attached. It was a situation of "here you are. We need you. We are desperate". That is the degree of support for the multinationals.

I was interested in the remarks made by the hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Murphy). Apparently he is the spokesman on behalf of the New Democratic Party for Atlantic Canada. I thought the job of spokesman for Atlantic Canada would belong to the most easterly member of Parliament for the New Democratic Party, namely, the hon. member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent). Apparently if there is no one available from the east, the next best thing is a member who lives close to the water. So the hon. member for Churchill is the spokesman because Churchill is close to Hudson Bay, and in that way he qualifies. I would like to thank the hon. member for Churchill. One cannot dismiss his remarks that quickly. During the course of his remarks he was very careful to endorse theories, such as the energy tax credit and the excess profits tax on companies. He missed the reduced depletion allowances but he remembered the energy bank. These were all policies that our party enunciated in its budget of last December.

During the debate on the Speech from the Throne members of the government side used this House of Commons as a forum to address their speeches to the province of Quebec and to fight the referendum battle in that province. As a result of the policies of this government, we are now faced with unrest in the west. If that unrest is not dealt with, it could reach untenable and unmanageable proportions.

I want to take a few moments now to address my friends in the west and to tell them about the people of Ontario, not central Canada, but Ontario. We are puzzled by the antagonism of the people in the west toward Ontario. We want to know the specific areas of concern. We promise that if these are brought to our attention, we will apply ourselves, correct the wrongs and explain the situation fully. We do not want the current citizens of Ontario blamed for the problems of this government. If members could come with me tomorrow to the tenth concession in my township and tell everyone there that the people in the west are blaming us for the situation, they would not understand. People in my riding are simply engaged in the process of earning a living, bringing up children and being citizens of our community. Our sons, daughters, nephews and nieces and our friends have gone west with our encouragement. The west is part of this country after all. Our friends and relatives now live in Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia. But they are still our brothers and sisters. If people out there want to blame anyone, let them blame this government, not the people in Ontario.

This Liberal government is not now and has not been for some time representative of Canada. I would suggest to Ontario members in this House that the Liberal government is not representative of the great province of Ontario. You were elected to govern Canada because you had 99 per cent of the vote in one province. You are completely swamped, subjected and impotent—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member's remarks should be addressed to the Chair.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I would not suggest for a moment that you were swamped, subjected or impotent. This leads to what we call confrontation politics. The hon. member for Churchill made reference to confrontation. That means the Liberal party decides that it has more to gain from confrontation than it has from co-operation. There is no bona fide attempt on the part of this government to sit down and negotiate a fair price and agreement with all of the producing provinces. There are some heroes in the cabinet. They have no desire to co-operate or conciliate. They make a lot of the fact that during the last election campaign they promised lower energy costs. But election promises have never bothered them in the past, so why should they bother them now? Nevertheless, these people are risking our country.

I want to deal with some of the comments made earlier in this debate, especially those made by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde). The minister stated that: "I think it is time that members of this House, and Canadians in general, grew up with respect to Canada's role in international affairs." The statement that every other country in the world would give their right arms to have a prime minister like the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Trudeau) is one which I find completely incomprehensible. I suggest that Canada is already giving its right arm because of this Prime Minister. The problem is we are giving it to Saudi Arabia, Venezuela and Mexico. Perhaps it is about time the government appreciated the domestic situation in this country. Perhaps it is about time the government had more respect for Canada's ambitions than for the people of Saudi Arabia. If the government members really did appreciate our domestic situation, we would not be engaged in this debate. The Prime Minister does not want to stay here and face reality. The government has failed to reach a pricing agreement.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It being ten o'clock, pursuant to order made earlier this day, it is my duty to interrupt the proceedings and put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of the motion now before the House.

[Translation]

The question is therefore as follows: Mr. Waddell, seconded by Mr. Knowles, moved that the proclamation laid before the House on Wednesday, November 12, 1980—

● (2200)

[English]

Mr. Nielsen: Excuse me for interrupting the Chair. It is the first time I have ever done it, particularly when putting a motion. However, I think you will find there is agreement—

Mr. Knowles: We know that. The question is being put now. The vote is tomorrow.

Mr. Nielsen: All right.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: —pursuant to subsection 35(2) of the Petroleum Administration Act, as proclaimed in PC 1980-2915, be revoked.

[English]

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the motion please say yea?

Some hon. Members: Yea!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion, the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to order made Friday, November 21, 1980, the division stands deferred until 5.45 p.m. Wednesday, November 26, 1980.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

PARKS CANADA—DECISION TO CANCEL CORNWALL TO PETERBOROUGH MOVE

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, I intend to spend some time tonight discussing certain of the comments made by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Simmons). In an announcement to cancel the Parks Canada move from Cornwall to Peterborough, the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Roberts) claimed, with lofty and saintly tones of compassion that his concerns are with the interests and morale of the majority of Parks Canada employees in Cornwall, especially the support staff who are less mobile and generally have fewer alternative work opportunities. Let me point out to this House that as of tonight there are over 20 unsettled claims before Treasury Board brought by the employees of the Parks Canada regional office in the city of Cornwall as a result of the cancellation of that move.

Leaving aside for the moment that 115 of the 145 employees of the Cornwall office went on record as being in favour of the move of the office to Peterborough, I take great exception to the sanctimonious appeal that the minister in cancelling the move is acting principally in the best interests of the employees of the Parks Canada regional office.

It is more than passing strange that this one small move of a regional office with no more than 150 employees was cancelled on the strength of employee morale. The reasons given in the Liberal policy announcements for the centralization were, first, to move the administration of federal government programs closer to the people directly affected by them and, second, to assist areas of slow economic development and high unemployment.

A 1978 Parks Canada document states, and I quote:

—average unemployment in the Peterborough area during 1977 was estimated at about 10 per cent of the labour force compared with . . . 7 per cent in Ontario.

I might add that October, 1980, figures from the local employment office in Peterborough indicate that there has been a 33 per cent increase in unemployment there in the last 12 months. This compares to a less than one per cent increase nationally. With regard to the second point of the government's decentralization policy, that of economic development, the document states:

Peterborough's current economic difficulties are directly related to major layoffs and shutdowns . . . overall. The Peterborough area cannot continue to depend on its long established manufacturing industries for the steady supply of new jobs required by its expanding labour force.

Finally, with regard to the contention that a proposed move brings programs closer to the people affected by them, I would cite the following from an ADM in Parks Canada to the minister dated July 3, 1979. This document stated in part:

In 1974, a study of the implications of operating from Cornwall showed that inordinate transportation costs were involved in operating the region (as a whole). The essential close working relationships and co-ordination with the Ontario regional operation was seriously inhibited by the office location . . . (In 1978) due to changed economic conditions, it was decided that Peterborough was now the best choice of location.

I hope I do not weary members opposite with my unrelenting reiteration of the true facts of this case. But I digress for a moment. The minister was concerned with the welfare of the staff. I would like to point out that if the welfare of the staff is his major concern, what about the move of the staff of veterans affairs to other parts of Canada; what about the Liberal government's agonizing over the morale of the employees in Supply and Services when they moved to Shediac, New Brunswick, in the riding of the present Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. LeBlanc)? Did they squirm in mealy-mouthed Liberal platitudes voicing their compassion toward all the employees affected by moves which benefited no fewer than six Liberal cabinet ministers after federal relocation from Ottawa?

I suggest the reasons given by the Minister of the Environment on May 5, 1980, for cancelling the move of Parks Canada from Cornwall to Peterborough were nothing less than hypocritical hogwash designed to camouflage this unmitigated piece of pork-barrelling, this clear case of patronage, this varnished example of cabinet level double dealing to satisfy rashly made election promises on the part of the present Minister of State for Trade, the minister from Cornwall (Mr. Lumley).

I would like to take this opportunity to make a certain sequence of events in this issue very clear. On August 3, 1979, I announced, and I quote, that "The Ontario regional office of Parks Canada will be moved to Peterborough during the summer of 1980". This was obviously not, as the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of the Environment was pleased to put it in this House on May 12, 1980, an "announcement to defer". It was an announcement to inaugurate the proposal. The member for Burin-St. George's is simply factitious, adulterated and pettifogging and mendacious to suggest otherwise.

I suggest that I have not yet been satisfied on this point by the hon. member opposite. I would also ask that he fulfil the promise he made in this House on May 13 to produce documentation to support his claim, and to support the Minister of the Environment's contention that the minister "did not overlook the question of costs and the effects on the Parks Canada administration" in deciding to cancel the move.

I have in my hand an authority to enter into a lease in Peterborough, file No. 1020-P22/38, issued by Treasury Board on behalf of Public Works Canada, dated January 18, 1980. This document states:

It is estimated that the rental rate for the space now occupied by the client in Cornwall would increase to approximately $270,000 for fiscal year 1980-81, should the client continue to occupy this space.

In the absence of any convincing evidence to the contrary these figures stand as an indictment of this government's shameful, unforgivable and manipulative disregard for anyone or anything which does not relate directly to their own revolting self-interest.

Mr. Roger Simmons (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the move from Cornwall to Peterborough was cancelled. It was cancelled on May 5, and I really would suggest to my good friend for Peterborough (Mr. Domm) that he get that message clear. It is cancelled. It is done. I said that to him last week. If I have to say it next week, I will be pleased to do so, until he gets the message that there is no mileage in this for him. We are aware, as he says, that not everyone was happy with the proposed move or with the decision to cancel. How many times does he want the careers of those people in limbo? The fact is, Mr. Speaker, the move is cancelled, it is done with and is not up for reconsideration.

The Minister of the Environment (Mr. Roberts), acting in his capacity as minister responsible for Parks Canada, made the decision and announced it publicly on May 5 of this year.

The hon. member for Peterborough and I differ on what it was he, the hon. member for Peterborough, said in August of last year. He says that when he announced in August that something would take place the following year, that was an announcement to go ahead. I say that that was an announcement to delay a further year. He is not going to convince me, and I doubt whether I will convince him, so I suggest to him that we just leave it at a healthy difference of opinion.

As to the promise I am alleged to have made to this House, as I said to the hon. member last week, I made no commitment to him. I made a commitment to Madam Speaker to assist her in expediting the matter, as I knew she would. She did expedite it without my assistance, and I saw then and see now no need to pursue the matter any further.

At the same time, if the House feels that the document ought to be tabled, I would would be very glad to do so. There is nothing mischievous about the document at all, but I do think at some point, in fairness to the people of Peterborough and Cornwall and particularly to the Parks Canada employees involved, the hon. member should stop fighting yesterday's battles.

Surely the people of Peterborough riding sent the hon. member here to deal with more than one issue. I appeal to him to honour the mandate he has been given and to get on with some other more productive things such as tomorrow's issues and today's issues instead of yesterday's issues.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION—LACK OF COVERAGE OF EUROPEAN CONFERENCE

Mr. Jesse P. Flis (Parkdale-High Park): Mr. Speaker, on Monday, November 24, I asked a question of the Secretary of State and Minister of Communications (Mr. Fox) about why the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, a Crown corporation, did not give adequate coverage to the Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe presently being held in Madrid. This conference is the second follow-up meeting to discuss the implementation of the Helsinki Final Act of 1975. The first such meeting was held at Belgrade at the end of 1977 and during the early months of 1978.

The Madrid conference, as it has now become known, is expected to last through to the end of March, 1981. The Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe is focusing on three major themes or "baskets".

Basket 1 deals with respect for human rights and other principles of the Final Act: disarmament, arms control proposals, military confidence-building measures and military build-up in Europe.

Basket 2 deals with economic co-operation. This includes imports and exports, protectionism, transportation, energy and scientific research.

Basket 3, which is of great importance to Canadians, covers such topics as family reunification, family visits, free flow of information and cultural exchanges.

The Helsinki conference in 1975 adopted ten principles which would guide relations between participating states. The ten principles adopted are as follows: First, sovereign equality, respect for the rights inherent in sovereignty; second, refraining from the threat or use of force; third, inviolability of frontiers; fourth, territorial integrity of states; fifth, peaceful settlement of disputes; sixth, non-intervention in internal affairs; seventh, respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms, including freedom of thought, conscience, religion or belief; eighth, equal rights and self-determination of peoples; ninth, co-operation among states; and tenth, fulfilment in good faith of obligations under international law.

The Final Act states, and I quote:

> All the principles set forth above are of primary significance and, accordingly, they will be equally and unreservedly applied, each of them being interpreted taking into account the others. The participating states express their determination fully to respect and apply these principles—

One of the goals of the Madrid conference is to analyse how far signatories of the Final Act have gone in implementing the provisions of the Final Act and to examine the progress which has been made in achieving the objectives of Helsinki.

Canada's Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacGuigan) at the opening session of the Madrid follow-up meeting of the Conference on Security and Co-operation on November 12, 1980, was one of the first speakers to address the delegates from the 35 participating countries. The minister said that over the past five years we have seen important developments in co-operation between participating states through economic, scientific, cultural and other exchanges. The world is a better place for the conclusion of the Helsinki Final Act, 1975. There has been a recognition, with all due respect to national sovereignty, that no state is an island unto itself, able to conduct its affairs, either internal or external, in complete disregard for its neighbours.

The minister went on to say that the Final Act is designed to reduce tensions and to increase co-operation in Europe. In reviewing the implementations of the provisions of the Final Act, the Secretary of State for External Affairs said the following:

> The deterioration in east-west relations, culminating last December in the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan, cannot be ignored in this forum . . . Soviet actions have challenged directly the principles in the Final Act of sovereign equality, refraining from the threat or use of force, inviolability of frontiers, the territorial integrity of states, non-intervention in internal affairs, and equal rights and self-determination of all peoples.

The minister went on to say that the alternative to detente is armed conflict. The shadow of Afghanistan will inevitably chill detente as long as Soviet troops remain there.

Under the human rights basket, the minister noted with great sadness that since the Final Act was signed people have been harassed, arrested, tried, exiled and imprisoned simply for trying to monitor and exercise their rights endorsed in the act. This persecution is inevitably a cause of friction in east-west relations today. The minister proposed a CSCE experts' meeting or some high level meeting to discuss the protection of human rights and fundamental freedoms which are reaffirmed in principle No. 7 of the Final Act and the application of those rights in basket No. 3 dealing particularly with the question of the freer movement of people among participating states.

I have made the preceding remarks to indicate to Canadians the importance of the CSCE conference being held presently in Madrid and my great disappointment that our own Crown corporation, the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, did not see fit to send even one reporter to cover this conference.

In reply to my question and concern, the Secretary of State and Minister of Communications (Mr. Fox) answered in this House that the CBC entered into an agreement with Visnews which is a European news-gathering agency. Mr. Speaker, Canadians want to hear a Canadian viewpoint of this conference, not a European one.

Canadians are fed up with getting news secondhand, either through American or European news-collecting agencies. When taxpayers pay the money they do to have a publicly owned media, they expect better service than what they have been getting to date. I again put my question to the Minister of Communications: what steps does he propose to take to ensure that the remainder of the conference will get better coverage than it has received in the first two weeks of its deliberations?

Mr. Roger Simmons (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Secretary of State and Minister of Communications (Mr. Fox) and his parliamentary secretary, who are unavoidably absent tonight, I should like to respond to the hon. member for Parkdale-High Park (Mr. Flis). I thank him for bringing this matter to the attention of the House. He is quite right in stressing the importance of the Madrid conference which is being watched with interest throughout the world. It is to my friend's credit that he raised the issue at this time.

I do not think I need to remind members of the House of the arm's length relationship between the government and the CBC. While the Minister of Communications reports to Parliament for the CBC, he does not interfere in the day to day management of the corporation. I am sure all members are in agreement with this policy, especially in the area of news services.

However, as the minister undertook in the House yesterday, this question has been pursued with the CBC management. In response to the minister's inquiries, the CBC examined its coverage of the conference and informed the minister as follows. As far as English television is concerned, the decision was made not to assign a reporter to Madrid for two reasons. The first was that all the coverage which would be needed was available to the CBC through Visnews, the world's foremost agency in the field of television news. By the way, the CBC is a founding member of Visnews which was formed by a number of broadcasting agencies specifically to provide television coverage of international news events. In this way individual broadcaster's resources are not stretched by having to assign reporters or film crews to an event which is already fully covered. Visnews provides pooled coverage of the conference which is available to all its member organizations. Within that context it was felt by CBC that as the conference lasts for many weeks, and no one could be spared for that length of time, the Visnews service would be adequate for network purposes.

During the first week of the conference in Madrid, "The National" carried four stories, first a scene-setter from Mark Phillips in London using film footage from Visnews and Eurovision of the delegates gathering. For three successive evenings after this, "The National" carried footage by satellite from Europe and voice-over reports from speeches by the Secretary of State (Mr. MacGuigan) and the chief delegates from the United States and the Soviet Union. The English television service is monitoring the work of the conference closely with the help of its London bureau and will resume the story as warranted by events.

On English radio 19 separate items on the conference were carried on network newscasts between November 10 and 16. There is no CBC reporter in attendance but reports have been taken from the BBC, NBC and freelancers. English radio's current affairs section carried interviews about the conference on "As it Happens" and "Sunday Morning." Also, commentary on the meeting featured Jim Cutler, law professor at McGill University and lawyer for Soviet dissidents.

Coverage on the French services is being greatly hampered by the strike of their journalists in Quebec, but the radio service has, as well as carrying a pre-conference item, included in its information programs a number of items about the conference.

Mr. Speaker, the conference has a long way to go. The CBC feels its news staff must exercise judgment in deciding which parts of the proceedings to report. The hon. member for Parkdale-High Park can be assured that his comments tonight will be noted by CBC management and the Minister of Communications will make a point of bringing them to the attention of the president of the CBC.

In conclusion, on behalf of the minister, I would like to thank the hon. member for Parkdale-High Park for raising this important issue.

SOCIAL DEVELOPMENT—RENEWAL OF FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL FUNDING—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg-Birds Hill): Mr. Speaker, my remarks tonight deal with the question I asked the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) on November 4 about the meaning of the words in the second last paragraph on page 13 of the budget paper in which the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) claims that he expects significant savings to come out of the upcoming renewal of federal-provincial funding arrangements for health and social development. I asked the Minister of National Health and Welfare where she expected the savings to come from. Mr. Speaker, instead of receiving an answer I received the usual lecture, plus a vague indication—and I quote:

—the savings to come as a result of discussions with those provinces which presently have a surplus—

This evening I ask: what does this mean? Does it mean there is to be a continuation of block funding for medicare, with a reduction of federal contributions to block funding? Likewise, are the provinces being expected to pick up a higher percentage of the established programs themselves with the federal government moving in, perhaps as Justice Hall recommended, to cost-share with the poorer provinces in order to maintain a comprehensive health care system? Is this the intent of the minister? This may sound good superficially but I think caution is in order since it further erodes federal ability to enforce national health care standards. It presupposes that richer provinces have better programs, which is false. It is in the three richest provinces of British Columbia, Alberta and Ontario that we find phenomena like premiums and extra billing, evidence that the quality of health care in any particular province is as much a matter of philosophy as it is a matter of wealth. The minister needs to tell us more. The Canadian public deserves to know more about what she intends for health care funding in Canada. Because the Hall report has been released, she can no longer hide behind the fact that it has yet to be released. Instead, we find her hiding behind the idea of federal-provincial consultation. She cannot give anything away because she is embroiled in this process of consultation. I ask this evening, Mr. Speaker, what happened to the great defender of medicare who we heard so much about during the time the Liberals were in opposition?

On that same day the minister indicated she would not turn to block funding for social services. We are glad to hear that. We welcome that announcement on her part since we feel that block funding has not been a success where it has been applied, particularly with regard to medicare. Unfortunately, she is also reported to have said, outside the House on the same day, that post-secondary education, another aspect of established program-financing, might be an area where savings could be made. The minister was quoted in the papers as saying that post-secondary education was an area where savings could be made because it was élitist. Does this mean she thinks post-secondary education should be élitist? If the federal government pulls out of this area and reduces its commitment to it post-secondary education will become élitist in this country.

There is a trend toward a renewed élitism in post-secondary education. I hope the minister will try to fight this trend and not give in or use it as an excuse to save money at the expense of equality of opportunity. It is time we heard from the minister personally, if not tonight, then on some other occasion, as to just what she meant when she indicated that in her view post-secondary education was élitist and therefore an avenue which the government might use in the upcoming renewal of federal-provincial funding arrangements for established programs.

Mr. Doug Frith (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I would like to begin by addressing the second part of the question raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill (Mr. Blaikie). The hon. member has consistently made allegations in the House with respect to the minister's commitment to medicare and the government's response to the recommendations of the Hall report. The minister has pointed out in the House on previous occasions that the government is spending $7.1 billion on medicare. We have also pointed out that the increased commitment of the federal government with respect to the established program funding laid out in 1977 has enabled the provinces to use those additional funds to expand into the field of extended health care. As a result of this increased federal spending, the provinces, with the exception of Alberta and Ontario, have been able to, for example, extend denticare to children and intermediate nursing home care to the elderly. These are the areas of growth with respect to medicare.

As a result of the policies developed by the minister and the government these programs have been implemented. Many of the remarks made by the hon. member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill and other hon. members opposite have led the public to believe that the government intends to decrease the amount of money to be spent on social development in Canada. It has been pointed out by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) on several occasions in the House that this is simply not the case. It is a basic priority of this government to cover those groups in our society which it has traditionally supported in terms of our priorities and our principles. I refer to the elderly, the sick, the oppressed and the underprivileged.

I think our expenditures in these areas indicate that we have been true to our commitment and our philosophy. Over the past ten years expenditures in the social development envelope have increased by 300 per cent. In the coming year there will be an increase in the total amount spent on social development in Canada. The government is still committed to those basic priorities which have traditionally been part of its philosophy, and we have no intention, as the hon. member has mentioned, of going to block funding for social development.

SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

CALL FOR APPOINTMENT OF NEW MINISTER—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Lorne Greenaway (Cariboo-Chilcotin): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that the present Minister of State for Science and Technology (Mr. Roberts) is also responsible for the environmental ministry and in addition is burdened with constitutional reform duties, and in view of the fact the former government recognized the tremendous importance of the ministry of science and technology by regarding it as a separate entity, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Scarborough East (Mr. Gilchrist):

That the Prime Minister give immediate and serious consideration to elevating this vital portfolio to its rightful position by appointing a new minister who understands the urgent need in Canada for massive reform of outdated and inadequate programs, and who will have the sole responsibility for science and technology unencumbered by other diversions.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

FINANCE

CALL FOR DELAY IN IMPOSITION OF SALES TAX—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Charles Mayer (Portage-Marquette): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Whereas the October 28 budget has imposed new sales tax regulations on manufacturing firms that assemble or package goods, and whereas the new regulations will impose financial hardships on some of these firms in that they have already quoted prices and sold goods to be delivered after January 1, 1981, when the regulations come into effect, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Prince George-Bulkley Valley (Mr. McCuish):

That this House direct the Minister of Finance to allow at least a six-month lead time for the imposition of this tax to give these firms time to adjust their prices accordingly.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

HEALTH CARE

EXTRA BILLING BY PHYSICIANS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg-Birds Hill): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Whereas the Alberta government refuses to end extra billing by physicians and therefore gives its blessing to the 37 per cent of Alberta doctors who extra bill their patients; whereas Premier Davis of Ontario merely muses publicly about the unacceptability of extra billing but refuses to take any measures whatsoever to end the practice; and whereas former Justice Emmett Hall in his review of our medicare system has said that extra billing by physicians inhibits reasonable access to services and is contrary to the intent and purpose of the act, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House direct the Minister of National Health and Welfare to ensure that the federal government, in her own words, "re-establish control of the medicare program", as she argued so passionately during her brief period of exile from her department, or state categorically that she is content to let the practice of extra billing continue in order that a two-tier health care system can rise from the ashes of what was once a program in which Canadians had confidence.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

POSSIBLE INTERFERENCE BY FRANCE IN CANADIAN AFFAIRS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Marcel Dionne (Chicoutimi): Madam Speaker, under the terms of Standing Order 43, I request the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion dealing with an urgent matter.

Whereas, under the Canadian Constitution, relations between Canada and foreign states fall within federal jurisdiction; whereas the Canadian government has always been flexible in allowing the provinces, especially Quebec, to take part on their own behalf in many international meetings because the agenda included matters of provincial jurisdiction; whereas the agenda of the Dakar summit lists topics of federal, rather than provincial jurisdiction; whereas, by its attitude, France is once again interfering in the internal affairs of Canada, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Timmins-Chapleau (Mr. Chénier):

That if France persists in interfering in our internal affairs, the Canadian government consider resorting to economic sanctions such as unfriendly surtaxes on French wines, cheeses, perfumes and other products.

Madam Speaker: The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, the motion requires unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

HAZARDOUS SUBSTANCES

UREA FORMALDEHYDE FOAM INSULATION—REPORT OF COMMITTEE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Doug Lewis (Simcoe North): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Despite the fact that the state of Massachusetts banned the use of urea formaldehyde foam insulation over a year ago, and although the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) and her officials indicated to the health and welfare committee in July of this year that they were aware of this serious problem and were studying it, no report is yet available. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Portage-Marquette (Mr. Mayer):

That in the interest of the health and welfare of Canadians, this House direct the minister to table the report on urea formaldehyde foam insulation within the next week.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

USE OF RAILWAY CAR TO ATTEND GREY CUP GAME—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds-Grenville): Madam Speaker, I rise on an urgent matter regarding a government railway passenger car travelling Ottawa-Toronto the night before the Grey Cup game, returning Toronto-Ottawa the evening after the Grey Cup game, and the fact that the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) has clamped a lid on the identity of the occupants of the car, that such names have been forbidden entry in railway records and that railway personnel along the entire route were denied knowledge of those on board. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Domm):

That the Minister of Transport reveal forthwith the names of any and all members of the cabinet or other persons making use of this Grey Cup special in order to remove the sinister air of secrecy surrounding same; that the minister examine the whereabouts during the time that the car was being used of the Postmaster General of Canada; and finally, that the government instruct the Postmaster General to order his private secretary not to use rude or crude language or hang up telephones when called by members of Parliament, as was done today.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

COSTS RESPECTING POLICING SERVICES IN PROVINCES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Madam Speaker, I too have a motion under Standing Order 43 which is urgent and pressing. The Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) recently announced before the committee that it is the intention of the government to shift $100 million of costs related to policing the provinces to the provinces and municipalities. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro):

That the House instruct the government to abandon its proposal to shift up to $100 million in police contract costs to provinces and municipalities which are not now served by a provincial police force, as these additional costs would further erode the already weakened financial position in which the western provinces particularly and the maritime provinces find themselves as a result of the budget and energy measures of recent date.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

ALLEGED CONTRAVENTION OF RAILWAY ACT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, I too rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Since Canadian National Railways plans to cut back on its express service by up to 40 per cent nationally, which will affect many communities which do not have reasonable, low-priced alternatives, since in northern Manitoba the cutbacks will mean an abandonment of service in many communities which do not even have road access, meaning that essential goods will cost much more for those residents, and since section 262 of the Railway Act gives the federal government the authority to intervene to ensure that the railways provide suitable accommodation for traffic offered, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill (Mr. Blaikie):

That the Minister of Transport immediately intervene in this matter by charging CN as being in contravention of the Railway Act, and by ensuring that parcel service is continued to Manitoba's northern communities.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE CONSTITUTION

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—APPEARANCE OF EXPERT WITNESSES

Hon. Jake Epp (Provencher): Madam Speaker, I would like to direct my question to the Prime Minister. The question relates to government policy. At the time the joint committee studied the constitutional proposals known as Bill C-60, the committee had the opportunity to hear a number of expert witnesses give their opinions and views on the bill. In fact, the committee heard a total of 11 so-called expert witnesses at that time. Will the Prime Minister advise whether it is government policy to deny parliamentary committees the right to hear expert witnesses and whether it is government policy to deny Canadians who are expert witnesses to appear before the constitution committee.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, there is no policy in this regard. Our intention with regard to that committee is that it should do its job, particularly regarding the substance of the proposals before it, to wit, the patriation of the Canadian constitution, the acceptance of an amending formula and the insertion of a bill of rights. Within its time framework the committee is master of its own procedures and it should get on with the job rather than bog down in procedural debates for fear that it would have to debate the substance.

Mr. Epp: The Prime Minister says that the committee should be, and is master of its own proceedings and agenda, yet the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Justice, in replying to the committee yesterday, said that it should be up to the House to decide the matter of the scheduling of the expert witnesses. I would like to ask the right hon. gentleman, since many of the umbrella groups which have appeared before the committee have shown that there are serious flaws in the proposed package that is before the committee, is it the fear of the government that, if such experts were allowed to appear, additional and more glaring deficiencies of the proposed resolution would be made public to Canadians at large?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I think you will recognize that the tenor of the question indicates the wisdom of the rule that we not comment in this place on what is going on in committee until the committee makes the report. I think the hon. member has given a good illustration of why that rule should be adhered to.

As to his suggestion that we are not willing to hear witnesses, I point out to the hon. member that although I do not have the exact figure, it seems to me there are more than 200 submissions which have been made. There has been ample occasion for Canadians through these submissions to indicate their points of view. What the opposition seems to fear is that it might have to make up its mind on the substance. That is why they seem to be spending so much time on this kind of preoccupation that is raised now by the hon. member.

Mr. Epp: Madam Speaker, again my supplementary question is for the Right Hon. Prime Minister. This party has no fear as to the substance of our position.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Epp: I am pleased that the Prime Minister has indicated that there are 200 groups or individuals who want to appear before the committee. As a result of the government's timetable, they will not be able to appear. That is the point. They cannot appear, nor are they asked now by the government to appear. They are denied the right to appear by the very policy which his government has adopted through its members on the committee. In view of that policy and the manner in which those members voted yesterday to deny Canadians the right to be heard, will the Prime Minister now—

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Madam Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is referring to a vote or some proceeding that took place in the committee.

An hon. Member: No.

Madam Speaker: The hon. member was asking a question about policy but then he proceeded to comment on a vote that took place in the committee. I would ask him not to do that.

Mr. Epp: Madam Speaker, I am relating my question to policy. I ask the Prime Minister whether he will now reverse the government policy of denying expert Canadian witnesses the right to appear before the constitutional committee.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, the hon. member obviously did not listen to my first answer. I said there was no government policy in that regard. I indicated the government policy was to have this matter dealt with as expeditiously as possible. Members of Parliament know well the subject matter which is before them.

As to the legality or otherwise of certain procedures, the hon. member knows that some provinces have taken the matter to court. If the provinces want to bring in expert witnesses to explain legal subtleties to the courts, they can always do that. But what we are asking for, Madam Speaker, is that this House essentially pronounce on three things: patriation of the Canadian Constitution, the insertion of the bill of rights and an amending formula. I wish the Tory opposition would get on with the job.

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—OPPORTUNITY FOR INDEPENDENT ADVICE

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Justice. In replying to my colleague, the Prime Minister said that the committee should get on with its job. Our problem is that the committee has been hampered in getting on with its job by the government majority on the committee. That is what prompts our concern.

The Minister of Justice has said that he is prepared to provide the committee with the legal advice of his officials. Given our experience with respect to Bill C-60 and the advice we received and given the testimony last night by Mr. Justice Clyne that the bill was badly drafted and would not stand the test of law in Canada, will the minister now give the House an assurance that he will provide an opportunity for the parliamentary committee to hear independent, expert advice and not the bad advice he has been getting?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam speaker, it is clear that Parliament is called upon to pass pieces of legislation and if they are not lawful they can be reviewed by the courts. I have testified 17 hours before the committee, and the committee members have had all possible opportunities to question me as well as my advisers about the legality. During those 17 hours, there were very few questions on the matter of legality, and the committee members seemed satisfied with my answers.

When I appear again before the committee, I shall still be willing to answer the questions put to me. However, as stated by the Prime Minister, if the legality of any legislation is to be challenged, it must be done before the courts. Since some provincial governments have started court proceedings, it does not belong to me to make any comment on their submissions. The federal government will be represented before the courts and will assess the legality of the action taken by the sovereign Government of Canada.

[English]

Mr. McGrath: Madam Speaker, far from satisfying the committee with his evidence, the minister made the committee and the people of Canada more apprehensive about what he proposes with this bill of rights. In view of the fact that at least four departments of the government, including the department of the minister's seatmate, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, are now seeking their own legal advice with regard to the impact of the bill of rights on mobility and the effects it will have on these various departments, is it the view of the government that what is being provided to these four departments, independent legal advice, is to be denied a committee of Parliament?

Mr. Chrétien: Madam Speaker, we intend to enshrine in the constitution non-discrimination clauses and mobility rights for all Canadians. Every department will have to look at the legislation they administer to make sure that it conforms with the desire of the Parliament of Canada that there shall be no discrimination and that the mobility rights of Canadians are protected. Of course, we have to look at the present legislation to make sure that the laws of Parliament passed in the past will be in conformity with the charter we will be giving Canadian citizens.

NORTHERN PIPELINES

EXPROPRIATION OF LAND IN BRITISH COLUMBIA

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East-Revelstoke): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Last Friday the minister assured this House that Foothills would negotiate with B.C. land owners whose property it requires under procedures outlined by Senator Olson in 1979. I have in my hand copies of writs filed by Foothills expropriating the lands of four of my constituents. These writs were issued under the provisions of the antiquated Railway Act, which is something the minister assured this House would not happen. Will the minister direct Foothills to use the provisions outlined in Bill S-12, as he promised us would be the case, or is he going to allow Foothills to continue to trample on the civil liberties of my constituents?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I refer the hon. member to my answer in the House last week. There is no way by which Foothills can act other than under the provisions of a law which is in effect in this country, namely the Railway Act. I have told the House, however, that Foothills has indicated that, as far as compensation is concerned, Foothills is ready to work out compensation arrangements on the basis of the bill introduced by my colleague, Senator Olson, which has not yet been passed by Parliament. Foothills voluntarily agreed to follow the rules proposed in that particular bill. As far as I can see, nothing has happened which is contradictory to what I indicated to the House or what Foothills had indicated publicly before.

As far as giving directions or orders to Foothills is concerned, I have no power under the law to give any such orders.

● (1425)

Mr. Parker: Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister. As I indicated two weeks ago, my constituents watched as riot police occupied their land against their will. I refer to the minister's statement in the House last Friday, when he said that "we have succeeded in obtaining a commitment from the builders that they will settle on the basis of the rules put forward in a bill in the Senate".

I should like to ask the minister the following question. If that is his intention, then why not use clause 75(1) which allows mediation to take place, so that a proper settlement can be reached instead of using the arbitrary figures in the Railway Act of 1919?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lalonde: I have said that my information is to the effect that the company has indicated they are ready to pay compensation on the basis of Senator Olson's bill. I fail to see the problem raised by my hon. friend if the company has agreed to pay compensation on the basis of the bill proposed by Senator Olson.

Mr. Parker: My final supplementary question is also for the minister, Madam Speaker. I should like to remind him that Foothills is expropriating Canadian land so that it can export Canadian gas to Americans for their use. Our people are being subjected to laws which date back to 1919. I have contacted Senator Olson, who gave us the very commitment which the minister gave us in the House, and asked him to negotiate on that basis—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. Will the hon. member put his question.

Mr. Parker: Will the minister instruct Senator Olson, who is in charge of the pipeline, to ask Foothills to negotiate on a fair and equitable basis?

Mr. Lalonde: I certainly have no power or authority to instruct any of my colleagues, but I will be very happy to raise the problem which my hon. friend has pointed out with Senator Olson. I also understand that my friend has spoken to Senator Olson who has indicated that he had the commitment from Foothills that they would pay compensation on the basis of the bill he had put forward. I will draw to the attention of Senator Olson the question raised by my hon. friend this afternoon, but I am happy to see that he himself has taken the initiative of talking to Senator Olson.

PROPOSED RESOLUTION—REQUEST FOR MEETING WITH PROVINCES PRIOR TO PATRIATION

Hon. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. A couple of days ago in the National Assembly, Mr. Ryan appealed to the federal government leader asking him to confine himself to patriation and an amending formula and to meet again with the provinces before sending his address to London. In view of the circumstances and of these objections and considering the wisdom and the interest shown by Mr. Ryan, is the Prime Minister prepared to discuss Mr. Ryan's appeal and to support it?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I must regretfully inform the hon. member that I have not heard Mr. Ryan's statement. It is certainly most welcome. I must remind the hon. member that for about the past ten years, I have been proposing such a solution, namely, to patriate the constitution with an amending formula. Several provinces have repeatedly refused and, if I am not mistaken, Mr. Ryan also. That is why we have decided to try another approach. Had the provinces, a few years ago or even this summer, indicated their agreement with this, perhaps our position would differ and the resolution before the House would be different. But the hon. member realizes, I am sure, that Mr. Ryan's proposal would be unacceptable to Mr. Lévesque, to Mr. Peckford and to several other premiers who are purely and simply against patriation unless we are prepared to satisfy their specific demands, which in essence means more power for Quebec, or Newfoundland, or Alberta, or B.C., and that, Madam Speaker, is the crux of the problem. Now the provinces are saying that they would support patriation, but the last ten years have shown us that if we had proposed patriation of the constitution, they would have been against it unless they were granted offshore rights in one case, cultural sovereignty in another, and so on. I remind the hon. member for Joliette that we must be realistic and consider what has happened in the last few years.

Mr. La Salle: I have a supplementary, Madam Speaker. I am sorry that the Prime Minister questioned the good faith of the provinces by adding today that he is convinced they would say no to a simple patriation with an amending formula.

The second question that I should like to ask is this: since the Prime Minister has said that Mr. Ryan's recommendation was welcome, this is already a step in the right direction. In any case, it is the first time we have heard the Prime Minister say in the House of Commons that Mr. Ryan's recommendation would be welcome. The leader of the Quebec Liberal party also indicated to the federal government that it would be wise to wait until the Supreme Court has ruled on the legality of the constitution, since some provinces have already expressed the wish to ask for such a ruling.

Under the circumstances, would the Prime Minister be at least willing to give an affirmative answer to the leader of the Quebec Liberal party by postponing his address to the British parliament until he learns how the Supreme Court will rule on this proposal?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I must repeat to the hon. member that I am not questioning the good faith of the provinces. I will state to him the position made publicly by the provinces during the week of September 9. They said: Patriation is out of the question until you accept certain things. Mr. Peckford talked about offshore rights, Mr. Buchanan mentioned federal jurisdiction over fisheries, Mr. Lévesque talked about communications as a whole and sovereignty in this area, and so on. They said this publicly, and we have taken the position that since the provinces are determined to try to extend their powers before giving to the Canadian people what they have wanted for 50 years, namely, a Canadian Constitution, negotiation is impossible.

I would prefer that the hon. member ask supplementary questions if he does not agree with what I say. In this case, this statement was made publicly on television in September, and I know what I am talking about.

PATRIATION—REPORTED PRESSURE BY CANADA ON UNITED KINGDOM GOVERNMENT

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, my question is also directed to the Prime Minister, who I am sure will be aware that the Secretary of State for External Affairs seriously misled the House last week when he denied that pressures were being brought to bear on the government of Britain by the Government of Canada with respect to getting its constitutional proposals through. I say that in light of the report which appeared in yesterday's edition of the Edmonton Journal in which Sir Anthony Kershaw, chairman of the select parliamentary committee on foreign and commonwealth affairs, confirmed in a telephone interview that Ottawa is putting extreme pressure on Westminster to rubberstamp the Trudeau formula for patriation of the British North America Act. Who is responsible for this extreme pressure? What does the government feel about the propriety of this act? Why does it feel it has to resort to this kind of tactic?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, it would seem to me that that question should be addressed to Sir Anthony rather than to me. I can state quite clearly that there has been no extreme pressure or no pressure at all. Indeed, I would find it undignified that any member of this—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: If hon. members opposite do not understand the meaning of the word "dignity", I suggest they look it up in their dictionaries.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: I would not want this government to be in the position of begging anything of the United Kingdom. We think it is their duty to respond to a joint address of both Houses of Parliament.

An hon. Member: Blackmail.

Mr. Trudeau: It is as simple as that. That is the way it has happened in the past. They have no more right to look behind an act or resolution passed by this Parliament than the government of any other country would have a right to look behind the composition of some delegation we would want to send to an international meeting.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss MacDonald: Madam Speaker, the Prime Minister may try to refer me to Sir Anthony, but when he denies stories of extreme pressure being brought to bear on British parliamentarians by the Canadian government, indeed he is accusing these people of lying. That is what the question is all about; that is how far he has gone.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Miss MacDonald: There have been statements issued by Sir Anthony which indicate that there are Canadian officials operating in London—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Miss MacDonald: —who are bringing pressures to bear on British parliamentarians. That story is backed up by a number of British members of parliament. It is backed up by George Foulkes, the Labour member for South Ayrshire—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. The supplementary question is getting a bit long, and I would ask the hon. member to co-operate with the House by putting her question.

Miss MacDonald: Who are these Canadian officials who are making these threats and giving warnings to British parliamentarians?

An hon. Member: The Peckfords.

Miss MacDonald: Whose direction are they acting under? If they are not being directed, what steps are being taken to see that they are publicly and quickly reprimanded for the steps they are taking in interfering in the British parliamentary system?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, the only officials I know who are trying to put pressure on the British government are a few officials who were appointed to London by some provincial governments. Mr. Loiselle, appointed by the Quebec government, has said that he is attempting to do that. We take the view that this is pure colonialism, and no person in my government—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: —and no official responsible to this government has the authority to beg anything of the British Parliament in this respect.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

HAZARDOUS SUBSTANCES

SHIPMENT OF VITAVAX PESTICIDE TO NEPAL AND INDIA

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina East): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, I direct my question to his parliamentary secretary, whose office I phoned earlier today in order to give notice of the subject matter I would be raising this afternoon.

During the month of September, 1980, 15 metric tons of the pesticide Vitavax was shipped to Nepal and India as a donation through CIDA. I would like to know why the department is shipping this potentially hazardous chemical to Third World countries, considering that at present there is a judicial inquiry being held in Manitoba into the death of a farmer exposed to Vitavax. His death has been attributed by the medical examiner to Vitavax. Also it has been alleged by Uniroyal, the company involved, as well as federal government departments, that the Manitoba farmer did not read the label properly and did not use the proper clothing. If Vitavax requires such extreme caution in handling, how does the Department of External Affairs imagine that agricultural workers in India or Nepal could handle it safely? Has the department informed the countries involved of the potential health hazards of Vitavax?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, like many of us I have read the clippings attributed to the hon. member in the newspapers this morning which amplify what he said at the Standing Committee on Agriculture yesterday. He suggested that Canada has done damage to the people of the Third World by sending them some pesticides which we see fit to use in Canada.

I take exception to the incredible question which the hon. member has raised. By way of consequence the hon. member has suggested that the Canadian government has such a policy toward the Third World countries. He has suggested in a very paternalistic way that the people of India and Nepal are not sophisticated enough to use properly the pesticides which we use in Canada. Is the hon. member suggesting that there should not be rural electrification because of the possibility of electrical shock? What exactly is he suggesting?

Mr. de Jong: Madam Speaker, what I am suggesting is that the darned government be realistic about the realities in Third World countries.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Chrétien: Father knows best.

Mr. de Jong: My supplementary concerns the effectiveness of Vitavax in agriculture. Today in Saskatchewan there are 500,000 pounds of rapeseed treated with Vitavax which has a germination rate of 10 per cent. I wonder if the Department of Agriculture advised the department of foreign affairs to inform Nepal and India that the rapeseed only has a germination rate of 10 per cent, and that if Vitavax is used extensively in those countries, there could be a famine. I wonder how the government would explain that reality.

Miss Bégin: Madam Speaker, it is essential to clarify the fact that the reasoning of the hon. member is based on the conclusion that the death of a farmer in Manitoba was directly connected to the use or misuse of Vitavax.

Mr. de Jong: Talk about germination.

Miss Bégin: That death has not been connected to the use of Vitavax or products containing lindane. This fact should be established first and an inquiry is under way right now. The hon. member should tell the whole truth, including the fact that the liver analysis showed only six parts of lindane per billion, which is inconsistent with the conclusion that the person was a victim of an overdose. One must not draw conclusions based on a single fact with no correlation to other known facts which would apply to the sending of pesticides to the Third World. I believe that this is unacceptable intellectually.

POST OFFICE

POSSIBLE ISSUANCE OF STAMP COMMEMORATING LATE RIGHT HON. JULES LÉGER

Mr. Pierre Gimaïel (Lac-Saint-Jean): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Postmaster General. In view of the death of the Right Hon. Jules Léger, whom I have personally always considered a great Canadian and whom most Canadians have always admired for the many years he gave to our country, can the minister say whether his department is considering issuing a commemorative stamp in his honour?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, I am happy to confirm that the Canada Post Office will issue a commemorative stamp in honour of the Right Hon. Jules Léger on March 5 of next year, which will be the anniversary of his appointment as Governor General.

PATRIATION—REQUEST FOR REFERENCE OF PROPOSED RESOLUTION TO SUPREME COURT

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. He will be aware that yesterday former British prime minister James Callaghan said that the British parliament would likely act on Canada's request "unless there was some legal challenge in the courts of Canada which betrayed a taint of illegality".

In view of the growing number of distinguished Canadian experts on constitutional law, such as the former deputy minister of justice, Mr. Elmer Driedger, and Mr. Justice Clyne, who have raised serious doubts about the constitutionality of the government's action, is the Prime Minister personally prepared to take action to resolve these doubts by asking for a reference to the Supreme Court of Canada so that once and for all Canadians can be satisfied, in Canada, that the actions being proposed by the Prime Minister are both legal and constitutional before he asks the British parliament to take those actions?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, many times since I have been in this House the opposition has demanded that this or that bill be referred to the Supreme Court. My answer generally has been that the courts should be brought into the subject when some citizen refers the matter to the courts, and this is what the Minister of Justice answered earlier. Let us patriate the constitution, let us have a bill of rights, and if some citizen or province feels aggrieved by that action and that it is, to use the words of the hon. member, "tainted with illegality", the place to plead that would be in front of the courts.

Mr. Beatty: Madam Speaker, the Prime Minister will know that three provinces have indeed taken the government to court on this matter. In view of the fact that three provinces have taken the matter to court to obtain a decision on the legality and constitutionality of the government's action, will the Prime Minister now reject the advice given to him in the infamous Privy Council office document, which stated:

> There would be a strong strategic advantage in having the joint resolution passed and the U.K. legislation enacted before a Canadian court had occasion to pronounce on the validity of the measure and the procedure employed to achieve it. This would suggest the desirability of swift passage of the resolution and U.K. legislation.

Will the Prime Minister give the Canadian people the assurance that he will allow the courts to adjudicate and to make a ruling as to whether or not what he is doing is legal, so that if it is illegal or improper it would be possible to prevent this action from being taken, instead of having it passed by Westminster where it is beyond the reach of the Canadian courts?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, the essence of much of what we are doing is, of course, to carry out the intention expressed by this House with unanimity last May when we all agreed that the constitution be patriated with an amending formula. I point out that the party opposite approximately a month ago moved a motion in this House proposing patriation with an amending formula.

Miss MacDonald: Which you defeated.

Mr. Trudeau: That is the essence of what I have proposed—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Epp: You voted against it.

Mr. Trudeau: That is the essence of what I proposed to the premiers in a letter which I sent to all of them as long ago as January, 1977. Indeed, that is the essence of the proposal we had before us in Victoria when Premier Robarts, as he then was, suggested that we set aside all this debate on the division of powers and get on with patriation and an amending formula, things which were essentially of interest to the people.

This idea has been before Parliament, the Canadian people and the premiers for at least ten years in its present form. What I have argued in answer to an earlier question is that the provinces have always said no, that they would not permit this to be done unless we gave them this or that power. It is in the face of that kind of deadlock that we have indeed acted unilaterally with the support, as hon. members will know, of at least some provinces, and certainly of many Canadians, to get on with the business so that we could have a constitution made in Canada which could be amended in Canada by Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

ENERGY

IMPORTATION OF OIL FROM SAUDI ARABIA—INSTRUCTIONS TO PETRO-CANADA

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Yesterday in the House I asked the minister to elaborate on a question which I had put to the Prime Minister, and which he did not answer very fully, in connection with the Saudi Arabian oil contract. My question today is: Has the minister instructed Petro-Canada to obtain more precise terms on the deal with Saudi Arabia than the government was able to get from Mexico?

I remind the minister that the contract with Mexico did not provide Canada with any control over timing, price, volume or quality. All these elements were under the control of the Mexican government. Has the minister given instructions to Petro-Canada so that this situation does not arise again?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, my officials are reviewing the situation. We have already discussed that, and I will have other discussions with them. I will meet the chairman of Petro-Canada in the coming weeks and at that time I will have the opportunity to tell him what conclusions my department has reached about that offer from Saudi Arabia concerning oil products.

Meanwhile, there are no ongoing negotiations, no representations are being made to Saudi Arabia, but if such representations were to be made later on, we should obviously see to it that the contract is really negotiated in the best interest of Canada.

[English]

Mr. Wilson: Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister. The minister has forced eastern Canadian refiners to take the Mexican oil, somewhat to their reluctance, because it is more costly and more difficult to refine. At the same time there are 50,000 barrels of shut-in heavy oil in western Canada, which is the same amount we have agreed to purchase from Mexico. Why has the minister forced these eastern Canadian refiners to take this oil from Mexico when the government has done nothing to seek assurance from those refiners to take similar qualities and quantities of oil from western Canada? Surely if we had done that, our balance of payments, our costs and our security would be much better under control than they are from buying this oil from Mexico.

● (1450)

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, my hon. friend seems to be rather ill-informed about the situation, especially with regard to western heavy oil. In the last two years, eastern Canada has increased quite considerably its consumption of western heavy oil. But the fact remains that there is a problem, which my colleague is doubtless aware of, because of the difficulties encountered in the transportation of western oil to eastern Canada. Very often, an exchange must be made whereby oil is shipped from Saskatchewan to the United States, while eastern Canada takes in American products. With regard to the decrease in the American demand for heavy oil in the last few months, we have taken steps to reduce the Canadian tax on heavy oil in order to restore American demand, and according to my conversations with western producers in this regard the results are most encouraging.

[English]

MEXICAN OIL IMPORTS—AVAILABILITY OF CHEAPER CANADIAN CRUDE

Hon. Bill Jarvis (Perth): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is addressed to the same minister. He indicates a problem in which the government has had to reduce its tax in order to try to firm up very weak, or lack of, markets for Canadian heavy oils, much of which is locked in the ground in Saskatchewan and Alberta. As the minister knows, these oils are of the same quantity and quality as the Mexican Maya oil that we are now importing. As a point of clarification, can the minister explain to the House what benefits there are to Canada in paying approximately $38 per barrel for inferior Mexican crude, when at the same time we have a Canadian source of supply at less than half the price?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, again my colleague seems to be badly informed. The oil we import from Mexico includes some heavy oil but also a considerable amount of light oil of the same quality as that imported from other countries. Concerning western heavy oil in particular, I would remind him that the transportation systems for this product are limited: it is not easy to transport it economically by pipeline or other means to eastern refineries. So, at this time, it is erroneous to claim that western heavy oil producers are suffering because we are importing oil from Mexico. Once again, I remind him that a hefty proportion of the imports from Mexico include light oil.

[English]

Mr. Jarvis: Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister. I agree with part of his answer. However, he will remember that originally with respect to the Mexican contract we anticipated 80 per cent would be isthmus crude of a quality which is acceptable and comparable to other imported crudes, and only 20 per cent would be the inferior Maya oil. Now it appears that those proportions will be almost exactly reversed and we will be getting up to about 80 per cent of the inferior crude, even up to 100 per cent because we have no control over that contract.

In view of the fact that we are going to get all of this inferior crude, does the minister not agree that that will act to weaken already soft markets, as he pointed out, for Canadian heavy oils, and does he not think it time to instruct Petro-Canada to renegotiate the Mexican contract?

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, I do not know exactly to what anticipation my hon. friend is referring. There was no such anticipation on the part of this particular government. I know that when his party was in office for six months it did not bother to talk to the Mexicans.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Wrong.

Mr. Lalonde: As far as the percentages are concerned, my friend knows very well that the figures he mentioned do not reflect what is happening at the present time; the relationship is more like 55 per cent.

As to the last point raised by my friend, I want to remind him that I have consulted with the producers of heavy oil in the west, particularly people in Husky Oil, and their view is that the market is going to firm up. It is quite encouraging to them that we have reduced the levy on heavy oil, and this will allow them to gain a substantial part of the market which they were serving.

IMMIGRATION

IMMIGRANT STATUS FOR VICTIMS OF ITALIAN EARTHQUAKE

Mr. Roland de Corneille (Eglinton-Lawrence): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. At this moment of grief and concern for so many people, not only abroad but also in this country, I wish to inquire into recent press reports that the government is prepared to facilitate the access to Canada as landed immigrants of those Italians tragically victimized by the current earthquake disaster, people who, because of tragedy, are literally refugees in their own country. I presume this is a question which is of concern to all of us in this House.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, what we can do most importantly in the aftermath on this disaster is, first, to assist Canadians to make contact with any relatives they may have in the affected areas. I will be instructing my regional officials to meet with Italian organizations across Canada so that we can use our communications system and immigration offices in Italy to trace relatives so that news about their whereabouts and well-being can be obtained.

Second, we have instructed our embassy in Rome to provide for the immediate processing of all applications for immigrant status of those who are in the affected provinces. We have been working with the Department of National Health and Welfare and the RCMP to waive requirements for the normal medical and security checks which can then be conducted in Canada.

Third, we have provided for means whereby those who are homeless or left affected can be given visas into Canada on a temporary basis, provided that their relatives here will give them assistance when they arrive, and we will take their word on trust.

Those are the immediate measures we have implemented. We assume after contact with the Italian government and with Italian organizations here that if there are other ways we can provide assistance, we will be more than happy to do so.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

CANADA PENSION PLAN

VOLUNTARY PAYMENTS BY WOMEN—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mrs. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Madam Speaker, our party would also strongly support the last question and answer.

My question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. It concerns pay and pensions for homemakers. Although our party has long advocated universal Canada Pension Plan coverage for all housewives, we are concerned that the minister's recent proposal for voluntary payments into the pension plan further discriminates against poor women. Will the minister explain whether women raising children on welfare will receive increases so as to be able to pay into the Canada Pension Plan, as she has proposed? Second, how can low-income earners, who cannot find the money for groceries, pay premiums for spouses? Third, why can we not have a system which treats these women as first-class citizens with a right to Canada pension at age 65 rather than welfare?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, if we can reach a consensus that opening up the Canada Pension Plan is a good thing, the proposal is to allow those people who can and want to contribute to do so. I acknowledge the problem of women in the lower economic groups who will not have enough money to contribute to the pension plan which is built on employer-employee contributions. I will continue to put forward the proposal that it is valid to address the problem of women and pensions by the nature of the programs existing in Canada, improving each of them to encompass women. Generally speaking, the Canada Pension Plan applies to the average Canadian worker. If we can reach an agreement, we will open it up to those housewives who want to contribute to it. That will be one avenue which will permit many more women, although not all, to build a pension in their own name.

With regard to the problem of mothers on welfare referred to by the hon. member, we intend to look after them through the GIS. This will, we hope, give those who live alone, many of them women, the full amount to take them above the poverty line. That is another program, another fight, which we are carrying on at the same time.

Mrs. Mitchell: Madam Speaker, my question is for the same minister who seems to condone inequity in a program which really discriminates against low-income women. Given the fact that the minister proposes in this plan to treat housewives as self-employed persons, yet over four million Canadian women, and some men also, who work long hours in their important jobs of rearing children, receive no pay, no benefits, and could not pay premiums under this scheme, will the minister consider a "pay for homemakers" allowance, with a tax back provision for higher income families, to recognize the important job of homemaking as essential, to include low-income women and, in fact, allow all women to become more independent with the chance to pay Canada Pension Plan premiums in their own right, not through their husbands?

Miss Bégin: Madam Speaker, I am not sure I have fully understood the question. If the hon. member is asking about what is called the "salary for housewives" paid through a state program, my answer would be that it is not for the state to judge whether women wish to be full-time housewives or have paid employment as well. We decided on that a long time ago.

As the hon. member knows, the income tax structure provides tax privileges to housewives and others in a similar position. I believe that is the proper route. It is for women to choose whether they want to work full or part-time outside the home, or full-time at home. That is not for us to decide.

As to the problem of pensions, which the hon. member mentioned at the beginning of her question, I think it is valid, and far more pragmatic than trying to attack all the problems at the same time, to tackle that—au fur et à mesure—when we can make progress on one front. We can begin by opening up the Canada Pension Plan to permit many housewives, average Canadians throughout this country, to build a pension in their own name. I believe this proposition is valid.

AIR TRANSPORT

PROMOTION OF TRAVEL WITHIN CANADA

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Madam Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Transport. Since we are faced with conditions which appear to discourage Canadians from embarking upon air travel in Canada, such as more stringent ticket practices, more strict reservation requirements and cancellation penalties, I wonder if the Minister of Transport, who I believe is aware of these problems, is prepared to contact the air transport committee of the Canadian Transport Commission and request them to address themselves to these anomalies, to see what can be done to promote Canadian air travel within our own country.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): I am quite prepared to do that, Madam Speaker.

HAZARDOUS SUBSTANCES

UREA FORMALDEHYDE FOAM INSULATION—INQUIRY WHEN REPORT OF COMMITTEE WILL BE PRESENTED

Mr. Doug Lewis (Simcoe North): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In a press release from her department, it was indicated that a report into the health hazards of urea formaldehyde foam insulation would be completed by the end of November. Today we have two statements. On the one hand, we have an official of her department saying that the study will be complete by December 10; on the other hand, a member of the study group has stated that he has no way of knowing when it will be completed. In view of the seriousness of this matter, can the minister tell the House when we can expect that report?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, the report and recommendations of the committee on the study of urea formaldehyde foam insulation will be ready around December 10. This is a small delay of about ten days compared to the original target date, which I find valid. By the way, the committee did meet with officials in Washington and added to their review the recent United States findings.

Mr. Lewis: The American group recommended to the U.S. consumer products safety commission that they ban it completely in all of the United States, not just Massachusetts. However, one of the members of the study group in Canada has stated that he sees no reason why we should be guided by a U.S. study. Is it the policy of this government to risk the health and safety of Canadians for the sake of scientific nationalism?

Miss Bégin: The answer is obvious, Madam Speaker—of course not. I am sure the hon. member will agree we should not prejudge the report. We will read it when it is received. I am sure the advisers outside of government will give the best advice to Canadians.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

DAKAR CONFERENCE—FEDERAL JURISDICTION OVER REPRESENTATIVES

Mr. Rémi Bujold (Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. I would appreciate if he could elaborate somewhat on the conclusion of his response to the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands concerning the French-speaking nations summit in Dakar, and also today's press reports that France would support Quebec behind the scenes. Could the Prime Minister indicate whether he had an opportunity last weekend, when he met the Prime Minister and the President of France, to discuss the matter and impress upon the French that this is a purely domestic problem?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Well, Madam Speaker, I have been made aware of that news item, apparently by Agence France-Presse, in which there are contradictory indications as to France's position. For instance the following quote:

> —President Giscard d'Estaing emphasized that it is not for France to comment on the issue of Quebec's representation, which . . . should be settled between Ottawa and Quebec.

It seems to me this is the right position, and I look no further. There is something else in the news item that apparently contradicts this, and were it to be the view of the French government, I would be in total agreement with the hon. member that it is for this country alone to settle the matter of its representation abroad, just as it is for Senegal and France to decide how they are going to be represented abroad. But for the time being, I repeat that I question the authenticity of the report, because it is contradictory in content. As far as I am concerned, I shall look no further than France's correct attitude, that it is not for France to comment on the matter of Quebec's representation.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. ROBINSON (BURNABY)—TABLING OF CABINET DISCUSSION PAPERS

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order relating to the tabling on Monday of this week of two bills, C-45 and C-46. It has to do with the commitment made by the government some time ago when tabling Bill C-43, the freedom of information legislation. At that time the government indicated it would be prepared, in the spirit of Bill C-43, to table cabinet discussion papers at the time bills were to be tabled in this House. I believe that no such discussion papers were tabled in the House at the time Bills C-45 and C-46 were tabled.

Perhaps the Secretary of State (Mr. Fox) can confirm that the government does indeed plan to make public the discussion papers in question in line with the principles of the freedom of information legislation. Second, possibly the Secretary of State can indicate when the government will finally be prepared to bring this important bill before Parliament for second reading.

[Translation]

Hon. Francis Fox (Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): Madam Speaker, in reply to the hon. member's question as to when we intend to proceed with Bill C-43, I have discussed the matter on several occasions with the government House leader and he would also like to proceed as soon as possible. Had the official opposition been a bit more co-operative in the last few days, we might have had second reading of this bill and referred the whole matter to the relevant committee, and this would have allowed us to make progress with regard to this piece of legislation which I personally consider crucial. The opposition House leader has not yet informed us how much time he wants to spend on the issue and how many speakers wish to take part in the debate. I remind the hon. member that when the opposition House leader introduced his bill in the House last year, all parties, including ours, which was in opposition at the time, agreed, in view of the importance and urgency of the bill, to have only one speaker from our side in order to ensure rapid progress on that piece of legislation. I certainly hope that the opposition House leader will soon come to the same type of agreement so that we may make rapid progress in the consideration of this highly important bill.

• (1510)

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader looked across at me as the minister was speaking and raised his eyes heavenward in despair with respect to the answer that had just been given to a question that was not asked by the member. The hon. member put it clearly, and I think it is a perfectly supportable position that he put. He asked, where are these discussion papers in the spirit of freedom of information? That question was not answered. I am interested in the answer to that question. I do not know if there is any consultation over there at all, I am beginning to wonder. It may have escaped the hon. member that the freedom of information bill has been on the lips of the government House leader for a few days with respect to its priority. I understand it has priority today. I sometimes wonder why we did not bring it in with priority over some other legislation we have been dealing with. I wonder why freedom of information, some work with respect to the economy and a whole host of other areas, has not been given some priority by this government. They stand up now and say we have no agreement with the government as to how many speakers we are going to have. Why should we have agreements with the government? These bills come and go on their merits. The fact is that our Bill C-15 on freedom of information was so meritorious that the opposition themselves, and now the government, decided that one speaker would deal with the few defects that were there. I cannot guarantee that this bill is of that nature. I can guarantee it will have the debate that it deserves.

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, I planned to rise on a different point of order, but perhaps I could relate my remarks to this subject first. To put it very simply, the order of business for the House for today, tomorrow and Friday has been determined. The order of business for next Tuesday and the rest of next week has been determined. Monday, which is a government day, is free. I suggest therefore that the order of business on Monday be the freedom of information bill. I am satisfied, on behalf of my party, and I think members to the right would agree, that if that bill is called on Monday it will be given second reading before the day is out. I hope the government will take that seriously.

I have another point of order, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: If the hon. member has another point of order I would appreciate if he would rise later on with respect to it. We will deal with this one if everyone agrees.

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, I do not mind if the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) disagrees with me or reflects upon what I say, but certainly I ask him not to reflect upon my facial movement in the house. I know he did it, as usual, in the best of spirits.

I think part of the problem was that in the confusion at the end of question period, with members leaving, the Secretary of State (Mr. Fox) was engaged in a conversation; I then alerted him to the fact that the question was being addressed and, perhaps, the purport of the question of the hon. member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson) was lost. I regret that we were sidetracked a little.

As to the question of the business before the House today we know what is before the House, it is the Petroleum Administration Act. We also know that the government House leader has outlined certain priorities for the government, one of them is the access to information legislation. When that measure comes before the House it will be discussed in the usual way.

Mr. Knowles: Madam Speaker, I rise again on the same point of order. May I point out to the parliamentary secretary that we will not be sitting tomorrow afternoon, which is when we usually receive the Thursday bill of fare for the next week. Why not tell us today that the order of business on Monday will be the second reading of the freedom of information bill?

Mr. Collenette: Madam Speaker, at this stage there have not been discussions among the parties, and I think, perhaps, we should wait until a bit later. I am not in a position to state what the position on Monday will be but there will be discussions over the next few days, I am sure, between the parties and a decision will be arrived at.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): With respect to that matter, there is some implication that our party will not agree to deal with the freedom of information measure in one day. That is quite right. We do not agree to deal with freedom of information in one day. I want to make that clear publicly because of the difficulties I have had before, not with the Minister of Communications (Mr. Fox) from whom I have had very little communication. But so the government House leader will know, if he is counting on one day's debate for his legislative program, I have a number of speakers, as I said earlier, who want to deal with the bill on its merits or demerits with a view to improving it. I want it clearly understood that there is no agreement to get that bill through in one day.

I also want to indicate to the government House leader, the House, the minister and my friend from Winnipeg North Centre that I undertake that all speeches with respect to this legislation by our members will be to improve the bill. We do want to lift the government up, even by its own bootstraps.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, on this same point of order. First of all, I hope the Secretary of State will answer the first question which I asked. Perhaps I might just repeat that under the spirit of Bill C-43 cabinet discussion papers are to be tabled at the time a bill is tabled. The minister will recall, in fairness, that he did, indeed, table the cabinet discussion papers on Bill C-43. Since that time three bills have been tabled, two of them, Bill C-45 and Bill C-46, on Monday of this week. No cabinet discussion papers were tabled with those bills. My question very simply was: when will we see those cabinet discussion papers in line with the spirit of the new legislation?

Second, I want to indicate my regret at the decision of the Conservative party not to expedite this bill in one day and to get it into committee where the bill can be properly studied. I think that is an unfortunate decision.

Mr. Fox: In the first place, Madam Speaker, as the hon. member pointed out himself, as far as Bill C-43 is concerned, we have issued the cabinet discussion papers on which the government policy on information has been based. I will have to check the precise terms that have been used. I am under the impression that we are committed not to table the said papers in the House, but to make them public. I should like to have the opportunity to review the situation. However, I understand that there is a whole series of such discussion papers which have been made public without having necessarily been tabled in the House. However, I should like to check what was the nature of the commitment. I believe it was to make those papers available, and I think that the Privy Council will be in a position to give to the hon. member a list of papers which are now avilable as a result of papers or bills being tabled in the House.

Madam Speaker: I think that we can dispose of both questions raised on the same point of order, namely, the publication of some papers. Hon. members know that their private arrangements or agreements concern only themselves and are not covered under our rules. Consequently, I cannot compel the minister to table such papers. Anyhow, I think that he got his answer during that short exchange.

The second question raised has to do with the order of business of the House in the next few days. This is a question which should be discussed at the appropriate time; hon. members now have their answer.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Knowles: Madam Speaker, my other point of order also relates to House business, but it is one concerning which we have had discussions, and I believe the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council will be able to deal with it.

When we discussed the other day the order which provides for the House not to sit tomorrow afternoon, it was our understanding that even though we are sitting only in the evening the usual adjournment debate, or late show, would take place. The officers at the table have said to some of us that because of the way the order was worded we would have to adjourn at ten o'clock. But I believe there is an understanding that a late show will take place tomorrow night.

One of the problems had to do with when members could be informed of the questions that would be scheduled. I think we are agreed that that could be done by five o'clock this afternoon.

Since there is agreement among the three of us, perhaps that could be made an order of the House.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, so that it could be made an order I would like to say that we concur. I think it is an excellent idea.

Mr. Collenette: Agreed, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: The House agrees. It is therefore so ordered.

Mr. Collenette: Madam Speaker, in relation to the discussion we have just had, we neglected—obviously because we are not sitting tomorrow—to announce the business today, and should inform hon. members that the President of the Privy Council informed me a minute ago that we will be dealing with the Judges Act, which is Bill C-34, on Monday next.

Mr. Knowles: Ahead of freedom of information?

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, did I hear correctly that we will be dealing with the Judges Act ahead of freedom of information? What is the matter with this government? We had a great argument a few moments ago when the Minister of Communications complained that we cannot deal with these bills expeditiously; he will want to go outside the chamber and blame that on the opposition. I want the public to know that the government prefers to deal with the salaries of judges first, over freedom of information, and I think that throws a lie, if I may use that phrase, or casts a pall over the kinds of things we have been dealing with.

Is there any chance that the government will change its mind with respect to that order of business prior to Monday? If the parliamentary secretary would tell me that, it would be very helpful.

Mr. Knowles: Madam Speaker, I join in this protest vigorously. Every time we have had a lineup of business, including business such as the freedom of information bill and the bill regarding judges salaries, I have received from the government the commitment that the freedom of information bill was to come first and that the Judges Act was to come later. The other day when we were dealing with the Post Office the problem was to get it out of the way so that we could get on to freedom of information and judges salaries later. For the parliamentary secretary to stand up now and tell us that on Monday we are not going to deal with freedom of information but a bill to raise the salaries and pensions of judges is making a travesty of this place, and it is quite a reflection as to the government's priorities.

Mr. Collenette: Madam Speaker, I was trying to be helpful in view of the previous questions put by the hon. members. It seems that they are willing, likely and liable to make political points out of the order of business, and I can only say to my colleague, the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton, that he knows that the government is flexible on all matters.

Mr. Epp: Oh, yes, like the committee.

Mr. Collenette: The hon. member made a representation on the floor of this House a minute ago, as did the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. All such representations are taken into consideration. Basically I was trying to be helpful to the House by informing it of information I had just received.

PRIVILEGE

MR. SHIELDS—INTERPRETATION OF SPEECH IN FORT McMURRAY

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Madam Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I have always made it abundantly clear in this House and in my constituency that the delays in the construction of the Alsands plant in Fort McMurray and the plant at Cold Lake in my opinion were caused by the lack of an oil pricing agreement between the province of Alberta and the federal government. Last evening the hon. member for Burin-St. George's (Mr. Simmons) clearly questioned my integrity when he said the following about me:

The disappointing thing—

He was referring to me.

—is that he did not say in the chamber last night what he said in Fort McMurray last Friday before his constituents.

The hon. member claimed that he read something.

Also I read the comments he made in Fort McMurray last Friday night.

To my knowledge the comments I made in Fort McMurray last Friday were not printed, and I suggest that the hon. member should have to produce my printed comments.

The hon. member said that I laid the blame squarely upon the government of Alberta. The hon. member for Burin-St. George's is clearly accusing me of saying things which I have not said. This undermines publicly my credibility as a member of Parliament. However, more important, it undermines my position in my community and thereby interferes with the job I do. Because of the communication gap which exists between northeastern Alberta and this House of Commons, my constituents depend on me to carry back to them clear and precise messages and to repeat to them the things I say in this chamber. The hon. member continually spreads falsehoods and half-truths. This particular member seems to have done this on a number of occasions in a misguided attempt to feed what appears to be—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. It seems to me I heard a word which is not very parliamentary. Perhaps the hon. member would like to rephrase his sentence. I do not think an

hon. member can use the word "falsehoods" when referring to what another hon. member says. I am sure the hon. member would want to rephrase that comment.

Mr. Shields: You are referring to the word "falsehoods"?

Madam Speaker: Yes.

Mr. Shields: Thank you. As a new member, I find that some words pop into my head—words I would like to use but cannot. Perhaps "association with the truth" would be better. However, it seems that the hon. member is continually misquoting members of this House in an attempt to feed what would appear to be a very insecure ego.

I humbly request that Your Honour direct this misguided member to withdraw his remarks and apologize.

Madam Speaker: The hon. member is obviously responding to an invitation made to him by the other hon. member to debate apparent inconsistencies in some of his statements. That clearly is debate. Because the hon. member invoked a question of privilege, I had to listen to him. I believe he made his point, but he does not have a question of privilege.

CORRECTION TO DATE OF ISSUE

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, I have been informed that, in answer to a question during the oral question period, when I announced the issue of a stamp in honour of the Right Hon. Jules Léger, I mentioned the month of March when I wanted to say October. I want to make this correction to Hansard and to make it very clear that the stamp will be issued on October 5, 1981.

OFFICIAL REPORT

CORRECTIONS TO "HANSARD"

Mr. Doug Lewis (Simcoe North): Madam Speaker, having made a correction to Hansard I must say that I took the time of the House today to make that correction with reluctance. I wonder if there is not some other method whereby a member could notify Hansard of corrections after receiving Hansard. I think what we are looking for is an assurance from the Hansard office with respect to having corrections printed as errata in the following day's Hansard. I just wonder if consideration has ever been given to that.

Madam Speaker: There are provisions for that. An hon. member can go directly to the officers at the Table and indicate that he wants to correct Hansard. That is done. It is also done in the House from time to time, but it would save time in the House if members would approach the Table officers and give them their corrections which would be taken into account in Hansard.

Mr. Lewis: I should like to ask, Madam Speaker, whether an acknowledgement could be given to the member saying that the correction had been done and would be so printed in Hansard. Is that the way it is done?

Madam Speaker: If an hon. member tells an officer of the Table that he feels the record is not a correct version of what he had said, then the officers of the Table will take his word and he can assume it will be done. We never doubt the word of an hon. member.

PRIVILEGE

MR. EVANS—NOTICE OF POSSIBLE QUESTION

Mr. John Evans (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, during the question period the hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Beatty) made some comments which I should like to have the opportunity to check in Hansard to ensure that I heard his words correctly. I would like to reserve my right to raise a question of privilege on that matter.

KNOXDALE—HUNT CLUB ARTERIAL ROAD—EXTENSION

Question No. 785—Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton):

Has the Department of Public Works, the NCC or any other department or agency made any agreement with the regional municipality of Ottawa-Carleton or any other local government in the national capital, to grant land or the right to use land for the extension of the Knoxdale-Hunt Club arterial road or any part thereof through lands owned or controlled or used by any government department or agency?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): I am informed by the National Capital Commission and the Department of Public Works as follows: In so far as the National Capital Commission is concerned: By virtue of an agreement dated July 1, 1976, between the National Capital Commission, the regional municipality of Ottawa-Carleton, and the city of Ottawa, the NCC has agreed to pay 50 per cent of the cost of the Knoxdale-Hunt Club bridge crossing of the Rideau River. However, no agreement has been made with the regional municipality of Ottawa-Carleton or any other local government in the national capital, to grant land or the right to use land for the extension of the Knoxdale-Hunt Club arterial road or any part thereof through lands owned or controlled or used by the National Capital Commission.

In so far as Public Works Canada is concerned: Public Works Canada has never reached an agreement or met with the regional municipality of Ottawa-Carleton or with any other local government in the national capital to grant land administered by Public Works Canada or the right to use such land for the extension of the Knoxdale-Hunt Club arterial road or any part thereof.

Question No. 1,561—Mr. Howie:

What are the guidelines employed by Defence Construction (1951) Ltd. to determine whether contracts for the construction of buildings, roads, repairs to buildings and renovations will be called (a) by advertisement in newspapers (b) by invitation only (c) without tender?

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Defence Construction (1951) Ltd. is subject to the provisions of the government contracts regulations issued pursuant to the Financial Administration Act and, accordingly, the following guidelines with respect to the calling of tenders reflect these provisions:

(a) With few exceptions, tenders are called by advertising in trade papers and newspapers.

(b) Tenders would be invited only in a case where the scope or complexity of the work requires a particular degree of expertise or experience. In such a case, the requirement would be advertised in trade papers and newspapers and firms would be invited to submit their credentials for prequalification. Only suitably qualified firms would be invited to tender.

(c) Tenders would not be called where the need is one of pressing emergency in which delay would be injurious to the public interest or in the rare case where only one firm is capable of performing the contract.

AUTOMOBILE DEALERS—TERMINATION OF BUSINESS OPERATIONS

Question No. 1,564—Mr. Howie:

To the knowledge of the government, how many automobile dealers terminated their business operations in the last year for which statistics are available?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): Statistics Canada reports: Statistics Canada does not possess information on this subject.

Order Paper Questions

NATIONAL DEFENCE—GUIDELINES FOR CONTRACTS FOR THE CONSTRUCTION OR RENOVATION OF BUILDINGS

Question No. 1,565—Mr. Howie:

What are the guidelines employed by the Department of National Defence to determine whether contracts for the construction of buildings, roads, repairs to buildings and renovations will be called (a) by advertisement in newspapers (b) by invitation only (c) without tender?

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): The Department of National Defence is subject to the provisions of the government contracts regulations issued pursuant to the Financial Administration Act and, accordingly, the following guidelines with respect to the calling of tenders reflect these provisions:

(a) With few exceptions, tenders are called by advertising in trade papers and newspapers.

(b) Tenders would be invited only in a case where the scope or complexity of the work requires a particular degree of expertise or experience. In such a case, the requirement would be advertised in trade papers and newspapers and firms would be invited to submit their credentials for prequalification. MIRAMICHI RIVER, N.B.—DREDGING

Question No. 1,578—Mr. Howie:

1. Was there a delay in dredging the Miramichi River in New Brunswick and, if so (a) for what reason (b) what is the status of the project?

2. Were tenders called in the spring or summer of 1980 and, if not, for what reason?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works):

1. There has been a delay of approximately one year to the commencement of dredging in the Miramichi River.
   (a) The delay resulted from a decision to cancel the tenders called during the summer of 1979 because the bids received exceeded the department's estimate.
   (b) The project was retendered on October 21, 1980.
2. Tenders were not called in the spring or summer of 1980 because there was no advantage to commencing the project in the summer or fall. It is preferable to begin the dredging in the spring because of environmental factors.

[English]

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds-Grenville): Madam Speaker, I have a point of order with regard to the unanswered questions on the order paper. I will not take the time of the House to list the numbers of the questions involved because there are quite a few of them. They pertain to the Crown Assets Disposal Corporation and, in particular, to Claudette Nadeau, the president and general manager of that corporation, and to Yvon Gariépy, master of the Royal Canadian Mint. What I cannot understand is that on October 21, the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Blais) said that he had signed the answers to all those questions and had sent them to the Privy Council office.

I assume the Minister of Supply and Services would not mislead us; I have never known him to do so. I am sure that if he subsequently found he had misled a committee of the House, he would have said so, and therefore I am assuming that his words, as they were uttered at that time, are accurate.

I assume, therefore, that at least as long ago as October 21, and presumably before that, these answers were signed by the minister, as he said, and sent to the Privy Council office for transmission in the usual way to the House of Commons. However, they have not reached us. What has happened to all these questions in the Privy Council office for well over a month, probably a month and a half or even longer? In other words, who is sitting on these answers? What official of the government has given instructions to the Privy Council office that these questions not be answered in the House, and why have such instructions been given—or have they been given? I assume they must have been given because the normal procedure, if an answer goes to the Privy Council office, is not to hold it for a month, two months or three months before the House receives it. Time and again we have received assurances from the parliamentary secretary, who I assume has been giving them in the best of faith, that he is doing all he can to expedite answers to questions. If that is the case, surely he could tell us now why these questions, according to the Minister of Supply and Services, have been sitting in the Privy Council office with no one attending to them, and why they are not being sent on to the House.

Mr. Collenette: Madam Speaker, I would be quite willing to shed some light on the question. The hon. member was quite correct when he stated that the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Blais) at the meeting of the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates on October 21, stated:

—I have signed that reply and that the replies will be tabled in the House within a very short time.

Subsequent to that, I should inform the House, the hon. member put down on the order paper further questions dealing with the same subject area. At the same time, the minister was reviewing the answers after having signed them and is providing additional information for the hon. member when these answers will be tabled. So far as the Privy Council office is concerned, in order to be fair to the questioner and to the department providing the answer in matters like this, we prefer to table all the answers dealing with the same subject matter at the same time.

So while it is true that the initial answers were prepared and signed by the minister and are being added to, to help the hon. member, answers will be forthcoming to the rest of his questions. I hope to be able to table the whole series of answers to the whole series of questions ranging from question No. 994, which was the earliest I believe, to question No. 1,595, which was the most recent question on this subject put by the hon. member. I hope to put all of those down and give answers to them in the House at the same time, if that is satisfactory to the hon. member.

Mr. Cossitt: Madam Speaker, I rise on the same point of order. I appreciate the forthrightness of the parliamentary secretary but I must bring out the fact that his statement is completely demolished by the fact that the government has answered four of the questions already. So his contention that they were waiting to answer them all at once is hardly appropriate or accurate. Therefore, I suggest to him that he has been misinformed by someone, either by his superior, the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard), or by someone in the cabinet, because although he has named correctly the numbers of the unanswered questions, they have answered four or five others, so there was no question of waiting. The four or five other questions were answered after the minister said, "I have signed them all." So they were not held back, four or five of them got through. Perhaps it was because the other answers are too embarrassing to the government where it involved, perhaps, the use of public funds for purposes for which they should not be used.

Mr. Collenette: Madam Speaker, I am sorry to prolong this debate but we do not want to give the impression of being surreptitious in the answering of these questions. Once we realized that more questions were coming, we felt it would be better to hold back all of the answers so that the hon. member could have all of the information at once. I think he will recognize that to table one or two answers on a particular question might shed light on only one aspect of the total subject being considered and that we need the full dimension or the full scope of all the answers to accurately reflect both the intent of the questions and the intent of the government in answering them.

Mr. Knowles: Madam Speaker, may I ask the parliamentary secretary if he could see whether the answer to question No. 1,640 can be brought down soon?

Mr. Collenette: I will look into that, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: We have not yet had the agreement of the House that the remaining questions stand. Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, I ask that all notices of motions for the production of papers be allowed to stand.

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. There is notice of motion No. 24 standing in the name of the hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Beatty), dated July 11, 1980, which reads:

> That an order of the House do issue for a copy of the contract entered into between the government and the Canadian Media Corporation to perform its duties as agency of record for the government.

The hon. member referred to it last week. He has had to go to committee and he asked me to see whether or not something could be done about that. Has the government formed any intention with respect to that matter, whether it is an order or otherwise, because there was—I would not want to call it an undertaking—an expression that there would be some answer immediately with respect to the propriety of that matter?

Mr. Collenette: Madam Speaker, I hope to table the reply to notice of motion for the production of papers No. 24 next Wednesday afternoon if all goes well.

While I am on my feet, and if the House does not mind, the hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Beatty) is concerned about question No. 1,449 on the order paper. So that he can read the record in Hansard, let me indicate that this is a shared reply; I am awaiting the other part of the answer, and I hope to table it soon.

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds-Grenville): Madam Speaker, I hesitate to rise once again, but this can be done only on a Wednesday when the House deals with notices of motions for the production of papers. Briefly I refer to motion No. 2 which I put on the order paper on April 14, almost eight months ago. It deals with a request that the government produce correspondence, documents, etc., in regard to the Taschereau papers between the Prime Minister's office and/or the Privy Council office and the Public Archives. Particularly it refers to the letter or the correspondence of Mr. Michael Pitfield with the Public Archives when, on someone's instigation, he was instructed to return these papers and have them resealed for a further ten years, whereas in reality they should have become public property at the end of the 30-year limit.

These papers concern the national security of the country. They contain a very great deal of information which Canadians have the right to know. I am sure some members of the House know something of the content of those papers, as I do and as I am sure the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) does.

Members on the government side talk a great deal about freedom of information, though they will not bring in the bill, as was pointed out by my House leader. Nevertheless, they do talk about freedom of information. Why then, can we not have such a simple request as this answered? Will they give us the information as to why they are hiding the Taschereau papers for a further ten years, or will they simply stonewall this matter, hoping that nothing will happen and no one will raise any points of order? The ten years will go by, and if they happen to be in power—and God knows I hope they are not, for the good of the country—they can bring in another stonewalling for a further ten years. This is becoming absolutely ridiculous. I should like the parliamentary secretary to tell me when notice of motion for the production of papers No. 2 will be answered with a very simple yes or no.

Mr. Collenette: Madam Speaker, it is difficult for me to put a date on anything. I did put a date on motion No. 24 in reply to the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker). On this particular one, I will undertake to look into it and try to get the answer as soon as possible.

I ask that all notices of motions for the production of papers be allowed to stand.

Madam Speaker: Shall all notices of motions for the production of papers be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Madam Speaker: Shall I revert to motions to hear a motion by the hon. member for Hillsborough?

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S.O. 26

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

CLOSING OF CN EXPRESS TERMINALS IN ATLANTIC REGION

Mr. Tom McMillan (Hillsborough): As Madam Speaker will know from the notice I gave earlier today, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 26 to seek leave to move a motion for the adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing what I consider to be a specific and important matter requiring urgent consideration, namely, the announced closing of ten of the 15 Canadian National Express terminals in the Atlantic region.

The closures will throw out of work over 250 CN employees and inflict substantial hardship on the many small business people, farmers, fishermen, and members of the general public who depend on CN Express for small parcel delivery to, from and within the region.

In conclusion, the matter is of pressing and urgent necessity because irreversible steps are being taken immediately by CN to terminate the employment of these employees and to contract with a national trucking company to replace, most inadequately, the services now being provided by CN Express.

Madam Speaker: I received notice from the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. McMillan) in exactly the terms he just stated in the House. There is no doubt the matter the hon. member is seeking to put before the House is a very important and very urgent one. However, the Chair cannot ignore the provisions of Standing Order 26(5) which read in part as follows:

In determining whether a matter should have urgent consideration, Mr. Speaker shall have regard to the probability of the matter being brought before the House within reasonable time by other means.

As early as next Tuesday, December 2, an opposition motion can be set down, if the hon. member so chooses, for debate in the House under supply procedures. In addition, the following six days have been set aside for the consideration of supply in Committee of the Whole. Pursuant to a special order adopted on April 29, 1980, members of the opposition have the opportunity to name a department or agency they wish to consider while in Committee of the Whole.

It seems to me that there will be ample opportunity for the hon. member to raise this matter in the House. Furthermore, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) is scheduled to appear before the Standing Committee on Transport later this afternoon on his estimates. The hon. member can then question the minister at length.

For those reasons I regret I cannot accept the hon. member's request for an emergency debate at this time.

PETROLEUM ADMINISTRATION ACT

PETITION TO REVOKE PROCLAMATION

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway) moved:

That the proclamation laid before the House on Wednesday, November 12, 1980, pursuant to subsection 52(3) of the Petroleum Administration Act, as proclaimed in PC 1980-2917, be revoked.

He said: Madam Speaker, first a word of explanation in order to clarify this matter. Earlier, I moved that the order in council with relation to the fixing unilaterally of oil prices by the federal government be challenged and be revoked. This motion deals with the fixing of gas prices, but essentially it concerns the same act, the Petroleum Administration Act.

I should like to begin by making the position of my party very clear on this issue respecting both oil and gas. We say that the national energy program brought before the House when the budget came down is basically flawed; it is a flawed program. In time people, especially progressive people, will find more and more things to criticize in this program.

We feel there are two major flaws in it. The first arises through the government's failure to introduce an industrial strategy or economic restructuring of the economy either in the budget or the national energy program. Later on I will talk about the fact that there has not been any industrial strategy at all. When I say "industrial strategy", I mean making Canada a country which manufactures at home its own resources, instead of being a shipper of raw resources or a vast mine for foreign countries.

Such a move requires real industrial strategy, planning, concern and commitment. My party is committed, but apparently the government is not. I will be discussing that matter in more detail later in my speech. The second major flaw in the national energy program and the budget is that there is no cushion in the form of subsidies on the impact of higher energy prices on low and middle-income people. Canadians will come to realize very shortly that as the price of gasoline and heating oil begins to rise many segments of the population will need help to pay the higher prices. They will not receive that help from the government.

The third flaw is that the Petroleum Administration Act, this Draconian measure, has been invoked too early. My party would prefer to get back to the original principle of co-operative federalism and obtain agreement with the provinces. Instead, the federal government is unilaterally invoking this serious act. I would like to quote from a speech made during the debate on the Petroleum Administration Act in this House on October 31, 1974, by the Hon. Donald Macdonald, the then minister of energy, as reported in Hansard at page 914:

While it is the government's earnest hope and desire that the price of oil from the producer provinces will always be determined at mutually-acceptable levels by agreement with those provinces—

The government is most hopeful that the exercise of such powers will not be required.

The minister was referring to the powers of oil price restraint, and saying that he hoped these powers would not be invoked, that, instead, there would be agreement. Alberta has not acted unilaterally in this matter without the permission of the minister. I have no brief with respect to the claims of Alberta. Personally, I believe it is wrong that so much wealth should be concentrated in one province. Nor do I have a brief with respect to Alberta's actions since the budget and since the invocation of this act. By that I am referring to Premier Lougheed's announcement that he would cut production. Such a move is bad for Canada and bad for Alberta. I do not have any sympathy at all with the recently announced private boycott by Alberta businessmen on Ontario goods. It is wrong and shortsighted. The government did not have to invoke this act. The government could have continued on with the price regime which had been de facto agreed upon, and the minister admitted as much in the House just the other day. There was no dispute of that price regime by Premier Lougheed.

The government could have merely set out the limits of its tolerance in terms of price increases by Alberta. If Alberta overstepped those limits, then the Petroleum Administration Act could have been invoked for good reason. My party is not against the act in principle, but we would prefer to see it used as an emergency measure when all else fails. If the government could not get agreement with the producing provinces, then it would be required to act unilaterally and invoke the Petroleum Administration Act, but only in cases where the action by a province would have a drastic effect on oil prices or on the principles of co-operative federalism. The act should only be invoked along with a very progressive policy which is fair and can be seen to be fair in all areas of the country. Such is not the case now.

Many of my colleagues have indicated in the House that the budget and the energy policy of the government are not fair to the north, to Atlantic Canada or to western Canada. It seems to me that Canada has the worst of all possible worlds. It has higher oil prices, angry provinces, no cushions or help for the lower or middle-income people and no future job strategy for the country.

As a Canadian who lives in western Canada, I would like to say a few words about the alienation of that part of the country. This topic has been very much a part of the debate and part of the news of late. By invoking the Petroleum Administration Act the federal government is seizing revenues from western resources. It is seizing a larger share of oil and gas revenues. If one were to approach this matter logically one must ask, "Should the provinces have control and ownership of the resources?" The answer is yes, because it is in our constitution, although the section needs further clarification.

Mr. Siddon: Does Dave Barrett agree?

Mr. Waddell: I will tell the hon. member what Dave Barrett wants in a few moments. If he would listen, he might learn something.

Mr. Siddon: I am listening.

Mr. Waddell: I put the second question to the hon. member in order that he may think about it for a little while—when he does take the time to think. It is, "Does a resource become so valuable that the federal government should interfere with provincial control of that resource in order to distribute it more fairly?" Premier Lougheed once said that the government would not interfere with the oil industry if it were in Ontario, but that is only one side of the argument.

I have thought about this matter a great deal, and I believe the answer must be, "Yes, the federal government can interfere". But the government must interfere only in an extraordinary situation and it must be perceived as acting fairly. This situation will come up again. I say this to my friends in the Atlantic provinces, who will have to make some of these basic decisions and face these issues when and if, as I hope, gas and oil are discovered in large quantities off Newfoundland in the Hibernia field.

I would like to quote from a speech made by Allan Blakeney, the Premier of Saskatchewan, at the annual conference of the Atlantic Provinces Economic Council in Halifax on October 25, 1976:

> —we in the west and you in the Atlantic region must face the fact that political power in Canada is now and for the foreseeable future concentrated in Ontario and Quebec.
> Neither the Atlantic region nor the west can expect the federal government—whatever its party stripe—to take the initiative in introducing the basic structural reforms that are needed to encourage more balanced regional development.... Westerners feel aggrieved by recent efforts to change the rules of the confederation bargain, that is:
> —to change the rules on who should benefit from natural resources, which were supposed to be our source of wealth—
> —to change the rules on tariffs and transportation.
> The west, like the Atlantic provinces, because of its dependence on natural resources, is subject to chronic instability of prices and markets and wild fluctuations in local economic circumstances.
> And like the Atlantic region, the west is dependent on an efficient transportation system to move its goods to distant markets, and it suffers, as you do, from the anomalies and inequities that are so much a part of our freight rate structures.

In that speech Premier Blakeney was dealing with some of the real grievances of the west, not the negative grievances raised by members of the Conservative party in recent speeches. He was dealing with the real western grievances concerning transportation tariffs and so on. A poll was released this week by the Canada West Foundation, representatives of which testified yesterday, I believe, in front of the joint committee on the constitution. That poll shows some interesting results. The voices of western Canadian grievances are not in reality represented by what I call the fascist oil company types. The people of western Canada support increased federal government and provincial government action in the energy sector. They support that. I think that is important. Seventy-eight per cent agreed that oil companies are making excessive profits. Forty-eight per cent disagreed. Only 38 per cent agreed that the federal and provincial governments have enough control over the oil companies. Seventy-four per cent agreed that too much of the money Canadians spend on oil leaves the country by way of oil company profits. Seventy-four per cent believe that the federal government should increase its involvement in exploration and refining. Even in western Canada there is a feeling that the federal government has a role in exploration and refining, and that it can become involved in what is otherwise a provincial resource.

Canadians living in the west want very much to remain part of Canada. However, they feel they are getting a raw deal. Sixty one per cent of the people disagreed that the federal government has made a genuine effort to overcome the problems of discrimination against the west. Eighty four per cent agreed that western Canada gets ignored because political parties depend on Ontario and Quebec for most of their votes. Sixty five per cent disagreed that western Canada derives so few benefits from being part of Canada that it might as well go it alone. Ninety per cent prefer that the western provinces remain part of Canada. That is a sampling of opinion which shows overwhelmingly that Canadians living in western Canada want to remain a part of Canada. But they do feel they are getting a raw deal. Lawyers have the expression "justice must not only be done, but it must seem to be done". In western Canada they do not feel justice has been done in the sense of the federal government dealing fairly with the issues, such as tariffs, transportation rates and a host of other things.

I can tell you how deep the feelings go, Mr. Speaker, even on what would otherwise be little things. Here is an example. Canada played Mexico in a soccer game as part of the World Cup series. More countries participate in the World Cup than in the Olympics and 108,000 people watched that game in Mexico City. Yet hardly any notice was taken of the World Cup in eastern Canada. The CBC televised the game at an awkward hour. Football, or soccer, as it is known here, is very important to the average individual in Vancouver. That is just an example of a little thing people complain about. These little things build up into bigger things, such things as transportation, tariffs and other matters.

Another interesting poll was published in the Edmonton Sun. On November 13, 1980, this question was asked: how satisfied are you with the performance of Joe Clark and the Conservatives in the recent dispute between Ottawa and the provinces? Satisfied: 45.5 per cent. Dissatisfied: 54.5 per cent. It is clear, too, that westerners do not like the attitude of the Conservatives, which is a completely negative one in this constitutional debate.

I stood up in this House and asked the hon. member from Richmond, who is chattering away here, why the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) does not deny the remarks made about a western parliament by the hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington). Incidentally, the Leader of the Opposition heard this. That is no way to deal with the problems in western Canada. In fact, that is a negative way of dealing with them. The Conservative party has been negative in dealing with this problem. I suggest that instead of talking about separatism, the Conservative party should do something positive about the grievances of western Canada.

Many members from this part of the House come from western Canada. I can tell the member what we have been doing. We have been standing up in this House and asking for a federal-provincial development fund. We have stated that we do not like the fund outlined in the budget. It is patronage and we do not want any more of that. We do not want any more in money, such as the $4 million going to Mr. Axworthy and some Ottawa people. We say, get the provinces involved and co-operate with us in the west. That is what we want.

Second, we supported the government and, indeed, pushed the government, telling them we wanted more public ownership of the oil industry. It took guts to say it because that is a national policy. But the people of western Canada will support that stand. I tell hon. members to take a look at those polls.

Third, instead of saying who was in bed with whom, we have taken the stand in the constitution committee that the constitution will go through, although we disagree with a unilateral move. We have decided that we will fix up the bill of rights, we will fight for women, the native people, and we will get a better amendment. Not only that, we will get an amendment which will nail down the control of the provincial governments and give them power over resource revenues. That is very important to my province. I am proud to go before that committee to stick up for that kind of result for the west. That is what my friends in the Conservative party should be doing. They should be working positively to keep Canada together.

In the event the Liberals across the way are thinking they are going to get off lightly, I shall now return to some remarks made by the minister.

An hon. Member: You are partisan.

Mr. Waddell: My friend says I am partisan. Yes, I am partisan. I am partisan for western Canada and for my province. It is about time that he got partisan, too. But let me refer to remarks made by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde). He had this to say: "I think it is time the members of the House, and Canadians in general, grew up with respect to the role of Canada in international affairs." The minister is not here today, but his parliamentary secretary is. He is the man with the bow tie, although he does not have it on today. I ask him to relay what I am going to say to the minister. Canadians have grown up in their attitude to foreign affairs. Canadians are proud of the role Canada plays when it gets back to its proper and active role in foreign affairs. Canadians do not need lectures from the minister telling them to grow up in their attitude to international affairs. I suggested the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) should not have gone to Saudi Arabia. Instead, he should have been here dealing with the serious problem of Alberta. The minister can disagree with me and tell me that he has important things to do. That is fine, but it is my position that he should have been here and that he was remiss in running away. If he were doing something when he was away, that would be a different matter. But yesterday in the House, he did not know anything about Arabian oil. He said very little about North-South relations, although I am sure he knows a lot about it. Why did he go away? In my opinion, one should not go away when the government is losing control of a situation. The country is slipping into a crisis and the Prime Minister should be around to deal with it. He cancelled trips and stayed around during the Quebec referendum. In many ways, the situation facing us now could become a serious crisis.

The minister said he had to bring in the Petroleum Administration Act and that he had no other choice. I have already gone over my position in that connection. I said he could have negotiated; he was not obliged to do what he did. For some years there has been a tendency in the Liberal party to use a sledge hammer to kill flies. The War Measures Act was a good example. The government should be very careful in picking a fight with Alberta and in trying to bring Alberta to its knees because it could bring the country to its knees as well.

I want to refer now to remarks made by the hon. member for Etobicoke Centre (Mr. Wilson), who is the Conservative energy critic. He claims to be concerned about the impact of this program on the average man and woman. I thought it was a joke for a moment that the Conservatives are so concerned after bringing in a budget which was going to raise prices of oil and gas even more and give a large chunk of money to the oil companies. They made what I call "the Harvie Andre deal". If you read Jeffrey Simpson's new book on the Clark government, you can see that.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I apologize for interrupting the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway. I wonder when the day will come when hon. members will choose to refer to each other in a more comfortable fashion than by name. For the fourth time the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway has referred to individual members by name. I know there is no slighting intention in doing that. However, I am forced to uphold the traditional rule that members should be referred to by their constituencies and I would appreciate it if the hon. member would do that.

Mr. Waddell: I was referring to the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre) in terms of title which may be distinguished from referring to his name per se. I would ask Your Honour to rule right now. We are in the modern world. We have television in this House of Commons. People think we are silly when we refer to the hon. member for blah-blah-blah rather than use that member's name. I invite Your Honour to rule that the tradition be changed so that we can use the proper names for members.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Waddell: I am prepared to abide by Your Honour's ruling either way.

Mr. Collenette: Mr. Speaker, I would like to substantiate the comments you have just made. We do have rules. The hon. member may have some arguments as to why the rules of the House should be changed. However, this is not the time or the place for such a debate. We are debating the Petroleum Administration Act. Perhaps we can take the hon. member's concerns under advisement.

There is a procedural committee of this House. There has been talk by many members regarding parliamentary reform, such as limiting speeches. The hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) objected last Friday afternoon to the reading of speeches in the House during private members' hour. These may very well be legitimate concerns, but the rules of the House are there to be observed and obeyed. I hope we do not debate this matter now.

Mr. Waddell: Perhaps I can aid you, Mr. Speaker, I agree.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): We can dispose of the matter. The parliamentary secretary is quite correct, this is not the time. Under our rules, we are not in the position to debate it now. The hon. member has pointed out that in the case of some members, this may be something the House would like to go to eventually. This having been said, we better stay with what we have now and what we have is a requirement that hon. members refer to one another by their constituencies.

Mr. Waddell: Rome was not built in a day. I was dealing with some of the speeches I heard in this House. In particular, I listened to the hon. member for Thunder Bay-Atikokan (Mr. McRae). I will not mention his name. He sits opposite. He expressed the view which I have heard many Liberals express during this debate, namely, that the Liberals are fortunate that they are in the middle. Suddenly they are fine, things are fine, and the policy is right because they are in the middle.

I wish the hon. member were in his seat today. I am sure the parliamentary secretary will relay my message that that is the muddle middle. In modern politics, which is something else that is coming out of the west, the muddle middle is gone. People want parties to take a position today. They want them to define their positions. I see the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan). He is in the muddle middle about the marijuana issue. I do not know how long he will get away with that. I do not think it will be much longer. That is the kind of new politics we will see coming out of the west.

The hon. member for Thunder Bay-Atikokan also suggested that provinces such as Newfoundland cannot protect themselves from the large multinationals and, therefore, the federal government must do that. I again point out to him that British Columbia, Saskatchewan and Quebec in their relationships vis-à-vis the multinational oil companies have a much better record than the federal government.

One problem with western alienation is that all the really exciting action, with the exception of the bilingualism legislation, since the sixties has happened in the provinces. There has been nothing from the federal government. The hon. member for Thunder Bay-Atikokan further suggested that we in the New Democratic Party should be in favour of this policy because we, above all parties, believe in the strongest of strong central governments. Speaking for myself, I would like to see my party, and I hope it will, move this way.

Mr. Kaplan: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. member would permit a question.

Mr. Waddell: I will be glad to, Mr. Speaker, at the end of my speech.

Mr. Oberle: You call that a speech?

Mr. Waddell: I am saying that the people of this country want the power moved closer to the people, which is the provinces, or even to the local level. When the New Democratic Party formed the government in British Columbia, they established community resource boards which brought the government and the welfare system right down to the local people. That is the future in politics. In any event, I want to talk a little about the gas policy while we are dealing with it under this part of the motion.

An hon. Member: Good. We have been exposed to your gas all afternoon.

Mr. Waddell: We have been exposed to your gas policy and your oil policy. The problem with the oil policy is that it sold our oil at cheap prices. We in the NDP are worried that the same might be done with natural gas. Yesterday a report came out from the Canadian Institute for Economic Policy. The author of the report, Bruce F. Willson, had this to say at page 93:

> —this country can probably expect a natural gas deficiency within five to ten years, if not sooner. Such shortages will have devastating effects.

We are now selling cheap gas. Later we will have to import expensive gas from such places as Algeria. Last spring we debated the pre-build of the Alaska pipeline. That is a microcosm compared to our other problems. American companies are now saying that the pre-build pipeline, when built, will only operate at 40 per cent capacity. The pipeline in my province of British Columbia only operates at one-half capacity.

In our scramble for gas exports, we have overbuilt our pipeline capacity. Last December the National Energy Board approved eight applications for more exports. Only half have been taken up by the Americans. Clearly they do not want our gas now.

Look at the Canadian government policy. We have this fancy energy policy. However, we must look at the reality of it and see what they have been doing. The government has been encouraging drilling and giving up to 92 per cent in tax write-offs. As a result of the drilling and finding of gas, there has been pressure from companies which have a cash flow problem. They have to sell the gas. The government is overbuilding pipelines, hurrying through the pre-build of the Alaska pipeline, even at the risk of expropriating people's property with police state methods and archaic laws, as was pointed out in question period today by my colleague for Kootenay East-Revelstoke (Mr. Parker). Then the policy comes out. It advocates that Canadians switch to natural gas. That does not give you much confidence in a gas policy dealing with exports and problems with exports.

The government overbuilds pipelines, continues to follow a strange policy. With regard to the pre-build, for example, the government said it had the support of the President of the United States. When we said he might not be there next year, they said no. They said they had the support of congress. When we said the congress might change, they said no. Now the government is in the difficulty and is never going to see the Alaska highway pipeline built. They rammed that bill through Parliament. I personally brought a lawsuit against the cabinet on this thing—

An hon. Member: How are you doing with it?

Mr. Waddell: The member asks me how I am doing. Very well. The case has been set for trial and I hope that we will be able to subpoena some senior government people. They can wait with bated breath.

Mr. Siddon: Is it before the courts?

Mr. Waddell: Yes, it is before the courts, which is why I am limited in what I can say about the case.

I might tell hon. members that the government is so together on it they even technically defaulted on their pleadings, that is, they forgot to appear. We could have obtained a default judgment against them, which would have stopped the pipeline. They finally got through to Ottawa and received some instructions. That case is continuing.

I want to quote from the energy paper at page 36:

> Producers will not suffer any reduction in the price which they currently obtain for their exports or their domestic sales, except for a small loss due to the taxation of pipeline fuel. In setting the export price of natural gas in the future, the price will be adjusted to take into account this tax.

I say that the minister of energy was really misleading us with that statement. He knew, or should have known, that he could not increase the price of natural gas to the United States. He brought in a gas tax of 30 cents per 1,000 cubic feet which is to go into effect in February. On November 15, he announced that there would be no export tax on gas. What does that mean? In effect, it means that the money, the $300 million from Alberta and $50 million from British Columbia, will have to come out of the pockets of the people in British Columbia and Alberta, rather than being passed on to the Americans. This means that no sooner is the ink dry on the figures in this document, the national energy policy, the paper is cracking. Those figures are wrong. The minister said there would be $3.6 billion gained by the province of British Columbia from gas revenues. That is wrong. It took a few weeks to see that it was wrong. Actually, it will be less than half that. This, in the eyes of the province, discredits this paper with respect to gas policy.

With respect to another more populist level, if I can call it that, in terms of gas conversions, what people are asking in my constituency is: can they convert their oil furnaces to gas furnaces. It holds out a promise, but it is an imperfect one. There is no protection to people from the CHIP insulation style rip-offs from contractors. The minister refuses—I talked to him about it yesterday—to finance the program through utility companies like B.C. Hydro and Quebec Hydro, which would enable low income people to receive subsidies over the years from hydro to pay for conversions. It does nothing to help senior citizens or to deal with their problems. Since it is a taxable grant received as a result of converting one's furnace to gas, will it come off their GAINS program or their old age pension program? There are always concerns which remain unanswered. In Quebec, the minister's own province, two-thirds of the people are tenants. This policy does nothing for them. It does not even approach the problem. Again, the Liberals walk the muddled ground. The reality of this energy program is far different from the illusions.

The real flaw in the program, and I will conclude with this, is that if you look at a worker in St. John's, in Toronto or Vancouver, you will see they are unified. They have something in common. They have economic concerns. Suddenly they find their heating cost will double next year—zap, their price of gasoline will double. They can cope with these increases if they have a secure job. That is what I mean when I say that the greatest flaw in this policy is the failure to give back to the people some cushion, some guarantee that they will have jobs to pay for the increase, when you are raising energy, oil and gas prices by so much. This is what people are concerned about.

The Arctic pilot project is a good example. Here are the great words of this policy and here is the reality in the Arctic pilot project, under which Petro-Canada and other companies will ship gas from Melville Island in the Arctic, in foreign built ships, manned by foreign crews, and then export it to the United States. That is what is happening in terms of policy. That is the reality, which is what the workers of this country are worried about. They do not see any industrial strategy which would provide jobs for their children and their children's children.

Mr. Speaker, an old Scot once told me that the only way capitalism works is when you have 12 men looking for the ten available jobs. It seems to me that when you really get down to this policy what the government is telling Canadians is that they do not have a right to own their own home, they do not have the right to a job, they do not have the right to a lifestyle to which they have become accustomed.

An hon. Member: That is socialism.

Mr. Waddell: That is socialism. That is what we stand for and that is what we support.

Canadians know that this country has great potential. They know they can own their own homes. Canadians know they can and should have a job and that they can live a good lifestyle. They are prepared to make some sacrifices. They know that the price of oil and gas must go up. They are prepared to make some sacrifices but they demand that they be fair, just like the provinces demand that the federal government act fairly toward them. The ordinary people in those provinces demand that the government act fairly, that the great mass of people do not bear the burden of these oil and gas prices as is the case under this policy. This policy is a sham when we get down to the average person. That is why we in the NDP have brought forward this motion today to challenge the government, to ask for the revocation of the Petroleum Administration Act and to debate its energy policy.

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I seek the floor to participate in this debate. I cannot resist asking one question of the member opposite. He indicated he would permit questions and I think technically he does have a minute left. The question I wish to ask calls for a very short answer.

He was telling us how much guts the NDP had in the energy area. Those were his exact words. Then he said that people in the west expect parties to take positions nowadays, and that was going to be characteristic of what would happen from now on so far as the NDP was concerned. This is a debate about energy prices and that is what I will talk about. The Conservatives had the misfortune, when they were in government, to be exposed, to lay out their prices. We have laid our prices out for the next four years, which is what I will be speaking on. I would like to ask the hon. member, who stands as his party's spokesman on energy, what is the price schedule the NDP stands for? Would he have enough guts to take a position on this before the Canadian people if the NDP were in power, if socialism were prevailing, with Premier Blakeney looking on and being quoted so favourably by the hon. member? I will talk about the four energy prices, the four gasoline prices for each of the next four years. What are the NDP's prices?

Mr. Waddell: I would need 40 minutes to reply. But I can give you three words: lower than yours.

Mr. Kaplan: I hope Premier Blakeney is listening since the NDP has not been very forthcoming with regard to their price schedule. Now they have made it clear that if they were in power the provinces would find prices controlled by the federal government. The hon. member has indicated as much. He has also indicated that their prices would be lower than the prices set by this government. I do not think that is very realistic, and that is what I want to deal with in the time before royal assent is called for.

● (1630)

As the hon. member opposite was speaking, I listened for something with which I could agree because he is an agreeable fellow, but the only thing with which I could agree was his idea that it would be better not to be operating under this act unilaterally but to be operating by way of agreement with the producing provinces. It has been the objective of this government to try to reach agreement with the producing provinces. The hon. member opposite says that he would not have given up hope of agreement. But at a certain point the government did give up hope and proceeded unilaterally. It proceeded unilaterally for a peculiarly Canadian reason and a peculiarly Canadian objective. Of all the countries in the world we are the one, and maybe the only industrialized country which can set out a schedule of prices for the next four years to help in a meaningful way with the industrial strategy which the hon. member himself regards as so valuable. We can tell the participants in the Canadian economy what energy prices will be over the next four years.

What other country can do that? Italy, a country recently wracked by disaster, is a complete importer of its oil. It cannot have a debate like this and set energy prices as we can. Other western European countries cannot do so, but we in this country can, and should.

The NDP spokesman warned the Canadian people—and I thought it was very forthcoming of him—that energy prices do have to go up. It is worth nothing, even though we have a measure of control, that energy prices must go up. They must go up, for the very good reason that energy costs are going up. As we all know, our present energy mix with respect to oil is derived from three sources. One is imports, and one is high cost non-conventional sources. In those two categories we do not have very much choice about the price. We pay the market price or we do not get the product. We pay the necessary exploration, production and transportation costs for the non-conventional sources. Canadians have to understand that we do not have much flexibility in that regard and that those resources have to be paid for on the basis of a demonstrated cost. The third source, over which Canadians as a nation do have control, is the conventional energy source. We know that is declining, but it is a major part of our energy mix now.

It is a part over which the country has control constitutionally and to which this legislation is addressed. Naturally, we would have preferred, and it would have been better, to be operating on the basis of agreement. I do not think hon. members opposite can demonstrate any fault on the part of the government for our inability to reach an agreement. The hon. member tried to blame it on the fact that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has been travelling outside the country—on very legitimate public business—but he knows perfectly well that if the Prime Minister had been present in the House or in the country, that would not have changed the preference expressed by Alberta not to embark upon face to face ministerial or prime ministerial negotiations at this time but to have exchanges by officials. That is Alberta's preference. In view of that, I do not see how the hon. member can criticize the Prime Minister's trip or this government for moving unilaterally to establish a framework within which an industrial strategy can unfold, a strategy which he indicates he welcomes as much as this government does.

The Conservatives do not have the luxury the NDP does of refusing to tell us what would happen if they were in government because they had that opportunity, and last December they set out in black and white—and I will refer to it—how much a gallon of gasoline would cost in Toronto under their policy in each of the next four years. In the budget brought down by the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) the national energy program was described, and in that program we also set out a price schedule of what prices for gasoline would prevail in my city during each of the next four years.

Mr. Siddon: How about heating oil too?

Mr. Kaplan: And heating oil. Across the board including heating oil, and I thank my hon. friend for mentioning it because I do not have time to give those figures.

Mr. Siddon: They are very significant.

Mr. Kaplan: Yes, they are, including heating oil. Energy costs for Canadian consumers over the next four years in all provinces will be $40 billion less under the national energy program than they would have been if the Canadian people had continued to support the Conservative government in power to carry out the program it had in mind for the next four years for Canadians and which it put down in black and white.

Mr. Siddon: Table the calculations. That is not true.

Mr. Kaplan: The next Liberal speaker will provide the calculations on heating oil, but I can compare the demonstrated prices. It is too bad that the NDP has been unwilling to come across and tell us how it would deal with this very difficult problem. Comparing the 1979 budget to the national energy program of this government for Toronto at the city gate, gasoline consumers in 1981 would have paid under the Conservative budget $1.56 and will pay under the national energy program $1.36. In 1982 they would have been paying $1.75. They will be paying $1.53. In 1983 they would have been paying $2.32 had the Conservatives continued in power. They will be paying $1.71. In the fourth year they would have been paying per gallon $2.63 if the Conservatives had stayed in power, but under the national energy program they will be paying $1.95, a difference of nearly 75 cents. That represents a saving to consumers of $40 billion. Listening to western spokesmen and reading the press, one might think that $40 billion saving was coming from the money the provincial governments would otherwise have received.

However, as hon. members of this House know, such is not the case. It is not the intention of the national energy plan to reduce the take of the provincial governments substantially. In fact, the $40 billion which they would have derived from the Conservative package is virtually the same amount as they will derive under the national energy plan of the Liberal government. The province of Alberta, which has a smaller population than metropolitan Toronto, will receive over the next four years an increase of $31 billion; Saskatchewan, $3.2 billion; and British Columbia, $3.6 billion. I do not deny the feeling of western alienation. I know it exists and that it is real, but it is obviously not legitimately based on this national energy plan because the plan gives the provincial governments almost exactly the same amount of money as they would have received under the Conservative budget.

Under this national energy plan the national interest is also taken into account. Money is provided—and I cannot take the time to deal with it—for subsidizing conversions from heating oil, for participating in exploration and development, for pipeline construction and facilitation, for incentives to industry, for alternative energy developments and for many other projects which have been outlined. The budget does take account of the national interest and does provide funding at the national level to encourage these things.

If the provinces do not lose and if the nation continues to benefit and consumers get a much better deal, it is reasonable to ask who is paying for all of this. Of course, the answer is obvious if we look at what has been happening on the stock exchanges lately in the oil and gas sector. There is no doubt that the oil and gas sector is not going to derive the benefits and the profits from the national energy plan that it would have derived from the Conservative plan. This is particularly true of the multinational sector. They will be getting less. The right question is not how much less they will be getting, because the amount they will be getting will continue to represent an incentive; a reasonable question is why this particular sector has been getting so much incentive from the government, why they have been paying so little federal tax over the last 40 and 45 years during which they have been in business in Canada. I think that is a more important and a more interesting question. The answer to that question really lies in our history. This is long before the time of nearly any member of the House, and I emphasize the word "nearly".

Mr. Knowles: Speak for yourself.

Mr. Kaplan: In those days, discoveries were made in the west and it was a question of encouraging their development, so incentives were provided which, in my opinion, seemed to have been modelled on what was going on in the United States. We have felt as a country that if we did not do as well by the oil and gas sector as the Americans did in their own country, they would not come here. Because we wanted them, because there was a premium on that kind of technology, know-how and capital, we were willing to provide a very sweet deal.

Well, I think we have to look at the national interest now, as the national energy program does, and provide incentives which are realistic and which, I submit, will be effective. I do not think the multinationals want to leave Canada. I think they will continue to receive benefits which will make it worth while for them to stay here. But we have changed the incentives in such a way that it is going to be better and there will be greater incentive for participation by Canadian interests. The more Canadian a business is, the more incentives it will have to remain and develop in the oil and gas field.

Members of the official opposition are referring to this aspect of our policy as socialism. I think it is very important to emphasize that it is not, that there is a plan for public sector development, and that the main thrust is to encourage Canadian investors, not the state to take a bigger interest in the oil and gas field. Private investors are being encouraged to take a bigger piece, and they will have the incentive to do so. Certainly no country needs it more than we do. They get extra development incentives for proceeding in proportion to the degree of Canadian ownership.

The NDP is quite ambivalent on this question of capitalism. I remember that David Lewis, the former leader of that party, said very often in the House that there is no difference between a Canadian capitalist and a multinational capitalist—that a capitalist is a capitalist. There is a very important difference between that ideological socialist party and ourselves. We do attribute importance to Canadian ownership, participation and control in our economy, and this national energy plan contains novel, important and very real incentives which, I have no doubt, will have the effect of increasing the number of Canadians and the size of Canadian participation in the ownership of the oil and gas industry in Canada. I think the NDP may have come along a little since David Lewis' departure from the House.

Mr. Waddell: He said that in 1964.

Mr. Kaplan: The hon. member suggests it was said in 1964. In fact, it was said while I was a member of the House while I was present in the chamber and on many more than one occasion. This is an important distinction to draw between our two parties. As far as we are concerned, Canadian participation, ownership and control are worth-while goals, goals which will be encouraged by this national energy plan. Opportunity, one of the three keynotes of the budget and of the national energy plan, means opportunity for Canadians to play a larger role in this important sector.

Mr. Speaker, I see my time has nearly expired. I should note that Petro-Canada is also a Liberal invention. Petro-Canada is a corporation which belongs to the state and which is available to take risks and to join in partnership with the private sector where the extra, traditional Canadian government input is required to make a project work and to make sure that the resources of this country are explored and developed. After all, a capitalist, even a Canadian capitalist, has the choice of the country in which he wants to operate. If prospects seem marginal in Canada, he can pass them up and go to some other country. Well, Petro-Canada does not look at things that way. It has the mandate and the responsibility to look at everything in our country, however marginal or remote, and make sure that the Canadian interest is developed. This is a totally different perspective than a capitalist would have. That is why we need Petro-Canada, although there are other good reasons for it, and that is why the government will continue to support Petro-Canada and even to expand its role.

I wanted to comment also on the attitude of Ontario people toward the claim of the present government of Newfoundland to have constitutional jurisdiction over the resources off the shores of that province. We all know the legalities of it. The legalities of it are settled, they are in the national domain because the offshore territory was not part of the colony, and that is quite clear. But people in Ontario recognize that so far as the economic benefits are concerned the people of Newfoundland should benefit from those resources, and if major resources are found there from which the nation can benefit, then Newfoundland should benefit first. Then we look at Alberta and we see how a province which has legal control over its resources can turn the tap off and tell the rest of Canadians, "Go offshore" or "Give in to our demands" or "Do without"; we have to ask ourselves in my part of the country whether Newfoundland, which is not in a position to do that to us, should be put in a position to take such a stand.

The Conservatives had no difficulty with it last year because they did not see it from the point of view from which we have to see it in my province. We think that if Alberta has that constitutional power and is exercising it, we should not add to our national problems by suggesting that Newfoundland should be given the same power. That is not to say they should not have the economic benefits from their resources. I think there would be strong agreement where I come from that Newfoundland should not only be the first to benefit from its offshore discoveries but should derive, on a priority basis, substantial benefits from them. If Alberta can derive extra benefits from properties over which it has constitutional jurisdiction, Newfoundland should too, so far as the economic benefits are concerned. From our point of view, it would be adding extra problems to Canada's viability if we gave a premier who does not now have the authority, the same authority as Alberta has to turn off the taps.

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest, as I always do, to the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) this afternoon. There was one statement which made me wonder whether or not the Solicitor General and myself and a good many Canadians are living in the same country. Certainly we cannot be reading the same newspapers and travelling in the same parts of the country. He said basically that under the government's national energy plan, everyone wins, that the provinces win, the consumers win and the federal government wins. If the minister is correct in that statement, then approximately one-half of this country, in terms of size but not in terms of population, must be wrong. A good portion of the country, particularly western Canada, does not believe everyone wins under the government's national energy plan. Canadian-owned oil companies, not the multinational ones, have said to members of my party—and I presume to members opposite—that because of the energy plan we are debating this afternoon, some of them may go broke, drilling rigs will be moving out of Canada and there will be a loss of jobs and equipment in the country. I doubt very much if the minister is correct, but if he is, then these companies must be wrong. I frankly do not believe that. What the minister said really exemplifies the problem in the country in terms of not being able to communicate or not understanding each other and each other's regions. Knowing the Solicitor General as I do, I do not believe he would have made a totally wrong and incorrect statement, since he knows the feeling of frustration and resentment which exists in other parts of the country.

Today we are debating the Petroleum Administration Act. When it was set up, I do not believe any government thought it would be used. Certainly it was hoped the act would not be used because it allowed the federal government to set unilaterally the prices of gas and oil. As I understand it, this is the first time it has ever been used in the history of Canada since this legislation was enacted. Obviously prices should be settled through negotiation. That is the Canadian way, that is the way it has been done in the past, and if our country is to be viable, that is the way it must be done in the future. They should not be set arbitrarily at any time through an action such as the use of the Petroleum Administration Act.

It is being used at this point in time because the federal government, in what appeared to be a very heavy-handed and sometimes sneaky manner from the point of view of the producing provinces or the regions of the country from which these products come, worked toward an agreement in which faith in the negotiating process and trust between the partners totally broke down. The entire process reached the point where the government either felt, as a last resort, or because of a grand design previously set down, that it must move toward this very regrettable step.

The budget set out the oil prices. It was really an energy statement rather than a budget. Out of the total of $14.920 billion in new revenue, $14.155 billion will come from changes in oil and natural gas taxes. Over the next three years, some 95 per cent of the revenue collected will come directly from the energy sector. It is my contention that the Canadian consumer will be stuck with the bill or will end up paying it through higher prices and taxes.

Most Canadians have various feelings about this particular piece of legislation. I think they must ask themselves four or five main questions concerning the thrust of the government's energy package. They should ask themselves whether or not the measure will be of help to the consumer. Of course the answer is basically no. While we know that energy prices must increase, we on this side of the House feel that sectors of society should be cushioned while the price increases are working their way through the system. That will not happen under the proposal put forward by the government.

Another question Canadians should ask is whether or not this energy proposal will increase our security of supply. At the present time the answer is a very positive no; it will not increase our security of supply. In fact, it may very well work in the opposite direction.

Another question Canadians should ask is whether or not employment will improve because of the government's energy package. Of course the answer to that question is no. Jobs will be lost in the western provinces, hence jobs will be lost in central Canada where a lot of the products used in the energy field are manufactured. Certainly it appears that we will end up with a weaker oil industry because of this energy policy.

Lastly, going back to what the Solicitor General alluded to, national unity is being strained. There is deep resentment in various parts of the country, particularly in western Canada from where I come. This resentment is directed not necessarily toward this in itself, but toward a series of things which have occurred over the past number of months.

I should like to compare the energy proposals of the Progressive Conservative Party in December, 1979, to those of the Liberal government and their possible effect in the coming year and certainly into the 1983-84 year. To compare these proposals one must decide on a benchmark, and the only benchmark in effect is what the Progressive Conservative Party was prepared to do in terms of pricing arrangements. In regard to price increases and taxes in the year 1980, from January to December, my party proposed a $4 per barrel increase; the Liberal government proposed a $3 per barrel increase, coupled with an 80-cent per barrel petroleum compensation charge and a 75-cent per barrel Syncrude levy which brings the total cost of its package up to $4.55 per barrel. Turning to the impact upon consumers during 1980, under the pricing policies of the Liberal party, the cost of gasoline will rise by approximately 17.3-17.4 cents per gallon and home heating fuel by approximately 15.9 cents per gallon. If we project this through to 1983, under the Liberal policy, or what we are operating under at the present time, gasoline prices will rise by 83.8 cents per gallon at the pumps or somewhere in the neighbourhood of 19 cents per litre, and heating fuel will rise some 77 cents per gallon.

Under the Progessive Conservative budget, gasoline prices would have risen 84.5 cents per gallon at the pumps and heating fuel, some 61 cents per gallon. Therefore, consumers would pay approximately 1.7 cents more per gallon for gasoline and 16 cents more per gallon for heating fuel by 1983 than under the Progressive Conservative proposals.

This will affect all Canadians, whether or not they are car owners, old age pensioners, home owners, regardless of status or position in our society. One of the frustrations we in western Canada are experiencing right now relates to the fact that during the last election campaign the Liberal party deliberately led Canadians to believe that over the coming years energy prices would be lower than under the Progressive Conservative budget. And this is wrong. I will illustrate this by taking my figures based on an average family of four through to 1983, because that is the fairest way to judge both programs.

Under the Liberal policy, gasoline for the family car would cost about $484 more per year at the present time and home heating fuel would cost approximately $616 more. Under the Progressive Conservative budget which was defeated, gasoline for the family car could cost approximately $495 a year more—approximately $10 a year more than under the Liberal budget—and home heating fuel would cost $488 more, some $150 less than what was proposed by the Liberals. Over all, for these two essential commodities, costs for the average family would be over $100 per year higher and over $1,100 higher by 1983 under the Liberal pricing policy than under the prices negotiated with the provinces by the Conservative government.

As I have mentioned before, prices must rise. All Canadians realize that we cannot keep our oil and gas prices at their present level. The injustice is the severe impact of these price increases on low-income Canadians who have no way of either passing on the price or making up the difference through an increase in salary. There are zero offsetting measures under the Liberal budget or energy policy, but under the proposals brought down by the Conservative government in December, 1979, there were numerous offsetting measures such as tax credits, tax rebates to farmers and fishermen and so on. The tax credit was in the amount of $80 per adult and $30 per child. There was a series of measures to help cushion the substantial rise in prices which would be felt throughout our economy, affecting everyone.

The Canadian Council on Social Development, a very respected non-partisan organization has said:

> The energy price increases announced in the budget, combined with rising inflation and planned federal reductions in social spending will have a negative effect on the living standards of Canadians on low and fixed incomes.

That is one of the most regrettable aspects of this whole energy pricing scheme. As a result of the general thrust of the government's action by unilaterally imposing its will and an energy pricing scheme on the provinces, the oil industry and the Canadian public, the consumer is being asked to pay for the very large increases which will result. By the end of 1983 the cost of energy will be between $300 and $600 more than it would have been under the Crosbie budget.

What does the consumer receive? He receives two things—a tax credit and more government.

Another question which will be asked is, "Is security of supply being increased"? Of course, it is not being increased. The cancellation of such projects as the Cold Lake project and cutbacks in exploration programs by Canadian independents prove that security of supply is not being increased. This is the present situation, and it can only get worse. In Atlantic Canada—

THE ROYAL ASSENT

A message was delivered by the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

> Mr. Speaker, the Honourable the Deputy Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable House in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker with the House went up to the Senate chamber.

And being returned:

Madam Speaker informed the House that when the House went up to the Senate chamber, the Deputy Governor General had been pleased to give, in Her Majesty's name, the royal assent to the following bill:

> Bill C-6, an act to revise the Bank Act, to amend the Quebec Savings Banks Act and the Bank of Canada Act, to establish the Canadian Payments Association and to amend other acts in consequence thereof.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

PETROLEUM ADMINISTRATION ACT

PETITION TO REVOKE PROCLAMATION

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Waddell:

> That the proclamation laid before the House on Wednesday, November 12, 1980, pursuant to subsection 52(3) of the Petroleum Administration Act, as proclaimed in PC 1980-2917, be revoked.

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Madam Speaker, I suppose any speaker in the House of Commons hates to be interrupted in the middle of a speech, but on an historic occasion like this when royal assent is given to the Bank Act, it does not make one feel quite so bad.

I was talking about five critical areas which most people in this country are wondering about—questions which have not been answered satisfactorily by the unilateral move the government has made. First, consumers themselves regardless of income levels are being asked to pay large increases, not only with respect to gasoline for an automobile, but for any kind of oil. From our point of view, this is wrong, because of the effect it will have on the low-income earners of this country. Security of supply is not being increased or protected. I would predict, certainly in the future, that we will find ourselves in a serious situation with respect to security of supply as we enter the late 1980s. We will find ourselves more reliant upon OPEC oil as we move along. That is an absolute shame for our country. Each year Canadian families are spending the equivalent of approximately $900 per year on OPEC oil. That money should be staying in Canada. I do not see in the energy proposals any indication that this will happen.

Earlier I mentioned that the energy proposals would not increase employment. In fact, the energy pricing proposals will work in the exact opposite fashion. In my opinion, we will not have a stronger Canadian industry, at least not for a long, long time. The industry will be severely affected by the moves of the government.

Energy development will also slow down. It will virtually stagnate and the whole question of our balance of payments will be turned around. Under this proposal, we will end up paying more and more for imported oil over what we now pay the producing provinces of this country. Coupled with that is the question of the development of technology. That will not be there. In my opinion, the highly skilled advance technology will be developed in some other country, presumably in the United States where the action will take place.

One of the great tragedies of this whole question of the inability to come to a pricing agreement and, flowing from that, the government's unilateral moves on energy pricing and their budget which devoted so much to energy, is the way it will affect Canadian companies. I refer not to the multinational companies, but to companies owned by and controlled by and employing Canadians. I presume most members have received a copy of a letter addressed to the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) dated November 13 by a person by the name of B. M. McVicar. I wish to quote from his letter because it states far better than any of us in this chamber could describe what is happening to Canadian-owned companies in this country. I quote:

> Such budget cuts immediately result in a drop in seismic crew and drilling rig crew and normal procurement activities. If there is a predicted 40 per cent or 200 rig drop there could be a direct lay-off of, say, 5,000 people. Indirect lay-offs amongst logging, mud company and all other ancillary exploration and production service and supply companies could total up to 100 people per rig especially if supply outlets in Ontario and Quebec are counted. Everyone will have slightly different figures for all of this but the order of magnitude will be the same. The gross budget cut dollar effects are not too difficult to extrapolate from the past personal experiences of available knowledgeable people and presumably government statistics. The net effect of your budget is immediate severe Canadian job loss or degradation which will persist and will not only include hard pressed wage earners but also those with a high technical capability for sustaining and increasing our energy capacity. Job loss will occur from Halifax and St. John's through Sarnia and Windsor to Vancouver.
> Acting on your government's previous inducements to invest in Canadian industry I took it in good faith and made what was then a prudent and well advised investment, specifically Turbo Resources Oil and Gas Production Funds numbers 5 and 6. This was an act of thrift. My intent was to make provision for retirement. Your budget may have now ruined these investments and with them my retirement savings. How can I ever afford to trust the Canadian tax system to be a reliable inducement to commit investment in Canada versus elsewhere ever again?—
> The saddest part of the budget is its effect on Canadian individuals and companies: Ocelot, Tri-Mac, Simmons, Canadian Hunter, Voyageur, Turbo, etc. Individual Canadians with formerly viable and sound productive properties proved reserves, new discovery and a talent for finding hydrocarbon are verging on bankruptcy.

That is the result of what the energy package which the government brought down some time ago is doing to Canadian industry. It has been repeated time and again by other owners of Canadian natural resource industries. In effect, the government has virtually taken a sledgehammer to them without any recourse other than to suffer the consequences and see the industry literally shift to the United States.

There has been talk of western separatism. I do not know whether that is a good phrase. Certainly there is western frustration. There may be a certain element of separatist feeling in western Canada. I know the frustration level is dangerously high. That has not come about through only one thing. It came about as a result of an election campaign conducted on the basis of lower prices and a turnaround by doing almost directly the opposite. There was a first ministers' conference on the constitution in which it was perceived that the federal government was acting in a very devious manner, leaking memos and doing things not traditionally in the Canadian way.

The fact that closure was imposed on the constitutional resolution is very frustrating and worrisome to people in western Canada, as it must be to all Canadians. The budget and the energy package which we talked about this afternoon is one more building block in the whole foundation and may at some point in time lead to a very serious situation in western Canada.

Westerners are Canadians. There is no question about it and there has never been any doubt about it. I have talked to some people in western Canada who have indicated that they are separatists in their leanings, but they still have a Canadian flag on their desk, in their office or in their home. It is not the same kind of separatism we experienced in terms of the province of Quebec some time ago.

Westerners are Canadians, but they will only be pushed so far. They are sick and tired of the methods being used which result in the culmination of a series of things they do not believe are necessary. They believe that given a proper input into the life of this country, they could make a very good contribution. Fortunately, a country is stronger than any of its politicians or political parties, individually or collectively. That is good for Canada at this time in our history.

In closing, I urge all members before voting to take a hard look at what is being done to the goodwill of this country and a very important industry in it. I think we are moving toward not only severely hurting it, but to dismantling it.

Petroleum Administration Act

PETROLEUM ADMINISTRATION ACT

PETITION TO REVOKE PROCLAMATION

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Waddell:

That the proclamation laid before the House on Wednesday, November 12, 1980, pursuant to subsection 52(3) of the Petroleum Administration Act, as proclaimed in PC 1980-2917, be revoked.

Mr. Doug Frith (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I wish to add my comments with regard to the present debate before the House. I know it is a well-known fact to members of this chamber that the basic principles outlined in the budget speech in October were the crux of the energy program that was to be instituted in Canada on behalf of the Government of Canada.

In it they outlined three basic objectives of that energy package. First of all, they dealt with security of supply. Second, they dealt with the opportunity for Canadians to participate in the energy industries more than they have in the past. Third, they dealt with the fairness in pricing and sharing of revenues among governments and industries in this country. The third objective is the one I wished to address myself to more particularly in the first part of my speech this evening.

When we talk about fairness I would like, by way of preamble, to state exactly what the situation is as I see it in Canada today. I think that I, along with many members on this side of the House, have expressed some concern about the level of western frustration. I am glad the member from Lisgar (Mr. Murta) expressed it that way since too often I feel that in this particular debate I have heard from the members opposite the word "separatism". That, clearly, is misleading to a number of Canadians who watch this particular program. Some of the better speeches from members opposite have come from those I would term the moderates in this realm. They discussed the feelings of alienation in western Canada in terms of the situation which I believe exists.

I visited western Canada in July as a result of a request by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) to a number of Liberals in this House to undertake a tour of western Canada in order to explain federal energy pricing policies to Albertans, Saskatchewanians and British Columbians. From the open line shows I participated in and from some of the discussions I had with chamber of commerce groups in western Canada, as well as with people involved in municipal politics in western Canada, I learned first hand that I share some of the frustrations they have with central government. I have had discussions with people who live in western Canada about how they feel about the way the central government treats them.

Before dealing with that I would like to give an historical perspective of how the federation of Canada has evolved since the time of confederation in 1887. Most of us who are students of history realize that at the inception of federal government in Canada the "have" provinces were the maritime provinces. Over the ensuing 113 years since confederation we have experienced a continual evolution of both economic power and population demographic changes which have consistently moved from the eastern borders of our country to the west.

In the last several weeks I have read with interest some very good editorials, not only in central Canadian newspapers but in western Canadian ones as well. They spoke about this shift of power occurring within the country. They spoke about how we should view it from the standpoint of the opportunities it means for Canadians rather than from a sense of frustration as we try to come to grips with this problem of evolution in our country. From my perspective, as member of Parliament for Sudbury, I have some understanding of the frustration which is felt by people who live in western Canada with respect to their interpretation and the way in which they relate to central government. In northern Ontario we have had that same feeling of alienation with respect to our central government. It goes without saying that this kind of alienation, is a function of how far away one is from the centre of power. Political science documents have been written relating to this feeling. It occurs whether it is the provincial centre of power or the federal centre of power. I sensed, and I share, the same frustration as I think western Canadians feel about the way in which the economic structures of this country have worked in their view. I think they have some legitimate beefs. It has worked to their detriment in terms of development of secondary industry in western Canada and in terms of creating job sectors for the next generation of western Canadians. We too in northern Ontario have shared those feelings. For example, in northern Ontario freight rates work to the detriment of the development of secondary manufacturing industries. We see that 112 years after confederation we are still very much a hinterland economy largely resource oriented. Resources are shipped continually from northern Ontario to points in southern Ontario or elsewhere in Canada for further processing. I say, yes, share those feelings of frustration with respect to the feelings of western Canadians. They say, "Look, the resources are going to run out; they are finite resources. At some point in time we must have a manufacturing base in place or we must be able to develop the tertiary sector of the economy for the next generation of western Canadians." I can understand that attitude from the viewpoint of western Canadians. I share it with them from the standpoint of living in northern Ontario.

I am disturbed by some of the comments I have seen in newspaper articles in western Canada. I am somewhat concerned about comments made by some of the members on the benches opposite when they interpret that frustration level. I think the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) said it very well in Saskatchewan several nights ago when he was confronted by some members of the hard core separatist movement there. He said it is the duty of all Canadians to fight with all their ability whenever the head of separatism arises. I do not have to say in this House how hard the Minister of Justice fought separatism in his own province.

I think it is important that hon. members from western Canada in this debate, and in the ensuing months, should to the best of their ability calm down this feeling of western separatism. Surely if we are members of Parliament we are Canadians first and Albertans second. As members of Parliament that is the message we must all give to western Canada regardless of political affiliation.

I would like to deal now with some of the remarks I have heard on open-line shows which have attempted to answer some of these problems vis-à-vis western frustration with respect to our present energy program and our budget, indeed, even with respect to the constitutional debate which is presently in committee.

I went to western Canada in July and participated in open-line shows. People calling in said, "Look, suddenly we find that for the first time in our lives we have all the riches, we are becoming much stronger economically than we have ever been before. All we see is a strong federal government trying to grab the money that we feel is rightly ours." Coming back to this whole issue of fairness in revenue sharing and about being a Canadian I say to them that there has been one consistent oil policy developed as Canadians, regardless of whether it has been under a Liberal or a Conservative government. Since the time of confederation one of the major principles which has allowed this parliament to survive the 113 years has been the ability of the federal government to take the riches from the "have" provinces and distribute them—I am not saying distribute them equally across this country, but distribute them in a manner in which we can, at least, deliver a basic level of service to all Canadians. There should be a basic security system for Canadians in this country; there should be basic rights for all Canadian citizens to enjoy.

Mr. Siddon: All you do is keep taking.

Mr. Frith: What the member opposite has just said is the kind of remark we seem to be hearing all the time—we always seem to be taking. Clearly, that is not the case. If the member wishes to rise on a point of order I do have at least seven minutes left—

Mr. Siddon: I wonder if the hon. member would receive a question on the subject of equalization and sharing?

I appreciate the genuine atmosphere in which the member is speaking. I think the reason for the frustration western Canadians feel is that in the talk about the importance of suppressing our feelings of anxiety we should not at the same time talk about what we view as discrimination or unfairness in the means by which equalization is to be administered. In other words, western Canadians want to know how the sums add up. The government opposite will not share with us what we are giving and who is receiving to what degree. Would the hon. member answer this question: does he not think western Canadians are entitled to that information?

Mr. Frith: I would like to answer the hon. member's question in this way since it is a question that came up in the Quebec referendum. It came up within the last four years as a result of the threat of separatism in the province of Quebec. When we get into this whole mathematical ballgame of how much we put into confederation and how much we take out the answer is: whoever is cooking the books can give you a different answer.

I was at the Economic Council of Canada two or three years back when the finance minister for Quebec, Jacques Parizeau, gave an address. He had been making quite a few speeches with respect to how much money it was actually costing Quebec to stay within confederation. I remember that the treasurer of Ontario, Mr. Darcy McKeough handed Mr. Parizeau at that time a leather-bound edition of what Ontario's treasurer had come up with as to what confederation cost Ontario.

I want to get away from that and come back to the basic feeling of fairness in the country. I happen to believe, having talked to western Canadians, that once their level of frustration is at least spoken out, they are still Canadians first, and they still believe in the principle of sharing. The reason I am speaking in this vein is that in terms of editorial reporting in western Canada and to a large extent on the national television networks I feel we are not getting our message across. I speak not from the standpoint of a Liberal message. I refer simply to the message that a central government must give to western Canada.

Let me come back to some of the remarks addressed to me on open-line shows in western Canada. I was told that world prices prevail for almost every other commodity and asked why not for oil. Last night in his speech the hon. member for Burin-St. George's (Mr. Simmons) correctly pointed out that in the late sixties copper prices were deliberately kept below the world price by the federal government in order to maintain a viable industry in Canada. In addition, exports were curtailed at that point in order to allow our Canadian industries to survive.

It was pointed out on other occasions that over the years, and particularly in the sixties, Canadians paid more for western oil than the world price. That was a conscious decision made by a central government to stimulate the oil industry in western Canada and to allow it to survive and to grow. This has been done in the past. To an extent I suppose we have done the same with respect to the cost of wheat. In order to maintain a thriving agricultural economy in western Canada, there have been times since confederation when we have paid more than the world price for wheat, and for the same reasons.

Therefore, when these kinds of subsidies occur, it naturally goes without question that somebody has to pay for them, and that is the principle all Canadians have accepted since the days of confederation.

Others said that oil is a commodity like all others and asked why it should be taxed any differently, why we should be suppressing the world price and why the producing provinces should not be getting the world price for oil as they do for all other commodities. I pointed out to western Canadians that by the law of supply and demand last year the supply markets on a worldwide basis increased and demand dropped. Therefore, by any other law of supply and demand the price should have dropped, but that did not occur. The price on the market doubled, so I say that oil cannot be a commodity like all others if that is what is happening on world markets. I said that the difficulty the federal government faces—and we have attempted to address it through the establishment of a national energy program—comes back to the way in which taxes from the resource industry accrue either to the province or to the federal government. To put it in perspective, the revenues which are derived from the oil and gas industry in Alberta for every man, woman and child amount to $1,851.

Let us compare that amount with the revenues derived from resources in Manitoba of only $46 for every man, woman and child, and in Ontario from the resource field of only $23 for every man, woman and child. When there is a discrepancy of the difference between $1,851 per person in Alberta compared with $23 in Ontario—and there are other provinces in which the figures are still lower—the federal government clearly has a problem. No matter how we attempt to increase federal revenues in order to distribute and equalize so that Canadians can share, somebody must give in this respect. Unfortunately, at the present time it is Alberta, but this will happen, as it has since confederation, to each province. At varying times in our history some of the provinces have been "have" provinces and others "have-not". The "haves" change from time to time, and so do the "have-nots". The time may come when Ontario will be a "have-not" province. If there is to be the semblance of a fabric of nationhood, we as members of Parliament will have to accept the fact that the "have" provinces must share with the "have-nots". I appeal to hon. members opposite to sell that message.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

PETROLEUM ADMINISTRATION ACT

PETITION TO REVOKE PROCLAMATION

The House resumed from Wednesday, November 26, 1980, consideration of the motion of Mr. Waddell:

That the proclamation laid before the House on Wednesday, November 12, 1980, pursuant to subsection 52(3) of the Petroleum Administration Act, as proclaimed in PC 1980-2917, be revoked.

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Madam Speaker, I rise to participate in this debate on the invocation of the Petroleum Administration Act. I rise with a sense of déjà vu or, perhaps more accurately, with the realization that I am reliving a nightmare we have already experienced once before in this country. When the Petroleum Administration Act was first introduced in April, 1974, my party and I were adamantly opposed to it. In our view, the passage of this act would negate realistic negotiations between Ottawa and the producing provinces since the government in Ottawa knew it would never have to negotiate with the give and take implied, because Ottawa would have the hammer. We fought this act as vigorously as we could, and we fought it alone. But the Liberal government with its majority and with the help of its NDP bedmates, of course, prevailed.

An hon. Member: Not with the Tory separatists.

Mr. Andre: The battle was a total rout because after many weeks and months we were able to gain the inclusion of the sections which allow ten members to bring about the debate that we now have. We gained that amendment without New Democratic Party help. The New Democratic Party approved the bill but it did not want the bill to be used, which is just like saying that it is in favour of the fox guarding the hen house but it does not want the fox to eat the chickens. Is that hypocritical? I say it is at least hypocritical. But there was worse to come.

The New Democratic Party energy critic, the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell), was bordering on McCarthyism in some of his remarks which were directed at the hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington). The late U.S. Senator, Joseph McCarthy, to whom that infamous phrase is not contributed, used to destroy reputations by making the accusation, "Why do you not stand up here now and state categorically that you are not a member of the communist party?" He knew full well that it would plant doubts in a person's mind. That is exactly what the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway is doing in asking the hon. member for Capilano to state that he is not a separatist. The hon. member for Capilano does not have to prove to the hon. member, or to anyone, that he is a Canadian. He fought for this country in the war. That cheap McCarthyism is below the dignity of the New Democratic Party we used to know from the past.

Mr. Kempling: Say it outside.

Mr. Andre: Character and integrity are not words one would use to describe the current New Democratic Party caucus. Perhaps that is why they are such comfortable bedmates of the group opposite. If there is one single reason behind the current energy crisis, it has to do with the lack of integrity and honesty shown by Liberal governments over the last seven years.

It is seldom possible to point with accuracy to the genesis of a public issue, but in this case it is possible. Very specifically, we can go back to July, 1973, when the then minister of energy, the Hon. Donald Macdonald, and his deputy minister, now Senator Jack Austin, tabled phase 1 of "An Energy Policy for Canada". That was July 7, 1973. They stated on page 9: "No national energy policy can be contemplated without the fullest of intergovernmental consultation and consensus." At page 58, they said, "That there can be no effective set of national policies developed without the participation of the provincial governments is readily apparent." That was the position of the government.

About a week later they held the Western Economic Opportunities Conference. All kinds of promises were made about consultation, listening to the west and helping western industrial development. Six weeks later, because the then leader of the NDP, David Lewis, said, "Do something about inflation or I will get out of bed and no longer support you," on September 4 they imposed a price freeze on crude oil. That was six weeks after they promised there would be no such thing in their energy policy.

On September 13, 1973, the Trudeau Liberal government announced a 43-cent. export tax on each barrel of oil because American prices were going up. Therefore Premier Blakeney and Premier Lougheed reacted with some anger and concern. Both changed the royalties in their provinces.

In November Ottawa raised the export tax to $1.90. During that time, as Hansard will show, we were told not to worry, they were just collecting this to keep the price differential between Canada and the United States, but the money belongs to the producing provinces and the industry.

On December 13, 1973, the then federal energy minister, Donald Macdonald, said 50 per cent of the revenue from the export tax, which was then close to $2.20, would be given to the oil producing provinces and the rest would be invested by Ottawa in the petroleum industry, likely through a national petroleum company. Two weeks later, December 27, when the House was not sitting, the export tax was raised to $6.50. Macdonald said the commitment to return the tax revenue to the province would end on February 1. That was another blatant break of a promise and a commitment. Naturally there was outrage and indignation from the producing provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta.

In January they held a national energy conference. There was agreement that the domestic price should rise from $4 to $6, and in March all parties agreed that the increase should be to $6.50 a barrel over 12 to 15 months. About a month and a half later, on March 6, then finance minister John Turner dropped the bombshell in his budget, ending the deductibility of royalties. Companies could no longer deduct such payments from taxable income. That was a blatant contradiction of everything the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) had promised just two months earlier. That was a third violation of a commitment. Under the Prime Minister we now have, there were three broken promises in the fall of 1973.

Then there was an election. The NDP got their just reward. The Liberals, I suppose, got theirs. They were re-elected a majority government. They sat down and produced a new energy policy called "An Energy Strategy for Canada: Policies for Self-Reliance." In it they stated, "It is clear, therefore, that a viable national energy strategy requires consultation and constructive co-operation with and among provincial governments." For a while they lived up to that. In fact an agreement was reached. Finally, there was agreement in 1975 that we move to world prices, there would be an escalation of $1 every six months, and the federal government imposed a ten-cent excise tax to help finance the subsidy for imported oil.

Lougheed formally declared peace on December 30. In fact for two years everything went along reasonably well. The industry prospered. We started working toward self-sufficiency. Then the end of that Liberal government's term of office came along. On September 27, 1978, energy minister Alastair Gillespie announced unilaterally that $1 increase scheduled for July 1 would be cancelled. That was a unilateral decision in violation of what was then a written contract. It was the fourth direct violation of a promise. It was a written contract they had violated. They broke their word for the fourth time.

Mr. Lalonde: Lougheed agreed to it.

Mr. Andre: Later, after some concessions. He did not agree to it on September 27.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Marc, you listen to a good speech and stay quiet.

Mr. Lalonde: Agreed.

Mr. Andre: In March, 1979, the Prime Minister called a federal election for May 22, declaring that Canadian energy needs were too vital to be left to Exxon or the Alberta government. There we are. There is the history of broken promises, the chicanery, the dishonesty, the kind of dealings one would not expect from an enemy, let alone your own national government. That is the legacy.

If anyone wants to know the root of western alienation, look at this history of broken promises. If you want to know the root of the distrust shown by the people for the federal government, look at how the federal government has behaved—broken promise after broken promise after broken promise, and violated written agreements. That was up until the election of 1979. Since their return to power, the dishonesty has become worse.

During the summer we had the charade of so-called meaningful negotiations by the minister. We had the details laid out in the Alberta legislature. We know what actually happened at those meetings where the minister said he was negotiating in good faith. There were no such negotiations in good faith.

Then there was the advertising campaign. Incredible! George Orwell's 1984 personified right here in this strategy document for this energy advertising campaign. Then we have the malicious distortion of the energy pricing agreement which had been worked out between the Clark government and the Alberta government when the minister sent out his poor embarrassed officials to make the presentation on what gas prices would be under that agreement.

We then have the utter distortion on revenue sharing. It is interesting to note when various spokesmen from the other side talk about how the revenues from oil and gas are shared, they never talk about it at the pump where the consumer pays for it. When a consumer pays $1 for gasoline at the pump, 22 cents goes to the federal treasury, 22 cents to the Ontario government, and 18 cents to the Alberta government. Those kinds of proportions are never mentioned. What they keep saying and various ministers keep repeating by rote, even though they know not what they are saying, is that the sharing formula is 45 per cent province, 45 per cent industry, and 10 per cent feds.

What price are they talking? That is the $16.75 which bears no relation to the market or the world price. They keep saying that in Texas the state government only gets something like 20 per cent, and Alberta is getting 45 per cent. The reality is that the state of Texas gets more per barrel of oil. I believe they get $6.50 where the province of Alberta gets $6.10. The state of Texas does not own the oil. It is privately owned.

What is the fair price that we should have? The minister has said many times that world prices have no relationship to reality. There are OPEC prices. Is that the real feeling? I refer hon. members to the November 22 edition of the Toronto Globe and Mail and an article by Hugh Anderson:

> Pressed to the wall in an argument, and speaking "for background" only, federal energy officials will concede that keeping the domestic price of Canadian oil far below the price of imported oil makes little economic sense. There is currently a difference of about $20 a barrel.

The policy can only be understood through the prism of national politics. As Edward Clark, an assistant deputy minister in the federal Energy Department and one of Energy Minister Marc Lalonde's most influential advisers, puts it: "If Canada were a unitary state, not a confederation, there would be no problem about going much closer to the world price."

What an admission. In essence the article is saying that this whole thing of pricing has nothing to do with pricing or saving consumer dollars, but instead it is revenue. What they are saying is that if Canada were a unitary state and if the oil belonged to the federal government, we would be paying the world price. That is what the chief adviser of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, Ed Clark, said when asked by a reporter. Yet the minister stands up in the House and has the audacity to say that the price which they are talking about is fair and reasonable based on the best advice and analysis of his officials. His officials have given the minister no such advice. His officials are described by Keith Spicer as "smug little ideologues in Lalonde's department".

What is a fair price? The Clark government and the Lougheed government agreed that eventually the price of oil and gas in Canada would reach 75 per cent of the world price. If we were at 75 per cent of the world price today—and the officials in the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources say that we should be—then the share ratio would be the following. Alberta would receive 23 per cent; the industry 23 per cent; and the federal government 53 per cent. The federal government would receive part of its share directly through taxes and the rest of it by virtue of policy which distributes the revenue to the consumers of the country. If the government is to be honest about the sharing of oil and gas revenues in this country, the formula is federal government 53 per cent, provincial government 23 per cent, and the industry 23 per cent.

If the government has any decency or integrity, it should try to be honest and stop repeating what is a blatant lie, the ratio of 45-45-10, which has no relationship to the truth. The dishonesty goes beyond that and extends into the national energy program which came down as part of the budget.

I see the minister responsible for the western development fund is present tonight. While we are on the subject of dishonesty, I would like to deal with the question of the $4 billion western development fund. I went through the budget fairly carefully, and there is only $2 billion in that fund, not $4 billion. It is a $2 billion fund spread over three years, and most of that $2 billion comes from existing programs. The minister's colleague, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin), has said that he will do away with the Crow rate and make up for it through funds from the $2 billion. The Crow rate contributes about $300 million a year to western Canada, and the Minister of Transport is going to make up for that out of the $2 billion western development fund. If one considers the Prince Rupert project, this $4 billion western development fund comes out to nothing at all. At most it is in the millions, and it is certainly not $4 billion. However, that does not prevent members of the government from standing up with no apparent embarrassment and talking about the $4-billion fund.

I see that the holier-than-thou man with the collar is nodding; he should go to confession.

The dishonesty of the government, when it talks about $4 billion in the western development fund which does not exist, and in this document, "The National Energy Program", is evident.

In this document the government says that there will be no export tax, but in the very next paragraph it says that it will tax sales to U.S. consumers at 30 cents per 1,000 cubic feet. If sales to U.S. consumers are not exports, then what are they? And if that is not a tax on exports, then what is it? On page 17 of this document Canada's policies are compared to the British policies and the government says how favourably it is treating the industry compared to the way the British government is treating the industry in the North Sea. But it does not mention that the North Sea rules were changed several months ago by Prime Minister Thatcher. Is that dishonesty? It is certainly not honesty.

Mr. Lalonde: Plus a 20 per cent tax yesterday.

Mr. Andre: It is certainly not honesty if one remembers what the government has already said.

There is another statement on page 17 which describes how important it is to deal with the question of foreign control, and that over the period 1975 to 1979 approximately $3.7 billion in capital flowed out of Canada to the United States. What the government neglects to mention is that more than half of it, or $2 billion, is attributable to Petro-Canada as a result of this government, and not foreign ownership in the industry. Is that honesty? It would certainly not be described as honesty by anybody I know and respect.

On page 27 of the document the government describes the world price on oil as being arbitrary and artificial. Yet the man who undoubtedly wrote this document, though the minister put his name to it, has said in a newspaper article which I quoted earlier, that in fact if we were a unitary state prices would be near world levels. The official is saying on the one hand in the article that our price should be at world levels, and on the other hand, in the political document he is saying that world price levels are artificial. When was this official being honest—when he was talking to the reporter or when he was writing this document for the minister?

On page 38 of "The National Energy Program," the government refers to the 8 per cent net revenue tax which is in fact a royalty because it is levied right at the wellhead. The government does not want to talk about royalties because it knows it will be challenged in the courts and that it would probably lose in court. The document goes on to say:

This tax . . . will produce a high marginal tax rate for firms that reinvest little of their cash flow.

It seems to imply that one would only pay that tax if one does not reinvest. As an official admitted to me in committee, one pays that tax whether or not one reinvests. It is a blatant distortion of the truth. Moreover, this tax is not 8 per cent. It is between 12 per cent and 24 per cent depending on the type of material one is producing, whether it be new oil, old oil, gas or what have you, and depending on the province in which it is produced. What is more interesting about that 8 per cent tax is that it is non-deductible for income tax purposes except, of course, if the company is a foreign multinational. A foreign multinational company can deduct that 8 per cent from the income of the parent company in the United States.

It is interesting that this great document which talks about Canadianization states that Canadian companies will not be able to deduct the 8 per cent royalty for income tax purposes, but that foreign companies may make the deduction. What genius dreamed that one up? It is absolutely absurd. It must have been the same genius who wrote this line, which is a dandy:

> While the Government of Canada is determined to increase Canadian ownership and control, it does not wish the result to be increased concentration of power in the hands of a few large . . . companies. Competition is the lifeblood of the industry, and the consumer's best protection. . . . Therefore, the government will be vigilant about ownership trends in the industry.

The government will ensure competition in the public sector by creating perhaps two or three additional companies. Here is the sentence:

> To ensure competition in the public sector, the government may establish one or more new Crown corporations to hold the assets acquired, rather than adding them all to Petro-Canada.

Is that not a dandy definition of competition? Instead of having just one Crown corporation at the minister's beck and call, he is going to have two or three and thereby have competition. There will be competition by having three toys to play with rather than one. If this were not so serious, it would be laughable.

On page 51 it says:

> Judging from the results achieved to date by Petro-Canada, it is also an effective way of encouraging the rapid energy development necessary to meet our security needs.

Petro-Canada has not found a drop of oil or a cubic foot of gas yet. How can we judge its tremendous success? Success in the gas and oil industry is judged by the gas and oil the industry finds. Petro-Canada has not found any. Petro-Canada does not have it yet, but it has negotiated with a German-owned and Liechtenstein-headquartered company to build a high rise office building in Calgary. Mind you, this is all in the interest of Canadian ownership. I suppose Petro-Canada got this contract from the Bermuda company which designed its new logo.

This Canadian ownership is really a great thing when exercised by this government. The litany goes on and on throughout this document. There is misinformation, blatant distortions and dishonest analyses of facts. I am not talking about prejudice or some interpretation. I am talking about blatant distortions which are totally contrary to what the officials who wrote this would say in another format.

The reality is that we are in a crisis. This country is in an energy crisis. We are not going to have enough oil to satisfy our needs within a few years. It is absolutely imperative that we resolve the disputes between the federal and provincial governments, reach an accord, and get on with making this country self-sufficient. That is absolutely imperative to this country. That means that there must be negotiations. The feds think they have the big club and that they can beat the provinces into submission. If that is their true feeling, they are making a very grievous and serious mistake because they will not succeed. They will do enormous damage to the country. They will do more damage than they have already done by taking that path, but they will not succeed in beating the provinces into submission.

The feds must sit down and negotiate. They must negotiate pricing, revenue sharing, and a strategy for future development of supplies for Canada. Canadians are basically a fair-minded people. I am talking about westerners and easterners. Easterners cannot help but think that westerners are greedy and selfish when the only information they get is the blatant lies put out by this minister and his colleagues who believe the things he is telling them. They cannot help but believe that westerners are greedy when they accept the figures of 45-45-10 as the revenue-sharing formula. How do they know any better? That is a distortion. It is a lie. They cannot help but think that Alberta is being very difficult and unwilling to negotiate if they are not aware of all the broken promises and lies of this government in the past.

By the same token, westerners cannot help being overly protective of their resources, given the history of those broken promises. They have waited 113 years for transportation policies which would look after their interests. They have been frustrated about the national policy of high tariffs. They now finally have a resource which is providing some income, and they will not sit idly by and allow this federal government, which has lied to them so often in the past, to seize that resource based on some promise that the federal government has their interests at heart.

If the federal government really wants westerners to believe it, it should stop lying about $4 billion development funds which are not $4 billion development funds. The government should stop lying about the 45-45-10 revenue-sharing formula, which is not true. It should stop trying to portray westerners as greedy and selfish and somehow less than real Canadians because they want to be able to protect their own futures. What Canadian does not want to protect his own future? What group of Canadians anywhere does not want to be able to prosper and grow with this country?

Western Canadians feel, with cause, that they do not have a federal government which can be trusted. I say with cause, because there is that record of broken promises. And how can that be changed? It can be changed by coming clean and by being honest. Perhaps that is too much to ask. I do not know. If it is too much to ask, I am afraid we are in for some very tumultuous months and years ahead. I hope it is not too big a change or too much to ask that the Government of Canada, which is a majority and which would like to be a national government, be honest, stop distorting the truth, stop putting out blatant pieces of propaganda, cancel public advertising strategies and their Orwellian concept and expose Canadians to the truth about energy prices, about revenue-sharing, and about regional distortions.

Western Canadians are quite ready to share with their fellow Canadians. Their commitment to this country is every bit as strong as that of anyone else, but they are not prepared to be lied to and stolen from. As long as the approach of the federal government continues to be lies and theft, I am afraid we will see a continuing growth of that very ugly mood which exists in the west today. It will be a cancerous type of growth which may eventually destroy its host.

I plead with hon. members opposite who have consciences to think about that for a while. I do not have access to their caucus, but I ask them for goodness sake not to tolerate being abused and misused. They should not tolerate receiving false information. They should demand honesty and integrity from their government, and perhaps the country will survive.

Mr. Waddell: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I wish to give the Chair and the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre) notice that I wish to reserve my right to raise a question of privilege in this House after I have read in Hansard the reference in the hon. member's speech to McCarthy and other remarks with reference to me. I just want to put that on the record.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, earlier today I had to make a very difficult decision not to provide a permit to the Stratford Board of Governors to allow an artistic director to come into Canada on the ground that I felt the board should engage in a more extensive search for a Canadian who could provide the kind of dramatic qualities of leadership required by that institution. After listening to and watching the previous speaker and taking into account the theatrics and histrionics we have observed, I feel that I have found a very likely candidate for that position.

Mr. Andre: Did that take you half an hour.

Mr. Axworthy: The only problem is that if the hon. member were hired as the artistic director, the entire season would be full of farce and comedy, and we would not have any other types of presentations. I would be more than happy to recommend the hon. member for an alternative occupation and employment. I know that he is busily doing that for his leader. I do not want too many Tories unemployed come February, so we will simply leave the hon. member in his present occupation, which he very honourably and nobly espouses, as the evangelist for the oil industry. Perhaps we could call him the parson for the petroleum companies, or the minister for the multinationals.

The hon. member opposite has obviously wound himself into a religious fervor, and unfortunately he exhibits the worst signs of people who get themselves involved in that kind of obsession. They become narrow-minded and unable to see the truth and where it really lies.

There is a play called "The Rainmaker". It is a story about an evangelical preacher down in the United States. It is said of him that he is so busy being right that he forgets what is good. I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that if there is any comment on or description of the debate we have heard from hon. members opposite in the Conservative party, we can certainly say that they are so busy being righteous that they forget what is good for Canada; they are so busy taking a stand on these kinds of rigid, narrow-minded arguments that they forget what we should be doing to try to plan for the future of this country in the decade ahead.

If you distil the arguments, if you clear away all the insults, character assassination, bombast and rhetoric, you come down to two simple propositions put forward by the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre), which is simply that the consumer should pay much higher prices and that the revenue should go to the provinces.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): That is not what he said at all, Lloyd. You were asleep again.

Mr. Axworthy: He simply said that the beneficiaries of an energy policy should be the provincial governments and their treasuries, and that the people who should pay those prices are the consumers. Basically, that is what the Tory energy policy is all about.

As the hon. member went through his litany of historical events he reminded me of the same person who wrote that new history book that the province of Alberta has just produced, which somehow avoids mention of our Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) as being the Prime Minister of this country. Somehow they find a selective filter through which they pass their ideology.

The hon. member forgets some facts of history, such as the OPEC countries which have been raising prices at astronomical, exponential rates since 1973. That did not come out in his account of history, Mr. Speaker. We did not hear about increases going from 10 per cent to 100 per cent, to 1,000 per cent, and to 2,000 per cent over the past five or six years. It seems that somehow all the energy problems were caused by the Liberal party and we were the authors of these horrible crises in the energy field. Somehow he forgot there is a world out there and that people were raising prices according to what their own position in the monopoly market would allow them to do. Well, he has lots of guts, that boy. He can really stand up to the heat. That really shows exactly why the Conservative party is over there and why we are here.

The fact of the matter is that Canadians do want a consistent energy policy which balances the interests of all Canadians, not just those who are in the oil patch in Calgary, but those who sit in the board rooms of Bay Street. They want an energy policy that is fair and equitable and that serves all individuals according to need and according to a fair proportion.

When the hon. member talks about the west he is talking about a very small minority of westerners. He is talking about the friends whom he sees at the Petroleum Club and the people who read the journals which talk about the great exodus out of Canada, the loss of jobs. He is not talking about the farmer in Alberta who, if members opposite had their way in the budget, would be paying $2,400 more a year by 1984 under the previous Tory plan than under our plan. If you talk to farmers in Alberta, Saskatchewan or Manitoba, who are also westerners, and ask them if they want to pay inflated oil prices, if they want to charge higher prices for their commodities and goods so that the consumer ends up paying more, they will tell you that they are not so sure about that.

You can talk to the consumer in western Canada who lives in Edmonton, Calgary, Winnipeg or Regina, who would be paying $500 more to put gas in his car or an extra $500 or $600 to heat his home. Those are westerners as well. They are not the kinds of westerners the hon. member was talking about, because he does not associate with them very much.

That is the kind of concern we had to bring to bear in establishing an energy policy. We had to take into account the fact that there were a lot of people in this country, whether they lived in the east or in the west, who could not afford the kinds of policies and programs which had been put forward in the previous budget.

We admit that it is not easy to get an agreement with the provinces. We are not saying there is a magic wand or an instant solution which will provide the great agreement which hon. members opposite want. I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, there is an easy way. We could surrender, we could appease, we could give in. But if we were to defend the interests of the entire country and of all those who live in it, then there would not be an easy way to do it.

I was a little surprised at the history lesson we received from the hon. member for Calgary Centre. He made it sound as if this were the great Armageddon of federalism, as if somehow what has been transacting in this country over the past few months is a one and only event. He made it appear as if the great, glorious provincial leaders were standing up to the federal government which, as he says, has been dealing in deceit and dishonesty. He is not a very good student of history, because the history of this country is one of constant conflict, tension, certainly a whole series of disputes between federal and provincial governments, disputes from one region of Canada to the next.

I was reading some debates on the unemployment insurance bill back in about 1939 or 1940, and I came across some comments from a provincial premier who said:

> It is clear to me that with the western provinces hopelessly bankrupt, any national scheme of unemployment insurance will have to be borne by the two central provinces and if unemployment insurance is necessary it would probably be best to run our own show.

He went on to say that he was opposed to the federal government providing any assistance to the western provinces which were totally bankrupt at that time. That was Mitch Hepburn, the Premier of Ontario. This sounds very familiar when we compare it to some of the statements we hear from some premiers today. Different regions, different provinces—same philosophy. They say, "We have ours, we will keep it, we will not share it". But fortunately, in 1939 and 1940 the federal government had the courage to bring in an insurance scheme to cover unemployment right across Canada, to make sure that there was fair sharing of benefits and to make sure that people in the central provinces paid more than they gained to make sure that the regions in the maritimes and in the west would get economic security.

I would suggest to hon. members opposite that they go back and read those debates on the Unemployment Insurance Act of 1940. What is interesting is that the very same party which is now claiming this great history of dishonesty by the federal government was saying the same things then. The arguments have not changed 40 years later. The same thing is true now, "Let us defend the provinces, let us not have the federal government impose its will, let us not share the wealth, let us not provide benefits". You would think that after 40 years they could update their act. The point is that this party throughout history has always recognized the fundamental fact of confederation, that there must be a sharing of benefits.

Mr. McKinnon: It was King who said "Let's not give them a nickel."

Mr. Axworthy: Do you know what we should do? We should take a look at the figures as they now appear. There has been a certain kind of mythology around that this new energy policy will bankrupt Alberta, that somehow the people of Alberta, who have worked hard and are good citizens, will be impoverished by this national energy policy. Yet when I look at the numbers and figure them out by the same calculations that hon. members opposite have used, I find that the per capita revenue by 1984 will be $4,000 per person in the province of Alberta on resources alone. Compare that with my own province of Manitoba which will get $22 per person from resource revenues. It seems to me that when you look at both the $4,000 and the $22, you have to conclude that there is a certain economic disparity at work. So there has to be some mechanism of sharing and evening out that disparity, some way of providing a balance between the two so that one province does not have to raise its income, corporate or sales taxes to extraordinary levels simply to try to achieve a level of services equal to that in a province which has all the wealth.

All we are trying to do is to say that the responsibility of the federal government in this day and age is to provide for some balancing, some sharing, so there are not those hills and valleys of economic wealth and economic disparity.

● (2050)

Mr. Axworthy: Also it is true to say that the other responsibility of a federal government is to ensure some degree of balance between public and private activity in the country. My party is committed to private enterprise. We support and give incentives to small and large businessmen to produce and create jobs, but we are also committed to a basic fundamental principle that there must be some degree of ownership, control, and management within our own country.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Do you have criteria?

Mr. Axworthy: Yes, I do, that 90 per cent of the oil industry should not be owned by foreigners. That is the criteria I start with. I do not believe that with a valuable, essential resource like energy we can afford to have decisions made by people outside the country.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): No one is arguing with that. Tell us about your criteria.

Mr. Axworthy: I believe the government must be able to establish certain rules and to have a certain degree of accountability to its citizens, whether corporate or private. But we have no reach to Pittsburgh, Dallas or Houston. We are simply vulnerable to those decisions. We are trying to establish some rules which will give some certainty to private industry, at the same time providing some incentive for Canadian owners and managers to create wealth in the country and to be accountable to their own elected representatives.

The hon. member for Calgary Centre spent a great deal of time, to the amusement of his colleagues, scorning the activities of PetroCan. Yet he ignored one very fundamental consequence of the development of PetroCan in Calgary itself. Because of PetroCan, and the legislation brought in by Mr. Macdonald, Mr. Turner and Mr. Gillespie, we gave an enormous incentive boost to private Canadian operators to become active in the oil industry. It was Petro-Canada that took a bunch of small oil companies, and by allowing them to become a consortium and to get access to Crown land, they for the first time were able to get into the exploration and development field, a field which had been dominated by multinationals up to that point in time.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Will the hon. minister accept a question?

Mr. Axworthy: Certainly.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): The minister indicated that he was concerned about 90 per cent foreign ownership in the oil industry. That concern is shared by all Canadians. Would the hon. gentleman tell us how that occurred over the last 13 years? Who was in government when that occurred? Why was it allowed to occur? Has the government explored other ways, in addition to the ways the minister described, in which that may be alleviated?

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Speaker, I would be very happy to try to provide an alternative history lesson to the one the member received from his honourable colleague. We are talking about a major change in the nature and composition of the oil industry beginning with the OPEC prices of 1973. At that point in time we met a turning point in our history and in the history of the world. All of a sudden we were creating vast windfall revenues and enormous economic grants that had no relationship to cost of production or development, but were simply created artificially by the decision of a group of governments which had the ability to command and control the world market. Once that began to take place, enormous power was given to those who were acquiring the wealth.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Did you see that coming over 13 years?

Mr. Axworthy: No one saw it coming. I mean, I would like to think we were all born in possession of crystal balls. I do not make any claim to prescience and foresight. We simply said that we had to react to events, like the Japanese, the Germans and the Americans did. I do not want to be unkind, but I suppose I could say to the hon. member opposite that if his crystal ball was so good, he might have avoided December 13 more effectively than he did.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Will the hon. minister permit another question?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please.

Mr. Axworthy: I have tried to answer the member's first question. I would like to be allowed to continue. If there is time left, certainly I would be prepared to consider it.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): I thought you had forgotten what the question was.

Mr. Axworthy: The fact of the matter is that we have gone through a major change, and it was this government which brought in Petro-Canada as an alternative based upon its energy policy of 1974 and 1975. We are simply saying now, as the industry grows and expands, that we want to ensure a balance between the public and private sectors.

One important result of the establishment of Petro-Canada was the incentive it gave to the private, small, independent Canadian oil and gas industry in Alberta. That is a part of history which is conveniently forgotten by members opposite, by Mr. Lougheed and by members of the oil industry. They were given incentives, they were given assistance to develop and expand their operations, but now the time has come where we must take another look at changing conditions. Perhaps that is one of the things which makes us different from members opposite.

We are prepared to change policies and programs as conditions change. We do not etch them in stone and keep them there for 40 years simply because it is the Conservative way of doing things. We are prepared to respond if something happens. Also we are prepared to admit mistakes and to say that as the world around us changes, and as our own country changes, we must have the flexibility to respond.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): You have a lot of mistakes to admit.

Mr. Axworthy: With the Petroleum Administration Act we are simply trying to say that the conditions have changed, and we need to provide for a different regime of government to set prices and to provide a different order of incentives. If they do not work effectively, we are prepared to react, respond, consult, and make changes again if necessary. There is nothing frozen, static or reactionary about this side. I believe that is why we have been here so long and hon. members opposite have been there for so long. Canadian people want a government which is responsive and flexible, not one which is reactionary and rigid.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): You will never be leader, Lloyd.

Mr. Axworthy: Let me deal with another mythology which has grown up in the House, that somehow the changes under the national energy program will have enormous economic "drags" upon the economy of Alberta. The hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Hawkes), the hon. member with the Ph.D., and the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Thomson) rise in the House and say that the companies are leaving in droves.

An hon. Member: They are.

Mr. Axworthy: I looked at a report in The Globe and Mail which indicated that there was a cutback in oil drilling, but I should like to point out that the article appeared three days before the budget. It was based far more on the fact that now there is a surplus of natural gas, and it had nothing to do with the national energy program. If hon. members opposite accuse us of being somewhat loose with the truth, they should read that Globe and Mail article which appeared before our budget. It simply pointed out that, because of the surplus, oil rigs had to look for alternative markets.

In the national energy program we are responding to that very problem by setting up a natural gas bank, so that we can buy surplus gas and therefore provide more incentive for the continuation of exploration and development in the market. I have not heard members opposite talk about that good measure. It is an incentive to Canadian companies, it is an incentive to keep them working. I have not heard them talk about that, yet it is part of the national energy program. Nor have I heard them talk about the major incentives given to consumers to convert from oil to natural gas, which is an energy supply that we have in large surplus, in order to ease the burden upon our oil. One of the fallacies of the hon. member for Calgary South is that he assumes that our only energy source is oil. We are saying that we are energy rich as a country. We have oil, gas, coal, biomass, solar, propane, methane and all other kinds of energy sources. Surely the trick to having a proper energy policy is to ensure that we utilize all kinds and forms of energy, particularly those in which we have a major advantage.

So, an underlying and important thrust of our program and policy was to provide for conversion to natural gas. In fact, we can follow the linkage backwards. It would give private companies engaged in the exploration and development of oil and gas a further incentive to go forward and find new sources. So, Mr. Speaker, I must disagree when we are charged with ignoring the interests of the private sector. In fact, we are providing a wide range of incentives in those areas. We do not apologize for the fact that we are giving more incentives to Canadian companies than to the multinationals. We believe in equity and we do believe in balance.

I would like to deal with another topic which has caused me some concern over the last two or three weeks. It is the argument being made that the mistrust of western Canada is all due to the federal government. There is a deliberate, and I would say malicious, attempt to build the case that there would not be grievances or calls for separatism in the west if we did not have the Liberals around. The argument is that the Conservatives would solve all these problems. I take issue with people who say that having a Conservative government on this side would immediately result in an energy agreement with the western provinces. I can recall the former minister of finance, the minister for flabbergab, walking into this House and putting a budget on the table without having an energy agreement with the province of Alberta. He did not have an agreement right up to the end when they were in Edmonton trying to get a bargain out of Mr. Lougheed. What happened at that time was this: Mr. Lougheed kept upping the ante as each hour went by. He was putting more chips on the table. There was no agreement.

Furthermore, I suggest it is wrong to start setting region against region, to deliberately set one group of people against their national government. That is a trick the leader of that party must be very careful about. I know what his occupation is. I know what his obsession is. It has nothing to do with an energy policy. It has nothing to do with the constitution. What it does concern is keeping himself in that front seat. He is a politician and, as such, I will grant him the right to do that. But I suggest at times he steps over the margin. There are times when he stretches the point, when he begins to create the self-fulfilling prophecy of "don't believe in Ottawa, your national government, because they are not working in your interests." We are trying to work in the interests of western Canada. Not all western Canadians would agree with that, and maybe not the kind of industrial group the member from Calgary represents. They do not agree with that. There are a great many people in western Canada who are prepared to give us a chance, to see what we are prepared to offer. Members opposite have made light of the western development fund. We are not talking about a fund, Mr. Speaker. We are talking about an economic and industrial strategy for western Canada, taking into account major changes now occurring in the west. There is no doubt that western Canada is setting a political, social and economic agenda for the rest of Canada right now. They are the dynamo driving the economy. It is an area of primary importance, both nationally and internationally. It is a region for which the time has come in terms of its economic significance. We are trying to put in place a policy for our government which will respond to those changes, one which will respond to the new economic significance of the west. The western development fund is only one part of that, simply to make revenues available to provide for additional initiatives and projects. We believe that reorienting the outlook of the entire federal structure, is necessary. Similarly the outlook of the provincial governments and the outlook of the private sector must be reoriented. How do we ensure the tremendous potential which is looming in western Canada in the areas of employment, new investment and new resources? We are thinking of means by which they can be properly capitalized and used for the benefit not only of westerners but of all Canadians. It is our objective to say, in the light of this new resource boom that this is the time and here is the chance to do what westerners have always wanted to do, which is to diversify and mature their economy, not to have it based solely upon resources but to bring industry and technology into the west. Our thought is to provide for a whole new industrial base which will not work solely for the interests of the west, though that will certainly be of prime importance, but will be of benefit to the entire country, multiplying its benefits from one end of Canada to the other. That is what we are after.

Mr. Speaker, I think this should be the objective shared by all members of this House. Rather than taking cheap shots and making premature judgments, trying to stomp something into the ground, they should be trying to help us. They should be making recommendations and proposals we could use. We are a government. We have to make decisions. In doing so we are also prepared to listen to members of the opposition who come forward with constructive and positive proposals of how we can take advantage of a new resource boom in western Canada and use it to develop a richer, broader, more varied economy in that region. It does mean investing in new transportation facilities. It does mean putting new rail lines in to carry potash, coal and grain to markets. It does mean investing in new industrial locations. It means ensuring that the productivity of the soil is maintained and enhanced. There are a number of options and opportunities open to us in the west. All we are saying, as the federal government, is that we would like to use some of the revenues which come out of our resources to recycle something back into that economic plan for the benefit of western Canadians. I find it hard to accept that such a plan should be the subject of the kind of criticism which journalists, editorialists, provincial premiers or members like the one from Calgary South express, which is so negative, blind and narrow that they would not give us a chance to put that kind of a program in place. We think a national government should have some role in that economic plan of development, not just a provincial premier or one provincial government. That is the difference between us. We feel that by putting that kind of economic plan into operation we can share the benefits among all.

The debate we are engaged in today is a good one and it is useful but I think it is time we gathered away from the wailing wall, stopped the gnashing of teeth and the tearing of hair, stopped the negativism we see here and started looking at what a national energy policy can do for western Canada. We should be looking at what western Canada can do for the rest of the country. If we can bring ourselves to that kind of action, then I think we will have a much more positive debate.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lorne McCuish (Prince George-Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, before I address myself to the motion before the House I would like to say most sincerely that it is, indeed, an honour for me to rise and contribute to this debate. It is fair to say that I am somewhat at a disadvantage here, Mr. Speaker, because you are so calm and relaxed and I am so much afraid. one emotion which I do have stronger than the fear I demonstrate is that of pride. I take pride in the fact that I am here, that I am a backbencher. In that one way, as a backbencher, there is only one way for me to go—down. I take pride in the fact that I am a Progressive Conservative and that I can call these men my colleagues—seven at last count. More important, I take pride in the fact that I have been chosen by the people of Prince George-Bulkley Valley to represent them in this, the House of Commons, and to speak on their behalf.

Although I take pleasure in contributing to this debate, I feel somewhat saddened by the fact that there is the need for it. I am saddened because we are in the midst of a debate on an issue which allows the federal government, under the Petroleum Administration Act, to unilaterally set the price of oil and natural gas.

Due to the federal government's inability to secure a lasting agreement with Alberta on a pricing scheme, they now propose to act alone without regard to, or respect for, their partners in confederation—the provinces. They have acted on clauses 36 and 52 of the act. This, to me, is tantamount to the other guillotine measures they have adopted during this brief session of the Thirty-second Parliament. A feeling of despair increases because the federal government is once again, demonstrating its disregard for western Canada, that part of our confederation which undoubtedly holds the key for future economic stability and security through its natural resources.

Now we find ourselves debating a section which allows the Government of Canada the right to overrule the provinces. This is a debate which should never have taken place.

I should like to emphasis the point made by the hon. member for Etobicoke Centre (Mr. Wilson). He stated that in December, 1979, our government was able to reach an agreement with the government of Alberta after tough, protracted and difficult negotiations. But we were able to reach an agreement. Our agreement was but a signature away from being final. Therefore, I find it hard to believe the present government would fail to come to an agreement with the government of Alberta, particularly as the Liberal government had promised the Canadian people a made-in-Canada energy package.

We, in British Columbia, want to negotiate a fair price for energy, one that will be fair to all Canadians. The provisions of the Petroleum Administration Act, the two sections which are under debate, should only be used when all else fails.

On this side of the House we do not dispute the need to implement that provision if—and let me emphasize the word "if"—there have been sufficient negotiations between the two levels of government. The Alberta energy minister has invited the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) to return to the negotiation table with the hope of securing agreement. Ignoring this invitation, the minister has arbitrarily opted to reject the invitation and to invoke sections 36 and 52 of this act. In my opinion, this is not the Canadian way of doing things and that is what I abhor about this whole ghastly mess.

The impact of the energy program put forth by the minister will not only affect the west, but it will have a grave and dangerous impact on the whole of the country. The Canadian consumer is being asked to contribute more money to the federal coffers than it was under the Crosbie budget of 1979. Within the next four years, Canadians will be paying over $1 a gallon more for gas. By the end of 1983 the cost of energy will be between $300 and $600 a year more than it would have been under the Crosbie budget.

When one looks at the record of the present government, we see a government living in a dream world, over which it maintains complete supremacy. This government has refused to negotiate with the producing provinces for an oil agreement. Instead it is acting unilaterally. The same government also refused to debate the constitution, the most fundamental law of this land. It proposes to act unilaterally through its resolution. Since this government took office, it has totally ignored the people and the views of the people who put them there. Why do we have a government which does not listen to the people it governs?

I would like to take a few moments to reflect upon some of the expressed concerns of western Canadians. I feel it is important to this debate, especially when we are considering legislation which will have a major effect on all Canadians today, and for generations to come.

The constituents of Prince George-Bulkley Valley have sent me to Ottawa for a very clear reason. As I said earlier, I am here as their representative and as their spokesman in Parliament. Therefore, I intend to express their concerns with regard to this debate. The issue relates directly to my constituents. It also relates to the continuing feeling of alienation and frustration in western Canada. Reports in the press, items on television and political leaders from all levels of government have all stated that the west is not understood. We hear that central Canada does not understand western Canada. Why do we hear about this alienation? My constituents in Prince George-Bulkley Valley want me to express the reasons. I intend to do so in this House, in this, the greatest institution known to Canadians.

Western Canadians are tired of subsidizing the price of fuel for industry in Quebec and Ontario. They are tired because they already pay top dollars for central Canada's products. They are tired of living with the fact that the Government of Canada has set measures to protect the textile industry. The government makes it difficult for westerners to buy the less expensive goods from Pacific rim nations. Westerners are tired of the fact that the federal government has shown little presence in western Canada. The government has paid lip service to the needs of western Canadians with no solid effort to create continuity and fairness for the western economy. Westerners are tired of paying 1.6 times the western world price for consumer goods because of the barriers put up to protect industries established in Ontario and Quebec.

Western Canadians are not fooled by the federal government's propaganda of Canadianizing the oil industry. They know that the government will turn the notion of Canadianization into nationalization. Is the term "nationalization" not directly related to socialism? Of course, it is. The frustration of the west has led the government to encourage ministerial visits to western Canada by ministers of the Crown. They say they sense a concern that all is not well. Let me assure this House that all is not well.

The result of the last election proves that western Canada does not agree with Liberal philosophies. An editorial by the Vancouver Board of Trade states:

> If the west is to be treated as something more than an obstinate child and if we are to be taken seriously as a mature member of this nation, we must speak up and state our case. Murmurings of western separation, conceived in resentment and nurtured by alienation, must not be allowed to grow.

To give this message, Mr. Speaker, is why the people of Prince George-Bulkley Valley have sent me here. Is it any wonder that western Canadians feel a sense of continued frustration when the federal government reaches into their pockets by forcing a massive federal tax grab on the industry that assures them of their future? The government has not only stifled our input into the constitution but has forbidden us the right to sit down and negotiate with our partners in confederation, namely, the provinces.

We want input into the future of our nation, and when we seek it, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) calls us hysterical. To give this message is why I have been sent here.

Western Canadians do not and will not accept the government's unilateral attempts to control our lives. I am at a loss to understand why the federal government has put Canada on a path toward a unitary state. It may not be the government's immediate intention, but its actions during this Thirty-second Parliament certainly lead me to believe that it does not hold the view that the provinces' rights should be upheld or that the provinces are, in fact, its equal partners in confederation.

We must ask ourselves the question: Are there other areas in which the government intends to act unilaterally? Its arbitrary decision to change unilaterally the most important law in the land without consultation with interest groups, notably native groups, women's groups, organized labour and even elected representatives of the people, leaves me with a sense of despair and frustration. Because the government intends to act unilaterally to attempt a take-over of one of the most important industries in Canada I am left with a greater sense of despair and frustration. The government has most clearly implied the belief that nationalization or, if you will, socialism, is better for us than a system based on free enterprise. What will happen next? On what industry will the government of Canada next implement its so-called Canadianization scheme? Will it take over British Columbia's forest industry, the single most important industry to my province and, indeed, to all of Canada? Following the route upon which they have now embarked, I see very clear signs of something of that nature in store for British Columbians, other western Canadians and all of Canada.

I stand here to make an appeal on behalf of my constituents and all British Columbians who wish to see an end to frustration. I hope the government will recognize the serious implications of the measure for which they seek approval. The policy adopted by the federal government states that there is a desire to secure supply and ensure energy stability in an unstable energy world. Is energy security increased by the cancellation of the Cold Lake project or the cutback in exploration by Canadian independents? Is it secure when today in a small community, Grande Prairie, Alberta, of four Canadian petroleum companies, one reports a 40 per cent lay-off, the second a 95 per cent lay-off, the third a 75 per cent lay-off and the fourth a 100 per cent lay-off?

Exploration budgets are being cut. This is reported daily. Drill rigs are moving to the United States, and history tells us they will not come back. The government is prepared to allocate money to Saudi Arabia, but not to its own partners in confederation. This confuses me. I wonder what is happening on the government side when such terrible situations face the Canadian public.

Canadian independent oil companies have been hit extremely hard by the recent budget, particularly through the 8 per cent de facto royalty. The Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen), with his energy package, has made it possible for Canadian companies to make more money in the United States than in Canada. Canadians are being asked to pay huge increases in prices for over-all energy use. The government will reap the benefits of this, not the people of Canada.

The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources in his opening statement on the national energy program said:

> We must not let our energy strength become a source of internal weakness. Most Canadians are aware of the strains created within the federation by domestic energy pricing and revenue-sharing issues.

If he is aware of this situation, I would ask the minister why his leader is prepared to put Canadian dollars in foreign economies. Why will the government not invest its oil dollars in Canadian oil? If he does not want our energy strength to become a source of internal weakness, why is the federal government not prepared to negotiate a fair pricing system with the producing provinces to see that our energy strength does not cause further internal weakness?

This minister has also stated that the outlook for the next decade is not encouraging. Well, I must agree with him on that point because, with his attitude, and the attitude of the government of which he is a part, our future is not encouraging. Our energy richness should strengthen our nation, but the government has weakened our nation with its unilateral and autocratic actions.

We are an energy-rich nation, with new technological techniques being introduced daily. Canada can become a world leader in oil production and refining. Look at a cross-section of the whole Canadian scene. We have capacity and the capability to produce enough oil and natural gas to supply all of the western world, if there were co-operation between all levels of government. We have an agricultural industry second to none, an industry that can feed the nations of the world. We have a forest industry which, with proper control, will serve Canadians for generations to come. Canada has the potential to be one of the strongest economic forces in the modern world. With so much potential, why are we wallowing in the morass of this debate? If the past Liberal governments had effectively planned an energy strategy, we would not be in this position today.

This brings me to a point the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) was making earlier when giving this House a history lesson. He was expounding on the wonderful programs the Liberal party had introduced and carried out with regard to unemployment insurance. I wonder if he recalls Mr. Diefenbaker's roads to resources program and the fact that a Liberal Government decided against continuing it? Will he admit, as he indeed should, that if the Government of Canada had continued with that program, our northern area would now be open and perhaps we would not need his precious unemployment insurance programs.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McCuish: The Clark government was committed to an energy policy that would bring Canada to a position of energy self-sufficiency by 1990. Our policy was right, and I truly believe that many members opposite have realized as much by proceeding with a number of our measures.

I have spoken about internal problems within the government's energy proposals and their inability to come to grips with the real solutions that lie before it. Colin Beale stated in a newsletter he published in Vancouver:

> If Prime Minister Trudeau goes ahead with his plan to nationalize one or more of the U.S. oil companies now operating in Canada—
> Some New York analysts call it confiscation.
> —how do you think Reagan would react? He might just retaliate with some sort of bite out of our lumber market hide... And what would it mean for our industry if Reagan opens up some of the U.S. national forests to the domestic lumber industry?

Every time I see measures such as this imposed by the government, I wonder what they will take their next run at and where it will all end. Frankly it scares me.

The reaction from Canadian industry itself proves that the government has proceeded on a misguided course of destruction. The president of Paramount Resources Ltd., a Canadian oil company, states in a letter:

> On October 28, 1980, the Government of Canada saw fit to confiscate 25 per cent of the interest we have earned, and paid for at great expense, with no restitution or compensation whatever . . . If Paramount was a foreign corporation, we might be enraged. As a Canadian company, I can find no words to describe the rape and plunder the Canadian government has perpetrated on our company. The government has effectively deprived Paramount of all possible profit in the future.

I quote from another letter to the Prime Minister, this time from a resident of Alberta:

> I am still in a state of shock and disbelief that a Canadian government can propose such complete control over a given industry, amounting to de facto nationalization, as our current federal government has done with its national energy program and related budget proposals.

● (2130)

When opposition from such a great multitude arises to any initiative, then no matter which government has conceived it, a second look should be taken to determine whether the measure proposed is really good for the country. First we saw the official opposition oppose the government's energy policies—and we still oppose them. Then we saw the western producing provinces, represented by all parties, oppose the government's energy proposals. And now we see industry and private citizens from all parts of the nation opposing them. Should this not tell the government something?

It frightens me to think of the future directions this government might take. To further state my case, I quote from yet another letter written by a western Canadian to Liberal MPs. This person expresses his deep regret regarding the government's energy proposals, and he states:

> I am mad and saddened by what you have done and are doing to Canada. First, I do not think that you have properly assessed the rage of western Canadians regarding, inter alia, the budget, your energy policy and the constitution. Secondly, the discriminatory manner in which you have attacked the west and the oil industry assures me that Canada cannot become self-sufficient in oil in the foreseeable future.

I believe opposition to the government's energy policy is widespread and completely clear and that everybody in Canada recognizes this fact except the Liberal government. When I look at the direction the government is taking, I find myself past the feeling of frustration—I am sick and I am saddened because the federal government's actions will be sorely felt by every Canadian.

There is a famous saying which quite appropriately suits the Government of Canada at this time, and it is, "Forgive them Lord, for they know not what they do". Yet, I firmly believe that the government does know what it is doing. I believe it knows, as I do, that it is destroying this institution through its motion of closure and is destroying any sense of national unity by ignoring western Canada. It is attempting to destroy free enterprise in this country by taking over the oil industry. Most important, it is refusing to listen to the views of the people it is supposed to represent as a national government. I am truly saddened.

The Liberals can still turn things around if they wish. The government can still move away from the dangerous path it is on if it realizes that for us to continue as a strong, independent nation, the foreground must be the people with the government in the background. Big government and the massive tax dollar will not make a country work.

Mr. Roy MacLaren (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, a number of previous participants in this debate have referred to the fact that Canada holds a special position in this energy-sensitive world. Our resources in oil, natural gas, coal, and uranium are envied throughout the world. Unlike most of our industrial partners and competitors, we remain a net exporter of energy.

Just as Canada holds a special position in the world, the petroleum industry holds a special position in the Canadian economy. It produces a commodity of unrivalled and pervasive importance. No industry has undergone or is undergoing more rapid growth. The energy industry underpins and dominates our economic strategy. However, despite Canada's position of strength there is, however, reason for some concern. While Canada is energy self-sufficient, it is not oil self-sufficient. Oil currently provides about 40 per cent of our energy needs. But for every four barrels of oil that we consume in Canada, one must be imported from a foreign country.

The supply of oil from foreign sources cannot be relied upon. The outlook in the Middle East is unpromising. The Iranian-Iraqi war has affected the supply of oil to many countries. Some have warned that supplies may be insufficient to meet future demand. After the confused and contradictory policies of the previous Conservative government, which greatly offended a number of our friends in the Middle East, the Prime Minister's recent tour has done much to retrieve our reputation there. However, to establish a truly independent Canadian foreign policy, we must have an independent Canadian energy policy. After all, foreign oil is expensive oil, and unless we act now we will have to buy more of it. The world price will continue to be unsteady, erratic and unpredictable.

For that reason, among others, the government has proclaimed a goal of oil independence for Canada. In this we have asked for the support of all Canadians. We expect to become self-sufficient in oil within ten years. And in reaching this goal we believe that Canadian consumers would prefer to pay Canadian prices, not prices set by cartels elsewhere. We believe that Canadians will accept the need to support both at the gas pumps and as taxpayers, Canadian production—not foreign development.

How do we eliminate the foreign barrel of oil? The national energy program provides the answer. First, by encouraging more exploration and development in Canada, we can replace foreign oil with Canadian oil. We have set aside over $300 million so that we may use our oil more efficiently. A second approach is to substitute other more plentiful energy found in Canada for foreign oil. We have allocated $1.6 billion for our off-oil program. Our third approach is to restrain the total demand for oil through a major effort at conservation, for which we have provided over $1 billion in federal funding. Finally, to provide for our more secure energy future, there is $75 million for the promotion of renewable energies and almost $300 million for energy research and development.

Both opposition parties are aware of the dangers of relying on foreign oil, but the previous government seemed to remain unaware of the dangers of relying on foreign-controlled oil companies. While many other nations moved to form state oil companies, the Conservative government tried to strip Petro-Canada of its assets or to abolish its leading role in our energy future. Public outcry, fortunately, forced them to reconsider their position. After all, without Petro-Canada all of the top ten oil and gas companies in Canada would be still foreign controlled today. Petro-Canada is the one exception.

Not only were the Conservatives moving in opposition to the practice of other countries, they were also incapable of learning from the provinces themselves. Several provinces, including Alberta, Ontario, Quebec and Saskatchewan—two of which have Conservative governments—have themselves established state corporations with a mandate in oil and gas to complement the developments of a yet more dynamic private sector. These governments are committed to using these provincially-owned corporations to shape their regional economic development.

The government is pursuing the same policy and applying it for the benefit of all Canadians. Until now Petro-Canada has been the major agent of Canadianization. Yet Petro-Canada earns only about 5 per cent of the total revenue from the production of petroleum in Canada. Even if this were to double or triple in time, it would still represent only a small share of the total Canadian petroleum market.

Accordingly, the national energy program provides special encouragement to private Canadian oil and gas companies. They are big enough to do the job. Canadian entrepreneurs are at least as bold as foreign managers. Canadian investors are as sophisticated as foreign investors. The public sector will in no way overwhelm the private sector. There will be no government monopoly. The old system of tax incentives, which will be phased out—a policy to which the previous government was also committed in the case of super-depletion—tended to favour big oil companies which are foreign controlled. The profits of Canadian companies have typically been smaller. Since the incentives of the past were in the form of write-offs against profits, the Canadian companies received less support and encouragement from their government than foreign companies.

As a consequence, Canadian companies have frequently been outbid in certain essential aspects of the industry, such as land auctions, farm-ins, and takeovers. As the 1979 petroleum monitoring survey indicated, the petroleum industry in Canada spent still more of its dollars on activities and acquisitions outside the energy sector. This applies particularly to the big integrated companies which spent about 7 per cent of their capital investment on sectors unrelated to energy. This use of revenue contributes nothing to the development of Canada's energy potential. We are not responsible for providing foreign-controlled firms with the capital to acquire Canadian firms.

To what other purposes have foreign-controlled companies put Canadian tax dollars and the dollars of Canadian consumers? In the last four years alone, capital exports in the form of dividend and interest payments and the return of capital exceeded imports by $3.7 billion. It simply does not make sense for Canadians to accelerate the development of their own petroleum resources and at the same time see the bulk of the profits and many of the jobs and industrial benefits go to other countries.

That is why Canadianization of the petroleum industry is a fundamental part of our new energy program, a program not designed to drive out foreign investors but simply to make sure that Canadians control at least half of their own industry. We shall not be a resource colony for the United States, Europe, Japan or anybody else.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacLaren: The new system of incentives and allowances outlined in the program will stimulate the petroleum industry to ensure that our target of energy independence by 1990 is fully met. These incentives are available to the industry, with special benefits for Canadian-owned and controlled companies. If foreign companies wish to increase opportunities for Canadians to participate in their particular activities, our government will certainly reward such efforts.

Both Canadian and foreign-controlled companies in the northern territories and offshore—on the so-called "Canada lands"—are eligible to receive depletion allowances at a rate of one-third of exploration expenses. This same rate also applies to all companies for non-conventional and tertiary oil projects and to crude oil upgraders. In addition to such measures, Canadian-controlled companies with at least half Canadian ownership will be eligible for grants which will cover 15 per cent of exploration costs on provincial lands and one-half on Canada lands. Companies with Canadian control and more than three-quarters Canadian ownership will be eligible for grants of 35 per cent on provincial lands and 80 per cent on Canada lands. For development costs, grants of 10 per cent and 20 per cent respectively will apply to Canadian companies for expenditures in non-conventional, tertiary and upgrading projects.

Let me pause for a moment to illustrate these incentives with an example. For one dollar spent, the net cost of exploration on provincial lands by Canadian-controlled companies with more than 75 per cent Canadian ownership would be only 31 cents—that is after tax and after incentive costs and assuming a 47 per cent tax rate. For an individual Canadian investor in the 40 per cent tax bracket, the cost would be 39 cents. The comparable figures for Canada lands would be only seven cents for a Canadian company and 12 cents for the individual.

The petroleum monitoring agency is about to release a paper defining Canadian ownership and control for discussion with the private sector, which will elucidate more details in this area.

The oil industry in Canada and, indeed, elsewhere is fiercely independent, and taxes are never popular, but to provide the national government with necessary revenue there will be increases in the taxation of the petroleum industry. Our government believes that the companies which benefit directly, the companies whose profits rose 54 per cent, to $4.7 billion, last year alone can be asked to contribute to this national interest.

The opposition has attacked our Canadianization initiatives. Hon. members opposite have cried, "nationalization, confiscation, expropriation". Their wailing is pure desperation. They cannot attack our energy program, so they attack another supposed program which simply does not exist. Certainly we intend to purchase a major foreign-controlled oil company, but we will pay fair market value for it. Despite such acquisitions, Petro-Canada will not have more than a limited share in the total Canadian market. Within ten years, the cash flow of the private sector in the Canadian petroleum industry is estimated to increase four times.

Canadian-controlled petroleum companies will form an even more prosperous industry than today. Among the small Canadian firms there are many potential candidates to lead the industry into the 1990s, buoyed by our incentives. Canadians will be major shareholders in many more firms. That is not nationalization; that is Canadianization.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lalonde: Tories don't know the difference.

Mr. MacLaren: On Canada lands, the lands in the north and offshore, lands which the federal government holds in trust for the people of Canada, the federal government will pay one-quarter of exploration costs. This will offset the 25 per cent Crown interest. Depending upon the level of Canadian ownership of the companies, companies will be eligible to receive the additional benefits which I have already noted. How can the government expropriate lands which it already holds?

As others have noted, we have not moved as far as Britain, where the Crown had first claim of a 51 per cent share of North Sea production. Having obtained the benefits of that particular policy, the British government has now replaced it with a higher taxation level in order to obtain a greater proportion of petroleum revenue.

We have not moved as far as Norway, where its state oil company takes up to 50 per cent in every field and has an option to increase its interest to 70 per cent. We have not moved as far as Australia, where foreign oil companies must have one-quarter of their equity owned by Australians—and they must pledge to increase this to more than one half, and a majority of their directors must be Australian. No, in Canada we have moved cautiously, we have moved with moderation but we are moving with determination.

Let us look at our policy as it will be reviewed in 1990. With our dual program of conservation and additional supply we shall not need foreign oil in 1990. Canada will have achieved energy independence in the full sense of the word. More than 90 per cent of secondary industry demand, excluding transportation, will be satisfied by energy sources other than oil. Oil will decline from its present 43 per cent share to about 27 per cent of our total energy needs. The use of natural gas and electricity will increase dramatically as a result of our program. The contribution of renewable energy will more than double.

To achieve energy independence our energy equation must balance. This means that while domestic supply will have to increase, demand will have to be restrained.

I shall not take the time of the House to cite examples of the many initiatives outlined in the energy program which will ensure that both in the domestic and in the industrial area Canadians will be encouraged to shift from the scarce resource of oil to the more plentiful sources of energy which we enjoy.

Elsewhere in Canada we shall develop new sources of energy, renewable sources, thanks in part to the creation of a new Crown corporation, Enertech, which will take a lead in assisting the private sector in renewable energy and conservation technologies.

There is much more that could be said about the demand side of the equation, but in our discussions in this House the tendency, unfortunately, has been to concentrate almost entirely on the supply side. I assume that since the opposition has said little about the demand side of the equation, they find little in our policy with which to disagree. Let us turn for a moment to the supply side.

Contrary to a common myth, Alberta's remaining established oil and gas revenues are larger now than they were ten years ago. While their reserves of conventional oil have declined, their potential in natural gas and non-conventional oil has increased dramatically. Our program will promote investment and exploration activity where it is needed most: in tertiary and non-conventional projects in Alberta, and in frontier and offshore areas such as the Beaufort Sea and Hibernia where the bulk of future oil supplies will be found.

For natural gas, the only problem our producers have is in finding the markets. So we approved the southern portion of the Alaska gas pipeline, despite the opposition of the NDP, and we shall extend the natural gas pipeline eastward, now to Quebec and soon to the maritime provinces, giving producers a much larger domestic market and consumers a less costly energy alternative. We shall drop the price of natural gas in relation to oil from its present 85 per cent to 67 per cent by 1983, providing a strong incentive for Canadians to convert from oil to gas. If producers still cannot sell enough gas, we shall buy it and we shall bank it. We have set aside $400 million in our program for a natural gas bank. For oil produced by enhanced recovery methods, a supplement will be paid to producers, a supplement which will be additional to the conventional oil wellhead price. This supplement will initially be about $14 a barrel, or sufficient to raise the total wellhead price to approximately $30 a barrel. This price will also be adjusted annually in a manner similar to the method of changing the oil sands price to which I shall refer in a moment. Implementation of that incentive will depend upon the co-operation of the producing provinces. The government has indicated that it is anxious to conclude agreements with each of the producing provinces on this important aspect of our energy supply.

As to the oil sands where our reserves are increasing, we are doing everything in our power to encourage their more rapid development. The federal government has always supported oil sands development. In the past, we provided the international price to Syncrude and to Suncor. We provided 12 per cent of the total investment in Syncrude. We allowed the deductibility of Syncrude royalties against federal income tax. We provided a tax system of rapid writeoffs and earned depletion which reduced the costs of investors by at least $2 billion.

Under the new energy program, we shall go even further. For new oil sands development, we have offered a price of $38 a barrel, roughly the international oil price today, and we shall increase it with inflation. We offered Imperial Oil a loan of $20 million to keep its Cold Lake oil sands project alive. The Alberta government refuses to put up its share, so we shall assume that burden as well. Unfortunately, the Alberta government has refused to proceed with these projects unless we accept their demands on petroleum pricing. If persisted in, the Alberta premier's decision will hurt all Canadians, but none more than those Canadians living in Alberta. Let me quote a recent Edmonton Journal editorial:

> Alberta has every right to drive a hard energy bargain . . . But driving a hard bargain differs markedly from holding fast to the adamant precondition of a "global" agreement on both conventional and synthetic oil pricing. Surely, if clear heads are to prevail, it must be seen that it would be a sign of statesmanship, not weakness, to divorce conventional and synthetic oil price negotiations.

Thus spoke the Edmonton Journal. We hope the Alberta premier will reconsider his attitude. We regret his decision to withhold 15 per cent of Alberta's oil production from other Canadians. Surely $100 billion over the next decade is sufficient income for any province, including Alberta. The Alberta government should surely be satisfied with 43 per cent of the total revenues from oil and gas. We, the national government, are willing to accept less than one-quarter. Compare us with other federations, such as the United States and Australia, and you will be struck by the lower level of revenue available to the national government of Canada.

I noted that last Friday the hon. member for Etobicoke Centre (Mr. Wilson) claimed that the federal share of petroleum revenue under our plan would be much more than 24 per cent, something like 45 per cent to 50 per cent—he was not quite sure. Let me set the record straight. The issue here is the sharing of net operating income from oil or natural gas. This is the traditional way of determining shares and I believe it remains appropriate. The hon. member noted that not all sources of federal revenue are counted, but he conveniently neglected to mention that not all sources of provincial income are counted, such as revenues from downstream profits and taxes on petroleum profits.

The hon. member opposite went on to contend that the new energy policy is causing some drilling rigs to move south. We have heard a lot about those drill rigs recently but, as the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) noted a few minutes ago, some oil rigs did indeed move south but it was well prior to the announcement of the new energy program. The movement of rigs was the result of oversupply prompted by the record petroleum activity in Canada in recent years. How could a member claim that the movement of a few rigs was an effect of a cause that had not yet happened? We are proud of the rapid growth in Canada's drilling rig industry. In 1975, there were only 272 rigs in Canada; now we have about 570. Although a temporary slowdown is expected because of the decline in natural gas sales—a decline which the energy program will do much to reverse—the Canadian Association of Oilwell Drilling Operators has said that the long-term outlook for the industry is optimistic and the demand for services will continue to grow.

Our current debate is predicated on the proclamation of certain sections of the Petroleum Administration Act. We have taken this step reluctantly but, as hon. members know, the previous agreement had expired. Some pricing schedule had to prevail. This does not restrict the right of the provinces to set the price of oil and gas within their own borders. In fact, the British Columbia government sets the price of natural gas at below cost, and the Alberta government has unilaterally proclaimed an act to set natural gas prices within that province. We have repeatedly pledged that our proclamation, now made, can be revoked immediately as soon as a satisfactory agreement is reached with the producing provinces. We cannot, however, ignore our national responsibilities. During our discussions in the past months, Alberta demanded the same net benefits as offered by the previous government. Alberta would not consider a natural gas export tax. Alberta would not consider a wellhead tax. Alberta would not discuss equalization. Alberta would not separate consideration of the oil sands from conventional oil sources. Alberta took the position that we as the national government had no claim to a greater portion of revenue which they claim was tantamount to federal expropriation. This left us with the possibility of deriving these revenues from the oil industry, including Alberta's oil industry, and Canadian consumers including Albertans. We made proposals on March 13—

Adjournment Debate

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been made.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—INTENTION TO ABANDON TRACK IN NOVA SCOTIA—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, last June the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) refused to indicate his support for the retention of the Oxford subdivision of the Canadian National Railways in Nova Scotia. This 55 miles of track known as the "short line" is very important to Nova Scotia. Also at that time the minister declined to investigate the condition of the railway, the deplorable condition of the track itself. As I understood his reply, he indicated that the CTC, as far as he was concerned, was the end-all and be-all. He would not do anything until they made a decision on an application to abandon this part of the system.

In the meantime, almost six months have come and gone. Conditions on the short line, as far as I know, have not changed, and its future has been left under a cloud.

The disgust that members of Parliament of all parties currently feel toward CN policy transcends partisan politics. Jeff Matthews of the Halifax Chronicle-Herald noted the following in a recent story:

If the Commons had been voting Monday on a least popular corporate citizen, the CN just might have run away with the prize.

The story which triggered this particular feeling was, of course, the CN's current policy in closing many of its express terminal services.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. McMillan) took the unusual but appropriate step of moving the adjournment of the House to discuss this particular move of CN which will cause over 250 CN employees to lose their jobs and inflict substantial hardship within the region. The minister is aware that CN has been systematically divesting itself of appendages which detract from its profit picture. However, he must surely agree that while profitability is commendable in a Crown corporation, a national railway system has a service to perform as well.

It is always timely to remind the House and the country that since its formation the CNR has been relieved of its debt and interest costs four times. The total relief provided from 1922 to 1978 has been in excess of $6.7 billion. At times CN management has been rather erratic, to say the least. For example, after the recapitalization that took place in 1952 which gave CN a debt-equity ratio almost identical to that of CP, CN proceeded to convert its power fleet from steam locomotives to diesel, and completed this conversion in less than half the time it took the CPR. Of course, if one was not taking depreciation into account and just had $700 million worth of debt written off, one could go out and borrow any amount to buy new diesel engines, which is exactly what they did. CN expected that investment to make them so efficient that they would be able to beat CP into the ground. But, it has not quite worked out that way, and their trucking ventures did not work out that way either. They paid two or three times what any sane trucker would pay for an acquisition, and of course they could never generate an adequate return for the capital outlay. The tower in Toronto is another example of CN policy. It cost them 2.5 times as much to build it as they thought it would, and the number of paying customers is much less than they had anticipated. So the tower is not earning an adequate return either, and thus it goes on. Nor can they adequately maintain a very important part of the Nova Scotia railway system.

A major portion of the short line railway runs through the county of Pictou, connecting it with the rest of the province and the nation. Without it, the town and the port of Pictou would be cut off from our national rail system. According to the national statistical agency, the town produced nearly $8 million in shipments of manufactured goods in 1977. Of course these statistics do not take into account the massive Michelin Tire complex at Granton. Instead of the dismantling and dismemberment of our railway system in Atlantic Canada—and I am speaking specifically now of Nova Scotia—what is needed is a detailed study of how it can be improved, such as those undertaken in western Canada. Such evaluations, whether by Mr. Justice Emmett Hall or others, have called for a reasoned approach. Neither DREE, the federal Department of Transport, nor the Nova Scotia department of transport has yet shown initiatives in regard to the Nova Scotia rail system. The maritimes are perhaps the only region in Canada where the railways are allowed to implement piecemeal abandonments without reference to the region's total rail transport needs. Piecemeal moves to dismantle sections of our rail system run a high risk of producing a truncated rail transport system.

No further abandonments in relation to the maritime rail transport system should be considered until an adequate evaluation has been undertaken in regard to the region's present and future needs. Since constitutional matters are dominating the attention of Parliament, it is timely to remind the government that the federal government is under a constitutional obligation to maintain Nova Scotia's rail link with New Brunswick and Canada.

As a sidelight, it is interesting to denote careful reading to the debates in the House of Commons which reveal the air of constitutional obligation under which the Canadian Government Railways were authorized in 1886 and 1887 to complete the then Oxford Junction and New Glasgow branch of the Intercolonial Railway, which is the branch about which I speak tonight. I quote from Hansard of 1887 the words of the Liberal member of Parliament from Nova Scotia who represented Guysborough. His name was John A. Kirk. This is what he pointed out:

Then, the local legislature, during the session of 1886, passed a resolution asking the people of Nova Scotia to decide at the polls whether they wished to continue in the union or not. Under those circumstances, on the 15th of June, 1886, the people declared by an overwhelming majority that they wished to withdraw from the union. Well, sir, I think that had something to do with the action of this government in afterwards passing those minutes of council in reference to railroads.

That quote was from Hansard of May 6, 1887, at page 311. The "short line" provides for the national government an additional capability to maintain the rail link with New Brunswick as required by the constitution.

If a derailment or other mishap should interrupt rail movements on the main line between Oxford and Truro, Nova Scotia's rail link with New Brunswick and the rest of Canada would be broken. The "short line" presently provides the opportunity for the maintenance of the rail link.

Mr. Speaker, I see my time is up. May I simply say in closing that we would like to hear less double-talking, or perhaps it was double-crossing, of the west, and more action to keep the existing rail system in operation in Nova Scotia.

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have very little to add in answer to the hon. member's question beyond what the minister has already stated to him in the House and in correspondence.

An application for abandonment of this particular line was first made in 1963 and resubmitted in April of this year. In the interim the railway has continued to operate the line and will continue to do so until it is authorized to abandon it. I think it is generally known that the Canadian Transport Commission must decide whether to allow the abandonment or not. If it does not, the CTC may compensate the railway for its losses. In any case, public hearings are required and 30 days' notice must be given to interested parties. To my knowledge the CTC has not yet indicated when it will hold hearings. I suppose one could be tempted to accuse the regulatory agency of being rather slow in this case, but I doubt if that is the hon. member's intention.

Pending a hearing and decision by the CTC it would not seem proper for the minister to indicate a preference on the future of the line. As recorded in Hansard on June 11, the minister pointed out there are certainly avenues of appeal once the decision is made. In the meantime, however, it is the minister's intention to let the matter run its proper course.

CANADIAN FILM DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION—RESIGNATION OF MICHAEL McCABE—AMOUNT OF SEVERANCE PAY

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock-North Delta): Mr. Speaker, on May 21 I rose in the House to ask the Secretary of State (Mr. Fox) the circumstances under which Mr. Michael McCabe had left the employ of the CFDC. Specifically, my question had to do with the report that Mr. McCabe had, in fact, resigned as the executive director of the CFDC. The word among the industry people was that having resigned he was granted one year's salary. In answer to an order paper question several weeks ago, I believe, the salary pegged for the executive director was in the range of $50,000 to $60,000 per year. That is not bad severance pay. In the annual report of the Canadian Film Development Corporation, dated June 1, 1980, under the heading "Management" we find the following:

On June 1, 1980, Mr. Michael McCabe resigned as the corporation's executive director.

According to the records he did, in fact, resign. I asked the minister whether it was not rather strange behaviour and a little generous to someone who had resigned to give him an extra year's salary. Did Mr. McCabe resign? Was he squeezed out, or was he fired?

Other questions followed: What did Mr. McCabe do after his so-called resignation? Is it true he is involved in another business? The minister said, as reported at page 1260 of Hansard:

He indicated in his letter of resignation that he felt he had made his contribution to the corporation, that he wished to return to the private sector, and he thought this was the best time to leave the corporation so that he could pursue his own private interests in the future.

What were Mr. McCabe's own private interests in the future? If the conflict of interest guidelines of the Prime Minister have any relationship to what senior executives of Crown corporations do, I wonder what Mr. McCabe is doing now. The word is he is now working with a firm called Film Accord of Montreal, even though he is apparently living in Toronto. My question is this: how much business is that company, Film Accord, doing with CFDC? Could it be that Mr. McCabe has spent several years working with the Canadian Film Development Corporation in order to cultivate connections with the film industry, to form his own consulting firm and thereby reap the benefits of the lines of communication he established with the government while he was a member of the Canadian Film Development Corporation? I wonder whether the Prime Minister's guidelines should apply to Mr. McCabe.

Is it true that he is receiving $50,000 or so in salary even though he is no longer connected with the corporation? Is Mr. McCabe in a conflict of interest situation vis-à-vis the Prime Minister's guidelines? I understand he spent a lot of time at the film festival in Cannes where the CFDC together with the NFB spent thousands of dollars pushing Canadian films which did not get anywhere. A yacht was rented as part of the promotion for those films. I understand also that Mr. McCabe spent considerable time in California apparently pushing Canadian films. How successful was Mr. McCabe in peddling Canadian films in California? Did the board of directors ever demand an accounting of the time spent by him in California? How was he spending his time? Was he successful? How much in the way of sales did he achieve for the CFDC or for those films which CFDC helped to finance?

Finally, I understand that Mr. McCabe went as part of a production company to help film the movie "Bethune" in mainland China. In the annual report of the CFDC there is a list of all the films which the CFDC helped produce in 1979. Nowhere in that list of films which they helped to finance is a film called "Bethune". If my memory serves me correctly, that film was not produced by the CFDC, but by the CBC. Is it true that Mr. McCabe was part of the production crew which went to the Republic of China? Was he granted a leave of absence? Was he on full salary while he was in China? For all of Mr. McCabe's frenetic activity it seems to me that he was handsomely paid, both by way of salary and by way of the fringe benefits he seemed to accumulate while he was executive director of that corporation. The minister seems to say in his answer that he does not know anything about the terms of separation between Mr. McCabe and the corporation. If the minister is going to discharge his responsibility totally, he ought to know what those terms were. The taxpayers of Canada, who have invested millions of dollars in the CFDC, have a right to know how that board of directors is managing the affairs of that corporation.

If they are going to discharge their stewardship properly, they owe an accounting to the Canadian people as to how their executive director discharged his duties. How much did it cost the taxpayers in addition to the very generous salary they were paying him? Does the Secretary of State (Mr. Fox) hold the board of directors accountable for the way they managed the affairs of that corporation? Can the parliamentary secretary stand in his place tonight and tell us whether Mr. McCabe was paid a year's severance pay, whether the board of directors asked for an accounting of Mr. McCabe's time in California and whether he went to the Republic of China to help film that movie, even though it was not part of the CFDC production schedule? If the taxpayers are to be given an account of the stewardship of that corporation, the parliamentary secretary should speak on behalf of the Secretary of State tonight.

Mr. Peter Stollery (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I intend to stick to the question the hon. member asked May 21 last and not involve myself in the rather extravagant elaboration of the question to which he has treated us.

Last May 21 the hon. member specifically asked that the Canadian Film Development Corporation disclose what is essentially confidential information concerning aspects of the corporation's internal administration as well as its relationship with its clients. The member opposite has consistently chosen to ignore one very crucial fact concerning this issue. It is that the Minister of Communications (Mr. Fox), who is responsible for the CFDC, operates at a traditional arm's length relationship with what is a Crown corporation and does not attempt in any way to interfere with its day to day internal operations. I am sure the hon. member would be the first to protest if he did.

In response to the questions raised by the hon. member, the minister has acted in a responsible manner by requesting a full report from the CFDC. This report has not, as yet, been forwarded to the minister for his full appraisal of all the facts surrounding the resignation of Mr. Michael McCabe as executive director of the corporation.

The minister will be asking again, this week, for presentation of the CFDC report at the earliest possible date. Once the minister has had an opportunity to study its contents thoroughly, he will be in a better position to respond to the questions raised by the hon. member, namely, the resignation of Mr. Michael McCabe.

CANADA MORTGAGE AND HOUSING CORPORATION—RENT INCREASES FOR APARTMENTS IN TORONTO

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cosgrove) for being here this evening. I rise in connection with a question directed to him on May 23 of this year with respect to the Toronto Main Square apartment buildings. Those buildings are held by the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation for which the minister is responsible. The purpose of my question was to determine why the tenants in those buildings were being notified that rents would be increased by 12 per cent on lease renewal, and that the first and last month's rent would also have to be paid at that time.

Since then I have written a number of letters to the minister on this matter. At no time has the minister given a satisfactory response to the fact that the tenants in those apartments are being asked to pay an increase in rents that is double the increase permitted by most landlords under Ontario laws. The minister made a further response on May 26, 1980, and told the House that CMHC had introduced a rent-geared-to-income program at Main Square. Six months later, I am advised that even though a number of tenants have applied for this relief, not one has received it. The tenants in those apartments want to know just who is giving the correct answer to this question.

Whatever the real answer is, the effect of this rental increase is, and will be, very real for Main Square tenants. At the time Main Square was constructed in 1971 it was reported that 65 per cent of the apartment units would be subsidized and that those who qualified for reduced rents would be senior citizens, handicapped persons, single parent families, students and low-income families.

The executive of the Main Square Tenants Association have repeatedly requested that they be supplied with information on the current population of those buildings, and to date have not been successful in receiving that information. However, in a letter dated July 23, 1980, to Toronto City Council the minister said that as of March, 1980, there were 22 handicapped and 252 senior citizens in Main Square.

In another letter dated September 10, 1980, to the Leader of the Ontario New Democratic Party the minister said:

> Initially, there were 50 units available for such tenants, but only 22 units are currently occupied by handicapped or disabled persons. The reason for this was that CMHC was not able to rent them to handicapped people at the time the units became available and they were therefore rented to other tenants.
> However, I can assure you, as these units become available, every effort is made to lease them to handicapped or disabled tenants.

I recently received a letter from a Main Square tenant which I am sure other members of the House will want to hear and I am equally sure the letter will have the same effect on them as it had on me and it speaks for itself. It reads as follows:

Dear Mr. Young

I am writing to you out of sheer desperation with a total feeling of indignity. I am a woman who is totally handicapped. I have lived in Main Square since the complex first opened under the Communicept program which allowed handicapped people to live here totally independent.

I am completely dependent on a fixed government income which does not keep pace with inflation.

I was notified by Property Management that as of December 1, 1980 my rent would be increased by 12 per cent. When I subtract the $30.00 subsidy from the new rental increase the actual cost to me is 15 per cent.

I submitted a notarized, questionable, "means test" to management at their request, which fully documents my total income and points out quite clearly the hardship that is placed on me by the 15 per cent increase in rent. To date there has been no response from management regarding special consideration and it makes me wonder why I must be humiliated into filling out a "means test" and notarizing it and not having it acknowledged.

I am afraid this additional hardship will give them the excuse to institutionalize me, taking away my freedom and dignity.

Since I am unable to stand up for my rights would you please make this stand for me?

Even though the minister has advised me and the tenants association and everyone else that CMHC has introduced a 25 per cent formula gearing rent-to-income to Main Square, the fact is, such a formula is not in operation in Main Square.

● (2225)

In examining the records kept by the tenants association it is also obvious to me—and it would be to the minister or to anyone else who cared to look at those records—that the company which CMHC contracted to manage Main Square has been more interested in making a profit than it has in properly managing the buildings.

It is a disgrace that only nine years after this apartment building was constructed a number of its structures, such as the underground garage, are in a state of disrepair. Cars parked in this garage are continually broken into and vandalized. At least one car had all of its four tires slashed in the last few months. Access to the garage by unauthorized persons is so easy that abandoned cars are an every-day item.

The lack of over-all security and protection not only in the garage but also in the buildings themselves has resulted in two reported rapes, two reported attempted rapes, several reported indecent assaults and at least one reported case of indecent exposure. All those incidents have the tenants in Main Square wondering just what kind of landlord CMHC is.

The tenants and their association have persistently made representations to the managers of Main Square to have normal and proper maintenance and security procedures implemented, and in nearly every instance have had those approaches rebuffed by both CMHC officials and the managers of this property.

I could go on at great length about the conditions in those buildings, but I see that my time has nearly run out. I will conclude by inviting the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cosgrove) to meet the tenants of Main Square face to face and to hear about those problems at first hand from the people who are living with them on a daily basis.

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, before responding to the specifics of some of the points raised by the hon. member opposite I would like to confirm as a matter of record that I received only short notice of the question raised this evening. However, in light of the substantial and serious issues raised by the hon. member, I agreed to attempt to respond to the question this evening.

At the outset, with respect to the question whether the 25 per cent rent geared-to-income formula is in place, I can confirm this evening that the formula is indeed in place. If there is any confusion about that, it will be set aside. In addition, because it was announced on May 26 by me in this House, the formula will be made retroactive to the beginning of June. Mind you, it will be available to those people who would otherwise have qualified under the rules which are normally understood. Of course, it would be under a situation in which individual tenants would apply, and they would have to satisfy corporation officials that they did meet those particular requirements.

With respect to the unfortunate incidents raised by the hon. member I would like to indicate my acceptance of his invitation to meet with the tenants of Main Square. I would like to confirm this evening that it is my intention within the next few weeks, because my constituency is close by, to look for an opportunity to do that with the hon. member. Because my constituency is in metropolitan Toronto and because of my experience in metropolitan Toronto, I know that security in multiple buildings over the last few years in metropolitan Toronto has created considerable difficulty not only for this project but for many other projects in the metropolitan area. The police have found it very difficult to cope with this situation. I think the response is one which could well involve not only CMHC but also a review by police of security generally in the area. In addition, it could involve the co-operation of the tenants association and that of the city through its various programs. It could also involve metropolitan Toronto officials.

I thank the hon. member for his question and, as I have indicated, the undertakings which I have given this evening will, I hope, go some way toward satisfying the hon. member and the people he represents.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 11 a.m.

At 10.30 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

FINANCE

HIGH INTEREST RATES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dave Nickerson (Western Arctic): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Despite the dire and awesome warnings that I and my colleagues gave in this House on Tuesday last predicting that, unless the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) pulled up his socks and dumped his ill-advised, ill-considered and ill-conceived budget, interest rates would skyrocket, nothing has been done. In fact, the worst has happened. Yesterday the Canadian prime rate shot up by ¾ of 1 per cent to its highest level since mid-May. In view of the vicious circle caused by the inept Liberal budgetary policy of high interest rates, economic slowdown and falling value of the Canadian dollar, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Jelinek):

That the Minister of Finance be put on a diet of bread and water until he brings down the Canadian prime rate to at least 12 per cent.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

NORTHERN PIPELINES

ALYESKA PIPELINE—CONCERNS OF YUKONERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity having regard to statements made recently by the leader of the Yukon government in connection with worker mobility rights which are to be included in the constitutional reform package. Such rights would seriously undermine the socioeconomic terms and conditions to which proponents of the Alaska highway gas pipeline have agreed, giving the Yukon some control over manpower planning and in-migration of transient workers. Mr. Pearson has threatened to withdraw his government's support of the project for fear of a repeat of the disastrous socio-economic side effects that were associated with the Alyeska project. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen):

That the government use whatever means appropriate to the situation, firstly to assure the people of the Yukon and their government that their legitimate concerns with regard to the construction of the Alaska highway gas pipeline will be respected, in accordance with the terms and conditions set out in the pipeline agreement; and, secondly, to dispel any doubt the pipeline community may now have resulting from the statement of the Yukon government.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ENERGY

PETROLEUM MONITORING AGENCY OWNERSHIP FORMULA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Otto Jelinek (Halton): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In light of the fact that the Petroleum Monitoring Agency yesterday released a Canadian owernship formula which, in mathematical form, is $COR = \frac{R + (R/B \times S)}{I}$ a formula which, according to the Ottawa Citizen, "appears likely to force the oil and gas industry to spend as much time in the next few months exploring its corporate and shareholder roots as it will be exploring for oil and gas fields", I move, seconded by the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle):

That the minister of energy make a statement on motions as to why he abandoned his commitment in New York to a formula which would be "as simple as possible", and whether he was advised in developing this formula by his colleague the Minister of State for Economic Development since it appears to reflect that minister's one time adherence to the A + B theorem of Major Douglas.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

IMMIGRATION

REFUGEE STATUS FOR VICTIMS OF ITALIAN EARTHQUAKE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Cyril Keeper (Winnipeg-St. James): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Since the devastation of the Naples-Salerno earthquake has left thousands of Italians homeless and in dire need, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House direct the government to establish immediately an Italian refugee program so that homeless persons who do not have relatives in Canada and those whose relatives cannot afford to sponsor them may be able to come to Canada, and that the federal government cover the costs of transportation and care for one year as they did for the boat people.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

MISCELLANEOUS ESTIMATES

ATTENDANCE OF GOVERNMENT MEMBERS OF STANDING COMMITTEE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Doug Lewis (Simcoe North): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Whereas research and development has been allowed by the Liberal government to slip drastically over the past 12 years, and whereas the Liberal party showed its complete disregard for research and development in Canada by sending no members to the miscellaneous estimates committee yesterday, other than the chairman, to examine officials from the National Research Council, although the Progressive Conservative Party had six members in attendance, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth (Mr. Scott):

That this House urge the government to send members to committee meetings when the health of Canadian industry is being discussed.

YELLOWHEAD HIGHWAY—COST-SHARING PROGRAM TO UPGRADE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Charles Mayer (Portage-Marquette): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. The federal budget of October 28 established a development fund for western Canada. Whereas the Yellowhead highway cannot keep up with population growth and the industrial development in the region it serves, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski):

That the Minister of Transport immediately sit down with the ministers of transport of the four western provinces and negotiate a cost-sharing program designed to upgrade the Yellowhead highway to standards commensurate with the present and future requirements of that highway.

ARTS AND CRAFTS

CANADIAN REPRESENTATION AT INTERNATIONAL FAIRS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. I wish to recognize this government's recent initiative to sponsor the Canadian arts and crafts fair in Manhattan, New York City. All members of this House encourage Canadian artisans from all parts of Canada to display their excellent crafts throughout the world and before international buyers. However, despite the fact that this fair was well organized, well promoted and a real credit to the Canadian arts community, one glaring omission was made: not one artisan from the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia was represented.

An hon. Member: Shame!

Mr. Riis: Needless to say, my colleague the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans) and I were extremely disappointed. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Beaches (Mr. Young):

That this House demands that when fairs titled "Canadian" are sponsored by this government, all parts of the country are represented and that efforts be made to demonstrate that Canada is more than simply Ontario and Quebec.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

EFFECT OF POSSIBLE CROP FAILURE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Prince Edward-Hastings): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provision of Standing Order 43. In view of warnings yesterday by officials of the government that, as a result of critically low world food stocks, a crop failure next year would hit food prices like OPEC hit oil prices in 1973, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling):

That the Minister of Finance and the Secretary of State for External Affairs make a joint statement on motions at the earliest opportunity as to the impact such a scenario would have on the Canadian consumer and on our aid commitments overseas, specifying any contingency plans they may have developed to deal with such a crisis.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

FIRST-CLASS TRAVEL FOR AMBASSADORS AND DIPLOMATS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Miss Pat Carney (Vancouver Centre): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to introduce a motion which I hope will have the support of all members of the House since it deals with travel arrangements for our ambassadors and heads of posts who represent our country abroad.

Since our ambassadors and heads of posts must travel on economy fare from Canada to their posts abroad, often involving long, exhausting flights, while members of Parliament have first-class travel privileges in Canada, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Clarke):

That this House direct the Secretary of State for External Affairs and his colleague, the President of the Treasury Board, to take the measures necessary to ensure that our Canadian ambassadors and heads of posts have the same travel privileges outside Canada as those awarded members of Parliament within Canada, as our diplomats and members of this House both represent, in our different ways, our country.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

FINANCE

INCREASE IN INTEREST RATES—ASSISTANCE TO LOW-INCOME CANADIANS

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance or, in his absence, the acting minister, who I think is the President of the Treasury Board. The Bank of Canada prime rate went up yesterday to 13.95 per cent. Canadian banks have raised their prime rates to 14.5 per cent. For small business this means a rate of 15.5 per cent or 16 per cent. I point out to the minister that Statistics Canada has reported that the capacity utilization rate in manufacturing fell in the July-September period to 78.5 per cent of capacity only, the lowest level in 18 years. These higher interest rates will stop a recovery in its tracks.

In view of these facts, will the government implement programs to help reduce the cost to potential home buyers, mortgage holders and home owners of these higher interest rates and help tenants with a shelter allowance program? Will the government also introduce an energy tax credit program or a similar program to help lower income Canadians meet these higher costs?

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State, Finance): Madam Speaker, I should like to remind the hon. member that this .89 per cent increase in the prime rate is not the highest ever recorded in Canada. He must remember very well that on October 25, 1979, the prime rate shot up by 1.75 per cent, that is from 12.25 to 14 per cent, in Canada. And the hon. member remembers who was then prime minister, also who was minister of finance. The hon. member referred to some difficulties in the industrial sector for a given quarter. All statistics are more or less significant in time. If the hon. member looks at the latest statistics, he will note, for example, that in the manufacturing sector profits have increased, that production is picking up. He should also know that during that period there were some rather important investments in that field and that such investment may have caused to some extent a slowdown in manufacturing output. However, as a whole the situation is not so bad and a recovery can be anticipated.

[English]

Mr. Crosbie: Madam Speaker, if this minister is going to attempt to answer questions, I wish he would try to answer them. The capacity utilization in the manufacturing industry is at its lowest level in 18 years. We are now in a recession. We are not in a similar position to last year and interest rates are going up. They are at the same high point now as they were when we were in office last fall. I would remind the minister that at that time the present Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce said the following on behalf of his party on November 6:

The Liberals and I generally want action taken now to prevent the hardship this Conservative high interest rate policy is creating for millions of Canadians and their families.

That was the attitude of his party last year. We are now asking the government to carry out their bold words of last year and to take action to help the millions of Canadians who are suffering as a result of this high interest rate policy at a time of recession. There was no recession last fall but we are in recession now; the minister has forecast a 1 per cent decrease in the gross national product this year. So if the minister is going to answer, let him tell us if he will take action to help these millions of Canadians.

[Translation]

Mr. Bussières: Madam Speaker, the hon. member is deliberately ignoring the action taken by this government to fight this recession. He has come out strongly against the budgetary deficit of this government. The primary purpose of the deficit supported by the government was to counter the expected recession. There is statistical evidence that we are progressively coming out of this recession and that the economy is on the way to recovery. The hon. member should recognize that the decision to accept a much larger budgetary deficit than we would have wished has helped the country to get out of this difficulty and contributed to an economic recovery whose effects are already being felt.

[English]

Mr. Crosbie: Madam Speaker, I have a final supplementary question. The minister says we are moving out of the recession. Well, we are not going to move far because the high interest rates will stop that movement. With respect to the deficit, we had $3.6 billion less in deficit last fall and we introduced the energy tax credit and a mortgage interest and property tax credit to help Canadians. This government is introducing nothing but more costs to Canadians.

My supplementary question is for the Prime Minister, Madam Speaker. It is a plea to the Prime Minister to take some interest. On October 30 of last year his finance critic proposed——a 14 per cent prime rate because . . . it will mean the loss of thousands of jobs, increases in the cost of living, it will bring the housing industry to a halt, it will put housing beyond the reach of most middle and lower-income Canadians, it will hurt small business and it will hurt farmers, and will add to the cost of food.

If that is what interest rates did last year, it is exactly what they are doing this year. Will the Prime Minister take some action now to help Canadians meet these increased costs, or was his finance critic last year just talking through his hat, giving us a lot of nonsense which he is not prepared to act on now that he is in government?

● (1120)

Mr. Bussières: Madam Speaker, the hon. member is once again raising the question of interest rates. Canada is often criticized for not following closely the interest rates in effect in the United States. I should like to point out to the hon. member the present gap between Canadian and American interest rates.

This gap has widened in the last few weeks, which may have very important side effects. This technique of adjusting each week the interest rates to the pressures exerted both on our currency and on the economy as a whole allows us to monitor more closely an interest rate better geared to the problems of the Canadian economy. I firmly believe that the efforts made to fight inflation and bring about an economic recovery will enable us in the medium term to set more acceptable interest rates and will promote a healthy economy for the greater benefit of all Canadians.

SMALL BUSINESS

REQUEST FOR EXTENSION OF DEVELOPMENT BOND PROGRAM

Mr. Bill Kempling (Burlington): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Finance. In view of the new rise in prime rates, most small businessmen will be hard pressed to continue operation; in fact, many of them will not survive. I think a look at the bankruptcy rate will confirm that. Will the minister consider extending the small business development bond cut-off date from March 31 to at least December 31, 1981, to help the small business community bridge this gap and thus ease the difficulty they will be in with rising interest rates?

Mr. Nielsen: He will squirm out of that one too.

Mr. Crosbie: He is the government's squirmer.

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Busssières (Minister of State, Finance): Madam Speaker, I do not recall the hon. member speaking so dramatically when his colleague for St. John's West raised the interest rates from 12.25 to 14 per cent on October 25, 1979. I would like to remind the hon. member that the fight against inflation and the fight to restore a sound economy is one which, as this government has always stated, must be fought by all sectors of the economy, namely, of course, farmers and small businesses, as well as all individuals and businessmen. Moreover, I would like to point out that as concerns the particular measure mentioned by the hon. member, the minister responsible for small businesses has been having regular discussions with the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance, who had already agreed to extend small business development bonds. I do not believe that decisions should be made in terms of one particular event, but rather that we should follow the normal course of the economic situation. In view of the signs of recovery that we now have, I am sure there will be no need to grant an extension for the bonds.

[English]

Mr. Kempling: Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Minister of State for Finance—or should I say the minister in charge of government squirming. I should like to quote from page 1017 of Hansard for November 6, 1979 wherein the hon. member for Winnipeg-Fort Garry, the present Minister of Employment and Immigration, said:

—if there is a requirement to raise interest rates, there is an equal requirement to help those people who are hurt by those interest rate increases.

Mr. Nielsen: The chickens are coming home.

Mr. Kempling: I ask the minister to assist the small business community in view of the large number of people it employs. He knows, I know and everyone knows that the largest percentage of employment in the country is in the small business sector, which will be very severely hurt by these interest rate increases if they continue at this level. Will the minister consider reducing the income tax rate for small business to offset the interest rate charged by the banks?

• (1125)

Mr. Bussières: Madam Speaker, small businesses can already avail themselves of several programs which are administered by my colleague, the Minister of State for Small Businesses. The hon. member mentioned one, the Small Business Development Bond program which allows extremely generous rates of interest on certain loans. Many provisions of the Income Tax Act are also of special benefit to small businesses. The fact, for instance, that the Minister of Finance agreed to keep indexation also means that small businesses can keep more money in their pockets come income tax return time.

PROPOSED RESOLUTION—REQUEST BY NATIVE LEADERS TO MEET PRIME MINISTER

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. On previous occasions I have raised with the Prime Minister the need for him to meet with Indian, Metis and Inuit leaders to discuss the current constitutional resolution now before Parliament. In my hand I have a copy of a letter dated November 17, 1980. It is a joint letter from the three leaders of the national organizations asking to meet with the Prime Minister to discuss this resolution. In spite of the government's haste to rush the resolution through Parliament, this letter has not been answered, nor have the requests of the native leaders to meet with the Prime Minister been granted.

Has the Prime Minister received the letter? Is he willing to meet in the near future, with the leaders of the Indian, Metis and Inuit peoples to work out acceptable amendments to the constitutional resolution?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the hon. member knows that the proposed constitution is being discussed by a joint committee of this House and the other place. I am informed that ten days ago members of that committee agreed to meet with the Indian representatives. As far as our members on that committee are concerned, they are prepared to meet with the representatives as early as Monday morning, afternoon or evening. I understand there are negotiations going on as to whether that date will be kept; I do not know if it will be, as it is in the hands of the committee. Our members are prepared to meet them Monday morning, as I have indicated.

Mr. Manly: Madam Speaker, the leaders of these organizations would very much like to meet with the Prime Minister to find out what kind of amendments would be acceptable to him and his government before they appear before the committee. The Prime Minister has stated that, if language rights are not entrenched now they never will be because of the difficulty of getting the provinces to agree to them. He has told native leaders it will be easier for them to get their rights after the constitution is entrenched and patriated than before. Why does the Prime Minister have a double standard with respect to this matter? Does he think native rights are not as important as language rights?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, the hon. member knows, as I have said before in the House a few times, that I did meet with the Indian chiefs and elders. In that meeting a few months ago I spoke to them at great length about our position on the constitution and our desire to meet with them and to discuss with them any constitutional matters in which they are directly involved. Since I made that speech meetings have taken place with both officials and the minister responsible for Indian affairs. The matter is now before a committee of this House. Surely that is the place for the Indians, like other groups in this country, to present their views and to seek amendments. I am relying upon the members of that committee to see if these amendments can be accepted with some consensus among all parties and, hopefully, many of the provinces as well. I must await the report of the committee in order to see their views on that.

I think the hon. member is misstating the case in so far as the comparison between language rights and native rights is concerned. Language rights have been agreed to by the ten provinces in meetings they had in St. Andrews in 1977 and in Montreal in 1978. A clear policy on minority language rights and the field of education was announced, and it is that policy which we are putting into the constitution.

Such is not the case with native rights. There are some very general requests to entrench aboriginal rights, but as I said in this House just a few days ago, aboriginal rights are undefined. Nor is it defined as to whom these rights would apply—to how many groups of Indians or aboriginal peoples, to what extent the rights would apply to the Metis, and what is an Indian, a half Indian or a three-quarter Indian.

The House of Commons, Parliament and the joint committee will have to look into these questions, and when the native requests are very clearly put and the content is known, then it will be up to the House to take the responsibility to determine whether or not there should be an entrenchment at that time.

Mr. Manly: Madam Speaker, the Prime Minister has said that he met earlier in the year with native leaders, but the result of that meeting is that there were absolutely no guarantees of their rights given whatsoever. The Prime Minister always comes back to the difficulties involved in entrenching aboriginal rights. We recognize that there are difficulties, but surely, because of those difficulties, it is important for the Prime Minister himself to meet with those leaders. Since the Calder case, even the Prime Minister must recognize that there are such rights. Why will the Prime Minister not sit down with the leaders of aboriginal peoples and find some acceptable way of recognizing these rights and of negotiating them in the future so that they will be protected?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, the hon. member makes much of my sitting down with the native leaders. I would have him know that I have sat down many times over the past years with the native leaders and that we have discussed this question again and again. I have no objection to a further meeting with them. I have indicated in this House that I would be prepared to do so again at some appropriate time in the coming months.

But surely the hon. member recognizes that it is not enough to say that he is for aboriginal rights. I am sure that if I asked him what consequences the insertion of those two words in the constitution would have, he would be absolutely incapable of answering exactly to whom they would apply in Canada and exactly what they entail. That is the situation.

ARRIVAL IN OTTAWA OF "CONSTITUTION TRAIN"—SUGGESTED MEETING WITH INDIAN LEADERS

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Madam Speaker, I would like to ask a short supplementary question of the Prime Minister. Would he be a little more specific with regard to the "constitutional train", which is arriving in Ottawa this afternoon, its passengers having travelled 3,000 miles to meet with the Prime Minister. Is the Prime Minister prepared over the weekend or next week to sit down and meet with the leaders of the Indian nations who have come to Ottawa to discuss the future, not only of themselves, but of the country?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the native people have not come here to meet with any particular people. I believe they would like to meet with as many members of Parliament as possible, and certainly I hope they will. But the committee which is studying this question was created by this House and by the Senate, so I think it is important that they meet with the committee. If after that meeting it appears that my great skills can help in some way to solve the problem, then I would be happy to meet with the native people. But I do not believe in creating expectations that a meeting which is not more better defined than it is in the questions that I have heard would be productive.

I wish the Indians would put their case, that it would be known and could be examined by the representatives of all parties on that committee, so that a report could be produced. Then the hon. members opposite would have to do more than just ask questions; they would have to make up their minds on the matter.

PRESENCE IN GALLERY OF MINISTER OF LAND AND DEVELOPMENT OF SRI LANKA

Madam Speaker: At this point I would like the House to recognize the presence in our gallery of the Hon. Gamani Dissanayake, the Minister of Land and Development of Sri Lanka.

GOVERNMENT ADVERTISING

INCREASED FUNDING OF CANADIAN UNITY INFORMATION OFFICE—REQUEST FOR BREAKDOWN

Mr. Otto Jelinek (Halton): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Justice and the minister of state for propaganda and multiculturalism, I would like to put my question to the Acting Minister of Justice. It arises out of a series of documents I have here which are marked "secret" and which were prepared by the Canadian Unity Information Office earlier this year in support of their request for an additional $28.9 million, including a massive $14.25 million publicity campaign in support of the government's constitutional plans.

In view of the number of unexplained figures presently in Supplementary Estimates (B), many of which coincide with figures in this document prepared by the CUIO, would the Acting Minister of Justice or any other minister explain or table in this House the detailed breakdown of these figures, including a description of how much of that money has already been spent by the CUIO and how the government intends to use the remainder of the funds?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, it is obvious to the hon. member that I have no knowledge at all of these documents. I will look into them and bring them to the attention of the minister so that he can answer the question. I would appreciate receiving copies of the documents from the hon. member.

REQUEST THAT PROGRAM BE DISCONTINUED

Mr. Otto Jelinek (Halton): Madam Speaker, I will certainly make the documents available to anybody who requests them. My supplementary question is for the Prime Minister. It is with regard to advertising. In view of the fact that hundreds of thousands of Canadians, like myself, came to Canada to escape governments which spent vast amounts of money to manipulate the opinions of their citizens, and because the Prime Minister's own government at the present time is asking to increase the budget of the Canadian Unity Information Office by 170 per cent, regardless of the excuses his ministers have continued to make to justify constitutional and other government advertising, would the Prime Minister assure the House and Canadians that he will put a stop to the government's growing practice of spending millions of dollars of the taxpayers' money on propaganda campaigns? I wish the government would quit telling the people what to think with the people's own money.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I have seen publications by practically every province, including the province in which the hon. member has chosen to live, financed at the taxpayers' expense, which indicate policies, the advantages and the glory of living in any particular province. I have seen ads on television about how beautiful it is to be in Ontario and so on. I do not believe there is anything wrong with governments indicating to Canadians that they have good cause to be proud of the country in which they live.

ACCESS TO INFORMATION

REQUEST FOR RELEASE OF PUBLIC OPINION SURVEYS OF PROPOSED CONSTITUTION

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe): Madam Speaker, my question is also for the Prime Minister, who has said that his government is committed to the concept of freedom of information. In view of the fact that the documents released today by the hon. member for Halton include an allocation of $1.4 million for research on the constitution, including $900,000 for public opinion surveys of the public's reaction to the constitution, will the Prime Minister tell the House whether he is prepared to instruct the Minister of Justice, for whom these polls were prepared at the taxpayers' expense, to stop suppressing those polls and to make them available to Parliament and Canadians so that, at a time when this Parliament is being called upon to assess the constitutional direction which this country should be taking in the future, they will have access to the results of those $900,000 worth of public opinion surveys paid for by the taxpayers of Canada?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I am sorry but I missed the hon. member's question. I am not quite sure to what document he is referring, but he did mention, I believe, some $1.4 million being spent on research on the constitution. I believe that is the amount which the government allotted to the various Indian groups in Canada so that they may conduct research on the constitution. I see nothing wrong with the Government of Canada also spending an equivalent amount of money.

Mr. Beatty: Madam Speaker, the House will recognize that the Prime Minister avoided answering my question, which was very simple. Would the Prime Minister, in the spirit of information, order the release of three public opinion surveys and the following trace surveys on the constitution which were completed at a cost of $900,000 of the taxpayers' money? Those documents are currently being suppressed by the government. How can the Prime Minister conceivably justify to the Canadian people the expenditure of millions of dollars of taxpayers' money to manipulate public opinion to try to draw support for the government's propaganda for its constitutional initiatives, when at the very same time he refuses to release information relating to public opinion surveys of public response to his constitutional initiatives, paid for by taxpayers' money?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I remember hearing the Minister of Justice indicating in this House that he had released that particular day results of some 120 or 130 surveys. He did say that a small number, perhaps three, had not been released. I do not know which three but I will be happy to see if those three cannot be released very soon.

Mr. Hees: Three important ones.

Mr. Trudeau: Three important ones? I imagine they were all important, Madam Speaker. I wish the hon. member for Northumberland would spend a little more time reading the 133 which have been released, because he would get a lot of good information on which he could base questions.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hees: We want the three with the real information.

THE ECONOMY

REDUCED PURCHASING POWER OF CANADIANS

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, I, too, would like to ask a question of the Prime Minister. Is the Prime Minister aware that the purchasing power of Canadians has been dramatically reduced in the past year, in fact to the extent that Canadians now have in comparative terms $244 less a year to spend than they had a year ago? As a result of this, there has been a reduction in the industrial capacity figures to the point where they are at the lowest they have been in 18 years. Bankruptcies are up 20 per cent. People cannot find their way to meet mortgage payments or renew mortgages. Will there be a time when we in this House are going to be able to deal with the problems confronting tens of thousands of Canadians all across this country?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I think I indicated in the House a few days ago that it is obvious, with the vast transfer of spending power resources which Canadians are now embarked upon in order to purchase petroleum abroad under OPEC prices, that the rate of growth of the Canadian economy, of the purchasing power, and so on, is not as great as it used to be. The House knows that we have before us now a budget and an energy policy which will increase the price of petroleum, but it is an increase considerably less than that requested by the producing provinces.

Mr. Crosbie: That is untrue. It is completely untrue. It is unfounded. In fact, I could go further, but it would be unparliamentary.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for St. John's West does not have the floor just now.

Mr. Crosbie: I wish I had.

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, this is a novel interjection because the hon. member for St. John's West said that the prices for petroleum that we are bringing down in our energy policy are not less than those requested by the producing provinces. This is complete news to me. I am sure it would be news to the Premier of Alberta that we are proposing prices with which he now agrees. The hon. member for St. John's West has made a complete untruth with that interjection which, as usual, had nothing to do with reality.

Mr. Crosbie: Get the sand out of your head.

Mr. Deans: Madam Speaker, I will read Hansard to see if my question was answered.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Deans: My supplementary question is for the Prime Minister. Recognizing that consumer purchasing power has decreased, that the manufacturing sector is on the decline, that unemployment is rising, that there are fewer people who can go into the stores and buy the products which we must manufacture, and that interest rates have contributed significantly to the problem which confronts us in Canada today, is it not realistic to think that perhaps we in the House of Commons and the government should reassume the political responsibility for the setting of interest rates, and that we should establish an interest rate in Canada which is made in Canada, as was promised by the Liberal party during the last election?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, the premise of the question is fallacious.

Mr. Deans: It is not, and you are out of touch.

Mr. Trudeau: The hon. member says it is not and that I am out of touch.

Mr. Deans: Try living on it.

Mr. Trudeau: I heard him say that the manufacturing sector is on the decline.

Mr. Crosbie: It is.

Mr. Trudeau: I have here an indication that real output in manufacturing, as measured by real domestic product, increased sharply in December, 1980, a 2.2 per cent advance—

Mr. Crosbie: We are not there yet. That is next month.

Mr. Hees: That is November.

Mr. Paproski: It is November 28, and it is Friday.

An hon. Member: This is Canada, Pierre.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I have the figures here for the third quarter which ended September, 1980. If the hon. member or the howling members opposite have the figures for the fourth quarter, I would be very happy to hear them.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

SPORTS

CANADIAN AMATEUR HOCKEY ASSOCIATION—MINOR HOCKEY CHAMPIONSHIP

Hon. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton North): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Labour who is responsible for fitness and amateur sport. It is my understanding since the last exchange we had in this chamber that the Canadian Amateur Hockey Association, Murray Costello and company, has reconsidered its decision with regard to Father Athole Murray's Notre Dame College in Wilcox, Saskatchewan, in connection with its hockey program. Is this true or false, or does the minister have something to add to that?

Hon. Gerald Regan (Minister of Labour): Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for the question. There has been no specific announcement by the Canadian Amateur Hockey Association in relation to Father Athole Murray's Notre Dame College at Wilcox, Saskatchewan. However, an announcement was made in Halifax by Brian Wakeland, the national president of the Canadian Amateur Hockey Association for minor hockey, that this year's Air Canada Cup for Canada's minor hockey championship would be played on the basis of last year's rules.

This answer was given in response to some complaints and problems which were affecting other areas besides Notre Dame and indicated that all teams eligible to participate last year, including Notre Dame, would be eligible to participate this year. This is very encouraging news. If the hon. member's question and my response elicits a clarification from the Canadian Amateur Hockey Association, that would be very pleasing; but it is apparent on the basis of the official statement in Halifax that all teams which participated last year, including Notre Dame, will be eligible. If that is accurate, I want to thank the hon. member, members from all three parties who made representations on behalf of Notre Dame's cause and the thousands of Canadians who wrote to me on the subject.

LOTTERIES

DISPOSITION OF UNCLAIMED FUNDS

Hon. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton North): My short supplementary, Madam Speaker, is directed to the same minister. Will the minister advise the House whether he is using the interest on the unclaimed loto funds for amateur hockey and football scholarships for those worthy students who require money? The money is sitting there; what is the minister doing with the $750,000 interest accumulated on the unclaimed Loto Canada funds?

Hon. Gerald Regan (Minister of Labour): Madam Speaker, I have some difficulty determining how that question is supplementary to the original question. However, I want to assure the hon. member that we are continuing to improve and to expand the grants in aid to students who have achieved excellence, not only in the Olympics, but now also in non-Olympic sports in the country. We have not specifically applied any particular source of funds, because the unclaimed lottery funds, from the days when we used to have that wonderful organization known as Loto Canada, are being held against the possible outcome of some lawsuits which were undertaken by people who felt the Conservative government's withdrawal from Loto Canada did them a legal injustice.

Mr. Paproski: What did that have to do with my question?

AGRICULTURE

PROPOSED CANADIAN AGRICULTURAL EXPORT COUNCIL

Mr. Jesse P. Flis (Parkdale-High Park): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the fact that the previous Liberal government took initiatives to establish the Canadian Agricultural Export Council under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Agriculture, only to be disregarded by the previous government—I repeat, Madam Speaker, only to be disregarded by the previous government—will the minister update this House on the progress of CANAGREX, its structure and method of financing?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, CANAGREX, the Canadian Agricultural Export Council, is under very serious discussion. Preliminary drafting of the legislation is proceeding. I hope we will have something in the not too distant future to report to the House.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PASSPORT GUARANTORS—NON-RECOGNITION OF VETERINARIANS

Mr. Lorne Greenaway (Cariboo-Chilcotin): Madam Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Recently a veterinarian in British Columbia signed as guarantor on a passport application form and it was returned as unacceptable by the department. The reason they gave was that they do not recognize veterinarians as a profession. I am a veterinarian and I find that very offensive. If you look at the document, Madam Speaker, you see that school teachers, postmasters, lawyers, dentists and others can sign these applications. Will the minister do something about this and recognize that these people are professionals? They are the James Herriots of Canada, for heaven's sake.

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, passports come under my responsibility. The guarantor section of the passport application form is not meant to be a stamp of government approval of various professions in Canada; it is related only to serving the needs of the public. We believe we have provided for a sufficiently large number of classes of guarantors so that all of the public is adequately served.

Mr. Greenaway: Madam Speaker, I find that answer unacceptable. The answer that came from the department was that they do not recognize that profession as a profession. That is just unacceptable. I therefore ask the minister to have a look at that.

Mr. MacGuigan: Madam Speaker, I do not know what may have been said to the hon. member, but I can tell him it is not our duty to pass on various professions. It is our duty merely to ensure that the people have a wide selection of possibilities for passport guarantors.

RAILWAYS

WHITE PASS AND YUKON ROUTE—MEETING TO DISCUSS CLOSURE

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. According to a news broadcast this morning by the CBC at Whitehorse, the president of the White Pass and Yukon Route Corporation, Mr. Tom King, has called a meeting of all railway employees and their wives for tomorrow morning in the Travel Lodge in Whitehorse to discuss closure of the White Pass railway. Has the minister been informed of such a meeting? I know that he is in the middle of negotiations which have been going on for some time now, negotiations commenced by the previous government. When is the minister going to exercise some leadership and initiative in coming to a solution to the very critical problem facing the railway so that it will continue its operation and provide the only link to tide water that the Yukon has?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, I think the hon. member is confusing two issues. As I understand it, the meeting taking place there is relative to a labour dispute that, hopefully, is in the process of being settled. The question whether a commissioner will be appointed should more properly be directed to the Minister of Labour. I understand that is the essence of that particular meeting.

If the hon. member is referring to what we are going to do with respect to White Pass in terms of the very sizeable capital investment which will be required to keep the railway in fit shape, I had detailed discussions on that matter with Mr. Pearson and the Yukon government in the last couple of days. He is aware of the situation, namely, that we have had our offer on the table for some time and so has the Yukon government, and jointly have committed ourselves. We are waiting for some word from Alaska, which as the hon. member knows has a great interest in this matter and some vested interest as well. Many Americans are employees of that railway. The indication is that they would be prepared to make an investment also, but nothing definite has evolved. We hope that, because of a change in the political situation there in the last few weeks, they will now give their attention to the matter and indicate whether they are prepared to participate in this capital infusion along with ourselves and the Yukon government. As the hon. member well knows, we are looking for Cyprus-Anvil to have some input as well. I hope the whole thing will come together in the next month or six weeks.

Mr. Nielsen: Madam Speaker, I have a very brief supplementary. My information, of which I do not vouch for the accuracy, is that the meeting called for tomorrow morning includes the wives of the railway employees. I wonder if the minister's information is the same, because it appears rather odd to me that the wives would be invited to a meeting to settle a labour dispute. We will all rest easier, of course, if the minister can assure us that the railway will not be closed and that he expects to find a solution very shortly to the real problems confronting the railway.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Madam Speaker, the railway is functioning; what is needed are improvements. Certainly that is our intent. It is essential to the Yukon that it continue to function and that it have this enrichment we are talking about. There may be concern expressed at this meeting with respect to the future of White Pass, but I think the labour dispute is of some considerable concern. I was happy to note, and I hope it is accurate, that Cyprus itself has indicated some willingness to afford employment opportunities to those who may be laid off. Naturally, I hope that will not be necessary.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

RADIO-CANADA JOURNALISTS DISPUTE—INQUIRY RESPECTING RESUMPTION OF NEGOTIATIONS

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Communications in his responsibilities for reporting to the House on behalf of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. Since Radio-Canada journalists have been without a contract for almost a year now, have been on strike since October 30, a strike incidentally supported by politicians of the three major parties in that province, and since the CBC has declined even to meet with the union since the strike started, does the minister intend to use his good offices to get the parties together again to settle this issue which has been depriving Francophones of news and public affairs programs since the strike began?

[Translation]

Hon. Francis Fox (Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question concerning the present strike by Radio-Canada reporters. The hon. member wishes to know when negotiations might resume. I am pleased to advise him that CBC management spokesmen have informed me this morning of their intention to meet today with union members to determine whether negotiations might resume with a view to achieving a new collective agreement.

[English]

Mr. Rose: May I ask the minister if he has any more information about the meeting and whether the CBC is ready to depart from its Bob Cratchit offer of 7 per cent and 7½ per cent—

Mr. Knowles: Scrooge.

Mr. Rose: Is it Scrooge? I am sorry. It is the journalists who are the Bob Cratchits! Seven per cent and 7½ per cent over a two-year contract fails even to keep up with inflation. In addition, is the CBC prepared to discuss or negotiate improving working conditions and hours of work for those journalists, not only in the province of Quebec but for CBC journalists and other workers throughout Canada?

[Translation]

Mr. Fox: Madam Speaker, of course, it is CBC management which must take part in the negotiations aimed at a new collective agreement. I am informed by management that the initial position was based on the conciliation committee report which the union rejected. Nevertheless, Radio-Canada is prepared to sit down with the union in order to come to an agreement as quickly as possible.

CROWN CORPORATIONS

LEGISLATION TO REQUIRE ANNUAL REPORTING

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Madam Speaker, my question deals with what I consider important reports which, in the opinion of many of us, have been gathering dust. I refer to the Lambert commission report and D'Avignon report. My question is addressed to the President of the Treasury Board. Is his department considering or contemplating legislation to control, force accountability and direct these Crown corporations to give us annual reports on how they manage public funds? If so, what stage has the consideration of this legislation reached as of today and are there any obstacles at this time that he can foresee? Would the minister inform the public as to why we should not have legislation controlling these Crown corporations?

• (1200)

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, let me advise the House first of all that these reports are certainly not gathering dust. In fact, very substantial progress has been and will be made in bringing forward a co-ordinated response to the Lambert and D'Avignon reports.

With respect to Crown corporations per se, I know this House has great interest in the subject and a bill was previously tabled. We have received many constructive criticisms of that bill. I know there is considerable interest on all sides of the House; I recently read a speech by the hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe on the subject. I would like to assure hon. members that I will be bringing forward proposals with respect to Crown corporation legislation to my colleagues in the very near future, and by that I mean within a matter of days.

CAMPAIGN OF AWARENESS TO NEEDS OF THIRD WORLD

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I want to ask him about the "Dear friend" letter which he sent out recently together with a questionnaire entitled "Study No. T.0061". In his letter the minister implies that he is seeking the views of opinion leaders across Canada. A first step in this campaign is "to enhance the awareness of Canadians to the needs of the Third World".

How many of these questionnaires did the minister send out? Did they go to all parts of Canada, and how were the recipients selected? Perhaps the minister can tell us if it is a substitute for the government's costly advertising campaign which has been going on recently.

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, in order to lay the groundwork for a campaign of public information, some months ago I decided to have a large-scale oral survey of Canadian public opinion to enable the campaign to be better planned. That survey has been completed, and shortly I will be releasing the results to the public and, of course, to this House.

The questionnaire to which the hon. member refers is the same questionnaire which was also sent to a representative selection of public opinion leaders across Canada. It was a supplement to the more scientifically conducted questionnaire, and the results of that will also be available to the public in the long run.

Mr. Clarke: Madam Speaker, the minister obviously has more faith in the Post Office than some of us. The questionnaire was mailed on November 6 requesting a return by November 12. Can the minister tell us how many he has received back and when he might be releasing the results to the House?

Mr. MacGuigan: Madam Speaker, the primary survey is the scientifically conducted one, the results of which will be released within a week or two. The other one, the supplementary one to which the hon. member is referring, that of opinion leaders, will depend upon when we feel a sufficiently representative number has been returned.

INDIAN ACT

ALLEGED DISCRIMINATION AGAINST INDIAN WOMEN

Mr. Lorne McCuish (Prince George-Bulkley Valley): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Reading from a prepared text, in his speech to the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development on November 18 the minister stated, and I quote:

> I agreed last summer to suspend sections of the Indian Act which discriminated against Indian women, when asked to do so by band councils.

Is the minister saying that he is prepared to allow sex discrimination and make third-class citizens of Indian women solely at the whim of a band council?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, I think the implication of that question is rather insulting to chiefs of band councils across Canada, because the essence of the action I took was simply—and this is in line with our commitment and, I understand, the position of the opposition too—the promotion of a great deal more self-government by Indians across this country.

In essence, it is saying that if the chief and band council wish me—and they give me a BCR—to use my powers under section 4 of the Indian Act to set aside the alleged discrimination in section 12 with respect to an Indian woman who marries a non-Indian man, I will do so on receipt of that BCR. It is the government's way of saying to Indians that with respect to this particular problem they can make the decision. Once they make the decision, we will adhere to a decision they themselves make and give them an opportunity to settle this question without having non-Indians settle it for them.

Mr. McCuish: Madam Speaker, the minister is saying that he has in fact condoned negative action by a band council. I wonder if he would relate the position to his home town of Hamilton. If the mayor and council of that city decided that the women in Hamilton no longer should have the right to own land or to vote, would he concur with the action and support that mayor and council? If not, by what rationale can he hold the rights and privileges of women in Hamilton above those in Grassy Plains?

Point of Order—Mr. Mazankowski

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Madam Speaker, if the hon. member is suggesting that the government should move in and tell the Indian people how they should cope with the situation themselves at the same time as we are talking in the context of self-government, I think that is contrary to the position not only the official opposition and many others have taken but also the position of the Canadian government. In any event, it has been stated by the Prime Minister and I in the past that, with respect to certain anti-discriminatory provisions of the patriation resolution, within three years this will have application to do away with the type of discrimination about which the hon. member is talking. However, surely it is not unreasonable in the meantime without interference from non-Indians to allow the Indian people themselves to cope with this particular problem.

MR. MAZANKOWSKI—STATEMENTS MADE BY MR. PEPIN DURING QUESTION PERIOD ON NOVEMBER 24

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order which arises out of answers to questions given by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) on Monday last. This is the first opportunity I have had to raise this matter. I regret that the Minister of Transport is not in the House at the present time.

My point of order has to do with answers which were given in connection with questions having to do with funds which were committed by our administration for the purpose of urban transportation improvements in the province of Ontario. This exchange can be found at page 4981 of Hansard.

In his customary flippant and superficial manner the minister attempted to discredit the genuine commitment and undertaking which were made by our government at that time. Moreover, in my view, either advertently or inadvertently, the minister imputed motives which I believe are unfair to me but, more particularly, I believe could cast a reflection upon the minister of transportation and communications of the province of Ontario. I simply wish to correct the misunderstanding for the benefit of the minister and, indeed, for the House.

As I am sure the minister is aware, the question of urban transportation and improvement of the urban transportation system in Toronto has been the subject of a tremendous amount of discussion, debate, and exchange of correspondence. I believe it goes back to 1976. There was an extensive exchange of correspondence, telephone calls and discussions. Indeed, this intensified during our tenure of office, particularly during the latter part of 1979 and the early part of 1980, and culminated in an exchange of documents which constituted agreement in principle.

The agreement was to provide for additional funding in the amount of $10 million for the fiscal year 1979-80 and the next two fiscal years, the sum of which would amount to $30 million in total. A letter was directed to me from Mr. Snow outlining the request. I subsequently directed a telex to Mr. Snow which concurred and provided approval of the additional funding in the amount of $10 million in the current fiscal year and an additional $10 million for improvements to the Toronto Union Station and the Bathurst railway corridor.

This was also followed by a press release which was issued by the minister of transport and communications of the province of Ontario, and it was very clear, in the exchange of correspondence and in the documentation, that these were funds in addition to the existing program. The Minister of Transport should also note, if he is not aware of it, that each year—

An hon. Member: That is not a point of order.

Mr. Mazankowski: I am correcting the record, or the implication—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Mazankowski: With all due respect, Madam Speaker, members across the way suggest I am wasting the time of the House. It is my integrity and the integrity of the minister of transport and communications of the province of Ontario which are at stake. I believe they are worthy of preserving, and I simply want to—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I believe that the hon. member on the other side was reminding the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) that he was entering into debate, which I think he was doing in exposing this point of order. I would further remind him that if he feels the minister has imputed motives to him, he can perhaps discuss that, but the fact that the minister might have imputed motives to someone else who is not in the House should not be brought out in the manner in which the hon. member is doing it now. I would ask the hon. member to restrict himself to the point of order he wants to raise concerning himself, and not other people who are not in the House.

Mr. Mazankowski: Thank you, Madam Speaker. The point I want to make is that the minister has suggested that the undertaking was simply the shake of a hand, that there was no Treasury Board submission, and that it was, in effect, improper for me to have done what I did. I should indicate to the House and for the benefit of the minister that he should know that every year there were lapsed funds in the UTAP. Last year was no exception, and I am sure that this year is no exception. If he were to check that out, clearly he would find that to be a fact. He also suggested that there was no Treasury Board submission. The fact of the matter is that he should know that Treasury Board approval is not required for the utilization of lapsed funds in the case of the fiscal year 1979-80, provided that the proposal complies with the terms set out governing the program. So clearly the funding was in order, appropriate, quite proper and correct.

I am satisfied that the funding for the next two years, which would have required Treasury Board approval, would and should have been honoured. So, Madam Speaker, the commitment was more than simply a handshake or a partisan gesture, as the minister said, on the eve of an election. It was a genuine, well-discussed and well-thought-out-proposal that was to be honoured and should be honoured, and I hope and trust that the Minister of Transport will change his mind and look at the file—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. It is very hard for me to see whether or not that point of order is well founded and I would have to check the record. Since the minister is not present in the House at this time, we will leave that point of order in abeyance and see whether the minister wishes to reply to it at another time.

I have notice of a question of privilege from the hon. member for Humboldt-Lake Centre (Mr. Althouse).

PRIVILEGE

MR. ALTHOUSE—CONTENTS OF TELEX RESPECTING PLANT BREEDERS' RIGHTS

Mr. Vic Althouse (Humboldt-Lake Centre): Madam Speaker, in the last day or so a copy of a telex has found its way to my office. The telex, addressed to the attention of all directors, was issued on July 25 of 1980. Its contents read as follows:

> The NDP is forwarding you a questionnaire on plant breeders' rights. I suggest that you and your scientists do not reply.

It is signed by A. A. Guitard who, I understand, is the research director for western Canada. All of this is under the Department of Agriculture.

I have realized for a long time that plant breeders' proposals are controversial and that there are strong feelings in all sectors of agriculture and within the agricultural community, including research people, in connection with that issue. I also understand the difficulties faced by plant breeders, a great many of them being civil servants who are unable to speak out. I realize that they have strong opinions, as they should, because the outcome will affect the kind of job they are doing. At the same time I am very cognizant of the fact that they are in that position, and for that reason no such questionnaire was ever considered, prepared, or issued. The closest thing to that type of questionnaire we have ever undertaken is a question which I put to my constituents on the back of my Householder which I will be sending out next Monday on what they think of plant breeders' rights. I ask them to respond either for or against them.

The matter which I raise as a question of privilege today is with regard to the wording of the telex which specifies that a questionnaire is being forwarded by the NDP. This is not a request by management alerting people to the fact that we might or might not be submitting a questionnaire, or mentioning that possibility. It states specifically that the NDP "is forwarding" such a questionnaire. This leaves the implication that this is the case, which it is not. It puts all of us in a rather strange position.

Here we have a directive from a research scientist, which Mr. Guitard is, a man accustomed to dealing with hard facts. Either he has forgotten his lifelong training, which I doubt, or he has been fed some facts which turn out not to be facts, or has been fed information which he believes to be factual. Again this implies that either some untruthful information is being disseminated in the department about myself or my party, or that such information is being gathered and provided, which, in either case, does not make me feel any more happy about it.

Because this directive indicates anticipated actions which we have not taken, and states that a certain event will take place, it presents what history has proven to be an untruth or, to use a more parliamentary term, inaccurate information. I think we have a question of privilege before us and I would ask you, Madam Speaker, to consider all the facts and to give them your attention.

Madam Speaker: It seems to me, first of all, that the hon. member is referring to a telex which dates back to July 25, 1980. I understand from the hon. member's intervention that the telex was announcing something that was going to happen later, and therefore the hon. member probably waited to see whether that action would in fact take place. I would remind the hon. member that questions of privilege must be raised at the earliest opportunity.

However, that is not the substance of his question of privilege. I do not find a question of privilege in the point raised by the hon. member. He has probably a grievance. He is complaining about improper information being sent to someone. Also, the hon. member himself is not personally implicated, and the reference is rather to the NDP party, so the privileges of the hon. member have not been directly breached by this action, it seems to me. At any rate, the privileges of members do not extend outside of the House, so I really feel that the hon. member has only a grievance. We have heard it now, and I do not see a question of privilege in his point.

• (1220)

MR. WADDELL—STATEMENTS MADE BY MR. ANDRE

Madam Speaker: The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell) on a question of privilege.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Madam Speaker, last night when the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre) was speaking in the debate on the Petroleum Administration Act, as reported at page 5121 of Hansard he had the following to say:

> The New Democratic Party energy critic, the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell), was bordering on McCarthyism in some of his remarks which were directed at the hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington).

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I was in the House last evening and I heard the exchange which took place in the debate to which the hon. member refers. It involved not only the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre) who is not here today, but also the reputation and the standing of the hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington).

I respect the right of the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell) to rise on a question of privilege, even though he may be wrong on both counts with respect to both members. But I think it would be adding discourtesy upon discourtesy if the member were allowed to proceed in the absence of the members who were involved by name last night in those remarks. I think it might be appropriate if we allowed the matter to rest until they are here.

Madam Speaker: The hon. member is free to rise at this time on what he considers to be a question of privilege but perhaps is a point of order. I am confused as to what the hon. member is really raising because he called it a point of privilege. I am confused as to whether it is a question of privilege or a point of order. At any rate, the hon. member has heard the suggestion of the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker). Does the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell) want to extend that courtesy and delay his point of order or question of privilege until a time when these members will be present in the House?

Mr. Waddell: Madam Speaker, at page 5125 of Hansard, I am reported as saying the following:

> Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I wish to give the Chair and the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre) notice that I wish to reserve my right to raise a question of privilege in this House after I have read in Hansard the reference in the hon. member's speech to McCarthy and other remarks with reference to me.

Mr. Nielsen: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Waddell: Just let me finish my point. I do not think the member need rise. I am prepared to extend—

Madam Speaker: The hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) on a point of order.

Mr. Nielsen: I will defer it because I heard the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell) say something that the Chair probably did not hear.

Mr. Waddell: I have said that I gave notice last night.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Yes, that is correct.

Mr. Waddell: The hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) is correct that the hon. member for Calgary Centre and the hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington) are not in their places today. The third person who is involved in this question of privilege—and it has been raised all week in the House of Commons; it is a very important point with respect to western separatism—is the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark), the hon. member for Yellowhead, who has been asked on numerous occasions to reply in the debate—we have had a six-day debate—on my charges with respect to his position on western Canada.

Mr. Nielsen: He is not here today.

Mr. Waddell: He is not here today either. In the interests of getting this matter properly aired, I will reserve my right to raise the matter. I intend to bring it up on Monday. I will tell the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton that right now, and I hope he will have the three members here in the House to reply.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Just so that it is clear, certainly I will advise the hon. members, but I make no guarantee to the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway with respect to the attendance of members.

Mr. Ouellet: Where is he?

Mr. Evans: Where is the hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington)?

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): They are likely in their ridings. It may have escaped the Postmaster General (Mr. Ouellet) that the hon. member for Capilano represents a seat in British Columbia and that the hon. member for Calgary Centre represents a seat in Alberta. It takes a little time for them to get to their constituencies. The Postmaster General and I are quite fortunate in that regard.

An hon. Member: It takes longer to go by private rail car.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): We can get to our constituents very easily. I want to make it clear that certainly I will inform the hon. members with respect to the matters raised. I want to thank the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway for his marvellous display of courtesy.

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Madam Speaker, when the question of privilege of the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell) is being considered, when he sees fit to bring it up, it should be noticed and realized that only the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre) is mentioned in his notice of a question of privilege. The hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington), the hon. member for Yellowhead (Mr. Clark), and myself are not mentioned.

Mr. Waddell: They will be.

Mr. Clarke: I would not want the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway to think that he could include all members when he has only reserved the right to raise a question of privilege concerning one member.

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, I take note of the remarks of the opposition House leader. I sympathize with these members from British Columbia and Alberta.

Mr. Nielsen: You think they have problems!

Mr. Ouellet: I realize that they have to go back to their ridings every weekend and sometimes leave on Thursday night. This brings me to wonder why the opposition has not yet accepted the very keen proposition of my government House leader to have only four sitting days each week.

Mr. Siddon: Because the House should work.

Mr. Ouellet: I hope this will be considered seriously and that we will get on with the long overdue amendment to our working schedule in Parliament.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): I will leave that one alone.

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, I rise on another point of order, but now that I am on my feet, perhaps I should reject the suggestion that we should work any shorter a week than we are now working.

Mr. Ouellet: Now we know who blocks reforms here.

Mr. Knowles: A three-day work week would be an even greater reform—is that what you want?

Mr. Ouellet: There is no reason why we cannot work longer hours on three or four days.

Madam Speaker: I thought the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) was rising on a different question of privilege which I should like to hear, if possible.

POINTS OF ORDER

MR. KNOWLES—USE BY MEMBERS OF AIR TRAVEL PRIVILEGES

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, perhaps I should call it a point of order to save Your Honour having to rule on it. During motions under Standing Order 43 today, the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Miss Carney) moved one in which she referred to the fact that members of Parliament have the right to do their air travelling in Canada first class.

I should like to make the point, although the member did not say that all our travel is first class, that there was an implication there which I think should be corrected. Many of us—perhaps most of us—do our air travelling in Canada economy class, and I think that should be on the record.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

MR. EVANS—STATEMENT MADE BY MR. BEATTY

Mr. John Evans (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order of which I gave notice on November 26, 1980. I refer to page 5092 of Hansard and a question of the hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Beatty) during question period to the Right Hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). In the question the member indicated clearly that the testimony of Mr. Justice Clyne of Vancouver before the constitutional committee indicated that the proposed actions of the government with regard to the constitution were, in his opinion, unconstitutional. I should like to have that matter reviewed, because I listened to the testimony and that is not what he said. In fact, he said they were constitutional in his opinion.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): That is not a point of order. It is something which occurred during committee proceedings.

Madam Speaker: Yes, the hon. member should know that he should not refer to proceedings of committees in the House. However, I have listened to his point of order and I will just leave it at that.

EMPLOYMENT OPPORTUNITIES FOR THE '80s

Second report of the special committee on Employment Opportunities for the '80s—Mr. Allmand.

[Editor's Note: For text of above report, see today's Votes and Proceedings.]

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Madam Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I am the vice-chairman of the committee and I would like to bring to the attention of the House that I have not yet seen the report which has just been tabled.

I understand from question period that the committee was dictated to by the government House leader. I would need some time to prepare a question of privilege adequately on the report. Therefore I would request Your Honour's indulgence to allow me time to review the record and look at the report.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Madam Speaker, I rise with respect to the same matter. Notice of the meeting to prepare the report referred to was given to all members on the committee, including the hon. member opposite. He was telephoned and he knew when the meeting was to take place. The reason he did not see the report is that he did not attend the meeting. He was told. I discussed the content of the report with him on several occasions. I did so a few minutes ago in the House. At that time he did not mention the point he has just raised to me.

[Translation]

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, the hon. member of the opposition claims that I gave instructions with regard to the preparation of the report that was just tabled. I want it to be clear once and for all that that is absolutely false. What the hon. member has just said is absolutely untrue. It may be wishful thinking on his part, but I can assure him it is not the case. I gave no instructions whatsoever to that committee. The committee in question is a parliamentary task force which is to report on December 19. I understand this report is a preliminary report, and I had nothing at all to do with its preparation. I trust the hon. member will have the courage to withdraw his accusation which I take as a serious personal insult if not a direct accusation.

[English]

Mr. Hawkes: Madam Speaker, I am at a disadvantage because I did not attend the meeting. I have seen the reports of the meeting and I attended previous meetings. I think there is a great deal of testimony from members of the committee which would indicate that procedures in that committee and the substance of this report are, in effect, being dictated by the government House leader. I would like the opportunity to examine the record and come back to the House on my question of privilege to put the evidence before the House.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, I wish to emphasize that the hon. member does not seem to have the courage to withdraw the completely unwarranted and unfounded accusation he has just made and that he is trying to hide behind the examination of I do not know what notes or the cross-examination of I do not know what hon. member. I insist that he should withdraw this false accusation, without any basis in fact, which he has just repeated by saying that I contributed directly or indirectly to the preparation of the report which has just been tabled. I categorically deny this accusation. I am certain that my word is at least as good as his and I am asking him to believe me and to withdraw the unfair accusation that he has made.

[English]

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Madam Speaker, perhaps I could suggest a way out of this difficulty. I suggest to the hon. member who raised the question, for the purposes of deferring it, that he withdraw the current statement with respect to the alleged participation on the part of the government House leader until such time as he has read the report. Subsequently, he may present a question of privilege based on the alleged participation of the House leader and upon whatever evidence he may come up with at some later date. In the meantime, perhaps the hon. member would be disposed to withdraw any allegations at this time.

Mr. Hawkes: Madam Speaker, of course I accept the minister's word. This leads to another problem in that the committee report was drafted under a misunderstanding. The committee chairman may, in fact, wish to withdraw the report at a later date. I would like the question of privilege to be aired after I have had a chance to examine the public record.

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, I do not see what there is to check as concerns my participation in the preparation of this report. However, to clarify what both the hon. member and the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) do not seem to understand, I would like to say that this committee wants an extension of its deadline and that it should make that request in the very near future.

Obviously, I was consulted about this matter. However, regardless of consultations about the extension of the deadline, which we would be willing to grant if there is no debate in the House, I must state that in no way did I take part in the preparation of any report, and if this can allay the fears of the hon. member, I am convinced that he will no longer want to accuse me of anything. However, I would like this to be clarified today. There is nothing else to verify.

[English]

Madam Speaker: I was somewhat confused myself when the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Hawkes) said he would check the records. That type of allegation would not be included in the records since obviously, if something happened, it was conversation which took place among a number of people. I am happy that the hon. member has offered to withdraw these allegations and to take the hon. minister's word, as he has stated in the House. I think when a motion for concurrence is moved the hon. member could raise his objection at that point. For the time being the report has been presented and I will consider it as such.

PARLIAMENTARY EMPLOYEES COLLECTIVE BARGAINING ACT

MEASURE TO EXTEND PUBLIC SERVICE DEFINITION TO PARLIAMENTARY EMPLOYEES

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-621, to permit collective bargaining for employees of Parliament.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Rose: Madam Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to implement an all-party unanimous recommendation from a special committee studying the Public Service Staff Relations Act in 1967.

All members know that, technically, House of Commons employees are not members of the public service. This bill extends the right now enjoyed by the public service to people who work for Parliament.

I think the rumours, events, and controversy of the last few weeks attest to the fact that we need much better procedures on all fronts in terms of dealing with human relations in the House of Commons, with such matters as pay scales, seniority, bargaining rights and the like. I believe this bill will go part way in solving some of these very difficult problems for staff members working here on the Hill, which I think in the main tries to be one of the best employers in Canada, if not the best.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 84, 791, 941, 1,428, 1,536, 1,563 and 1,567. I would ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Question No. 84—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Where is the Featherbed file presently located and specifically, what is the exact municipal address along with the portion of the building at that address in which it is located?

2. What are the names of all persons who have access to the file?

3. What are the names of all persons who have had in any way whatsoever access to the file or any part of it in the past four years?

4. Has the RCMP shown the file or any parts thereof to any Solicitors General of Canada and, if so, what is their name?

5. What is the total number of names, individuals or any other entities mentioned in the file?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): By the Ministry of the Solicitor General (Royal Canadian Mounted Police):

1. The Featherbed file is retained at RCMP Headquarters, 1200 Alta Vista Drive, Ottawa. The pinpointing of the repository of the file is not considered to be in the public interest.

2. It is not considered to be in the public interest to divulge the names of persons who have access to this file.

3. See reply to part 2.

4. I am acquainted generally with the Featherbed file and have been informed that previous Solicitors General may also have been familiar with its contents.

5. The policy of the RCMP is to preserve the confidentiality of all information it holds on individuals and organizations.

CONTAMINATION OF WATERS

Question No. 791—Mr. de Jong:

1. Did the Dieldrin levels in herring gulls and bloater chubs continue to increase in 1979?

2. Was the source of the PCBs currently contaminating the St. Lawrence by way of the Grass River isolated and, if so, what was the source?

3. Was action taken regarding the PCB contamination near Mississauga at the Gulf Oil of Canada outfall and, if so (a) what was it (b) was it cleaned up (c) were or are charges to be laid?

4. Was action taken to remedy the pollution caused by the E.B. Eddy Company near Espanola, Ontario and, if so, what was such action?

5. Is action being taken to ensure that the 49 per cent of industry, that is not meeting discharge standards, will comply with the standards and, if so, to what extent?

6. Will the government ensure that in the future, real honest figures are used when compiling statistics on discharge requirements?

7. Is Canada doing anything to limit the amount of phosphorous loading in the Great Lakes and, if so, to what extent?

8. Is anything being done with regard to the amounts of photomirex in the environment and, if so (a) to what extent (b) is a study on the effects of this substance on humans being carried out?

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Departments of the Environment and National Health and Welfare as follows: 1. No.

2. The New York department of environmental conservation has collected and analysed samples of water and sediments in the Grass River in an attempt to isolate the source. However, the results are inconclusive, therefore NYDEC is preparing a comprehensive sampling program which will cover the greater Massena area and will include water, sediment and fish analyses. This program will commence next spring.

3. (a) The matter being referred to likely relates to the discharge of phenols from Gulf Oil of Canada Ltd. and not PCBs.

(b) At the request of the Ontario Ministry of Environment the company is preparing a report on control alternatives for this problem. As an interim measure, the company is diverting its effluents to the municipal sewage treatment plant during periods of high phenol discharge.

(c) Prosecutions will be considered only if the company demonstrates an unwillingness to effect a permanent solution to this problem.

4. The E.B. Eddy Forest Products Ltd. pulp and paper mill in Espanola produces bleached and unbleached kraft pulp and kraft paper. It is in compliance with the biological oxygen demand (BOD) and suspended solids (SS) requirement of the federal pulp and paper liquid effluent guidelines. It does not meet the toxicity requirement. A provincial control order was issued in February, 1978, that requires the mill to reduce both air and water pollution. The company recently signed an agreement with the federal and provincial governments to modernize the Espanola mill. The federal and provincial governments will contribute $25 million and the company will spend $225 million. The control order has been redrafted to conform to the agreement. The mill will meet all federal and provincial environmental requirements by the end of 1983.

5. In 1975-76 85 existing mills were in compliance with the federal objectives for biochemical oxygen demand and 52 mills for total suspended solids. All the "new" mills covered by effluent regulations were in compliance. At the end of 1978, the number of mills had increased to 93 mills in compliance for biochemical oxygen demand, and 65 mills for total suspended solids. Based on written compliance schedules negotiated with companies, 71 per cent and 58 per cent of total production should meet the federal government objectives by 1986 for biochemical oxygen demand and total suspended solids respectively. In addition, the DREE Forest Industry Modernization Program has resulted in the submission of projects for many mills in Quebec and Ontario. These projects will result in improved environmental controls. In virtually all cases, if the projects are completed in the five-year span of the program, those mills will be meeting the federal requirements for total suspended solids and biochemical oxygen demand. In fact, a great percentage will likely be in compliance before the end of the program period, that is, before 1984. Also several more proposals are expected, which should increase that percentage even more.

6. The government ensures that when compiling statistics on discharge requirements, only the best available data are used. The reliability of the data is verified by random spot-check samples which are taken by trained field personnel and analysed in government laboratories.

7. As a result of the findings of the lower Great Lakes study between 1963-68, it was determined that the accelerated eutrophication of Lake Erie and Lake Ontario was the result of increased nutrient inputs especially phosphate. In order to deal quickly and effectively with this identified problem, Canada acted independently to reduce the phosphorous (P) content of laundry detergents 8.5 per cent P dry weight in 1970 and 2.2 per cent P dry weight in 1972. This action resulted in a rapid reduction in the total phosphorous loading from municipal sewage treatment plants. In recognition of the deteriorating state of Great Lakes quality, the governments of Canada and the United States signed the Great Lakes Water Quality Agreement in 1972. This agreement called for implementation of phosphorous removal facilities at all sewage treatment plants discharging more than 1 million gallons per day into the lower Great Lakes. Plants of this size were required to reduce phosphorous concentrations in their effluents 1.0 mg/1 or less. By 1978, 40 of the 68 Canadian plants discharging to Lake Erie and Lake Ontario had achieved the 1.0 mg/1 target. In terms of the total allowable phosphorous discharge from these principal sewage treatment plants, Canadian sources exceeded the agreed upon limit to Lake Erie and Lake Ontario by 468 kg/day. In the United States, plants discharging to these lakes exceeded the limit by 11,288 kg/day. In Lakes Superior and Huron where a policy of nondegradation has been recommended, phosphorous control programs are now under review. The terms of the 1972 agreement also recognized the importance of determining the magnitutde of the phosphorous loading coming from non-point sources, including runoff from agriculture and forested areas. An international reference group was established to investigate this problem and its final report was presented to the International Joint Commission in July, 1978. This report identified runoff from agricultural land as an important source of phosphorous. The two governments have just received the final recommendations from the LJC and are preparing a formal response in consultation with Ontario. In 1978 the governments of Canada and the United States reaffirmed their commitment to improve Great Lakes water quality by signing a second Great Lakes Water Quality Agreement. The agreement specified future phosphorous target loads for each of the Great Lakes. Before proceeding under this agreement to further reduce phosphorous loadings to the Great Lakes, a number of issues remain which require resolution. These include refinement of the target loadings and existing loading estimates and clarification of the importance of determining that portion of total phosphorous entering the lakes which is available to promote undesirable algae and other growth. The governments of Canada and the United States are now proceeding to negotiate the phosphorous reductions which must be undertaken by each party to achieve the agreed upon target loadings. It is expected that these further reductions will be directed to municipal point sources and to important nonpoint sources of phosphorous. Until the negotiations on phosphorous loading allocations and compliance schedules are completed, it is difficult to estimate what commitment to further phosphorous reduction will be required in Canada.

8. (a) The Department of the Environment has monitored the levels of photomirex in herring gull eggs from Lake Ontario and found that the long-term trend in levels is downwards. Photomirex has also been monitored in fish samples. Co-operative studies with the Department of National Health and Welfare on the effects of photomirex are currently being conducted on laboratory animals.

(b) In so far as the Department of National Health and Welfare is concerned: No. In order to assess the effects of photomire on humans, the toxic properties of photomirex are being studied in experimental animals.

IMPORT STATISTICS

Question No. 941—Mr. MacKay:

With reference to a first quarter 1979 directive to Statistics Canada and Revenue Canada (Customs) from the Board of Economic Development Ministers concerning the problems of accuracy and detail in import statistics, what action has been taken by these departments?

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Department of National Revenue and Statistics Canada as follows: Revenue Canada has accepted responsibility for implementation of the government approved policy for handling the problems of accuracy of detailed import statistics. Treasury Board has approved the additional resources required by Revenue Canada for the next fiscal year, and for the remainder of the current fiscal year those resources which are available at Statistics Canada are being tranferred to Revenue Canada.

RCMP—RELOCATION—BEDFORD-SACKVILLE, N.S.

Question No. 1,428—Mr. Crosby:

1. Was a proposal made for the relocation of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police detachment in the Bedford-Sackville area of Halifax county, Nova Scotia and, if so, what was the proposal?

2. Is the RCMP authorized to purchase a property or purchase land and construct a building directly or must it go through a government agency?

3. Is the RCMP authorized to negotiate for the rental of (a) existing premises (b) premises to be constructed by a private party?

4. What is the estimated capital building cost or annual rental cost for providing facilities for the RCMP in Bedford-Sackville?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): By the Ministry of the Solicitor General (Royal Canadian Mounted Police):

1. The proposal was made by the commanding officer, "H" division in October, 1979, to the attorney general of Nova Scotia to relocate the Bedford detachment to Sackville, Nova Scotia, as Bedford was being granted town status, with resulting town policing responsibilities, and a move closer to our prime area was approved by the attorney general in November, 1979, with the proviso the RCMP remain in Bedford and provide police services until May, 1981. The proposed move was approved by RCMP headquarters in December, 1979.

2. The RCMP is authorized to purchase a property or purchase land and construct a building directly.

3. The RCMP is authorized to negotiate for the rental of (a) existing premise and (b) premises to be constructed by a private party.

4. The rental rate for the present detachment in Bedford is $1,750 per month, however, the annual rental cost for the new Sackville detachment is not known at this time. In the event of future construction, Public Works Canada will be asked to provide a cost estimate. In the interim, funds in the amount of $800,000 have been programmed tentatively for the purchase of a site in 1983-84 and construction of a new detachment building in 1985-86.

PORT OF CHURCHILL—SHIPMENT OF GRAIN

Question No. 1,536—Mr. Mazankowski:

Did the Minister of Transport arrange for the MV Arctic to pick up a shipment of grain at the Port of Churchill this fall and (a) if so, when is the voyage planned (b) if not, for what reason?

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Yes. (a) During the first half of November, (b) Not applicable.

TREATIES WITH OTHER COUNTRIES—CANADIAN CITIZENS TO SERVE PRISON SENTENCES IN CANADA

Question No. 1,563—Mr. Howie:

Does Canada have treaties with any country permitting Canadian citizens to serve their prison sentences in Canada instead of the country where the conviction was pronounced and, if so (a) with which countries (b) in each case, do the provisions of the Canadian parole system apply, or do similar provisions in the country where the conviction was pronounced apply?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): By the Ministry of the Solicitor General: In so far as the Correctional Service of Canada is concerned: Yes. (a) The United States, Mexico and Peru; (b) The provisions of the Canadian parole system apply.

2. Were tenders called for the contracts and were they advertised in the press and, if not, for what reason?

Petroleum Administration Act

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Attorney General and Minister of State for Social Development): For Canadian Unity Information Office:

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

PETROLEUM ADMINISTRATION ACT

PETITION TO REVOKE PROCLAMATION

The House resumed from Thursday, November 27, 1980, consideration of the motion of Mr. Waddell:

That the proclamation laid before the House on Wednesday, November 12, 1980, pursuant to subsection 52(3) of the Petroleum Administration Act, as proclaimed in PC 1980-2917, be revoked.

Mr. Roy MacLaren (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, yesterday at the time of adjournment I was speaking about the efforts which have been made by the national government to reach an agreement with the producing provinces, principally Alberta, on oil pricing. I recall for the House that we made proposals to the government of Alberta on March 18. We made proposals on May 13. We met again on June 18, 19 and July 24.

It was at the meeting on July 24 that we received Alberta's proposals for the first time. At that meeting we made two major proposals. We suggested a synthetic oil price which would be the lesser of $38 or the international price, plus an inflator, and we proposed a tertiary recovery price of some $30, plus an inflator. These proposals reflected what the industry had stated that it needed to proceed with the further development of the oil sands and of the enhanced recovery projects.

Alberta's response was that it could not consider the proposals for the development of the oil sands and of enhanced recovery in isolation. They did not say that our proposals were either unfair or unreasonable. In fact, with regard to tertiary recovery, we proposed a price greater than the price sought by the province of Saskatchewan. But it seemed to us that on that occasion Alberta was not seeking resolution. It was not to be persuaded to let the oil sands projects proceed.

Two parties, Mr. Speaker, are of course necessary to negotiate. An objective reading of the record will show that we approached the table in good faith, that we made substantial and reasonable offers, that we moved a long way in an attempt to get a fair deal for Canadians, and that we listened to provincial concerns. I should like to emphasize that the Petroleum Administration Act was introduced as a stop-gap measure.

I believe that both our government and the government of Alberta would prefer to see agreement. I believe also that we share the same goal of accelerating the development of our indigenous supplies. Accordingly, we do not understand why the provincial government continues to hold approval of the proposed new major oil sands project in abeyance. We believe that Alberta's decision in this regard is contrary to the stated goals of the Alberta government itself, and directly harmful to the many Albertans who pin their future economic hopes on those projects. These are matters which we would certainly like to discuss further with the Alberta government.

There has been a fundamental disagreement between the Government of Canada and the government of Alberta about revenue sharing. We had the distinct impression from the government of Alberta spokesmen that they felt that the national government should get any increased revenue only from the industry through corporate taxation. The Alberta energy minister has since said that this is not what he meant. This is an encouraging development and one which bodes well for our next meeting.

However, if the Alberta energy minister still feels that we have no claim to a greater portion of the government revenues and insists again that any reduction in the provincial share of revenues would be tantamount to federal expropriation of provincial resources, and he did not mean that we should derive increased revenues from industry, then he must mean that the federal government should derive additional revenues from Canadian consumers, including Albertans. This hardly seems fair. We could not continue in negotiations which were not producing results on any front, without making some national decisions.

The special provisions of the Petroleum Administration Act have not been proclaimed in isolation. They have been introduced in the context of a budget and a national energy program. Furthermore, these provisions have not been proclaimed without first making a strong effort to negotiate an agreement. They have not been proclaimed without the intention of continuing to seek an agreement with the producing provinces. We are ready to talk within the framework of our principles, entitlements, and needs.

We feel confident that we can fulfil our national obligations, and that includes our responsibilities in Alberta and in the west. No province will gain more than Alberta from federal spending on the new energy initiatives. Over the next four years spending on these initiatives in that province will approach $2.3 billion or approximately $1,030 per Albertan. The government of Alberta will receive a higher share of resource revenues than any other state or province in the world. For the industry itself there are guaranteed incentives, grants and prices which will facilitate long-term planning.

The estimated "net-back" on a barrel of oil before taxes will increase from the present $6.25 to $24.58 by 1990. Within the decade, Albertans will benefit from the $120 billion spent in their province on energy-related projects. Tens of thousands of construction jobs and more than 100,000 full-time industrial, technical and management jobs will be created. The spin-off benefits for the public service, the service industries, commerce, education and housing cannot be imagined. The Alberta government sells its gas at the lowest price in the world outside the Middle East, since the province eliminated its retail sales tax last year. Alberta looks to a real growth rate of about 5 per cent or 6 per cent annually. Others would make the growth rate as high as 9 per cent or 10 per cent. As Premier Blakeney of Saskatchewan has said, the major problem which his government will face in the next decade is how to deal with its new wealth.

Mr. Rose: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. MacLaren: Yes.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. parliamentary secretary's time has expired. A question may only be entertained with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Rose: In his remarks last night the parliamentary secretary made the point that no one in this House had discussed limiting the demand side in energy. Without predicting what kind of recommendations which the special task force on alternative energy and conservation will be making, there is a good deal of preoccupation about lowering the demand side.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. If the hon. member wishes to put a question he is at liberty to do so, but it appears that he is entering into debate. Would he please put his question?

Mr. Rose: I will get to my question. I am merely trying to put it in some context. Would the parliamentary secretary not agree that when 87 per cent of the national energy policy is directed toward the supply side and only 13 per cent is directed to the limiting of the demand side, the thrust of the government program is really toward the supply side and not the demand side?

Mr. MacLaren: Mr. Speaker, I want to pay tribute to those few who, during this debate, have called attention to the essential element in the total energy equation of reduction in demand. The hon. member opposite has been one of those exceptions who has given that factor in our energy policy the due weight it deserves. I said last night that the tendency in our debate has been to emphasize supply rather than the reduction in demand and substitution, which are essential elements in our national energy program.

As for the expenditure of the government on methods to substitute other forms of energy for oil and to promote conservation across Canada, the expenditures are being increased substantially and they, of course, can also be found in the budgets of other government departments such as Public Works and Canada Mortgage and Housing. All such programs are intended to reduce the dependency of Canadians on oil and increase the use of alternate forms of energy.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Humboldt-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, in continuing the debate on the motion presented by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell), I would like to spend some of my time this morning and this afternoon discussing the effects that the Petroleum Administration Act and the increased prices suggested therein will have on the agricultural sector and on the food production capabilities of the country. I would like to place this subject in the context of world requirements, both for food and for energy, and to discuss briefly the kind of energy policy which should be shaped in order to take into account these special considerations, not only as food producers in some parts of our economy, but as individuals who must survive on this planet and who must pass on the ability to survive on this planet to future generations.

The motion we are dealing with specifically talks about natural gas pricing. However, we had a companion motion which has been discussed in the last few days which dealt with oil pricing. If it is within the order of the House, I would like to extend that to a broad discussion on energy policy, coming back occasionally to the natural gas aspects of it. Basically, there are three broad categories into which an energy policy should fit. An energy policy should fit into an industrial strategy for the country and for its regions. An energy policy should fit the current and future needs of the nation and its regions. An energy policy should also be cognizant of the needs of all users and provide the means of rationalizing consumer patterns for the various forms available to everyone.

The pricing regime proposed by the government misses the point on most of these counts. The accumulation on earth of hydrocarbons, that is gas, oil and coal, took something like 600 million years. These hydrocarbons accumulated because minute quantities of the sun's energy converted organic matter by means of photosynthesis. This stored chemical energy is being released by man in the form of heat, and also as a form of feedstock for many industrial processes.

We began man's development of these types of energy as a feedstock with the coal tar developments in Europe at the turn of the century. We have developed petrochemical industries in the world today to make use of crude oil as a feedstock. We have a fertilizer industry which is dependent, in part, on natural gas as a feedstock. The hydrocarbons which have accumulated over 600 million years are being used up, both as a form of energy and as a form of industrial raw material. Unfortunately, when one looks at the consumption of this 600 million years of accumulation, we find that man has discovered how to use it on a fairly large scale in less than 200 years. During the latter part of the 1700s we started using coal in great abundance. We tapped into oil and gas 50 to 100 years ago. We are told that with the kind of use patterns we have established for ourselves at present, mankind will manage to use up the accumulated energy, which took 600 million years to form, in 200 to 300 years, if use patterns continue in the same way.

How has man decided, having been able to tap this kind of energy, what method to use to parcel up these rare, precious resources? Past practice has been to allow the market economy to do it. We have not adopted a legal practice which says, "Here, these are our resources. They have accumulated for our use. We should manage them for future generations as well as our own." Instead, we said, "anybody who can sit on top of a pool of oil, a vein of coal or a pocket of natural gas, can take it and sell it for whatever profit one can get." Therefore, we have allowed the profit motive to decide how to use up that energy. Of course, when one allows the profit motive to operate, to make the decisions in the economy, one finds that the decisions made are not always the best ones for current society, nor are they for future societies.

What happens under that kind of an allocation system? We find that areas with lots of wealth in terms of money and resources use these resources in great abundance. Areas that do not have very much in the way of energy resources do not get to share in the benefits of them. What we have developed and allowed to continue is a shortsighted and potentially disruptive practice of letting the market dictate.

It is two minutes to one o'clock, Mr. Speaker. May I call it one o'clock before I move on?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has given notice that he would like to raise a point of order.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I was consulting with the other House leaders, but this period of two minutes caught me and I was unable to get to the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker).

In view of the fact that the recorded vote, if it is requested, is to take place Monday rather than today, I would suggest that the putting of the question be deferred from 3.45 p.m. to four o'clock. In other words, I suggest that we put the question at four o'clock and have the vote on Monday as previously ordered. I suggest that now because we do not now know to which hon. member the extra time will be given.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, the purpose of my friend's interjection and suggestion is to allow members of the House to speak, and I think that is quite reasonable to have 15 minutes more in debate.

Mr. Collenette: Mr. Speaker, I can confirm the conversations. That follows the arrangement we had the other evening on the first proclamation under debate.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Agreed and so ordered.

It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this afternoon.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. When debate was interrupted at one o'clock, the hon. member for Humboldt-Lake Centre (Mr. Althouse) had the floor.

[English]

Mr. Althouse: Mr. Speaker, continuing on from where we were before the lunch hour, I had been talking about an energy program and allocation program that take into account various problems within countries and regions. I now want to deal with Canada and our consumption. As most people are aware, Canadians are the highest energy users on a per capita basis. This is in part due to our cold climate, but to a goodly extent it is due to some of the reasons I outlined before lunch, such as the method we use to allocate energy to those who can afford to use it. Because Canadians have been relatively wealthy as a nation, we use a great amount of energy. We have it to use, so we use it.

Each year we extract energy in approximately the following proportions: About 44 per cent is taken out of the ground in the form of petroleum, 19 per cent in the form of natural gas, 15 per cent in the form of coal, and the other 22 per cent is divided among hydroelectric power, nuclear energy, wood, and a great many other kinds of technology now becoming more popular.

The farm sector, on which I want to spend a bit of time this afternoon, uses only 3 per cent of the total energy consumed in Canada. Hon. members would not think that that would be something worth spending very much time discussing, but I do so because we are extracting 55 per cent of our energy resources from petroleum and natural gas, and it is from petroleum and natural gas sources that agriculture takes almost all of the fuel it requires under the technology we are using today.

Even though agriculture uses only 3 per cent of the total energy used in Canada, agriculture does use 7 per cent of the gasoline used in this country and 11 per cent of the diesel fuel. These two forms of fuel account for about two-thirds of the energy consumed in agriculture. Fertilizer consumes about another sixth of the energy used in agriculture, and a great deal of the energy input in fertilizer results because it is extracted from natural gas. The nitrogen we extract to use for fertilizers is taken mainly from natural gas. The other one-sixth, approximately, used in agriculture is the energy which is used in manufacturing the machinery farmers use in their productive process.

We are users of large amounts of energy, but when we look at the kinds of agricultural products we export, I suppose we are more or less competitive in terms of the amount of energy put into the production process and the amount of energy extracted. On wheat farms in Canada, for every unit of energy put in we extract approximately three and one-half units in an average year. We have a reasonably good conversion which compares favourably with that of England. It compares favourably with that of Australia, and quite favourably with wheat farming on an input-output basis in the United States.

We are competitive in a monetary sense and perhaps in an energy use sense, but when we throw in all the factors which should be computed in an energy input formula, we neglect in this particular input-output ratio to take into account the energy we are extracting from the soil, so to speak. I realize that is putting it a little crudely, but we have to remember that this continent is a new agricultural area. Particularly on the plains of western Canada and the western United States there was a large buildup of nitrogen in the soil. The soils out there took about 10,000 years to accumulate. There was a brief momentary surplus of nitrogen trapped in the form of humus in those soils, and we have been exploiting that trapped nitrogen at an alarming rate.

In my province of Saskatchewan we have been farming the soils for approximately 80 years. In those brief 80 years we have released approximately half of the nitrogen which was trapped in those soils. We have exported that nitrogen source along with our wheat and our other grains as we have sold them off the farm. Because of our having broken up the land and killed the original vegetation, and having gone into a cropping program whereby we leave the land lying fallow approximately half the time, the nitrogen and humus which were trapped in the upper foot or foot and a half of soil have tended to be leached down by the rain too far into the soil to be picked up by the roots of plants, so we have lost another approximately 8 per cent or 10 per cent of the nitrogen that way. However, most of it went out as part of the grain which was produced on the land.

We do not have many options in picking up that outflow of resource. It is an outflow from soil which is normally considered by many people to be a renewable resource, and yet some of the components of that soil are in fact not easily renewable. They can be replaced only with the kind of technology we have today, the result of which is chemical fertilizers, a component of which is nitrogen which is extracted from natural gas.

When natural gas prices increase, that immediately means an increase in the cost of production at the farm level. It means that because of the very difficult cost-price squeeze which always faces farmers, they will probably continue to export, in part at least, the nitrogen that is in the soil. They know there are probably another 80 years of nitrogen trapped in there. Some of it is coming out all the time. There will have to be some replacement every year, but farmers can carry on wearing the soil down because in the lifetime of this particular generation of farmers the nitrogen will not quite run out.

I suppose that is the same kind of moral dilemma and economic dilemma we, as Canadians, have when we look at the whole energy package. We say that this generation will have enough and that only the next generation will have to worry. I think that is indicative of bad judgment and bad planning, and shows up in the political judgments we in this country make. For instance, we are trying to increase exports of wheat, knowing that when we make that judgment we are going to be continuing to exploit the soil. The only way we can continue to do that is to have access to cheap natural gas to manufacture more nitrogen to replace the nitrogen we are pulling from the soil.

At the same time as we are trying to export wheat, which perhaps makes sense because we are processing natural products to some extent, we are processing gas into fertilizer and thereby employing some people. We are employing the product of that manufacturing process back into farming, recycling it again and exporting the wheat, so we are employing people at two or three stages. I could follow through with the argument in that respect, but I have a great deal of difficulty in seeing why we should be exporting natural gas without any processing going on, without providing any jobs, without increasing the technological aspects of our society but just shipping it off as a raw natural resource.

The pricing of a product has much to do with the kind of policy we have. In this country we have been setting a simple, straightforward price, and whoever can afford it will buy. I am pointing out today that that kind of system may leave our ability to produce enough food for this continent and this planet in jeopardy. I say this because the pricing regime we have been falling into, in the last several price proposals which have been put forward by this government and the previous one, is one which is based on the assumption that the price has to be competitive only with those of other countries.

We do have to be competitive with other countries. We realize that when we decide to export grain from our farms, but we also have to be careful of the way we allocate funds that we extract from a product. We are taking more and more just in the form of taxation, and the funds from that taxation are being used more and more to cover costs outside the energy field. They are not used to replace energy, they are not used to find alternatives to energy, they are not used to find technology which will avoid the use of energy. They are simply spent, almost like flaring up the gas well. They are being burned up with no thought for the after effects on the economy, no consideration of the future energy needs which people will have.

There are many alternate energy sources which farmers can use. Not all of them are applicable in the kind of market economy in which we are living. If we are using the philosophy of letting those pay who can, many of these technologies will not be integrated into the farming system in this country and in the whole of North America. We know, for instance, that we can produce a great amount of energy per acre by growing corn, and yet we also know that corn takes more energy input than any other kind of crop on a per acre basis and it is just barely competitive on an input-output basis. Yet, because of the economy of production under the current system, more and more agricultural production is going into corn.

The tendency is toward monoculture of crops such as corn or potatoes in some parts of our country, and in my part of the country crops like wheat. Even though we know that rotating the crops will maintain the nitrogen and humus level, most of our farmers are not following that practice by force of pure and simple economics. As long as there is partial replacement of the nitrogen through alternate forms, such as fertilizers, we will avoid ones which are produced naturally year after year. We know that legume rotation will maintain productivity at about the same level year after year. However, we also know that we will only extract grain crops about half of those years.

What we should be doing about it, Mr. Speaker, is re-evaluating our system of production. Many scientific organizations have been doing this. The Science Council of Canada has done a re-evaluation of production and energy use, and the Science Council of Saskatchewan has been doing this for the past two or three years. They have set out the parameters in which we are working. They know, for instance, that there is no point in expending any more energy, or dollars on energy which will go into machinery manufacture. I think that the economy is probably reacting to that finding of the Science Council of Saskatchewan, if you look at some of the problems that White and Massey-Ferguson are having.

By using energy input-output data you can predict what will happen in the economy down the road in as short a space as two or three years. We could be using the kind of agricultural practice which will capture more of the sun's energy and turn it into food output. We know that in this country we are capturing approximately 1 per cent of the potential energy of the sun with our agricultural methods. We know that in countries like Japan and Denmark they are capturing between 2 per cent and 4 per cent of the potential energy of the sun and converting that into food which can be consumed by man and beast.

Plants and the agricultural industry are a very clear alternative method of converting energy. They are well-known energy converters. Plants have been converting energy for millions of years. Man simply has to learn to use the existing methods to better advantage so that we can reduce our reliance on the kind of energy that has been trapped in rock formations below ground in our country, and we have been developing a technology to use the energy produced by living plants. Some of our physicists and small investors have come out with systems of transferring the sun's rays directly to electricity by introducing water to keep the collector cool. There is a double use of the sun's energy. We not only recover heat but we also produce electricity. These kinds of technologies will need more development. Development funds, however, are not being made available.

The kinds of people who have been experimenting with these technologies do not tend to be tied to a large energy production firm, such as Imperial Oil or Texaco, although those people are involved in the process. Most of the basic discoveries are being made, while not quite in backyards and small garages, almost at that level of technology and investment. These people need some assistance by way of special grants and special aid to help them bring those basic ideas, some of which have been tested out by reputable firms and reputable scientific organizations, to fruition. They have been shown to produce the kind of energy conversion that the investors claim, yet getting them to a marketable stage and developing the technology to a point where it can be generally available are a long way off and are still an expensive process. Yet, in spite of heavy taxes being demanded in the energy proposal before us and in previous ones, very little money is allocated in that direction.

We know that in some parts of the country ethanol production might make sense. I was recently in Prince Edward Island where I spoke to just one potato grower who sorted potatoes in the winter time in his processing plant. He has about a million pounds of surplus culled potatoes there and he has now begun to add a small piece onto his operation for something like $1 million which will turn these culled potatoes into ethanol. I do not know, and he does not know, whether it will be a paying proposition, but he is experimenting with the conversion of those culled potatoes, at least partially, into an energy form that he can use.

The pricing proposal before us is not paying adequate attention to some of these possibilities. We think that the energy policy should take into account the whole society and the fact that some aspects of production in this country require transportable fuels more than others.

I mentioned agriculture. I should leave you with the thought that when you are making comparisons between those who use the most fuel and those who use less, you should know that a 1,000 acre wheat farm in Saskatchewan uses less fuel for its annual production than the average household with two cars in a city like Ottawa. The average consumption of both is about the same. So if you are really going to be worried about reducing our reliance on transportable fuels, you should be focusing on reducing the amount of transportable fuels such as natural gas and oil for residential heating, and switching to fuels that will better generate heat and energy, such as fuel coal from burning plants or hydroelectric plants.

I have tried to deal mostly with agriculture today, but in conclusion I should like to indicate that the energy program should be cognizant of not only agriculture but of all people in the country who have jobs. We should ensure that our energy program continues to provide jobs and that we do not simply export raw energy in the form of gas or oil. Also we must recognize that not only farmers but the workers in Atlantic Canada, Toronto or Vancouver, require a certain amount of stability in knowing that they have shelter and will be kept warm. I have seen no evidence to indicate that this particular energy program looks down the road to the day that, looking at the gross figures, cannot be too far away. We are not making preparations for it. We are not setting aside technology, thought, energy or money toward the future. We are making very little provision for the future generations of the country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Judy Erola (Minister of State (Mines)): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to enter this debate. I paid particular attention to the remarks of the hon. member for Humboldt-Lake Centre (Mr. Althouse), particularly those dealing with the field of agriculture. I am a farmer's daughter and I too can attest to the frugality of the farmer. I disagree with him to some extent, though, on the perspective of the national energy package which we presented. I contend that it is a program with a great deal of perspective, and it is a long-term one. I will go into that during the course of my remarks.

The hon. member brought up another matter about who uses natural gas, one of the questions with which I dealt on a recent trip to western Canada. The additional 30-cent tax which will be paid by the consumer, I think it is interesting to note, will be paid primarily by consumers in the east. It is important to stress in the House and to the people of the country that 44 per cent of the natural gas consumed in Canada is consumed by the province of Ontario. As we move from oil to gas, as the national energy program urges us to do, and indeed it gives us a great deal of expert advice and help in the way of grants, we will see the consumption of gas growing in the province of Ontario, and the consumers of that province will be bearing the brunt of this extra tax.

Mr. Waddell: The minister said the Americans will.

Mrs. Erola: In export terms they will, but for the consumers of Canada, the consumers of eastern Canada will be paying the higher price or carrying the heaviest load.

What are we trying to accomplish with the provisions of the Petroleum Administration Act as brought into play by the hon. Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen)? The Petroleum Administration Act was first passed into law in 1974 in response to the widening international energy supply crisis which was precipitated by the Arab oil embargo of 1973. Since that time all Canadians have become acutely aware of the importance of national energy security as they watched international energy prices rise at a rate of upwards of 1,000 per cent. The act was enacted by the federal Parliament so that in a time of national emergency the federal government would have means to ensure that all Canadians, regardless of what region of Canada they resided in, would enjoy energy security at a reasonable cost.

As hon. members know, the Government of Canada has been negotiating with the producing provinces for a new pricing regime for some time. As hon. members must appreciate, in order to implement its objectives, the government, as set out in its budget presented on October 28, had to establish the parameters of that pricing regime. The budget and energy programs are intended to provide Canadians with both economic and energy security in the years ahead. It is obvious that this could not be done without first establishing a pricing schedule so that economic activity might continue in an atmosphere of relative stability. Members of the previous government well know the pitfalls of this exercise. Despite their contention of an agreement between themselves and the producing provinces, it is abundantly clear that such an agreement was never actually realized.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I can understand if ministers and other members on the other side of the House refuse to accept, at least publicly, the existence of the agreement to which the minister referred, but I think the minister should be very careful about her assertions with respect to that, because a statement was made on public television by the minister of energy for Alberta within the last week and a half indicating that such an agreement was in place. I understand the political motivation, but I think one must be very careful about asserting certain things which are not true, when it involves statements made by ministers of the provinces from whichever they come.

Mr. Cullen: Was the agreement signed? Do you have it in writing?

Mr. Nielsen: Yes.

Mrs. Erola: The agreement might have been reached tentatively, but was it signed? According to our information no formal agreement was reached.

Mr. Cullen: Right on.

Mrs. Erola: The government is still very anxious to negotiate an agreement with the provinces, as the Right Hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) stated in the House this week. These negotiations will begin again shortly at the official level, as the government of the province of Alberta indicated to us that they are not interested in meeting at the ministerial level. These measures instituted under the terms of the Petroleum Administration Act, whereby the national government established the domestic price of oil, are not meant to be self-perpetuating. They are a short-term interim solution and will be abandoned when an agreement is struck with the producing provinces. I am sure that an agreement will be struck.

The debate on these proclamations has been riddled with misrepresentations, unrealistic alternatives and distortions, and I was gravely disturbed at the tone of some members' comments.

After meeting the separatist challenge in the province of Quebec, if one listens to certain members opposite one would believe that we are now faced with a new threat to our national unity—western separatism. Just recently I returned from western Canada, and I can tell the House and Canadians that the westerners with whom I spoke—the people, the workers, the drivers, the swampers, the farmers and the small town businessmen—are Canadians. It is true that they are upset with the national government and that they feel a sense of alienation from the decision-making process here in Ottawa, but they are not separatists. They are Canadians; they love this country which they have worked so hard to build.

I should like to remind members opposite that alienation is not a state of mind which is relegated only to the west. I am from northern Ontario and I can recall many times the feelings of frustration and alienation which could be expressed by my friends and myself.

Canada is a vast country, and I am not sure Canadians really appreciate the immensity of it. On this point I should like to inform hon. members that alienation does not only occur in relation to the federal government. It also occurs within such a small area as the province of Alberta, that is, an alienation between the developed and underdeveloped regions. Indeed, in this regard I think it is time that we dispelled the myth of Alberta's vast wealth, a myth which has been held largely by easterners. Certainly Albertans per capita are by far the richest Canadians, but only those who have a large share of the wealth.

What of those other Albertans—and I met a great many of them—who must pay very high housing costs, food costs, and costs which are generally associated with large scale development? During my recent visit to western Canada I had an opportunity to visit those on the periphery. They want what others have. They are Albertans, yet they have not personally shared in the wealth. In those small communities streets remain unpaved. They want theatres and swimming pools. I share their dreams and goals.

Mr. Speaker, I have brought back their concerns. When we are examining the priorities for the western initiatives I will strongly urge my colleagues to consider assistance to those small towns first. I would like to add that I was very well received in these areas of western Canada. The people were genuinely interested in hearing the details of our policies and our energy package. We are working for all Canadians with the energy strategy which has precipitated this debate.

It has been quite a debate. I would like to comment briefly on some of the things which have been said in this House. We heard the hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Beatty) pontificate on clause after clause of the Petroleum Administration Act. He spoke ominously of the veiled threat he perceives lurking in the hands of the faceless bureaucrats. I can assure him that Canada has a civil service which rivals the best in the world. I would like to point out to him that not to set up the necessary mechanisms such as the Petroleum Administration Act, would be a grave abdication of responsibility on the part of the national government. If the tools are available, and if they are well tuned, then the time between the perception of possible crises and the needed response is short, indeed.

On Monday my good friend from Edmonton East demonstrated again to this House his dedication to Canada on the western separatist issue. I thank him for that. Of all the members opposite, his views probably best represent the views of western Canadians. I was sorry to hear him contend that the federal government purposely did not want to reach an agreement with the government of the province of Alberta so that it might impose its own energy price policy unilaterally. I was sorry to hear him contend that the pricing regime was to be in place for ten years, regardless of provincial objections. I am especially surprised because, when he put the question to my colleague, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde), the response was very clear.

In reference to the government's decision to establish a long-term program the minister replied, and I quote from page 4967 of Hansard:

> It was to ensure a certain degree of certainty and clarification as to the government's policy that it was decided to put forward this long-term plan. We have indicated that this is a ten-year program.

Hon. members opposite missed what the minister said next. I quote:

> It would be naive or irresponsible to say that in a ten-year program not one iota can be changed, or that this is cast in stone, just like the Bible. So that is not our perception.

Is that not clear, Mr. Speaker? Further on in the same reply the minister went on to say this:

> —we will reach an agreement eventually—

The willingness of this government to sit down with the provinces and negotiate an agreement which will be fair for all Canadians is part of the public record. To say otherwise is simply not to state the facts.

I would also like to comment on the remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell). Surely his perception of the world is not so blurred that he could possibly think that a revenue split of 45-45-10, with the 10 per cent share going to the companies, would be realistically acceptable. I have been involved in business for 27 years and I can tell the hon. member that his ideas, if put into practice in private business, would doubtlessly lead to bankruptcy. If put into practice by government it would lead to the bankruptcy of the nation. The people of this nation have had the wisdom not to pursue the policies of his party,—

Mr. Waddell: They would own the companies.

Mrs. Erola: —and I am thankful for that. We want to take control of our own economic destiny, as the hon. member does, but we must base our actions on realistic perceptions. Our ultimate goal of energy self-sufficiency within the decade is attainable. Our Canadianization—and I stress the word Canadianization—initiatives and our proposals, as they relate to the Crown equity involvement on Canada lands, are important elements of this package which will ensure the realization of this goal of energy security.

I would like to deal now with the mining industry for a moment. Members of the mining industry have expressed to me their concerns as to whether the taxation and ownership policies outlined in the national energy program will be extended to the mining sector. I acknowledge that the hon. member for Edmonton East asked me on April 24 whether I could assure this House and the mining industry that the government is planning no regressive taxation, regulatory or legislative initiatives which will inhibit the orderly growth of the mining industry. I stated at that time that there would be no moves, at present, to increase the tax base. This situation still prevails, as is evident from the recent budget speech.

Let me reiterate what has already been clearly stated in the national energy program. This government believes that the oil and gas sector is a unique sector and that special measures, not required in other sectors, are needed to ensure more Canadian control.

Despite the knee jerk reaction of the multinationals following the release of our budget-energy package, and despite the initial market vibrations, which were largely expected, the gloom and doom predictions have not materialized. Indeed, I understand that the multinationals are actively seeking to take advantage of the Canadianization elements of our package. They recognize the benefits. Canadian companies investing on Canada lands will pay just seven cents per investment dollar under the new program initiatives. Such investment opportunities must be applauded. Surely if one examines the program fully, the fact that the national government, the government of all Canadians, will have a 25 per cent share of all activity on Canada lands will be clear. This will be seen as an opportunity and not as a revenue grab, as one Canadian oil company asserts in a letter to its shareholders. Such a suggestion that the holdings of individual Canadians are being reduced by 25 per cent due to these measures is clearly a distortion.

With respect to another aspect of our energy program, hon. members will be interested to know that since the government announced the Canada oil substitution program, as a cornerstone of our national energy policy, more than 5,000 Canadians have asked if they qualify. These are requests which have come into our offices. There have been between 600 and 700 calls every day. In fact the load was so heavy on one day that the special telephone system just broke down completely for two hours. I might add that the rate of calls being made shows no sign of decline.

The Canada oil substitution program is designed to reduce oil consumption to less than 10 per cent of total energy used in residential, commercial and industrial sectors by 1990. Again, I must reiterate that that seems to be lost on many of the members in the House. Indeed, it has been lost, I think, to most Canadians. It is a major national program of incentives. I would ask the member opposite who preceded me to pay particular attention to this. It is a program of initiatives to help householders, businesses and, yes, farmers, to convert their heating systems and the types of energy they use from oil to other forms of energy.

Mr. Althouse: Gas!

Mrs. Erola: No, it is not just gas. Examine that program very carefully. The core of the program, which has a start-up target date of April 1, 1981, will consist of grants to consumers to help cover the costs of converting space heating and hot water systems from oil to other energy sources such as natural gas, electricity, and renewable resources such as wood, solar and wind. Consumers will be eligible for grants of up to 50 per cent of their conversion costs, up to a maximum of $800. In Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island, the Yukon and the Northwest Territories the program will provide grants to upgrade insulation and improve furnace efficiency rather than going toward conversions. There are also special programs in those areas in the northernmost part of this country.

As hon. members are aware, the Canada oil substitution program will be administered in co-operation with provincial and territorial governments or designated authorities such as provincial Crown corporations. Draft agreements are now being discussed with the provinces and the territories but it is obvious to all that in such a massive undertaking time will be required to develop the full details of the program. I would urge all hon. members and all Canadian consumers who decide to convert their heating systems, and who have done so after October 28, 1980, the date on which the program was announced, to keep all receipts so as to apply for grants once the federal-provincial agreements on eligibility have been established and program funds have been approved by Parliament. It is important that all these receipts be kept.

As agreements with the provinces and the territories are worked out, hon. members will be kept informed. Here, I would like to dwell for a moment on the word "informed". I urge hon. members in this House likewise to inform their constituents. When I was in western Canada recently, many people indicated that they wanted to know how the national energy program would impact on them and how they could benefit from what it contained. Hon. members are aware that copies of this program are available. I urge every hon. member in this House to make this program available.

Every householder must be made aware of the program if we are to reach the goal of energy security for our citizens. All Canadians have a right to examine this program for themselves and to make their own decisions as to its merits. Every member of this House owes every householder in his constituency at least that much. To deprive constituents of that option is wrong, and as responsible members of Parliament it is our duty to see that our constituents are made aware of the contents of this energy program so that we can work together to ensure its success and Canada's energy future.

In conclusion, I would simply ask for the consideration of the members of this House. I ask them to consider Canada's position as a nation. An hon. member opposite remarked that I was giving a lecture, and perhaps I am. It disturbs me when I visit other parts of this country and learn that people in these areas have not been made aware of a program which has been distributed to their member. I feel it is incumbent upon each member of this House to make sure that all this information is made available to their constituents.

I ask hon. members to consider Canada's position as a nation in an international system filled with crises. Also, I ask hon. members to place this debate and its implications in perspective. Canada is indeed a very fortunate nation and Canadians are among the most fortunate of all peoples on this globe. We have heard complaints that the national energy program is a financial grab at the expense of a provincial resource. Again, I ask, what have we done? In terms of revenue we have taken 2 per cent from the province and 12 per cent from the multinationals which are mostly foreign owned. And that was so that the national government could bring its share of revenues up to 24 per cent, a small change compared to other countries. That 24 per cent will help us become energy self-sufficient ten years down the road.

Members are aware, I am sure, of the budget recently announced by the present Conservative government in Great Britain. It included a 20 per cent tax on North Sea oil revenue, and this in addition to measures which increased health and social security payments and, I might add, the deindexing of pensions. Canadians are lucky indeed and, whether members opposite like it or not, this national government will continue to address the challenges which Canada must face and to act for all Canadians maximizing the benefits for the nation as a whole.

As in a good and healthy marriage, we will share the burdens and we will share the wealth. This government will not abdicate its national role, and I am confident that the initiatives included in the budget energy package will benefit all of Canada. Further, I am confident that we, as a national government, will reach an agreement with the producing provinces in the future which will be good for, fair to, and welcomed by, all Canadians.

Mr. John Thomson (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. Minister of State (Mines) (Mrs. Erola) was speaking about her recent visit to Calgary, I was reminded of the phrase, "There are none so blind as those who will not see". The minister suggested that hon. members should tell their constituents of the marvellous opportunities in the gas conversion program. The minister may be interested to know that 95 per cent of the homes in Alberta are presently heated by natural gas, so I do not think there is very much I can tell my constituents in that regard.

There are so many figures in this national energy program, and to say that they are confusing would be an understatement. But the minister stated that it would take only seven cents on the dollar to explore on Canadian lands. I wonder if the minister asked herself what is available for that 7 per cent, considering that Petro-Canada will have 25 per cent carried interest in the project, after a 40 per cent net profits tax, a 10 per cent basic royalty, and an 8 per cent production revenue tax have been paid. On a $40 barrel of oil what is left is a minus quantity.

If the minister thinks that everybody will be excited to get out and explore those Canadian lands, she has a surprise coming. While preparing my remarks for this afternoon I read over a number of speeches made by hon. members in this Petroleum Administration Act debate, and I wondered how many Canadians know what we are debating. It seems to me that Canadians must be truly bewildered to hear about fish, chickens, seals, muskrats, Sheik Yamani and Ronald Reagan. They must really wonder if we are at all seriously concerned about the energy issue in this country.

For those Canadians who have followed this debate, I wonder if their chief concerns might not be for their country, their jobs, and the future of their families. I wonder if they might be thinking, what is happening to my country, will I have a job and what is the future for my family? I wonder what the steelworker is thinking as the drilling rigs move south, and what the fishermen in Halifax thinks of paying an extra 14 cents per gallon for fuel to run his boat so that the government can buy up more oil companies. I wonder what the housebuilder in Calgary thinks as he watches the flood of oil field personnel and money leaving for the United States to Canadianize the American oil industry.

We have a national energy program. The reason we are debating oil and gas prices and the Petroleum Administration Act is because this government, in spite of what the minister just said, never negotiated in good faith with the producing provinces and never intended to do so. It never wanted to reach agreement; it wanted to impose its national energy program unilaterally. The national energy plan is not an energy plan at all. It is an assault on one province and one industry. It has nothing whatsoever to do with energy. This attack on one province and one industry is unprecedented in Canada's history.

This document is a disgrace to our system of government, to our way of life, and to this institution. This document is deceitful, ambiguous, full of half-truths, untruths and misfeasance. The national energy plan is not a plan to solve the energy problem Canada faces. It is founded on two concepts. The first concept is to strip control of the resources from the provinces, to emasculate an industry, and to turn that industry over to an Ottawa bureaucracy. The plan is founded on the ideology of a centrally planned economy, and the ideology that the state is paramount over individual freedom. It is a plan to implement a philosophy which the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has sought passionately for so long. Here is what the Prime Minister had to say about his philosophy: "Since neither individuals themselves nor the economic system itself can remedy Canada's economic problems, we are forced, whether we like it or not, to turn to the state. In the scheme of production, private initiative and property, collective initiative and co-operative property, public initiative and nationalization are the only means in the securing of human and economic objectives. Private initiative left to itself cannot guarantee common prosperity. That must be assured through planning. It seems evident to me that the regime of free enterprise has shown itself incapable of resolving problems posed in education, health, housing and employment."

I would like to ask my fellow Canadians the following: how was Canada built? How was our education system built? How were our health and housing systems built? Did the government build it or did individual Canadians build it?

Much has been said recently about western Canada separation. Coming from Calgary, I am acutely aware of the feelings of frustration, despair and hostility that exist. No one who goes to Calgary today can honestly come away without feeling that deep sense of frustration and hostility. I have received hundreds of letters from my constituents expressing their fears and angers. Let me read one such letter:

> Just want you to know that I cannot accept the concept of separation. Canada—from coast to coast—means too much to me.
> When the Springhill, N.S. miners were trapped in their mine, I felt it personally because they were our people—Canadians. While I can say that I feel sad about the great tragedy in Italy, it doesn't touch my heart in the same way. The French Canadians have always, to our way of thinking, complained about their inequitable treatment. We, as westerners, didn't and still don't understand them, but we responded to their anguish and their submerged desire to remain within Canada. We fought two world wars to defend Canada. I (thankfully) have only one cousin buried in the Bay of Fundy from that war. My father-in-law fought in both those wars. Our grandparents grew in this country, giving us our legacy to achieve, to build.
> Certainly, we've been upset by our indifferent treatment by central Canada but we've grown and prospered. I can't throw it all away because of perilous Trudeau and his despicable henchmen. I feel a kinship with my fellow Canadians in the maritimes (even though I have never taken the time or effort to visit that part of our land).
> I like my friends in Ontario despite their "blinker mentality". I feel strongly that our view, our emotions and feelings, will be heard and recognized. I know that if I fight—and I will fight—it will be to keep our country one nation. I can't accept separation as the solution.
> I've been so upset by the mood and feeling in Calgary, even tho' I understand it totally and believe in the grievances, that I keep bursting into tears—and I've thought about it and have come to the conclusion—I'm fighting for Canada.

Canadians, including those from the west, know that Canada is bigger than any prime minister. Canada will survive the national energy program and Canada will survive the Liberal party. Most Canadians from the west believe in their country, as I do.

My leader was accused the other day by two members of the New Democratic Party of fanning the flames of western separatism. I have attended three meetings in the last two weeks, in Winnipeg, Vancouver and Calgary, at which my leader spoke. He has steadfastly defended Canada against the interests of those who would choose to reject confederation. Those members of the New Democratic Party know full well that my leader would stand firm against any separatism option for Canada. They know the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) stands for Canadian unity above all else. Their accusations are the worst kind of political diarrhea. They are to gain headlines.

Mr. Waddell: We are not the only ones who are saying it.

Mr. Siddon: The quiet voice in the corner there. He is not the only one who is saying it.

Mr. Thomson: Why do you not listen to what my leader has had to say?

Mr. Waddell: Why does he not come and take part in this debate?

Mr. Thomson: I want to spend a few moments dealing with one aspect of Canada's energy policy which should be our central focus and our main concern, namely, security of supply.

The cornerstone of the national energy program is a reduction of 20 per cent in crude oil demand over the next ten years. This is to be achieved by conservation and substitution. There is no way this reduction can be achieved unless we are prepared to reduce economic activity or unless we all start to ride bicycles. There is not a single credible source in this country who would agree with the projections in the national energy program that we will reduce our crude oil consumption over the next ten years by 425,000 barrels a day. There is not one credible source. Not the National Energy Board, not the National Research Council of Canada and certainly no knowledgeable person in the oil industry.

Forty three per cent of our energy consumption is from crude oil. The government plan calls for us to reduce this consumption to 26 per cent by 1990. Most authorities believe that crude oil consumption will increase from 1,823,000 barrels per day, which it is at the present time, to something over two million barrels per day by 1990.

Now we come to conservation. Can anyone tell me why gasoline consumption in Canada has increased 6 per cent in each of the last two years? We are the only country in the industrialized world which is subsidizing a scarce commodity, such as crude oil.

Mr. Regan: What about Venezuela and Mexico?

Mr. Thomson: I can see that the hon. gentleman has been to neither of those two places. I would hardly call either of them industrialized.

The Energy Resources Conservation Board in its latest estimate of Alberta's future crude oil productive capacity said that production will have dipped to 139,000 barrels a day by 1999. In fact, Alberta's oil production capability, which was almost two million barrels daily at the beginning of the 1970s, will slip to the one-million-barrel-a-day mark in 1982. The Energy Resources Conservation Board report states that current capacity is 1,183,000 barrels per day. The report forecasts productive capability will decline to 1,074,000 barrels per day next year and to 966,000 barrels per day in 1982. The forecast says conventional crude productive capacity will have declined to 688,000 barrels daily in 1985, about one-third of what Canada needs to meet its demands. By 1990, western oil fields will be capable of producing only 377,000 barrels per day. Some time around 1995, we will not be able to supply enough crude oil to one refinery in Edmonton which presently processes 145,000 barrels of oil a day.

If we are to have energy security in Canada, we will need a new oil sands plant every two years for the next ten years for there to be any hope whatsoever of becoming self-sufficient in oil. Therefore, ten plants will be required. We should have had three more plants on-stream today. As it stands, the two plants presently planned cannot be on-stream for at least six or seven years.

With regard to offshore production from the Beaufort Sea and off the east coast, we will be fortunate if we see production from those fields before the end of the decade. There is no technology in place to make an underwater completion in over 250 feet of water, water which is known to be plagued with icebergs. More than one half our imports of 425,000 barrels per day presently come from Saudi Arabia and the government is talking about increasing this by another 100,000 barrels a day at a cost of somewhere around $40 a barrel.

It is madness to place the Canadian economy, Canadian jobs and our future in the hands of OPEC. There was a quotation by the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) on the night he presented the budget which really caught my attention. He said the worst of the dramatic surge in international inflation directly associated with the OPEC price increases is behind us. Does anybody believe we have seen the last of OPEC price increases? It is inconceivable that any knowledgeable person would make such a statement and it is inconceivable that a government would be willing to place the future of our country in the hands of OPEC. Yet that is what this national energy program is doing. Make no mistake about it.

In conclusion, I wonder who the government will blame for future energy shortages. Who will they blame for increased unemployment, a faltering economy and continuing high inflation? Maybe they will be able to blame OPEC instead of Premier Lougheed and the multinationals. The wounds which have been inflicted on our country in this debate on energy and in the debate on the constitution will never be healed in my lifetime.

Mr. David Weatherhead (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to have this opportunity to speak on the motion of the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell), for it allows me the opportunity to discuss an important point in today's political climate.

It goes without saying that Canada is a vast country. Many regions span more than three and one half million square miles. Each of these regions has distinct features which contribute to the make-up of Canada; differences in terrain, geography and natural resources have helped to shape the individuals who have lived in those regions. It has become common to exaggerate those differences and to ignore the common heritage we share as Canadians. We share some important characteristics that must be emphasized during this debate if we are not to lose sight of our purpose. Each and every Canadian must face long distances and the daunting climate which is our lot. We share institutions and a common history which have done more to make us Canadians than fish, trees, grain, steel or oil will ever make us. We share a place in a difficult and uncertain world. We share a future which we owe to our children and to generations which will follow. We would be untrue to ourselves and to those who will follow if we were to fumble away the great opportunity we owe them.

A nation, then is more than an amalgam of soil, more than its natural resources, greater than a collection of rocks and trees. It is an abstract notion, it is the aspirations and dreams of the people who populate it. To reinforce and encourage those dreams, a country must be seen to have a future. In such a context, the responsibility of the national government is very important to Canada at this stage. The government must reconcile sometimes competing hopes with the realities which prevail. Canada's history has been one of sharing and helping the various regions, which, for one reason or another, do not have an equal share of the natural resources of this country. It is a difficult task, for our constitutional history dictates that natural resources are the property of the provinces in which they are found and no person on this side of the House would have any great argument with that principle. Nevertheless, all members on the government side share a common belief in the responsibility of the national government to see that no region of this country is left out of the wealth and opportunity which these resources bring. At one time or another, a different region has had its moment in the sun.

To make the idea of Canada work, however, it is important for us to recognize that equality of opportunity has not existed in equal measure throughout this land. On more than one occasion, I have stated that I entered politics and that I belong to the Liberal party because I honestly believe that sharing has been our history and will be our future.

In the past few years, many of the government's efforts in Canada have been directed toward bringing the economic promise of Canada to all of its people. No matter where a Canadian chooses to live, he or she must be guaranteed equal access to the wealth and opportunity which is his or her birthright. Without challenging provincial supremacy in the field of resource ownership and control, the bold and forward-looking national energy program announced October 28 is an example of the way in which the government has attempted to bring Canada to Canadians. Important aspects of the national energy program will see that Canada has a greater stake in the future of its energy supplies and that Canadians will have a greater role in participating in that future. The program has rejected an export tax on natural gas. That is a concession which the federal government need not have made; its right to tax resources for export is very clearly spelled out in the present law.

To ensure that Canadians will participate in their own energy future, the national energy program sets out a policy which will seek to increase the level of Canadian ownership in the vital oil and gas sector of our economy. To ensure the security of our energy future, the NEP will encourage the movement away from oil to more plentiful sources of energy. Finally, the government will seek to redistribute its share of the energy wealth to all Canadians in order that all may participate in our country's immeasurable good fortune.

I will seek to clarify some of these points in order that this debate may illustrate to Canadians just how fortunate we are. Sometimes it is said of Canada that Canadians do not understand one another, that we are not very good listeners. A. R. M. Lower, in an article published last September, made the point that because of our good fortune, we Canadians must resort to inventing problems in order to have something to fight about.

In many ways this fight over resources is an excellent case in point. The very real concern about Alberta's dwindling oil reserves has somehow broken down into an argument over regional grievances and has obscured the point that the national energy program suggests policies to account for this eventuality. Without fully understanding the facts on either side, people in the various regions of the country begin to eye each other suspiciously, so much so that some Canadians may genuinely feel uncomfortable in regions of the country other than those where they were born and raised.

Political differences have begun to take on human faces, and we have witnessed the sad sight of certain people from producing provinces accusing all easterners of being rapacious carpetbaggers and some people not living in the producing provinces regarding their Canadian cousins as greedy and not caring for the well-being of all Canadians. Proximity to natural resources has now become a measure of one's loyalty and degree of Canadianism.

On the sideline of this sorry spectacle are those who would wish to exploit this anxiety for their own savage political gain, and here I speak of the new western separatists. I will speak about their threat to our future at the conclusion of my remarks because I am genuinely concerned, as are all hon. members in this House, that differences over dollars might become the issue which divides this great country.

I rose today to speak, first of all, about some aspects of the energy policy which need to be reiterated in this House. I will begin with the national energy program's initiatives in the area of Canadianization. Speaking before a New York City audience recently, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) told his audience that it has become a matter of great concern to Canadians that so much of our energy resources is under control of foreign interests. He spoke of the incongruity of a major industrialized nation yielding so much of its heritage and its future to people outside its borders. He spoke about the very great need for Canadians to take some control over their future. As the minister pointed out, no country of Canada's stature could tolerate the degree of outside control which prevails in Canada's oil and gas industry. Indeed, no nation does so. The vast sums of profit and capital presently shipped offshore must remain in Canada if we are to develop our own oil and gas resources for Canadians.

The Canadianization element of the national energy program is essential in order to guarantee Canada's energy future.

It is only by encouraging small and large Canadian-owned and controlled firms and by our greater use of Petro-Canada as an agent of energy policy that this can be done. The Canadian people asked the government to increase the role of Petro-Canada in the last election. Greater Canadian involvement in Canada's energy field will enhance the chances of attaining energy self-sufficiency in the decade ahead.

Responsible private and public Canadian firms will ensure that Canada gets the energy it needs. The goal of Canadianization will be attained in a number of ways. It is important to point out some of these because I feel this debate has served to underline the confusion in which members of the opposition find themselves. Members of the official opposition would characterize the Canadianization aspect of the national energy program as confiscatory, which it clearly is not.

Spokesmen for the government have stated quite clearly that the terms for acquisition of any oil company would be fair and equitable. Further, members of the Progressive Conservative Party have repeatedly stated that the national energy program would supplant private investment with massive public involvement and that the program is too interventionist. For his part, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has indicated this government's preference for the bulk of the industry remaining in private hands. I strongly endorse this point of view, keeping in mind the importance of the Canadian oil and gas industry coming under Canadian control.

Members of the New Democratic Party see the Canadianization program as not going far enough. They would like to see the government nationalize at least three of the largest oil and gas companies in Canada. I ask them, why stop there? If we are going to come up with the billions necessary to do this, why not spend a few billion more and go after all the rest?

Opening this debate last Friday, the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway stated, as recorded at page 4955 of Hansard, that it would be sufficient for the major multinationals to sell off enough shares to bring the level of Canadian ownership to 50 per cent while keeping control of the company in Houston or London or some place else while at the same time taking advantage of some of the more generous incentives offered by the national energy program. I point out, however, that the essential elements of the petroleum incentive program are available to companies which are not just owned but are also controlled by Canadians.

On the one hand, hon. members opposite accuse us of confiscatory policies of nationalization and, on the other hand, some other opposition members accuse us of being soft on multinationals. This may go to prove one thing,—that the aim of this government is right on. To achieve that aim the government has taken a balanced and fair approach to solving the vexing and, indeed, embarrassing problem of foreign ownership in the resource sector.

The government wants to encourage private investment in the oil and gas industry. This is the objective of a number of incentives for individuals and corporations to invest in our energy future. But there is a role for public participation, and on this point I would like to raise a question with our colleagues in the New Democratic Party. Speaking to his own motion last Friday, the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway stated that his party would move to acquire control of the three largest foreign oil and gas firms in Canada. He spoke of a concrete commitment to do this. I ask, then, where the government would find the estimated $20 billion to $25 billion necessary to compensate these companies fairly for their assets. Is there a concrete commitment to wave a magic wave to find this money? Asked, by the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) to clarify this point, the hon. member merely stated: "My policy would be to force Imperial Oil to give control to the federal government". This policy gives no room to private investors, as does our policy. It is the belief of this government that private industry, together with a reasonable degree of public involvement, can be a useful tool for the development of energy policy.

If hon. members want to see a concrete commitment, they need only look to the national energy policy to see that this government will ask Canadians to participate in the Canadianization of the oil and gas industry through a Canadian ownership account. This account will be self-financing to ensure that the money to acquire one or more of the multinationals will be found. Contrast this policy with that of the NDP, which seeks to apply a measure of force here together with a wave of a magic wand there in order to come up with a crippling sum of billions of dollars. This whole approach reminds me of an editorial cartoon drawn during the 1968 election campaign by Duncan MacPherson. In it the then leader of the New Democratic Party is pictured gazing into the sky at an object shaped curiously like a pie. The object is entitled "NDP policy". Now, 12 years later, if one looks into the sky, that pie in the sky is still there.

However, Canadianization does not mean merely the acquisition of one or more of the multinationals. It means encouraging investors to continue to seek new supplies of oil and gas for Canada's future energy needs. The petroleum incentives program will provide incentive payments to Canadian-owned and controlled companies. Over the next few years, companies with 50 per cent Canadian content and control will receive payments of 10 per cent of approved costs for exploration of oil and gas anywhere in Canada. For development of these resources an additional 10 per cent will be paid on approved costs. For companies with a 75 per cent Canadian interest this payment will be raised to 20 per cent.

Development of Canada lands will be facilitated through incentive payments to any company searching on these lands. This payment will be to 25 per cent of approved costs. Canadian companies will, of course, be favoured by additional payments. Further encouragement will come from the provision that companies working on Canada lands must have at least 50 per cent Canadian ownership. To ensure that Canada lands remain under Canadian control, the Crown will retain a 25 per cent interest in any development on these lands through the agency of Petro-Canada.

Canadian companies will be favoured in the granting of any new natural gas exporting licences. Any small natural gas producers which may have problems selling their natural gas will be helped through the $400 million natural gas bank.

The Foreign Investment Review Agency and the petroleum monitoring agency will monitor the progress of Canadianization. Each will have the job to see that the private sector is co-operating in this endeavour.

In criticizing the policy of the government the Progressive Conservative Party has been no less unrealistic than the NDP. It trumpets loudly the effect on the consumer of the pricing policy set by this government while at the same time calling for yet higher energy prices.

● (1530)

Members of the official opposition are fond of circulating constituency reports with dire forecasts about the price of a litre of gasoline one, two or ten years down the line. Frightening graphs grace the pages of these householders, suggesting only half the picture to the consumer. Hon. members opposite do not point out that in contrast to the pricing regime set out in the December budget the budget of October 28 will be much more favourable to the consumer. In addition to pointing out to the consumer that a litre of gasoline will cost 30 cents in 1981, why do they not also point out that under the Crosbie proposals the cost would have been 34 cents a litre? Where does it state in the reports circulated by members of the Conservative party that had the House of Commons and the people of Canada not wisely defeated the Clark government, a litre of gasoline would have cost 58 cents in 1984 instead of the more moderate 43 cents proposed by the government? The answer to those questions is easy, Mr. Speaker. We on this side of the House are not ashamed to defend our proposals. As a government, we realize that the price of oil and gas must rise, but it must rise at a rate which will not rob the consumer. The Conservatives are content to illustrate only one-half of the picture, so indefensible was the price grab in their December budget.

The official opposition chooses to ignore the investment in jobs and technology which the energy program represents. They choose to ignore the benefits which accrue to all regions of the country through our policy.

Mr. Wilson: That is the whole point of the debate. Aren't you listening?

Mr. Weatherhead: The extension of the natural gas pipeline to the maritimes supported by this government in the national energy program will provide new markets for western natural gas in the east.

An hon. Member: You are reading a speech you do not understand.

Mr. Weatherhead: This is a plan which will benefit all regions of the country. The most immediate effect will be the jobs this plan will bring. Industrial activity will increase as a consequence of this extension. In the longer term, new markets will open both in the east and in the west.

Expenditures envisaged by the national energy plan will bring about $2.3 billion to Alberta over the next three or four years, in addition to the very substantial funds that the new pricing regime will bring. In New Brunswick, some $290 million will be spent under the program in support of research, industry incentives, conservation, and the like. Ontario will benefit from the plan to the tune of $925 million. These funds will provide jobs in the immediate term, in addition to the spin-offs which will result from such expenditures, and all provinces will benefit by direct spending. In the longer term, these expenditures will lay a base for industrial activity and start new industries to deal with the changing needs of Canada's energy future. It is interesting to note that the MacEachen budget does not alter the sums paid to the producing provinces versus those suggested in the budget last December, and those prices were set without an agreement.

It has become a favourite pastime of the opposition to suggest that they had an agreement with the producing provinces before bringing in their budget. As the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources demonstrated last week, no such agreement was signed. The opposition has been repeatedly challenged to prove that such an agreement existed. I suppose that we on this side of the House, and indeed all Canadians, must watch while Tom Sindlinger, the newly independent, former Conservative member of the Alberta legislature, asks for just one shred of evidence to prove that such an agreement was ever reached. I suppose the philosophy of the official opposition is that if you repeat something often enough, people might just believe that it is true. The official opposition is attempting to prove that that myth is now legend.

Over the next four years, the producing provinces in western Canada will receive almost $40 billion for their oil and gas. It has been estimated that over ten years, or over the life of the national energy policy, the province of Alberta will receive $100 billion. That is a point for us to ponder, Mr. Speaker. I spoke earlier about regions having their moment in the sun. It is now the turn of the producing provinces, particularly Alberta. However, the people of Alberta are genuinely concerned that with the disappearance of conventional sources of oil prosperity will disappear. Nothing could be further from the truth. The national energy policy envisages a very different future for the province of Alberta. Encouragement of Alberta's coal reserves is an additional feature of the national energy policy. The pricing formula for heavy oil and oil recovered by tertiary recovery methods will encourage the development of plants and refineries in order to exploit these vast, and as yet largely untouched, resources. The pricing formula for natural gas, set at a rate less than that for oil, will encourage markets for Alberta's natural gas.

Mr. Lambert: So what's new?

Mr. Weatherhead: Alberta's share of oil and gas production revenues is greater than that received by any other state or province in the world. Compare the Alberta government's return of about 43 per cent of revenues from all of the oil and gas production in Alberta under the national energy policy with that of the share of Texas or of Victoria state in Australia, each of them receiving less than 20 per cent of revenues.

The natural gas bank is of special concern to the province of Alberta. Many of the natural gas producers in that province are small Canadian firms supported by equally small investors. By providing a customer for their natural gas and by encouraging research for new markets, the natural gas bank will keep many producers in business who might otherwise give up for lack of markets.

An hon. Member: That is a great departmental speech.

Mr. Weatherhead: Some of us in the House can write our speeches without the help of departments. And that is the case with my speech this afternoon.

We are speaking here of dollars to governments. Who speaks for the consumers of Alberta? Ironically, it is we, the Liberal party, long painted as the bogeymen in this scenario. It is worth while for us on this side of the House to point out that higher oil and gas prices affect the people of Alberta quite as much as they affect people in all other regions of the country. Discounting the effect of provincial and local taxes, any increase in the price of oil and gas products would have an impact on the consumer in Alberta, in just the same way as they would affect a car driver in Toronto, Winnipeg or Halifax.

So it is important to point out that far from just benefiting consumers in the non-producing provinces, lower prices for gasoline and natural gas will benefit consumers in all provinces. Expenditures on conservation and the development of new sources of energy will be great in Alberta and in the other producing provinces. The Canadian home insulation program will require more money to be spent in addition to the $13.8 million spent since 1977 in Alberta.

British Columbia, another of the producing provinces, will receive its share of expenditures under the national energy policy. In addition to the estimated $3.6 billion in revenues from natural gas and oil production over the next four years, British Columbia will see $550 million spent on research, industrial incentives and conservation over the same period. Of particular interest to British Columbia will be the improvements to the forest industry renewable energy program. New industrial sectors will be allowed to take advantage of the program, and individual grants will be permitted to exceed $4 million, thus encouraging the development of new sources of renewable energy. Finding new markets for Alberta's natural gas will be one effect of the conversion grants, to a maximum of $800 per household. Another effect will be the resulting reduction in heating cost for the home owner. These conversion grants will also have the effect of stimulating the creation of jobs and industrial development in the search for better ways to use energy.

This weekend I listened with interest to a CBC radio program in which one of the principal owners of a furnace manufacturing company spoke of his firm's development of a more efficient gas furnace. While not a consequence of the national energy program, this gentleman also spoke of his company's effort to develop this even further. At present, the new furnace tests out at approximately 90 per cent to 95 per cent efficiency. The incentive to bring natural gas heating to more Canadians will undoubtedly spur more such entrepreneurship.

The national energy program seeks to make Canada's automobile industry more competitive by introducing more stringent mileage standards. At present, North American cars compare unfavourably with imports on the whole. Rather than allowing foreign manufacturers to fill this void, the government should give encouragement to Canadians to purchase domestically produced cars. Improving efficiency standards will ensure that this is done.

These are just a few highlights of the national energy program. In addition to Canadianization, fair prices, production incentives to discover new sources of oil and gas, incentives to convert from oil to more secure sources of energy, and encouragement to seek out renewable sources of energy, there are a number of other programs designed to ensure Canada's energy self-sufficiency. But all of this misses one thing, and the missing link is a price for oil and gas. What we are seeing, through the proclamation sections of the Petroleum Administration Act, is a government which recognizes that it must seize the political will if Canada is to attain energy self-sufficiency. Members opposite suggest that the pricing regime of the government will harm the future of oil and gas exploration. I say that this is not true, and to illustrate let me quote from the national energy program which indicates that the netback to the producer will increase between now and 1990 by a factor of four times; from the $6.29 a barrel received by the oil companies today, the netback before taxes will increase to $24.58 a barrel in 1990. That is hardly a massive grab of oil industry revenues. The immediate response of the oil and gas industry, much of it foreign owned, was predictable. However, if they were to stop and look, these companies would see that the incentives, plus the very generous share of revenues, make Canada a good place in which to make money in the oil and gas industry.

We have not seen a massive intervention of government. Rather, we have seen a move toward greater balance in the oil and gas sectors of the economy. In the past there were very few rules when it came to developing oil and gas in Canada. Now, before it is too late, there must be some rules which benefit consumers and Canadian people. While oil and gas revenues to the oil companies have gone up by ten times since 1970, production has not kept pace.

So, the impasse on pricing and revenue sharing must come to an end, without shutting the door to further negotiation. The government is only trying to bring home the urgency of Canada's energy future to Canadians. Admittedly, some would like to see their regions benefit even more greatly, but we must keep in mind that the government has a responsibility to see that Canada is not mired in eternal wrangling over ownership, revenue sharing and the pricing of our natural resources. Balancing the constitutional ownership of the resources by the provinces against the federal government's moral and constitutional obligations in interprovincial and international trade, has not been easy.

In conclusion, we in this House express the political differences which democracy and the parliamentary system bring with them. However, outside we must remember that it is not just a voter to whom we are speaking; it is a Canadian, a cousin. Certainly I acknowledge the right of the opposition to criticize the program of the government. I will disagree with them, but it is their right and duty. As we on this side of the House go out and about this land, we will attempt to explain what the energy program means to the individual in dollars and cents. We will defend this policy and attempt to convert people to our cause. But, there is a greater cause. I ask opposition members to go out and, in their way, criticize the program if they must, but at all turns to defend Canada and not to allow the nation to be torn apart for a few resource points, for a few extra dollars. It will be a sad legacy of the House if we allow the country to be sold down the river for a few pieces of silver.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Mr. Speaker, it is with some trepidation and sadness that I rise to address the House on this motion which protests the proclamation of section 36 of the Petroleum Administration Act. It is with a degree of sadness because the very fact of the implementation of this motion reflects a lack of trust and a lack of realism toward the petroleum industry, the producing provinces and the people from the part of Canada which I represent.

The freedoms we in this country enjoy are very precious and also very fragile. To my way of thinking, those freedoms are entrenched in the fact that individuals can advance and work in a society, not unduly encumbered by a central interventionalist government which would repeatedly impose tax upon tax, collecting massive amounts of money through Ottawa, taking them with one hand, and then in a very gratuitous manner, as the previous speaker and the Minister of State for Mines (Mrs. Erola) indicated, giving us back but a pitiful portion of those funds. This interventionalist philosophy is reflected in a document entitled "The Practice and Theory of Federalism" which was written some years ago by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). In introducing a section on strategy and tactics, the Prime Minister indicated that "revolution and revolutionary wars proceed from birth to development, from small to large, from lack of power to seizure of power". It was a quotation from Mao Tse-tung, and immediately thereafter the Prime Minister indicated that if the whole of the Canadian electorate could miraculously be converted to socialist ideals at one fell swoop, there would be no reason to discuss strategy in the present context; socialism would be achieved with or without federalism and socialist administrations would be installed at every level of government affairs, no matter the form of the constitution. That is the fright which faces me and which faces my children, including one of my sons who is here today in the gallery, whose future and freedom within our society is very much at stake in the matter of this debate.

The need for the implementation of the Petroleum Administration Act is predicated on Liberal myths and scare tactics directed against western premiers, petroleum industries, and, by inference, all the people of western Canada. I want to make it very clear at this point that Canadians who live in the western parts of this country are neither selfish nor separatists. We do not take lightly to being accused of either, but Canadians in the west rightly feel alienated from a mammoth centralist government some 1,500 to 3,000 miles away which does not try to understand their way of life. The nub of the problem is that the Trudeau Liberals and their good socialist friends to my left are distorting the real meaning of the word "sharing". I believe—and I think most western Canadians believe—that sharing is an act of giving and receiving in a spirit of mutual goodwill. It is a voluntary thing. Sharing is not legalized theft and undue and disproportionate taxation. That is how the communists share. Western Canadians already share generously with all their fellow Canadians through direct equalization payments and a number of other forms of economic concession to central and eastern Canada, for example, as reflected in the preferential purchasing policies of the Department of Supply and Services, the use of DREE grants, protective tariffs, subsidised freight rates, and even certain biases in the UIC system and welfare program. I and western Canadians believe we are entitled to know the cost of that sharing.

At a committee meeting two weeks ago, the Prime Minister refused to tell Canadians the costs the people who are doing the sharing have to bear because of the heavy hand of the central Liberal government. Our concept of sharing is a far cry from the definition of the Prime Minister. The concept of sharing expressed by his insensitive colleagues, particularly those on the front benches who are not in their places today, amounts to a unilateral confiscation of provincial resource revenues without even making a fair and serious attempt to negotiate.

Mr. Speaker, I want to give an illustration of the tragedy that I think faces our country and the reason I am saddened with respect to our future. After the vote on Wednesday night, when the government denied the opportunity to oppose the implementation of the Petroleum Administration Act under the previous motion, I rode an elevator in the West Block. In the elevator I was surrounded by a boisterous group of Liberal backbenchers. They may not have thought I understood what they were saying. They were very happy and jovial. They displayed a smug cockiness which alarmed me, Mr. Speaker. What they were so excited about was that they had stuck it to Peter Lougheed. They thought they had stuck it to to a few western Conservative members of Parliament. They were acting like alleycats that got the mouse. They were so proud of themselves, Mr. Speaker. I must tell the House today that that laughter was not directed just at a couple of premiers in western Canada, or a couple of Conservative members of Parliament who may have happened to be in the elevator. They were not merely laughing at a few institutions which they like to distort and misrepresent from time to time. They were laughing at all western Canadians. Their behaviour offers a sad commentary on the Trudeau party—not the Liberal party. It is not the old time Liberal party of Mackenzie King or Sir Wilfrid Laurier, it is a party of Trudeau socialists. Let us not kid around about that.

Mr. Knowles: Who wants Mackenzie King back?

Mr. Siddon: He is not coming back. The hon. member likes Trudeau much better than Mackenzie King I am sure.

The Trudeau party fails to understand the regional realities and the aspirations of eight provinces where they are not well represented. They are making an appalling effort to try to understand them. It seems to me the gift of power is something entrusted to a government which should be used to advance the interests of all regions of Canada, not to hit one or two regions across the backside with a double-edged broad-axe as this party has done. They are misusing the power they gained in the last election, the power which was given to them for the purpose of benefiting those who gave it to them. They are snubbing the rest of the people, particularly those in the west.

Mr. Speaker, Canada is crying out for leadership, not divisive, devious and petulant leadership by a socialist Prime Minister, who is hellbent on changing our national fabric to suit his fanciful philosophy. Canadians do not appreciate the irresponsibility shown by this man who creates a furore at home in the constitutional and budgetary areas, who then goes cavorting off to Arabia to dance sheik to sheik in the desert. This is a man who has more time for international gladhanding than he has for solving the problems which he has created almost single handedly with the help of his energy minister. Canada does not need that kind of leadership.

Canada needs the kind of leadership which was given to it in the nine short months of the previous Clark administration. That was the government which restored national harmony. That was the government which put the nation at peace with Quebec, which distributed goodwill among the people and governments of Canada. That cannot be denied by any member in this House. The previous government was a government which restored financial responsibility. It was a government which began to set our national priorities straight. In spite of all the foofaraw on the other side an agreement on oil pricing was reached by the Clark government.

An hon. Member: Table it then!

Mr. Siddon: There was an energy policy which left some of the revenues in the pockets of individual, privately owned, free Canadian oil companies to advance in the national interests. There was a budget. Most Canadians I talk to nowadays regret having seen that budget defeated. There was freedom of information legislation along with a number of other progressive measures. All the statistical indicators show that Canada was going in a different direction. You may look at any of the figures to see that direction with respect to the level of employment in the public service, the level of unemployment, the rate of inflation, and any other statistics, that you care to look at. Finally, Mr. Speaker, that government restored a degree of honesty to the government benches which we do not see in the deceit, the misrepresentation and the charlatan trickery practised by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) in the presentation of his energy program and the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) in the presentation of his budget.

Yes, the former prime minister provided the leadership which Canada desperately needs for the 1980s. Alas, the deceit and the political opportunism of the Trudeau flock snatched that new hope away and replaced it with a government which is, frankly, drunk with power. It has been replaced by a government which seems willing to stoop to any tactic with respect to constitutional matters, energy matters and the implementation of the Petroleum Administration Act. Its supporters seem willing to stoop to any tactic to play their political best, even to risk the destruction of my country and theirs.

This country has tremendous potential. It was well worth the building over 113 years. It is a country which was well worth fighting for in the three great wars. It is certainly well worth saving in the face of, and in spite of, the actions of a few petty-minded, idealistic politicians who have no understanding of the way the real world works. The secret of the success of our country is not more dependence on Ottawa, it is not independence of the various regions, which are now going in different directions. The secret of the success of our country and our future strength rests upon interdependence. That is how the wars were won in the past decades. That is how the energy crisis will be confronted and overcome in this decade. That interdependence will involve the funding and the provision of an economic climate for the building of some seven or eight oilsands plants, heavy oil projects, extraction and development, exploration for natural gas, all of which will involve billions of dollars of capital. That is capital which ought to be spent in Canada, not in Saudi Arabia. It is capital which should be recycled in our economy over the next 25 years to the extent that trillions of dollars—yes, indeed, trillions of dollars—will circulate through the Canadian economy. Those dollars will be spent in all regions of Canada. They will be very important to the industrial centre of our economy. If we are to become interdependent again and have more respect for one another we cannot go around setting premier against premier. We cannot have a petulant Prime Minister putting himself on a platform above all premiers and calling each of them names. We must learn to share by consent, not by decree. We must restore respect for the right of the individual to his freedom. We must restore freedom to businesses so that they will be able to enjoy corporate freedoms under the rule of law in this country. We must restore self-confidence to the regions, the businesses, the communities, which are the building blocks of our country. We must not shatter that confidence the way it has been shattered in recent months.

I am concerned, above all, about my children, as I think all members here are. It is important that we develop employment opportunities and educational facilities so that our children can enjoy the kind of prosperity which we have been fortunate enough to enjoy in this short span of time. This means we must stop borrowing and squandering the equity of western Canadian resources so that our children will not have to foot the bill later when the country is faced with economic collapse.

Mr. Speaker, the invocation of the Petroleum Administration Act by this government is divisive. It is discriminatory against the producing provinces, low-income Canadians, and particularly young Canadians who hope to find a career in the future of this country. The invocation of this act reflects an ignorance of western Canadian aspirations and feelings.

I do not think my time is up for another fifteen minutes.

BROADCASTING

DEBATE AND APPROVAL OF CRTC POLICY RECOMMENDATIONS

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of bringing before the House for debate, modification and approval, all of the CRTC policy recommendations regarding northern and remote television and radio broadcasting.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Communications (Mr. Fox) has left the House, but I am sure a member from the government and a member of the Conservative party will be speaking, hopefully in support of this motion, this afternoon. The most serious problem at the present time in relation to the communications policy and CRTC policy is that it seems to be developed on an approach best described as "policy by press release".

The communications policy has simply been outstripped by technology and the desires of the Canadian public, particularly in the northern and remote areas of Canada. For example, in Skeena riding such areas as the Queen Charlotte Islands, the Hazeltons, Nass Valley, Telegraph Creek, Dease Lake and the Cassiar and Atlin areas have never had decent television reception. Through local entrepreneurial skills, volunteer labour and community effort, television programming ranging from canned rebroadcasting and local production to satellite dish reception, we have achieved the goal of televised entertainment and new service.

All that has been done with an absolute minimum of bureaucratic government intervention. Serious shock waves have been felt recently throughout the north every time the Minister of Communications puts out another press release, because of the sensitivity to the lack of the government's ability to deliver northern service. One can hardly accept the premise of "Canadian content" for northerners when Toronto, Vancouver, Winnipeg and Montreal and in fact over 90 per cent of the Canadian population has essentially the freedom of choice in television viewing.

The government's brand of Canadianism using northerners as media guinea pigs simply will not sell. We all understand the cultural aspects of good quality Canadian programming. However, there must be debate and agreement to continue northern access to diversified, even if pirated southern broadcasts. The concern of northerners is that cable companies in the south will get the government's ear to sell U.S. and other international programming and allow signal scrambling on the satellite broadcasts.

For example, at the present time in the community of Cassiar in my riding there is a satellite earth receiver which brings in and distributes American broadcasting throughout the community. In fact, it is the first and only ongoing and relatively newsworthy and entertaining television service that has ever been available in that community. None of the other broadcast systems were ever brought into that remote northern mining community. That type of broadcast is extremely important to families in terms of keeping up to date about what is going on in the world. The problem though is that those individuals in the community who watch a lot of television tend to know more about politics in California or on the eastern seaboard than they do about politics in Canada. For that reason I am very sensitive to this situation and the need to promote increased Canadian content on the air waves.

But when there is no policy in place or no satellite communication in place to provide television to communities such as Cassiar or the Queen Charlottes, it is only good sense that an interim plan be followed, one which makes clear to northern, remotely-located Canadians that this type of satellite, although it means the pirating of signals, will be allowed to continue. The government should get on with the transmission of letters between Canada and the government of the United States to ensure that the scrambling of those signals will not occur.

The CRTC can hear at any time from southern Canadian cable companies and so on ad infinitum. However, unless Parliament debates this policy the interest of southern Canadians may end up being served by corporate cable systems and television stations to the exclusion of the viewing rights of northerners. I am concerned about this, and I trust that both Liberal and Conservative members will rise to participate in debate, support the motion and endorse a parliamentary debate on this serious issue.

Too often, policies are made in the majority interest to the serious detriment of a minority—in this case regionally and geographically and isolated minorities. We hear evidence from Liberal members and Conservative members that the constitution should protect various minority rights. My party certainly takes part in that debate and supports that view. In a country such as Canada, it is extremely important that the rights of minorities be entrenched and supported.

However, pay television, CRTC policy and the demands of the cable systems do not deal with our needs in the north. The minister espouses the extension of services to the north as a priority according to recent statements, but history speaks for itself. The October 28 budget makes it quite clear where the government stands in relation to the northern extension of service. In my view a burgeoning, bureaucratic miasma of red tape is not required in this situation.

If the government wishes to put good quality, Canadian television on the air waves in the north, that is good and I tip my hat. However, once again history speaks for itself. Northern communities have fought for what we have and the decisions and agreements which ought to have been made in our interests have simply not been made. The 19-month extension of ANIK B programming is good and so is Telesat.

For the record I will list some of the projects which are under way. Certainly, some of these projects are important, but as hon. members will see, there are none which relate directly to what I am speaking about today. The first program listed under the minister's program on the extension of existing pilot projects is an evaluation of a 90-megabits-per-second digital link, which hardly affects my riding. There is the Ontario government teleconferencing network project, the Knowledge Network of the West, an interactive video educational system for southern British Columbia educational institutions; the distance education project in Alberta, and an interactive video educational system for communities in Alberta, all of which would have little or no impact on the north.

Other projects are Northern Ontario Hybrid Direct Broadcast, Operational Trial sponsors a good project which brings TV Ontario directly into remote homes and communities via satellite, and the Program Delivery Pilot Project West, is an extension of CBC and BCTV programs into northern British Columbia which only impacts on one very small community in my riding.

There is the Memorial University of Newfoundland Pilot Project which is for health and education exchanges in the province. Then there is the Inukshuk Project sponsored by the Inuit Tapirisat of Canada which is very well known to the Eastern Arctic. The Time Division Multiple Access or Slim TDMA project deals with digital technology applicable to business services and does not affect the north. The next program is called Long Baseline Interferometer which involves the use of a satellite to link radio telescopes for geophysical studies. It is an important scientific program, but in terms of communications policy, it does nothing for northern Canada. Then there is the Naalakvik II program for the Inuit of northern Quebec which puts emphasis on Inuit broadcasting education and community educations. It is obviously a good project, but it does little to bring broad-based educational, entertainment or news service to all of northern Canada.

I will list now some of the new projects upon which the government stands. I believe it will bring home to hon. members precisely why this motion should be supported. The first project is the delivery of teleprinter, audio and Telidon news-information signals which involves the delivery of satellite news directly to radio and television stations and cable companies. It does nothing for the north. The second project involves electronic news gathering. It is there to provide on-the-spot news coverage essentially for southern Canada. Then there is the transportable telephony earth stations project which is for terrestrial and offshore oil industry operations. The fourth project listed is called Inter-Omnibus and is sponsored by the University of Quebec to provide educational services to remote campuses of the university.

Then there are three experiments and demonstrations. The first is called Trans-Canada Amateur Radio Packet Network. It does not deal at all with the educational, entertainment or news areas of television. The second such project is called Technical Evaluation of Digital Modulation Schemes—it is sponsored by the University of Ottawa. The third project is called the Support of Australian Domestic Satellite Programs. So rather than offering something for northern Canadians, the government seems to think it is more important to get involved with the Australian domestic satellite program.

With respect to licensing, television is received only by earth terminals, namely TVRO. In a written statement, the minister indicated that rather than having to wait 18 months to get radio standards procedure 116, more commonly known as an RSP-116, northern Canadians who are interested in getting a licence for their earth receiver will have to wait only 90 days instead of 18 months. However, the minister is reviewing extension of licences to categories not now eligible. But, here is where the trick comes in. We have the problem with the CRTC and since this minister took office we have policy which has been handed down by press release. Whose interests will be upheld in a situation such as this where there are powerful southern cable systems and television companies in the southern part of the country and very powerful viewing audiences who know what they want to watch? No one goes into a home in Montreal, Toronto or Vancouver saying that you must watch CBC tonight if there happens to be a good movie on another television station. That person may never turn on Canadian television. However, the policy of the government right now is essentially to use Canadians living in the north and remote parts of Canada as guinea pigs for Canadianization policies.

I think this situation requires a parliamentary debate. The CRTC can hear evidence ad infinitum from many Canadians living in the southern part of Canada, but northern Canadians are only represented in a limited number of forums. The Parliament of Canada is certainly one place where we should debate and decide what we intend to do with respect to northern and remote television policy.

Under the review which is now going on, reported in The Canada Gazette for November 22 of this year, there is opportunity for formal notices to be given and I would urge all northern Canadians to make submissions before the end of February. I think that around the end of February would be a good time for a full parliamentary debate on the question of CRTC, northern and remote television policy.

There are 2.8 million Canadians who have access to two television channels or less. The overwhelming majority of people in my riding, until recently, had no television access whatever. Isn't it about time we let them have a voice?

Mr. Ron Bothwell owns a company selling satellite receiving stations near London, Ontario. As reported in The Globe and Mail for November 26, 1980, he had this to say about the Department of Communications—I quote from the report:

> Mr. Bothwell said the federal communications department was acting to protect certain cable television interests, since 'federal officials admit that they'll tolerate illegal satellite dishes only in those areas where cable is not available.' He said, for example, that the communications department told him it was willing to turn a blind eye to the operation of satellite dishes in Penetanguishene, but would not allow dishes in Waterloo. That kind of arbitrary action is both absurd and unconstitutional!

There are several vital quotations in the final Therrien report. When considering whether U.S. signals should be carried, at page 17 of the report, we read:

> In determining priorities for services to be carried on Canadian satellites, the carriage of U.S. stations or programming services should not be permitted, subject to a review of this policy should surplus capacity become available.

That recommendation from page 17 of the report applies directly to my riding. People have paid for these dishes, people have installed their own cables. A fantastic amount of community work has been done to bring this form of entertainment into communities. While that sort of recommendation is going forward, for the minister not to rise in this House and call for a parliamentary debate himself is the height of absurdity.

At page 19 of the Therrien report, we find the following:

> Several of the operators of unauthorized satellite reception and delivery facilities who appeared before the committee said they would gladly switch to a Canadian satellite if an attractive service were made available.

I appreciate that because I know that almost all, if not all, the satellite operators in my riding and probably throughout the north would start to use a Canadian satellite if there were full broadcast programming.

However, I think we all know that the broadcasts coming from Telesat and ANIK V are not around-the-clock. There are not many movies or regular local or regionalized news broadcasting, though these are extremely important.

An interim measure asked for by the government is for the CBC to have CTV programming on the present channel which distributes broadcasting of the House of Commons proceedings. I am not sure how many of the residents in the northern part of my riding would want to watch the House of Commons debates—I am sure there are many—but I think probably there are other programs they would appreciate being broadcast on Canadian satellites.

Mr. Knowles: They are watching right now.

Mr. Fulton: At page 20 of the Therrien report, we find the following:

> It is said that the CRTC and DOC have lost, or are rapidly losing, control of the Canadian broadcasting system, and firm action should be taken immediately to regain that control.

There is no question that the CRTC and DOC have lost complete control, not only of the technology, but of what is happening on a global scale in terms of what people are watching and how they are obtaining it. To simply move in now with some weird red tape and various licensing procedures and proposals to shut off, or to allow the American satellites to scramble their signals, is really a hodge-podge way of dealing with such a serious situation.

Recently the C.D. Howe Institute issued a report on federal-provincial aspects of communications policy. Generally, they have concluded the following:

> Neither a continuation of a centralized nationwide control—as originally proposed by the federal government—nor a massive turnover of authority to the provincial governments—as proposed by Quebec—is really acceptable.

I certainly concur with that view. I do not think that all communications policy can be unilaterally determined by the federal government, nor should it simply be disposed of unilaterally to the provinces because of the enormous amount of interjurisdictional communications, namely, transprovincial, transboundary and international.

Clearly, jurisdiction has to be mapped out. In my view that would be most comprehensively and competently done here in debate in this House of Commons. The report also stated that the CRTC should be brought under closer policy control by the cabinet, though the board also said the CRTC should continue to make rules "within the context of clearer political direction." That flows clearly from the motion I have before the House today; it is important there be some political direction for dealing with northern and remote satellite broadcasting. In fact, the question could be expanded to include satellite broadcasting in the whole of this country.

The Howe report also stated that regulatory and political proceedings related to communications policy should be opened up to allow consumers more input. Very clearly, that should include people in the north. The notice printed in the November 22, 1980, Canada Gazette gives some opportunity for northern Canadians to make their views known to the Department of Communications and to the minister, but I think we have to go much further than that. Members from northern and remote areas of Canada have a right to stand in this House and debate CRTC communications policy to ensure that the question of the dishes which are already in place, whether pirating signals or not is adequately discussed. I would urge all members of this House, certainly those who are to speak on this topic, to support the motion in order that we can get on with the debate, perhaps in February, and deal with the very important issues which affect northern Canadians and those who live in remote areas.

Mr. Peter Stollery (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, first I want to thank the hon. member for providing us with an admittedly brief opportunity to discuss this very complex question of extension of services, direct broadcasting, pay TV and all the complicated technical issues which have been brought to the public's attention through the Therrien committee report.

I wish to remind the hon. member that the government, after recommendations made by the CRTC, has taken very important steps in trying to deal with this complex issue.

Recently we extended the test program to remote areas of Canada. I am sure this will be of interest to the hon. member who has just spoken. In October, 1975, the TVRO dishes were legalized. The hon. member has rather badly missed the point addressed by the Therrien committee. As a member of the New Democratic Party, I would expect him to be interested in the whole issue that has caused the problems with satellite communications, namely how do we protect the Canadian interests.

It would be very simple to allow people all over Canada to buy dishes to put on the top of their houses, use the 14/12 gigahertz band and receive direct broadcasting from U.S. satellites for which, of course, they would not be paying. As the hon. member pointed out in a similar private member's hour last week, they would not be paying copyrights to the artists who originated the material being received on their television sets. That would be one point.

Second, and most important, the Canadian cultural interest would be lost. I did not hear the hon. member refer to that in his remarks. He did refer to the question of limited access to television in his constituency of Skeena, which is a remote area and which we all agree is underserved, as are many remote areas in Ontario, Quebec, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and the rest of Canada.

The problem facing the government and the CRTC is how to face that issue while protecting the Canadian cultural interest in a world in which borders and frontiers in terms of communication are becoming increasing fuzzy and vague.

If the hon. member had read the Therrien report, he would agree that it is an extremely complex report. The technical problems alone make one wonder whether it would be in the interests of Canadians to have it brought to this House, where their study would take a large amount of time, when we have other questions such as energy, the constitution and the economy to discuss. The hon. member would be the first to protest if the government, having set up the CRTC to look into the issue—

Mr. Waddell: Nonsense!

Mr. Stollery: The hon. member shouts "nonsense". He does not have the discipline to sit in his seat and keep quiet when another member is speaking. That is the least we can ask. The hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton) conveniently forgets that we have these various commissions and independent bodies to look into these issues objectively to try and resolve them. This is done because we learned over the years that it is the functional way to operate.

I now wish to deal with the question of more adequately serving northern communities with radio and television. The hon. member ignored the very interesting section of the Therrien committee's report which addressed itself not only to those areas of Canada not served by television, but to areas of Canada without proper radio reception. Fortunately, this can be dealt with in a less complicated way than satellites and television. However, it is important.

I live in Ontario. Parts of my province do not have adequate radio service. There are small communities with 80, 90, or 100 people and mining camps throughout the enormous reaches of this country which do not receive adequate service. The CRTC is addressing itself to that question, trying to come up with a solution which will serve Canada better, giving people a larger choice of broadcasting, whether it be television or radio. On the other hand, it insists that the Canadian cultural interest, which I am sure the hon. member is as interested in as I am, is protected.

Right now it is looking at an area which is under the most severe attack as a result of foreign domination. The hon. member's party has consistently made this a plank in its platform for many years. We have a Canadian cultural industry, which is dependent on communications, under severe attack by the internationalization of geostationary satellites which anyone can use by buying an appropriate receiver to stick up on his roof. It is not very big, only a metre and a half across, and it can receive signals directly from abroad, for which the person does not pay, even though someone was responsible for the material directed to that satellite.

I wish to direct my following remarks to a number of the recommendations related to the availability of satellite and earth station facilities to provide for the extension of services reflected in the report. In my opinion, and in the opinion of most members of the committee, it is in this satellite technology that the future of northern broadcasting lies. At this stage it would be appropriate to outline what positive steps have been and are being taken by this government, especially with respect to satellites, which also must include the associated earth stations. Last weekend, the communications minister announced changes in the federal government's policy and procedures with regard to licensing satellite television receive-only, commonly called TVRO, earth stations for the reception of television and radio programming from Canadian satellites. This new policy and procedure will be of benefit in several ways.

First, it allows for simplified application procedures which will make it possible for broadcasters to obtain TVRO licences within 90 days. Second, it makes Canadian satellite-delivered programming more readily available to Canadians throughout broadcast undertakings. Third, it permits provincial agencies and authorities to own and operate earth stations to receive Canadian-originated educational television and other signals from Canadian satellites. The previous policy, in effect since February, 1979, had restricted licences to broadcasters, common carriers and cable television operators. Fourth, licensed TVRO earth terminals are now permitted to receive radio program signals transmitted over the same satellite channel as the television signal. This change will facilitate the wider distribution of radio programs to remote communities at minimum cost and follows upon recommendation No. 21 of the CRTC committee's report.

The minister also announced that he is opening a more general review of the satellite earth station policy, including the study of the possibility of extending TVRO licensing to certain categories of applicants not now eligible. Recommendation No. 11 of the report states, and I quote:

> A review should be undertaken, in consultation with all parties concerned, with a view to expanding the present policy governing the ownership and operation of earth stations for broadcasting purposes that would permit:
> General and special-purpose broadcasting undertakings to own and operate uplink earth station; The ownership and operation of radio receive-only earth stations by licensed broadcasting undertakings; and
> The ownership and operation of receive-only earth stations by educational and other non-commercial institutions for internal use; by community groups; and by private citizens for exclusive use by them and their households. I submit that this recommendation is covered in large part by this recently announced policy and the general review to be undertaken shortly.

● (1630)

Early last week the Minister of Communications (Mr. Fox) announced the extension of the experimental program on the Anik B satellite. This program is one of ongoing operational research conducted by the Department of Communications.

The technical expertise and operational experience gained from this extended experimental program in the 14/12 gigahertz band will reflect the concern of the committee, as expressed in recommendation No. 8, that broadcast system planning should be flexible to accommodate advances in technology.

For the information of hon. members I would like to explain that I am a layman reading this very technical material. What are known as geostationary satellites are satellites effectively going around the world at the same speed as the earth turns and staying in the same spot. I believe this technology was invented in Canada. Step two of this, of course, is the kind of satellite which is used. The original satellites were of such a nature, without becoming too technical, that they would beam down at a receiver which had to be in a rural area because it tended to interfere with other communications because of the band it was using. I think it was a 6/4 gigahertz band, but I am not certain. The new technology which is just being developed, also in Canada, uses the 14/12 gigahertz band, which again in layman's language means that instead of having to be beamed down into a rural area and then brought by a cable into an urban area or wherever it is to be received, the signal can be beamed much closer. I am not sure if it can actually be put on a person's roof, but it can be brought quite close to it because it does not interfere with other signals. All this is very new and rapidly advancing.

I think the hon. member made a point with regard to how difficult it is for the government and governmental organizations to keep up with the tremendous expansion in this technology. However, that does not mean we should stop trying. We should keep trying. I am sure we have always done that in Canada with respect to this type of development, and I believe the government will develop policies which will be able to handle this kind of technology and protect the Canadian interest, which is our purpose.

Recommendation No. 9 refers to the planning of future Canadian satellites and urges full consultation with the broadcasting industry to ensure that the broadcasting needs of all Canadians are fully taken into account. These ongoing experimental projects are exploring ways by which the latest technological advances can be used for new and improved communications services in general.

However, more specifically, CBC, OECA and the private broadcast industry have been consulted and, indeed, are active participants in the Anik B experimental program. Educational television signals, OECA, are being beamed to locations in northern Ontario. In addition, CBC and BCTV signals are being beamed to northern British Columbia communities.

There is a continuing government involvement in satellites for broadcast purposes. There are studies presently under way to determine the suitability of the Anik C satellite to provide an interim direct broadcast satellite service prior to the launch of a dedicated direct broadcast satellite system which will probably take place in the late 1980s if a decision to proceed with such a system is taken.

There are Department of Communications studies on various DBS scenarios covering social, economic, regulatory, institutional and policy aspects. Later on this afternoon I believe one of our members will address the other problem this raises which, of course, is that of pay television, also addressed in the Therrien report. I am not sure whether the hon. member opposite is in favour or opposed, but these things are so intimately connected that we cannot discuss remote broadcasting without also talking about direct broadcasting; and direct broadcasting is, in effect, different from pay television, an issue which is very controversial and complex.

Mr. Waddell: Did you say too complex to debate in this House?

Mr. Stollery: There is that hon. gentleman again. He does not have any discipline. His colleague had his 20 minutes, and I did not say a word, but the hon. member can always be relied upon, if anything even slightly provokes him, to get into the act. He just cannot sit in his chair and keep his trap shut. It would be nice if he would do so for just another three minutes.

Mr. Waddell: You should talk!

Mr. Stollery: The Department of Communications is continuing with preparations for the 1983 regional administrative radio conference at which orbital positions and operating frequencies for the broadcast satellites will be assigned. Much of this subject matter is certainly not in layman's language. We are dealing now with who gets what on the broadcast band, and that is not a subject which can be resolved within Canada. It involves international co-operation not only between the United States and Canada but also with all of the countries in the western hemisphere because anyone can put up a satellite and beam down at any of the countries in the western hemisphere if he is using a geostationary satellite.

The primary task of the 1983 regional administrative radio conference is to create an environment within which a large number of sovereign states can create domestic satellite broadcasting systems tailored to their own requirements and conditions.

The need for satellites for broadcast purposes has been recognized for some time. As early as 1974 a joint Department of Communications-CBC study was undertaken to ascertain the potential of DBS for CBC's extension of coverage needs, and much of the work covered in that report is still pertinent today. I also point out to the hon. member that I believe that in the past week the CBC has declared its intention to apply for a licence for CBC 2 which, I am sure, will be of interest to his constituency.

Appropriate regulation and policies governing a Canadian direct broadcasting system will depend on the ultimate goals of establishing for the service the technical and economic characteristics and the environment in which it will function. All these aspects are presently under review within the Department of Communications.

In closing I would just like to touch briefly on the availability of satellite channel capacity because concern has been expressed of late that the availability of satellite transponders for television distribution will shortly be insufficient to meet the demand until the Anik D is launched.

I see that my time is nearly up. I would not want to leave the hon. member waiting with bated breath for the other part of my argument which I cannot make. I would like to thank him again for bringing this subject to our attention because, as he knows—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Mr. Dave Nickerson (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, I will be fairly brief so as to allow more time for my colleagues on my left to complete the discussion on this subject. It is not very often that I agree with the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton), but this is one of those few occasions.

I am pleased to support, at least in principle, the idea he puts before us today. It is a subject matter on which there is really not much difference between the various parties represented here.

• (1640)

The main difference, if there is one, is that members on this side of the House would like to see this matter debated by the elected representatives of the people of Canada either in this chamber or in committees of this House, whereas hon. members on the government side would prefer to have the matter dealt with by the Department of Communications, by the technical experts alone. My preference would be to have this matter dealt with, initially at any rate, not in this House, as suggested in the motion, but rather in a parliamentary committee because it is, as the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Communications (Mr. Stollery) has outlined, a rather complicated technical matter. In fact, the technical nature of this matter and the advances in communications technology made in the last few years are the reason for the difficulties which we are facing today. What we see is technology outstripping legislation. In many respects it is good that the laws of Canada are not changing quickly and that it takes time, time needed for public discussion, for the laws of this country to undergo change. But in this case a way should be found of dealing with technological advances much faster than when, for instance, we make changes to the Criminal Code.

The motion refers to the special situation which exists in the northern remote areas. I submit that many of the objections raised by the parliamentary secretary apply much more to the south than to the north. In the remote northern areas of our country we do not have the choice of channels and radio stations which the people in the south have, and because of the small number of people living there, very complicated and expensive cable systems and other systems used in southern Canada are not justified. In remote areas in the north the problem which exists in construction and exploration camps in this day and age is that it is very difficult to get people to work there unless you can promise them some of the amenities which they are used to here in the south. There is a growing awareness in these remote communities, mainly because originally the government provided the CBC service to them, that alternatives to the CBC are now available. I am sometimes surprised by the mail I get from very small, remote communities asking me what I can do to help in providing programming additional to that provided by the CBC. These people have also approached government departments, such as the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. I understand that on several occasions that department has made money available for the establishment of satellite receiving stations which, in fact, may be operating illegally. However, I will not comment on that any further.

One of the reasons people want programming additional to that provided by the CBC is that the corporation puts forward a certain point of view, a certain philosophy, and people would like to hear the other side of the story. We have heard accusations in this House from the NDP that the CBC has been an instrument of the Liberal party, and vice versa. The other day someone suggested that perhaps it is controlled by the Rhinoceros party.

An hon. Member: The Conservative party.

Mr. Nickerson: Most people would agree that there is a CBC point of view and that if alternatives were available, other concepts of what is going on in the country could be made known to people.

Apart from that, what many people in smaller communities want is entertainment. Very often the CBC concentrates on lecturing people, telling them what to think rather than entertaining them. I have referred to this several times in this House in the question period and in motions under Standing Order 43. To a certain extent the government has been responsive, although progress has been very slow.

One of the difficulties faced by small isolated northern communities is that they know that satellite receiving stations are available and they would like to put them into operation, as very often they do. But there is always the threat of illegality hanging over them. What we are doing by failing to bring the laws of the country up to date as far as technology is concerned, is forcing people to act illegally. The hon. member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle) tells a very interesting story. A few weeks ago he was part of an erection team constructing a receiving station. An agent of the Solicitor General happened upon the scene. Although he did not threaten to stop the crew, because, presumably, he would benefit from having that station, he inquired whether or not they were acting in accordance with the law, to which the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River replied "I do not really know, but I am certainly acting in accordance with the wishes of my constituents." The method of making this service available to communities in the north—aside from the camps to which I referred, where the services are operated by the company which owns the camp—is to form some communal organization usually through service clubs or sometimes by municipal organizations, the municipal council or some subsidiary organization set up by the municipality. If the Minister of Communications (Mr. Fox) or the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) were to move in and try to tear down those satellite receiving stations or prosecute the people who provided this service, they might find themselves in the position of taking the mayor of the local community to court and perhaps dragging the entire municipal council to court with him. There would be a great public outcry because these stations are what the local people want and they are set up in accordance with the wishes of the people. I would not like to see the Minister of Communications acting with a heavy hand, as he has threatened to do on occasions, and then having to draw back afterwards.

One criticism of the way in which the department is operating is that it is creating a double standard. The department has moved in rather heavily against stations and receivers owned by private companies. It is always easy to take on a private company; it is a lot harder to take on a public organization. They have chosen the easy way and left out municipalities and publicly-owned receiving stations, thereby creating a double standard which I think is morally wrong.

I have been presenting the positive aspects of the case in favour of the satellite stations, but I have to admit that certain things which the parliamentary secretary said are quite valid. There is a negative side to the argument. The parliamentary secretary mentioned such things as copyright, Canadian content and rebroadcasting difficulties. If you have two stations rebroadcasting on a similar frequency, one picture might impinge upon the other. That is a matter which must be resolved. Also I have had complaints about material being received over the airwaves which is not in keeping with generally accepted Canadian moral standards. There again, I have heard from people who very much like to see shows which are not in keeping with normally accepted Canadian moral standards. So, there is a pro and a con argument to that as well.

I admit there are difficulties and that this matter should be looked at, not only from the strictly technical point of view within the Department of Communications, but as the hon. member suggested, in the House or in committees of the House where it can be debated and I look forward to that opportunity.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Ralph Ferguson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State, Small Businesses): Mr. Speaker, I rise to address the motion of the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton) which relates to the report of the Therrien committee submitted to the CRTC on July 24, 1980. The report contains a number of recommendations dealing with the extension of basic television service to northern and remote communities. In addition, it outlines specific recommendations for extending native programming. I wish to confine my remarks to these two aspects of the report.

Although I live in a far different environment than the hon. member for Western Arctic (Mr. Nickerson), it seems rather strange, living in the heartland of southwestern Ontario, within about 35 miles of three radio stations, that at six or 6.15 o'clock in the evening we can only receive one of them, though we can receive a multiplicity of United States stations which increase their power output after the dinner hour. I sympathize with him and his problems in the Western Arctic, as well as those of the hon. member for Skeena in this regard.

Although certain aspects of native programming impinge upon each other, it is important to make a distinction between the needs of native people and those of other Canadians in rural and remote parts of Canada. The native peoples of Canada have special programming needs, particularly in regard to the cultural impact of television. Native people themselves recognize the potential of the television medium for supporting their waning cultures in the face of strong influences exerted by the predominantly non-native society. It is for this reason I shall discuss native programming as an issue apart from the extension of basic television service.

I am quite familiar with satellite receiver stations. As a matter of fact, a particular company in my constituency is pushing hard to have these installed throughout southwestern Ontario at the present time, as an alternative to cable television, to bring in satellite television in the larger apartment complexes, hotels and various other institutions. I am not sure this was the use intended for those satellite stations when they were first launched. If we are to ensure Canadian content, I believe we should take a very hard look at what is happening in this regard. Certainly the minister should be commended for the stand he has taken.

In recent years there has been a growing public awareness of the technological possibilities for satellite-delivered television. The falling costs of television receiver-only earth stations has meant that northern and remote communities have been looking to satellites as a desirable mode for delivering a range of television viewing. However, the lack of an alternative Canadian service has led to the installation of a number of unlicensed television receiver-only earth stations in rural and remote parts of the country. These have been aimed at American communications satellites in violation of international agreements by which both Canada and the United States are bound.

Therefore, much of the emphasis of the Therrien report has been directed to determining how a variety of television service might be extended expeditiously to northern and remote parts of Canada. This emphasis was reinforced as the committee defined "northern" and "remote" as applying to all parts of Canada where essential needs have yet to be met. Therefore, such a definition includes many parts of Canada which could not be categorized in normal circumstances as either northern or remote.

There is a sizeable segment of our population with little or no choice of available television programming. In fact, there are 2.8 million Canadians, or 11 per cent of the total population, who only have access to two or fewer television stations. Moreover, these people are to be found in all parts of the country and include 31 per cent of the residents of Atlantic Canada and 22 per cent of the people living in the prairie provinces, as well as over 50 per cent of northern Canadians. The service afforded these 2.8 million Canadians is in stark contrast to what the majority of urban Canadians enjoy—on the average the latter have access to between ten to 15 television stations.

In recognition of this fact, the Therrien committee indicated the following on the first page of its report:

> Our first unanimous conclusion is that immediate action must be taken to meet the needs of the many Canadians who believe that, as regards broadcasting, they are being treated as second-class citizens.

The report goes on to make six recommendations bearing directly on the extension of television services. Its first recommendation is that the CRTC should immediately call for licence applications for the delivery, in remote and underserved areas, of a range of Canadian satellite television services which would be attractive to Canadian audiences. Its second recommendation is that the federal government, as a purely interim measure of an experimental nature, should arrange and pay for one composite public service of alternative entertainment programming to be delivered by satellite to remote and underserved areas as authorized by the CRTC. Its third recommendation is that immediate action should be taken to ensure that national radio services be made available in all parts of Canada as soon as possible.

Its fifth recommendation was that the extension of broadcasting services to northern and remote areas must not rely upon subsidies from pay TV. Its sixth recommendation was that it must be recognized residents in remote areas may have to contribute to the cost of receiving all but the national broadcasting services, and such contributions must be kept down to the lowest feasible amounts. Its seventh recommendation was that approval for the introduction of any new satelitte service must take into account the essential need to provide, maintain or expand facilities for community and regional services. Its eighth recommendation indicated that planning for the broadcasting system of the future must be flexible enough to accommodate technological, legislative and structural change.

Immediately upon the tabling of this report, the chairman of the CRTC gave the assurance that the commission would act quickly on the extension of television services to northern and remote parts of the country. And they did act quickly. On October 16, the CRTC issued a call for licence applications for the extension of services to remote and underserved communities, such services to include the provision of a variety of radio and television programming services from Canadian networks, Canadian stations and other Canadian sources which will be attractive to those living in rural and remote communities. Applications are being received until December 1. The commission scheduled public hearings to consider the applications for February, 1981, and the chairman of the commission promised that they will render a speedy decision.

The Minister of Communications (Mr. Fox) is optimistic that later in 1981 a multichannel satellite service will be available on the Anik system. For the interim, in compliance with the second recommendation of the Therrien committee, the minister encouraged the CBC, the CTV and TVA to implement an interim satellite television package. They have agreed to pursue the matter and are currently in consultation with the CRC to finalize the details.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. May I say that this is the third or fourth Friday afternoon in a row when I have been sorely tempted to draw attention to the lack of a quorum during private members' hour. I have not done so, because I did not want to be responsible for cutting off discussions on important private members' motions. I hope this temptation will be removed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member's point is very well taken.

CALL FOR WELCOME BY PRIME MINISTER OF NATIVE PEOPLES' DELEGATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Albert Cooper (Peace River): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In light of the fact that the constitutional train has recently arrived in the nation's capital, bringing with it a large delegation representing our aboriginal Canadians, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Shields):

That the Prime Minister welcome these Canadians, thereby demonstrating his great statemanship from the hallowed halls of Parliament Hill equal to his demonstrations of statemanship recently exhibited from the humped side of a camel, and that the Prime Minister bring home the constitution, amended in Canada and not in Britain, to ensure that all Canadians will have an opportunity to be heard on this issue which so affects the future for all Canadians.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

WESTERN ALIENATION—SUGGESTED VISIT BY PRIME MINISTER TO WESTERN CANADA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to propose a motion of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Trudeau) has failed to respond to the feelings of western frustration arising out of the discriminatory provisions of the federal so-called budget and his constitutional proposals, and whereas the Prime Minister has chosen to ignore this very real problem, choosing instead to accuse those who would express their dissatisfaction with his proposals of practising blackmail, being separatists or contributing to separatism, I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Thomson):

That the Prime Minister be directed to cease taking cheap shots at Canadians who live in the west and, instead, to undertake immediately a diplomatic mission to the cities of Winnipeg, Regina, Edmonton, Vancouver and Victoria for the purpose of meeting the premiers and people of western Canada, so that he might begin to develop some understanding of the true reasons for western alienation, which is both real and growing.

Madam Speaker: Presentation of such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No.

VISIT OF NATIVE PEOPLES' DELEGATION—REMOVAL OF BARRICADES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, more than a thousand men, women and children representing the native peoples of Canada have come to Ottawa in peace and good faith to discuss matters of vital concern to their future and to the future of Canada. Considering that the barriers that have been put up in front of the Parliament of our country in response to this act of concern are morally offensive to all those who believe in freedom of assembly, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Selkirk-Interlake (Mr. Sargeant):

That this House demonstrate its willingness to reciprocate the peace and good faith of our native brothers and sisters by taking steps to dismantle immediately the offensive barricades.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Madam Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

PROPOSED VISIT TO FOREIGN COUNTRIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dave Nickerson (Western Arctic): Madam Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43 I wish to introduce the following motion. Whereas the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is soon expected to leave Canada for many weeks' extended holiday in Switzerland, Algeria, Senegal, Brazil and Mexico, all at the Canadian taxpayers' expense, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Burlington (Mr. Kempling):

That the Prime Minister be given leave without pay while he travels around the globe campaigning for the secretary-generalship of the United Nations, and that in the meantime he be replaced by the right hon. member for Yellowhead, who is not at all averse to staying in his own country to deal with Canadian issues on Canadian soil.

MUNICIPAL AFFAIRS

EFFECT OF DIRECT RESOURCE TAXATION ON SERVICES TO BRITISH COLUMBIANS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Vince Dantzer (Okanagan North): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that the city of Kelowna, the city of Armstrong, the regional district of North Okanagan and several other cities and regional councils in British Columbia have passed resolutions petitioning the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to put an end to his government's intrusion into the field of direct resource taxation, and because the imposition of these tax policies will severely inhibit the capacity of municipal governments in B.C. to fulfil their mandate, which is to provide services to their communities, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Cariboo-Chilcotin (Mr. Greenaway):

That this government recognize the vital importance of the essential services provided to the people of B.C. by their municipal governments and enable them to continue to provide essential services by immediately vacating the area of direct resource taxation.

SPEECH OF PRIME MINISTER IN MONTREAL—MOTION UNDER S.O 43

Mr. Robert Bockstael (St. Boniface): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the outstanding speech given by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) last night in Montreal, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Kitchener (Mr. Lang):

That this House encourage all federalists in western Canada to speak out in defence of one strong, united country and, further, that this House condemn all those in positions of influence in the west who, by their strange silence, give tacit consent to those who are fuelling the fires of western separatism.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

INVITATION TO PRIME MINISTER TO ADDRESS WESTERN CANADIANS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Madam Speaker, following on the heels of the last hon. member and in view of the fact that the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Trudeau) turned down an invitation to speak to a Canada West Foundation conference in Banff last weekend but chose instead to send his aide, Michael Kirby, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House invite the Prime Minister to address western Canadians in western Canada rather than from a Liberal fund-raising gathering in Montreal, and that under Standing Order 5 this House grant the Prime Minister leave to go and speak to western Canadians in western Canada.

Mr. Trudeau: Okay.

Mr. Paproski: It gets pretty hot in the kitchen, so he has to leave.

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—CALL FOR APPEARANCE OF NATIVE PEOPLES' DELEGATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Lorne Greenaway (Cariboo-Chilcotin): Madam Speaker, I too rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that the Liberal members of the joint constitutional committee have voted against extending the deadline of the hearings, thus effectively preventing hundreds of Canadians from appearing before them, and in view of the fact that the native people from my province of British Columbia have, on their own initiative, travelled thousands of miles on the constitutional train to appear before the committee, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Prince George-Bulkley Valley (Mr. McCuish):

That the Liberal government reconsider this unreasonable and unjust act of closure perpetrated on the citizens of Canada and thus give such groups as the Union of British Columbia Indian Chiefs an opportunity to appear before the joint committee, as is their right.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

PROPOSED RESOLUTION—SUGGESTED THREAT TO CANADIAN AND NATIVE RIGHTS

Hon. Jake Epp (Provencher): Madam Speaker, I was going to direct my question to the Right Hon. Prime Minister, but—

An hon. Member: He has gone west.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): You asked him to go, Jake.

Mr. Epp: Madam Speaker, he has just left, perhaps because of petulance, but if he does go west, we guarantee him a very warm reception.

● (1415)

Therefore, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. The Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent, on November 9, 1951, speaking at McGill University, stated that:

Canadians will believe that all their cherished rights are completely safe against the encroachment of any possible majority of their fellow citizens.

The late Right Hon. Lester Pearson, in debating the UN Declaration of Human Rights, expressed very similar views and made the point that the majority could not use its power to enact legislation or remove rights against the minority. In view of the fact that these former Liberal prime ministers have rejected unilateral action in the past, could the minister outline how the unilateral action of the government through amendments to the BNA Act in the proposed joint resolution does not threaten both Canadian rights and native Canadian rights?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, the hon. member is probably well aware of section 24 which indicates that in no way can the joint resolution be interpreted to detract or deduct anything from the rights that the native people have. Second, he must be aware that the National Indian Brotherhood and other native organizations will be invited to come before the joint committee this week. I believe the Inuit are going to be there this evening—that is my information—and the Brotherhood perhaps tomorrow, or very soon. But so far as I am aware, there is no question that the joint committee and the steering committee wish to have the native organizations before them.

They will have ample opportunity to present their views at that time not only to government members of that committee but to opposition members. I believe the hon. member himself is on that committee. All members of the committee will have an opportunity to hear what the native organizations have to say and to take a position on what should be done with respect to the entrenchment of their rights in the constitution. So not only will government members have to take a position but certainly the hon. member and his party will have to take one too. That assures me, and it should assure the hon. member, that they will have full input into the constitution with respect to expressing their views and getting involvement from elected members of Parliament.

Mr. Epp: My supplementary question is directed to the same minister. The minister knows that that answer is not adequate. It is not adequate because the Indian leadership has said very clearly that they have not been consulted. In fact, in a speech on April 29 of this year, the Prime Minister, when he appeared before the Indian Chiefs and Elders in this city, said:

We want to work closely with you in reforming the Canadian Constitution in ways which will better secure the rights and the status of the original people of this land.

The minister knows that the apperance of the NIB and other Indian groups before the joint committee is done almost under duress because the government has been blocking every attempt for a proper hearing in that committee as well. So I should like to ask the minister whether he would outline very clearly, not what the constitutional committee is doing, but what specific steps the government has taken since last April 29 to involve the Indian people in constitutional change, and will he specify which ones were accepted by the Indian people as having been taken in close consultation?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): First, Madam Speaker, may I indicate to the hon. member that it is not correct and I do not accept—and I ask all hon. members not to accept—that the government is blocking the attempts of the NIB to have their views expressed before the joint committee. This is a matter for all members of the joint committee and of the steering committee to decide and I understand that the Indian groups will be heard.

So far as the substance of the hon. member's question is concerned, there has been a series of meetings since the Prime Minister's statement in April, referred to by the hon. member, showing his concern and his commitment to involve the Indian people in the constitutional discussions relative to questions that are of primary concern to them. There have been meetings between myself and the Indian leadership off and on for a protracted period of time for the last several months. The National Indian Brotherhood and other native organizations have met with my colleague, the Minister of Justice, leading to the first ministers' conference on the constitution. They had a meeting then to discuss their concerns. There have been other meetings at the offical level with federal-provincial officials, several of them with native organizations. If the hon. member does not consider all those meetings—and I think they were a worth-while exchange of views—a real attempt to indulge in consultation, I do not know what the hon. member would consider a real attempt.

Mr. Epp: Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the same minister. It is not a matter of what I consider is adequate consultation. The point which must be made is that the Indian leadership feels there has not been adequate consultation, and that is why they are here.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Epp: In view of the testimony of the Minister of Justice that Indian rights flow from the Royal Proclamation of 1763 and that in fact it is protected in section 24 of the proposed resolution, can the minister give a full guarantee to the Indian people that in fact under section 24 their present rights are guaranteed, a position which we do not accept? More importantly, is it not possible that courts in the future, if section 24 remains as it is, in fact could abrogate, reduce or remove Indian rights now in place?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Madam Speaker, I have already answered that question. It is my view based on the legal advice which I have received—

An hon. Member: Table it.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): —that section 24 does protect all the rights of the Indian people as at the present time, in the sense that the joint resolution in no way detracts from any and all rights of the native people. That is precisely why I anticipate the native people are being invited to appear before the joint committee, so that people like the hon. member can listen to them and make recommendations which could be embodied in a report that would go to Parliament. If the hon. member feels that way, certainly he will have ample opportunity to express those views when the native people appear before the joint committee.

ESTABLISHMENT OF RIGHTS OF NATIVE PEOPLE

Mr. Stan Schellenberger (Wetaskiwin): Madam Speaker, my question is also directed to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. As many native people do not believe that the present section 24 establishes their rights, is the minister not concerned that their rights will have to be established, given the amending formula in the resolution, at the hands of the majority in the provinces? That is why there is so much concern in the native community which is here at the present time that this section is not adequately protecting them; that they are at the mercy of the majority to get any of their rights put in the constitution.

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, it seems to me that their rights remain the same because the Royal Proclamation is still there; but as I have indicated, certainly it would be very useful to see some of the provinces taking a position with respect to protecting the rights of native people. On many of their aboriginal claims hunting rights are affected; they fall within provincial jurisdiction. For that reason if for no other, it would be useful to have the backing of some of the provinces. Today I saw some indication that at least the Premier of Saskatchewan is prepared to take some of these matters into consideration. So perhaps it is not too late to have that type of support from some of the provinces.

Mr. Schellenberger: Madam Speaker, given that answer, it is no wonder the native people are concerned about what will or will not be in the constitution. I cannot understand why the minister has not recommended that the Royal Proclamation be in the schedule. But because native people have no way other than that process to renew their language and culture rights, can the minister outline if he has any other proposals which will assure them that this will be done after the patriation process has gone through?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Madam Speaker, there was already an assurance in a letter from the Prime Minister to the leadership of the three principal native national organizations that, in the second phase after patriation, one of the very first items on the agenda of the first ministers' conference would be the primary concerns of the native people. That assurance was not only given in a letter, but it was repeated orally on several occasions. Again I reiterate that it would be useful, since the joint committee is set up for that very purpose, if the hon. member and other hon. members would give consideration to suggestions of the kind he has made at that committee; that is what the committee is there for.

SUGGESTED MEETING BETWEEN PRIME MINISTER AND NATIVE PEOPLE'S DELEGATION

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Prime Minister my question is for the Minister of Indian and Northern Affairs Development. It deals with the same subject which was just raised. Considering that the Prime Minister was well received by the Indian people when he spoke to them last April, as strange as that may seem under the present circumstances, when he pointed out he agreed that they have a unique position among all the peoples of Canada, and considering that there are more than a thousand men, women and children representing the Indian, Inuit and Metis communities across Canada who are here now, is it the minister's view that the Prime Minister should take some time this week to sit down and listen to these people about their expressed concerns with regard to the constitutional resolution?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, the Prime Minister indicated orally in the House last Friday and by letter that he would be prepared to meet the Indian leadership at some appropriate time. If he studies the Prime Minister's remarks of last Friday closely, the hon. member will understand that the joint committee is sitting right now to consider many matters, including the requests and concerns of the native people. He indicated that to the House previously. Those concerns expressed there will give us a chance to find out exactly what the essence of their submissions will be to the joint committee, which is made up of members of Parliament both from the government side and the opposition side. The committee's purpose is to consider that very matter and to make recommendations, at which time the House of Commons, and Parliament itself, will consider the report resulting from that committee.

I think it is clear that the Prime Minister would prefer to see that process take place prior to the meeting in question. I would like to reiterate that there is an assurance that he would be prepared to meet with the Indian leadership at some appropriate time.

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, the Prime Minister has acknowledged that the native people of this country are not like any other group. They preceded the French and the English. They preceded all our ethnic minorities. The Prime Minister said in the House on Friday that he would meet "again at some appropriate time in the coming months". With respect, it is not adequate to meet with them in the coming months. The request of the leaders of our native people has been to have a meeting with the Prime Minister prior to the report coming back from the committee. That is the crucial time, since that is when the crucial decision will be made. Therefore I repeat my question to the minister responsible for Indian affairs: Does he not think it advisable in this constitutional change process that the Prime Minister sit down this week with this group of unique people, as he has described them?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Madam Speaker, I can only repeat what the Prime Minister said here last Friday in answer to questions by a member of the New Democratic Party. The hon. member is fully aware what those questions were. He is fully aware what the answers of the Prime Minister were. The Prime Minister's decision was relayed to the House of Commons last Friday and the Leader of the NDP has had ample opportunity to study those responses.

I reiterate that I think there is some real benefit to be had in terms of the Indian organizations having the right to appear before that committee. I am glad the committee has indicated they are prepared to hear them and listen to their views which will be aired before that particular committee. It might be helpful, not only to the Prime Minister of Canada but to many of us here in this House, to find a position which can be taken by all members of that committee, which include members of the opposition, with respect to some of the concerns expressed by the native people. The committee is the place to hear the positions which will be enunciated. It will be of extreme benefit to many of us to know what course should be taken which would be of benefit to the native people.

Mr. Broadbent: A final supplementary question, Madam Speaker. I am completely at a loss to understand the minister's reply.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: I read with care the Prime Minister's answers given in the House last week. There are literally thousands of the original people of this land here in Ottawa. There are members of the opposition and members on the government side who are saying, "Yes, work through the committee." At some levels and for some groups, that is appropriate. Our native peoples are unique. They feel strongly about this matter. Could the minister explain to the House why it is impossible for the Prime Minister, who can find time to travel abroad—and I do not object to that if it is on business—to find time to sit down this week for an hour to discuss this fundamental question with the original peoples of this land?

• (1430)

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Madam Speaker, it is becoming obvious to me that the Leader of the New Democratic Party seems to be primarily preoccupied with making political hay.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hees: You guys never do that.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): He is personalizing for political purposes the concerns of the native people and directing antipathy towards the Prime Minister of Canada. I do not think that is a particularly meritorious posture for the Leader of the New Democratic Party, judging by his past history of deep concern for the interests of native people. That is precisely what the hon. member is doing; he is exploiting the situation in order to direct antipathy towards the Prime Minister.

The Prime Minister's position was clearly stated last Friday and can be found in Hansard. The Prime Minister was present at the last all chiefs' conference in April and he indicated his commitment. He has delegated other ministers to meet with Indian leaders, and they have done so. Also the Prime Minister did not preclude in his answer last Friday the possibility of meeting with the Indian leaders again. At that time he made the reasonable suggestion that the joint committee on the constitution hear out the native peoples, and I understand that it is prepared to do so.

CANADA MORTGAGE AND HOUSING CORPORATION

INCREASE IN MORTGAGE INTEREST RATES

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Madam Speaker, my question arises out of the government's announcement to increase mortgage interest rates on five-year closed mortgages to 15.75 per cent from 15.25 per cent, and it is addressed to the minister responsible for Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation. On a $50,000 loan with an interest rate of 15.75 per cent, the house buyer will pay a total of $195,117, or $145,117 in interest during the life of the mortgage. How can the minister justify this increase in light of the fact that at 15.25 per cent Canadians were already paying in excess of 30 per cent of their income on housing?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, as the hon. member and all hon. members are aware, the increase by Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation is in direct response to market conditions at the present time. For example, when the interest rate went down in the summer months and in September, CMHC rates were also reduced; when the rates go up, the CMHC rate increases. If there is a gap between the market rate and the rate which the corporation must meet, it becomes a direct expenditure of the government. I notice in the newspapers today that there are experts who say the interest rate is temporary and that it is expected to drop off in the next couple of months.

Mr. Darling: Madam Speaker, I would point out to the minister that there will be a change in the opposite direction because the Canadian dollar is down today to 83.8 cents. This increase will affect very seriously those persons who are purchasing new homes and those who are in the process of negotiating their present mortgages. Will the minister tell the House if it is the intention of this government to introduce any contingency plans to assist home owners to grapple with this impossible burden? The average family income, according to Statistics Canada, is $22,000 per year or $1,833 a month, and 30 per cent of that wage is $550 a month. Yet, a $50,000 mortgage at 15.25 per cent costs $627 a month and even that payment will probably increase. What does the minister have to say on this matter?

Mr. Cosgrove: Madam Speaker, there are a considerable number of Canadians in the third quarter who, for example, are entering the market for the first time as a result of an upturn in building in the residential market. As the hon. member will know, new starts number 185,000 up to the month of October. I am waiting with interest to see what the starts were for last month. It is obvious that there is a segment of the Canadian population which finds that it can enter the market at those particular prices. I have also indicated that we believe the rate is too high and we are hopeful that it has reached its high point and will be reduced by market forces.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

DEER LODGE HOSPITAL—INQUIRY WHETHER RESPONSIBILITY TRANSFERRED TO GOVERNMENT OF MANITOBA

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Acting Minister of Veterans Affairs. On Friday the minister sent me a letter with regard to Deer Lodge Hospital. In the letter the minister stated that space for 32 chronic or long-term patients at Deer Lodge Hospital has been granted the Manitoba Health Services Commission for a period of one year. Would the minister indicate whether this is the start of the transfer of the Deer Lodge Hospital from the Department of Veterans Affairs to the government of Manitoba?

[Translation]

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence and Acting Minister of Veterans Affairs): Madam Speaker, in my letter to the hon. member I clearly explained, I think, the procedure that would be followed to ensure that veterans in that area would be provided with the proper care. There may eventually be a transfer, but whatever policy the Department of Veterans Affairs follows, veterans will certainly be given priority consideration and they will receive the care they can rightfully expect.

[English]

Mr. McKenzie: Madam Speaker, we on this side support the action of the federal government to provide additional hospital space to the government of Manitoba. But what action will the minister take now to reduce the long waiting list of veterans who are waiting to get into the Deer Lodge Hospital for chronic and domiciliary care? Many of these patients will be long term. What does the minister intend to do about this list?

[Translation]

Mr. Lamontagne: Madam Speaker, according to my information, there is no long waiting list of patients for that hospital. Nevertheless my officials advise me that they will give the matter priority consideration in order to solve the problem and, as I have said, so that veterans can receive the care they can rightfully expect.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

POLLUTION OF WATER SUPPLY ON INDIAN RESERVES—SEWAGE TREATMENT TRAINING PROGRAMS

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Madam Speaker, I direct my question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. A recent study by Environment Canada of northern Manitoba Indian settlements blames inadequate sewage disposal for contamination of the drinking water. The study also indicated that on many of these reserves the bacterial count in the water supply is at least three times the acceptable level. This has led to a substantial number of cases of hepatitis and dysentery. The minister's department is responsible for training the people who work on sewage disposal systems, and the report says that the training of these people has been inadequate. Would the minister tell the House whether or not he has yet given instructions to his department to see that adequate training programs are provided for these people who are responsible for sewage treatment so that these intolerable health threats will not continue?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, I am well aware of the whole situation in northern Manitoba as the hon. member has described it. My department is also aware of the concerns of the hon. member on this matter. We have looked into the situation and asked for a complete report. I can assure the hon. member that the entire question of more adequate training will receive our immediate attention.

Mr. Orlikow: Madam Speaker, according to the same report, 75 per cent of the above-ground petroleum storage sites are improperly designed and are a major factor in the pollution which has taken place. Among the companies responsible for this deplorable situation are the Hudson's Bay Company, the CNR, the federal Department of Transport as well as many of the multinational oil corporations located there. Will the minister give directions to his department to ensure that these corporate offenders are instructed very quickly to take care of this situation and to eliminate the pollution which they have created?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Madam Speaker, subject to receiving more details in a report later this week—the contents of which I will be pleased to relay to the hon. member—if what he has suggested seems to be an appropriate course of action, then I would have no hesitation in taking that course of action.

NATIONAL REVENUE

INCOME TAX DEDUCTIONS FROM WAGES OF SPOUSES IN UNINCORPORATED BUSINESSES

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Revenue. In view of the announcement by the Minister of Finance last spring that wages of a spouse working in an unincorporated small business would be deductible for income tax purposes, can the minister assure the House that this commitment made by the Minister of Finance will be honoured for the 1980 taxation year, because the department is refusing to accept income tax contributions deducted for spouses working in unincorporated small businesses?

Hon. William Rompkey (Minister of National Revenue): Madam Speaker, the policy of the government is as expressed by my colleague, the Minister of Finance, in his April statement. We have had some difficulty with legislation because the heavy legislative schedule the government has had, but I can assure the hon. member we will be taking all the necessary steps to ensure that that policy is put in place. People so affected should govern themselves as though all of the necessary steps have been taken which will allow them that claim before the 1980 taxation year.

PETRO-CANADA

INQUIRY WHETHER EMPLOYEE PARTICIPATED IN PREPARATION OF NATIONAL ENERGY PROGRAM

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. The minister will understand the distinction between being consulted on the content of a policy decision and the actual preparation of a position. In that context, can the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources tell the House whether any official or employee of Petro-Canada participated in the preparation of the energy policy published as part of the budget?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Would the right hon. member repeat the last part of his question? There was some noise and I did not hear him, Madam Speaker.

Mr. Clark: There is a distinction, which I believe the hon. minister understands, between being consulted and participating in the preparation of something. My question is whether any official or employee of Petro-Canada participated in the preparation of the energy policy which was tabled as part of the budget.

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, there was one employee of Petro-Canada who was on leave and was attached to the department during the preparation of the energy program. I know of no other employees of Petro-Canada who participated in the program. As I said, the employee in question was on leave from Petro-Canada during the time he worked for the department.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, can the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources tell us whether this individual—and I would appreciate having the individual identified—was drawing salary from Petro-Canada at the time he was on leave from that company? In addition, was there any arrangement with Petro-Canada which would speak either to pension rights or to the rights of re-employment, and is that person now back with Petro-Canada?

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, the individual is Mr. Joel Bell whose name has been public knowledge for the past few months.

I will make some inquiries about his exact contractual arrangements. I was aware of them, but I cannot recall all of the aspects to which the right hon. gentleman has referred. It was made quite clear that the particular individual was to be considered as working for the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources and, as such, was bound by the rules which apply to federal public servants for the entire period he worked for the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, we want to know all of the details, including any then existing, recommenced or continuing arrangement between Mr. Bell and Petro-Canada, whose Crown corporation was so well served by the budget he helped to prepare.

THE BUDGET

INQUIRY WHETHER ANY EMPLOYEE OF CROWN CORPORATION PARTICIPATED IN PREPARATION

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Finance. Can he tell the House whether any official or employee of any other Crown corporation participated in the preparation of any aspect of the budget? If so, what Crown corporations, other than Petro-Canada, were involved?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Not to my knowledge, Madam Speaker.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, would the Minister of Finance confirm that fact? Could he inform himself and provide that information to the House of Commons?

Mr. MacEachen: Yes, Madam Speaker.

SHIPBUILDING

PROPOSED MEETING WITH CANADIAN SHIPBUILDING AND SHIP REPAIR ASSOCIATION

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Madam Speaker, my question is either for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce or the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. It concerns a long awaited meeting between the Canadian Shipbuilding and Ship Repair Association pursuant to its brief submitted about six months ago. Could either of these hon. gentlemen tell us at what departmental level this meeting will take place? Will the ministers be participating personally in view of the very serious concerns which the industry has raised concerning, for example, the Jones act, which prohibits Canadian vessels being sold in the United States, and in view of the other conditions which are eroding the Canadian shipbuilding industry?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Madam Speaker, perhaps my colleague will answer the question because I believe it comes under his jurisdiction.

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, I met personally with the executive of the Canadian Shipbuilding and Ship Repair Association some weeks ago. I believe the association will be having its annual meeting in Ottawa over the next few days. There will be discussions at that time at the senior officials level.

Mr. MacKay: Madam Speaker, the minister will know that Canadian fishing companies are looking toward building replacement vessels in the United States because these vessels can be moved there if and when Canadian companies find it expedient to move their operations to the United States. Is the minister planning to move quickly to remove some of these conditions which are eroding the future prospects of the Canadian shipbuilding industry?

Mr. Gray: Madam Speaker, we are looking very actively into these things and I will be working on them in consultation with my colleagues, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and the Minister of Transport.

NORTHERN PIPELINES

NORMAN WELLS PROJECT—ALLEGED CONFLICT OF INTEREST

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. The National Energy Board recommendations on the proposed Norman Wells pipeline project in the Northwest Territories will be soon handed down to cabinet for a decision. The Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, while acting in its role as trustee for the interests of native people, also stands to benefit from one-third ownership of oil produced in the area if the project is approved. The government is also in charge of both the federal environmental assessment review panel and the national energy hearings. This constitutes an obvious conflict of interest.

Given this conflict of interest, how can the department, as trustee for native people, possibly represent the interest of the Dene Nation in a fair and reasonable manner? To ensure that the interests of the Dene Nation are given just and unbiased representation, I ask the minister if he will insist that this matter be brought before the House for a full debate prior to any cabinet decision on the Norman Wells project.

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, may I just tell the hon. member that there are many native leaders to whom I have spoken who are very glad that the department has some say with respect to the rate of development north of 60, vis-à-vis our power to consider environmental hearings, issue permits and so on, and to more adequately stage that type of development in the interests of the native people. Within the native population itself, there are some who do not see this type of conflict in quite the same light as the hon. member does.

As for the question of bringing the matter before the House, I cannot answer that question right now but I can assure the hon. member that when the National Energy Board does make its decision, the matter will be thoroughly considered by cabinet and the concerns of the Dene with respect to the Norman Wells development will be made known in a full and objective fashion. I have already given that assurance to George Erasmus, head of the Dene Nation. In fact, the concerns of the Dene have already been relayed to my colleagues in the cabinet.

Mr. Manly: Madam Speaker, when speaking to some of the Dene people this morning, they assured me it is very important that this matter be brought before the House for debate to ensure that their trust is being handled properly. Three years ago the Dene people understood the government had accepted the Berger recommendation for a ten-year moratorium so that their land claims could be settled fairly. Will the minister responsible for a fair settlement of Indian land claims assure this House that, on the basis of the outstanding claims with the Dene people, claims that will be violated if the Norman Wells project goes ahead he will seek a moratorium on the Norman Wells project until such time as the Dene claims have been settled to the satisfaction of the Dene people?

● (1450)

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Madam Speaker, surely it is a little premature to be reacting in the fashion the hon. member seems to be. The National Energy Board have not yet made their recommendation. That is a board duly constituted by Parliament to go into questions of this kind. It is rather inappropriate to prejudge what the National Energy Board might say. It is quite possible that the National Energy Board may recommend that there be a delay or that the application not be approved at this time.

I understand the Dene feel they have not had an adequate opportunity to present their views. Nevertheless, they did go before the board and the board was aware of their very real concerns. I can only indicate to the hon. member that his questions will be more appropriate once the National Energy Board makes its report and he and I and the entire House find out what they have to say about it.

In the meantime, in terms of allowing the House of Commons to have a full input into the implications of the matter, it is open to the hon. member's party and the other opposition party to raise this subject on their allotted days, because I agree it is a very serious one indeed.

EXECUTION OF SEARCH WARRANT—APOLOGY EXTENDED

Mr. Chris Speyer (Cambridge): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General. Does the minister agree that the action taken by the RCMP and immigration officials in executing a search warrant on the home of Mr. and Mrs. Fauja Bains in Toronto at 4 a.m., in circumstances where a gun was pointed at Mr. Bains' head, the home was ransacked and the Sikh holy book was torn, was outrageous; and is the minister willing to tender an apology on behalf of the RCMP and the government?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Before I answer that, Madam Speaker, I would like to indicate to the House I have directed that pursuant to the resolution passed unanimously by this House at two o'clock the RCMP remove the fence erected in front of the House.

In reply to the question, I would indicate that the RCMP and the Solicitor General are prepared to apologize to the family concerned for that incident. The warrant was issued properly. It was executed in a lawful manner. However, it is obvious that some attention will have to be paid to the religious sensibilities of minority groups in Canada. I intend to consider this fully at the next possible opportunity with the RCMP to ensure adequate sensitivity for the domestic religious practices of members of minority groups in Canada.

Mr. Speyer: My supplementary is directed to the minister of immigration. What policy governs the use of firearms in searching for illegal immigrants when immigration officials and RCMP officials conduct such a search? Is there a policy with regard to carrying and pointing firearms in the circumstances in which I asked my previous question?

Mr. Kaplan: Madam Speaker, I will be glad to look into that and give the hon. member information about that. I do not have full details about everything that took place at the residence, but I have asked to be fully briefed about it. I will then be able to indicate to the hon. member the policy of the police on occasions like that.

FISHERIES

PROPOSED REDUCTION IN QUOTAS OF NEWFOUNDLAND AND NOVA SCOTIA FLEETS

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Madam Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. In fisheries circles in recent days there have been claims that the new Atlantic groundfish management plan could result in lay-offs for trawlermen and plant workers, with suggestions of losses as a result of this plan reaching the $200 million mark. I therefore ask the minister why quotas which could reduce the year round fishing fleet's operations in Newfoundland and Nova Scotia to nine months a year have been proposed, and on what scientific data these new quotas are based.

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Madam Speaker, the type of headlines the hon. member refers to are misleading. The reality is that the large trawler fleet has enjoyed an increase in its catch from roughly 200,000 tonnes to over 300,000 tonnes for the last two or three years. Obviously, if the catch rate has increased dramatically and the fleet can take its quota in nine months, then surely that fleet is not entitled to ask me if it can take fish from other fishing enterprises which have a three, four or five-month season in order to ensure it can have a 12-month operation. That is the problem which must be dealt with, a dramatic catch rate increase and a biological increase which has to be kept within reasonable terms.

Mr. Crouse: Madam Speaker, it was my understanding that when the 200-mile limit was established, it was to be of benefit to the Canadian fishing industry. This, of course, is what has happened. When the 200-mile exclusive economic zone was established, quotas to other nations fishing within our zone were to be allocated only on fish surplus to our needs. In view of the fact that the new proposals can only be harmful to Canadians who wish to work not nine months a year but 12 months a year, has the minister decreased the quotas in 1981 for foreign fishermen operating within our 200-mile zone? If so, by how many tonnes and on what species?

Mr. LeBlanc: Madam Speaker, the quota that is of interest to Canadians and which was allocated in 1980 to foreign nations was in the order of 25,000 tonnes. The fishing plan for 1981 does not yet dispose of this quota. There are very important negotiations under way or which have just been concluded with the Common Market. I have not yet been briefed as to the conclusions of those discussions. It may be that Canada will want some part of that 25,000 tonnes as negotiating currency for access to the European Common Market. I think it is wise to keep this opening available to us.

I might say to the hon. member that the fishing fleet he defends, and which I suspect he has become the voice of, has enjoyed a very substantial increase in its rate of catch since the declaration of the 200-mile limit. That has not been the case for at least three provinces, Quebec, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, which inside the Gulf of St. Lawrence have not seen a substantial increase at all. It is to these fisheries that the large trawlers which the hon. member defends want to have access. I must tell him that the fish have to be shared, and those who had more cannot always expect to have an unlimited amount.

EXTERNAL AID

ITALIAN EARTHQUAKE—TRANSMISSION OF FUNDS TO VICTIMS

Mr. Al MacBain (Niagara Falls): Madam Speaker, my question is addressed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. There have been reports that financial assistance from the Canadian-Italian community to help Italy's earthquake victims is still in Canada. Can the Canadian government facilitate the sending of these moneys to either the Italian government or to international agencies?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, I presume the funds to which my hon. friend refers are those collected by the Italian community in Canada. What they decide to do with those funds in the first instance is obviously their own concern. My understanding is that those funds were collected primarily for reconstruction. I suppose they may be used for emergency rehabilitation and relief, if necessary. I can quite understand why they would not have acted at the moment when the full extent of the problem is not known.

With respect to our government assistance, we are now committed to $300,000 in emergency relief and another $1.5 million in longer-term rehabilitation. I understand my colleague the Minister of National Defence, is also making clothing and shelter materials available from our base at Lahr.

REFUGEE PROGRAM FOR ITALIAN EARTHQUAKE VICTIMS

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. In view of the deep concern felt by all Canadians for the suffering still being endured by the people of Italy, will the government consider a special refugee program so that homeless persons in Italy who have no relatives in Canada to sponsor them, or homeless persons who have relatives who cannot afford to sponsor them, might be permitted to come to this country as refugees rather than having to go through all of the immigration red tape?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, as I indicated in the House last week, there is already a provision whereby Italians from the affected earthquake area could immediately come to Canada under the visa regulations of the act, and we have instructed our officials to give them total access at the port of entry and waive some of the normal requirements that a person would normally have to meet. Under those circumstances they would not be landed immediately but would be able to get relief here in Canada, and we would be prepared even under extreme emergency circumstances to provide ministerial permits to allow them to take up residence.

Whether they can be incorporated under the refugee category of the act is something that my colleague the Minister of State for Multiculturalism and I and the Secretary of State for External Affairs will want to have discussed with the Italian government beforehand, because it really is, in part, a decision that they would have to make. Being a very independent country, we would first want to make sure that they are in agreement with that kind of action.

Mr. Knowles: Madam Speaker, may I ask the minister a supplementary question? In dealing with this matter, will the government also consider the possibility of providing transportation costs and care for a year, as Canada so generously did for the boat people?

Mr. Axworthy: Madam Speaker, as I indicated last week, the provisions of the transportation loan fund will be available to people coming from the earthquake areas of Italy; they will have exactly the same provisions available to them. It is also my understanding, again from talking to my colleague and having met with representatives of several Italian organizations over the weekend, that so far as any care or cost that would be encountered once the families or individuals have arrived here is concerned, many of the Italian community themselves are prepared to supply that assistance immediately. We are working with them to make sure that there would be no hardship.

PRIVILEGE

MR. WADDELL—STATEMENTS MADE BY MR. ANDRE

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Madam Speaker, my question of privilege was raised on Friday, and I raised it on Thursday night right after the remarks of the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre) as reported at page 5121 of Hansard. At that page of Hansard and in that speech, the member for Calgary Centre had this to say:

The New Democratic Party energy critic, the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell), was bordering on McCarthyism in some of his remarks which were directed at the hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington).

And then he went on to say:

That cheap McCarthyism—

And finally he said, and I quote:

Character and integrity are not words one would use to describe the current New Democratic Party caucus.

The words that I object to and raise the question of privilege on is the charge of "cheap McCarthyism". I want to say that one has to look at the context of the debate in which the remarks were raised.

On November 21 I opened the debate on the Petroleum Administration Act and said that as a Canadian living in western Canada I was concerned about the growing danger of separatism in the west, and I spoke of the importance of Canada to me and of the fact that western members of Parliament can be effective in this House, in this Parliament of Canada, can be effective in winning things for their constituents and for their region, and that western Canada was not monolithic in its outlook, that there were many groups there and perhaps the wrong groups were being heard from.

I said also that I was generally concerned with the fact that the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark), like the Premier of Alberta, had not forcefully condemned separatists in western Canada, and specifically I said that I was concerned with the remarks made by the member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington) in which he spoke of separatism and the establishment of a western parliament.

I quoted from an article that was in the Vancouver Sun on October 25, 1980, with the headline "MP Urges Western Parliament". I passed out copies of the article to my Conservative colleagues.

I am not alone in raising these concerns. On October 11, 1980, in the Ottawa Citizen, George Oake, in the column: "Dateline Vancouver", said the following:

Conservative Leader Joe Clark appears to be denouncing western separatism these days in almost the same breath he condones the reasons for its existence.

And further on:

A few members of Clark's B.C. caucus have come dangerously close to endorsing separatism. In a recent interview with the Vancouver Sun, Capilano MP Ron Huntington called for a western parliament to ensure more bargaining power with central Canada. Vancouver Centre MP Pat Carney has expressed similar sentiments in the House of Commons, despite pleas from some Tories that she hold her tongue.

And finally he quotes at the end of the article John Fraser, the member for Vancouver South who said, and I applaud this, Madam Speaker—

The day they (provinces) want to separate, I will go to the hills with a rifle and fight—that's how strongly I feel about this country—

This was said by the staunch federalist, John Fraser.

I raised those matters in the context of my speech. The Leader of the Opposition was in the House—at least he was in the back of the House—during part of my speech and he chose not to take part in the debate. The member from Capilano was not here for the debate. It was a six-day debate, and these matters were being debated. I point this out to show the context in which my remarks were raised.

At the end of the debate of November 27, instead of the member from Capilano speaking in the debate, as is right, or the Leader of the Opposition speaking, and replying to my criticisms and, indeed replying to general press criticisms which were similar, they did not take that opportunity. Instead, the member from Calgary Centre called my remarks "cheap McCarthyism".

My point of privilege is this, Madam Speaker, first, that the remarks were legitimate criticisms which my friends may not agree with, and that is their right, but I have a right to make them. They come at a time when the polls in western Canada are showing a majority of Canadians from western Canada—

An hon. Member: Cheap McCarthyism.

Mr. Waddell: —well, they don't want to leave Canada and don't think they are getting a fair deal in Canada. They come at a very, very touchy time. In my speech I suggested ways to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and to the government whereby westerners could get a better deal in Canada. In the debate we talked about the western development fund having provincial input, having a special committee of the House of Commons chaired by an opposition member, probably a Conservative member, on western development, western alienation, and there were a number of positive suggestions. I urge the leaders of both the Liberal and Conservative parties to turn their thoughts and their actions to healing wounds, not to call us hysterical in western Canada, as the Prime Minister did, and not to say, as the Leader of the Opposition did, that he understands the separatists, but does not condemn them.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. Could the hon. member restrain himself to pointing out to the Chair where his question of privilege arises? I do not think it is important or necessary to repeat his speech, which apparently he is referring to quite extensively.

Mr. Waddell: Madam Speaker, I am just coming to that, and I appreciate your comments. The point is simply this: the word McCarthyism has a certain connotation. It can be objectively defined as defined in the dictionaries, and I ask Your Honour to look at "The American Political Dictionary", fourth edition, by Mr. J. C. Plano, which defines McCarthyism, and I will pass this up to the Chair. It talks about it in terms of unsubstantiated accusations imputing disloyalty, threats and so on, and to being undemocratic. Also in William Safire's "Political Dictionary" of 1978 there is a definition of "McCarthyism" which talks about investigations which flout the rights of individuals in the pursuit of their ends. Again there is the notion of being undemocratic, and this indeed is the question of privilege.

The fact is that McCarthyism is not listed in the words which are listed at pages 108 and 109 of Beauchesne, with which I am sure Your Honour is familiar, but my point is that the word McCarthyism does mean something. It means deceitful and undemocratic, and when an hon. member says that about my remarks, he is imputing to me the notion that somehow I am being deceitful, undemocratic, disloyal, and so forth. That is why I set the context in which the remarks were made.

I ask Your Honour to look at page 136 of Erskine May's nineteenth edition which talks about breaches of privilege and contempt, and about "a tendency, directly or indirectly, to produce such results", in speeches, that may be treated as contempt. It speaks about contempt as reflecting on the character, good faith and motives of a member. I ask Your Honour to look at page 152 of Erskine May which talks about libels in common law and also says the following:

—but to constitute a breach of privilege a libel upon a member must concern the character or conduct of the member in that capacity.

To summarize briefly, my point is that the charge made by the hon. member is serious. He is in fact reflecting on my character and saying that I am carrying out something which is deceitful and badly motivated. In the context of my remarks, as I pointed out, I was simply making a legitimate criticism, as I am supposed to do in this House.

I was inviting hon. members to take part in the debate and to answer very serious concerns. After all, what is a western parliament when we already have a Parliament in Canada? That is what I was asking, and I was inviting hon. members to take part in the debate. They chose not to. They chose to duck the debate. The hon. member for Calgary Centre chose to make false and slanderous accusations. I ask Your Honour to look at the matter and to ask the hon. member to withdraw them.

I want to raise one other point before I sit down, and that is the nature of a word like McCarthyism. I apologize in advance if I am wrong, but in a debate I thought I heard the Leader of the Opposition, or perhaps someone else, refer to the Chair the other day by saying "Beaudoin". Taken in that particular context that was an unfortunate reflection that the Chair was acting unfairly. If that remark was made, it seems to me that would be a breach of privilege and that it should be withdrawn because the word Beaudoin has a certain connotation.

The word McCarthyism clearly has certain objective connotations which can be defined, and I have already gone over them. I will not repeat myself, but if Your Honour accepts that the word does have those connotations and can be defined that way, and if Your Honour accepts what I have said—I invite you to look at my remarks in Hansard—as legitimate criticisms, then the hon. member for Calgary Centre is in breach of my privileges as a member of this House by alleging that I am making McCarthyism remarks.

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Madam Speaker, the word McCarthyism is derived from the activities of the late Senator Joseph McCarthy of the United States who, under the guise of pursuing evil communism, besmirched many reputations of outstanding Americans by making the accusation either directly that they were communists or, more indirectly, by saying, "Will you now stand here and state categorically that you are not, never have been nor have any sympathies for the communist party?" Knowing full well that if a person had, for example, some socialist leanings, the mere asking of the question "Were you communist" was enough to hurt that person's reputation. Since then the word has come into increasing usage, to the point where it is defined in numerous political dictionaries.

The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell) quoted from "The American Political Dictionary" by J. C. Plano. According to that dictionary McCarthyism means:

Unsubstantiated accusations of disloyalty and abuse of legislative investigatory power that engender fear over real or imagined threats to the security of the nation.

Another definition in "The Young Voter's Manual", a topical dictionary of American government and politics by Leon W. Blevins, defines McCarthyism as follows:

The indiscriminate use of loose accusations by those seeking to cast doubts on the loyalty of selected public officials—

Those are two definitions. I bring to the attention of the Chair the remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway on November 21, as reported at page 4952 of Hansard, and I quote:

I will go further and say that the Leader of the Conservative party (Mr. Clark), who should know better, is aiding and abetting the new forces of separatism in western Canada.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): False!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Withdraw!

Mr. Andre: I would define that as a loose accusation by one seeking to cast doubts on the loyalty of a selected public official, in this case the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark).

Then there was an interjection by the hon. member for Richmond-South Delta (Mr. Siddon), after which the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway said:

The party to my right is aiding and abetting separatism in western Canada.

He accused the whole party. If the hon. member had said "The party to my right is aiding and abetting communism", that would be a precise example of McCarthyism as defined and accepted common usage. Then the hon. member said, after another interjection by the hon. member for Richmond-South Delta:

If the hon. member will give me a chance, let me ask why the former prime minister, who is the Leader of the Conservative party, has not stood up and repudiated the remarks—or denied them—which are reported in the Vancouver Sun of Saturday, October 25. The hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington) was reported to have said—

And so forth. In the heat of debate members sometimes make remarks. There were interjections, perhaps, from this side. One might say that the hon. member simply misspoke, became overly excited or said something he really did not mean. Well, five days later, on November 26, as reported at page 5107 of Hansard, the hon. member said, and I quote:

I stood up in this House and asked the hon. member from Richmond, who is chattering away here, why the Leader of the Opposition does not deny the remarks made about a western parliament by the hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington). Incidentally, the Leader of the Opposition heard this.

The hon. member reaffirmed that his remarks on November 21 were not an accident. He meant to use McCarthyism. He was reaffirming it on this particular date. The reason I accused the hon. member of McCarthyism in his remarks—and it is McCarthyism—stems from another definition of McCarthyism which I think is the real tragedy in what the hon. member is doing. That definition is in "Safire's Political Dictionary", an enlarged, up-to-date edition, in which Douglass Cater, apparently in a book entitled "The Fourth Branch of Government", is quoted as follows:

McCarthyism's greatest threat was not to individual liberty or even to the orderly conduct of government. It corrupted the power to communicate, which is indispensable to men living in a civilized society.

Mr. Nielsen: Waddellism.

Mr. Andre: Waddellism, perhaps, and that is the reason this had to be raised. Ironically—and he did not intend to—the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway is doing a service to this House by raising this issue so that it can be aired, because that is precisely what he is attempting to do. He is attempting to corrupt the power to communicate, which is indispensable. By accusing members of this party of fostering separatism and by talking about it, the hon. member is denying or attempting to prevent us from talking about what is a very real problem in western Canada. It has to be talked about.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has just said that he is grateful that the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell) has raised issues. I feel that the hon. member himself is raising issues. I ask him, as I asked the hon. member before him, to limit himself to discussing the question of privilege. I know he wants to offer definitions of McCarthyism, and I am grateful that he has done that. However, because I will need to ascertain whether the word was unparliamentary, I would like him to limit himself to telling me whether or not, in his view, there was a breach of privilege.

Mr. Andre: I thought I was in the process of doing that, Madam Speaker. I think this is a very important question which needs a full airing. Probably the accusation should be reversed. The point of privilege should come from this party because, if this type of behaviour is permitted and we are not allowed at least to counter it by way of debate and call it what it is, that is, McCarthyism, then we are certainly interfering with the privileges of members who feel it to be their responsibility to express the feelings which exist among their constituents, the growing sense of alienation which is harming the country and causing immense disunity in the country.

Perhaps the hon. member does not like to be identified as doing what he is doing, but I think, quite clearly—and this bears repeating—as Douglass Cater said, the greatest threat is not to the individual liberty, to me as a member of Parliament or to my colleague, the hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington), as a member of Parliament, but rather the corruption of the power to communicate. In fact the accusation was deliberately made in the debate, as reported at page 5121 of Hansard of November 27. The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway is only identified as "An hon. Member", and he said "Not with the Tory separatists". I was here and I know it was the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway who made the remark. Other hon. members can substantiate this. If a member is allowed to make that remark, which is McCarthyism as defined, and we are not allowed to identify it as such, then that means that western alienation, and the feelings of frustration in the west will never be discussed because those of us who might raise this will be branded as aiding and abetting something which we all detest. When the hon. member for Capilano suggests a possible way in which westerners might give expresssion to the feelings of alienation that are not separatist, namely, ideas on a western parliament or a grouping of the four western provinces—

An hon. Member: What?

Mr. Andre: —to enhance the negotiating strength, if that is identified as separatism by a member who, unlike the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) whom this hon. member supports, served this country during the last war as an airman in the North Atlantic Squadron, under enemy fire—

An hon. Member: That is imputing motives.

Mr. Andre: I hear the Leader of the NDP (Mr. Broadbent) speaking up because he too is guilty of McCarthyism in its more blatant form.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Andre: According to a Globe and Mail article here he "repudiates separatists". What separatists? The NDP members are feeling somewhat embarrassed these days because of their chicanery and because they are hopping into bed with the Liberals—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I will have to ask the hon. member to please conclude his comments. He is entering into a debate and not discussing the question of privilege.

Mr. Andre: Madam Speaker, I will conclude by saying that this is certainly not a question of privilege. If anyone has a question of privilege it is members on this side who have been charged with disloyalty to Canada in the form of supporting separatism, and indeed of being separatists. We are accused of being separatists. If anybody has a point of privilege it is the members of this party, not members of the party to my left. It was quite significant that the hon. member who raised the question of privilege has not quoted from a citation in Beauchesne because the point he raised today cannot be considered a question of privilege.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Ron Huntington (Capilano): Madam Speaker, as you probably know, I have been absent from the House since it reconvened for the second part of its first session. I have been away for several reasons. First, there was the death of the president of my company, which meant I had duties to some 100 employees to keep the economic unit intact and to keep it sound. The second reason is that I have been involved for the past three years in litigation which arose out of a Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates dealing with the Post Office. The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell), who is so good at reading out about character, good faith and motives, knew very well that in the last week of October and in the last week of November I had been involved with that court case before the Supreme Court of British Columbia. So, while I have been attempting to defend the rights of individual members of a union, he has been accepting dictates from union bosses to malign my name.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Huntington: My reputation as a Canadian, while I have been involved in these legal processes, has been maligned. I have been insulted as an individual, and my family has been insulted. I have been called a non-Canadian on a national television show by a member of the other place, and I resent that deeply. I resent being called a separatist and a non-Canadian at any time, because I can hold up my record, and my service to this country as being equal to that of any other Canadian.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Huntington: My brother, my sister and myself served this country in the last war and have worn the Canada badge on our shoulders. I was not running around in a leather jacket with a swastika on the back, on a motorcycle.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Huntington: When I came down with my family to the centennial world fair in 1967, you cannot imagine the pride and the emotion which my family and I felt for this country during that trip to Quebec, and when coming to see the Peace Tower, walking through these halls and seeing this chamber, on a tour. The emotion went up the back and into the spine. That is the kind of love I have for this country, and to be denigrated and accused of avoiding my duties in this House when there are other matters which occasionally take priority, is something which I do not have to stand for.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Huntington: Madam Speaker, I should like to say a few words on the alleged charge of being a separatist. Since the middle of 1978 I have been writing to my constituents through the riding mailer which is the privilege of a member of Parliament. Ever since Bill C-60 of the Thirtieth Parliament came down, I have felt a deep concern about the changes that were taking place in the style and form of government in this country. I have written to my constituents at length, and practically all of these riding mailers have been published in the newspapers and even read over the radio out west. I have expressed these concerns and I have tried to educate my constituents. I have met with a great deal of appreciation and support, and I think the polls have shown that. They understand what kind of a Canadian I am.

Madam Speaker, I ask you to bear with me because the time and the hour are important in this day, and the emotions are high. I have been critical of this Parliament. I have spoken in this House and have had agreement nodded from my colleagues across the floor about the fact that I think this Parliament is not working, that the locked in caucus system does not allow the voice of the regions to be heard. The cry of the regions is not allowed to get out and be heard and understood through the cameras and the newspapers of the land.

As you so well know, Madam Speaker, the great excitement of Parliament takes place in caucus and that is where the regional disputes take place, and to me that is a tragedy. Not all members on this side agree with me on that. But, if we and the people out there understood the debate that went on, if the House opened up its processes so that we could let go the emotion and understand each other, so that the people of Ontario and Quebec understand the deep rock-bound frustration in the west, this would be a healthier country, and this form of government would be working to serve the people and the land.

● (1530)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Huntington: My frustration as a Canadian and as a western Canadian—it is part of the whole; it has always been that way—is that I did not see from the last election a mandate to change the constitution unilaterally, to escalate the powers of the central provinces and emasculate the powers of the western ones and put them into a second-class status forever.

An hon. Member: Some of them third class.

Mr. Huntington: I never saw in the last election the power or mandate to expropriate and nationalize the energy industry.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Huntington: We are not addressing energy supply any longer in this country. We are addressing some kind of a unilateral form of government which is being imposed upon us.

An hon. Member: Right on.

Madam Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member will recognize that he is making a very impassioned speech but this is not the time to make such a speech. I would like him to address himself to the question of privilege which has been raised. It is a narrow matter, and although some of the arguments of the hon. member might be remotely relevant, in these matters of procedure one must be kept much closer to procedure. I ask him to relate solely to the question of privilege.

Mr. Huntington: I thank you, Madam Speaker, and accept your admonition but, after all, my character was impugned and I was called a non-Canadian. The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway has insulted me on several occasions in the House, but I will accept Your Honour's admonition.

In closing I should like to read from a riding mailer which was directly on this issue. It was sent out in August, 1980, and reads in part as follows:

As your member of Parliament, it is my duty to do everything possible to keep this once great and proud country intact.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Huntington: It continues:

However, the constitutional crisis has been created and if Mr. Trudeau's concept of federalism is nothing more than a brilliantly contrived vehicle to socialize Canada then I personally would rather see western Canada out than be a part of this Trudeau revolution.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Huntington: That is what it is; it is an overnight socialization of the country.

Some hon. Members: Right on.

Mr. Huntington: We, and many of us in western Canada, are alarmed at this intrusion because there was no mandate for it.

An hon. Member: That is the way the west feels.

Mr. Huntington: I am speaking on behalf of my part of this great country, just as my hon. friend across the aisle speaks about his. I understand his emotion and his feelings. I am appealing so that the emotions of western Canada will be heard and understood. Do not rend this country apart with unilateral imposition on it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, I had not intended to join with the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell) in this important question of privilege which, in one sense, goes to the heart of the debate about the future of our country, but the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre), in the course of his comments just a few minutes ago, made reference to myself as indulging in a kind of McCarthyism as well.

In a dispassionate but honest attempt I will deal with the accusations which have been made. In a similar fashion I want to defend the statements made by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway. We have just heard the hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington) say that he was called a separatist, and say that he was called a non-Canadian, if I heard him correctly. I have checked this with the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway, and I want to say that at no time was it suggested that the hon. member for Capilano was a separatist or a non-Canadian. He does not have to wave his patriotic flag—a number of us in all parties could do that if we were interested—because, if I may say so, I think it is entirely beside the point in this argument.

What is at stake in the accusation of the hon. member for Calgary Centre the other day about my colleague is the imputation of motives, and I refer to Beauchesne's fifth edition, citation 316, subsection (e) which deals with the imputation of motives. To say that the motives of the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway were something other than what he said they were, that is, to pass a judgment and to state the truth as he was quoting it, in my view is a question of privilege. I do not think that is what the member was doing.

As he has done for a period of a week or so in the House, with justification, the member was saying that when the hon. member for Capilano called for a western Parliament—and he did not deny it today—it meant one thing and one thing only. We have legislative assemblies and parliamentary bodies outside the Parliament of Canada and, in my judgment, a member can rise here and express legitimate grievances whether he is from western Canada, Ontario, Quebec or Atlantic Canada.

There are legitimate grievances about the west with which my party has sought to deal positively, by proposing, for example, resource amendments that are central to western Canada.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: That is a joke.

Mr. Broadbent: I have hit a sensitive chord, but we can watch the Tories and see how they vote when those amendments are presented in committee.

When a member rises and seeks to talk about legitimate grievances, whether they are about the west, the central part of the country or the east, and then calls for a Parliament for that region, what does it mean if it is not, as the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway described it, aiding and abetting—

Mr. Waddell: The forces.

Mr. Broadbent: —aiding and abetting the forces of separatism? If anyone has any sense of impartial judgment, that is precisely what is involved. If I were a western Canadian and I had grievances, as indeed the west has, and I heard someone rise in the Parliament of Canada and say, "If we do not get our improvements, we need a Parliament of western Canada", then surely that is the same kind of tactic which supported René Lévesque in the province of Quebec, an independence movement in the province of Quebec.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nielsen: What did you do about it?

Some hon. Members: Where were you?

Mr. Huntington: Oui.

Mr. Broadbent: I listened with interest, I listened in silence. I will reply to the obvious, little emotional concern in the Conservative party. During the debate on the referendum in the province of Quebec, we made it—

Mr. Nielsen: Where were you?

Mr. Broadbent: If the member listens, he will hear the answer right now. The New Democratic Party was on the record in the province of Quebec, and with its leader it went into the province of Quebec, as aptly as the Leader of the Conservative party (Mr. Clark), and spoke clearly for the federal side in that debate. There is no question about it; it is part of the public record.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: But I want to return to the essence of the problem. If, during the great debate about the future of the province of Quebec, members of the Liberal party, the New Democratic Party or the Conservative party said, "Oh, well, Quebeckers have legitimate grievances, I guess we should form a Parliament of Quebec", the Tories would have been the first in the House of Commons to rise and say, "You are aiding and abetting separatism", and they would have been correct!

● (1540)

If they had gotten up and said what is really needed, because of their grievances, is an entirely different representative system—that is precisely what the member for Capilano has done, in my judgment—I would agree with proposals which ought to be implemented in the House of Commons to deal with the legitimate concerns of western Canada. However, rather than speaking about that he raises—and to use the words of the member for Vancouver-Kingsway, he aids and abets—the separatist option. He talks about a western Parliament. Surely that is what is being done.

There are forces now in western Canada calling for independence. In those meetings they will be able to quote Conservative members of the House of Commons who say that what we need, perhaps, is a parliament of western Canada. If aiding and abetting the forces of separatism means anything, it seems to me that is what it means. Therefore, when the member for Vancouver-Kingsway made the accusation I think he made it with intellectual and moral honesty.

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Broadbent: Members to my right may differ, but I think he was dead on. If we had members in the House of Commons at the time of the Quebec referendum, or prior to it, who went around saying that what we need is a separate parliamentary system, entirely different from the one we now have in the province of Quebec, the Tory party would have been calling that, I repeat, "aiding and abetting the forces of separatism."

So, Madam Speaker, I say that our member has a legitimate question of privilege. When the member for Calgary Centre gets up and says that he was indulging in McCarthyism, which means he was distorting beyond the level of evidence, beyond the point which evidence would support—in blunter terms, that he was lying or was imputing bad motives—then I think the member for Vancouver-Kingsway has a legitimate question of privilege. It is inappropriate for one member of this House to describe another member's remarks or speeches in the way the member for Calgary Centre has done.

I conclude by saying that the Conservative party does this country no good by repeating the kind of statements that the member for Capilano has made. I support them 100 per cent in this House when they state western grievances, or grievances from any part of Canada. I for one in this party will take a very definite stand for a united Canada. I will not aid and abet, by the use of exaggerated statements such as the ones which have been made by members of the Tory party.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: I take it the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) wishes to speak on this question of privilege. The Chair is becoming quite informed through the arguments which have been made on this question of privilege. Some of these arguments have been repeated several times. I have allowed the three hon. members concerned to speak on this question of privilege. I have allowed the Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent) to intervene as well, since he is the leader, and also because in his intervention the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre) referred to him. Therefore I have allowed the hon. member for Oshawa to reply. I will also allow the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition to speak, but I will cut the debate off after that. I appeal to the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition to make his remarks brief.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, naturally I will be brief. I would like to begin by congratulating the Liberal party for once again arranging to have the New Democratic Party do its work for them by levying accusations at my colleagues and myself.

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Clark: I would like to begin, Madam Speaker, by correcting what I am prepared to believe was—

Mr. Rae: You are a disgrace.

Mr. Clark: The silver spoon socialist is speaking again, Madam Speaker.

I will be as brief as the NDP interjections will allow me to be. If they will sit calmly in their seats while I put the facts on the record then I will do that with dispatch. Let me begin by correcting what I believe to have been an innocent error made by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell) when he said, as reported at page 4957 of Hansard, in relation to my presence:

> —the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) was here this morning. He was in the lobby, he heard my remarks when they were made—

That is not correct. I was in the House toward the end of his remarks, after he had made remarks relative to me. I did not have his remarks relative to me drawn to my attention until after that occasion, so he was wrong on that matter. I am sure he will accept my word that that was the case.

Second, I could not help but note that the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway, in characterizing his remarks about me today, said that he had criticized me for not speaking forcefully against separatism. Indeed, as has been read into the record, that is not what he said about me on that day, November 21. What he said was: "The leader of the Conservative party is aiding and abetting the new forces of separatism in western Canada." That is an accusation markedly different from an accusation that I am not speaking forcefully against separatism in western Canada or elsewhere.

I think the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway will agree that in his statements today he has misrepresented what he himself said in his statements on November 21. He has distorted those statements. Today he said I have been making statements that I understand separatism, understand the sources of separatism in western Canada, but have not been condemning that phenomenon. Madam Speaker, I have condemned that phenomenon on public platforms in Winnipeg, Vancouver, Regina, Calgary, Edmonton, Barrhead and Drumheller to date. I will continue to speak out for Canada and against separatism, and to try to divert the energies of western Canada into the counsel of a Canadian channel.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: I would like to turn to the rather absurd position put forward by the Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent). He has suggested that the member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington) is a separatist because he proposes a new way—

Mr. Broadbent: I did not say that.

Mr. Clark: —in which members from one part of Canada can have their influence felt within Canada. Let me remind the Leader of the New Democratic Party that for years there have been recommendations that there should be a parliament of Atlantic Canada to allow the people of that region to make their cause known within the context of a united Canada.

Mr. Broadbent: Who said that?

Mr. Clark: No one accused those people, those advocates in royal commissions, or other advocates of maritime union, of being separatists, although by the logic of the New Democratic Party they are separatists, by the definition of their leader.

Ever since the concerns have arisen and developed in this country about the adequacy of our institutions to develop and reflect the regions of the country there have been a number of proposals put forward with respect to changes in Canadian institutions which could better reflect the nature of the country. There have been proposals for a House of the provinces. There has been a proposal by the Leader of the New Democratic Party himself to change our system to a system of proportional representation. He did that only after election results were in, not having had the foresight to do that beforehand.

Mr. Broadbent: Another distortion.

Mr. Clark: There have been a number of proposals to change the institutions of this country within the context of Canada, to ensure that the institutions of this country could better reflect the regional realities of this country and to stop the kind of temptation toward separatism, the kind of frustration which has so alarmed and caught attention and provoked the remarks and suggestion of the hon. member for Capilano. Indeed, if the New Democratic Party and their allies in the Liberal party are interested, the full quote of the hon. member for Capilano was:

> Let's organize ourselves in the west to give us enough political clout and bargaining power at the table.

Well, Madam Speaker, at what table? Obviously, at the Canadian table.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: What the member of Parliament for Capilano was proposing was not some device to take the people of his region out of Canada but, instead, some device to make the people of his region feel effective within Canada. That should be a preoccupation of all of us in this House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: I know now why the New Democratic Party are raising these accusations, not simply in the House of Commons but in speeches the hon. member for Oshawa made in Winnipeg recently, in speeches he made across the country, and in Vancouver. This occurs at a time when the government has introduced an energy policy and a constitutional policy both of which can deeply divide the country, and at a time when there are also very serious economic problems which are causing hardship across the country. But the Leader of the New Democratic Party does not attack the constitutional provisions, the economic situation of the country or the energy policy of the government. Instead, he attacks the Leader of the Progressive Conservative Party of Canada.

● (1550)

Mr. Clark: He applauds that now. His party attacks us, not on the basis of the policies which we have put forward, but by imputing motives to members of my party, by suggesting that they are less than loyal to Canada than members of the New Democratic Party. The NDP members do not attack us on the merits of what we have proposed or on the merits of our appeal to the people of western Canada to find their future within this larger country, but as separatists.

That party has attacked us as separatists, not because there is something in the record of the performance of the Progressive Conservative Party, but to draw attention away from the behaviour of the New Democratic Party and the way in which the members of that party have betrayed the electors who sent them here to stand against the Liberal party. Many of their constituents have become alarmed to find the members of the New Democratic Party hopping into league, hopping into liaison or hopping into bed with the Liberals they were elected to oppose.

The Leader of the New Democratic Party talked about his campaign in the province of Quebec against the forces of separatism. I give him the fact that he was there, but his was the only national party which refused to join the No campaign against separatism. His was the only party in Canada which turned its back on Claude Ryan because—

Mr. Broadbent: Who was in bed with the Liberals then, Joe?

Mr. Nielsen: We were in bed with Canada.

Mr. Clark: They were afraid to take the unequivocal kind of stand for Canada and for federalism which was taken at that time by the Liberal party and the Progressive Conservative Party. Now that party is doing everything it can, in every public forum it can find, to try to turn attention away from the fact that it joined in support of the Liberal constitution, a position which is driving western Canadians to consider leaving this country, and which is described as civilized by the Leader of the New Democratic Party.

I do not consider a measure which drives people of my country to consider leaving my country a civilized measure, and I do not wonder at all at the fact that members of the New Democratic Party are so embarrassed about their own behaviour that they are trying to create false issues by calling into question the dedication to Canada of other members of this House of Commons.

Let me say one thing, Madam Speaker, about the sources and the cause of separatism, and the anger and frustration of those in western Canada. I would hope that members of Parliament, instead of accusing others of separatism because they report reality which is disturbing in one region of our country, before the word separatism leaps to their lips would do themselves and the country the favour of getting out of a part of the country where perhaps separatism is not a dynamic and growing force and of visiting western Canada to determine for themselves the level of anger and frustration which is growing there and which is being provoked there by the positions taken by the government on the constitution, energy, and other areas, and which are supported in such a Pavlovian way by the New Democratic Party.

I have fought separatism in Quebec and in western Canada, and I am fighting it now because it is a very dangerous and real problem. We do not solve the sources of separatism by making false accusations in this House of Commons about members of this House. We solve the danger and the prospect of separatism by recognizing how real that danger is in western Canada today and by paying heed, not casting scorn, on those members of Parliament who have the courage, honesty and dedication to their country to stand up in whatever forum to describe the real nature of the problem which is growing there.

If separatism is allowed to go unaddressed, it will grow into dimensions which will be very dangerous to this country. This is not a time to slander people who fight separatism in western Canada by offering alternatives to those Canadians in that region who are frustrated. It is not a time to slander members of this House or citizens in western Canada who are offering alternatives to the frustrated citizenry of that region who are now allowing their emotions to find outlet in movements which would take them outside this country. The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway has reason to worry about the reputation of his party, but he has no reason at all to cast that kind of slander upon myself or upon my colleagues in this House of Commons.

Madam Speaker: I have heard all the arguments and the definitions of McCarthyism and of the aspersions that might have derived from the whole discussion on separatism in western Canada. I will cut off the debate now, look into the interventions, and rule on the question of privilege later.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. NIELSEN—PROCEDURE GOVERNING S.O. 43 MOTIONS

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Madam Speaker, my point of order relates to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Bockstael), who today during the period assigned for motions under Standing Order 43 moved such a motion. I believe you will recall, Madam Speaker, that your predecessor, almost immediately after assuming office, took the position, upon which he expounded at some length in the House, that he would not entertain the previous questionable practice which had given rise to considerable objection prior to his assuming the Chair, of parliamentary secretaries participating in the question period.

Mr. Speaker Jerome gave at least three reasons for taking this action. One reason was that the parliamentary secretaries were in receipt of emoluments over and above those ordinarily received by members of Parliament. Another reason was that a parliamentary secretary takes an oath somewhat similar to the oath taken by cabinet members. Perhaps the most important reason was that parliamentary secretaries were privy to matters that were the responsibility of the individual departments and, beyond that, privy to matters which were the subject of general cabinet discussions. Mr. Speaker Jerome took the position that for these and other reasons he would not entertain any further participation by parliamentary secretaries in the question period. As far as I am aware, this has not happened thus far in this session.

Mr. Evans: It was not during question period.

Mr. Nielsen: If the hon. member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Evans) will be patient for a moment, he will hear my argument with respect to the participation of parliamentary secretaries in the period reserved for motions under Standing Order 43. There is no distinction, in my submission. I do not recollect, nor have I had the time since the matter arose today to look at the precedents, whether Mr. Speaker Jerome dealt with the period reserved for motions under Standing Order 43. He may not have done so, but I am making the submission now that there is no difference between parliamentary secretaries participating in the period reserved for motions under Standing Order 43 and participating in question period.

I make my submission on the same basis and the same arguments which have been outlined. For example, it is quite conceivable that a parliamentary secretary may, by virtue of his position, have information which would be unavailable to any other member of Parliament, and as a result be placed in the favoured position with respect to moving a motion under Standing Order 43, in which he would not otherwise find himself. For that reason I submit that you should take the matter under advisement and obtain the counsel of your advisers, Madam Speaker. Hopefully, you can come back to advise us that your position will be along the same lines as that of your predecessor, in other words, that it would not be mete for parliamentary secretaries to engage in the period reserved for motions under Standing Order 43 which, by and large is a period reserved for members of the opposition, any more than it would be proper for them to engage in the question period itself.

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, I am glad the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) has raised this question, and I join with him in asking you to review this practice.

I was here in the Thirtieth Parliament when Speaker Jerome made his ruling, both on the participation of parliamentary secretaries in question period and in the time reserved for motions under Standing Order 43. At the time I think it caused a lot of concern and reservation on the part of parliamentary secretaries, not so much on the ruling directed toward participation in question period because I believe Speaker Jerome was entirely correct that a parliamentary secretary cannot be expected both to answer questions and pose questions at the same time, but because motions under the provisions of Standing Order 43 come under a different section of the routine proceedings of the House. As I understand it, this section was designed to allow every hon. member to rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, especially as it affected a member's constituency.

As hon. members know, the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Bockstael) is one of two Liberal members elected from western Canada. He has deep feelings on the whole question of the debate now under way affecting western Canada. I believe he has every right to express his emotions and feelings, as do members opposite who engaged in the question of privilege raised earlier. Of course, the hon. member for St. Boniface is a parliamentary secretary and he does not have the means in the House to bring those emotions to bear on a regular basis.

To my recollection, during the Thirtieth Parliament Speaker Jerome permitted parliamentary secretaries two or three times to move motions under the provisions of Standing Order 43. At one point he actually broke his own rule, and I believe allowed a parliamentary secretary, who is now the hon. member for Etobicoke-Lakeshore (Mr. Robinson), to ask a question during question period, although it was not directed toward the ministry he was then serving.

Therefore, I would ask you, Madam Speaker, to look into this matter so that we can have a clear ruling. I believe that today was the third occasion on which you have allowed a parliamentary secretary to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43 since this Thirty-second Parliament opened. You allowed the hon. member for Thunder Bay-Nipigon (Mr. Masters) to move a motion under Standing Order 43 the other week.

On behalf of members on this side of the House, I urge that you view the matter concerning the rule under which parliamentary secretaries can participate in the period reserved for motions under Standing Order 43 as a flexible one.

Respecting the question period, I believe the precedents are clear.

Madam Speaker: My decision to allow the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Bockstael) to propose a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43 was based on the Standing Orders and on several precedents. Standing Order 15(2) permits members, other than ministers of the Crown, to move motions. That is the limitation placed on Standing Order 43. Even so, there are examples of ministers having moved such motions and of ministers having seconded such motions.

I am not sure whether it was three other occasions when I allowed—although I will take the hon. member's word for it—parliamentary secretaries to move motions under Standing Order 43. However, there are several precedents where parliamentary secretaries have moved motions under Standing Order 43. I have a record of one moved by the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Corbett) seconded by the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) on November 6, 1979. I have one moved by the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) at the time he was prime minister. I have one moved by the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Duclos), seconded by the hon. member for Edmonton North (Mr. Paproski) on March 21, 1979. The precedent is there. The reasons for that precedent are, I think, quite different from those which would preclude parliamentary secretaries from asking questions, as was ruled by my predecessor. However, my predecessor has not ruled on the matter of motions under Standing Order 43. He has allowed them. It is also my feeling that they should be allowed.

Mr. Nielsen: Madam Speaker, I seem to be surrounded by questionable precedents. Of course I respect the ruling of the Chair, but there is one area which I intend to raise, if it occurs to me proper to do so, where the provisions of Standing Order 43 might be used on the basis of information in the hands of a parliamentary secretary by virtue of his position. I think that would be totally improper.

Madam Speaker: If I may reply to the hon. member, and I do it now because I want to be enlightened on this question, it seems to me that the Speaker could disallow a motion in one case or the other. The Speaker could say that it is not in order or that it is not proper to be put to the House during the period reserved for motions under Standing Order 43. In a sense, I suppose I am a depository of that kind of judgment. Sometimes I may not be able to make judgments because these things happen so quickly, but it does seem to me that this judgment is in the hands of the Chair. However, I am willing to discuss the topic with the hon. member at some future time. The hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse).

I am sorry, I have notice of a question of privilege from another hon. member and I do have to take them in the order in which they come. The hon. member for Kindersley-Lloydminster (Mr. McKnight) has given me notice of a question of privilege. I will hear him first, and then the hon. member for South Shore.

Mr. McKnight: Madam Speaker, I submitted my question of privilege in the hope that the hon. member whom it concerns would be in the House at this time. The hon. member is not in the House and I would like my question of privilege deferred until such time as both he and I are in the chamber together.

PRIVILEGE

MR. CROUSE—STATEMENT MADE BY MR. LeBLANC DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Madam Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. It concerns the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. LeBlanc) and, in particular, the response he gave today to questions I raised in the House. I regret that he is not present at the moment, but I feel it is important that I put my remarks on the record. He implied that I am speaking for my own interests in the fishing industry and not for the fishing industry as a whole. This allegation has been made on previous occasions by the same minister.

I wish to state for the record that I have sold all of my interests in the deep sea fishing fleet which, through my own initiative, I brought into being. I established the fleet in 1948 and sold all of my interest in 1968. At that same time I sold all of my financial interests in the Canadian fish processing industry. I no longer have any capital invested in this particular industry.

Therefore, when I rise in my place and raise questions relating to the fishing industry, I do so because more than one-third of the people in my constituency, whom I have represented for more than 24 years, are involved in the fishing industry, either inshore, mid-water, offshore or through ancillary industries. The minister's reply indicates not only an insensitivity to the interests of Nova Scotia and Newfoundland fishermen, but an insensitivity as well to the interests of the shore workers in the plants of both provinces.

On November 22, Mr. Lawrence Wilneff, president of the Canadian Seafood and Allied Workers said, as reported in the Halifax Chronicle-Herald:

> —the management plan will likely lead to plant closure during the last three months of next year unless there are massive changes made in the scheme.
> He said plant closures would force workers to go on UIC benefits for part of the year, resulting in some 40 per cent reduction in their pay.

Obviously my questions were related to the hard-working people I have been elected to serve, not only the fishermen of that area but the plant workers in my constituency and throughout all of Nova Scotia and Newfoundland. I wonder why the Newfoundland members have not been actively pursuing this matter as well, because the people they have been elected to serve are also affected.

In closing, I demand a retraction of the minister's allegations. I submit to this House that he has no right to impute motives to me when I am carrying out my duties in this House.

Madam Speaker: The minister is not present in the chamber. I presume he will want to reply to the hon. member. Therefore I will leave the matter open until the minister is again in the House, to give him the opportunity, if he wishes, to reply. The matter will be left open for the time being.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. MACKAY—BARRICADES ERECTED OUTSIDE PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order, or a point of information. As Your Honour is well aware, the matter of barricades was dealt with today in motions under Standing Order 43, and again in the question period. I think this is a matter of some disquiet to members.

Having looked very briefly through the fifth edition of Beauchesne, I wonder whether the Chair would take under advisement as a point of information the circumstances under which barriers or barricades are placed around the House of Commons, and clarify for the benefit of myself and others whether our security people should have the exclusive jurisdiction. I understand that, pursuant to rule 105, so far as the Centre Block is concerned there is no question whatsoever that the protective staff of both the Senate and the House of Commons, who are parliamentary employees, have sole and exclusive jurisdiction. Once outside this building, however, security and control of access are more directly under the control of the executive branch of the government.

I am curious, and other members are as well, about the extent of the jurisdiction of the executive branch of the government on a matter as sensitive as this, as has been demonstrated today. I wonder whether the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) has the proper jurisdiction to arrange on short notice to have these barricades taken down, or put up in the first instance, and to what extent Your Honour has the right to be consulted or not to be consulted in matters of this kind.

Madam Speaker: I think I can reply to the hon. member. There may be other questions to which I may not be able to give answers. Protection and security inside the House of Commons are, of course, the responsibility of the Speaker of the House. Outside the premises the responsibility is that of the Solicitor General. I have to assume it was under his responsibility that the barricades were erected outside the Parliament Buildings and under his responsibility that they have been removed, if they have been removed. I have not been out there to see.

There is a clear division of responsibility. I assume it must flow from the kind of competence that is required to ensure protection and security inside the building as to what might be required outside the building. I do not know at what point this clear division of responsibility has been established. I can look into that. However, it is quite clear that the responsibility is so divided.

JUDGES ACT

MEASURE TO INCREASE SALARIES OF JUDGES

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice) moved that Bill C-34, to amend the Judges Act and certain other acts in consequence thereof, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

[English]

He said: Madam Speaker, we have had in this country in the last few years a judiciary whose morale has progressively deteriorated with the passage of time, the increase in inflation, and an apparent lack of concern by governments with their economic condition. In August, 1978, a committee of the Canadian Bar Association recommended substantial modification of the compensation package of the federally appointed judges. In November, 1978, the Advisory Committee on Judicial Compensation and Related Matters—the Dorfman committee—which was appointed by the then minister of justice to advise him on these issues, presented its recommendations. In the summer of 1979, the executive committee of the Conference of Chief Justices of Canada, followed in April of this year by the Canadian Judges Conference, made a number of suggestions on this subject.

All of these views took as their point of departure the fact that since 1975 federally appointed Superior Court judges had received salary increases which totalled 7.5 per cent.

In the same period the industrial composite, which reflects the average wages and salaries in occupational groups across the country, registered an increase of some 60 per cent. A significant erosion of the economic position of these judges is demonstrated by this simple recital of figures; their salary increases have clearly fallen far behind the rate of inflation and the consequences to the judges have been serious.

We can all think of reasons for the delay in coming to grips with the problem of judges' compensation. We know about the competition for parliamentary time, and we know about differences in priority that may be attached to the various legislative proposals presented to the Parliament of Canada for its consideration.

But there comes a time when inaction on the salaries of judges in an inflationary period begins to have profound effects, not only on the morale of those sitting on the bench but also on the attractiveness of judicial appointment to the more highly qualified lawyers whom we would like to see appointed to the bench. At some stage, subtly and slowly, no doubt, a failure to maintain judicial compensation in line to some degree with inflationary tendencies must come to affect the quality of our judiciary. I have no doubt about the correctness of that proposition, and I venture to suggest that there is a real concern about judicial compensation that underlies section 100 of the British North America Act.

That section, which deals with the provision of salaries, allowances and pensions of the federally appointed judiciary, is unique. It is the sole section of the BNA Act which casts an affirmative obligation on Parliament to enact legislation. In recent economic circumstances, this obligation serves to secure not only the independence of the judiciary, but also requires Parliament to take action to mitigate the debilitating effects on the judiciary that flow from undue delay or default in securing legislation on judicial compensation. Bill C-34 seeks to fulfil that constitutional responsibility and to improve the structure of compensation for the federally appointed judiciary. It does so in a way that is responsive to the present concerns for judicial morale and recruitment. It also makes provision for future remuneration which should avoid further difficulties flowing from the dependence of the judges on salary adjustments by statute, in a manner consistent with the principles of ministerial responsibility for financial management under our system of government.

● (1620)

And so, Mr. Speaker, this bill is meant to grant, for each of the fiscal years 1979-80 and 1980-81, a $6,500 increase to the puisne judges of the superior courts and a $7,500 increase to the county and district judges, the difference in the increase reflecting, as recommended in the Dorfman report, the relative importance of the specific responsibilities of each of those two levels of jurisdiction. Those increases respond to the effects of inflation since 1975 and raise the salaries to a level which henceforth will serve as an adequate base for automatic adjustments in the future.

Under the bill, the salaries of the judges appointed by the federal government will be adjusted automatically from April 1, 1981, on the basis of the annual increase in the composite index of economic activities, up to a maximum of 7 per cent. This indexation is the same as the one that applies to MPs. Naturally, should the indexation factor be considered inadequate, the whole mechanism of automatic adjustment will become unsatisfactory, and once again a bill will have to be introduced later on to remedy the situation. In addition to salary indexation starting at an adequate level, the bill provides for the appointment of a commission made up of no more than five members which will be asked to examine every three years the adequacy of judicial compensation.

Since 1975, the pension plan has been another source of malaise in the federal judiciary since only the judges appointed after February 6, 1975, must contribute to their basic annuities under the provisions of the Judges Act. All judges contribute to the supplementary retirement benefits, or indexing. The date of appointment can therefore mean a substantial difference in the salary of judges sitting at the same level in the same court and hearing the same cases. Experience has shown that the system is not necessarily good. Financially, the retirement pension account of judges is not self-supportive because of the relatively short career of the contributors, and it is certainly not beneficial in terms of morale once it has been productive of real grievance on the part of a significant group of judges.

To rectify the situation, Bill C-34 provides that all judges will contribute to the pension plan at the normal rate prescribed by the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act. This provision will be retroactive to the date of introduction, therefore re-establishing the salary equality of judges. The bill will also readjust the pensions granted several years ago to the surviving spouses of judges. These very modest pensions will be readjusted on the basis of the average of all pensions paid to the surviving spouses of judges.

The bill also aims at readjusting for the first time the allowances granted to judges appointed by the federal government and creating a new allowance to reimburse major representational expenses, such as the price of purchase of judicial robes and the like that our necessarily incidental to the proper performance of the office of a judge.

Finally, it provides for the creation of several new judiciary positions in certain provinces and both territories to respond to the need.

I am certain that the new salary structure provided in this bill will allay the real concerns of judges that the federal government is not interested in their well-being. Some members may individually or collectively question this feeling or not share the opinion of the government concerning the economic situation of judges. Nevertheless this piece of legislation must ensure a just compensation for judges in order to reinforce the expertise and independence of this essential component of our system of government. By passing this bill we will be doing this unique duty of ours as parliamentarians. As I said, it is in this area only that the Canadian Constitution places on members of Parliament any direct obligation as far as salary and compensation are concerned.

[English]

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity at long last to participate in this debate with respect to Bill C-34 which relates to the renumeration and the benefits to be paid to judges. As the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) has pointed out, the matter has been under discussion for some considerable period of time. He rightly points out that the question of the agenda of the House of Commons is one which is in the exclusive control of the government. In other words, they are the ones who decide when matters of importance must be brought forward and the order of priority.

I will not make any further comment with respect to the timing of the delay that has taken place with this legislation, except to point out that it is a government's prerogative to call the business on orders of the day, as we have seen on so many occasions in the past when that right has been challenged.

I want to join with the minister, as he so rightly points out, in underlining the importance of an independent judiciary in our country. An independent judiciary involves a number of considerations, one of which happens to be independence from concerns with respect to the level of renumeration. I should like to quote a statement by Sir William Holdsworth, who is known to jurists and lawyers alike, with respect to the role of judiciary and parliamentary system that we adhere to in Canada. Sir William Holdsworth said:

> The judges hold an office to which is annexed the function of guarding the supremacy of the law. It is because they are holders of an office to which the guardianship of this fundamental constitutional principle is entrusted, that the judiciary forms one of the three great divisions into which the power of the state is divided. The judiciary has separate and autonomous powers just as truly as the King or Parliament.

The principle of the independence of the judiciary has been established in common law since the Act of Settlement of 1700 whereby, as opposed to the situation prior to that time, judges held tenure at the King's pleasure, to the point where they could only be removed for serious misbehaviour or conviction of a serious offence and only upon an address of the Parliament with respect to the removal of those judges.

There is no question that we are very much involved in an era of increased litigation, increased access to the courts with respect to matters of serious concern in our country. I need only point to the fact that we in Canada are involved in a very serious constitutional debate. One of the proposals involves the entrenchment of a charter of rights by which there will be a departure from what the situation has been up to now with respect to a matter of basic and fundamental human rights. It is going to mean that the courts will be taking on an even more important role in terms of the interpretation of the fundamental rights of Canadians.

Not only the highest court of the land, the Supreme Court of Canada, but indeed every level of court federally appointed will be involved if the government's intention to proceed with this entrenched bill of rights takes place and will be involved with serious considerations of a constitutional nature. So it becomes absolutely essential that we attract to the bench members of the Bar of the highest competence and the highest capacity. As a result I think there will be sympathy with the desire on the part of the government, as stated by the Minister of Justice, to make sure that there is adequate and reasonable compensation so that there will not be a significant deterrent to people of competence coming forward and offering themselves—after the appropriate solicitation, of course, by the Minister of Justice or his amanuensis—and serving on the bench.

It seems to me that we will be entering into a very different kind of judicial activity with respect to an entrenched charter of rights. I do not want to be drawn into that debate. I was previously denied the opportunity to participate in the debate on the constitution on the floor of the House, but let me just smuggle in an observation. There will be a greater responsibility placed upon the judiciary with respect to these questions, and the final charter of rights we bring about and entrench in our constitution will call for a significantly more important role for the judiciary generally.

As an aside, I read with interest recently a book published in the United States, written by Messrs. Woodward and Armstrong, entitled "The Brethren", which is an interesting treatise on the activities of the Supreme Court of the United States. We in politics are sometimes known by the press to have a tendency to exaggerate or occasionally to make a mistake of fact, but if one-fifteenth of what is written in that book is accurate, we can see that the whole question of the interpretation of constitutional matters by the judiciary is not clearcut or a matter of precise and distinct judicial interpretation. There are other considerations which enter into these deliberations.

If I may be permitted to say so, there is a certain amount of politicking in the courts. There is a very important consideration as to the backgrounds of judges with respect to appointments. It becomes important, when we deal with constitutional matters, to know what is the philosophic outlook of judges. That in itself is a very important aspect with regard to the appointment of judges.

However, that is not the purpose of my intervention today. My purpose is not to discuss an entrenched bill of rights or the way we appoint judges, but I think it is relevant for us to consider that we are not going into a period when the judiciary will be any less important in terms of our country and the interpretation and supremacy of law. Indeed, from what we can see of the government's package, we might well expect a greater role to be played by the judiciary.

Amongst other things, this bill deals with an increase in the number of judges who are to be appointed to the courts of Canada and who are to be available. If I may be permitted to make a statement to the minister by way of representation, it has been my observation in the course of my conduct in private life as a lawyer and teaching at a law school that we are now faced with a higher and higher proportion of women at the Bar who are available for judicial appointments. There have been statements from the government side on a number of occasions. The actions of the government in a sense do not live up to the statement of intention made by the minister and other spokesmen on behalf of the government.

Women comprise 51 per cent of the population. We are also approaching that ratio with respect to women attending law schools and becoming members of the bar. These are women of some considerable competence. I think it is appropriate for me to say that it is time for the government to settle, in very precise manner and without the application of any quota system—which I think would be inappropriate—and to demonstrate and indicate very clearly its intention to proceed with the appointment of more women to the bench. It is my experience that the bench is woefully lacking in this regard.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. member would entertain a very brief question on the subject he has just raised.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: At the end of my remarks, if that is all right. I have to admit a bit of conflict. I have to leave the chamber, and I want to make sure I get my remarks on the record. After I have, if time permits, I will be glad to receive a question from the hon. member.

I want to get down to the details of the bill and to canvass some of its aspects which I think require consideration by this House, and certainly by the committee.

There are some 650-plus judges in the federal judiciary. The cost of their salaries at the present time totals some $35 million. Because of the increases proposed in this bill we can anticipate an increase in the expenditure for judges' salaries of some $4.5 million, which would bring the total expenditure up to some $39.5 million on an annual basis.

The cost of implementing the proposals brought forward by the Minister of Justice will mean that, in addition to that expenditure of an additional $4.5 million, there will be a one-shot repayment with respect to annuities, to which I want to come back because I think that is one area of serious concern which must be expressed in this House and in committee as well. There will be a one-shot repayment under the provisions of this bill of some $3.5 million. The increase will involve $800,000 annually for this increase in judges' allowances.

The bill provides for the increases outlined by the Minister of Justice, and I think it is important for us to note that the amount being proposed by the government exceeds the amount proposed by three committees or commissions which were established to review judges' salaries. I refer to the Casgrain committee which reported to the Canadian Bar Association, the Dorfman report which was referred to by the minister and, most recently, the statements made by the judges themselves in their committee in which recommendations were made by them with respect to the amount of increase which would be appropriate.

I think it is important for us to have full, adequate, and reasonable compensation for our judges. I do not take exception to that, but I must draw to the attention of the House, and express my concern about, the provision relating to pensions.

I might give some background of what has transpired over the course of the last few years. What is being proposed here is the abolition of any contributory element with respect to judges' pensions and benefits. We are being asked by this bill to change a situation which was brought about in 1975. At that time federally-appointed judges received, at the will of the governor in council, upon retirement pensions to which they did not contribute. Under the minister of justice at that time the government brought in amendments to the Judges Act, to supplementary benefits provisions, to ancillary provisions and to ancillary legislation whereby judges appointed after 1975 would contribute toward pensions or annuities which they would receive on retirement.

As a result, we have two classes of judges. One class is composed of those appointed before 1975, and the other is composed of those appointed since that time. Quite frankly, the expedient the government is now undertaking is that rather than having everyone on one course of action which involves a contributory pension, the government is suggesting that we revert back to the situation which obtained in 1975 by which there will be no contribution to pensions by judges except for a 1 per cent levy which will go toward the payment of the indexation provision.

I think it is important, therefore, that we consider this part of the bill, because what the bill purports to do for the judges and for those other officers who are affected by the Judges Act, is to put them into a unique position. I think it would be important for us to compare this with what is happening in other executive positions, whether it be in the public service, the armed forces, the RCMP or the House of Commons and the Senate. I just want to emphasize that in the circumstances in which we are now required to address this bill, judges will be in a somewhat different position from practically everyone else who is paid out of public funds.

In terms of public servants, pension benefits are accrued at the rate of 2 per cent per year of service, multiplied by the average salary in the best six consecutive years. The maximum rate of a pension is 70 per cent, which would be earned after 35 years of service. The result is that a public servant who has reached the age of 55, may retire with a 60 per cent pension if he or she has served 30 years. A public servant who has reached the age of 60, may receive a partial pension if he or she has served at least five years, with the pension rate equal to 2 per cent for each full year. That is to say, ten years equals 20 per cent of the average salary in the best six consecutive years.

Turning to the armed forces, the period of service required to retire with an immediate annuity or pension varies with rank, with less service required for enlisted men. A general, for example, may retire with a 60 per cent pension at age 55 if he has 30 years of service. An enlisted man may receive a 40 per cent pension at age 40 if he has served 20 years. Pension benefits are accrued at the rate of 2 per cent per year and are based on the average of the best six consecutive years.

In the RCMP, lower ranks may receive an unreduced pension after 25 years of service. Officers with 35 years' service may receive a pension at the age 55. Pension credits earned at the rate of 2 per cent for each year of service are based on the average of the best six consecutive years of service.

With regard to members of Parliament and senators, members earn pension benefits related to their best six consecutive years' average indemnity at the rate of 3.5 per cent in each of their first ten years. I do not know what the best six years are, whether it is in terms of their production or in terms of salary, but I assume the latter is the case. Members of Parliaments' benefits are related to 3 per cent in each of the next ten years and 2 per cent in each of the next five years. An MP serving the minimum six years would thus be entitled to a future pension of 21 per cent of his or her average indemnity. An MP serving two terms, that is eight years, would be entitled to a pension equal to 28 per cent of the average of his or her best six years.

I simply read these statistics to point out that what we are doing is putting the judges—I am not sure the judges themselves are necessarily anxious to be put in a unique and different position—in a situation which is quite different from that of anyone else in the country who is paid from public funds. I understand the argument that judges are, generally speaking, appointed at the height of their income earning ability, and that they tend to be usually appointed later on in their careers and therefore it is difficult for them to get into a properly funded pension plan which can be demonstrated to be actuarially sound, although I should say that judges now seem to be appointed at a younger and younger age. I am not saying that the government has been in power for too long, but perhaps nowadays the older Liberals are getting their reward and the younger ones are now being called upon to be judges.

Having taught at law school for a few years, I often run into former students whom I ask whether they are in their third year or are articling, and more likely than not the man or woman will say to me, "No, I am a Queen's Bench judge." I want to point out that they are getting somewhat younger, or perhaps I am getting older. It must be a sign of aging in me as well. I hear the chief government whip asking me if I am looking for a job. I say to him, yes, I am looking for his job.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I want to get back to the government side and fill that most important position, of course, only after the hon. member for Burlington (Mr. Kempling).

Mr. Kempling: You can have it!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: The fact is that I understand those arguments, but it seems to me that in terms of considering this bill and its operation, we should give serious consideration to the implications of the proposals it brings forward. A serious concern has to be expressed for the non-contributory pension scheme. Whether or not the scheme will be actuarially sound is another matter we can address. It seems that in the course of deliberations in committee we should take a look at this, and already we have received an indication from the minister, on occasions when he has appeared before the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, that he is prepared to discuss this aspect of the matter. I say to him that this is a matter which will be brought up by us at committee stage, and one to which we want to pay serious attention. We want to consider the implications of the proposals brought forward by the government.

Also dealing with the pension matter, I hope that the minister will be able to answer questions at some point in this debate or in committee on a rather curious operation of the pension provisions in this bill. I refer to the fact, under the provisions of this bill, if a judge dies, the widow's annuity is suspended upon remarriage. By definition that includes a widower. I simply raise this as a matter of interest. I have never understood why this provision exists in our pension legislation. It seems to me that if people are entitled to benefits under the provisions of any pension legislation, then their pension benefits should not be suspended on remarriage. There may be quite legitimate reasons for a widow or a widower remarrying, and this whole provision of availability of a pension seems to be a curious anomaly in the law.

What I want to say about this bill in general terms is that we have a certain difficulty with respect to matters of legislation. I know that under section 100 of the BNA Act, Parliament, to distinguish it from the cabinet and the executive, has the responsibility of dealing with the salaries, benefits, annuities or pensions of the judiciary. I understand that responsibility, and I am not suggesting for a moment that we should do anything which would tend to diminish that very important role which Parliament must play. However, it seems to me—and I want to extend a compliment to the minister in this respect—that perhaps we should look at a better system with respect to executive compensation for public service. The hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) has commented on this in the course of the years. We should not have to operate on an ad hoc basis in dealing with salary increases, as we do it seems. I was very pleased to see that there is at least a start in the bill before us in the provisions which allow for a compensation review committee to be established after 1983, and every three years thereafter, to make recommendations to Parliament on compensation to be paid to our judges. I think that is a good start on action which has been long overdue.

It seems that we have been dealing in a rather casual way with compensation for a segment of our society which has rendered a public service of some importance. I think my colleague, the hon. member for Edmonton West, will address himself, as he has in the past, to this important topic. This is possibly an opportunity for us to canvass the potential of having some mechanism by which this committee would make its recommendations directly to Parliament. There is a certain amount of support for the idea of allowing Parliament to control this entire process. The recommendations would be brought forward and enacted, unless we had something in the nature of a negative resolution brought forward in a petition by a certain nominal number of members of the House of Commons.

We want to ensure that when people are appointed to the bench they will understand and expect, without concerning themselves with the vagaries of elections and parliamentary agenda, that a reasonable and rational salary range will be considered on their behalf before Parliament. In that event they would have financial security in the performance of their very important functions. I hope we will have the opportunity to deal with that particular aspect with the minister. I hope he will be prepared to discuss some of the advice he will receive from his departmental officials, and I am sure we will have recommendations and suggestions of our own.

In conjunction with that, I want to raise another matter. Under the provisions of the Judges Act—and it is affected by this legislation—certain public servants are tied cheek by jowl to the increases proposed and the salary ranges suggested for judges. Of course I am referring to the Auditor General, the Commissioner of Official Languages, the Chief Electoral Officer, and members of the tax review board by way of example. Their salaries are related to the amount awarded or passed by Parliament with respect to judges. If we will be pursuing the entire question of executive compensation, I wonder aloud whether or not that whole range of public servants should necessarily be tied to the compensations paid to judges.

When we consider the salary of a particular vocation, profession or pursuit, it is rather too simplistic to suggest that it should apply to a whole range of other positions. If there is to be a review by way of a commission, it should concentrate on what in fact judges require, or what would be fair and appropriate for the judiciary. If we look at the salary of the Chief Electoral Officer, he may require more money than the judiciary, because of the stress of that position. It may be appropriate to decide whether he requires more or less, depending on the prevailing salary rate being paid to judges. But simply willy-nilly tying the salaries of these public servants who perform important functions to the salaries of the judiciary is rather an inappropriate way for us to do justice with respect to their salaries, or indeed with respect to the questions of the role and the compensation of the judiciary in the country.

I simply wanted to point out these particular observations and to express my sincere concern respecting the pension provisions of this bill. I recall an article which was written some time ago by an English humorist, Geoffrey Lincoln. He pointed out that Her Majesty's judges, as everyone knows, are a race completely apart. He referred to the fact that their salaries were in the order of $70,000 and that their pensions after retirement amounted to some two-thirds of that. To the uninformed layman, they might seem to occupy somewhat enviable positions, but as he humorously pointed out the judges are the first to point out that they are required to be at work at ten o'clock and to work through until four o'clock in the afternoon; that they have occupational hazards such as occasionally riding on public transportation, and cannot be found in enclosed places after dark. This was really said in jest, because it is an oversimplification of the great dedication of and duty performed by the judiciary, of which we can be justly proud.

Notwithstanding the fact that we have gone through periods of great crisis and serious political debate about divisions in our country, by and large the judiciary has been exemplary in its contribution to society, in its protection of the supremacy of law, and in its independent interpretation of law.

I say that judges must be independent. It is a principle in common law with which I find no dispute. Often it interests me, and sometimes quite frankly mystifies me, that in the course of discussions respecting constitutional matters some people feel very strongly that somehow it would be the prerogative of one level of government or another to have judicial appointments, that somehow the mere fact a federal court judge is appointed by a provincial government ensures that there will be a string attached to the judge in the course of his deliberations, and that somehow for time immemorial, or for the judge's time on the bench, his decisions will be influenced by who appointed him. I think history has demonstrated that nothing could be further from the truth. Once persons are appointed to the bench, because of their independence and their respect for common law traditions they have in fact operated in a completely independent fashion, one which is not affected by the government that appointed them. I compliment the judiciary from that point of view.

Having made these few remarks, I want to thank my colleagues and the minister for their attention. I hope we will have an opportunity to consider some of the points I have raised which are of serious concern to my party and me. I look forward to pursuing this matter on the floor of the House and to hearing the government response both here and in committee.

Business of the House

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. member would permit a brief question. Understandably, the hon. member referred to the importance of increasing the number of women who are appointed to the federal judiciary. In light of this, I wonder if the hon. member could explain why, since confederation, no Conservative government in this country ever appointed a single woman to the federal judiciary, including the government of which he was a member?

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, I might say that I am glad to respond to that question. Of course the hon. member forgets that for the few fleeting hours we were in government it was difficult to accomplish all goals. But I can understand the hon. member's sense of sanctimony; he has now been a member of the NDP caucus for a while and the holier-than-thou attitude has been bred into him. As far as my party is concerned, we stand second to none with respect to our determination to ensure that the women of Canada, not only in appointments to the judiciary but in every respect, receive proper attention. I must say I appreciate the subtlety of the particular question, because it comes from a member of a party which has been known to spend more time, in the course of deliberations, on rhetoric rather than action.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Collenette: Mr. Speaker, before you move to the private members' hour, there have been discussions among the parties concerning the progress of two private members' private bills sponsored by my colleague, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of State for Trade. I believe there is a disposition with respect to Senate Bills Nos. 13 and 14, which were reported last week, to proceed with the report stage and third reading with no debate, with the caveat that my colleague, the parliamentary secretary, will be tabling some documents which have been requested by the hon. member for York-Peel (Mr. Stevens) in the context of the committee deliberations.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): That was our understanding as well. I have spoken personally to the hon. member and also to the hon. member for York-Peel. I understand that when these bills are introduced, with respect to each of these private members' bills the member will be making a statement to the House with respect to the tabling of certain documents. He may need consent to table those documents. He could have that consent today.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, there have been such discussions. We have agreed that a few minutes be taken for this purpose. I remind the parliamentary secretary that the assurance was that the whole operation would not take more than two or three minutes. My friend, the hon. member for Prince Albert, whose private member's motion is to follow, is willing to surrender those two or three minutes and no more, I trust.

Private Bills

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. The House has heard the proposal made by the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council and the comments in pursuance of that made by hon. members representing their parties. Is it the agreement of the House that we can proceed with Bills S-13 and S-14 on all stages?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Agreed and so ordered.

PRIVATE BILLS

MONTILAC LTD. AND SOCAM LTD.

Mr. Claude-André Lachance (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Trade)) moved that Bill S-13, to revive Montilac Ltd. and Socam Ltd., as reported (without amendment) from the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills and Standing Orders, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Lachance moved that Bill S-13, to revive Montilac Ltd. and Socam Ltd., be read the third time and do pass.

He said: Mr. Speaker, first of all I should like to thank the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Hovdebo) for his kindness in allowing me some time so that we can concur in the report and give third reading to those two bills.

The hon. member for York-Peel (Mr. Stevens) asked for some information when the bill was before our Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills and Standing Orders. For technical reasons, I was unable to get them and do not have them with me today. But I shall be getting them sometime this week. With the consent of the House, I shall table them so that everyone in the House can acquaint themselves with them. More specifically, these are letters signed by the shareholders and by the public curator of the province of Quebec agreeing with the procedure we are following today.

I therefore promise the House, Mr. Speaker, that the information concerned will be conveyed to the House as soon as I have received it. I shall personally inform the hon. member for York-Peel who asked me for them in committee.

I thank the House for having agreed to proceed today without real notice, and I move this motion be passed.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The House has heard the proposals made by the parliamentary secretary that certain documents related to Bill S-13 be tabled. Is there unanimous consent to the proposal?

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member and myself have had discussions and what he has said to the House is substantially what my understanding was. I would like to see this bill proceed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I must apologize to the hon. member for York-Peel, as I was otherwise occupied.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): He said he wants to have it proceed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Do I understand that we have unanimous consent to proceed? I assume that documents will be tabled in the course of the next few minutes.

Mr. Knowles: In the next day or two.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Those documents will be tabled in the next day or two.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): We will deal in the same manner with Bill S-14. I understand from the remarks made by the parliamentary secretary that there is also a request to delay the tabling of certain documents respecting Bill S-14, and that is so indicated.

TREMUS INDUSTRIES LIMITED

Mr. Claude-André Lachance (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Trade)) moved that Bill S-14, an act to revive Tremus Industries Limited, as reported (without amendment) from the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills and Standing Orders, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): When shall the said bill be read the third time? By leave now?

Some hon. Members: By leave, now.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I think the hon. member was trying to catch your eye in order to put a similar statement on the record with respect to this bill.

[Translation]

Mr. Lachance: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I rose and said that it was the same thing. I simply want to repeat what I said to the hon. member who asked for similar information regarding Tremus Industries Limited. As far as that company is concerned, we have all the information. But it is now on its way from Montreal to Ottawa, and I intend to table it just as for Bill S-13. The hon. member will then have the information he wants, and I will speak with him personally on the matter so that he may judge himself.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Given the exchange of comments, we will proceed to third reading.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Lachance moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. It being five o'clock the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, notices of motions and public bills.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

SUGGESTED EXPANSION OF RESPONSIBILITIES

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Prince Albert) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of expanding the Canadian Wheat Board into a Canadian Grains Board, placing the major grains, wheat, oats, barley, rye, rapeseed, corn and soybeans under the jurisdiction of the Canadian Grains Board and under the quota system including full responsibility for the marketing of all feed grains delivered to primary elevators in Canada.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it is with a great deal of pleasure that I introduce this motion to the House today—perhaps I should say reintroduce this motion to the House today, since a similar motion has been put before this House on a number of occasions, once by my colleague, the hon. member for Regina West (Mr. Benjamin), and by other members of my party.

All parts of Canada are faced with the solving of problems which have been created by the technological age in which we live. Not the least of these problems is the marketing and distribution of grain, with which this motion deals. In the larger world picture we are faced with forecasts which indicate a doubling of the world population before the end of the century. We are faced with the growth of population where even today millions of people live in hunger.

Our capacity for food production in Canada is not functioning to the maximum. Even in Canada malnutrition and poverty continue to exist. Canada is blessed with the ability to produce much more food than is necessary for our own requirements. We have committed ourselves to the world as a net exporter of food, particularly grains. We have built out farm economy in the west on providing these grains to the rest of the world. We know the rest of the world needs them and it therefore should be providing and developing a distribution system which can offset the growing threat of world hunger.

In the last year we have seen food, particularly grain, used as a political weapon. Both the official opposition, when they were in power, and the present government, bowed to the political might of the United States and agreed to an embargo on grain shipped to the Soviet Union. It is my contention, and that of many in my party, that food should never be used as a political weapon against another country. This policy was adopted by our party in a motion put forward by Alf Gleave, the former member from Saskatoon-Biggar. I am proud to support that motion. I condemn the government for waiting eight months before realizing that this embargo was hurting Canada's reputation as a grain exporter. In a food embargo, only the poor and the hungry suffer and animosity between the countries increases.

Food should be used as an instrument of peace. Canada, as a net food producer, should recognize its moral obligation to assist in feeding the world within the limits of good land husbandry. The provision of an effective marketing and distribution system will help us to fulfil that obligation.

Today's motion deals with an area of food distribution known as grain marketing. While I was growing up on a farm in northern Saskatchewan during the 1920s and the 1930s, the scourge of the farmers, particularly the small farmer, was the fact that wheat and other grains were subject to a great deal of speculation by members of the Winnipeg Grain Exchange. The effect of that speculation, pure and simple, was to rob the farmer.

I can remember my father selling wheat for $1 per bushel in the fall, a time when he needed money and therefore had to sell, and it sold for $2 per bushel in the spring, when my father had no grain left to sell. This meant that my father received only $1 per bushel for his investment which was the use of his land and all his hard work. Whether or not this was enough money, the fact is my father had no alternative but to sell in the fall. Consequently, his grain went into the system at $1 per bushel. This was at a time when very little was needed for transportation and handling. Therefore, someone who provided no work, no investment, no land or any productivity of any kind took the rest of the money. In many cases these people did not even risk the loss of their own money, because they would buy on margin and would not be required to own the grain on which they made their money.

This speculation was one of the reasons for the establishment of the original Canadian Wheat Board. However, the motion before us today is not aimed particularly at speculation, but is intended to point out the need for a stable and orderly marketing system. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) and the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board, Senator Argue, have come out often and loudly in support of orderly marketing. Most farmers and the New Democratic Party wholeheartedly agree with the ministers on this position. Our main concern is that it seems to be all talk and no action. There seems to be a great deal of equivocation on the part of the Minister of Agriculture. For example, the Minister of Agriculture stated specifically that he supports orderly grain marketing, but seems very hesistant to support the proposition that all feeds grains be placed back under the Canadian Wheat Board.

This motion suggests that the Canadian Wheat Board be expanded and renamed the Canadian Grains Board in order to put all grains under its jurisdiction, including oil seeds such as rapeseed and soya beans. In simple terms, this motion suggests extending the orderly marketing to all the products listed, and treating those products in the same way in which wheat, barley and oats are handled on the prairies now. At present, the Canadian Wheat Board is the sole marketing agent for prairie wheat, oats and barley sold for export or for domestic industrial use. This motion would extend the power of the Wheat Board to allow for orderly marketing of all the grains listed and for the return of domestic feed to the Wheat Board.

The Canadian Wheat Board grew from the history of prairie grain marketing. The men who developed the idea of a central marketing system were pioneers of this country. They came to the prairies from all parts of Europe, eastern Canada and the United States, to own land and to achieve their dreams. The prairies are a harsh teacher. The farmers watched their crops being ruined by grasshoppers, drought, disease or hail. After washing off the dust of the drought of the 1930s, they took what little grain they had to market and sold it for a price of 25 cents a bushel.

Being strong and determined people these farmers were provoked into action. The first agrarian movement had the goal of greater regulation and supervision of the grain companies and the major railways. When this failed, the agrarian movement turned to a central marketing system as the answer. Farmers had experienced the board of grain supervisors in 1917 and 1918 as a wartime measure. They had also experienced the effect of the first Canadian Wheat Board in the years 1919 and 1920. So it was that during the early 1930s, the depression, when the grain industry was tottering, farmers pressed the government for a central marketing system. The administration of the Conservative Prime Minister, R. B. Bennett, from 1930 to 1935 saw the depression worsen, the provincial wheat pool stumble, and their central selling agencies collapse before they were finally convinced of the need for a Canadian Wheat Board.

The establishment of the Canadian Wheat Board in 1935, just prior to Bennett's defeat at the polls, was a surprising legacy left to the grain industry by this Prime Minister, since he spent most of his term in office proclaiming that the open market system would solve all the problems. Mr. Bennett's proposals which received first reading in June, 1935, provided for a compulsory marketing agency, which would take delivery of all grains. During the committee meeting chaired by Mr. Bennett, the legislation was changed to become a voluntary agency, and, surprisingly—or perhaps it is not so surprising—the Liberal opposition under William Lyon Mackenzie King took most of the credit for the bill.

The compulsory factors of the board did not come into being until 1933 for wheat and 1949 for barley and oats. The basic mandate of the Canadian Wheat Board fits as well today as it did in 1935. It was to provide grain farmers with a more orderly marketing system, to assure them the best return possible for their grain under changing marketing conditions, and to provide the maximum degree of price stability to producers. The motion before us today suggests extending this mandate to more producers.

The Canadian Wheat Board fulfils this mandate through three main operations. It controls grain marketing through a central agency, the delivery of grain to the customers and through a price pooling system it achieves price stability. This mandate implies some kind of supply management which the Wheat Board has evolved over the years as the quota system.

During this past year there have been a couple of situations arise which point out the fact that the position suggested in this motion is acceptable to most farmers and the fact that an open or free market, as it is sometimes called, is causing problems in our market today. Last year's situation also pointed out that lack of an orderly marketing system for all grains is costing the farmers a considerable amount of money. It is causing a number of transportation difficulties because of movement of off-board grains. There are other irregularities which have developed regarding the resale of western barley.

• (1720)

On October 21, 1980, the advisory committees to the Canadian Wheat Board and the Canadian Livestock Wheat Board agreed that, given suitable conditions, the federal government should return control of domestic feed grain marketing to the Canadian Wheat Board by next July 1. This is a rather historical agreement because it is an agreement between the producers and the consumers of feed grain.

In an article printed in The Western Producer, Mr. Charles Munro of Embro, Ontario, a member of the CLFB, is reported as saying:

> Members are not very happy with the activity of the trade—there was a lot of support for the Wheat Board system.

Mr. Munro said that the Canadian Livestock Feed Board committee was disturbed at the way the open market had been operating recently with traders buying grain.

Between 1976 and 1979 off-board grain sold in Canada cost farmers $142 million. This money could have been in the farmers' pockets. The figures indicate that farmers had average losses over the last three years of 49 cents per bushel for feed wheat; 16 cents per bushel for oats; and 36 cents per bushel for barley, all because farmers did not sell through the board. There were many transportation problems because of off-board sales.

In an editorial, we find the following:

> At a time when the whole grain transportation industry has been working toward greater efficiency some of the most difficult transport tie-ups have stemmed from these policies.
> A classic example occurred just over a year ago when an oversupply of barley resulted in producers seeking to unload it by moving large numbers of producer cars into the system. The extra cars clogged trackage and terminal space needed for other purposes.

The movement of rapeseed, which is an off-board grain, also caused a number of problems. In The Western Producer, for September 18, 1980, we find the following comment:

Unpriced rapeseed has been a serious problem for the Alberta Wheat Pool, according to Ted Ball, director of operations. Ball says during the middle of August, AWP's Pacific Terminal was so full of unpriced rapeseed administered by grain dealers that the Pool was having trouble taking delivery of enough of its own rapeseed to fill its sales program.

The Pool was forced to obtain rapeseed from other grain companies to fill commitments—

That same rapeseed also caused a lot of trouble in the futures market because the futures market did not work. The cash price for rapeseed is considerably lower than the futures price. However, I will not go into that aspect today.

Because the Wheat Board is forced to sell barley to fulfil eastern feed orders at a corn competitive price, we are concerned the price of barley may become so high that it will be profitable for Ontario traders to buy barley from the west and resell it at an export price. Again there has been considerable loss because of that factor.

I started my comments with a global look at food needs and our responsibility in fulfilling those needs. The type of orderly market suggested for grain by this motion would allow the farmers of Canada to fulfil those needs efficiently, as far as grain is concerned, without themselves or consumers being exploited by speculators or by multinational corporations.

This motion touches only the grain area. We need the same kind of orderly market in all farm commodity areas. This government has expressed support for that movement. Indeed, it has established effective and successful marketing boards in many areas. Let us hope the government will help to extend that direction by passing this motion and getting on with the job in other areas as well.

Mr. Peter Lang (Kitchener): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Bockstael) is most concerned about this issue raised by the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Hovdebo) and he asked me to outline some thoughts on this motion. The hon. member for St. Boniface wanted to be here, but his responsibilities on the constitutional committee have prevented him from doing so.

It is likely that the reason we have both the board and open market systems operating side by side in Canada today is because of the advantages either system offers in particular marketing situations.

When it is suggested that all the major grains in Canada should be placed under a single marketing board and under the delivery quota system, I think we should take a careful look at the marketing system for each grain in deciding whether it could be better handled by a marketing board or whether it would fare better on the open market. In each case we need to examine the applicable federal and provincial legislation. More important, we need to ascertain the views of producers of each grain on whether they wish to have the sale of their crop transferred from one marketing system to another.

I recognize in this motion a fine tribute to the objectives of the particular farm organizations which have been advocating the universal adoption of the board marketing system, to the exclusion of the open market, for the past 60 years. It is also a tribute to the operating performance of the Canadian Wheat Board since 1935. Yet, there are many who believe that the well-intended pursuit of that objective to the complete destruction of the open market could lead to unexpected and unwelcome results, which may be unacceptable to the affected producers themselves.

For example, problems could arise in placing crops such as corn and soybeans under the jurisdiction of a conglomerate grain marketing board whose constitutional authority for marketing grain is limited to interprovincial and export trade which may not apply to corn and soybeans at all.

Having made the point that different circumstances surround the marketing of each grain, which the mover of this motion would like to assign to a single marketing board, I shall now review the experience the Canadian Wheat Board has had with the marketing of oats and barley since 1949 and the practical lessons learned when you try to handle different crops having distinctly different market outlets within the supervision of one board.

The federal government has had very serious misgivings concerning problems which would face the Canadian Wheat Board if it were the sole marketing agency for western oats and barley, as western producers and eastern feeders evidently wanted. The doubts over its practicability were well expressed by the Hon. C. D. Howe, who introduced an amendment to the Canadian Wheat Board Act on February 27, 1948, to provide for the board marketing of oats and barley.

Because his statement so clearly contrasted the market situations for wheat and the major coarse grains, and underscored the need for complementary provincial legislation, all of which is relevant to the motion we now have before us, I would like to place part of Mr. Howe's statement on the record again, and I quote from pages 1677-78 of the House of Commons Debates in 1948:

The fourth amendment proposes to empower the governor in council by regulation to extend to oats and barley the regulations now applicable to wheat. Strong representations favouring the marketing of oats and barley through the Wheat Board have been received from farm organizations in this regard, provided a workable plan can be agreed upon. However, the government is well aware that the compulsory marketing of oats and barley through the board represents serious difficulties. The success of such an enterprise must be dependent on a large measure of agreement on policy matters as between organized farmers of both the producer and the consumer class, as well as on the co-operation of provincial governments. Therefore, this government will wish to have concrete evidence of such agreement and such co-operation before it can assume the responsibility for putting this amendment into effect.

He goes on to illustrate some of the difficulties he sees, such as the fact that oats and barley are primarily feed crops, most of which do not even leave the farm. He concluded:

The government is prepared to take whatever steps lie within its power to assist in establishing marketing arrangements that will help to maintain economic and stable prices for Canadian agricultural products. The government must, however, be satisfied that any given scheme for this purpose is a practical one, a constitutional one, a workable one and one that will command the support of the interested groups concerned. Until it is satisfied that these conditions have been met, the government will not be prepared to undertake the marketing of oats and barley through the Wheat Board.

After Mr. Howe's amending bill received royal assent, Premier T. C. Douglas promptly introduced a coarse grain marketing control bill in the Saskatchewan legislature. Its substantive provisions were very simple. Section 4(1) provided that "No producer shall sell . . . grain . . . for delivery within the province to any person other than the Canadian Wheat Board", and section 4(2) excluded farm to farm transactions for feeding purposes from the provisions of the bill. Thus, all farm to farm sales, even if trucked at a considerable distance within the province remained outside the control of the board. The Saskatchewan coarse grain marketing control act received royal assent on March 25, 1948, but the Alberta and Manitoba governments did not act so quickly.

On March 16, 1948, Premier Stuart Garson of Manitoba wrote to Mr. Howe. He took note of the fact that ever since 1943 the Canadian Wheat Board has been an agency of the Crown, and that as such the federal government had the power to direct its pricing policies in contravention of the board's acting as an agent of producers and selling to their best advantage, and he raised the following pertinent questions.

Is the Wheat Board to be the agent of the producer of oats and barley charged with the responsibility of securing the best price possible in all available outlets, or is the board to be the agency of the government, buying oats and barley at a price set by the government for reasons not necessarily related to, and even incompatible with, the securing of the best price? Is the price to be set, for example, at a certain level to keep down the cost of living in Canada or to provide livestock raisers with feed at a reasonable figure? In this latter case if the Wheat Board fixes a price for oats and barley below what those commodities can be sold for, will the resulting loss be left with the producer of oats and barley, or will this loss be paid by the whole Canadian people? To put it in another way, will it be the policy of the Wheat Board in handling oats and barley to hold down the price to the buyer by open or hidden subsidies? If so, who will pay the subsidies—the producer of oats and barley, or the federal government representing the whole body of the Canadian people?

Mr. Howe made no attempt to answer these questions in detail, but simply repeated his position that the federal oats and barley amendment would not be proclaimed until all three prairie provinces enacted complementary legislation. In the spring of 1949, both the Manitoba and Alberta legislatures passed coarse grains marketing control acts which were drafted in the same form as the Saskatchewan act. With the enactment of the complementary legislation, the federal government's commitment to proclaim its act had been met, and the Wheat Board was instructed to take over the marketing responsibility for oats and barley commencing August 1, 1949.

Before doing so, the board's criterion for its sales policy still had to be established. It had been placed in the middle, along with the federal government, of the conflict over prices between, on the one hand, farmers producing and selling their grain as a cash crop to consumers and, on the other, those whose customers are farmers themselves, buying grains to convert into livestock products. This conflict of interest over the pricing of oats and barley between farm producers and farm consumers has continued from 1949 to today.

When the Canadian Federation of Agriculture recruited equal support among its eastern and western members in 1948 for placing the marketing of oats and barley under the Wheat Board, it admitted that it would have difficulty in recommending to government the price that the Wheat Board should fix for these grains, one which would be fair and reasonable to producers and consumers alike. Nevertheless, it undertook to make such a recommendation and, had the federal government taken the federation at its word, the federation would have been saddled with the same conflict of interest between domestic farm producers on the one hand, and domestic farm consumers on the other, with which the federal government and the Wheat Board have been saddled ever since.

Mr. Howe and his Wheat Board faced this issue first as the latter took over the monopoly marketing of oats and barley in 1949. Because they were not prepared to depend upon price recommendations to be forthcoming from the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, they decided to abide by the mandate provided by the Canadian Wheat Board Act of 1935, to sell to the western producers' best advantage, although this was not what the eastern feeders sought to obtain by supporting board marketing of oats and barley.

At the same time, the Wheat Board encouraged the Winnipeg Grain Exchange to keep its futures markets for oats and barley open, and the board confined its selling operations to offering both grains for sale in the oats and barley futures markets. Thus, for a number of years, the board continued to use the facilities which the open market system had been providing. It was a somewhat contrived situation at best, because the board now became the dominant seller in these futures markets. Yet the prices those markets registered could be pointed to as an indicator of the prices at which it was fair and reasonable for the board to sell.

After a while, all sorts of problems began to develop in the marketing of oats and barley. As surpluses accumulated in the west, the board was forced to restrict the delivery of oats and barley to primary elevators which had become congested. This it did through the delivery quota system administered by the board.

When western producers found themselves cut off from sales through the elevator system to the Canadian Wheat Board, they turned to the only other market available to them, namely, farm to farm transactions or the off-board market which was exempted from the complementary provincial marketing legislation, and over which the board had no control.

These off-board sales could be carried to considerable lengths by long distance trucking within each province which was perfectly legal under the provincial legislation, or across provincial boundaries, though this contravened the regulations of the Canadian Wheat Board which had jurisdiction over interprovincial trade. With the expansion of this off-board market, a two-price system for oats and barley developed, one at board prices for the restricted delivery to elevators, and another at a much lower price for off-board sales. Not only were western producers discontented, but their eastern customers became incensed because they had no access to the low-priced off-board grains, and had to pay the higher board prices for grain moving through interprovincial trade.

Hon. members who were here in those days will recall the hearings which took place in the House committee on agriculture which led to the recommendation adopted by the government in 1974 to remove from the Wheat Board the sole responsibility for the domestic marketing of the feed grades of wheat, oats and barley. Commencing on August 1, 1974, western producers were given the option of selling their feed grades of these grains either on the open market or through the facilities of the Wheat Board. Thus, from that time a substantial portion of the sales of the feed grades of western grain have reverted to the open market.

One further episode in the Wheat Board's experience in handling oats and barley should also be recorded. This hit at the core of the Wheat Board's legislative responsibility to sell producers' grain to the best advantage. Occasions arose in the 1970s when barley could be sold for higher prices overseas than in competition with imported feeds in eastern Canada. The board's parliamentary directive required it to sell in the producers' interests in the most attractive market. But this meant the shorting of supplies of western feed in the eastern market, and the irregularity of supply could threaten the future competitive position of western grains in that market.

In that situation, the government and the board recognized that western producers' longer-term interests warranted the retention of a continuous supply to eastern Canadian feeders at the expense of sacrificing short-term price gains to the western producers. In consequence, the Wheat Board undertook to furnish the eastern Canadian market on a continuous basis in accordance with a pricing formula which related the domestic prices for western oats and barley to the prices eastern feeders were paying for corn imported from the United States. There is an adjustment for protein from soybeans. American corn and soybean prices are, of course, determined by the Chicago futures market.

In conclusion, in the account I have given, I have described the extent to which the marketing of western oats and barley differs from the marketing of western wheat, and the way in which any government is caught in the middle in trying to arbitrate the price governing transactions between one set of domestic producers and another. I have shown that no board system is in complete control over all transactions in feed grains and that a two-price system can develop between board and off-board grains when farm to farm sales take place within each province.

I wonder, therefore, if the sponsor of this motion would like to see feed grades of western wheat, oats and barley sold to Canadian feeders in the east and the west at different price levels, either through the board or through farm to farm transactions. It would be a backward step if Canadian feeders did not have access to the same price. I also wonder about the extent of actual producer support for such action.

Last, I would like to know what price directive he would be prepared to give to the board—whether to sell to western producers' best advantage at all times, thereby shorting at times the domestic market, or whether he is satisfied that western feed grains should be continuously offered to eastern markets at prices related to the Chicago open market prices for corn.

Mr. Bert Hargrave (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, I want to make a few remarks in this private members' hour and try to put on the record, at least briefly, the position of the western livestock feeding industry. I am thinking primarily of my own province of Alberta, I suppose, but my remarks certainly include the feeding industry in Saskatchewan and Manitoba—and that is an enormous feeding industry. It has become vastly important, much more important than it used to be. For example, in Alberta, wheat is no longer the big crop; it has not been so for a good many years. The big crop is feed barley. Sometimes we can raise anywhere from 500 million to as much as 700 million bushels of barley every year in the province, an enormous crop. That situation is going to continue. After the very severe indication of drought for the first two to three months of this year's growth season, when the rains finally came back it was barley with its growth season, that came back and won the day for the grain producers in Alberta. There was a very substantial crop of barley in spite of conditions during that crop year.

Where is the principal market in the west for feed grains? The big market, in spite of the headlines that are made about the export of feed grains and especially barley to foreign markets, is right at home. That is the big market and we should never forget it. It is either on the same farm as the barley is produced on or on the farm next door or at the feed lots which are so well established in western Canada. The sales through the private grain market, through the open market for feed grains, satisfy that market which is by far the most important market there is.

I know that the member for Prince Albert (Mr. Hovdebo) is very sincere in his motion. He is a very sincere man. I respect his sincerity and his initiative in promoting this market, but I say to this House and to all western Canadians who are concerned about this subject, that there is no way the feeding industry could ever operate with a proposal such as he has put forward in this private members' hour. We must have an open market for our domestic feed grains in western Canada. Let there be no doubt about that. The importance of the feeding industry itself in western Canada should certainly be justification for that statement and I mean this most sincerely. I want to mention that this is only part of an ongoing debate that we are hopefully going to see more of in the balance of this session of the Thirty-second Parliament. I am sure it will not surprise members to know that I am referring to the combined Crowsnest Pass freight rate issue and the domestic feed grain pricing policy. Those two issues are as important to western agricultural people in total, that is, the grain producers and the livestock industry, and as important to the whole of western Canada in their own way as some of those other issues that we think are so important to all of Canada—I am referring to the constitutional issue and even the energy issue. That is the importance that I attach to this double-barrelled controversial issue of domestic feed grain prices plus the Crowsnest Pass freight rates. I know that the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) has been making public statements—and I think the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) has done the same—to indicate that it is his wish to bring to a head in some way this public debate that has been going on now for quite a number of years in western Canada, and very seriously over the last two years, and bring it to the floor of the House of Commons. It remains to be seen, of course, what form it will take. There is a suggestion that it could take the form of a commission that would, shall we say, publicize the suggested policy and ask for input from all concerned. We will take it from there and probably see the government bring in an appropriate piece of legislation. This is not going to happen overnight, of course. It is going to take several years. After all, the problem has been with us now for four generations.

I know my friend from Regina West (Mr. Benjamin) is not happy with what I am saying, but I hope he at least recognizes that I have a personal interest in this and I am very sincere about it.

Mr. Benjamin: I am just trying to get you to change your mind.

Mr. Hargrave: It is a litle late, that is all I can say.

Mr. Benjamin: It is never too late.

Mr. Hargrave: I want to say that we just cannot possibly envisage the whole grain system in the prairies of western Canada operating without free access to an open feed grains market.

• (1750)

On a related matter I want to draw the attention of this House—this is the first time I have been able to do so although I have raised the matter in the Standing Committee on Agriculture—to what has been termed a joint press release from advisory committees dated at Ottawa, October 23, 1980. It is on the stationery of the Canadian Livestock Feed Board, and I will read briefly from it. This is a statement which followed a joint meeting here in Ottawa at about the time of this release, October 23. No doubt it was a day or two earlier. The two groups which were meeting were the Canadian Livestock Feed Board advisory committee, which is a board appointed by the Minister of Agriculture, and the advisory board to the Canadian Wheat Board, an elected board which is now a very important part of our western grain economy. Those two boards got together here in Ottawa and put out a release which referred three or four times to a unanimous agreement reached by the two boards. They key one is at the bottom of the fist page, and I will read it into the record as follows:

> Both committees unanimously rejected any system whereby the supply of domestic feed grains would be totally within the domain of the private trade. It was felt that such a system would be detrimental to the interests of both grain and livestock producers throughout Canada.

Mr. Benjamin: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hargrave: It is utter rubbish to suggest that those two boards could sit down together and issue a statement saying that they were unanimous. I do not know how the circumstances came about, but immediately afterwards at least four of the members of the advisory board to the Canadian Wheat Board denied very vehemently that there was any substance to this. Two of them are from Manitoba and two are from Alberta, and they were elected representatives. They put out their own statement about it immediately afterward.

At that particular meeting of the two boards two ministers were reported to have been involved in at least part of their deliberations. Those ministers were the Minister of Agriculture and the minister of state responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board. Some of us in the Standing Committee on Agriculture did have an opportunity to question the Minister of Agriculture about his involvement.

The issue was raised by three or four of us from this side of the House. The minister denied that he had any specific input into the preparation of this joint press release. He did so rather vigorously, and I would say that those from our side pressed our point equally as vigourously. In the end the minister went on record—when the minutes are finally printed we will find this reference—as saying that the only thing he was dead sure of was that he was for orderly marketing. He repeated that several times. I am saying, I suppose rather tactfully, that the minister was somewhat embarrassed. The Minister of Agriculture was somewhat embarrassed to be involved in a statement on government stationery belonging to the Canadian Livestock Feed Board.

I do not propose to speak much longer, but I want to place on the record the importance of the feeding industry in western Canada. I refer to feed for both cattle and hogs. If I may digress for a moment, I would like to say something about our hog industry, especially in Alberta. It was not too many years ago when the hog industry in Alberta was the largest in Canada by province. We had the largest hog population, and it was a thriving industry.

Then when the higher price for barley and the surplus grain era came along, that hog industry rather suddenly diminished, and at first glance it appeared that it was taken over by the province of Quebec. There is reason for assuming that things happened that way, but in reality we in western Canada lost our large hog industry, especially in Alberta, not to Quebec but to the corn belt in the United States, simply because hogs could be produced cheaper there than here, and there is a better climate there. Of course, we have always known that.

While this was going on, the provincial government of Quebec introduced a rich subsidy program to encourage hog production and feeding in that province. This eventually paid off to the extent that either in the current year almost ending, or next year the largest hog producer in Canada will, I am sure, be the province of Quebec. This is essentially because of the subsidy program.

The basic reason hogs were a casualty in the west was the unsatisfactory pricing system for domestic feed grains. That is why, when this great debate moves into Parliament, we have to address ourselves to it so completely. Surely the farmers themselves, both the producers of feed grains and their customers, cattle feeders and hog feeders, must make the decision themselves.

They are prepared to do that now after many, many years of discussion especially of the Crowsnest Pass freight rate and to a lesser degree the domestic feed grain pricing policy, both being hush-hush types of topics. They had never been raised seriously at annual meetings, but that situation has ended. These subjects are now out in the open. They are no longer taboo. We will see them raised here, and rightly so. However, when they are here, let us put on our non-partisan hats. Many members of Parliament will be involved. There are many farmers in western Canada who do not completely understand what is behind the Crowsnest Pass freight rate and what it does to the total agricultural economy and the total Canadian economy. There are many who do not understand, including farmers. That will be the case in this House, and when that situation arises, I will ask hon. members to be patient and to try to learn, understand and give the debate a chance to develop properly. I am sure it will eventually develop all across Canada. Hopefully at some time the committee will travel across Canada either to put a policy to livestock producers and grain growers or to ask their advice preliminary to a policy being established by the government.

Mr. Benjamin: We have done that a dozen times, Bert. Hon. members opposite do not have the guts to do anything. We have had a dozen hearings and heard a dozen submissions.

Mr. Hargrave: In response to my hon. friend, who at one time helped me ship cattle in Walsh, I will say that they will have an opportunity. The government of the day will have an opportunity to face up to this great question. In the meantime I say to hon. members very sincerely that this is not the time to abolish the open market for domestic feed grains.

Mr. Louis R. Desmarais (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, in a review of the actual marketing circumstances for each of the major grains enumerated in motion No. 12 I would like to draw the attention of hon. members to the different circumstances and conditions which affect the marketing of each grain. The only valid conclusion that can be drawn is that the board marketing system has already been adopted wherever it has appeared to be in the best interests of producers to do so.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but the hour provided for the consideration of private members' business has expired, and I do now leave the chair until 8 p.m.

At 6 p.m. the House took recess.

JUDGES ACT

MEASURE TO INCREASE SALARIES OF JUDGES

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Chrétien that Bill C-34, an act to amend the Judges Act and certain other acts in consequence thereof, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

● (2010)

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I rise this evening to say a few words about a very important bill before the House, that is, Bill C-34 to amend the Judges Act. Hon. members will know that the last time there was a serious debate about the Judges Act was in 1975. They will also know that this bill was introduced, received first reading on June 12, 1980, and that members of the judiciary have expressed considerable concern at the delays which it has encountered in receiving second reading.

As the hon. member for Saskatoon West (Mr. Hnatyshyn) pointed out it is, of course, the responsibility of the government to establish the legislative timetable, and certainly the delay in the tabling of this bill for second reading is one for which we bear no responsibility. We are as concerned as are members of the judiciary that this matter should receive serious study.

Under section 92(14) of the British North America Act, the provinces have jurisdiction over the administration of justice itself. We know that from time to time concerns have been expressed about the inadequacy of the resources which some provinces have allocated to the administration of justice at the provincial level—that they have not been prepared to give this important area the kind of priority that it deserves in Canadian society, with the result that the justice system, both criminal and civil, has suffered. We on this side of the House certainly hope that all provinces will take seriously their responsibility to provide adequate resources in the area of the administration of justice.

But Parliament itself has serious responsibilities toward the federal judiciary. Those responsibilities are established in the terms of the British North America Act, primarly in section 96 which deals with the appointment and supervision of judges, in certain sections which deal with the removal of judges, although fortunately their application has not been necessary in Canada, and in section 100 which sets the terms of compensation and pensions for the federal judiciary. These are serious responsibilities which no member of the House takes lightly. Similarly, it is very important there be no suggestion that these responsibilities under the British North America Act should in some way be foisted off on some special advisory board or on the governor in council without there being full responsibility of Parliament at least at the final stages. We have no objections to an independent advisory board considering the concerns expressed by the judiciary on compensation and pensions, but ultimately Parliament must take its responsibilities. We will strenuously oppose any suggestion that the cabinet or the governor in council should have sole responsibility for implementing changes to the compensation of the federal judiciary.

We have been fortunate in Canada in having outstanding judiciary. I have only had the privilege of practising for a short time in British Columbia as a member of the Bar, but I stand here and say with pride that we in British Columbia—and I am sure this would be the case in the rest of Canada—have an outstanding judiciary, one of which all members of the bar are very proud. The chief justices of the Supreme Court and the chief justices of British Columbia are men who have very fine records as practitioners. As I say, certainly we are proud of the judiciary in the province of British Columbia, and indeed I know that other members speak with equal pride about the record of the judiciary throughout the country.

The judiciary plays a very important role in Canadian society, a role which is sometimes not given the recognition it should receive. As we know the federal judiciary—and I am speaking now only of the federal judiciary—handles a wide range of issues which concern Canadians including both criminal and civil matters. The federal courts handle matters such as the Income Tax Act, immigration questions and the supervision of various federal tribunals; that particular level of the judiciary is perhaps one of the least understood, yet one of the most important in Canadian society. As we know, Parliament has responsibility for supervising to some extent the compensation levels of judge and appointments to the Federal Court of Canada and ultimately to the pinnacle of our judicial system, the Supreme Court of Canada.

Many Canadian citizens do not appreciate the difficulties involved in being a member of the judiciary. It is important that Canadians respect and understand the vital role which members of the judiciary play in Canadian society. For example, one need only imagine the difficulty involved in properly charging the jury in a complex criminal case, covering every aspect of the charge carefully knowing that every word will be scrutinized by a court of appeal if the decision is appealed. Also one can imagine the great burden which is placed on a judge in considering the difficult and often vexing question of sentencing.

I should like to say a word or two about the whole area of sentencing because it is one of the most important obligations and responsibilities of our federal judiciary. When we talk about sentencing in the criminal justice system, it is fair to say it is absolutely essential that our federal judiciary should have a clear understanding and knowledge of exactly what is involved in the sentences they are imposing. Too many members of the federal judiciary, and indeed of the provincial judiciary, have an inadequate concept of the prison system of the country. I suggest it is incumbent upon any judges in the country whose task includes sentencing convicted criminals, to have the obligation and responsibility to observe at first hand conditions in the Canadian penal system so as to be more aware of the kind of justice they are dispensing, in order to be more aware of the failure, in many respects, of the Canadian prison system, in order that hopefully, in considering appropriate sentences, they might look very carefully at alternatives to imprisonment wherever such alternatives are feasible. Certainly we will welcome the proposals which the Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development (Mr. Chrétien) has promised for some time designed to make the opportunities for alternatives within the criminal sentencing system more appropriate. Those opportunities are presently lacking, but within the present sentencing system I think it is fair to say that our judiciary has not shown the kind of flexibility it should have shown. They must turn so readily to imprisonment but, in appropriate cases, they must consider alternatives such as restitution, the concept of community service, and the concept of fines geared to ability to pay.

Also, our judiciary must look at the concept of fairness in sentencing. I should like to give one example which was raised recently of inequity in sentencing. I know that our judiciary has by and large attempted to apply an even hand in the very difficult process of sentencing, but unfortunately when there are instances such as the one I am about to relate, it tends to bring the entire federal judiciary and its sentencing process into question. I should like to compare the sentencing process in the case of the late Clarence Campbell, on the one hand, and on the other hand, in the case of Jean-Claude Parrot. I quote from a column by Allan Fotheringham who dealt with this question. In the introduction to the comparison of these two cases, he said:

> White-collar crime still pays. If you're going to break the law, for heaven's sake wear your best suit (not to mention your best lawyer) to court. The jails are full of grubby little men who do stupid things. They seldom are overflowing with those who do extremely clever, illegal things. Fiddling with large amounts of money is one thing, but if you really want to stay out of trouble, don't get caught stealing hubcaps.

The column in question went on to point out that Clarence Campbell was found guilty in February of a very serious offence involving an attempt to bribe a member of the other place, a member of the Senate, in return for assistance on a government contract. The trial judge at that time said that this was an affront to the fundamental values of Canadian society which must be denounced in strong terms. Well, what were those strong terms? Mr. Campbell received a token one day in jail and a $25,000 fine. In fact, he served some five hours in jail and the NHL had already raised over $50,000 to assist him with his legal fees.

In contrast, we have the case of Jean-Claude Parrot, leader of the CUPW who led a legal strike of postal workers which started on October 16, 1978. Three days later Parliament passed back-to-work legislation and Parrot, on October 25, sent his people back to work. He and four of his fellow officers were charged under section 115 of the Criminal Code for defying an act of Parliament. The maximum penalty is two years.

Mr. Breau: He did not defy the law.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): Keeping in mind the one-day sentence imposed on Clarence Campbell, what was the penalty the trial judge imposed on Jean-Claude Parrot, a man that Chief Justice Gregory Evans of the Ontario Supreme Court called an honest and dedicated man? He was given a sentence of three months in prison. Contrast that with one day to Clarence Campbell for attempting to bribe a Liberal Senator. The hon. member in the Liberal benches opposite suggests there was not a violation of the law. If it is not a violation of the law to attempt to bribe a member of the Senate to obtain a favour, I do not know what a violation of the law is.

It is important that the public see clearly there is equity and fairness in the sentencing system in this country. Cases such as the one I have outlined, unfortunately, do not enhance that impression.

The law and our judiciary must be more sensitive and more accessible to the poor and minority groups. The courts must be accessible to all citizens in this country. Recently we have seen cutbacks in legal aid programs, which mean that the old adage about there being one law for the rich and one law for the poor is, unfortunately, a reality in some cases. It must be a fundamental precept of the Canadian criminal justice system that no man or woman in this society should be denied justice, denied their day in court, because they do not have enough money to pay for a lawyer.

Mr. Speaker, we are talking about the Judges Act and about the role of Parliament in dealing with the federal judiciary. We know that as a result of the proposals by the government—proposals with respect to an entrenched charter of rights which we support—the role of the courts will be substantially enhanced. We welcome the principle of an entrenched charter of rights, a charter which says no Parliament and, indeed, no provincial legislature at any given time, can through a transient majority, take away fundamental rights which many Canadians thought they had yet which could be swept away at a moment's notice, as we have seen in this country on too many occasions. We saw it in 1970 with the proclamation of the War Measures Act; we saw it in 1942, and following that the scandalous treatment of Canadians of Japanese origin who were interned and whose property was confiscated. To this day they have not been adequately compensated. We recognize and we support the increased role of the judiciary. In interpreting a charter of the fundamental rights of all Canadians, we recognize there are very serious flaws in the proposal which is presently being studied by the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution. We do accept, as I say, that our judiciary will have a more activist role, a broader role in interpreting this charter of rights.

For example, the very first section of the proposed charter of rights as it is now worded, is a section which is being condemned by every group which has studied it and which has appeared before the constitution committee. This means it will be up to the courts to decide what the appropriate limits are on the fundamental rights and freedoms of Canadians.

Under section 7 of the proposed charter of rights it will be up to our courts to determine what constitutes the principles of "fundamental justice", a new concept in Canadian law. If reasonable amendments are accepted, as we certainly hope the Minister of Justice will see fit do, then important decisions concerning what constitutes unreasonable search and seizure, what constitutes unreasonable denial of fair bail, will be left to the courts to decide—not just the Supreme Court of Canada but the federal judiciary at every level.

Perhaps one of the most important obligations of our federal judiciary under the proposed charter of rights will be that under section 15; to determine whether there has been a violation of the right of all Canadians, men and women, to equality before the law and to the equal protection of the law. The record of our judiciary on the interpretation of the words "equality before the law" is not one of which we can be proud. That is why we in this party will be proposing amendments which are being urged upon the committee by a number of groups and individuals make it clear that when we talk about equality before the law we are not talking about the concept which has been determined by the Supreme Court in this country to be merely one of equality in the administration of the law but, rather, about equality in the law itself. We talk about no Canadian being denied equality before the law on the basis of some unreasonable distinction. As I say, we recognize that in the interpretation of the charter of rights our judiciary will have an increased role. And we welcome the entrenchment of a charter of rights.

But I must say there is another section of the proposed charter of rights which would take away any discretion our courts should have. It is with respect to that section we hope the Minister of Justice will listen carefully to the representations which have been made by many groups. We hope he will listen to amendments which we shall be proposing. What section 26 of the proposed charter does is tie the hands of our federal judiciary and say they have no—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Is the minister rising on a point of order?

Mr. Chrétien: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I would like to ask the hon. member if he has anything to say about the salaries of the judges. He seems to have avoided it since he started his speech. He is dealing with the bill of rights and other matters, to which I have no objection, but I would like to know how his party stands on the pay increase and if he has any intention of voting for it.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): I know that members of the judiciary and others will read with great interest the eight-minute speech of the Minister of Justice. If that is all he had to say about the judicial system in this country then I think it is a rather sorry commentary on his understanding, knowledge and recognition of the importance of the judiciary in this country. I intend to take the full 40 minutes which I have been allotted. I hope the Minister of Justice will perhaps give more serious recognition later on in the course of this debate to the role of the federal judiciary and not merely talk for a few minutes about the salaries and pensions. Mr. Speaker, I will certainly be dealing with those. I am sorry to hear that the federal justice minister, unlike his three immediate predecessors, said not a word about the important role of the judiciary in this country. We on this side of the House recognize that role and respect it.

I was talking about section 26. Since we recognize the importance and competence of our judiciary, I am urging the government to give very serious consideration to permitting a discretion in our judiciary to exclude evidence which has been obtained in a way that would bring the administration of justice into disrepute. Surely, if we are to have confidence in our courts and confidence in the federal judiciary, it is not good enough to say to them they must accept evidence no matter how it is obtained, whether illegally, through the use of force or duress or, the use of illegal search and seizure. It is incumbent upon the government to say, "We trust you. We trust the judiciary to exercise its discretion wisely." Indeed, they should have that discretion. We hope the government will recognize that in dealing with the charter of rights.

We recognize the fundamental and important role of an independent judiciary. There are some 657 federally-appointed judges at all levels in this country. Their job is not an easy one. I would like to quote from some comments made by Judge Learned Hand, the eminent American judge who, in answering the question: What makes a good judge? was quoted as saying that, in interpreting a constitutional document, a judge should:

> —have at least a bowing acquaintance with Acton and Maintland, with Thyucydides, Gibbon and Carlyle, with Homer, Dante, Shakespeare and Milton, with Machiavelli, Montaigne and Rabelais, with Plato, Bacon, Hume and Kant . . . For in such matters everything turns upon the spirit in which he approaches the questions before him.

The role of the federal judiciary is indeed a difficult one. The independence of the judiciary is surely the cornerstone of the Canadian justice system. We must not for a moment tolerate any threat or any incursion into that independence. I am glad to see that the days of telephoning judges by certain members of the cabinet opposite appear to have gone by. The appearance of justice is very, very important, and it is not good enough to suggest that because a certain individual has a position in society or is a cabinet member in a government he or she can pick up a telephone and talk to a judge. We reject that concept.

We say that there must be one law right across the land for all citizens and that no person, no matter how powerful, should ever have special access to judges as was outlined in the case known as the "Judges Affair", the sorry incidents of telephoning judges in our fairly recent past. We say that the independence of the judiciary and the rule of law are cornerstones of our Canadian justice system.

We await with interest the government's response to the question of the rule of law and how it will apply when there have been violations of that law by members of those who are pledged to enforce that law. We wait with interest the outcome of the McDonald commission and with even greater interest the response of this government to the recommendations of that commission.

With regard to the importance of the judiciary, we do not deny there are certain areas which can be updated. In some respects the powers which are given to the judiciary are obsolete. For example, one of the powers of the judiciary which is surely obsolete is its power to cite contempt for what is known as "scandalizing the court". That power is obsolete. Indeed, it had not been used in Canadian society until recently when it was revived in the case of the hon. member for Papineau (Mr. Ouellet)—I hope that he will make some contribution to this debate and give us his thoughts on the independence of the judiciary, perhaps with a particular comment on the role of the Quebec judiciary. We know that this power was used in the case of the editor of a New Brunswick newspaper.

The concept of contempt by scandalizing the court was described at the turn of the century by the British House of Commons as "giving an arbitrary, complete and sweeping power to the judiciary". Indeed, it was dealt with by the judicial committee of the Privy Council which said "contempt of court convictions for scandalizing the court have become obsolete" and "the courts could leave to public opinion, attacks or comments derogatory or scandalous to them". Surely, that power should be removed from the hands of our judiciary, and I am sure the judiciary itself would overwhelmingly welcome that suggestion.

There are other suggestions with respect to updating the role of the federal judiciary. It has been suggested that the descriptions "my Lord" and "my Lady", are outdated and that with equal respect members of the judiciary could be addressed as "Your Honour". There are those who suggest, and I think properly, that the scheduling of our legal calendar leaves something to be desired—that perhaps the summer recess in July and August should be looked at with the idea in mind of rotating vacations, thereby serving Canadians better in the administration of justice.

There are other areas—

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): How about air conditioning in the courts?

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): The hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) has quite properly pointed out that Ontario courts in many cases are not air conditioned. Naturally, the administration of justice is the responsibility of the Conservative provincial government, and I will be pleased to make representations to that government on behalf of the hon. member. We must also look at the areas of discipline and of continuing education for our federal judiciary. We welcome the establishment of the Canadian Judicial Council in 1971. However, it is argued that there should be some public involvement in the discipline and the continuing education process of our federal judiciary. It is not good enough to have a system whereby judges judge other judges, though that indeed is the system as it now stands.

There are flaws in that system, and I need only point to the example of a recent case involving a distinguished member of the judiciary of the province of British Columbia. Certain allegations were made against that member of the judiciary and, frankly, an investigation should have been carried out. It is not enough to say that because the member of the judiciary resigned from the bench, there was no mechanism whatesoever at that point for reviewing his conduct. Surely, if in the eyes of the public there is to be confidence in our federal judiciary, there must be some way of reviewing the conduct of members of the judiciary in those very rare instances in which there are suggestions of impropriety. It should not be good enough for members of the judiciary simply to resign, thereby effectively cutting off all scrutiny.

It was noted with some interest—and I must say this because I believe it is relevant—that the judge in question had sat and, indeed, delivered judgment in a case in which the whole area of prostitution was front and centre. The issue in the case in which this particular individual rendered judgment was whether or not a customer of a prostitute could be charged under the Criminal Code. Surely, in view of the allegations against that particular member of the judiciary, there should have been a full and complete investigation.

Of course, we have a fine judiciary in this country. We have come a long way from the days when, as was suggested in one Ontario appeal court, all that was necessary was for counsel to appear before the court of appeal and to indicate that he was appealing from the judgment of Mr. Justice "X" for the court of appeal to say, "Thank you very much, Mr. Solicitor; do you have any other grounds for your appeal?" And he would get no further. Fortunately, these days are in the past.

With that brief introduction, I would like to turn now to some of the specific clauses of Bill C-34. One of the three major areas covered is provision for some 20 additional judges throughout the country. The other two provide for substantial salary increases for the federal judiciary and changes to the pension provisions. I will not comment on the provisions for an increased number of judges throughout this country, except to say that I believe it was Tommy Douglas who welcomed similar provisions in 1975 by saying that "at least with the appointment of these additional judges, there will not be as many lawyers in Canada!" I say that as a lawyer and intending no disrespect to my fellow lawyers.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): You intended no humour, either!

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): Certainly, we have no objection to this reasonable response to the concerns of provincial attorneys general that there should be additional judges in their jurisdictions. However, in the area of appointments there are a number of aspects which could be raised. We have serious concern about the rather incestuous nature of the present consultation process with the Canadian Bar Association through a special committee which consults with the minister of justice. A member of that committee, of all men, may pick up the phone and, often on the basis of hearsay evidence, make a recommendation to the minister of justice. Surely, that should not be the only vetting process for the federal judiciary, that this kind of hear-say evidence can be accepted.

We suggest that the process be broadened—that some type of independent commission be statutorily entrenched to ensure that the sweeping powers of the minister of justice in appointing judges are exercised carefully. For example, such a statute could specify that an adequate number of women be appointed to the federal judiciary. If there is one area which stands out above all others in the area of appointments, it is the abject failure of governments, both Conservative and Liberal, to appoint women as members of the federal judiciary. Not one woman has been appointed a judge by the Conservative party since confederation, although the Conservative party had an opportunity to do so in the last Parliament. No women judges have been appointed by that party in its entire history. At the moment there are 20 women who sit as federal judges. In Canada's history, 21 women have been appointed to the federal bench and 20 of the 21 women still sit on the federal bench.

• (2040)

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): How many did the NDP appoint?

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): We know that the NDP appointments are coming soon.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): The excuse has been there were not enough women in the legal profession, but that is no longer the case. The number of women practising law and distinguishing themselves in that practice is now much greater. I challenge the Minister of Justice to give this House a commitment that the next Supreme Court of Canada justice he appoints will be a woman. Surely that is not an unreasonable request to make. I note that the newly elected President of the United States has made a similar promise. However, I must say there are some of us on this side of the House who are sending vitamin pills to members of the United States Supreme Court, urging them to maintain their health, at least for the next four years. Surely it is incumbent and long overdue for this Minister of Justice to make a clear commitment that the next Supreme Court of Canada justice to be appointed by him will be a woman, and that he will appoint more women to the federal judiciary.

In the past we have seen too many examples of political patronage as the basis for appointments. There have been some recent examples, but I will not dwell on those.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Go ahead.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): I know that all members of this House hope that this will be a thing of the past.

The hon. member for Nepean-Carleton has suggested that I go ahead. I will not, for example, give the example of the Supreme Court of Canada justice who was appointed by the Conservative party and who just happened to be a Conservative candidate in the province of Quebec. I will not give the example of a former Liberal member of Parliament who was appointed to the federal court bench in 1978 to make way for the present hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Mackasey), who, unfortunately, ran third that year. I do not have to give the example of the hon. member from Nova Scotia who was appointed to the provincial court bench because a deal was made. He said quite openly that a deal was made between himself and the Liberal government of the day because he was not appointed Speaker of this House. I do not have to give specific examples.

An hon. Member: Are they good judges?

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): The minister responsible for amateur sport will know of the example about which I am talking. Political patronage should play no part in the appointment of judges in this country. Hopefully those days have come and gone.

I would like to turn to the question of salaries.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. This matter involves an official of this House who served it very well. He was appointed to the bench, not by the federal government, but by the provincial government of Nova Scotia. For the hon. member to impute motives of wheeling and dealing is inappropriate. I think the hon. member should refrain from casting doubt on people who have served this House and have served as judges honourably in the last few years.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I must quote from the letter sent by a former member from the province of Nova Scotia. He said, referring to the Liberal government:

> The government, however, felt an obligation to me, and I understand tried to carry it out then with a judicial appointment. Mr. Stanfield felt, and I agreed, that I should serve at least a part of my term. Time, one might say, marched on. I am now advised that the provincial government—

I believe that was the provincial government headed by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Regan). The letter continues:

> —will authorize my appointment as a provincial judge, which carries out the understanding reached in 1974. I have decided to accept the same since, essentially, that has been my position since 1974.

Mr. Lynch, wrote the column in which the letter appeared. He asked:

> If we were permitted to question the learned judge, we would ask: What 'understanding'? What 'position'? What 'principle'?

There is no question but that it was a deal. As I have said, hopefully those days are past.

Mr. Regan: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I was premier of the province of Nova Scotia as the time the Conservative member Robert McCleave, a very able and respected member, was appointed a provincial judge in Nova Scotia. I do not know how the NDP runs a government, but the cabinet of the government of Nova Scotia at that time decided on the appointment of Mr. McCleave based upon his abilities and the respect which the people of Nova Scotia had for him. His appointment was not based on any federal government considerations.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It appears that we are entering into a debate, and I invite hon. members to respond in the normal way.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I listened quietly to what the hon. member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson) said. What he said is most unfair and wrong. He was wrong, as has been pointed out by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Regan), at least with respect to His Honour Judge McCleave. When Judge McCleave was a member here he was appointed Deputy Speaker of this House of Commons by a party which does not bear the label that Judge McCleave wore when he was fortunate enough to be among those who could defend themselves in this House.

Second, I think this is a place of free debate, but it is a free debate with some discretion.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. With all due respect to the hon. members who have spoken, this may be difficult to accept as ordered. It appears there is a very substantial difference of opinion. I would hope hon. members in the course of debate would respond, but the hon. member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson) does have the floor. He will, of course, take responsibility for his own remarks.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I see that my time is drawing to a close. I want to refer to two other aspects of this bill which give us serious concern. I will deal with the first briefly. It concerns the question of proposed salaries for judges.

Naturally we recognize that Parliament has the responsibility to set salaries which are fair and just. They must reflect the seriousness with which we take the federal judiciary and we must recognize also that often there is a considerable financial sacrifice involved in accepting an appointment to the federal bench. However, our party will be elaborating on this point in committee. But the proposed salary increases go far beyond those recommended even by the independent Dorfman commission and the Canadian Bar Association itself. We should be looking at narrowing the income gap not widening it. While recognizing the importance of a fairly and adequately paid judiciary, we will be expressing concern in committee about the levels of the proposed increases.

Next is the question of the proposed pension provisions under this bill. They are nothing short of scandalous. The Minister of Justice came before us in the fall of 1975 and said then, as President of the Privy Council, that it was time members of the federal judiciary at least contributed to their own pensions. He brought in a bill requiring that contributions be made by the federal judiciary to their pensions. That bill was effective December 20, 1975. The same minister now comes before the House and suggests that contributions should no longer be made by the federal judiciary to their pension plan but that we should refund with interest all of the contributions made so far. Surely that is an unacceptable provision. Surely members of the federal judiciary have the same responsibilities of citizenship as do all other Canadians. They pay taxes. It is not unreasonable to ask the federal judiciary to contribute to their pension plan in the same way as other Canadian citizens do, and as members of Parliament do.

We urge the government to reconsider this particular clause of the bill, a provision not even asked for by the Canadian Bar Association.

● (2050)

I conclude by saying once again that we recognize the importance of an independent judiciary as being the cornerstone of the Canadian judicial system. We recognize the importance of the rule of law, the strength and vitality of the Canadian federal judiciary. We hope that after examination in committee we will ultimately come up with a better bill, a bill of which all members of this House, all members of the judiciary and the legal profession can indeed be proud.

Mr. MacKay: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member's time has expired. The question may be accepted only with unanimous consent. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. MacKay: Mr. Speaker, I came into the House as the hon. member was speaking. I want to say in passing that I commend him on some of his remarks with regard to sentencing and so on. However, there is one remark that I wonder if he researched. I understood him to refer to the "late" Clarence Campbell. I wonder if he is aware of what he said. As far as I know, Clarence Campbell is still alive.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): That is more than you say about the member.

Mr. MacKay: While I am not one of his greatest fans, keeping in mind the way he treated Don Gallinger, Billy Taylor, Maurice Richard and his former friend and partner Andy Anton, I would like to think he is still around in order to continue some of the judicial proceedings in which he is embroiled. I wonder if the hon. member can tell me whether Clarence Campbell has really expired.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I do believe that my reports of his death are greatly exaggerated.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I would have hoped the hon. member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson) would have concentrated on this bill, which contains many provisions, rather than engaging the House in what I, as a lawyer with some 30 years standing, can only characterize as gutter-depth denigration of the legal profession. He reminds me of one of those who always walks along and at intersections looks for horse dung, cigarette butts and chewing gum wrappers. That is about the level of what is found there.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Surely there are some standards in this House with respect to the kind of language which can be used against hon. members. I would hope that those standards would be adhered to.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Chair is paying careful attention as to parliamentary and unparliamentary remarks and has detected nothing so far that can be considered unparliamentary.

Mr. Lambert: The hon. member will learn. This bill is much more important than the government seems to imply when it asks this House to accept it and possibly to consider all of the implications. I am not concerned about what the judiciary is going to do with regard to a new constitution. That is a lot of tripe in this debate, but very important in another debate.

What we have to consider here is a proposal to increase the number of judges in certain provinces and to note that some of the provinces have moved away from a district and superior court level. New Brunswick and Alberta have merged the courts in their provinces and Saskatchewan is about to do the same. There is a proposal to increase the salaries of judges at all levels. I want to take hon. members through those implications because not only do they tie in at the level of federally appointed judges, but many provincial departments of justice and solicitors general have more or less tied the salary scales of provincial judges to the federal scale.

We then come to the pension provisions which were referred to by the previous speaker and the hon. member for Saskatoon West (Mr. Hnatyshyn). I had hoped the hon. member for Burnaby would have spent more time looking at the practical effects of salary increases and used a little of the basic mathematics to which he might have been exposed during his educational career. He would have realized just what salary levels are projected in this bill.

I also want to talk about non-contributory pensions. I wish the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) were in his place at this moment. I recall the many remonstrations I made to him prior to 1975 to have judicial pensions made contributory. In 1975 I had hoped this was being done in the spirit that henceforth all members of the judiciary, regardless of when appointed, would make suitable pensions contributions as provided for in the bill. But that was not the case. The "weasel" interpretation was made that judges appointed after February 15, 1975, would be asked to contribute the standard 6 per cent of their salary toward a pension scheme. All others would continue at their non-contributory basic level. All they paid was a margin to take into account future indexing. I will deal with that in a little while.

I invite hon. members to read Bill C-34. They will see at what levels of salary they are and where the judges are to be. I want to read from the Parliamentary Newsletter of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association of October 23, 1980. Hon. members will see how this is handled in the United States. I quote:

> U.S. Senators voted by 78 to 13 to reject the planned 9.1 per cent pay increase to top civil servants on grounds of economy. It was reported, however, that the real reason for the decision was that Congressmen were determined that senior officials and judges should not earn more than they earn. The Senate majority leader, Mr. Robert Byrd, gave this reason frankly. The basic salaries of Congressmen are currently frozen at $68,662 a year.

That is where they are. Hon. members in this House are paid in the $30,000 range, with an expense allowance. When I came to this House in 1957, my salary was at the level of a district court judge. Today that individual is paid $50,000. It is proposed to pay him an additional $15,000 effective April 1, 1980. In other words, from the $30,000 that a member of Parliament earns, the spread to a county court judge is $65,000. It beggars description and cries out for some investigation as to how this spread has arisen. One of the important elements highlighted by this particular bill is the haphazard way in which senior salaries are fixed. There is a statute, the Senate and House of Commons Act, which sets the salary levels for members of Parliament, ministers of the Crown and members of the other House. There are the order in council people appointed at the behest of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). They are guided by certain recommendations presumably from an independent advisory body, but that does not necessarily apply. There have been some glaring examples of omissions and capricious changes as a result of Privy Council appointments and payments. Then there are, from the same advisory body, salaries at the senior executive level in the public service. We know, for instance, that under the top Privy Council appointment the limit for a DM-3 or possibly a DM-4 is in the $88,000 a year range. There may be one, two or three such individuals in the Public Service of Canada. That is considerably more than the Prime Minister of the country is paid. That in itself is an unacceptable anomaly. Regardless of the personality of the Prime Minister, the position is such that it is the prime position and that is where the prime salary should be. Then we have a series of fixed salaries in Crown corporations which compete partially with industry—and I must say they are poor competitors. For instance, there are the banks, insurance companies and trust companies. See what we pay to the governor of the Bank of Canada who is supposed to be the first, above all bankers.

An hon. Member: Does he get to take home samples?

Mr. Lambert: He is paid only maybe a third or a quarter of what some other heads of banks are paid. The Federal Business Development Bank president is way underpaid which affects the salary scale all the way down into mid-management. That corporation spends its time training credit officers who are then siphoned off into various parts of industry which pay better. Frankly, it is not fair. Then we have the judges, whose salaries are fixed by statute. This statute is a limper as to time. The situation is most unfair to the judges who depend upon the hazards of the parliamentary calendar to have their salaries adjusted. In this particular bill two annual increases are included, but they are all going to fall in with the other increases in one year. As a matter of fact, at the present rate of progress it could be that both of them will fall into the year 1981 with the other increases. So, the judges will be hit just that much harder, possibly on income tax, although at their level most judges at their marginal rate would be at the top 47 per cent on a good portion of their salaries.

Dealing with, shall we say, the middle court, I will read salaries now provided. The current salaries in effect since April 1, 1978, are as follows: in the Supreme Court of Canada, the Chief Justice, $72,000; puisne judges, $67,000 each; in the Federal Court of Canada, the chief justice and the associate chief justice, $62,000 each. These are basic salaries. There are some adjustments and representational increments of up to about $3,000 for various positions. Other judges in the federal court, $57,000. In the superior courts of a province, the chief justice and associate chief justice, $62,000; other judges, $57,000. The judges of the Supreme Court of the Yukon Territories and the Supreme Court of the Northwest Territories, $57,000 each. The last level of federally appointed judges, the chief judge and the associate chief judge of the county and district courts, $55,000, and other judges, $50,000.

This bill proposes to increase the salaries for the years 1979 and 1980. The Chief Justice of Canada will receive an increase of $8,000 a year for a total of $16,000 bringing him to a level of $88,000 on the passage of this bill. The puisne judges will get a total of $81,000 because their present levels are $67,000 and they will get total increases of $14,000. The salary of the chief justice of the federal court will go to $76,000 and those of the other judges will rise from $57,000 to $70,000, such as the superior court judges in all of the provinces. The salaries of district court judges will rise to $50,000 plus $15,000. In other words, they will go to $65,000. I have made a tabular list but unfortunately, as I immediately noticed, I made one mechanical error in the Supreme Court calculation: I am short by about $13,000, but I might point out that an appointment of 15 years is the minimum required for a vesting of pension.

In this act the wording is "shall", the governor in council shall grant a pension to a member of the judiciary after 15 years of service. If hon. members turn to clause 16 of the bill, they will read the conditions under which a judge, having reached age 65 with 15 years of service, may retire. There are other provisions and then a condition whereby a judge, having reached retirement age after ten years of service, may get a full pension. Then there are proportional pensions.

I will not say that I am a mathematical genius, but on the basis of my calculations—and it may be that I am slightly out—some of my friends appointed to the Court of Queen's Bench division in the province of Alberta will receive salaries as of this year of $70,000. There is a formula in the bill which says that salaries of judges shall be increased annually by the lesser of 7 per cent or the average of industrial wage increases in the country. That is the formula which is applied to the salaries of members of Parliament. The only difference is that members of Parliament started on a base of $24,000, whereas judges of the Court of Queen's Bench start on the formula at $70,000. Let me assure hon. members that the results are dramatic. At the end of ten years, in 1990, the judge who is appointed this year will be drawing down $138,923 per annum. In 1995 when he will have completed his 15 years so as to draw a pension, his salary will be $194,844. Those poor men and women!

Pension entitlement shall be two-thirds of salary on retirement, and two-thirds of $194,844, comes to the small and measly sum of $129,950 retirement pension in 1995, and in some cases it will be 1990.

That is for those men and women being appointed today who will serve their time. That is for the Court of Queen's Bench division, which is the middle range of court levels.

I now refer to Supreme Court justices. Their finishing salaries will be somewhere around $215,000 in 1995. According to my figures, in ten years the salary increase under this formula of 7 per cent compounded without any of the rest provided for in the bill—because there is a sweetener in the bill which does not apply in the case of anyone else—is 198.4 per cent, and in 15 years it is a mere 278 per cent.

I wish the Minister of Justice or his parliamentary secretary were here to defend those figures. Judges have to be paid well, but outside, possibly, of some of the senior positions in the country such as chief justices and Supreme Court of Canada justices many judicial offices are filled by men who sought them because they cannot—and refuse to—put up with the hassle of private practice. I know many of my contemporaries and men who are perhaps ten years younger than I are going to provincial solicitors general and asking to be appointed provincial court judges. They are senior partners in good and medium-range law firms.

They are men who earn $75,000 or $80,000 per year without the bat of an eye, but they will not put up with constant hassles with junior partners who want to become millionaires or aspiring millionaires in the first five years of practice, who want to cut corners and who are not prepared to abide by the standards which have developed in the practice of law after years of experience. Many of these men in my home province have told me that that is why they want to seek the peace and honour of the bench.

If I am to be a county court judge, I start out this year at $65,000, and with the indexing formula of 7 per cent—even if it is not reviewed by commissions every three years to be upgraded in order to meet increases in the cost of living, which does not apply in the case of members of Parliament—in ten years' time I shall be earning $128,900. True enough, we do not know what the value of the dollar will be at that time but, by God, where are the rest of the people going to be? The government has laid down this yardstick for the future. This is where this bill is important: It is a yardstick for salaries of senior public servants because, if we look further at the bill, we see that the Auditor General is tied into this particular salary schedule with the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Canada.

The salary of the Commissioner of Official Languages is tied into this bill as is the salary of the Chief Electoral Officer. In committee I will find out—and I hope hon. members will help me find out—about their pensions. Will theirs be non-contributory as well?

I come now to the last indecency in this bill. It is proposed that all contributions made by judges since 1975 shall be reimbursed, and any contributions made by any judges who since 1975 have died shall be repaid to their estates. That is only fair if we accept the principle of repayment, but on this question of contribution or non-contribution with respect to pensions, judges are the only ones in the public service whose pension schemes were non-contributory. This was brought in in 1975, effective February 15, as I have said before, but why was contribution not applied to all judges then occupying their positions? Certainly in the fluxion of time there would have been some windfall gains for a few of them, just as we accepted windfall gains when we created the Canada Pension Plan. A number of people did not contribute the nine years as required for full contributions, but if my memory serves me correctly, any person having reached the age of 64 at the time of the act's coming into effect, or something akin to that, would after five years be entitled to full benefits. So there was a windfall gain—a small one.

We accept that because no scheme can provide that all persons shall pay the same amount and receive the same benefits. That is what should have happened in the case of the Judges Act. Now they have come around, I am told, and have convinced the bureaucrats, who have convinced the Minister of Justice, that they should not pay. That is wrong. Some are paying in and some are not. Every last one of them should pay in, and we will find out on an actuarial basis just what the equivalent of that non-contributory pension is. I have made statements before and I make statements—

• (2120)

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I wonder whether the hon. member would permit a brief question on the subject?

Mr. Lambert: Yes, a question, not a statement.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): The hon. member has referred, I think quite properly, to the scandalous situation of non-contributory pension plans and the refunds of the contributions proposed in the bill before us. I wonder if the hon. member would explain then why it is that the previous minister of justice in the Conservative government proposed exactly that in a letter dated December 20, 1979, to members of the federal judiciary. Why is it that the hon. member's own government proposed exactly the same scheme as that to which he now objects so bitterly?

Mr. Lambert: Well, Mr. Speaker, to justify the hon. member, who is a great nit-picker, and also the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell)—those swashbuckling legal twins from Vancouver—I will say that that letter was written per incuriam by the members of this caucus. I will say it quite flatly: I have opposed this matter from the beginning, and I am opposing it now—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lambert: —because I want to ask hon. members too, in case they have not done their homework, how much does anyone consider should be paid to an honourable judge in the Queen's Bench Commission who concludes his career on a salary of $194,844, plus or minus several hundreds of dollars, to yield to him a pension of $129,000 per annum after 15 years' purchase with a 50 per cent survival benefit of $65,000 for his widow or, in the event that the judge is a woman, for her male survivor? I have made statements in the House and I do not think I am far wrong, that in order to achieve that same pension level, a judge would have to be paid $194,000 in his final year and he would be paid 100 per cent more on his scale of salary to yield to him tax-paid dollars which would buy that 15-year purchase annuities contract. Remember this: income tax is at 47 per cent. If anyone should think that it will be easy to buy a contract yielding $129,000 per annum to be indexed on the basis of the scales provided in this act with that escalating formula, he has another think coming. I have asked actuaries about the situation and they have thrown up their hands and said the conditions are too variable. True enough, a man may serve 30 years and therefore the benefits for pension purposes are much less per annum because he can purchase a longer contract.

This bill provides a mare's nest of problems. It points up the illogicality of the ad hoc system we have of setting salaries of senior public servants in this country. I am not denying that a competent judge is not worth $70,000 a year or, in the case of the Chief Justice of Canada or the puisne judges of the Supreme Court, that they are worth their salary, but I will deny most vehemently, that members of Parliament, many of whom are the intellectual and other equals of these judges, members who work a lot longer hours and have no security of tenure, are overpaid. I say they are paid a relative pittance. I am one of them, but I have had almost 25 years here. There are few of us here who can speak out like this. It is a crying shame and there is a scrambling of values that is quite wrong. I can go into various areas and pick up some more inconsistencies.

This brings me to my last point because, having diagnosed an ill, I want to prescribe a remedy. I have brought this forward before, in an adjournment debate in July, and I have set down a private member's motion to this effect; I hope it will get a chance to be debated.

As sure as God made little apples, I will go after this in committee and I will ensure that the Minister of Justice explains this non-contributory pension scheme and the figures I have given as a result of the escalation clause. One has to say, "Just a minute, how silly can we be!" I want to propose to hon. members that we consider the practice followed by our Australian friends. Remember, we do not have a blueprint here on the best possible procedures in Parliament. We think we have some pretty good things around here, but on this one we have to take a seat way back, not the rumble seat but a seat somewhere in the fifth vehicle in tow behind our Australian friends. They have a remuneration review tribunal provided for in an act which came into effect in either 1972 or 1973. I commend it to members of the House for its fairness. A commission of three people is set up, independent of government, before whom the government is only an interested party. The rules say the chairman shall be a legal person but not a judge appointed by the federal government. He or she shall be a state-appointed judicial officer, and the other two persons shall be also divorced from government service. No former member of Parliament or senator can be a member of the commission, except after seven years of continuous absence from elected office. Once a year the commission announces publicly that it will hear representations with regard to the salaries from the prime minister down through all the ministry, members of the house of representatives in Australia, the senate, senior public servants, heads of governments board and agencies, and the judiciary. If the government wants to put brakes on salary increases, it appears before the board or the tribunal. In any event, within a fixed time the tribunal must make its report—I think it is within 15 days, but perhaps it is within 30 days of the report having been tabled in Parliament. Unless 50 per cent of the members of the house shall have signed a motion rejecting the report, the report becomes effective.

That is the type of fairness which must be present in every city in every province. Many members of the House have sat on municipal bodies and have had their skins flailed by editorial comments concerning the pay scales of city aldermen and mayors; they have withstood a lot of abuse. The same applies at the provincial level to a lesser degree, but the favourite kicking boys in newspaper columns and other areas are federal members of Parliament. These self-same commentators do not look at their empire-building reports which are filed and before which they all kneel down and prostrate themselves in worship. All these reports do is pile on the agony with more controllers at higher levels of pay. It just packs together the bureaucracy. That is why we have expensive inefficient government in Canada, and that is why we have government controlled by bureaucrats rather than being controlled by Parliament. I say with great regret but with great advisement that is the situation we face in Canada.

I do not like this bill. It is not because of the increases in the salaries of judges or their general salary level, but I do not want to see a formula which will take off like a rocket within the next 15 years, nor a pension scheme such as the one proposed. If members opposite think that they can sell it to the public, let them try. I think judges should be paid well and that they should enjoy a comfortable pension on retirement, but we should not provide a financial trough which makes the English Channel look like a mere brook. Unfortunately in my view that is what this formula will provide.

I am glad to see the bill because I think it is one more reason why the government and the House must move toward a sensible remuneration review tribunal which is independent of government and independent of the influence of individual members and sectors of the public service. We are all working hard for the country, but by God, we are not paid the same way.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, I should like to speak against the contribution aspect of the pension plan and in favour of part of the proposed salary increases. But before doing so, let me suggest that this debate shows what an absolute farce Parliament has become. The Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development (Mr. Chrétien) who is on his way out of the chamber—

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I am not leaving the chamber. I am in my place. Surely I am allowed to stand.

Mr. Kilgour: Mr. Speaker, does the Minister of Justice or I have the floor?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Frankly I have some difficulty being sure. If I do not see the hon. minister rising to his feet again, I will continue to recognize the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Kilgour).

Mr. Kilgour: There are virtually a million unemployed Canadians, inflation is running at more than 10 per cent per year, two-thirds of the persons over age 65 in Canada have incomes of less than $5,000, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is going through a checklist on how to disunite the country, most particularly in the west, and what are we doing?

We are discussing whether or not we should increase the salaries of judges. I should like to give a few figures. The present salary of the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Canada is $72,000. Now we must add $8,000 and another $7,000.

Mr. Evans: And what is the total?

Mr. Kilgour: It will increase his salary from $72,000 to $80,000—

Mr. Chrétien: How many oilmen in the province of Alberta make more money than the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Canada?

Mr. Kilgour: We are also discussing increasing the $55,000 per year salaries of county court judges by $8,000 and $7,500.

Mr. Chrétien: You are irresponsible.

Mr. Kilgour: The Minister of Justice is heckling from his seat as usual. He knows that if the people of Canada could listen to this sort of nonsense, they would vote each and every one of the members of this Parliament out of office in the next election; they would know how we are using the public time at this point.

Mr. Kaplan: Then why are you holding up the debate?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I rise on another point of order. Let me state very clearly that the proposition in front of the House was presented to judges in a letter of the former minister of justice, Mr. Flynn.

Mr. Lawrence: But it was not approved by government.

Mr. Chrétien: It was sent at the beginning of the year and with the approval of cabinet. When I hear an hon. member from a province in which there are people with $100 million in the bank making a fuss, because we want to give decent salaries to the very good judiciary of Canada, and making derogatory reference to the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Canada, I think it is clear demagogy and acute irresponsibility on the part of members like the one who is on his feet right now.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Kilgour: I should like to inform the Minister of Justice that when my ancestor was the chief justice of the province of Manitoba in 1938, he was earning a salary of $5,000 a year and he had to stay on in that role because there was no pension at all. To make a statement indicating that there is someone in Alberta with $100 million in the bank is so much an argument ad hominem that I do not know how to grapple with it. I have maintained since I came here that anyone in the House who has taken a course in logic is under a great disadvantage, and the Minister of Justice continues to reinforce that opinion.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Kilgour: I see that my time is running out—

Mr. Chrétien: You are filibustering.

Mr. Kilgour: I should like to deal with one aspect of the bill at this time, the question of the pensions of judges as compared to those of public servants. Public servants contribute 6.4 per cent of their salaries to pension plans, with the federal government paying 9.5 per cent. Under the provisions of this bill, judges will pay 1 per cent of their salaries, and these contributions are only paper indexing. How in the name of anything that makes any sense do judges get such special treatment? Of course there is no answer; we will discuss it in committee.

Turning to the area of retirement benefits, a judge can obtain a two-thirds pension after as little as ten years of service. Public servants receive pensions of 70 per cent of their average salary over the last six years of employment after 35 years. To obtain a two-thirds pension, they would be required to work approximately 33 years. Both pensions are indexed to the rate of inflation, and there is no fund for the pensions of judges. It is creating a new class of people, those who are judges. Judges do not have to pay in anything like what they take out because they are considered by our so-called democrats on the opposite side of the House to be special people who should not have to do what everybody else must do.

I see my time is quickly running out. I would like to deal with a couple of other aspects with respect to judges' pensions. To obtain a two-thirds pension a judge need serve only 15 years, or in some instances, ten years. As I just mentioned, public servants, members of the armed forces or members of the RCMP would have to serve 33 years to receive a two-thirds pension. In other words, a judge is something special. A poor mounted policeman who goes out and risks his life 24 hours a day must work 33 years to get the same benefits—

Mr. Chrétien: A fallacy!

Mr. Kilgour: It happens to be the truth. I dare say it is important to appreciate the difference. As I mentioned, judges contributed 1 per cent for their indexation—

Mr. Chrétien: Following the lead of Jacques Flynn.

Mr. Kilgour: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the Minister of Justice has been lobbied by the lawyers of the Canadian Bar Association. Two-thirds of the people in this House read the National, which comes out once a month, and which has a new article every time saying that the poor judges are underpaid.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member is aware that this very important bill has been awaited for some time by the federal judiciary. I wonder if he is prepared to draw his remarks to a close very quickly in order that this matter might be studied in committee rather than needlessly prolonging the debate on this important bill.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Kilgour: The hon. member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson) has, I believe, been a practising member of the Bar for a total of only ten months. Is that not right?

An hon. Member: So what?

Mr. Kilgour: I appreciate the cost of living in British Columbia is quite high. Since I have the undivided attention of members opposite—

Mr. Chrétien: You would honour yourself by sitting down!

Mr. Waddell: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. member would permit a question.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): When he has finished his speech.

Mr. Kilgour: I know the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell) is anxious to hear about the Casgrain report.

That report made the following recommendations:

1. Judges' salaries should be fixed by the governor in council after consultation with an advisory committee constituted for that purpose.

2. While awaiting the establishment of the advisory committee the Judges' Act should be amended to provide for an increase of at least $5,000 in each of the years 1979 and 1980.

3. The $3,000 allowance paid to judges since June 1, 1971, should be converted to a non-taxable allowance.

4. Pension contributions should be virtually eliminated and the discrimination between payments made by "old" and "new" judges should be eliminated retroactively.

5. The gap between salaries of Superior Court judges and those of district and county courts should be eliminated progressively.

I quite agree with that last point. I will now deal with the Dorfman report which recommended:

1. Salary increases of $3,500 to be effective April 1, 1979, and same amount on April 1, 1980.

2. A non-taxable allowance of $1,000 for expenditures on textbooks, law reports, court office.

I would again remind the hon. Minister of Justice that to my knowledge there is not one judge's library in any of the four provinces in which I have practised law which is not perfectly adequately shelved with books.

The Dorfman report also made these recommendations:

3. That the Judges' Act be amended effective February 17, 1975, to require contributions to supplementary benefits retirement only (1 per cent of salary).

4. Gradual reduction of differential between salaries of Superior Court judges and called for special allowance for judges of Supreme Court of Yukon and N.W.T.

5. Recognized the need for a more flexible procedure to fix judges' salaries.

Mr. Speaker, are you ruling that it is now 9.45?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Yes.

Mr. Kilgour: Then may I claim the floor next time?

Mr. Chrétien: Shame on you!

POINT OF ORDER

TABLING OF DOCUMENTS—INCLUSION AS APPENDIX TO "HANSARD"

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): As hon. members are aware it is now appropriate to call for the deferred division. First, though, I would request the kindly co-operation of hon. members in the House in assisting me to clear up a technical and procedural problem. If I may have a moment of your time I will explain it. With the unanimous consent of hon. members it can then be disposed of.

Standing Order 41(1) and (2) provides that only a minister or parliamentary secretary may table documents with respect to the department for which they are responsible. Earlier in the day, before private members' hour, arrangements were made through the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Collenette), the House leader for the Conservative party, as well as the House leader for the New Democratic Party, to put through, in all remaining stages, bills S-13 and S-14. The arrangements provided for the tabling of certain documents related to those bills; they were to be tabled by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of State for Trade (Mr. Lachance) in due course, when they were available to him.

The difficulty, very simply, is that all the precedents of this House indicate that private members may not table documents. One could take the view that unanimous consent is adequate to overcome that problem. One could equally take the view that the Chair is responsible for upholding the precedents which have existed throughout the years. In order to avoid any confusion on that score, and in order to avoid creating difficulties for the future, perhaps the best way to proceed is to suggest that with the consent of those involved, including the already-given consent of the parliamentary secretary, rather than tabling the documents they would be appended to Hansard on the day on which the parliamenatry secretary is prepared to put these documents before the House.

If there is unanimous consent to this course, then we can proceed in that fashion and the procedural difficulty will be cleared up.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): There was an arrangement made and some of us would be surprised tonight to learn about that long list of precedents. There are some of us who feel the House of Commons is empowered to declare a man to be a woman and a woman to be a man. But I guess that is not so.

The anxiety of the member for York-Peel (Mr. Stevens) was that there be a public record with respect to the undertakings given by the parliamentary secretary. I suspect that publication in the manner suggested, that is, by way of appendix to Hansard, would be appropriate. I think that was also in the mind of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), although he is not present now. If that is agreeable to the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council we could agree on this now, leaving open the right of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre to disagree at some later time, if he wishes. I think he will be agreeable.

Mr. Collenette: Mr. Speaker, I wish to concur in the remarks just made by the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) and with what Your Honour has proposed. I did discuss this point with the hon. member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson), in the absence of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), and I understand that the New Democratic Party members will agree. This is just a housekeeping matter.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): It is so agreed. So that there may be no difficulty in misinterpretation, when the parliamentary secretary has the documents ready, the Chair will accept them and have them appended to Hansard.

PETROLEUM ADMINISTRATION ACT

PETITION TO REVOKE PROCLAMATION

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway) moved:

That the proclamation laid before the House on Wednesday, November 12, 1980, pursuant to subsection 52(3) of the Petroleum Administration Act, as proclaimed in PC 1980-2915, be revoked.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Pursuant to order made Friday, November 21, 1980, the House will now proceed to the taking of the deferred division on the motion (Mr. Waddell).

Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion (Mr. Waddell) which was negatived on the following division:

That the minister in charge of manpower and the minister in charge of DREE take immediate steps to have representatives of their departments meet with officials of the city and of the province to consider what steps may be taken to assist the city and the businesses affected by the fire.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Madam Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

CHEMICAL POLLUTION OF ONTARIO LAKES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom McMillan (Hillsborough): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Canadian scientists have revealed today that dioxin TCDD, one of the deadliest man-made chemicals in the world, has been found throughout Lake Ontario and in other lakes in Ontario from which millions of Canadians derive their drinking water and obtain fish. Dioxin is known to promote cancer and cause severe birth defects among humans. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Bruce-Grey (Mr. Gurbin):

That this House call upon the Minister of the Environment to make without delay a statement on motions in the House of Commons detailing what the government intends to do to deal with the crisis, since the minister's statement to the media today said little more than that he is having the matter investigated.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

POLAND—ABSTENTION BY NEIGHBOURING STATES FROM MILITARY OR PROVOCATIVE ACTIONS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, considering that Poland is an autonomous state which is currently undergoing severe internal tension, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill (Mr. Blaikie):

That this House strongly urges all other states in the region to refrain completely from military or other provocative actions which could be seen as intimidation by the people of Poland and which could break peaceful relations beyond the borders of Poland itself.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Madam Speaker, I rise pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43 to move a motion which I hope will receive the unanimous consent of the House. Whereas insulin was discovered by two distinguished and dedicated Canadians, Sir Frederick Banting and Dr. Charles Best, whereas this discovery and ongoing research into the treatment of diabetes have relieved suffering and saved the lives of millions of people around the world, and whereas the Worldwide Diabetic Information Service, which has its headquarters in Canada, is celebrating in 1981 the diamond jubilee year of the discovery of insulin, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Malone):

That this House express its gratitude to the Worldwide Diabetic Information Service for its outstanding contributions to humanity.

CN EXPRESS OFFICE CLOSURES—APPEAL BY WORKERS TO CTC—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to propose a motion of urgent and pressing necessity. In light of the statement on the weekend by the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Breau) to workers affected by proposed reductions in CN express service to the effect that they should appeal before the Canadian Transport Commission against the plan on the grounds that a needed service was being withdrawn, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Halifax West (Mr. Crosby):

That the Minister of Transport instruct the Canadian Transport Commission to hear such an appeal at the earliest opportunity and that he further instruct Canadian National to reinstate any service already withdrawn and suspend any further cutbacks until the Canadian Transport Commission renders a decision.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

GUARDIANSHIP FOR ORPHANS OF ITALIAN EARTHQUAKE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter which I feel is of urgent importance, and I hope that members of the House will share my concern. Many Canadian families have expressed concern for the children who have been rendered orphans as a result of the earthquake in Italy, and many families have indicated a willingness to provide shelter and care for those children. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Beaches (Mr. Young):

That the federal Minister of Employment and Immigration and the Minister of National Health and Welfare, in addition to programs already in place, move immediately to provide the opportunity for Canadian families to assume legal guardianship for children orphaned by the disastrous earthquake in Italy and that a representative of the federal government, in co-operation with any provincial jurisdiction that wishes to become involved, and with the Italian government, begin the process of offering these children an opportunity here in Canada.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

THE CONSTITUTION

PATRIATION—CALL FOR CONDEMNATION OF LEADER OF NEW DEMOCRATIC PARTY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Over the weekend it was reported that the leader of the NDP had stated in Vancouver that the leader of the Conservative party was against repatriation of our constitution. Given the fact that on October 22, 1980, the leader of our party introduced a motion calling for the immediate repatriation of the BNA Act so that all other constitutional changes be made in Canada by Canadians, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen):

That this House condemn the leader of the NDP for deliberately misleading those present at the B.C. labour convention and the Canadian public, and condemn him and his party for failing to vote for repatriation.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

IMMIGRATION

ITALIAN EARTHQUAKE VICTIMS—PROPOSED ESTABLISHMENT OF RECEPTION CENTRES IN CANADA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Gilchrist (Scarborough East): Madam Speaker, I too rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent, pressing and, I hope, compassionate necessity. In light of the statement last Wednesday by the Minister of Employment and Immigration that he had instructed our embassy in Rome to process immediately applications for immigrant status from people in the Italian provinces affected by the recent disastrous earthquake, and that his department is working with the Department of National Health and Welfare and the RCMP to waive requirements for the normal medical and security checks which can later be conducted in Canada, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Burlington (Mr. Kempling):

That, in addition to any special arrangements made in Italy, special reception centres be immediately established in Canada along the lines of those provided for the Vietnamese refugees last year where medical and administrative requirements can be conducted as thoroughly and as quickly as possible, so that these victims of disaster may start their new lives in Canada as soon as possible.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

FINANCE

INCREASES IN INTEREST RATES—EFFECT ON INDUSTRY AND SMALL BUSINESS

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Can the minister indicate to the House whether he has noted that corporate bond interest rates are now over 14 per cent compared to less than 12 per cent a year ago, that conventional mortgages are now nearly 16 per cent compared to about 13 per cent a year ago; and if he has noticed these rather sensational increases, would he indicate whether he feels this is the way to reinvigorate our industry and, in particular, help small businessmen in this country?

• (1415)

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, I have noted since the Bank of Canada adopted a floating rate system shortly after the government changed that for most of the period, or at least a substantial part of that period, interest rates were considerably below what they were when the Conservative government was in office.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Gray: I am sure the Minister of Finance is as interested as I in the comments of my hon. friend. We are watching the situation carefully.

Mr. Stevens: Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce who appears to feel that it is government policy to raise interest rates with, presumably, the intention of lowering them. As we have gone twice through the sequence of rising interest rates in the country, and since in a televised interview on February 10 the minister said he would resign from a government which could not reduce interest rates, would he indicate why he is hesitating to resign? He is in a government where rising interest rates have occurred twice, yet we see him still holding his post.

An hon. Member: He has no credibility.

Mr. Gray: Madam Speaker, interest rates in fact came down after the government changed, and I think that is a very positive development.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Gray: With respect to the other part of the hon. member's question, he should bear in mind that the budget presented by the Minister of Finance contains an extension of the life of the Small Business Development Bond. I hope he will continue to support this initiative, which is very important to small business in dealing with the interest rate situation.

Mr. Stevens: Madam Speaker, again my question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Has the minister noticed, as was published yesterday, that in the month of November auto, truck and steel output was down rather dramatically, in some cases as much as 20 per cent, compared to the previous year, urban completions were down approximately 20 per cent, and newsprint production was down? All of these things have occurred since the minister became Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Would he indicate to the House what has gone wrong? Why have they occurred since he became minister? In addition, of course, the dollar is down to the 83-cent range now compared to over 87 cents; or in case he missed that, is he simply agreeing with his predecessor, Mr. Horner, that even 83 cents is a long way from zero?

Mr. Gray: Madam Speaker, my immediate predecessor was Senator de Cotret. I know what happened when Canadians examined the work of the government of which he was a part, so I intend to follow a more constructive course of action.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gray: Also I have noticed that real output in manufacturing increased sharply in September of this year. This increase, compared with the previous period, is the second consecutive increase since July. I think it confirms that real output in manufacturing has bottomed out, and I think that is a very important and positive development. I have also noticed the record positive balance on trade, which certainly is a very great improvement over the situation when my hon. friend's government was in office.

DECREASE IN VALUE OF DOLLAR—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce who has now been minister for nine months. He has done nothing but jawbone; he has not delivered one thing in his nine months in office.

Mr. Trudeau: Order, order.

Mr. Crosbie: We now have a Canadian dollar below 84 cents American. A year ago, on October 30, the minister told the House of Commons Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs the following:

I don't think that allowing the dollar to have some downward adjustment would do as much harm to our economy as our present high level of interest rates.

The Bank of Canada rate then was 14 per cent; today it is 13.95 per cent or five one-hundredths lower; it has been up to 16.2 per cent under the minister's administration. Would the minister tell the House if it is the government's policy to carry out the minister's words, to have some more downward adjustment on the dollar, or does he consider that it would do more harm than the present high interest rates and that, therefore, interest rates should go higher? What is his choice now that he is in a position of responsibility and not just jawboning to the public?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, I am afraid the hon. member has overlooked a number of constructive achievements since the government changed. For example, he has overlooked the $3 billion industrial offset program connected with the new fighter aircraft contract, something which created some 6,000 jobs directly and some 20,000 to 24,000 jobs indirectly over the life of the contract. He has overlooked the implementation of the electronics development program. One of the grants from that program is creating 1,000 jobs in a company based in the Ottawa area. He has overlooked the special remission program with respect to the front-end loader industry, something that will create 1,200 jobs.

I could go on and give further examples, but I think the hon. member should concentrate on these positive achievements and not simply try to raise questions, as he has, that do not deal in a constructive way with the efforts we are making to strengthen the Canadian economy and provide more jobs for Canadian workers.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is for the "Terror of FIRA". I would like the minister to answer my question. Last fall he said that allowing the dollar to have some downward adjustment would not do as much harm to our economy as the present high level of interest rates. The level of interest rates right now is as high as, or higher than, when he made the statement last fall, but our international reserves are at their lowest level since February of 1970, down $210 million in November. Is the minister's policy now, or are his instructions to his colleague, the silent Minister of Finance, that the dollar should be allowed further downward adjustment, or is his advice that the economy would suffer less damage if interest rates go up? What is it to be? What is his advice now that he is in a position to decide—the "Terror of FIRA"?

Mr. Gray: Madam Speaker, if the hon. member was really serious, especially about being worried about the silence of the Minister of Finance, he would ask him that question since it is he who speaks for the government in this important area of policy.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

ENERGY

TAR SANDS PROJECTS—INQUIRY RESPECTING PLANS TO BENEFIT NATIVE PEOPLE

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. It concerns native matters and energy development. I think the minister is aware that there are many native people in the midst of the development of the tar sands. I have before me a letter from Mr. Eric Shirt, who is the treasurer of the Indian Association of Alberta. The letter is to Premier Lougheed and is dated June 25, 1980. The premier never responded to that letter. I will not go into the letter in great detail, but it is a litany of the fact that the native people in Alberta have not benefited from the economic boom there.

My question to the minister is this: What plans, if any, does the Government of Canada have with respect to dealing with the tar sands projects and with the government of Alberta over the tar sands projects to ensure that native people benefit from the great boom which will come about when those projects eventually get under way?

Mr. Malone: A bill of rights to kill affirmative action.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I had the opportunity yesterday to read the letter to which the hon. member has referred. It is a very sad letter indeed. It tells much about the fate of the Indians living on Alberta reservations at the present time.

Mr. Clark: Tell us about James Bay.

Mr. Lalonde: The Leader of the Opposition asks me to talk about James Bay. I remind him that the James Bay Indians have had a first-rate settlement with the Government of Canada and the government of Quebec, and they are happy with it.

Mr. Clark: They were abandoned by their government. Mr. Chrétien ran away from his responsibilities.

Mr. Lalonde: I regret that the Premier of Alberta does not appear to have answered that letter. I have raised this issue with my colleague in meetings we had during the course of the summer. I have had meetings with the Indian groups concerned also in the last few months. I expect to see them again this week to discuss this issue further while their representatives are in Ottawa.

It is difficult to know what exact arrangements will be possible. I have raised this matter with Imperial Oil, which is the main promoter of Cold Lake, and they have indicated they are willing to consider participation by the Indians in the project. Obviously it would require the full co-operation of the two governments in order to achieve this particular purpose.

● (1425)

I would remind my hon. friend that under the project put forward by Nova and Petro-Canada, Petro-Canada has indicated quite clearly that it is willing to set aside shares for Indians to participate in such a project, and we are fully behind this action.

Mr. Waddell: Madam Speaker, when one reads the letter with regard to what Mr. Shirt has said about Indian mortality being four times higher than the provincial average, native people in alcohol treatment institutions and the lack of economic development on the reserves, one begins to understand what the native people are talking about when they speak of aboriginal rights and what they mean to their future.

The House of Commons Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works visited the tar sands this summer and made a report to this House. I am surprised that the minister is not familiar with that report, which recommended in items five and six that the federal government "maximize native involvement in the tar sands and . . . the formation of a body involving native, government, corporate and labour interests". The committee further recommended that there be adequate native participation in the development of these resources.

The minister mentioned Petro-Canada and Nova, but there are other projects—the Alsands project, the Cold Lake project, the Imperial Oil project and so on. Will the minister tell this House whether or not he is in agreement with the unanimous recommendations of the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works?

Mr. Lalonde: I would be quite willing to try to set up such a committee, but obviously, once more, if the government of Alberta would not wish to co-operate, we would run into very serious difficulties and put in jeopardy the efficacy of such a committee. I am quite willing to look at the recommendations to which my hon. friend has referred. I hope that we will have the support of all other parties concerned in order to set up such a committee.

Mr. Waddell: Madam Speaker, a final supplementary. It is not good enough, in our view, to lay the blame on the provincial government or for the provincial government to lay the blame on the federal government. The minister gave $40 million to Imperial Oil, for which I called him the "$40 million Marc". Is the minister prepared to consider giving some money to the native people in the area of the tar sands with the same speed which he gave money to Imperial Oil, so that these people can prepare for future involvement in the tar sands projects?

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, I remind the hon. member that the money which has been advanced to Imperial Oil was in order to keep the project alive. If the project is not kept alive, the Indians would have nothing in which to participate even if they wished to. It is very important to put it into perspective and to realize that the first condition to any Indian participation is that the project proceed. And before that can happen, as my hon. friend knows, we need the co-operation of the government of Alberta. It is not a question of attributing blame; it is a question of making sure that all parties concerned will take the necessary steps to ensure that the project proceeds.

WESTERN DEVELOPMENT FUND

ASSISTANCE TO INDIAN ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Madam Speaker, I direct my supplementary question to the Minister of Employment and Immigration, who is responsible for the western development fund. Considering the deplorable economic and social conditions which prevail among Canadian Indians in the west, including Alberta, and the fact that those Alberta Indians do not benefit at all from the Alberta heritage fund, would the minister indicate whether any of the $4 billion in the western development fund which was announced in the budget will be allocated to assist Indian economic development in the west?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, as the hon. member knows, the development of that western initiative is being considered at the present time by cabinet. Once a series of options have been developed, we intend to have discussions with provincial government officials and different interest groups in western Canada. Economic development for native people in western Canada is being examined and, considering the tremendous wealth being generated from our resources, I personally think it would make good sense to recycle much of that revenue to help those people in western Canada who need help the most, namely, the native people.

INDUSTRY

INCENTIVES TO IMPROVE PRODUCTIVITY

Hon. George Hees (Northumberland): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. More than a month ago I asked the minister if he would give serious consideration to introducing productivity incentives, to be paid in direct proportion to increases in industrial productivity, as a means of correcting the very serious drop in productivity which has taken place in Canada this year, a drop from an average increase of 4 per cent to a decrease of 3 per cent. The minister said he would give this matter serious consideration. Would he now advise the House of the result of that consideration, and can we expect him to announce a program of industrial incentives to be introduced in the very near future?

• (1430)

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, we are continuing our work on this. As I said when I answered my hon. friend a few weeks ago, this matter is worthy of serious consideration. When we are ready to announce any decisions, my hon. friend will be among the first to know about them.

Mr. Hees: Madam Speaker, I am very glad to hear the minister is moving on this matter, but would he give serious consideration to moving quite a bit faster? Although he is making some move, I must advise him that the efficiency and effectiveness of his department is today still far below what it was in the golden era.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Is that the Glenn Miller era?

Mr. Gray: Madam Speaker, I am not sure whether my hon. friend is referring to the era when the member for Ottawa-Carleton was the minister. Certainly the concept which the hon. member has mentioned is worthy of serious study, and that is what we are doing.

RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT

INQUIRY RESPECTING PROPOSED DISBURSEMENT OF FUNDS

Mr. Gordon Gilchrist (Scarborough East): Madam Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Whenever we remind the government of the gross inadequacies of research spending these days, we are told by his colleague, the Minister of State for Science and Technology, about the Mitels, the Canadairs, the jets and all the other things being developed by government research spending, and I think that makes the case for us. The only problem is that enough is not being done in this field. Many times the minister has alluded to soon to be unveiled plans for research spending and for industrial growth in this country to build on the unique Canadian resource base. Would the minister stand in his place and tell us specifically what programs he has in mind now? We saw nothing about that in the budget. I would like to know exactly on what he will be spending research money. What specific projects will this entail, and what specific products will be generated?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, I hope to be in a position to make specific announcements in these areas before too many weeks pass. I hope my hon. friend has checked his desire for greater spending with the new industry critic. I do not want to have any further intraparty conflicts on this score, because I am happy to have his support for the kinds of initiatives he is talking about.

Mr. Gilchrist: Madam Speaker, the only difference is that we do not consider that to be spending; that is investing in legitimate job creation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gilchrist: And that is quite different from spending on unemployment insurance. In the light of the badly sagging economy, I would think the minister would be more attentive to that—

An hon. Member: Question.

Mr. Gilchrist: —and that after 14 years of government, he would have an industrial plan.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Paproski: Listen and you will get the question.

Mr. Gilchrist: What is the minister's long-range strategy on which business can build and plan its long-range strategies for job creation and wealth generation in Canada?

Mr. Lalonde: It must be their stimulative deficit.

Mr. Gray: Madam Speaker, we will be making specific program announcements in the coming weeks. Our basic approach is to strengthen innovation in the country, to strengthen our export capacity and to build up our own domestic manufacturing base. I hope, too, to have the support of my hon. friend in a serious way for our initiatives as we bring them forward.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

INVESTIGATION OF ACTIVITIES OF NOVA SCOTIA MINISTER

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. It concerns the transaction between the minister for economic development in Nova Scotia, Mr. Roland Thornhill, and a number of chartered banks, about which, I believe, the minister is aware. I have given the minister notice of this question.

An RCMP investigation was completed in September of this year. Can the minister tell us whether the Inspector General of Banks has seen the RCMP report? If so, has the Inspector General made a report to the minister as to the contents of it?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, with respect to the hon. member's question, I would advise him that earlier in the year I had an inquiry by letter from an interested citizen in Nova Scotia asking whether there had been any investigation into, or concern expressed regarding, transactions between the bank and the particular minister in the province of Nova Scotia. The Inspector General of Banks advised me that an investigation did take place respecting any impropriety which might have been committed in connection with the provisions of the Bank Act. In pursuit of his investigations, he had sought interviews with officials in the relevant banks and had concluded that, in so far as the Bank Act was concerned, he could not find any impropriety. He made no comment with respect to any other law or convention which may or may not have been affected by this particular investigation.

Mr. Rae: Madam Speaker, I am sure the minister would agree there is a very serious difference between conducting interviews and the kind of investigation carried out by the RCMP, or the kind of investigation which is called for under the terms of the supervision section both of the old Bank Act and the new Bank Act. I would point out to the minister that under the terms of the new Bank Act, which came into force yesterday, he has the power to order the Inspector General to carry out an investigation, and the Inspector General has all the powers of a commissioner under the Inquiries Act. With respect to these transactions, which, in our view, are extremely serious indeed, would the minister agree to order the Inspector General to carry out such an investigation under the terms of the Inquiries Act, and not simply be satisfied with a series of interviews with a number of people who may or may not have been involved?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, the Inspector General of Banks himself described his activities as an investigation. Following the conclusion of his investigation, he decided that there had been no impropriety. I have since discussed the matter with the Inspector General of Banks, and since events in the spring he has had no further reason to launch an investigation. The hon. member has indicated that there may have been a police investigation, but I am sure he would be the first to agree that that is not a matter into which the Inspector General of Banks should intrude himself.

AIRPORTS

INCREASE IN PASSENGER TRAFFIC AT MALTON, EDMONTON AND CALGARY

Mr. Robert Gourd (Argenteuil): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. In light of a report published yesterday by Michel Gratton of the newspaper Le Droit can the minister confirm that there has been an increase in passenger traffic at the Malton, Edmonton and Calgary airports? Can he also tell us what steps he intends to take to improve conditions at Mirabel, the largest airport in Canada, and make it profitable?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I imagine the hon. member refers to higher landing fees for small planes at the four main airports in Canada. If not, I would ask him to repeat his question—because I did not understand it very well.

Mr. Gourd: Madam Speaker, I did refer the minister to the increase of passenger traffic mentioned in the report written by Michel Gratton of Le Droit.

Mr. Pepin: Madam Speaker, that announcement was made in the budget laid down by the Minister of Finance. The announcement made yesterday was only an extension of that decision.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

STEPS TO CURTAIL USE OF DIOXIN TCDD CHEMICAL

Mr. Tom McMillan (Hillsborough): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of the Environment. As he knows, Canadian scientists have today confirmed that dioxin TCDD has been found throughout Lake Ontario and other lakes in Canada from which Canadians derive their drinking water and obtain their fish. Dioxin is one of the deadliest man-made chemicals in the world. It is known to promote cancer and to cause severe birth defects in humans.

• (1440)

Will the Minister of the Environment assure the House that the Government of Canada will take immediate steps, either alone or in concert with the provinces, to have banned all industrial or consumer products containing dioxin? Will the minister also take steps to ensure that the deposit of dioxin in drinking water is outlawed? In addition, will he ensure that the disposal of any industrial waste containing dioxin will be outlawed, as has been done or is being done in the United States? Will he show leadership along the lines of the leadership taken in the United States but not taken in Canada?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): Yes, Madam Speaker, I can confirm that this morning I did release the scientific findings to which the hon. gentleman has referred. Those findings make it clear that there are traces, although very small quantities, of dioxin in the Great Lakes.

The two sources for the provision of those dioxins are both in the United States. As a result, my colleague the Secretary of State for External Affairs is addressing a note to the United States which is in the final drafting stages and should be sent within the next 48 hours, outlining to the United States the information which we have, drawing it to their attention and asking for a thorough investigation, as well as requesting that they take urgent steps to remedy this situation.

My department is also in touch with other departments of the Canadian government. We are proceeding with our studies to try to isolate more clearly the significance of these findings. We are continuing our own work to try and establish clearly the source points and the consequences of these facts. I have also instructed my department to be in touch with the International Joint Commission so that the information we have is brought to their attention in order that they may issue their advice to both governments of the United States and Canada as to what action should be taken.

Mr. McMillan: Madam Speaker, my supplementary is adressed to the Minister of the Environment and is in connection with the investigations and examinations the minister is seeking or is sponsoring through his department. Is the minister aware that last month the journal Science, one of the most reputable scientific publications in the world, documented that the chemical dioxin, the cancer-causing product that we are talking about, is discharged into the environment from the combustion process of coal-fired power plants. Thermal power plants are one of the sources of dioxin, among others.

In view of those findings, will the minister assure the people of Canada that the government will not proceed with its plans to promote the conversion of electrical plants, in the Atlantic provinces in particular, from oil to high sulphur content coal until Canadian scientists have documented beyond reasonable doubt that those conversions will not increase dioxin discharge in the Atlantic provinces and elsewhere in Canada? Will he assure us that the Government of Canada will not proceed with its off-oil program as outlined in the minister's colleague's budget without a scientific determination that those conversions will not increase dioxin discharge in Canada which cause cancer and can cause very serious birth defects in humans, in addition to other problems?

Mr. Roberts: Madam Speaker, of course I am well aware of the hazards and dangers of that extremely toxic poison, dioxin. I was not aware of the article to which the hon. member referred. I thank him for drawing my attention to it; I will look at it. As has repeatedly been made clear to members of the House, the desirable proposals brought forward in the budget, and supported by my colleague the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, for moving to conversion to coal in the Atlantic provinces will proceed only in conformity with the highest standards of environmental protection.

EXTERNAL AID

ITALIAN EARTHQUAKE—SUGGESTED FORMATION OF EMERGENCY NATO FORCE

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs and concerns the ongoing tragic events in Italy. I am aware, of course, of the supplies which have been sent from Canadian Forces Base Lahr to Italy. However, the need now seems to be for greater co-ordination and co-operation in the actual earthquake area itself. In that regard, will the minister consider proposing to Canada's partners in NATO that they put together and make available an emergency NATO force which would help out with the logistics, distribution of supplies, reconstruction and other needs in the earthquake area? In the event that this initiative meets with success, will its availability be made known to the overtaxed government of Italy, itself a strong NATO member?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, I appreciate the intention of the hon. member. I would like to sound out the government of Italy on the acceptability of and necessity for such an offer. They know that we have offered whatever will be useful to them. I think we should go back to them and put it in this larger context to see if such an initiative might be helpful.

SUGGESTED ADOPTION OF ORPHANED CHILDREN

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): I thank the minister for that response. I will pose my supplementary to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. I am sure he knows that many Canadians, both those directly affected by the earthquake tragedy and those who are not, have expressed a great deal of concern about the plight of children orphaned as a result of the earthquake. In connection with the proposals the minister has put forward to provide resettlement places in Canada for those who have been left homeless by the earthquake, has he been in touch with his provincial counterparts to see whether methods can be worked out for the adoption of children who have been orphaned as a result of the earthquake tragedy? If he has not already done that, will he proceed to do so immediately?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): In the first instance, Madam Speaker, we thought that the best we could do was to respond to immediate requirements and ensure that those in Canada who have relatives in the affected areas would be able to have their relatives come to Canada, and that we provide the proper communications system so that they could make contact.

On the question of orphans from the earthquake area, we have had discussions with Italian-Canadian organizations here on that matter. My colleagues the Minister of State for Multiculturalism and the Secretary of State for External Affairs have been talking to the Italian government as well. Therefore, we have that particular question under serious consideration. As soon as those conversations are concluded, we think this is something that it is possible to do. However, we would like to work with the Italian government before we make a final decision.

DISCONTINUANCE OF BRIDGE FINANCING OF CANFARM

Hon. John Wise (Elgin): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture. It is with reference to the future of Canfarm. Recently the minister made a unilateral decision in which he discontinued the bridge financing of that corporation. This is the latest example of a broken commitment and broken promise. What is the status of that issue today?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, the hon. member has the right to say what he thinks is a broken promise. However, we made an agreement with Canfarm that they should have 12,000 members. At the present time they have 5,000. If anybody has broken a commitment to Peter Hannam, an outstanding young man who is the leader of that organization, it is farm organizations and the provinces which refused to participate in any fashion or form to help go along with improving the membership in Canfarm. Not one provincial minister has come forward to say that he thinks it is a good organization. We discussed this in July at the provincial ministers' meeting, and also in Brandon.

We have fulfilled our obligation to them with regard to funds. We have given the limit of the funds up until the present time. We will be meeting with the board of directors later this afternoon to discuss further whether there is any way imaginable it can be kept alive. We have over $4 million in that organization at the present time. It appears we could put a further $4 million into it, but we do not know if it is going to be a success. There must be more participation by the farmers and provincial ministers of agriculture in that organization. It is a good organization. Peter Hannam has given it tremendous leadership, but he does not have the support that he needs, especially from farm organizations and provincial ministers of agriculture.

Mr. Wise: The minister uses his old flam of blaming everyone except himself. Since the moneys required to wind down Canfarm are more than what is required for its survival—$1.5 million versus $1.2 million—would the minister reconsider his decision and, at the very least, make the final payment of some $300,000, which was really the final commitment that we made a year ago, and our commitment that we have fulfilled, of $1.2 million?

Mr. Whelan: All the member was doing while I was away on a short sabbatical was fulfilling the commitments I made to Canfarm. That is all he was doing. We have given them the $300,000. Let him come up to date and make sure he knows what he is talking about before he asks questions or makes accusations.

THE MONARCHY

RELATIONSHIP TO TREATY INDIANS

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton-Strathcona): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development who is, I see, helping the Brazilian coffee industry and the Niagara tobacco industry at the back of the chamber.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Kilgour: Madam Speaker, the minister will be aware that the Indian people of Canada feel that they have a special relationship with the Queen of Canada which goes back a great many years. Does the minister feel that the duties of the Queen of Canada to, and the relationship the Queen has with, Indian groups, particularly the treaty groups, continue to exist?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, it is clear to the Indian people, as it is clear to many other Canadians, that the Queen of Canada has a great deal of symbolic value and is an institution that they and the rest of us want to maintain.

Mr. Kilgour: I ask the same question, Madam Speaker. The newspapers reported yesterday that the Governor General has indicated that the people who have come on the constitution express must negotiate with the Government of Canada only, that they may have no dealings, as I understand it, with the Queen of Canada living in Britain. Is that the position of the Government of Canada? If so, does that mean that the head of state in Canada is now the Governor General rather than the Queen of Canada?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Madam Speaker, the hon. member is a member of Parliament for Canada. Surely he is aware of the role of the Governor General and of the Queen of Canada. To be so patronizing as to assume that the Indian people do not seems to me to be rather insulting.

PENITENTIARIES

DORCHESTER, N.B.—INQUIRY WHEN REPORT ON CONDITIONS WILL BE PRESENTED

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General. The minister knows that there has been at Dorchester Penitentiary in New Brunswick a very serious history of hostage takings, the tragic death of a prison guard, the suicide of a prisoner, escapes of convicted murderers and allegations of brutality and lawlessness before and after the recent hostage taking. The Canadian public has a right to know the full circumstances surrounding these recent incidents. In view of the fact that on October 14 of this year the Solicitor General promised the House that "I would be prepared, when the facts have been collected by the special inquiry, to make them public in the next few days as soon as I have them"—and that was almost two months ago—when are we finally going to have a full public report, as promised by the minister, on the very serious recent events at Dorchester Penitentiary?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, subsequent to my making that statement, the coroner of the province of New Brunswick indicated that a public inquest would be held. That inquest by this independent official of the New Brunswick government was indeed held. A full statement of facts was made and adduced before the coroner's inquest. I am very glad to tell the House that those public findings by that objective inquiry correspond exactly with the findings that were made by the special inquiry which was held by the inspector general of the correctional service.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, that answer is completely unacceptable. The minister knows very well—

Some hon. Members: Order, order.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): —that the coroner's inquest had the mandate of looking into the causes of death of the prison guard, not of looking into any allegations of brutality, of shootings or any of the other allegations which have been made about Dorchester.

My supplementary question to the Solicitor General is this. The minister knows that the correctional investigator heard very serious allegations made by a number of prisoners of beatings, indiscriminate use of gas, destruction of personal property. Will the minister confirm that a number of these allegations have indeed been substantiated? Will the minister tell the House, in view of the fact that the rule of law does not stop at the prison gate, what disciplinary action or other legal proceedings have been taken against the guards involved in these very serious offences?

Mr. Kaplan: I would want to see the exact allegations that the hon. member is referring to. A number of allegations were made by inmates at Dorchester which I am satisfied were false, because I have seen reports about them. Some kinds of allegations can never be established one way or the other; others are being looked at now by the inspector general. I have not had a report from him on some of them. I will have the report within the next few days. If any of them can be substantiated, appropriate action will be taken.

PETRO-CANADA

INQUIRY RESPECTING EMPLOYMENT OF OFFICIAL BY DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY, MINES AND RESOURCES

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and has to do with the participation of the senior vice-president for finance of Petro-Canada in the preparation of the budget. I wonder if the minister can amplify his answers of yesterday and tell the House of Commons whether Mr. Joel Bell, the official of the Crown corporation which benefited by the budget, during the period that he was with the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, was drawing salary or any benefits from Petro-Canada, including the prospect of future re-employment by Petro-Canada?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I have made some inquiries following the question yesterday of the hon. Leader of the Opposition. Mr. Bell was not involved in the preparation of the budget. He was on loan from Petro-Canada to work on the acquisition program of the Government of Canada, and that is part of the energy program. He was on loan as a consultant from Petro-Canada. He continued to receive his salary from Petro-Canada and he worked for my department, in the preparation of the energy program, on the acquisition program of the Government of Canada.

An hon. Member: Which is part of the budget.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, what we have admitted here is that the energy program which was presented as a major part of the budget of Canada was prepared by an official of Petro-Canada, which was the principal beneficiary of that budget, at a time when that official of Petro-Canada was being paid by the Petro-Canada company, which was benefited by the budget he helped prepare. That is a clear conflict of interest—

Mr. Nielsen: Gross.

Mr. Clark: —far more serious than the Walter Gordon transgressions of some 15 to 16 years ago. Since the minister knows that Petro-Canada is involved in several joint ventures with private companies operating in Canada and outside Canada, can he tell the House of Commons whether any of those companies knew that the senior vice-president for finance of their partner Petro-Canada was involved in the preparation of the energy portions of the budget prior to or during the participation by that official of Petro-Canada in the preparation of the budget?

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, I would like to remind the hon. member that, contrary to the situation when his party was in office, when the office of the minister of energy, the presidency of the party and several other positions were occupied by former employees of Imperial Oil, we consider that Petro-Canada belongs to the people of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lalonde: We consider that Petro-Canada, as always—and it has been stated quite clearly—is an instrument of policy of the Government of Canada. As far as the role of Mr. Bell is concerned, he was there as a consultant to the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources in the preparation of the acquisition section of the energy program. The program itself was developed by officials of the department and approved by cabinet. The Minister of Finance developed his own budget with the Department of Finance and with his own colleagues. That is the whole story, and I am afraid that the Leader of the Opposition has it all upside down once more.

● (1500)

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, I take it now that the position of the government is that the energy program was not a part of the budget. If the energy program was not a part of the budget, why was it presented as part of the budget?

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, I indicated that Mr. Bell was a consultant to the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources in the preparation of the national energy program, which was made public at the same time as the budget and which my hon. friend has had an opportunity to read.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PASSPORT GUARANTORS—OFFICIAL RECOGNITION OF VETERINARIANS

Mr. Bruce Lonsdale (Timiskaming): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. On Friday last the minister was questioned with respect to the non-recognition of veterinarians as official guarantors for passport applications. Subsequent to that, I and many other members of Parliament inquired of the minister and made representations urging support for the proposition that veterinarians, because of their unique position in the agricultural community and in the rural areas of the country, because of their constant contact with individuals in remote sections of the country and because of their particular position of trust and respect, be officially recognized as official guarantors for passport applications.

Has the minister reconsidered his position, and is he prepared to announce today that veterinarians will indeed be recognized as official guarantors for passport applications?

Mr. Crosbie: The answer is yes.

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, I will repeat what I said last Friday. The list of guarantors for passports is not intended and does not function as a recognition of various professions or businesses, but as a result of the representations made by my hon. friend, the hon. member for Timiskaming, and other hon. members, I have come to the conclusion that it would be appropriate to add veterinarians to the list.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hees: How is that for crow tasting?

Miss MacDonald: You look embarrassed.

Mr. MacGuigan: I am glad to see so many veterinarians in the House!

An hon. Member: They are donkeys on the other side.

Mr. MacGuigan: As I was saying—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I did not think veterinarians would cause such excitement.

Mr. MacGuigan: As I was saying, the purpose of this is to serve the rural people of Canada, not to extend recognition to a profession which is already well recognized.

However, I will just add that because passport applications have recently been reprinted, it will be some time before the written recognition of veterinarians will appear on those forms.

The Constitution

THE CONSTITUTION

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—EXTENSION OF DEADLINE FOR REPORT

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, I rise on a very important point of order which is also very urgent because it is related to an issue which is very well known by all my colleagues in this place. It is related to the deadline for the joint committee's dealing with the constitution matter.

I would have liked the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) to be in the House, but I understand he has an engagement. I learned that just a few minutes ago. In any case, I see that the deputy House leader of the Conservative party and the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) are both here, and I have given notice of my intention to rise on a point of order. I did not specify what I would say, but I am at ease when I speak in the absence of the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton because I think he will be in agreement with all I will say. If not, we will find out later, but I have no doubt in my mind.

May I say—and I offer as a witness the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), who attended our last meeting—that we received a final proposal from the opposition parties, and it was agreed amongst us that if we were to agree to that final proposal I would be free to move a motion from the floor of the House and receive unanimous consent, without debate, for the motion.

The matter is very simple. The offer is related only to a date, and it is without condition. The last proposal—and I will not get into the details of the negotiations or explain them here because I want to be brief—from the opposition parties was that the committee report at the latest on February 6, 1981. That was the firm and final proposal made. The agreement is that if we were to agree to that, we were to come here. If we were to disagree, we could make our case public.

I am glad to report that we agreed to that firm proposal, and therefore there must be unanimous consent for the following motion, which is very simple:

That the order of reference creating the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution of Canada be amended by deleting the words "December 9, 1980" and substituting therefor the words "February 6, 1981"; and that a message be sent to the Senate to acquaint Their Honours thereof and to invite them to join with this House in the aforementioned action.

I move that motion, seconded by the right hon. member for Yellowhead.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Madam Speaker, with respect to the point of order raised by the government House leader, I had an opportunity to discuss very briefly and very sketchily with the opposition House leader the discussions which took place among the House leaders on this question. It was not my intimation from the opposition House leader that there was a firm, be-all, and end-all agreement with respect to the date of February 6, beyond which we would not go. My understanding, through the opposition House leader, was that the agreement would be at least to February 6 because of the avalanche—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Chrétien: Yes or no.

Mr. Nielsen: —of oral applications and written briefs. I believe the number of oral applications amounts to some 350 and the written applications amount to a like amount, for a total of some 700 or 800 applications to be dealt with. I know that the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) went into that meeting with the thought uppermost in his mind which was stated by our leader yesterday when leaving caucus. He said, and I quote from a transcript, which was sent to the government House leader and to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) of that exchange between our leader and members of the media:

I understand the question of exact dates is under discussion among House leaders and it will continue that way, but there was a unanimous view on the part of my colleagues in the House of Commons that we want the people of Canada to be heard on the Constitution of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nielsen: While we gladly accept the motion which is before us now waiting to be read to the House, we must file the caveat that should this backlog of Canadians who want to be heard on their constitution—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Cousineau: Blackmail.

Mr. Siddon: You don't want to hear Canadians?

Mr. Nielsen: —remain a serious backlog when February 6 rolls around—in other words, if there are still hundreds of responsible organizations and individuals who want to be heard—we are simply reserving the right to raise the matter again with an appeal to the government to be reasonable so that these Canadians can be heard on their constitution.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (1510)

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, I should like to say that we welcome the statement that the government House leader has made on this point of order. I should like to add that although we have had our difficulties, which always happens where there are negotiations, we have done very well at negotiating in the last little while. We even managed yesterday to hold our meeting in a place where the members of the press could not find us—

An hon. Member: Stanley's office.

Mr. Knowles: —and I do not think they know yet where we held that meeting.

As for the proposal that the government House leader has made, and as for his statement, they correspond to my understanding, namely, that if the government was prepared to agree to the date of February 6, the minister would be free to stand in the House and announce it, but that if the government did not agree to the date of February 6, we would be informed as House leaders and the negotiations would be off.

My understanding at yesterday's meeting was that, so far as the opposition was concerned, we would not consider any earlier date, such as January 30 or January 23, but that we would consider February 6. It was also made clear that there were, in both parties on the opposition side, members who wanted a longer period, but that we would agree to the date of February 6 without debate. I congratulate the government on agreeing to this sensible proposal.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: The House has heard the proposal put forward by the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard). Is there unanimous consent to presenting this motion without debate?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Madam Speaker: Does the House agree to the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Madam Speaker: The Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. LeBlanc).

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, I wish to rise on a brief point of order.

Madam Speaker: I have notice from the minister that he wishes to reply to an hon. member. Is the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) rising on a point of order which should be heard before we hear the minister? If so, I will recognize the Leader of the Opposition.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. CLARK—PROPOSAL RESPECTING CONSTITUTION COMMITTEE

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, my point of order is one that flows directly from the procedure to which the House has just agreed. I simply want to express my regret that we were not able to receive from the government House leader an indication of the contents of the proposal which he was going to make at three o'clock. I think it would have facilitated arrangements in the House and an understanding of what exactly was going to be proposed if it had been brought forward as a proposal rather than as a surprise.

[Translation]

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, there is a very simple reason for this. This is the result of the lengthy consultations I have had with others, other than the House leader, which ended only around 20 minutes before three o'clock this afternoon. I was therefore unable to elaborate on this point and to discuss with the Leader of the Opposition the details of what we agreed on, namely, that the date of February 6 was the final date, that there would be no other requests for future extensions and that this was a gesture of exceptional generosity which the opposition appreciated. This is why we agreed to the final date of February 6. However, in spite of what my hon. colleague , the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) has said, I want to make it very clear that there is no question in the agreement that there might be other requests to grant a further extension to the committee. As we understand the agreement we have reached, the date of February 6 is final and there will be no further extension granted to the committee. It will report on the sixth at the latest, even though, in principle, if the committee so wishes its proceedings could be completed earlier. However, in our opinion there are limits to what is reasonable and we believe that a time-frame of three months in committee is sufficient, because if we indeed go on until February 6—and I believe that the Conservative House leader as well as my colleagues of the New Democratic Party understand this—the committee will have considered the constitutional proposals for three months even though we had previously provided a much shorter period. I believe that the hon. member for Yukon, who was not present at this meeting, must have gotten carried away when he said, "We can assure you that we shall ask for an extension in late January or early February". Such was not the spirit of these negotiations; we have discussed at length and in good faith in the last two weeks, and I must say that the government has been extremely generous in the concessions it has made without setting any conditions, without requesting a deadline for the third phase and without even having agreed on the form of this third phase, as my hon. colleague will certainly recognize if he is sincere. I believe that he should not now state in advance that his party will try to create obstacles and have another filibuster in committee, because this was certainly not the spirit of the discussions we had with the House leaders, and it is certainly not the spirit that will animate the discussions in the days and weeks to come when this very important constitutional issue is debated in committee and subsequently in the House of Commons.

I therefore want to make it very clear that the agreement is firm and that while the extension we are granting may not seem as generous as some would want it, as in any negotiation and any agreement, some give and others receive. In view of the circumstances, I believe that the extension is generous. I want to make it very clear that this is an ultimate deadline and that it corresponds exactly to what was agreed among the House leaders and what was the subject of the resolution of this House which has now been passed.

[English]

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, the discourtesy to which I made reference was the reluctance—I will use that word—of the government House leader to communicate to the deputy House leader of the official opposition, the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen), the contents of the proposal which was to be laid before the House when, during the question period and after the hour specified by the government House leader, the opposition deputy House leader crossed the floor, spoke to the government House leader and asked him for the contents of that proposal. It would have helped the House, I think, had that information been conveyed at that time.

The only point I want to make, Madam Speaker, is that the record of the House shows very clearly that we are pleased that the date of February 6, which we had originally proposed, has been accepted, but we accepted it with the caveat that if the people of Canada, represented by responsible individuals or responsible groups in large numbers, still have not been adequately heard by that time, we will not be party to closing off the right of the people of Canada to be heard on their constitution.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): The last words of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) were that they would not be party to the closing off on February 6. If that is their position, then they should not have voted for the motion.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: I want to make it quite clear, Madam Speaker, that this date is the result of unanimous agreement of all parties of the House.

An hon. Member: Nonsense.

Mr. Trudeau: It says "no later than February 6". If the committee feels its work is finished earlier and there is a consensus in the committee to finish earlier, I suppose that would be permissible under the motion agreed to in every part of the House.

Mr. Clark: After having heard the caveat of the hon. member for Yukon, I point out that the caveat was quite clear.

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, if the Leader of the Opposition wishes to withdraw his consent to that motion and put in a condition, we are prepared to permit him to withdraw his consent.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: The caveat stands.

Mr. Trudeau: It should be obvious, Madam Speaker, that it would be possible to have hundreds of briefs coming in forever, and to have a new agreement in February to postpone the date.

Point of Order—Mr. Clark

● (1520)

Some hon. Members: What is the rush?

Mr. Trudeau: Hon. members opposite are already saying, "What is the rush?" I remind the House that there was opposition from that side to the date of December 9—

Mr. Andre: To any date.

Mr. Trudeau: —and we had to use unilateral closure to get agreement on that date.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: Today there is no closure; there is voluntary consent to that date by all parties in the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: With a caveat.

Mr. Trudeau: It should be on the record that we have not forced this date on the hon. Leader of the Official Opposition. As I understand it from both the NDP House leader and our House leader, it was a date which they suggested and to which we agreed. Therefore, let it be on the record that there is no closure imposed. If the Leader of the Opposition wants to have second thoughts and say that this is a date he only agrees to on condition, that he does not want the further date—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Andre: We said it before you voted.

Mr. Trudeau: —then let him withdraw the consent, let us debate it again, or let us just say that no agreement is possible. That is our view, and I appeal to the New Democratic Party to state right now in the House that that is equally its view—

Some hon. Members: Don't worry about them.

Mr. Trudeau: —that it is a negotiated date which has been agreed to freely by the opposition parties.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Baloney.

Mr. Trudeau: This kind of howling from the Tory party does not suit the House at a time when we are—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: —today agreeing to the—

An hon. Member: Sit down.

Mr. Trudeau: —very date they suggested. I repeat that we do not see this as an imposition of a date upon them. We see them as freely accepting this date, and if they do not freely accept it, the time to say it is now, not next February.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, I want to make it very clear, if there is any doubt at all, where we stand on this issue. We, along with the official opposition, felt very strongly about the extension of time. The government knows that through private negotiations involving the House leaders of all parties.

To understate it considerably, we have not been in agreement with the way the government has handled all proceedings of the committee, but I think an agreement was entered into in good faith by all House leaders to provide Canadians reasonably good access to present their views. When we in this party enter an agreement, we intend to keep it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, the country knows full well the degree to which the NDP intends to keep the agreements into which it enters with the Liberal party.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: This matter need not detain the House any longer. Two things are clear. First, the House has voted on a reporting date of February 6, offered without condition by the government House leader, to quote his language, and second, the caveat expressed on behalf of my party by myself and the deputy House leader of the official opposition that if the people of Canada have not been adequately heard by February 6, we will put pressure upon the government to extend the date just as we put pressure upon the government to extend the date of December 9 when they tried, in our view, to muzzle the rights of the people of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

PRIVILEGE

MR. CROUSE—STATEMENT MADE BY MR. LEBLANC DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Madam Speaker, yesterday after I left the House the hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse) raised a question of privilege. I wish to reply to the question of privilege by saying at the outset that I sincerely regret any misunderstanding of my remarks in the House yesterday which could have suggested to the hon. member any reference to conflict of interest.

The hon. member and myself have had this type of exchange before.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. Would those members who want to have conversations with their colleagues please do so in the lobby so that the House can hear the hon. minister.

Mr. LeBlanc: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I know the hon. member represents many large fishing vessel crews, and he very properly defends their interest. I was trying to point out that there are other points of view, and of course I apologize if I have offended the hon. member.

MR. MCKNIGHT—LETTER WRITTEN BY MR. DE CORNEILLE

Mr. Bill McKnight (Kindersley-Lloydminster): Madam Speaker, several weeks ago I gave notice of the question of privilege which I should like to bring to the attention of the House. It arises out of the propriety of the use of members' facilities and the privileges which go with the use of those facilities, that reflect on all members of the House, by the hon. member for Eglinton-Lawrence (Mr. de Corneille).

I have stood twice to raise this matter, and the hon. member was not in the House. I see that he is not present at this time, but I will proceed because I think I have waited long enough. My question of privilege arises out of a letter dated October 28, 1980, bearing the crest of the House of Commons, which the hon. member for Eglinton-Lawrence circulated on behalf of an organization called the "National Committee for Human Rights Charter". On this piece of House of Commons stationery he was soliciting the membership, and for members for this organization.

The hon. member is the national chairman of this committee, and the return address for this petition is in care of the national chairman, Box 547, Ottawa, Ontario, K1P 5P6. He solicited memberships for an organization and used the crest of the House of Commons, which is something we all value, which is something that is very special in Canada, and which I hope is something under the protection of the Chair. The letter was circulated to clergymen across Canada.

I should like to read one reaction to this communication and how it reflects upon all members of the House of Commons. The letter is dated at Unity, Saskatchewan, and it reads as follows:

Roland de Corneille, M.P.
House of Commons,
Ottawa, Ontario.

Dear Sir,

Your letter dated October 28, enclosing a petition for a charter of rights and freedom has made me very angry.

Firstly, in your letter you say, "That human rights should not be a partisan political issue." That may be so, but the fact is that the proposed charter of rights as a part of our constitution is a partisan political issue today. Seven of ten provincial premiers strongly oppose the entrenchment of this particular charter of rights. The charter listed on your petition has a remarkable similarity to the charter proposed by the Prime Minister. From my reading, there are many knowledgeable legal and political commentators who have serious reservations about this particular form of a charter of rights.

I cannot decide which makes me more angry; your assumption of my naivety that I would accept this petition as a simple humanitarian statement, or that you are seeking my support and the support of my congregation on a religious basis for a petition that will certainly be used for partisan political purposes.

My second objection is to your use of your free mailing privileges as a member of Parliament to send out this document. I would suspect that you would be legally correct, though morally suspect to use those privileges to send out political materials. If, however, the "National Committee for a Human Rights Charter" does exist, I can see no justification for you using your free mailing privileges for an organization's mailings.

I would find your whole letter disgusting if it were from an ordinary politician. The fact that you are a minister of the gospel and sign your letter as "Rev." I find to be an abomination.

Yours

(Rev.) Harold C. Black

• (1530)

Madam Speaker, the first point I would like to bring to the attention of the Chair is that I, and other members of this House, who happen to be involved in other organizations and who happen to have businesses or are members—

[Translation]

Mrs. Beauchamp-Niquet: I am sorry, Madam Speaker, we seem to have lost the French interpretation and I would like you to check on this if you would.

Madam Speaker: I believe that this has been done.

[English]

Mr. McKnight: I am sorry that I cannot assist the hon. member, Madam Speaker.

There are many members in this House who do belong to other organizations. As a matter of fact there are many members of this House who are owners of businesses, or presidents of their own corporations, who would not use the House of Commons stationery with that crest to solicit support for something which is not in the ordinary line of work of a member of Parliament. The reaction caused by this petition, I feel, reflects on all members of the House of Commons. It brings us all under suspicion. I would like to point out that several independent organizations have asked many members of Parliament for their support as members of Parliament to assist in those organizations. Members have given of themselves freely, but they have done so as ordinary members of society and not as members of Parliament.

Madam Speaker, to my knowledge this letter has been sent to at least seven clergymen in my constituency and, no doubt, has been sent to several more clergymen in Canada. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay):

That this matter be referred to the House of Commons Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. Roland de Corneille (Eglinton-Lawrence): Madam Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity of being able to reply to the hon. member and his expressed concerns. First of all, I would like to indicate that, from the point of view of my background and the concerns I have had in the past, I have not suddenly developed a unique concern now but have always had a concern about the matter of human rights and freedoms.

As a matter of fact, I was engaged in a petition campaign in 1971 regarding the International Human Rights Covenants of the United Nations. That campaign was undertaken under the sponsorship of a large number of Canadian organizations including the League of Human Rights of B'nai Brith. At that time, Madam Speaker, that petition campaign involved tens of thousands of Canadians who wished to express their support for Canadian ratification and signature of the International Human Rights Covenants of the United Nations. There were many provincial premiers who did not quite agree with that at the time, but Canadians across the country indicated they wanted their federal and provincial governments to sign and ratify the International Human Rights Covenants. That petition campaign took place from October until approximately December 10, 1971. It continued on for quite some time thereafter.

The reason I mention this particular campaign is that it resulted in the acceptance, ultimately, by all of the provinces, of that desire to have Canada sign an international human rights covenant. Canada did so in 1976. Of course, this was a desire to bring all Canadians into the international mainstream of human rights.

The same thing occurs here in this desire to have a charter of rights and freedoms entrenched in a Canadian Constitution. This petition campaign involves many people from various walks of life, not only politicians but clergymen, businessmen and so on, in a national committee which is called A National Committee for a Human Rights Charter. They approached me and asked me to serve on that committee. In fact they asked me to act as chairman of that committee because of my past experience in petition campaigns, namely, the campaign in 1971.

The 1971 campaign had some influence in giving Canada that opportunity to share in the international spirit as a signatory of the International Human Rights Covenants. This enabled Canada to go on and sign the Helsinki Agreement. Without having taken the step of signing the International Human Rights Covenants we could not have gone on to sign the Helsinki Agreement. Each step in the human rights battle is an upward one in attempting to build a foundation of understanding throughout the world of the sacred nature of human rights.

With respect to this particular matter, a group came to me and asked me to join in a campaign to ensure that Canada would entrench a charter of human rights and freedoms. I would like to point out that if you look back over the records of time you will see that Tommy Douglas advocated the entrenchment of a charter of human rights and freedoms in our constitution, as did the Right Hon. John Diefenbaker, the Right Hon. Lester Pearson, and as does our present Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). It has been advocated by countless members of all parties everywhere, including many provincial premiers who have advocated the entrenchment of a charter of rights and freedoms, for instance, Premier Davis of Ontario.

This particular petition does not mention whether it should be entrenched in England or here, now or then. It simply calls for people to say that they would like to see a charter of rights and freedoms entrenched in our constitution. It makes no reference to time or place.

I believe that most people would agree that this is not an unusual thing to ask as a member of Parliament, as one who is serving his country, and one who presumably represents the whole of Canada, not only his own constituency, who is able to speak to people everywhere he wishes to in Canada about the sacred nature of the entrenchment of human rights throughout the world. When other countries come to us in Helsinki and say, "How come you and your country are not fulfilling your promises about human rights? How come you do not have it in the constitution?" then we can say that we have it and we are taking our full responsibility throughout the world. This is a goal toward which we should all work, members from all parties in this House.

The point is that I hope it is a solemn desire of us all that this be what Canada will eventually do. I am in no way ashamed to be part of such a program under such a committee. I hope the House will encourage me to continue to do so.

Madam Speaker: I am tempted to say that our Standing Orders are silent on matters such as the one which has been raised by the hon. member for Kindersley-Lloydminster (Mr. McKnight). I would like to say also that a member may write to Canadians outside his constituency to promote whatever he feels are the objectives he is pursuing. In doing so I assume he may use the government's stationery. However, I will reserve judgment on this question since I am not clear whether the hon. member was recruiting in favour of some association through the letter he has written. I wish to examine the matter further before I rule on it.

MIRABEL AIRPORT

Question No. 83—Mr. Cossitt:

What was the total amount of losses suffered by taxpayers for all aspects of the operation of Mirabel airport since it was opened until the date the answer to this question is prepared?

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The total deficit for all aspects of the operation of Mirabel airport since it opened, November 29, 1975, to March 31, 1980, was $192.6 million. This is the excess of operating and maintenance expenses (including interest and depreciation) over revenues. The deficit before providing for interest and depreciation was $10.2 million. For the period April 1, 1980, through September 30, 1980, Mirabel will break even, before providing for depreciation expense of $9 million.

2. What is the cost per home of the evaluation of insulation needs and are the evaluations done by on site inspection or by questionnaire?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): The Department of Energy, Mines and Resources reports as follows: 1. The current (1980-81) budget allocation for the Ener$ave advisory service is $1.2 million.

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—ALLEGED FAILURE TO PROMOTE INDIAN SELF-RELIANCE

Mr. Stan Schellenberger (Wetaskiwin) moved:

That this House condemns the continued failure of the government to promote Indian self-reliance and the continued failure to protect the culture, language and health of Canada's Indian peoples.

He said: Madam Speaker, after spending a number of years in this House and serving on the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development, I have watched the activities of various ministers of Indian Affairs and noted the accomplishments which each of them have attained over the years. I have served on the standing committee for some eight years now. As I have observed the statistics and watched the performance of the department over the years, I find that instead of the plight of the native people of this country improving, it is getting worse. Various ministers have tried to deal with the problems of the department in various ways.

I have waited for almost one year before moving this motion, because it would have been unfair to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Munro) to have moved it earlier, since he had just taken over the portfolio, to see if the minister would in some way change the policies which past ministers of the Liberal government followed, bring forward some new ways to deal with the plight of the native people, and move them closer to self-reliance. There have been no such policies in this past year. The minister has followed the same policies which have been followed for years. This is why I felt it was necessary to move this motion at this time.

I and my colleagues have lost confidence in the ability of the Liberal government and of the minister in that portfolio to deal effectively with the Indian problems in this country. I would like to illustrate that by putting forth some statistics compiled by the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. In 1964, approximately 36 per cent of the Indian population was supported by social assistance, compared to 3.5 per cent of the national population. In 1974, 55 per cent of the total Indian population on reserves was receiving social assistance or welfare payments. In Ontario it was an estimated 70 per cent. By comparison, only 6 per cent of the national population received welfare or social assistance. In the fiscal year 1978-79 the portion of the native population receiving welfare rose to 70 per cent.

At the same time the government has spent $359 million over five years on economic development. It is spending $250 million a year on education. The department has a budget of over $700 million per year to deal with this problem, but it is falling further and further behind in its attempts.

Out of a deep sense of conviction, I and my colleagues feel that it is time the government developed the kinds of policies which will stop these increasing statistics. I will add to these statistics with regard to health and welfare later in my speech. I know that some of my colleagues who will be speaking later in the debate will be dealing with such topics as economic development, housing, and unemployment, and that they will be putting on the record statistics which will show that the government is falling behind in those areas as well. I do not have the time to deal with all those areas in my speech. I merely hope to give an overview of why I believe the House should support this motion.

I would like to quote from a brief which was put before the standing committee on July 8, 1980, by the National Indian Brotherhood:

> The failure of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development to serve our interest has, perhaps, been inevitable, given its origins, its other obligations and the need of any bureaucracy to perpetuate itself. Were there no right inherent in our peoplehood to create our own Indian government, the department's continued mismanagement of our affairs would surely create such a right out of pure self-defence. The government often says we should negotiate from need rather than from right. We need to remove that impediment to the free exercise of our rights.

I think that says a lot about the way the National Indian Brotherhood represents all native groups in this country. I think it tells us what they feel about the department which was created to assist native people become self-reliant, in other words, dependent only upon themselves. As we now deal with the constitution of this nation, surely the job of that department is to wind itself up.

What has happened as a result of this department becoming smug and complacent in its dealings with native people? This department has not come up with any new ideas or initiatives to deal with the problems that members of Parliament see. I ask what has happened? After all these years, infant mortality is still four times higher than the national average. It is significant to note that since 1970, even though pre-natal and post-natal care for the Inuit and the Indians is as good as it is for the rest of the population, this figure of infant mortality, being four times higher than the national average, has not changed.

Violent deaths among natives are three times higher than the national average. Suicides are six times higher than the national average. In my opinion, that means many native people feel there is no hope left. They must feel there is nothing for them in the future of this country. As a result, there is more violence and more use of alcohol among the natives than there is among the rest of the population in Canada. Only 20 per cent of Indian children stay in school to grade 12. If a person does not have a high school education today, his chances of bettering himself or getting a proper job are much less. This is particularly true when you belong to a minority group.

The largest reserve in Alberta is in the city of Edmonton. I use the words "largest reserve" advisedly. There are more native people in the city of Edmonton than on any reserve in the province. I ask hon. members if they know how many native students graduated from grade 12 last year in Edmonton? The answer is that only two such students graduated from high school last year.

Unemployment among Indians is the worst in the nation. Some 25 per cent to 30 per cent of the Indian population is constantly unemployed, and many times this figure rises to 85 per cent or 90 per cent of the population. Many programs are aimed at the native people, for instance, the LEAP program, the CMTP, the DMITP, Outreach, the Summer Youth Employment program, FLIP, and so forth. Just recently $10 million was put forward for native programs. But none of these programs meets the problem. The problem has to be met from within. Economic development has to take place on the reserves by native people themselves, for their interests, otherwise nothing will succeed. This fact has been proven over and over again over the years.

Indian life expectancy is ten years less than that for non-Indians. I find that statistic appalling. We have spent $240 million a year on welfare. What has it done? It has only increased the dependency and reinforced dependency by natives on government. It has not in any way encouraged self-reliance among the native people. Nearly half of the Indian homes in Canada do not have running water or sewers, yet the department is spending some $40 million a year on housing. Again, this money is not meeting the problem. $40 million will cover only sewer and water in many reserves in one province of this country.

I can use the example of a reserve in northern Alberta. The people realized they were not getting adequate housing through these programs, so the reserve decided to build homes themselves. People on the reserve asked the province to assist them by providing power saws and the gasoline to run them, and for one expert to show them how to build log houses. All this was done and with tremendous success. New homes are being put up in this northern reserve. These sorts of ideas could be used. Why is the department not doing anything?

What do the young native people think who grow up on reserves and who live adjacent to projects with $80,000 and $90,000 homes? What do these young native people think when they have no running water and have to walk out to the outhouse behind with the half moon, when just across the fence there are Canadians living in beautiful homes? I certainly wonder what they must think about the future and what life has to offer them as they grow older. These statistics we are talking about today represent a social disintegration and a cultural decay in this country.

Economically native people are worse off and they are becoming more dependent on government. More than half of the Indian population have grown dependent on social assistance and welfare over the years. Only one-third were dependent on assistance twenty years ago. However, there have been some successes.

There have been some advances in the area of economic development. We have spent a lot of money and we have had many excellent people working in that area. But there have been many failures as well. I shall mention only a few because there is no point in mentioning more. I was a member of a committee which studied examples which recurred over and over. The Auditor General of Canada, after seeing these examples, felt compelled to make a report and chastised the department for being unable to care for the money it had under its control. The examples I will use are mostly in my own province because I am more familiar with them.

The department spent $6.1 million out of a total of $9.1 million in a company called Alberta. Aspen. The Indian people got only 20 per cent of that company. The Indians spent over 70 per cent of the money and yet they only got 20 per cent of the company. As a result, the Indians had no control over the management of the company, and the company failed.

In a company called Ehatlesaht Co-Op Enterprise Association located on Vancouver Island, $4.5 million was spent. Some DREE money was added to that. This was a logging operation. As I stated in the committee, a lot of this money was spent deciding whether these logs could be used for export. Trips were taken by great numbers of people to Japan, Hawaii, Fiji and so forth, to find out whether there was a market. The company failed.

The Apanakii motel failed. Millions of dollars were spent in the Arcan timber enterprise. The end result was a couple of sheds. There are many other examples, all documented in reports of the Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development in years gone by.

We have used these types of programs over and over again through the years. In most instances the only ones which have been successful are those which have come from the native people themselves where they have had control of the money.

When I look for successes and the reasons for them, I do not have to go far outside my own riding. The native people in my riding have been fortunate to have some revenue from oil. As soon as they were able to get their hands on that revenue, they no longer needed government assistance. They were capable of building their own enterprises and homes. They were capable of setting up trust funds for their children for necessary education. They were capable of managing their own band successfully without government help. That ought to be the goal we should strive to attain. The government should use that as an example of how programs can be successful.

This minister has a feeling for the problem and he is attempting to do things about it. He has travelled the nation to see what can be done. In his generosity, he offers native people various amounts of money to establish their projects, but when the natives go to follow that up, in some instances, the department says it does not have the money, or that all the money has been committed.

I do not know how the minister could make that kind of recommendation. I can give an example of a $5 million promise made to an impoverished Alberta band in October, which was not followed through. The necessary communication between the minister and his officials is not taking place.

Part of the reason is that many of the deputies and assistant deputies in his department have never come up through the organization, worked on the reserves and understood the problems. They are excellent at creating bureaucracies and looking after the efficiences of money. They come from that kind of background, and therefore should be able to do this. But there is a communications gap between the minister and his officials in this area and many native communities are suffering because of that.

Another area is the export tax. This has bothered me for years because we have stated that we should not tax native people. It is in the Indian Act that they will not be taxed, yet the ownership of their resources is denied in allowing that export tax to take place. As many as 19 bands in western Canada have made a commitment of this money into the future and now find 30 per cent of it is lost.

Members of the oil producing bands have never had the export tax returned to them. The provinces had it returned, but never the Indian people. That money could have been used to eliminate some of the statistics I put on the record earlier.

Why has the Department of Indian Affairs not put forward some recommendation on what salaries should be paid for band managers? Native people come to me to show statistics where certain band managers are paid $70,000 or $90,000 for a year's work when, in most instances, all that other bands can afford to pay is between $10,000 and $20,000. Surely there should be some recommendation coming out so that we do not see these kinds of facts reported in the paper and the problems which result in other reserves because of that.

There are many other problems in the department I could mention. There are so many inefficiencies that I cannot even go into them. However, the problem which bothers me most is that we set aside tax dollars for the Department of Indian Affairs and only 30 cents of each dollar actually reaches the native people on reserves. There must be a better way of running the department to ensure that the money actually gets to those who need it.

When we have an energy problem in this country, such as we have just gone through, the premiers, our Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), the government, and all the best minds we can gather together become involved in attempting to solve it. They may not always solve it according to the way certain individuals in this House would like, but at least there is the commitment to solve the problem. Has that ever been done in the Department of Indian Affairs? Not to my knowledge, because we have not seen any extraordinary ideas in the past ten or 20 years to solve the problem. Why is it not done here? It is done in other countries. Land claims are still not settled, and we are falling behind in the statistics on health and housing, yet that has not been done.

Today I was talking to a native person. I asked how we could assist them to become more self-reliant. The department now pays the budget to reserves not once, twice or four times a year, but five times a year. I presume the department feels if it gives out all the money at the beginning of the year, it will no longer have control. They could not make the fatherly handout. That is the problem, but how do we solve it?

The person I was speaking with suggested that there be a native person in the districts that are set up, something like a parliament. That person would be responsible to the native bands in that district as well as to the department, would bring forward all the problems and be responsible for the management of money which goes into the district. If just that one suggestion were instituted, I bet it would do away with one-third of those in the Department of Indian Affairs.

When members of Parliament have a problem in their constituencies, the government knows about it very quickly. However, that is not the case with the Department of Indian Affairs. Those who have native people in their constituencies constantly receive people at their offices there, and in Ottawa.

We now have the constitutional express, and many native people here in Ottawa talking about the problems and the inability of solving those problems under the umbrella we have set up and the methods we have continued to follow for many years. We have lost confidence because we have not come up with new ideas. I said we, but I should say the minister and this government, because when the Progressive Conservatives were the government we were moving rapidly toward self-reliance. However, that was a very short period and we did not have an opportunity to put those ideas forward.

According to the motion as presented, culture and language are areas in which we have fallen back. Unlike other ethnic minorities in this country, native people have nowhere else in the world to go to renew their language and culture. They only have Canada. For thousands of years they have been here and, therefore, their traditions, culture and language must be looked after in a special way.

This is why the native people are calling for entrenchment of certain rights in the constitution. They are concerned that if those rights are not entrenched in the constitution before we patriate it, they will never be in there. This is the reason they have come to Ottawa twice in the last year to discuss this problem. Even though they have been promised they would be involved in every aspect which affects them directly, they have not been involved. There have been a few cordial meetings where they have been listened to, but nothing has happened.

The minister is saying, "Trust me. I will look after you once the constitution is patriated". We will see if there are any amendments accepted by the government resulting from the constitution committee which is now in place. We will see whether the proclamation will be in the schedule and whether these rights, language, culture and traditions will be maintained, because, as I said, there is nowhere else in the world they can go to renew them.

We spend $250 million a year on education for 300,000 people. Despite the millions that are spent each year, there are less native people graduating from high schools. As I mentioned before, there were only two in Edmonton, and 20 per cent in the rest of Canada. When looking for a job and attempting to assist their band, it is very difficult because more and more native people do not have adequate education. They do not carry on their education in universities and colleges. In most instances the amount of money available for them to live in the cities where they must go to attend college is inadequate.

There are hardly any teachers graduating who will teach the native people. The greatest success has been in those colleges set up by the native people. Maskwachees College in Hobbema, Alberta, is now graduating teachers with the help of the University of Calgary. They are finally graduating teachers to help native children attain some scholastic abilities, and not in the traditional ways that have been used in the past.

We all know of the alcohol problem and the number of native people in our jails across the nation. As far as alcohol is concerned, many people have had a drinking problem for years. The problem of attempting to dry these people out is the same as with any other person. It does not work in the established institutions. Where it is working is in the detoxification centres set up by the native people. Put yourself in their position.

I will use an example in my constituency. After being an alcoholic for ten years and finally receiving some help at a detoxification centre on a reserve, a person comes out of that institution. He has a grade seven education. Having been out of service for about ten years, who will hire that person? He has very little education and no real abilities, as well as a past record. We have to put in place the ability for that person to further his education and get the kinds of training and trades which are essential. As it is now, when he leaves the institution there is nothing to do but go back to drinking. He does not have the ability to take pride in himself and the people around him.

This is the case of over half the people in jails in Alberta. It is not quite that high in other parts of Canada. There is no counselling for these native people. If there is, it is only in limited areas. When they leave the institution, what is there for them?

Mr. Yurko: Hopelessness.

Mr. Schellenberger: In many cases, as my colleague says, it is hopelessness. We have to develop those programs. For years I have been watching to see whether those programs would be developed. I do not see them being developed. In some cases native people, in desperation, if they have their own funds, have developed this because they realize the problems. However, in most cases they do not have their own funds. They are dependent on the department to dole out funds.

As I conclude, I want to put on record a quote from the B.C. Indian Chiefs which I believe sums up the problem:

> As Indian nations, we have battled for many years on many fronts to retain our special status, dignity and pride. As Indian people we fought and will continue to fight for our right to exist as sovereign nations gathering strength from each battle.
> When we lose we become more determined and find other ways to continue the battle. We have fought governments, corporations, courts, small people, big people, and those who ever stood to threaten our lands and our rights. We've withstood racism, poverty, disease, ignorance, assimilation, social chaotic disorder and political suppression by paternalistic governments. We have survived. But now, our Indian nations across Canada are in "a state of emergency". Our future as Indian people has been put on the line.

That is why we have a conference here in Ottawa this week. Many feel it is a state of emergency. There has to be hope in order for people to have dignity and work their problems out themselves, not under some paternalistic hand. It has to come from within themselves. If they are not granted the tools to do that, such as the constitution, the ability to use their own money and make their own mistakes, that hope dwindles. When we look at the constitution before us, it is dwindling rapidly.

I do not know whether this is a good example, but two years ago I travelled to the Middle East. I visited Palestinian refugee camps. I could see that the people there had no hope. They could not get outside the camps. There were hundreds of thousands of them living on a few quarters of land. They had to exist on ten kilograms of flour, ten kilograms of peanuts and two quarts of olive oil a month per family, plus whatever else they could scrounge, and that was not very much. The United Nations helped with a program to feed some of the children so that when they dropped below a certain weight they could somehow keep them alive.

We ask why they resort to some extremes at times. We are appalled at those extremes. But I will tell you why they do these things. It is because there is no hope. Well, there is still hope for native people in Canada. We have to prove as a government that that hope is there and that we can establish the new policies which will give them that hope. In that way they can go on to become a great community within our confederation or their confederation and ours. We will not do that if we continue with the present policies, and that is why I have moved this motion.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with attentiveness to the remarks of the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Schellenberger). May I say that when the official opposition moves a motion of this kind identifying the failure of the government to promote Indian self-reliance and the continued failure to protect culture, language, and the health of Canada's Indian people, I do not think that too much attention has been paid to an awareness of the record and, indeed, an appreciation of the problem.

I do not have to remind the hon. member that his party formed the government for seven or eight months. I suppose I have been minister for a month more than my predecessor in the Conservative government. I listened with some interest to the condemnation in the sense that the hon. member directed it toward government. He indicated that the previous government had moved toward establishing innovative policies respecting self-reliance. I would appreciate it if the hon. member would enlighten me, sometime during the course of the day, on precisely what those policies toward self-reliance were. I can assure him right now that if he would articulate them, I would be more than happy to endorse them.

One thing I do know that the hon. member perhaps failed to note because of his busy schedule, is that there was an agreement in principle arrived at with the Committee for Original Peoples, the Inuit in the Western Arctic under the then minister of Indian affairs and northern development, Mr. Faulkner. I regret talking in the absence of my immediate predecessor. He may have some comments on this. That was a breakthrough in the sense of agreement in principle with respect to a comprehensive land claim reached with the Inuit people of the Western Arctic which would afford them a land base and economic guarantees for their future well-being. Because it was a comprehensive type of claim settlement, they would have a very high degree of self-government and/or self-reliance. It is something they negotiated and won through the process of negotiation, something which would give them a good economic and social base.

As I understand it, it was the feeling of my predecessor that that agreement in principle should be set aside, or suspended, without any further effort being expended bringing it to a final agreement. I might indicate that one of the first things I did upon becoming the minister was to visit the Western Arctic and the Committee of the Original People, and I indicated that we intended to honour that agreement in principle. I do not view the record of my immediate predecessors with quite the same sense of disapproval and I point out that one example.

The reason I will not point out any more is simply that I find it rather unique, with reference to this department, that when I go before the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development and meet the hon. member, and many others, I sense that there is, because of the intensity of feeling with respect to the condition of the Indian peoples and the urgency with respect to the development of the north, probably less partisanship there than in any other standing committee before which I have had the experience of appearing. In addition to that, various members of the House of Commons in whose ridings there are Indian people are deeply concerned, when they deal with the minister of the day, about working out problems. That tends to undermine excessive partisanship to a very great degree.

I want to indicate a sense of appreciation for the help not only of government members but also of members of both opposition parties, given to me in a spirit of non-partisanship. Along that line, I approached the hon. member and indicated that because so many Indian people are in Ottawa this week, because many chiefs have indicated they wish to see me and because I have a very heavy schedule, particularly over the course of the next few days, I would appreciate his understanding if I cannot be here for the entire day. I spoke to members of the New Democratic Party also, and I appreciate their understanding on that score. If I am away, my parliamentary secretary will certainly be here to note the remarks which are made, and I certainly will study them in some detail tomorrow.

There is a certain lack of awareness of the record. I will endeavour to be somewhat more positive later on in my remarks, but there are certain things which have not been accomplished over the years on behalf of the Indian people, despite funding which has been allocated for the Indian people's benefit.

The hon. member for Wetaskiwin referred to the Indian conditions document. That document was released by my department in June of 1980, and noted that the social, economic and other conditions of the Indian people improved in the last two decades. They still, of course, remain well below the conditions enjoyed by other Canadians. That document removes all doubt about that fact. Life expectancy, a reflection of health standards, is still ten years less among Indians than it is among the national population. University enrolment has increased, however—this is on the positive side—from 57 in 1963 to 2,700 in 1979. That was the good news.

The following is the bad news. Indian participation in the labour force is still less than what would be desirable. It is about two-thirds of the national level. Only about 32 per cent of Indians of working age are employed. Generally speaking, reserve resources have not been developed, due partly to the fact that many Indian reserves do not form economic units, and almost half of them are relatively inaccessible.

During the past ten years the greatest proportion of increases in government expenditures for Indian affairs have been in community services and economic development, but development funding remains at less than 10 per cent of over-all funding in the department. That is a source of frustration to myself and has been to my predecessors and others. It is indicative of the problem with respect to limitation of funds. It is a problem I have as Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, but it was also a problem faced by my immediate predecessor. Many programs involve heavy funding commitments.

I would like to deal with one matter to which my hon. friend referred. He said that only 30 cents of each dollar reaches Indians. I would like to have that figure examined in more detail by the committee because, quite frankly, I question its accuracy. The figures I have, and those which I think have been put before the committee, indicate that the administrative costs of the department are not more than 12 per cent of the entire budget. Certainly the 30 cents comes into question when one looks at that figure, and also when one recognizes that 35 per cent of the entire budget of the department is administered by the bands themselves. Perhaps when the hon. member refers to that figure he is talking about those bands which have taken over administration. They are taking over 35 per cent. There are bands which have not, but moneys expended on their behalf is not counted as part of the 30 cents. This casts a very different light on a figure of that kind, but the hon. member quotes it without further analysis.

I will carry on with some positive aspects. I think they should be emphasized simply because, when I talk with many Indian people, they express some unhappiness about the constant conduct of some of us in the House of Commons who continually refer to the gloomy aspects of their conditions. One said that he is a little tired of being considered the "poor little Indian" all the time. I can understand how they feel in that regard, so there might be some merit in talking about some of the positive things which have happened.

For instance, one could look at the participation of natives at all levels of government and, more particularly, at the active involvement in Indian political associations which have developed over many years. However, setting that aside and talking just about their representation at all levels of government, I refer to Senator Guy Williams, a native from British Columbia; Senator Willie Adams, an Inuit from the Northwest Territories; and the hon. member for Nunatsiaq (Mr. Ittinuar), an Inuit from the Northwest Territories who is a member of the New Democratic Party. I understand that the hon. member for Winnipeg-St. James (Mr. Keeper) will speak after I do. He is a native member.

Frank Calder is a native MLA in the B.C. legislature. Not now active but defeated are the Hon. Leonard Marchand, a native from British Columbia, and Wally Firth who was a Dene member of Parliament from the Northwest Territories. Many others ran but were not elected. They ran and conducted good campaigns with the determination to serve here one day. Some of us have been defeated. I certainly was. Bill Shead is native Liberal from Manitoba. Don Moses is a native who ran for the Liberals for a seat in the House of Commons. He is from British Columbia. George Erasmus is a member of the New Democratic Party who ran in the Northwest Territories. Archie Patrick is a native member of the New Democratic Party from British Columbia. Jim Gladstone, I think, became a senator under the Right Hon. John Diefenbaker. Tagat Curley is an Inuit Liberal. Andrew Kirkness is a native Liberal from northern Manitoba, and Charles Sark is a native from Prince Edward Island.

Mr. Nielsen: And Joe Jack.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): I missed Joe Jack, and I am sure I missed some others, but this list is indicative of the number who are sitting or who have run.

Mr. Nielsen: Erik Nielsen, Whitehorse Indian.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Erik Nielsen from Yukon. It is a positive thing that band governments have emerged to take basic responsibility for local administration. That is a very encouraging sign and, as I say, 35 per cent of the entire funds are now under local administration. That trend is going upward and I am sure will continue, ending the problem of self-reliance about which the hon. member in the official opposition complains.

There is general agreement among Indian people and the government that relations between the two are more positive now than they were. There are still complaints. There is a far greater degree of Indian participation in the provision of health, education, community and other services than there was a decade ago. Indian people have greater access to more kinds of employment, both on and off reserves, than they did before.

I might talk about a greater degree of recognition of the government's position. The hon. member says that the government has done nothing to protect the culture, language and health of Canadian Indian people. I might add that one of the reasons for the preparation and release of the "Indian Conditions" report was to create an awareness among those interested in the affairs of Indians—including, presumably, the official opposition—of the real nature of the problem and to promote a widespread recognition of the real and urgent need for true Indian self-reliance to be realized. Judging from the hon. member's comments, the opposition has obviously read and concurs in that report since it endorsed its logical conclusion that greater self-reliance is not only desirable but also essential.

However, some other aspects of the situation have apparently gone undetected by the drafters of this non-confidence motion today. The government is committed not only to promoting Indian self-reliance in all possible ways but also to ensuring that all Canadians and their representatives are mindful that this is a fundamental objective of government policy and of government actions.

The principle of self-reliance is basic to the government's approach to the constitution. In the Indian Act we emphasize self-government and the provision of services. As an example I can cite housing, education, economic development and the preservation and enhancement of Indian language and culture.

● (1630)

First, I should like to talk about self-reliance in the constitutional context, in the context of constitutional development. Contrary to the position taken in today's motion, what is happening on the constitutional front is not a failure but a testament to the government's commitment to promote Indian self-reliance. Here are some examples. A decade ago, the government began to address seriously the issues of native rights by encouraging Indian participation in the development of a mutual understanding of their nature and extent. Issues underlying concepts of aboriginal and treaty rights are complex. They require extensive consultations, both with Indians and with provinces. These issues include, from the native perspective, the right to self-government, hunting, fishing and trapping rights, education and language rights, a special share in resource revenues, special provisions pertaining to family law, the administration of justice, and so on.

For the record, I want to review some highlights of the government's efforts to encourage native participation in constitutional renewal.

In June of 1978 "A Time for Action"—a basic document of the government of the day—gave priority to the place of native peoples in constitutional renewal. The constitutional amendment in Bill C-60 provided an opportunity for native-government dialogue on the proposed charter of rights. In October and November of 1978, native observers were invited and welcomed by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to the first ministers' conference.

On January 30, 1979, the Prime Minister invited national native federations to send observers to the second first ministers' conference. On February 5 and 6 of 1979, at the conference, the Prime Minister proposed that the ministers meet with native leaders to explore their constitutional concerns. On February 12 of 1979 the Prime Minister released a list of new constitutional items, including "Canada's Native Peoples and the Constitution."

On April 29, 1980, the Prime Minister gave a speech on the constitution at the National Indian Brotherhood's all chiefs conference, and focused on the need to define aboriginal and treaty rights, native self-government, native representation in political institutions, and federal-provincial responsibilities for the provision of services to native people.

On August 11, 1980, the Prime Minister sent a letter to the national native organizations affirming observer status at the upcoming first ministers' conference on the constitution. On August 26, 1980, the continuing committee of ministers on the constitution met in subcommittee with native leadership, received briefs and discussed their concerns.

From September 8 to 12 of 1980 the first ministers' conference was held at which attention was drawn by a number of premiers and the Prime Minister to native rights issues.

On October 2, 1980, a resolution was proposed for a joint address to Her Majesty that the constitution be returned to Parliament. Section 24 of the charter of rights in that document was to ensure that the proposed resolution in no way detracted from any rights of the Indian people, whether it be statute law or treaty proclamations in the jurisprudence that has developed over the years.

On October 10 and 17 of 1980, the Prime Minister assured the House that constitutional negotiations with native leaders would continue and that any changes directly affecting native peoples would only be made after discussion with them. The Prime Minister stated that meetings with native leaders would continue to take place to consider how best to protect native rights.

One aspect of this chronology has been left to the last because it is so central to the issue of Indian self-reliance raised in motion. Last April, the Prime Minister announced to the National Indian Brotherhood conference that $1.2 million had been approved, $400,000 for each of the three national native organizations, to help them prepare for discussions on the constitution. On November 7, 1980, the Prime Minister, in response to questions from members, made note of this contribution and of subsequent meetings and correspondence. Also on November 7 the Prime Minister said:

> The precise definition of those rights in a written constitutional document is something, I repeat, that we have assisted the Indians, native people, Metis and the Inuit to research for themselves. If they come up with some form of amendment which is acceptable to all parties in this House—and, I should say hopefully, to several of the provincial governments—we are prepared to accept amendments on this as on other things. I would merely want to point out to the hon. member that I think the simple claim of aboriginal rights, without anyone knowing exactly what it means, is not a matter which one can convincingly argue should be put in the constitution at this time. First of all, the courts would be called upon to interpret such a constitutional amendment, and I think everyone would want to know what aboriginal rights are, what is their extent, to whom they apply, and so on.

Hence the justification for the research money which was made available to enable the Indian and native associations to deal with their constitutional position. That money has been utilized, I think. As we noted, the committee on the constitution which is sitting right now will be hearing native organizations throughout this week. It has already heard from the Inuit organizations which made ample use of this type of funding arrangement and which were able, with these resources, to obtain the kind of constitutional expertise which they desired.

The latest development is the Prime Minister's most recent letter to the national native organizations in which the following message was communicated: First, patriation will not reduce the natives' rights in Canada; second, the government's commitment to work with native peoples toward constitution change remains firm; third, the list of natives' priority concerns, including aboriginal and treaty rights, internal self-government, representation in political institutions, and a guarantee of services will be addressed along with other items which would be treated as the first item on the next first ministers' meeting in the second phase after the constitution is brought home; and finally, the pursuit of the objective to entrench native rights in the constitution will likely involve a number of meetings with first ministers, and we as the government are committed to that end.

I have dealt briefly with the question of the self-reliance of Indians in the constitutional context. I should like to deal with it now in reference to the Indian Act and self-reliance in that context. It is clear to us, when we look at the Indian Act, that the relationship between Indians and government must change.

As a result of extensive consultations last summer, in which I was personally involved to a considerable degree, it became clear, first, that there is no consensus among Indian people on this subject, and I am speaking here about the Indian Act and what should be in it to foster greater self-reliance; second, that the National Indian Brotherhood does not, at this time at least, support amendments to the Indian Act. To be a little more objective, I should explain that their preoccupation at present is with the constitution; third, it became apparent to me during these consultations that there are still, however, a significant number of Indian bands who wish to assume greater control of their affairs. Therefore, we are now considering legislation to provide the option for self-government at the band level for those bands that wish it.

The scope of the legislation is still under review and it was subject to the type of consultation which took place during the summer. We indicated then that the legislation would establish band councils as governing bodies in their own right. It would permit them to administer their own financial affairs with accountability to their own people. Also the legislation would give them control of the administration of programs to allow them to pass and enforce bylaws within their own communities, and they would have increased responsibility for the administration of their lands and resources. These are some of the very key elements which would establish self-reliance in the context which the hon. member for Wetaskiwin talked about. They were the key elements in the proposals which I took to the Indian people this summer.

I should like to talk about self-reliance, and services to Indians. The first area with which I will deal is that of housing. I do not know if hon. members opposite are aware that last July cabinet approval was given to a submission which I took to my colleagues for an additional $20 million to improve Indian housing on reserves. The amount available for housing in 1980-81 was raised to $93 million. The long-term effect of improvements to Indian housing will be to strengthen Indian communities. They will be involved in decision-making in a much more adequate way, and now there will be much more adequate funding for them to do that.

The second area is education. It is now government policy in education to achieve two objectives: first, increased Indian control of education, and second, more adequate funding in the way they wish it. In this area the department since 1976, with the support of the National Indian Brotherhood, has pursued the goal of greater Indian control of education. Some of the more encouraging aspects on that point would be that most Indian bands have now established education committees; the department is committed to a plan to transfer up to 50 per cent of the teaching staff to Indian-controlled schools; the department, with Indians, is now reviewing current education agreements with the provinces at the request of the Indians. We are doing that with their involvement.

In terms of education achievement, Indian elementary shcool participation is now equal to national levels, there has been a tenfold increase in Indian participation in universities, and now Indians are virtually involved in all kinds of professional training, including nursing and legal. One only has to look at the tremendous number of Indian lawyers who, in a very articulate legal fashion, are advancing the causes of native people.

I should like to talk about economic development, which is a very worth-while preoccupation of members of the committee. A great deal of discussion with Indian people has been held over the last few months, and studies have been undertaken. Both have confirmed that for Indian economic development to be successful, it must be planned and controlled by Indian people themselves and it must go beyond the reserves as the resource base.

Our experience over the past few years has shown that economic development has been extremely successful in sectoral programs and under the auspices of such programs as the Manitoba Indians Agricultural Program, the Saskatchewan Indians Agricultural Program, and the British Columbia Indian Fishermen's Assistance Program. These initiatives have provided models for Indian control and comprehensive management by Indian people of development projects. I think the hon. member for Wetaskiwin would agree that the projects have been notably successful. Efforts have been continuing to increase Indian access to employment opportunities off the reserve. An example is the Indian Oilsands Development Corporation in Alberta which, since 1976, has participated in the Syncrude oil sands project in the province. My department is now working with Indians to ensure Indian participation in other major resource development projects such as the Alaska Highway and Polar Gas Pipeline projects.

There will have to be more exploitation of on-reserve development potential, particularly in the areas of agriculture, timber, recreation and oil-gas where the emphasis must be placed. Moreover, such development cannot take place piecemeal, or by the government. It must be done in a comprehensive way, and we realize that Indian people must play the lead role. Opposition members would surely not have the House believe that Indian people should be dependent on the government in this regard. I am talking about involvement in these megaprojects. We are now consulting with Indian people to seek ways to improve the structure of financial support for Indian economic development ventures. Some meetings will take place with Indian leadership during the course of this week in which not only myself but the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) will be involved. Our goal is to ensure that the sources of funding available to all Canadians are tapped to their fullest and that Indian economic development takes place within the existing economic structure of Canada.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I regret to interrupt the hon. minister but his allotted time has expired. He may continue only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Nielsen: The minister has not spoken on Indian affairs during this whole session, so I think he should be allowed the opportunity to do so now.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): With that somewhat dubious observation, let me indicate that I appreciate the time to complete my remarks. I will be very brief.

I should like to emphasize the optimism which can be engendered by us all and to negate some of the more negative aspects emphasized so much over the years. I am referring to the land claims activity which is of prime concern to the native people of this country. I would advise the hon. member who put this motion of my appointment of Dennis O'Connor as chief federal negotiator for the Yukon claim. The hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) is well aware of that appointment.

Mr. Nielsen: It is a fine appointment.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): This appointment has received the approbation of the hon. member for the Yukon, the government of the Yukon and the Council of Yukon Indians. I saw him just yesterday and he told me that the negotiations with the Council of Yukon Indians are going reasonably well. Also I advise the member of my appointment of Senator David Steuart of Saskatchewan to try to bring to conclusion the agreement in principle, and of course I am referring to the COPE claim, Also in August Robert Mitchell was appointed to deal with the Inuit claim in the eastern Arctic, and Robert Young was appointed to deal with the Nishga Tribal Council land claim. These appointments have received not only the endorsation of the territorial government but of the provinces. The inactivity of some of these land claims has been an impediment to development and a source of irritation not only to the natives but to the non-native population who find that little can be accomplished as long as these claims remain inactive.

Indeed that has been a very encouraging development. I appreciate the indulgence of the House in allowing me to point out some of the positive aspects of the fronts that are being moved on now in all these areas, to cope more adequately with the severe problems which historically native people have suffered. They are all primarily designed to provide, as identified in the motion, the Indian people of this country, Canada's first citizens, with the self-reliance that not only they want but we endorse.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Cyril Keeper (Winnipeg-St. James): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak on this motion since I think it clearly raises a question which is of great concern to us all, to all Canadians and all native people. I wish to say that while native and Indian people make up a very small percentage of the population, their problems are very real ones, in spite of improvements. It is not only the fact that native people face very real problems which is important but also the fact that the continued existence of these problems serves as a symbol to many people. It serves as a symbol of the incapacity of a nation to come to grips adequately with these problems. It symbolizes a government which fails to deal with problems effectively or adequately.

I wish to make some comments about the remarks made by the minister. He made reference to elected native people. I must say that the capacity of native people to become elected to legislatures across this country is important, but it is certainly not sufficient. The central question which faces the Indian and native peoples today is that of participation in the decision-making process as a community, not simply by way of having individuals elected to legislatures across the country.

The minister also made reference to the constitutional process. He detailed the involvement the native people have had so far in that process. I must say that while he was able to elaborate a large number of details, I think the fact of the constitutional express coming to town with a large number of Indian people, who still feel totally locked out of any real involvement in the constitutional process, indicates that the efforts so far to involve Indian people in that constitutional change process have been ineffective. It is not, however, too late. I think the recommendations before the committee could be responded to positively by the government. The government could still come forward with an amendment to the constitutional resolution which would affirm aboriginal and Indian rights rather than simply make a negative statement, as is in the present resolution. That statement says that nothing in the resolution will take away from aboriginal rights.

With regard to the minister's comments about the Indian Act, I must say that unless the general mood that is generated by the way the government is handling the constitutional process is reversed, and an appropriate and constructive mood is struck, when the minister comes to deal with the Indian Act he will have a very difficult time indeed. It is clear one issue is related to the other in terms of the over-all quality of the relationship between the Indian people and the government. It is very important that the constitutional process be dealt with in a constructive manner so that when the minister comes to deal with legislation he has a constructive relationship to rely upon, in terms of working out those amendments with the Indian people.

The minister made reference to improvements and optimism. I think there is certainly a role they can play. That is not the only side of the coin. Clearly, we would not be talking about the conditions of Indian people without those conditions continuing to be serious and calling for a serious response.

The minister referred to Indian involvement in oil projects. My colleague, our energy critic, referred to that in question period today. I have in my hand a letter from the vice-president of the Indian Association in Alberta which is addressed to the premier of that province. It outlines the very serious conditions which Indian people continue to suffer in that province, including, among other things, an increasing mortality rate. In other words, in the province in which there is the greatest economic boom presently in this country, the conditions of Indian people continue to deteriorate. We are talking about very serious, and not always improving, conditions when we talk about the conditions of Indian people. This has obviously been well-documented over the years.

The minister's own report on Indian conditions, while pointing to some improvements, obviously outlines very serious problems which continue to exist. These problems call for serious attention. They are not only dealt with in the minister's report but there was also a report on Indian and Inuit health conditions which outlined, elaborated and sketched the completely intolerable conditions under which Indian people live in this country.

While making these introductory remarks I would like to say that there is obviously some validity to the claim that there are some improvements. We continue to face problems which are very serious and intolerable. These problems require attention. I would like to focus my remarks on Indians in the urban situation since that is much closer to my own experience. It is the general deterioration of the conditions under which Indians live in a rural setting which causes the migration to cities. Whether they are status Indians or non-status they come to cities with a great deal of hope. They come in search of better housing, better jobs, and better living conditions.

In the cities, status Indians face some special problems, some of which relate to the jurisdiction the federal government has over Indians and the jurisdiction provincial governments have with regard to social matters. I am thinking now of child welfare. I know that in my home province the provincial government tends to deal with the problem of Indians and child welfare on reserves only in emergency situations. There is a gap in the services, and a serious problem arises. What tends to happen is that rather than the problems being dealt with, the federal and provincial governments deal with the problems of status Indians, where there is this conflict of jurisdiction, more in terms of a revenue problem about who is responsible financially. As a result, the Indian people and the Indian children get caught in the middle and fall between the chairs.

More specifically in dealing with the resolution, I note that it refers to self-reliance. My understanding of that term is that it calls upon the government to assist Indian people in their own self-help efforts. The reason I translate the word "self-reliance" into "self-help" is because I am afraid of the attitude which might prevail in one saying that self-reliance means we no longer have access to public funds in order to cope with the problems which we face. I think that is a real possibility since I know, with regard to the provincial government in Manitoba, under the premiership of Mr. Lyon, the approach there is really one that could be described as a freedom to starve, to be self-reliant in that sense. That is certainly not the sense in which I am speaking to the motion.

When that government came into office in Manitoba, the first thing it did was cut off many of the very valuable services to the Indian people, particularly those in northern, remote communities of the province. This has only helped to stimulate further the migration to the cities. Certainly, it is not the sense of self-reliance to which I am speaking here, and that is why I specify "self-help" as opposed to the word "self-reliance" which is in the motion.

While Indian people suffer under very grave social conditions, they should no longer be referred to as victims. It is useful to adopt the notion of the Indian as victorious, as the survivor, and as the person who is growing and coping better with these very difficult problems. It is important because in instances when the social problems which Indian people face are listed, it is often felt by Indian people to be a put-down. Obviously, we must face these very serious social problems in the light that Indian people are no longer simply victims of those problems, but are turning the situation around and coping with their problems much better than ever before.

In order for the Indian people to cope with these problems, the government assistance or public assistance must be effective. Indian people require the assistance of their fellow citizens in order to cope with these problems. the problems faced by Indian people in the cities are of a global nature and embrace such areas as education, employment, difficulties with the criminal justice system, lack of adequate social services and all the problems a person can face. Indians face these problems particularly in cities in the west, but also in many other Canadian cities such as Montreal. Of course in the west Indians in Winnipeg, Regina, Saskatoon, Edmonton, Calgary and Vancouver face these problems. All these cities have large Indian populations.

These very serious problems require immediate and urgent attention. Since the government is aware of these problems, it is incumbent upon it to take action which is appropriate to the size and urgency of the problems. I have seen no evidence of this action so far. When the Indian Conditions Report was first published I felt, perhaps naively, that this document would cause the government to take serious action in this area. I also anticipated that the government would do something about the problems which Indian people in the cities face, but I have seen no evidence of that so far.

The Winnipeg Indian Council has often come to me about the fact that the Department of Indian Affairs does not deliver its services in the city. It seems to stop—

Mr. Orlikow: Writes them off.

Mr. Keeper: —it writes them off when native people move into the urban environment. Certainly this is not acceptable to the status Indians who live in the cities, nor is it good for the over-all community because it means there are serious problems which are not receiving adequate attention. This policy must be changed. The Indian Affairs Department should not write off Indian people when they move to the cities.

The government has a clear responsibility to the status Indians, but with regard to non-status Indians its obligation is not all that clear. While there is no specific clause in the constitution which outlines the federal government's responsibility to non-status Indians, clearly, because of the seriousness and the national scope of the problems, the federal government does have a responsibility to become involved so that provincial governments and local communities can adequately deal with these very serious problems faced by both status and non-status Indians.

There are several parts to this motion. It refers to the "failure" of the government, which raises the question of what is the benchmark for failure? It is not whether the government is doing a little more or whether there is some improvement. The benchmark should refer to the disparity between the living conditions of Indian people and the over-all population. Clearly, against that benchmark, the government has failed. It must take more aggressive action in this area. When the motion refers to self-reliance, we think of it in terms of self-help. The government must move to help Indians where they seek to help themselves. It is no use simply to allocate money for problems unless that money is used in programs which have been designed by Indian people.

There is one gap in the motion. By and large it is a good motion, but it contains no specific reference to living conditions, although it is implied in the words "failure to protect the culture, language and health of Canada's Indian peoples". However, it would be helpful if it were spelled out more clearly. Accordingly, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Regina East (Mr. de Jong):

That the motion be amended by inserting therein, immediately after the word "health", the following words:

"and living conditions".

I move my motion because I believe that the motion, whether it refers to self-reliance, culture or language, is really based upon the living conditions under which people suffer today and this, fundamentally, is what must be changed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I thank the hon. member for Winnipeg-St. James (Mr. Keeper) for having provided the Chair with a copy of the amendment in advance. In a procedural sense, I find it acceptable and in order.

Mr. Lorne Greenaway (Cariboo-Chilcotin): Mr. Speaker, I would like to begin today by referring to three articles which recently appeared in the Toronto Globe and Mail. These three commentaries dealt with the plight of our native people in present-day Canada. They were written by Mr. David Lancashire, the chief feature writer of The Globe and Mail. Allow me to quote the first paragraph of article number one, which appeared on page 10 of the October 18, 1980, issue:

They call themselves refugees in their own land. They crowd by the thousand in the downtrodden districts of big cities across the country, some 15,000 in Montreal, perhaps 30,000 in Toronto and the same in Winnipeg, 20,000 or more in Vancouver. They are Canada's urban Indians, who have traded the poverty of their reserves and settlements for poverty and racial discrimination in the bright lights.

Let me quote from the first paragraph of the second article found on page 7 of the October 20 issue. It reads:

'We have got 111 houses on the reserves', says Roland Crowe, Chief of the Piapot Indian band outside Regina, 'and only four of them have running water or sewage disposal. There are almost no jobs, and 279 of our people have moved away. A lot of families are on welfare. The younger band members are getting very depressed and frustrated, but we are better off than most—we are an upper middle-class Indian reserve'.

Finally, I would like to quote the lead-off statement in the final article which appeared on Tuesday, October 21. It reads:

The 1980s must be a decade of decisions and actions, the white man was saying, but the Indians didn't pay much heed. After 100 years of what many Indians regard as empty promises, and in a decade when a minister in Ottawa can still forbid an Indian to raise chickens on a reserve 1,600 kilometres away, it sounded like more empty talk. The white man was Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau, his audience in Ottawa last April was a gathering of chiefs and elders from Indian bands across the country. Canada's treatment of its native peoples has been a failure, Mr. Trudeau confessed, and simply pouring larger amounts of money into the same programs will not work either. He told the chiefs the time had come for Indians to set their own action. It is time, said Mr. Trudeau, for Indian bands to be given a chance to govern themselves.

The first two quotations illustrate that the problems faced by native people are very real, and are still with us. The last one indicates that we have a Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) who publicly, at any rate, has the solution. But the Prime Minister of this country admitted publicly on April 29, 1980, that Canada's treatment of native peoples has been a failure. For once, I find myself in complete agreement with the right hon. gentleman.

The Knox report, or to give it its proper title, Survey of Indian Conditions, published this spring, documented very clearly what an absolute disaster government programs have been. This report provides the following dismal list of statistics. These statistics, I am sure you will agree, sound as if they were derived from some fourth-rate, Third World, poverty-stricken nation. Mentioning the Third World reminds me that one of our best known Canadian Indian chiefs, George Manuel of British Columbia, coined the phrase, "The Fourth World" in reference to our native Indians. As a matter of fact, he is the author of a book by that title, a book which deals with the plight of the native people. I can recommend it to anyone who is truly interested in this subject. My colleague, the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Schellenberger), quoted Chief Manuel in his closing remarks.

To return to the Knox report, I ask you, Mr. Speaker, does this sound like Canada 1980? The following illustrates how the Indian people of Canada are disadvantaged: 11,000 new houses are needed to meet existing needs while current construction barely meets new demands; 40 per cent of Indian housing needs replacement or repair; and one family in three lives in crowded conditions on reserves, usually in relatively small houses in poor repair, resulting in unhealthy and unsafe conditions. More than half of existing Indian housing lacks safe water or proper waste disposal. The alternatives are unprotected water supply and waste disposal that is a potential source of pollution. Fires and fire deaths on reserves are six or seven times higher than national levels.

Indian use of health services is two and a half times higher than national levels. Disease, accidents and violence are four to five times higher than national levels, with a considerable proportion of those related to alcohol abuse. Mortality rates are improving, but three times as many Indians die between birth and middle age as do non-Indians. One-third of Indian deaths result from accidents or violence. This is especially true for young adults, among whom the number of suicides is particularly high. Between 55 and 70 per cent of the Indian population use social assistance. This is 22 times higher than national levels. These are documented facts. And we, in Canada, the fabled "Just Society" have not been willing so far to supply the solutions.

As Canadians, how can we continue to pat ourselves on the back to maintain such a holier-than-thou attitude while such statistics occur in our own backyard? How can we continue to pump money into foreign countries and not address such horrendous problems in our own nation? In my view, it is hypocrisy of the ultimate magnitude.

Even this report, from which I have just quoted, is, with all due respect to its author, an example of the misguided endeavours so typical of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. This little gem, "Survey of Indian Conditions" cost the department $246,940.26, almost a quarter of a million dollars. But what is even more disturbing is that $154,000 of it, or 62 per cent of the total cost of this catalogue of chaos, went to so-called consultants. This means to me that the Department of Indian Affairs is such a circus that it is not even able to author a report dealing with the very problems it works on day in and day out. What a sad case for economy, efficiency and effectiveness.

Who were the consultants? Surely they must have been some of Canada's foremost Indian leaders but, as far as I know, no Indian people were among the consultants. The consultants included W. Babcock, M. Giuliani, J. Nicholson, and G. Cassidy. I do not recognize any Indian names among those. If we are going to spend money on reports such as this one, at least some of the hired consultants should be Indian people. Who know the problems better than those who have faced them head on every day of their lives?

What we have here is a report, a rehash of well-known facts, which has cost the taxpayer a quarter of a million dollars. Worse still, it has deprived the needy of a quarter of a million dollars.

I say the Indian people of Canada have been studied to death. We have had report after report. All of them have pointed out the failure of various programs which continue to roll out of the department. We have had report after report on how to correct the situation, rolling out of the offices of the various organizations. It has become a game of report writing, or who can turn out the highest pile. It is the battle of reports, and I have a stack of them six feet high in my office. If anyone does not believe me, they are welcome to come to my office with a tape measure and measure them. Maybe all of this is simply a diabolical plot to have the problem solved by the department and to have the Indian people reading themselves to death.

These issues are with us today. Why are we making such slow progress in helping the Indian people of Canada solve the problems we have imposed upon them? I think I am aware of a few reasons for this. At the top of the list, and of paramount importance in my view, you must have a federal government willing to give the issue top priority. Have we seen this since 1968? I think not. This is borne out when you consider that the department has had six ministers in a 12-year period, not counting the nine months our party formed the government. I have been told that it takes most men or women at least two years to become familiar with and to get control of a ministry. I should think that this would be especially so vis-à-vis the ministry about which we are talking. If gambling were allowed in this House, I would bet you $20, Mr. Speaker, that our present minister is shuffled to a new post within six months. The pattern is there, and it is well established.

Think what ramifications this must have upon the department. It is not hard to see why this department is run by bureaucrats. If you worked in a business, Mr. Speaker, which had seven managers or bosses in 12 years, you would probably begin to think that you knew more about what was going on than any new manager. You and your fellows would begin to make and implement policy simply for self-survival, if for no other reason. Also, if you are so disposed, you would be able to control the manager, or minister in this case, because he would never be around long enough to know what was really going on. In my opinion, this is what has happened in the Department of Indian Affairs.

There are many examples of programs and policies initiated through discussions between Indian leaders and well intentioned ministers which have been scuttled by the bureaucrats in the great teepee in Hull. Promise after promise made by the minister is thus broken, leading to frustration, building rage in those people who are supposed to be the benefactors.

Another reason for the failure is the seeming inability of the department to listen to and, what is more important, to hear and digest what the Indian people are saying. A good example of this has recently come to light, and that is the department's plan for the 1980s. When the directional plan for the eighties was unveiled to native groups, it was immediately denounced as a return to the policy of assimilation that was the thrust of the infamous 1969 white paper. The native protest against the 1980s plan was so overwhelming that the minister sent a telex to the National Indian Brotherhood in which he said, referring to the directional plan:

I think it should be made quite clear that this was sent out to senior personnel in the Department of Indian Affairs as a discussion paper only.

However, in a letter dated the very same day as the telex, October 3, 1980, an assistant deputy minister of Indian Affairs told all regional directors general that "we, as a department of the government, are committed to ensuring that it—the directional plan—is effectively instituted".

I do not think that I have to amplify on this bit of nonsense. The problem is self-evident. Judging from this evidence, you can see who runs the department. It is certainly not the minister.

A third situation is one I touched on briefly in my first point, and that is the building of a bureaucracy. We now have approximately 7,000 civil servants employed by the department. When you look at the structure of the department it is interesting to note that there are five assistant deputy ministers, 13 directors general, 51 directors, and 20 regional directors. We are awash with directors. We could drown in a sea of regional directors. My cup runneth over with directors general!

The amount of paper that goes through the system would have to be measured in mega tons. In my own riding the Indian band managers have become the most skilled of all in filling in forms and applications. I actually hear of cases where town administrators have gone to band managers to get advice on filling in complex government forms. This has reached a ridiculous stage, but if you want to keep 7,000 people busy and you desire to build layer upon layer of bureaucracy, then paper shuffling is the order of the day.

A fourth reason for failure is the lack of authority of the standing committee. Of course this could be said of most committees on which we sit. In the case of our committee I get the distinct impression that all we are is simply a sounding board. I have only been on the committee for one year, but already we are seeing the same delegations a second time, hearing the same sad stories. We sit, we question, we listen, but that is as far as it goes under the present system. We must have some reform of the system as it now exists or it will collapse, and so it should. We, as a committee, have about as much influence on this government or on the department as a gnat has on an elephant's posterior. This must be changed.

A fifth reason for failure is in the area of funding. Expenditure on the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development as a percentage of the total government budget has remained constant at 1.7 per cent since the 1970-71 fiscal year. It has remained constant in spite of the fact that the conditions are appalling. The conditions outlined in the Knox report are not new. The Prime Minister has known about these conditions; he admitted this on April 29 of this year. Yet the department, which is supposed to help improve these conditions, gets no increased aid in that endeavour.

Let me give a specific example of this government's priorities. About a month ago I was sitting in this House when the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Lapointe) rose to praise the budget. The hon. member proceeded to point out that the "business acumen" of his constituents had netted them $419 million in Department of Regional Economic Expansion grants since 1969, almost half a billion dollars.

I do not know if this is a display of business acumen or government welfare. However, it is not for me to judge on what basis, political or otherwise, the government disburses its funds. But let me point this out. Beauce has a present population of 74,759 people. There are about 300,000 status Indians in Canada, or about four times the population of Beauce. According to the Knox report, Indians have received annual DREE grants ranging from $130,000 in 1972 to $3 million in 1978. That is for all Indians in Canada. That does not approach what Beauce, a single riding, has received, and with one-quarter the population. I am sure that the Indian people could display their business acumen also, given such funding. I would like to thank the hon. member for Beauce for bringing these figures to my attention, as well as to the attention of Canadian Indians.

We often hear that Indian people do not have business acumen, that they are not sharp. I wish to give an example of something that happened to me. Last Friday I received a telephone call asking whether we would distribute buttons, such as the one I am wearing. I said we would be happy to do that. Today I received a phone call asking for my cheque. They are $2 each. Therefore, they are sharp.

But that is not the end of it, Mr. Speaker. The Liberal government is not interested in making Indian bands independent and viable economic units. It appears to want them on welfare, on the backs of taxpayers instead of as economic assets to our country. This point is neatly illustrated by the following figures. In 1976, the department spent $100 million on social support; in other words, welfare, and in 1979 it spent $150 million, a 50 per cent increase. In 1976 the department spent $44 million on economic development and in 1979 it spent $43 million, an actual decrease of about 2¼ per cent. Does this make sense? Does it make sense to increase handouts 50 per cent and at the same time reduce development funding? I think not.

Then we have the issue of the mismanagement of funds. I look forward to the tabling of the audit of native trust funds, ordered over a year ago by this House. I am confident that we will see fresh horrors from the office of the Auditor General at that time. We already know that the department has lost some of its records of these trust funds, and I can only imagine what has happened since then. These are not even government funds we are talking about, these are native funds held in trust by the government. As I said, I look forward to the audit which I hope will clarify this murky area.

The list of cost overruns by the department on its projects is also a nightmare. The list of overruns tabled by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) this spring provides for depressing reading. The department had 77 cost overruns, some of up to 550 per cent. This is insulting and frightening news for the taxpayer, Mr. Speaker. We have questions on this on the order paper asking for specific details, and have yet to receive the answers. I know I have been critical. It is the easiest thing in the world to criticize, and that is my role as an opposition member. However, it is only fair that I should be called upon to offer some solutions.

Many people, including the highest officials, know what these solutions are. Even the Prime Minister knows, and again I quote him in his speech of April 29 at the all-chiefs conference. He said, "It is time for Indian bands to be given the chance to govern themselves". This is the answer in a nutshell. This is what Indian leaders have been telling minister after minister for years on end. What must be understood is that today we are dealing, in most cases, with a very sophisticated segment of our population. Indian leaders and band managers are perfectly capable of organizing their own affairs. Give them the mandate and give them the funding, wind down the department and dismantle the layers of bureaucracy. I am positive that they can handle it. Naturally, there will be some problems. However, a system could be put in place that allows bands to opt in as they feel ready to accept the responsibility. The dollars expended would then actually reach the level at which they are so desperately required.

I know that many in the department feel this could be achieved. There are many good and dedicated people in the department, and to them I pay tribute. However, the problem we have here is that we are asking bureaucrats to agree to phase themselves out of their jobs. Such dedication is understandably difficult to find. This is where visionary and innovative government policy, carried out by a strong and capable minister, enters into the picture. Nothing will ever happen if we continue the ministerial revolving door approach to this entire shameful and disgraceful situation that now exists in our country.

In closing, on behalf of the native people of Canada I appeal to the minister, I appeal to this government to move rapidly in the direction I have indicated.

[Translation]

Mr. Ray Chénier (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I merely wish to add a few details to the overview the minister gave us of some of the amendments made to the Indian Act in the last few years.

[English]

The process of Indian Act revision has been going on for almost 20 years. The present Indian Act became law in 1951 and was last amended in 1956. It became apparent in the late fifties that there were already deficiencies in the act, and a report was tabled by a special joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons in 1961. In 1962, the cabinet of the day decided to proceed with revisions to the Indian Act and a motion to that effect was introduced into the House in 1963. Recognizing that there was a need to be better informed about the conditions and the needs of the Indian people before such comprehensive revisions were proceeded with, Professor Hawthorne was commissioned to carry out a survey of the situation of the Indian people of Canada. In 1966 his report was released and recommendations on comprehensive revisions to the Indian Act together with an elaborate plan for consultation with Indian representatives across the country were prepared the following year in 1967. Following those consultations, the white paper on the Indian Act was introduced in 1969 but the principle that it proposed was soundly rejected by the Indian people as being contrary to legislative needs that they themselves envisaged.

After a number of exchanges of viewpoints in the 1970s, including the presentation of the Indian Association of Alberta's "red paper", the National Indian Brotherhood was formed and undertook to come up with suggestions for the type of revisions which they saw as being necessary from the Indian point of view. On their behalf, the Indian Association of Alberta prepared a submission to the government in 1974 but it was unable to command unanimous support from the various Indian groups. Consequently, the next year, the government agreed to establish a joint National Indian Brotherhood-cabinet committee process to tackle the question. This joint committee, through its various working groups, examined a variety of concerns, using as its base the principles spelled out in the annual general assembly of the NIB in through the summer of 1975. These were: The Indian Act should be revised on a phased basis; that is, that there should be no comprehensive revision but that the revision should be tackled on a subject-by-subject basis; that any revisions suggested should be made optional so that individual bands could study the new revision and each could make its own decision as to whether to adopt it or reject it; and that there be an extensive consultation process through which proposed revisions to the act would be made fully known to the Indian people and could be fully discussed by them.

At the same time, in 1976, the cabinet agreed to fund the NIB and its member associations in order to enable them not only to study recommendations which might be produced by the joint committee but also, when it was considered desirable, to come up with their own alternatives to any proposed legislation. The National Indian Brotherhood withdrew from this process in April, 1978, feeling that although a measure of agreement had been reached on some issues, there was nevertheless an over-all lack of progress in accepting their major position on the question of Indian rights and how this issue should be dealt with within any Indian Act revision. However, the government was still urged by certain Indian groups to continue with the process and at the same time it decided to continue funding the work of Indian associations in their efforts to develop their own views on the nature of the required revisions.

As a result, certain positions were put forward by the minister to chiefs during 1978 and certain responses were received from some associations in the period which followed. Over all, however, many bands and associations felt that further consultation should be involved in the discussion of these arrangements of Indian Act revision and the present minister decided, at a meeting of all the chiefs here in Ottawa last May, that he would like to get a clearer understanding of their viewpoints before proceeding further with this process. Accordingly, during this past summer he met with Indian groups across the country, from Vancouver to Truro, from southern Alberta to Fort Good Hope in the Northwest Territories. It became clear from these meetings that there was still a wide divergence of opinion on the whole question of legislation affecting the Indian people. Some groups were opposed to any changes in the present Indian Act until much more time had been given to its study and the presentation of their counter-proposals. The groups have already proposed certain progress and substantial issues which they would like to see adopted by the government as revised Indian Act legislation. Still, other groups have insisted that while they are not opposed to changes to the legislation they wish to see some of their essential concerns settled within the constitutional committees before agreeing to any other legislative revisions.

At the same time, there are also bands and associations that have urged action be taken now to either amend the present act and its present provisions concerning Indian local government, or, alternatively, to introduce separate enabling legislation which will meet these needs without necessarily disturbing the remaining fabric of the present Indian Act. It is this latter course of action which seems to be more appropriate at this point in time.

There are many aspects of the present Indian Act which severely inhibit the ability of Indian governments on reserves to take adequate responsibility for their own social, economic, political and cultural development. The legal status of the present system of band councils has been queried on a number of occasions and the findings of the courts have consistently been ambiguous in this matter. Thus the ability of band councils to be considered as valid governing bodies in their own right has not encouraged the commitment of developmental funds from other sectors of the Canadian business community which is essential if the human and physical potential of reserves is to be fully developed.

It is the minister's proposal that enabling legislation with the object of recognizing the legal status of Indian governments within the reserve communities should be introduced during the coming year. In keeping with the ongoing concerns of the Indian people, this legislation would be optional in nature and only bands wishing to do so need take advantage of its provisions which would recognize the responsibility of bands to be in full control of their own community planning and development.

● (1740)

In addition, this legislation would not propose to diminish the minister's responsibility as it relates to the ultimate questions of protection of Indian lands and the status of Indian people in their special relationship with other Canadians. It would, however, remove many of the barriers which the present Indian Act imposes across the chosen road to self-discovery and self-reliance. It would eliminate the sense of dependency and paternalism which is epitomized in many of the provisions of the present act. With the introduction of this legislation the previously agreed principles of full consultation would still continue. It would be proposed that a parliamentary committee travel across the country to meet with Indian bands and associations to gain their first-hand reactions to the proposed legislation. It would be the intention of the government to listen carefully to the recommendations made by that committee and to try to ensure that the final form of any legislation would meet, in as many ways as possible, the expressed needs of bands which would prefer to be responsible for the development of their own communities under its provisions rather than those of the present Indian Act.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the legislation we are proposing will certainly draw the day closer when the autonomy of Indian reserves and bands will be recognized throughout the land. The recommendations we will implement as we pursue our course in coming months were submitted to the previous government which, at the time, chose to ignore them. To my mind, the negative criticism of hon. members for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Schellenberger) and Cariboo-Chilcotin (Mr. Greenaway) are somewhat ridiculous, considering the fact that during the nine months their government was in power they showed very little concern for the problems of the Indians of Canada.

[English]

Mr. Lorne McCuish (Prince George-Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, for decades the government seems to have recognized the need for adequate native housing and for health programs, but it has really only recognized the tip of the iceberg.

I believe we have to go back a long time to find out just what did happen to the native people in Canada. We have to go back to the time of Columbus. We came to North America and took North America. It was populated by native people, and we felt we could just convince them that they should come into our life-stream and adopt our life-style. Because of the independence and pride these people felt, they could not accept the way we conducted ourselves. They could not accept the manner in which we lived. Because of that we decided to put them into specific areas and build fences around them. We left them there, possibly hoping that they would go away. Well, they have not gone away, nor have their spirit of independence, their pride and their culture. The only things about the Indian which have gone away are the rights which are his and which for decades and generations we have chosen to ignore.

I have in my hand a confession of failure. It is a survey put out by the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development entitled "Indian Conditions". Because my great concern is about Indian housing and health, I was appalled by what is contained in this book and by the facts to which the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development admits. Statistics prove that the department has failed dismally to give Indian people in Canada any semblance of human dignity.

With respect to present housing needs, the number of units needed has risen from 6,000 in 1966 to 11,000 in 1977. In 1970 the then minister of Indian affairs and northern development, the Hon. Ron Basford, made the commitment that he would provide housing for Indian people which, in a period of ten years, would provide them all with adequate living accommodations. He asked for 54,000 housing units over that period of time, and only slightly over 3,000 have been provided by him and his government over that period of time. There was a promise of 54,000 and an accomplishment of 3,000, which I feel is not only appalling but also a real offence.

The book is fraught with comparisons with respect to what Indian people are expected to put up with and what the rest of the Canadian population demands and receives. I have spent sufficient time in municipal affairs to know the demands imposed upon municipalities by provincial governments and imposed by the municipalities on people building homes. Yet we find that less than 55 per cent of Indian homes have running water. Less than 45 per cent have sewage disposal. Fire deaths per 100,000 population number 28 among the Indian population compared with four in the rest of Canada. With respect to fire protection, only on 15 per cent of reserves is there any semblance of fire protection. There is incredible and intolerable overcrowding in inadequate Indian homes. These people do not have a chance if fire breaks out in their homes. There are seven times the number of fire deaths in one segment of our population than in the rest. This segment of our population is being shabbily treated and put down for a long period of time. These are the original people of this continent, and even with all the years behind us we have gone only downward in our efforts to establish them as a nation in their own right. They should be given more opportunities than those of us in the rest of Canada, but we are giving them far fewer.

It is a little known fact that in terms of people per square mile the most densely populated area in the entire world is the west end of downtown Vancouver. By any standard that would be considered a ghetto, notwithstanding the fact that that ghetto is made up of high-rise buildings of recent construction. These buildings are most certainly provided with all the facilities which are demanded with respect to health and living conditions. However, on the basis of people within a room let me give the House another grizzly statistic. In the west end of downtown Vancouver there are 1.2 people to a room. In the Fort Babine reserve in central British Columbia there are 3.8 people to a room. If we compare what our governments have called Indian housing with what we find in a high rise reinforced concrete building with all the facilities, and if the west end of downtown Vancouver is a ghetto, what in hell shall we call the housing found on reserves?

• (1750)

That is precisely what it is; it is hell. I have seen them and I walked away ashamed. The cost of operating the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development has been mentioned by my colleagues. Indian people are being provided with money from the taxpayers, but that money has been laundered so much that the Indian people in the end get very little of what the taxpayer is giving. One hon. member in my party made a reference to this, but it was challenged by the minister. According to the information which I have taken from the estimates, the Indian and Inuit affairs program operating expenditures, such as authority for the minister to enter into agreements, amount to $289,069,000. Capital expenditures, such as expenditures on buildings, works, land and equipment, construction and acquisition of houses for Indians, amount to $67,455,000. The total expenditures of the department amount to $809 million. When we find that the cost of operating the department is six times the amount provided to the Indian people for housing, we must come to the conclusion that those disgraceful figures speak for themselves.

No one can deny that our Indian people have suffered through the decades from degradation and deprivation. What a shame it is that they are also being fractionalized now by the politicians and are made the victims of regional disparities and regional pork-barrelling. It appals me that the Indians doubt and mistrust each other, that they look askance at each other.

If I may, Mr. Speaker, I should like to quote some government figures again. For example, the province of British Columbia has the second largest native population in Canada, yet, British Columbia receives the smallest amount of funds from the federal government for native services and programs on a per capita basis. In British Columbia, the individual Indian receives $191.61 a year per capital project as compared with his brother in Quebec who receives $2,198. British Columbia Indians get only 8.72 per cent of what Quebec Indians receive from the department. Quebec Indians receive more than twice the funding per capita that Indians in the province of Saskatchewan receive. It is bad enough that the politicians direct officials of the department in the disbursement of funding to assist native people. No one can deny that it is impossible to do a worse job managing the affairs of the Indians that has been done by the federal government. I am not putting the blame on the hard-working officials of the department nor am I blaming any of the ministers who have been in charge of that department. I put the blame on the Canadian people and their governments which, over the decades, have given no consideration to the rights and needs of the native people. That is why I listen very carefully when I heard my Indian friends talk about Indian government. The money which is being spent on administration is shockingly disproportionate to what eventually seeps down to the native population, and even that is spent unjustly because favouritism is being shown, and favouritism originates with the politicians, not with the department. The one who suffers from it is the native Indian. There is no way in which we can provide his family with the facilities that are being made available.

I recall receiving a report on conditions in other parts of the world. Part of the report stated the following:

Anyone drinking this water unboiled breaks out with rashes, pimples and sores, especially around the eyes, ears, nose and mouth, but his digestive system also becomes infected with diarrhoea, nausea and worms.

I am not speaking here of central Africa, I am speaking of central British Columbia. I raised this point in the Thirty-first Parliament with Mr. Ivan Head, chairman of the International Development Research Centre. Mr. Head responded in the following way:

—our statute states that IDRC's jurisdiction shall be working in the developing regions of the world. By my definition, there are regions of Canada that qualify. I would like very much, and hopefully with—and it will have to be with—the full support of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, to try out some of our techniques with the native people of Canada.

He went on to say in part:

—I will insist that we do this with the use of native persons themselves. I will not hire consultants to go and do the work for them. It must be done in the way that we have found successful abroad.

There are two points there, the most glaring one being that a responsible person heading a federal agency recognizes that part of our population is as primitive, filthy and deprived as any in central Africa. The second is that facilities are available within the federal government's structure, use of which could be made by the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development but which the department has not chosen to use.

I see that my time has expired, Mr. Speaker. I only urge that the House give consideration to the motion.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock this evening.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Dave Dingwall (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak tonight I must say that I appreciate the opportunity to address myself to the issues raised in the opposition motion. It gives members of Parliament an opportunity to discuss the contents of the motion and perhaps to address themselves to some of its substantive parts. Perhaps one could query the sincerity of the motion inasmuch as the opposition benches are practically vacant this evening.

Mr. Clark: But filled with distinction.

Mr. Dingwall: Notwithstanding that, the aspect of the motion to which I should like to refer is that respecting education. Education has been recognized by the Government of Canada and Indians for some time as essential to reduce dependence and increase self-reliance.

Basically the concern of Indians and the government has been twofold: to ensure increased Indian educational achievement, and as a means of accomplishing this, to provide for increased Indian control of Indian education. In relation to the second issue, the principle of Indian control of Indian education has been an objective of Indians and the department since the early seventies. The object of this policy is not simply to transfer to Indian control the direct administration of schools, but to assure that the curriculum and the method of teaching is adapted to Indian needs in a way which will assist Indians in meeting the challenges they will find in the day to day world.

Obviously this is a difficult challenge since Indians must gain their education not only on reserves, but in provincial schools and indeed in post-secondary institutions such as universities and colleges. The first step has been at the band level and has involved the development of support to band education committees which could assume responsibility in the first instance for planning educational activity, and in the second instance, engaging provincial systems to ensure that they provide for the needs of Indian students.

At the moment this policy has reached a critical stage. Now only about 8 per cent of Indian students are in Indian-controlled schools, although about one-third of the education budget, or approximately $90 million, is controlled by Indian bands. During the next three years the department, in co-operation with Indian bands, will attempt to accomplish two things: first, to transfer approximately 50 per cent of Indian education staff now employed by the department to band control, and second, to review and revise joint school agreements with local school boards to provide education to Indian children. Therefore, by the end of the next two to three years Indians will have achieved a comprehensive degree of influence in the education system as a result of this progressively evolving joint policy of Indians and government.

Another indication of the increasing Indian orientation of the education system is the fact that of the 1,800 teachers employed by the department, approximately 500 are native people, 400 have proficiency in native languages and 600 have special training in cross-cultural education. But Indian control must be accompanied by increased participation and quality in order to accomplish the goal of reduced dependence and increased self-reliance. Some of the indicators in this include the fact that the proportion of Indian children enrolled in elementary schools is comparable to national levels; secondary enrollment has more than doubled since 1965 and university enrollment has increased tenfold since 1970.

Mr. Speaker, we readily acknowledge that this performance is not yet satisfactory, although it is particularly heartening to see the increased involvement of Indians, particularly in the post-secondary institutions and the various professional fields. We believe strongly, however, that the key to increased effectiveness and quality in education is Indian participation in management and planning. Experience has shown in schools in Quebec, in Fort Alexander, Manitoba, and in the Indian Federated College and the Indian Community College in Saskatchewan that Indian control leads to an increase in quality, participation and, above all, a sense of pride.

Indeed, Indians are justifiably proud of these accomplishments since these are the initiatives not of governments but of themselves. For our part the government will continue to support Indian initiatives as we have done in the past. We have done this by providing funding—education accounts for more than one-third of the department's budget. We have done this by providing a special education framework through departmental and band-administered schools. This has been done in the past by our support of Indians in reaching new and revised agreements with provinces and local school boards which meet Indian priorities. It has been done by assisting in the development of Indian-oriented curricula and through cultural support to Indian cultural education centres. It has been done by providing special tuition and living allowances for Indians in post-secondary education.

Mr. Speaker, what I have said answers in part in a very real way the motion now before the House, one which in no way deals with what is actually happening in the field as it relates to Indians and the services available to them. Mr. Speaker, the fact that Indians are taking the initiative within this framework confirms to me, and I believe to themselves and all members of this Parliament, that Indian pride and self-reliance is well established and growing with each passing year.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have always been proud to number among my constituents, in the two constituencies I have represented in this House of Commons, citizens of both status native background and Métis background. I am pleased my colleague from Wetaskiwin (Mr. Schellenberger) has introduced this motion. It has allowed us to recognize today that in an age and in a country of increasing affluence, and at a time when the air is rife with talk of rights, the basic ability to live of our first citizens has been marked by a movement backwards—not by a movement forward.

The figures are stark, they are known and are shocking to all of us who have followed Indian affairs. The life expectancy of native people in Canada is, on average, about ten years less than that of other Canadians. That is a figure which is worse than the figure of ten years ago. We are not moving forward, we are moving backward. Pre-natal and infant mortality is 60 per cent higher among native people than the national average. Again, this is a situation which has not improved over the last nine years. Among the native people the suicide rate is three times the national average. The rate of violent death is also three times the national average. In terms of unemployment, chronically, the figures run to 20 per cent or 30 per cent; at certain places at certain periods of time the figures for unemployment among native people run in excess of 80 per cent. In 1960, 20 years ago, 10 per cent of native housing units were in need of major repairs. By 1977, 24 per cent of native housing units were in need of major repairs. Fire deaths are about seven times the national average.

I was interested to hear the hon. member speak about post-secondary schooling. The fact is that the proportion of Indian children aged 14 to 18 in school has been continually declining, since 1973 to a point at which almost 50 per cent of the Indian children in that age group are no longer in school. That is a dismal and frightening fact. Pre-vocational training attendance is down from 3,400 in 1973 to 1,000 in 1979. Those facts, sir, are all the more damning for this Parliament since the status natives of Canada are the one group of people whom the federal division of powers least affects by statute, treaty and tradition. They are citizens for whom the Government of Canada is particularly responsible. Their education, welfare and rights are indisputably federal responsibilities.

There have been instances when those responsibilities have been shamefully betrayed by their guardians in the Government of Canada, as the native people of James Bay were betrayed when the Liberal government gave only the most limited support in a crucial conflict where Ottawa had absolute and unlimited responsibility. But the deeper condemnation is that at a time when the federal government is trying to extend its powers into fields occupied previously by the provinces and the private sector, the health and the dignity as well as the rights of these people for whom the federal government is now responsible have deteriorated steadily and disgracefully.

Mr. Speaker, I say to you that if the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Trudeau) had given the cause of native Indians one-quarter the priority he has given his own personal preferences for constitutional change we would have made more progress as a nation against the shameful spectacle of Indian poverty, suicide, infant mortality and the indignity which has become a part of life for the original citizens of this nation. I specify the Prime Minister because he is the head of the government and his priorities prevail.

But the condemnation, sir, extends to all of us in this House. Most of us have been too ready to allow other priorities to intrude. We have been too ready to turn our eyes away from the problems that the system of dependency on others has incubated among the native people of our land. No realistic thinking person will pretend that these problems are easy to resolve. Those of us who are experienced in this area are more aware of their complexity and difficulty. Those problems began with bad decisions more than a century ago. The reserve system has steadily drained status Indians of initiative and dignity. But the native people themselves have begun to reverse that trend. They have begun to take steps, some of them halting and some of them very dramatic. These steps will enable them to regain their pride and regain their place in Canada. For their pains and the work they have done they have been excluded from the decision about their constitution. They have been confronted with both paternalism and prejudice.

I want to speak tonight about paternalism because it is within the direct responsibility and control of this Parliament. I have particular cause to know that we have excellent people serving Canada in the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, as we have in the rest of the public service. But federal bureaucrats will always be tempted to think they can make better decisions than the natives can. Occasionally they will be right, but usually they will be wrong. There is no department in the Government of Canada where the temptation to run others' lives is stronger and there is no department where the consequences of succumbing to that temptation are more ruinous for the people involved. When my colleague, the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp), who is now sitting on the constitutional committee, was the minister for Indian affairs we began to implement a deliberate decision to change the direction and orientation of Indian affairs policy across this country, to move more responsibility to the band councils themselves so that native people could grow in responsibility by exercising responsibility. We recognize that the most legitimate organization in the Indian community is the band council. It is a council which is elected by and responsible to the Indian people themselves. We tried to build up the force, the influence, the role, the independence and the autonomy of those band councils. I draw attention to that policy, Mr. Speaker, only because it appears to have been abandoned and replaced by new forms of paternalism.

Under the policy announced by the hon. member for Provencher, when he was the minister, the department would increasingly move back to an advisory role. This new approach would help Indian people carry out the programs that they propose. It would not tell them what to do and control their lives by controlling the purse strings. Three major reforms were announced and were in the process of implementation by the government which it was my honour to lead. First, we made it clear that band councils would be given the power to control their own social and economic development. They would no longer be told so rigorously what to do by the people in Ottawa or elsewhere. Second, a process was being established so that planning and development of programs would begin at the local level. It would start with the band council and not be forced down upon the band council by someone with less knowledge but more authority.

Third, the Indian affairs department would move gradually away from its administrative role and, instead, would provide resources to assist programs begun by the band councils. Regrettably, this new approach which would have broken the cycle of paternalism appears to have been abandoned by the Liberal government. That is a betrayal of the people whose interests that department is supposed to serve.

Whereas self-management and the exercise of responsibilities at the local level were characteristic of our approach to the programs of the department, full consultation and participation was the basis of our approach to constitutional renewal and the role of native people. As prime minister I met with Indian leaders to present our government's view that Indian representatives would participate fully in all deliberations of the consultative committee of ministers on the constitution where there was a clear Indian interest or where the result of such discussions could affect Indian people significantly.

Indian, Inuit and Metis leaders would be called upon to participate in the development of the agendas for first ministers' conferences. We explicitly stated our hope they would join at some very near time with first ministers in the discussion of specific issues. Similarly, last August my party suggested that if the first ministers' conference of September broke down, as in the event it did, a constituent assembly be formed to deal with constitutional renewal. In the event of such an occurrence we made specific provision that native spokesmen be included in addition to members of Parliament and members of provincial legislatures and territorial councils. The president of the National Indian Brotherhood responded to this suggestion stating that it was a very, very attractive progressive proposal.

This record of consultation and participation contrasts sharply with the dramatic events in this city this past week—a constitutional process which, only at the last minute, under duress, allowed for Indian presentations before the special committee on the constitution, a process in which the Prime Minister has refused to meet with the Indian leadership to discuss his constitutional proposals, a process which has so angered and so alienated the Indian people that they have felt compelled to go to the parliament of another country, the parliament of Great Britain, to present their case.

Indian rights and Indian concerns should be debated here in the Canadian Parliament. The Constitution of Canada should be decided here in this country by the people and representatives of this country, and in a way in which all the people of this country can be heard. I raise the constitutional matter because the conditions of poverty and of suffering which we all know to be too real a part of Indian life in this country are linked inextricably to the constitution. While the problems are specific—alcoholism, unemployment, school drop-outs, prostitution, to mention a few—the matter at base comes back to human dignity.

When a community has so essential a sense of the dignity of a people, that is why the constitutional questions which draw native people here from across this country are so central to the human, social, and economic problems which have been discussed throughout this day. The Indian, Inuit and Metis people of Canada regard themselves as being part of a community, with community or tribal rights as well as individual rights. These people cannot be taken out of their history.

Their history rolls out of their imagery, it rolls out of their language and out of their connection with the land which was once theirs alone. To most of us whose ancestors came after the aboriginal peoples, a constitution is a document of convenience, a way of ordering our lives. To the Indian and Inuit people, the Indian Act and the treaties are the only guarantees of their survival against a majority culture which, by threat of arms or guile of argument, took their lands and their livelihood and, inexorably, took their dignity. What they have left as a people is memory and legal claims and status which they feel are menaced by this constitutional approach. And now, happily, a growing pride and a growing sense of purpose.

I make the point that their documents are more important to them than our constitution is to us. If we say that their rights can wait while language rights are addressed, we are saying that guarantees which are sacred to them are secondary to us. Naturally, for the Parliament of Canada to say this will only breed anger and resentment. But, more dangerous still, that approach could destroy the growing sense of pride which is the only way this original Canadian people can find the will to work its own way back from the despair which causes indolence, alcoholism, prostitution and those shocking facts of infant mortality.

I am no romantic about Indian affairs. The mythical days of Crowfoot and the other ancient chiefs are long gone, together with other myths. But a people remain; a people as innately strong as any other, a people who once owned this continent and managed it well, a people who, like any other, can lift themselves up only if they start with dignity. In his days Chief Crowfoot commanded the plains and foothills where my father and I were born. When I was young and growing up, the people of Crowfoot had fallen from the pride which he symbolized. But in these last two decades, that has changed and the pride and strength that ruled a continent is becoming evident once more. If we worry about young people dying, about unemployment rates that can sometimes be in excess of 80 per cent, and if we want to reverse the shameful legacy of the reserve system then we must encourage that pride and that strength where we find it. We must encourage local native leaders to lead. That is why the tool of economic development exercised with local autonomy is so important, and that is why the rights, the source of identity and dignity of our original people cannot be treated by the Parliament of Canada as something secondary.

In our judgment, particular programs in the Department of Indian Affairs are wrong because they have turned away from the idea, the ethic, that decisions are more effectively taken when they are taken by band councils with local knowledge and local responsibility. But what is most wrong is that the priority we have given the Indian and Inuit people, who are the special responsibility of this Parliament of Canada, is too low. Their standing, in our view, their place in the work that we undertake, the priority which we assign them, is wrong. This must change if we are to accept our responsibilities as a Parliament to the native people of Canada for whom we are the only and ultimate guardians and spokesmen.

Mr. Doug Frith (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, before I go further I would like to comment on some of the remarks made by the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark). The Leader of the Opposition made the allegation in his remarks that this government has changed its view of how it wishes to treat the evolution of the native peoples. I will make clear in my speech that that is not the case. I will point out that regardless of which party has occupied this side of the House our record with respect to the treatment of native people, whether it be with regard to the delivery of health care or with regard to social economic policies, leaves many things to be desired.

Despite all of the dollars we have allocated to many of the problems discussed by members of this House, it must be acknowledged that one cannot, simply by the use of dollars, alleviate the situation which exists for far too great a percentage of the native peoples of this country. I think everyone will agree that the presence of the elders, the chiefs and representatives of the Indian people in Ottawa this week make the subject of Indian affairs an appropriate and a timely topic for debate this evening. That speaks for itself.

The health of the Indian people was made a responsibility of the Department of National Health and Welfare in November, 1945. By order in council, the Indian health services division was transferred to the Department of Health and Welfare from the then department of mines and resources. It is important to note that only the health services were transferred. All other services for Indians, including land, housing, education and welfare, and even what is referred to as hygiene and sanitation, remain with the Indian affairs branch.

This is an important point because responsibility for the provision of many of the services which govern health—I am referring to such things as adequate housing, sewage disposal and safe drinking water—rests with another branch of the government rather than with the ministry responsible for the health of the Indian people.

In 1945, it was estimated that there were only about 125,000 registered Indians in Canada. By 1967 the Indian population had almost doubled. Today their numbers are almost 310,000.

The health of the Indian, and, I may add, of the Inuit people, has always been a focus of concern for this department. When the Department of National Health and Welfare took over Indian health services, Canada's original people were riddled with tuberculosis. Even as early as 1880, reports from Indian agents listed the disease as the major cause of death among prairie Indians. In 1897, for example, the death rate from tuberculosis among one tribe of Indians was reported at 54 per 1,000.

In 1945, when the department took over Indian health services, the Indian tuberculosis rate was over 12 times the national rate and there were 990 Indians in hospital with active tuberculosis. While tuberculosis is still a matter of concern today, the rate for new and reactivated cases is only slightly more than 100 per 100,000 population. While federal health authorities cannot relax their vigilance over tuberculosis, new patterns of mortality and morbidity have emerged that are of far greater concern, not only to the department and the government, but to most Canadians as well.

Despite the improvements that have taken place in the health of Indians since 1945, death rates for Indians in all age groups are two to four times the national average. For example, despite considerable improvement, the death rate for Indian infants in 1978 was over 76 per 1,000, or twice the national rate. Mortality in the one to four age group is over three times the national rate, as is mortality in the 20 to 44 age group. That statistic is simply not acceptable to anyone who happens to represent the people of Canada in this House.

Over one-third of Indian deaths are due to accidental causes, many of which are preventable and should not occur. In the past decade, trends in Indian mortality and morbidity have shown marked improvements, particularly in the areas of infectious and respiratory disease. But, with the exception of heart disease and cancer, rates exceed those for the general population. One of the main reasons for the lower health status of Canada's Indian people is the harsh social and economic environment in which the majority of Indian people live. Although living conditions on Indian reserves have improved dramatically over the past 20 years, the fact remains that Indian social and economic development have not kept pace with the growth of the population.

In 1977, the Indian affairs branch estimated there was a backlog of 11,000 housing units on Indian reserves, and that to eliminate this backlog and to meet the demand for housing resulting from normal population growth, the current rate of construction would have to be doubled for the next five years.

The majority of Canadians take sewage and waste disposal and a safe and abundant supply of water for granted. Over 95 per cent of households in Canada enjoy these services. Nevertheless, only about half the houses for Indian people are equipped with running water and toilet facilities.

A great deal of catching up must take place in the effort to improve the physical environment on the reserve. As this comes about, there will be some improvement in the health of the Indian people, but the gains will not be dramatic until the Indian socioeconomic situation improves.

Social conditions on many Indian reserves are a major concern of the government and the Indian people. Direct evidence of this can be found in the appallingly high rates of suicide which have reached almost epidemic proportions among the 15 to 24 age group. Suicide accounts for almost 35 per cent of the violent deaths. Let me repeat that statistic; it accounts for almost 35 per cent of the violent deaths among young people, and for over 20 per cent of such deaths in the 25 to 34 age group.

The alcohol and drug abuse situation among the Indian people is another major contributing factor to the low level of physical and mental health experienced in many Indian communities. Health and Welfare estimates that over half of Indian sickness and death is alcohol related. It is estimated that hospital admissions for Indian people related to alcohol problems are five times the national average, and the rate for Indians living on the reserve is over twice as high as that for Indians living off the reserve.

I could continue this litany of health problems faced by the Indian people, but I think the figures I have quoted suffice to show the magnitude of the problem and the concern that this government, and indeed all Canadians, feel for the circumstances surrounding the life of our native people.

I would like now to review the growth of resources which the federal government has made available for Indian health services in the past decade. These figures are for Indians living in the provinces; they do not include the resources spent on health services provided by the federal government for all residents of the Yukon and Northwest Territories.

In the 1970-1971 fiscal year, Indian health services employed 1,588 people in the delivery of health services to the Indian people living in the provinces. Today, Indian health services employ 2,116 people and contract, in addition, for the services of a further 755 Indian and Inuit people through contribution agreements. Operating expenditures which were $29.8 million in 1970 to 1971 increased to over $96.1 million in 1979 to 1980. During the decade, the health and welfare department has expended over $45.4 million on capital projects. It now runs 15 hospitals 95 nursing stations and numerous other services. Nevertheless, as I pointed out at the beginning of my remarks this evening, that despite all the dollars spent on delivery of a health care system to the native people in this country, despite massive increases in this area, our success rate is far from what I think should have been accomplished in the past decade.

A new health policy was implemented for the Indian people. I return to this topic because the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) mentioned it in his speech this evening. The hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp) instituted this policy, so we cannot accept responsibility for it. However, we decided to support the intitiatives which commenced under the jurisdiction of the hon. member. I think it is well known that on this side of the House we have allowed native peoples in local councils, whether in the delivery of the health care system or in the beginning of an education system for their young, to have a say in recommending where federal expenditures should occur, thereby alleviating the system which exists now and is almost a self-perpetuating problem. I hope that at some point we will allow the system to expand so that native peoples can have their own say respecting federal expenditures.

The implications of this policy with respect to delivery of health care are, perhaps, greater than the authors of the policy first realized. I will now outline one of the problems we encountered in 1979-1980.

● (2040)

For example, expenditures on health services, such as glasses, dental care, drugs and medical transportation, which are not covered by provincial medicare plans, have skyrocketed and have reached the point at which over 66 per cent of the operating budget, excluding salaries, was expended on non-insured health benefits in the 1979-80 fiscal year. In dollar terms, the cost of these benefits has increased from $28 million in 1978-79 to an estimated $41 million in this fiscal year. As Indian health services is not a statutory program, the increase in uninsured costs is putting an enormous squeeze on the funds budgeted for Indian health programs.

The feature of the Indian health policy that we believe has the greatest potential for bringing about improvements to health relates to the federal government's willingness—and the Leader of the Opposition mentioned this—to transfer responsibility for local health care services from the department to the Indian community. Already, a number of transfers have taken place and more are in the planning stage.

For example, in Saskatchewan, the Battlefords Indian health centre is gradually taking over responsibility for health services to nine Indian reserves. In the Pacific northwest, the Nishga tribal council is being funded by the department to plan the establishment of a local health board for the Nass Valley that will run the local health services for both Indian and non-Indian residents. It is interesting to note that the Nishga tribal council has already taken over the school board, and we are confident that they will do a great job running their own local health care delivery system.

There is an important aspect of the Indian health policy that I wish to call to your attention. The policy is careful to state that the health needs of the Indian people are met through services provided by the federal government, by the provincial and territorial medicare and hospitalization systems and by the local community. Health services to the Indian people are, therefore, a partnership between the three levels of government, each of which has a specific role and responsibility for the provision of clinical and preventive health services. This is an important point and I wish to stress that this government does not wish to set up a parallel system of health care of the Indian people which would exclude the full participation of the provincial and private sectors in the delivery of services.

One question, I am sure, is foremost in the minds of hon. members in this House. It is: what is the prognosis for the health of the Indian people in the future? I would like to be able to answer this question optimistically, but there are a number of variables which make it difficult to do so this evening.

On the positive side, greater Indian involvement in health, as part of the federal policy of transferring responsibility to Indian local government, offers considerable promise. Also, Indian people have become more acutely aware of their health needs and responsibilities. On the other hand, the socioeconomic situation of the Indian people leaves a lot to be desired, and one can foresee economic development difficulties in the future, especially on the more isolated Indian reserves.

As long as opportunities for employment are limited to the provision of community services, unemployment on reserves will remain at between 60 per cent to 70 per cent of the work force. Only when there are natural resources in the area, such as fish, lumber or minerals, can an isolated Indian community expect to reach full employment. Nevertheless, the potential for economic development must continue to be exploited and new sources of jobs must be created.

As long as present harsh socioeconomic conditions persist on Indian reserves, it is difficult to see any major reductions in socially-induced mortality and morbidity.

Although the federal government is spending over $7 million per annum on alcohol abuse programs, it is sad to say that there is little tangible evidence that alcohol-related deaths and sickness are being reduced.

In 1978-79, the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development spent 43 per cent of federal expenditures for social services on social assistance, most of which went on direct payment of social welfare assistance. Almost 8 per cent of Indian children are in child care. It is not so much the percentage that should say something to the Canadian people, it is the fact that when we talk about the number of native children in child care, it is almost five times the national rate. The number of adoptions of Indian children has increased fivefold since 1962, with an increasing proportion of adoptions to non-Indian parents.

The Indian people have suffered over 200 years of dependency. A major task of the federal government is to help the Indian people break away from this dependent state, and this is the thrust that the federal government is following in its relations with Indian leaders. The light at the end of the tunnel is community self-government, with the Indian people accepting responsibility for the programs and services which are currently being provided directly by the federal government.

Self-government, within the broad framework of Canadian society, and the development of greater economic opportunity is surely the key to the social and cultural survival of the Indian people. This will require increased expenditures for individual and community development, for housing and services, and for economic development. Ways have to be found to make Indian communities sufficient in employment opportunities so that the young people can stay in their communities and not have to migrate to alien Canadian cities, looking for work.

Canadians have an enormous obligation to the original people who inhabited this continent thousands of years before the first white man arrived. The task of all of us is to assist them to establish their place in society where they can feel that their culture and their social and economic development is secure. This places an enormous responsibility, not only on the Indian people, but also on all other Canadians. It will take patience, resources and good will, but if we and the Indian people are determined, we can all look forward to a brighter future.

I say this in a meaningful way. If we look realistically at the future, we realize that despite the enormous amount of resources we are going to devote to dealing with the problems of native people and despite the fact it will take a number of years to occur, we hope that at some point non-Indian people in Canada, will be striving to achieve a level of health and well-being equal to that of the Indian people, rather than the other way around, where they are continually trying to play catch-up with the delivery of health care in the social system we have developed for other Canadians.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. My purpose in doing so is to thank the representatives of the other parties for agreeing to our request that instead of our having one more speaker tonight for 20 minutes, we will be given two with ten minutes each and ten minutes only.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I do not think it necessary to seek unanimous consent of the House because the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre indicated he has already achieved that. Subsequent comments indicated that members of the Liberal party may choose to use the same option, and I will be advised by them. In order to conserve as much time as possible for those who wish to speak, I will recognize the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mrs. Mitchell) and, pursuant to remarks made, it will be ten minutes and ten minutes only.

Mr. Kempling: I want it understood, Mr. Speaker, that we have our full 20 minutes left for our last speaker. If we choose to have two speakers for ten minutes each we will, but we will still have our full 20 minutes left.

Mr. Knowles: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Unfortunately, the mathematics suggest that if each and every one of those who choose to speak does so to the extent of the time described, whether it be multiples of ten or 20, we will be attempting to get exactly 64 minutes into the next hour. I cannot give an undertaking to do that. Much as I would like to do so, I am unable.

Mrs. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, the NDP has included living conditions in this amendment because we feel one of the most serious problems facing native people, both in the cities and on reserves, is the appalling housing conditions. This has already been mentioned by a number of speakers.

We know that the housing is not only unhealthy and unsafe, but is without adequate sanitary conditions such as clean water, and is not constructed with a view to fuel conservation. As a result, the young people are leaving the reserves for the cities. The people are living in overcrowded conditions. Women, especially those raising children on their own, are often the last to qualify for the limited housing being built. Housing and the servicing of land is a very important government responsibility and must be given high priority for government funds. It is important to train local people to help make some impact on the terrible unemployment situation on the reserves. It is very important to look at the funding so that people can feel they do not have to go begging but can get adequate mortgages without getting permission from the minister with only a small proportion of the people qualifying. Adequate housing is necessary for families as well as for elderly people. I raise this as a result of conversations I have had with women today respecting the importance of providing adequate housing so that bands will be able to take advantage of the moratorium approved in this House allowing women deprived of their status under section 12(1)(b) to return to reserves. It is understandable that reserves are reluctant to expand when they do not have adequate housing for people already there. I would like to mention very quickly a couple of statistics and then I am going to talk about people. We know that 19 per cent of the on-reserve housing is extremely overcrowded with several families often living in a single house. This would not be so bad except for fact that the housing itself is very poor. This affects 40 per cent of Indian families living on reserves.

Only 40 per cent of on-reserve housing units have adequate water systems: only 40 per cent of the homes have adequate sewage disposal systems. On remote reserves these figures drop to 20 per cent so only one out of five has adequate water supply and sewage disposal. Heating systems are very substandard. As a result of this there are many fires. The rate of death in home fires is 30 per cent higher among Indians on reserves than in the rest of the country. Inadequate heating and very damp weather conditions lead to a much higher incidence of respiratory disease. I know this is the case on the west coast. General unsanitary conditions are a result of inadequate water and sewage systems. Those are some of the statistics.

Let us look at it in terms of real people. Tonight I sat at dinner with ten of the native women who appeared before the committee on the constitution this afternoon. Half of them were from the Indian Rights for Indian Women group. I told these women I would be speaking in the House tonight and asked them to suggest from their experience some of the matters they might want me to raise concerning not only housing but some of the positive things, the kind of projects that develop self-reliance.

I will give the House some of their examples. On the whole question of self-reliance they feel that this not only refers to the autonomy of bands and bands being in control of social and economic development, as the Right Hon. Member for Yellowhead (Mr. Clark) was just mentioning, but also that in our constitution consideration must be given to the third order of government. This is something that is hard for us to understand. I think it is important based on Indian traditions, on aboriginal rights, on the language and culture, and so on. As they describe it, it is more than just geography. They are concerned about the education of their children. If we are talking about housing and better communities on and off reserves we have got to think about the particular cultural needs and desires of Indian and other native people. Schools should be planned and developed by native people themselves having adequate funds for decent facilities and to pay their own people to train for teaching and be hired as teachers.

The same thing applies in the cities. There is a great need for Indian culture to be available to young children, particularly in the cities where in quite a number of cases they have lost their sense of identity.

The women to whom I spoke tonight also felt that multicultural funds for Indian services are not available in the way they are to other groups, particularly in the cities, and that there is constant buck-passing between departments both in city programs and on reserves.

On the question of self-reliance, these women told me they felt very strongly that much more effort and much more funding should be going into economic development. This refers not only to the development of community development corporations on reserves and, indeed, in cities, some of which might be forms of co-op, but also to the sustaining of these efforts. There have been repeated experiences in which LEAP funds have been used for three-year periods to get something started and to train people, after which there is no way to carry on. LEAP has proved that people have the potential, the desire and the ability to manage their own affairs, but there has to be sustained and realistic funding.

With respect to training they said that everyone on reserves needs training, not just men but women too.

They spoke about a very interesting development on the West Bay reserve on Manitoulin Island. In this case there was a very great lack of housing, and those who were last on the list were single mothers raising children on their own. This is a great example of self-reliance from which we hope most people will not have to follow. These mothers got together, trained themselves and built apartments to house themselves and their children.

We heard also about scattered housing in Thunder Bay which is being bought up. Housing development is beginning with the aid of rent supplements. I visited a Burns Lake native development corporation in northern British Columbia where women as well as men are being trained in the operation of heavy equipment, and they earn a share of the lumbering industry there.

I could go on and on. I have many more points to make, but I see that my time is almost up. Four major problems related to housing have been raised by my colleague, our Indian affairs critic, who could not be here tonight. These four major problems have to do with the government's response to the demand for Indian housing. First, although the minister increased funding by $20 million last July, nothing has been done in a real way to meet the very serious backlog of housing needs. I refer to housing repairs as well as to new housing. As I said before, funds are not available for servicing land and developing the necessary infrastructures such as roads, sewage and water. Federal funding programs for housing on reserves do not provide permanent funding for labour, yet the labour component for housing developments is very important. There is a mish-mash of government buck-passing and no co-ordination, and Indian people get caught in between.

My time is up, but I would like to say again to the House that Indian housing should be given a much higher priority.

Mr. René Gingras (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, the motion of the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Schellenberger) before the House this evening is imbued with insulting negativism towards the native peoples of my riding. It is negative not only in spirit but in letter. The motion reads as follows, I quote:

> That this House condemns the continued failure of the government to promote Indian self-reliance and the continued failure to protect the culture, language and health of Canada's Indian peoples.

This afternoon, the hon. member spoke of his many years as a member of the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development. He could not say that the government continued to discourage self-reliance among the Indians, to destroy the culture, language and health of the Indians of Canada because his words would have been contrary to the truth. I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that the motion means the same thing.

Last week, I went around my riding. I shall speak to you about its Indian population. Toward the south, in Abitibi, 1,135 Attikamegues live at Obedjiwan and 920 Algonquins live at Pikogan and Lake Simon. In the mid-north, south of the 55th parallel, 7,129 Crees live divided into eight bands. Further north, 3,535 Inuit share nine villages. In all, Mr. Speaker, in the riding of Abitibi, 12,719 Indians and Inuit live in 19 separate bands, which I endeavour to represent well in Ottawa. I am sure Chiefs Richard Kistablish of the Algonquins, Billy Diamond of the Crees and Charlie Watts of the Inuit would be furious if they knew what the Progressive Conservatives think of them as expressed in the motion.

Mr. Speaker, the facts deny this motion according to which the government failed to protect the culture and the language of the Indians of Canada. The last decade has been noted for our native people's increasing awareness of their identity. The expressions of the native character, whether it be Inuit or Indian, can assume various forms but, at school, they are usually identified with the spiritual or artistic worlds. Still, it must be remembered that the way the Indians chose to express themselves this week in protecting and demanding their rights gives us the true measure of the dynamism of their culture.

Since 1970 the government has granted over $6 million to native organizations to enable them to take part in the review of the Indian Act and the constitution. The financing of research for claims during that same period has now reached over $30 million. At present, native political organizations are receiving over $20 million a year for their administration, research on claims, review of the Indian Act, consultations and development of their political platform.

Those points allow us to assess the continuous commitment of the government to assist and support the natives' efforts to protect, develop and express their cultural identity. We should also remember that the key concepts of that relation are assistance and support since it would be entirely unadvisable for the government to try to assume prime responsibility in that area. Moreover, the Indians would not appreciate such intrusion. Indeed, it is obvious that they would not tolerate it.

In 1971 the government developed a program to set up cultural and educational centres to assist the native people to develop, preserve and appreciate the numerous aspects of their culture. The program provides financial support or other assistance to the Indians and Inuit to allow them to set up and operate cultural and educational centres contributing to make education meet their needs as they perceived them. In those centres, educational programs based on the language, the culture and the Indian and Inuit heritage are organized and made available. Those programs are drawn up and carried out by them.

Programs offered in these centres cover areas related to specific needs, such as the rehabilitation of traditional techniques, research on culture, language research and learning, the development of study programs, the training of native teachers and services aimed at Indian communities. These include programs of activities for the reserve such as leader training workshops, libraries, publications, information bulletins, development courses, radio programs, advisory services for band councils and schools and services for non-Indian communities. The latter include activities for increasing understanding and relations between Indians communities and others.

These programs also provide for liaison services with organizations and teaching institutions, cultural resources for provincial schools, museums and cultural exhibitions, cultural programs for tourists, cultural programs and public relations through community television, radio programs, newspapers and magazines. At present, there are 59 educational and cultural centres across Canada, which between all of them receive $5.3 million. Since 1972 the government has spent $37 million for those centres.

The variety and scope of the programs offered by these centres depend on the number of people who use them. For example, the Saskatchewan Indian Cultural College receives a grant based on the range of services offered to the entire Indian population of Saskatchewan. Indeed, it receives over $1 million a year and administers a whole variety of programs. However, several centres serve only one band and the scope of their programs is necessarily more limited.

I should also mention, Mr. Speaker, the cultural grants program. Under this program, the government gives grants to Indian artists to help them learn new techniques and advance in their career. The objectives of this program are the preservation, promotion and expression of traditional Indian culture through music, dance, theatre, drawing, painting and sculpture, the promotion and expression of contemporary Indian culture through the same media and the promotion and expression of traditional and contemporary culture together.

The grants are given to Indians to help them make their mark in these areas. With these grants, they can pay for tuition fees and the tools, instruments and supplies that they need and meet the costs related to artistic shows and exhibitions, native artists sometimes even use the money from these grants to pay for the basic necessities of life so that they can show or exhibit some of their work instead of having to sell it immediately to survive.

This program has a clear and positive effect on the whole range of cultural activities of the Indian people. We have only to look at the imposing number of Indian artworks both in private art galleries and in the theatres across Canada.

In the last few years, the existence of native culture has been increasingly recognized in the teaching programs of the schools administered by the Indians, the federal government and the provinces. This recognition is reflected in many aspects of the programs and generally comes directly from the initiatives of local communities which want teaching services capable of strengthening their cultural identity and their pride in their heritage to be offered to Indian children. In the areas where native children attend provincial schools, the department has supported the efforts made by the communities to enrich the teaching programs with publications on the native cultures and has also contributed to the production of these publications. It should be noted that these publications greatly enrich the non-native children who attend these schools. The series on people of native origin produced for the Ontario schools is a good example of the progress which can be accomplished through the co-operation of the Indians, the federal government and the provinces.

In the last 14 years, the percentage of Indian administrators and teachers in federal schools has tripled and has now reached nearly 30 per cent. This is due to an increased interest in teaching on the part of the native people and to a greater awareness on the part of the teaching institutions of the need to train specialists in the area of intercultural education. The native people are making their presence felt in education in a great variety of roles. They control their own schools as members of the school boards. They act as consultants in planning curriculums, strengthening the critical home and school relationship as cultural co-ordinators, consultants and teaching assistants. Finally, as language teachers, they promote the survival and perfecting of native culture.

With regard to curriculums, the native culture is perhaps more prominent in the training material developed to be used throughout the country. The curriculums have also been improved through the introduction of courses in traditional music methods, physical education, nature classes as well as art and craft courses.

The position held by elders in native societies is reflected in the contribution that many of them make to syllabuses and, less officially, in other areas as well. There is a very close relationship between culture and language, and the use of native languages has increased significantly over these last few years. During the school year 1978-79, more than 29,000 registered students out of some 78,000 were using classrooms where a native language was either the medium of communication or a curriculum study matter.

Mr. Speaker, Indian peoples are legitimately proud of their achievement in promoting the development and use of their old languages and culture, which have much to offer to Canada. I would like to indicate once more that this government will continue its efforts to support such achievements, so that new generations may point to their heritage as a continuing confirmation of their identity within the over-all Canadian society. For these reasons, I shall vote against the non-confidence motion.

[English]

Mr. Doug Anguish (The Battlefords-Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, I too would like to address this motion which was moved by the Conservative party and amended by the New Democratic Party. However, before I start my comments I should like to thank the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mrs. Mitchell) for allowing me a portion of the time allotted to her to address this very important issue this evening.

I find it somewhat strange that the Conservatives would move such a motion in view of the way in which they have treated Canada's native people in the past. Since the beginning of confederation the Liberals have held government for over 60 years and the Conservatives for over 40 years, but neither of those parties has treated the Indian people with any degree of respect until now, so I do not know why the Indian people should believe they will be treated fairly by either of these parties in the future.

Although some of the things which the parliamentary secretary said has happened on Indian reserves sounds fine, I know that it is not so. My wife and I lived on an Indian reserve for two years where I taught adult upgrading at one time and I know conditions have not changed a great deal since the time we lived there. In the area which I now represent as a member of Parliament for The Battlefords-Meadow Lake there are 17 separate Indian reserves and the living conditions in every one of them is, to say the least, not the same as those which exist in some of the white or Metis neighbouring communities.

I should like to refer to an article in a newspaper which states that the Indian people do not want to be dependent on handouts from some bureaucrat. They have problems with alcoholism, welfare dependence, crime and suicide. I agree with what this article says—

Toward this end, the land claims must first be settled.

I think Indian people must be given a greater degree of control over their own affairs. I hope they will be equipped with the tools and resources which will assist them in achieving self-government. I sincerely hope the government will pay attention to the recommendations of the first nations' conference which was held here in Ottawa, and that it will listen for a change to what the Indian people want. I hope the government will listen to what they want so far as sovereignty is concerned to make them an independent nation, and they should be recognized as such. This has not been the case until now.

I should like to quote from another article on the organization of the Government of Canada in 1980. It has a couple of headings, one of which is "Education and Skill Development Branch". The aim is to ensure good education, according to this article. This looks fine on paper, but let us examine the reality. The reserve at Waterhen was promised a gymnasium for its school as far back as 1975, but today the project is still being delayed. Now they are told they might get it in 1984 or later. The parents at the Indian reserve at Dillon have stopped their children from going to school this year for a period in excess of a month because of the deplorable conditions at the schools on that reserve. The Thunderchild reserve has been promised a school for a number of years. That request, although approved by the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, was being stonewalled by the Treasury Board. Because of the bureaucratic bungle and hassle here in Ottawa they could not have a school until the issue was raised in the House of Commons.

Another area in which problems have arisen is the community services branch. They are supposed to provide housing, electricity, community buildings, water and sewers. I want you to know, Mr. Speaker, that not one of the 17 reserves in the constituency I represent has running water or sewage facilities, and I think that is a darn disgrace. Although conditions have improved somewhat this year, the Liberal government and the Tory government which has preceded it have done nothing much. They gave Indians $12,000 to build a house. What kind of a house can you build for $12,000 today? There is a problem with community services on the Thunderchild reserve where they are trying to put in sewers and running water. The Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development of the Department of Supply and Services, whichever is responsible, has not been able to have a well dug, so they dug a trench from a water supply over a mile away until they ran out of money and could not afford to complete the work to provide running water. That is a disgrace.

The biggest laugh of all is the economic and employment development branch. I should like to relate to you the case of the Moosomin Indian reserve in my constituency. They ran a successful farming operation which they developed in spite of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. They had cattle, machinery and land which they were farming. They happended to have a chief who performed some sleight of hand with a pencil, and a council member, both of whom were prosecuted for fraud. They ended up in jail, but the case did not stop there. To pay off the debt which the chief had incurred, the department came in and seized all the machinery, took away the cattle, and thus completely destroyed the economic base of the reserve. Then they said, "That is not enough to pay off your debts, you bad Moosomin Indian reserve, you will have to pay the rest of the debt". How can they pay off their debt when this government, through the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, has seized their only means of existence, their only viable economic base?

I should like to recount another instance concerning a contractor from the English River band at Patuanak. The department says it wants to promote the Indian people and help them get into business. In spite of the Department of Indian Affairs, this individual became involved in the contracting business. He went away to trade school and became a journeyman tradesman. He started a company in northwestern Saskatchewan, and he wanted to bid on building and Indian school on an Indian reserve for the Department of Indian Affairs. The department indicated the following to him: "You cannot do it unless you have a bid bond to cover the entire job". Although the minister has the ability to waive that condition and recommend an Indian to do the work on an Indian reserve for the good of the Indian educational system, he would not waive that condition and has not waived it up to now. That is no commitment to those people living on Indian reserves who are trying to develop an economic base.

This happens on many reserves. Indians in places like Fond du Lac, Canoe Lake and English River have tried to raise money in order to build recreational facilities on their reserves. I have before me a directive from the assistant deputy minister of Indian Affairs to all regional directors-general and regional directors of the Department of Indian Affairs in Canada. It indicated that $100,000 was available for Indian reserves to build recreational complexes. Many of the 17 reserves in my constituency applied for that funding, and they did not receive even a response from the Department of Indian Affairs as to whether the fund existed. Well, it must exist because I have the directive here, but when Indian bands try to get money from the department they are faced with a great many problems. There are inconsistencies from one reserve to another. If there is a problem on the Joseph Bighead reserve near Pierceland which is identical to a problem on the Witchekan reserve, there is no assurance that those problems will be handled in the same manner. They could be handled very inconsistently, with a different solution to each.

In conclusion, I should like to say that 16 treaties have been signed in Canada since September 7, 1850, when the first was signed with the Ojibway Indians. Almost all those 16 treaties were signed under Liberal governments; two were signed under Tory governments. I have seen no commitment by either the Tories or the Liberals to the native people of the country. They do not listen to them in constitutional terms. They have not done a darn thing for them in terms of building economic bases. They have made those people live in disgrace. The only help of any substance Indian people have received up until now has been from a few provincial governments. Of course, there were people who had the desire to leave the reserves and build futures on their own. I ask the government to take a different direction in the future.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, I should like to take only a moment, because that is what it deserves, to comment on the contribution of my hon. friend in the New Democratic Party and his verbal diarrhea.

Mrs. Mitchell: That is a terrible thing to say.

Mr. Shields: I listened very carefully. I wanted to hear one constructive suggestion in the last ten minutes, but I am sorry to say that I did not.

The hon. member mentioned in constitutional terms that the Liberal government and the Conservative party had sold out the Indian people. My party is on record; we would like to have the constitution brought home to Canada, amended here in Canada, with the participation of Indian people. We were sold out by the coalition of the New Democratic Party and the Liberal party, the Liberal party with the NDP rump.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Shields: Also I should like to point out that it was John George Diefenbaker who brought the vote to the native people of Canada. Up to that time I do not remember any member of the NDP running around the country saying anything about the downtrodden, voteless native persons of Canada.

I should like to tone down my remarks somewhat. I hope hon. members will give me their attention because I have had the good fortune of living in northeastern Alberta and working with native people on and off reserves for 25 years. I should like to relate a story about the very first trip I made to the Janvier reserve which is east of Fort McMurray. I toured the reserve and I saw the poverty which existed. I saw the poor living conditions and all the things to which many people have alluded today. Also I saw a tractor and a seed drill. Obviously those pieces of machinery had been sitting there for many years, because it was an old tractor with lugs. I inquired how this had come about, and I found out that the seed drill and tractor had been brought to the Janvier reserve as an economic development program probably in the early 1950s. Someone got the brainwave that an economic development program could take place on that reserve. It was decided, outside the reserve and without any consultation with the band or the Indian people of that reserve, that the economic development program would be a farming one. A tractor, a seed drill, some seed and a couple of ploughs were delivered to the reserve, and the Indians were told to plough up the land and start farming; then the department officials left.

Of course we know what happened. The weeds started to grow around the tractor and the seed drill. Their whole approach to assistance in the economic development program has been modelled along those lines. Many good ideas come from the Department of Indian Affairs. Many good ideas come from the reserves which are accepted as viable economic development programs in which to invest money. But what happens is classic—the money is invested, the equipment is bought, and then everyone leaves. They leave behind people who have never attempted business before, they leave behind unskilled workers with no training; they leave behind people who are expected to do an accurate accounting of what they are doing with no training. Absolutely no thought has been given to the backup system which must be in place when an economic development program is launched on a reserve. There are private corporations in northeastern Alberta which are attempting to assist in the economic development of the reserves in many ways. They are also attempting to assist in affirmative action programs which will allow the native person to train so that he may work in the work force. Many companies have tried, but they all seem to fall by the wayside. There are reasons for this, and some of those reasons are very obvious. I find it incredible that our government will not recognize what the problems really are.

For example, I would like to talk about a family in which the man is approached and asked to take part in a training program because of an oil sands plant going up in Fort McMurray, which means steady employment and good wages; the man will be able to educate his children and hold up his head. The man agrees that is what he wants. He goes to the work site with absolutely no counselling whatsover, and his family is left behind. In many cases the company says he must wait for 30 days before he can be paid. He cannot wait those 30 days. How will his family survive when he is not there? He goes to the company and asks if he can move his family. They say that he cannot because he does not qualify for housing until he has worked for three months. All those obstacles are put in his way, but from the company's point of view they are sensible. Someone coming to one of the oil sands plants in Fort McMurray, from Ontario or Saskatchewan, someone who is used to the Protestant work ethic, will understand that he will live in camp, that his family will remain behind and that in three months he will qualify for housing under the company plan. He understands this and knows that he can pick up the phone and talk with his family. That is not the case with native people. When you go to Janvier and to Chipewyan lake and pull a man out of an isolated reserve, he leaves his family there and he does not know whether they are surviving or not. He has no means of communication with his family. Have we never heard of a family counselling program? Have we never heard of bridge financing? We use the term all the time when we are talking about industry but we do not use it when we are talking about people. These are some of the things which are needed in the area of economic development. We have the resources.

The native people have expressed a desire on many occasions to participate. They come in with a plan. Let us follow a plan through for a moment. A man writes to his member of Parliament. He has an excellent idea. There is a brand new highway going through his community where there has never been one before. He does not have much experience in business but he has fooled around with cars a bit, he knows how to change oil and repair tires and he would like to set up a service station. He will employ four people. There is not to be a gas station within 50 miles on either side of his proposed site due to the kind of traffic in the area. In other words, he has got it made. This man writes to his member of Parliament—in this case it happens to be me. He asks where he can get some financing and some assistance to get this business going. He thinks it is a good idea—indeed, it is an excellent idea. There will not be another gas station within 50 miles on either side of his site, a main highway will be running through and he will employ at least four men. Speaking for myself, if I was putting up this service station I would employ many more people because I would add a restaurant on to it—he has not thought of that yet, but it will come.

I phoned the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development with respect to his proposal. They told me to write a letter and send with it a copy of his letter, which I did. I wrote to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. De Bané) and I received a reply back from him. I wrote to the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) and the Minister of State for Small Businesses (Mr. Lapointe). In all, I wrote about six letters. I received a reply back from each one indicating the types of program each department had available. But they were all very discouraging. I sent all the information I had obtained to this gentleman. I even talked to him on the phone this morning. He has given up the idea because it is all too complicated. The government has made it too complicated for him.

The other day I asked in committee about the Economic Development Fund which is not being used. Obviously it is not being used because there have been a number of failures. Programs have been funded which have all been failures which makes people a little excited and a little frightened. After all, it is risk capital that we are talking about. Of course there will be failures. Because you have one failure does not mean the supply must be cut off. Each application should be judged on its merits.

More important, with regard to the funding available from the Department of Immigration, Small Businesses and the Department of Indian Affairs cannot an agency be set up to co-ordinate it? Or would we rather take a community development project funding, for example, $350,000 or $400,000 in my area alone, and blow it on make-work jobs which will last for only three months? It is like a pacifier which might keep them quiet for a while. Why not take $300,000 and fund a program like the one I have described? The pro forma itself indicated the man would make a healthy profit and he would employ four people. Those four people he would employ would be taken directly off the welfare rolls. This represents a saving to the Government of Canada of something in the range of $50,000 per man, if he is married and raising a family. Just two years and you would have the return on your investment.

Every time we attempt to use a program, particularly as it relates to economic development, it falls down because we do not provide the backup which is required. Backup is needed not just in the business sense but in the training of the individual who will work in that community or that job. It is a case of having the backup in management and accounting skills.

Another example is a sawmill which was set up in my constituency and funded to the extent of $500,000. Once the machinery was set up and operating, everybody took off for the high hills and left the Indian people, who were not skilled and who did not understand the operation of the business, to function on their own. They survived for a year and now the mill is idle. It is idle because they were not given the necessary training, the necessary backup or the necessary counselling. The whole situation was ridiculous and a total waste. The mill employed 14 family men and meant a saving to the Government of Canada of $50,000 per family.

All such projects have not failed. Some communities in my riding, with the help of industry more so than the help of government, have made projects work by finally realizing that we must begin to carry out what we have been talking about. A laundry was built on the Goodfish reserve, and it brought down the unemployment figure on the reserve from 95 per cent to 40 per cent. This laundry plant has also caused some spin-offs. Because of it, a little store was built and because of the little store a recreation complex was built—all because funds were created as the result of this plant and circulated in the community.

All of what I have described came about because one company had the foresight to approach the band at Goodfish reserve and say, "Look, we will assist by giving you our laundry contract for all the coveralls, overalls and sheets if you will employ a couple of men to deliver as well as do the laundry". I would like to show hon. members what can happen when a little bit of foresight, guidance and backup is used and money is invested in an economic development program.

We are not giving the native people the proper backup. We are not giving the communities which receive economic funding the proper counselling and guidance. When there is a failure the bureaucracy feels it must pull back since one project failed and money was lost. Certainly, some areas will be high risk, but we must invest in the native communities because they want the pride of participation and they want for their children exactly what you and I want for our children. I wish we could get on with the job.

Mr. Bill McKnight (Kindersley-Lloydminster): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate that there are only 30 seconds left in this debate but I would like to make an appeal on behalf of the Lucky Man band in my constituency which has waited 101 years for a reserve. I do not mean all their entitlements, I mean a reserve. This band signed a treaty with the Government of Canada and to this day they have not received one acre or one square inch of land. I condemn all governments, including the government of my province which, according to the 1930 Natural Resources Transfer Act, is committed to assisting in completing the entitlements of the native people of Saskatchewan.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. It being 9.45 p.m., it is my duty pursuant to order made Tuesday, April 29, 1980, to interrupt the proceedings and put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of the amendment and the motion, the main estimates and the first and second reading stages of the bill based thereon. The question is on the amendment by Mr. Keeper. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the amendment?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

PUBLIC SERVICE

CAFETERIA AND LAUNDRY WORKERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Walter McLean (Waterloo): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In light of the benchmark decision of the Canadian Human Rights Commission six months ago which ruled that 3,000 federal employees, mostly women cafeteria and laundry workers, were found to be victims of equal pay law violations, in light of the government's stated commitment to justice and opportunity for women in the workplace, and in light of the open defiance of the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) in his refusal to implement the historic decision of the Canadian Human Rights Commission and the failure of the minister responsible for the status of women to persuade his colleagues to comply, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Crombie):

That this House express its abhorrence at the refusal of the government to implement an equal-pay-for-work-of-equal-value settlement with its female cafeteria and laundry workers, and instruct the President of the Treasury Board to comply with the decision of the Human Rights Commission.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

UNITED NATIONS

CONDEMNATION OF HUMAN RIGHTS VIOLATIONS IN EL SALVADOR—CALL FOR SUPPORT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton South): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under Standing Order 43. In view of recent reports of the assassination of six members of the opposition democratic revolutionary front in El Salvador, adding to the estimated 8,000 victims of political violence in that country in 1980, and in view of the fact that the United Nations is considering a motion on the human rights situation in El Salvador, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. McLean):

That this House urge the government to approve action at the United Nations condemning recent violations of human rights in El Salvador.

LABOUR DISPUTES

B.C. TELEPHONE COMPANY—CALL FOR MINISTERIAL INTERVENTION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that the B.C. Telephone Company has ignored in turn three consecutive reports, those of Justice Henry Hutchins, commerce dean Noel Hall of UBC, and finally the minister's own chief conciliation commissioner, Mr. Ed Peck, and since during the months of futile bargaining subscriber service has deteriorated to the point where phone bill strikes are being seriously contemplated in that province, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Alberni (Mr. Miller):

That this House condemn B.C. Telephone's intransigence in settling with its employees and call upon the Minister of Labour to intervene personally and directly so that a fair and just settlement can be achieved forthwith.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

NATIONAL UNITY

CALL FOR RESIGNATION OF LEADER OF THE OPPOSITION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Michel Veillette (Champlain): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to ask for the unanimous consent of the House in order to move a motion on an important matter.

S.O. 43

In view of the laudable objectives pursued by the government to strike an equitable balance between all Canadians at the social and economic levels and thereby preserve national unity, I find unacceptable the attitude taken by the official opposition, especially its leader, who are encouraging divisiveness by constantly speaking, both inside and outside the House, of "a feeling of alienation", "growing separatism", "western frustration" and God knows what else. Such statements do not foster good will and unity in this country.

Since such conduct by a so-called national party and by its leader is totally opposed to the basic philosophy which we should all share, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Témiscamingue (Mr. Tousignant):

That the House demand the immediate resignation of the Leader of the Official Opposition because of this conduct which is unsuitable for a true Canadian.

CANADA MORTGAGE AND HOUSING CORPORATION

MORTGAGE GUARANTEES FOR HOMES ON INDIAN RESERVES—MOTION UNDER S. O. 43

Mr. Bill Yurko (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, in view of the fact that there is a need to improve the quality and quantity of housing on Indian reserves in Canada, that the federal government is the custodian of all reserve lands in Canada, and that direct capital allocation by the federal government for native housing is constantly inadequate, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay):

That the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation and/or the federal government provide mortgage guarantees on homes and infrastructure on Indian reserves in order to allow the provincial governments and the private sector to provide the mortgage financing which would enable the private sector to undertake directly the construction of homes under band council direction and supervision, thereby relieving the federal government of the responsibility for some of the capital costs. This type of action by the federal government would support and accelerate the process of self-reliance by the native people of Canada.

Madam Speaker: Presentation of this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

APPLICATION OF INVESTMENT TAX CREDIT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. J. Robert Howie (York-Sunbury): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. A press release issued by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion on the government's new special investment tax credit program for areas of greatest disparity outlines the areas where the incentive will be applicable but does not indicate the data base for the selection of these areas, and this information is not available upon request. Therefore, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. McMillan):

That the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion be requested to table forthwith the data base and any other information used to determine the areas where the new special 50 per cent investment tax credit will apply.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I request the unanimous consent of the House to present a motion dealing with an important and urgent matter.

Considering the imprisonment to which are subjected members of the opposition and representatives of the independent information media in the Republic of Haiti, and considering the fact that 25,000 Haitian refugees in the Bahamas are threatened with expulsion, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill (Mr. Blaikie):

That the House request that the government intervene with the Haitian authorities to obtain that the rights of man be respected in Haiti and political prisoners released.

PROPOSED ESTABLISHMENT OF INTERNATIONAL COMPANY TO DISBURSE FOREIGN AID—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dave Nickerson (Western Arctic): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Whereas the chairman of Petro-Canada announced in Montreal on Monday that Petro-Canada International was to be set up with an initial allocation provided by Canadian taxpayers of $250 million, with the idea that "it will increase the level of Canada's foreign aid", I move, seconded by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor):

That the government cease to use Petro-Canada as a mini-CIDA, and that any tax dollars used for foreign aid be clearly identified as such in the estimates rather than being funnelled, in disguised form, through Petro-Canada or similar agencies.

Madam Speaker: Presentation of this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

TAX-EXEMPT STATUS OF OIL AND GAS PRODUCTION ON INDIAN LANDS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In light of fears expressed by the Saddle Lake band that oil and gas production on their reserve will be taxed under the federal budget despite the band's tax-free status, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Kindersley-Lloydminster (Mr. McKnight):

That a federal policy statement confirming the tax exempt status of oil and gas production from Indian lands be made as soon as possible and that the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, following his meeting with a delegation from Alberta reserves, use his good offices with his cabinet colleagues to hasten such a statement of policy.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

IMMIGRATION

PUBLICATION OF GUIDELINES FOR ENTRY OF INTERNATIONAL ARTISTES

Hon. Bill Jarvis (Perth): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. I am sure he will not be surprised to learn that my questions relate to what has been Canada's most prominent and heretofore most successful theatre, Stratford's Shakespearean Festival. I refer particularly to the minister's recent decision with regard to an application for a work permit for an artistic director. Nor do I think the minister will be surprised to know that I made a commitment some weeks ago to conflicting groups not to raise this, particularly as a partisan issue, because it did not appear to me at that time to be in either the interests of the festival or in the national interest to do so.

Having been released from that commitment I now ask the minister of immigration whether he intends to publish definitive guidelines with which internationally renowned artistes, directors, producers and so on will have to comply before coming to Canada. I specifically ask for these guidelines because I say with regret that under the present apparent policy even William Shakespeare himself would not be allowed into this country to produce one of his own plays.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I would like to begin by thanking the hon. member for his assistance in the past. We have had several interesting conversations about the situation at Stratford and I want to express my appreciation for the many helpful words of advice he has provided.

I do want to suggest to him that his question is phrased in the wrong way. It is not a question of which guidelines apply to international directors; the question is which guidelines apply to companies, groups or organizations in Canada in terms of their hiring policy. As the hon. member well knows, the Immigration Act very clearly states that the primary objective is to ensure that Canadians have first opportunity at any positions which are available in this country. There is a responsibility on the part of any employer to ensure that proper and extensive searches are made to make sure that Canadians do have that opportunity of access to those jobs.

My decision was made purely on the ground that the board of directors of the Stratford Festival had not conducted their search in a way which would make that position available to qualified Canadians. I have no interest in keeping out qualified people, but I do have a responsibility under my ministry to ensure that qualified Canadians at least have a chance at those jobs.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jarvis: Madam Speaker, one wonders whether the minister required the same kind of search be conducted for a kooky expert on LSD of Canadian nationality before Timothy Leary was admitted to the country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jarvis: Madam Speaker, my concern is that immigration policy and decisions are being created in a vacuum without regard to other considerations. Were the Secretary of State responsible for cultural affairs in the House, I would have directed the question to him, since he gave a very well-reasoned response some weeks ago with respect to Canada Council's involvement with the Stratford Festival.

In his absence I direct my supplementary question to the minister of immigration, who knows that despite being 98 per cent Canadian the Stratford Festival is not now, if it ever was, simply a regional Ontario theatre but rather one of the two or three most renowned theatres in the English-speaking world. Because of the cultural impact that is inherent in the implementation of immigration policy taken in a vacuum, I ask the minister whether the Secretary of State and Minister of Communications was in accord with this decision, were his recommendations and those of his officials sought and, if so, what were those recommendations to the Minister of Immigration?

● (1420)

Mr. Axworthy: Madam Speaker, there is a certain logic in the hon. member's question with which I am not certain I agree. While I agree with his statement that Stratford is a renowned and internationally famous institution of theatre, I disagree with his suggestion that there is no Canadian capable of filling the position.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Axworthy: We administered the act according to the sphere in which it was passed by Parliament, namely, to make sure that when a choice is made Canadians are given the opportunity to make application and to have access to that employment. That is the only criterion. I repeat, the board of directors of Stratford did not live up to that criterion, and that is the basis upon which the decision was taken.

Mr. Jarvis: Madam Speaker, I have no quarrel whatsoever with what the minister has just said. My quarrel is that I believe the immigration policy is operated in a vacuum without proper regard to the enormous cultural and economic impacts which were attendant upon the implementation of the immigration policy. That was the point I was trying to make.

Again in the absence of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, who is responsible for Canadian tourism, I ask my final supplementary of the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

Mr. Lalonde: The Secretary of State is here.

Mr. Jarvis: I will stay with the Minister of Employment and Immigration. I believe that the minister will be aware that, of the hundreds of millions of tourist dollars generated each year by the Stratford Festival, some 40 per cent of those dollars come from non-Canadian tourists—mostly from the United States, but also from many other countries around the world. Having regard to this enormous economic impact and, in particular, the amount of foreign currency flowing into the country through the festival, would the minister tell the House whether the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, in his capacity as minister responsible for tourism, was consulted and, if so, what were his recommendations; and was he in accord with the minister's decision?

Mr. Axworthy: Madam Speaker, once again, I suggest to the hon. member that the concern he has expressed is misplaced and misdirected. The decision with regard to the economic impact of the appointment of a director should fall squarely upon the board of directors of that institution. If that board would take the decision to start a search for available candidates, including Canadians, then there would be no problem in terms of economic impact; they could get on with the appointment of a director and the play could go on.

RECOMMENDATION RESPECTING APPLICATION OF JOHN DEXTER

Mr. Chris Speyer (Cambridge): Madam Speaker, my question is also directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Within the context of the John Dexter decision, and as a result of press inquiries, will the minister advise this House whether the recommendation of his officials, after conducting an extensive investigation, was to accept or refuse Mr. Dexter's application and, further, was a cabinet decision taken with respect to this particular decision?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, clearly in this case it is the responsibility of the minister to consult with a wide variety of sources. The decision is solely mine, and I will take full responsibility for it.

Mr. Speyer: Madam Speaker, for the fourth time in a row the minister has refused to answer a question which has been directed to him. My supplementary is to the same minister. In light of one of the intentions of the Immigration Act, namely, to promote and support the free movement of exceptional international talent, will the minister explain the criteria whereby John Dexter can be denied a work permit and yet Peter Ustinov can be granted such a permit to act in King Lear? Finally, using the rationale explained by the minister, would he please tell the House whether he is prepared to deny work permits to non-Canadian sporting figures in circumstances where they are in competition with Canadian sporting figures? I am thinking in particular of the Jamie Bone situation.

Mr. Axworthy: Madam Speaker, the hon. member, who, I gather, is supposed to have the responsibility of providing criticism respecting the Immigration Act, would be well advised to read that act more carefully. What the hon. member is asking amounts to a difference between someone who is coming into the country on a permanent basis and someone who is coming into the country under a visa for a short-term engagement. There is a singular difference there in the kind of application which is submitted. The same thing is also true in relation to athletic performers or those who are in different kinds of competitions. There are agreements, and as the hon. member might know—

● (1425)

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Axworthy: I would like to be able to continue answering the question, Madam Speaker—

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Why don't you begin?

Mr. Axworthy: —rather than hearing from the bleachers over on the other side. There are already agreements between different athletic leagues for the exchange of players and athletes in these areas because none of them is taking up permanent residence. If an athlete wants to apply to become a resident of this country, then he must go through the same procedures as anyone else.

ENERGY

IMPERIAL OIL LIMITED COLD LAKE PROJECT—COST TO TAXPAYERS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. If he has sufficient energy, he will be back in his seat by the time I ask the question.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: I am not sure he will be happy when he is back in his seat. My question concerns the statement made by the president of Imperial Oil on two important points, as reported in today's press. First, he says that his company controls the technology necessary for the development of the Cold Lake project. Second, he indicated that the $40 million hand-out already provided by the government and the taxpayers of Canada is not sufficient for Imperial Oil to proceed with this important project.

My question to the minister is this. Considering that he is now in possession of a copy of a letter sent to me recently by our friend "a concerned citizen", who has previously supplied some very accurate information, in which it is stated that the taxpayers of Canada have already provided a minimum of $30 million in one year to Imperial Oil for the Cold Lake project, will the minister tell us exactly how much the Canadian taxpayers have provided to Imperial Oil for the development of this technology? Second, is the company right when it says that we are totally dependent on the company to develop this project?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, as far as the technology is concerned—and I stand to be corrected on this—I believe the technology that has been developed for heavy oil was developed by Exxon and not by Imperial Oil in Canada. I believe that is the situation.

An hon. Member: How do you know that?

Mr. Lalonde: What are you talking about over there? Take it easy; let us get at the facts.

Mr. Nielsen: We will wait a year for that.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lalonde: As for the argument that the $40 million advance which has been given to Imperial Oil is inadequate to make the project go, I do not believe anyone in Canada ever thought that $40 million would be enough to proceed with this project, which will cost closer to $10 billion and probably even more. So I am not surprised at that statement. What that advance does is that it ensures the 500 engineers and technicians will be kept working on the project for the next six months while we have discussions with the government of Alberta in an attempt to arrive at an arrangement.

As to the amount of taxes provided by Canadian taxpayers in terms of income tax write-offs, obviously I do not have that figure at hand. However, I will be happy to try and get it for the hon. member. If he puts his question on the order paper, we will provide him with a written answer.

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, the minister in that rather long answer inadvertently, I am sure, managed to miss answering the relevant question. Did he tell us that Imperial Oil, which did the research in this part of the country for the development of this particular oil product, was indeed a subsidiary of Exxon and, therefore, because of the government's failure to have control over patents, he is now saying that the control really does reside with Exxon? If that is so, then we are in a virtual blackmail position with the Exxon corporation for the development of our own resources and we cannot go ahead on our own unless we pay to Imperial Oil whatever that company demands. Is that what the minister is saying?

• (1430)

Mr. Lalonde: No, Madam Speaker, that is not what I am saying. I am sorry if somehow I did not provide the answer the hon. member was looking for. What I believe I said is that the technology has been developed outside of Canada by Exxon. As the hon. member knows, Exxon spends about $450 million a year in research and development. Imperial Oil in Canada spends about $35 million to $40 million. If I remember well, I believe that that technology was developed by Exxon outside of Canada and belongs to Exxon. That does not mean it is impossible for Canada to develop heavy oil projects by technology which belongs to companies other than Exxon, or by technology that we develop ourselves over the years.

There is a particular technology at the present time which has been developed by, and belongs to, Exxon, but I suspect there are other ways of achieving it. Obviously, one could even purchase a licence from Exxon, if they were ready to sell us that technology. But I repeat, I do not think that technology was developed inside Canada; we have to borrow it from outside.

Mr. Broadbent: I suggest to the minister that he is wrong. I ask him to check with Petro-Canada to confirm that Petro-Canada has in fact developed in Canada research of precisely the kind that is required. Not only does Petro-Canada have that kind of technical capacity, but the research undertaken by the Alberta government's petroleum research centre is of a related kind to that done here in Canada. I also say to him that Imperial Oil did the research which he is talking about in Canada. If it is the case that Petro-Canada has the technical capacity, as well as the Alberta government facility, will the minister make a commitment today that the Government of Canada will use Canadian sources to develop this project and not rely on Imperial Oil?

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, I was very cautious in saying I was speaking from memory with regard to the development of technology. It may well be that it was developed by Imperial Oil. I want to check the facts on that. I seem to remember that it had been developed by Exxon, but it may have been developed by Imperial Oil. If that is so, the technology belongs to Imperial Oil, and Imperial Oil belongs to Exxon.

Mr. Broadbent: So do you.

Mr. Lalonde: The Leader of the New Democratic Party refuses to see the reality. Assuming that this technology has been developed by Imperial Oil, it belongs to Imperial Oil, which belongs to Exxon. That technology is there. I have indicated to the hon. member that there are other technologies. He referred to the technology of Petro-Canada. Our intention is to ensure that these projects go ahead. Whether they are developed by a Canadian company owned by Canadians, such as Petro-Canada, or by other companies which have their own technology, what is important is that all those projects proceed in the next few years. That is what we are going to work on.

NATIONAL ENERGY PROGRAM

ELIGIBILITY FOR EXPLORATION GRANTS

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. At the end of last week the Petroleum Monitoring Agency released the long awaited rules on measurement of Canadian ownership of the oil industry in Canada. It appears from these rules that companies like Dome Petroleum, which the Minister of Labour recently described as a good Canadian company, are being put in a position, because of their success which has attracted large amounts of foreign individual shareholders, where they will not be eligible under the new rules for exploration grants under the new energy program.

Will the minister explain why these good Canadian companies which are caught in this situation are now to be in the position of having to hire auditors, accountants and lawyers to dream up the various expensive ways of getting around these rules so that they can become eligible for the exploration grants?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, the hon. member has not read carefully "The National Energy Program". If he will do that, he will realize that all companies are entitled to some incentive grants. Some will get higher grants than others, depending on the amount of Canadian ownership. Dome Petroleum, like any other company, will be eligible for grants from the people of Canada, through the Government of Canada, on the basis of their Canadian ownership. If they succeed in reaching the level of 75 per cent Canadian ownership and control, they will be eligible for grants of 80 per cent of the cost of exploration provided by the Canadian taxpayers. I think that is a pretty good deal.

Mr. Wilson: Madam Speaker, the minister is very cutely sidestepping the issue. It is quite clear that good Canadian companies like Dome Petroleum are being forced to go through all sorts of legal and accounting machinations to become eligible for the exploration grants for conventional oil exploration in Canada. He has not answered the question why these companies should be put to that extra work and diversion of management activity.

I would appreciate if the minister would answer that question, as well as my supplementary, which is this: During the course of the preparation of the budget, did the minister give thought, with his colleague, the Minister of Finance, to developing some incentives for Canadians to purchase the shares of companies like Dome and others, so that there would be an incentive to purchase? The concern I have is that a company like Dome Petroleum may, through no fault of its own, see many of its shares owned by non-residents, and therefore become ineligible for the exploration grants.

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, I am surprised that my friend believes that Dome Petroleum cannot afford a lawyer or accountant to prepare the very simple form that will be required to determine Canadian ownership. A company is either Canadian owned or it is not. The formula is very simple. A grade 3 student could fill out the form. They will be eligible for the grants in proportion to their Canadian ownership like any other Canadian company, or any company for that matter operating in Canada.

As far as the incentives given to Canadians are concerned, I remind the hon. member that a Canadian who happens to be in the 60 per cent tax bracket is going to get back 92 cents out of every dollar invested. If he is in the 40 per cent tax bracket, he will get back about 88 cents out of every dollar he is going to invest. I challenge him to find anywhere else in the world schemes as generous as those being put forward by the Canadian government.

JUSTIFICATION FOR FORECAST OF INCREASED PRODUCTION

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, my question is also directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. One of the elements of the new energy policy announced by the Minister of Finance was that there would be a shift of emphasis to the frontier areas and away from the conventional areas of western Canada. On the basis of the assumptions and the supply forecasts the minister has made, such as the September 1978 NEB report and figures put forward by our government, that the bulk of the production would come from western Canada up to the 1990s, surely the minister must be aware of the very substantial shutdown that will take place in exploration activity in Canada next year, between 25 per cent and 30 per cent. How does the minister justify his forecast that there will be increased production in western Canada as the basis of this whole policy?

● (1440)

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, there is little doubt that the large increase in production over this decade is going to come from three main sources, the tar sands and heavy oils, the Arctic resources and offshore resources. As a good authority for this, I have a speech made as recently as a few days ago by the senior vice-president of Imperial Oil. He quotes those three areas as being the main sources of future resources. We agree on that estimate. I want to stress to the hon. member that in our own projections we have not included any oil coming from offshore or from the Arctic. Essentially, all resources are based on the developments that are going to take place in the west and out of tar sands and heavy oil. Any additional resources that will be discovered and developed offshore or in the Arctic within the next few years are going to be additional to our forecast and will strengthen the objective of oil independence in this country during this decade.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Madam Speaker, the fact is, as I have indicated to the minister—and he has not responded to this—that there is clearly an indication of a substantial cutback in exploration in western Canada. The oil sands and heavy oil projects are in serious trouble in this country. Even the aide-de-camp of the minister, the president of Petro-Canada, in a speech over the weekend, indicated that we are going to face shortages and shortfalls of production and supply in this country, that we cannot rely on offshore oil. Who are we to believe, the minister or the president of Petro-Canada, with respect to the shortfall possibilities in this country? I want the minister to address himself to the issue and not try to equivocate.

Mr. Lalonde: I would invite my hon. friend to read the speech by the president of Petro-Canada in Montreal early this week. He will find that he has misrepresented the statement of the president of Petro-Canada. We have indicated we will have a shortfall between domestic production and demand over the next few years. However, we have indicated that this country could reach independence in oil supply during this decade and the president of Petro-Canada is in full agreement with that forecast.

As for the potential reduction in activities in Alberta next year, I recognize that this is indeed a possibility. We hope that once the industry has had time to look carefully at the program and budget implications, and once we have reached further agreement with the government of Alberta, which I hope will be possible, I believe the problems now raised by my hon. friend will be non-existent.

EXPORT AND IMPORT PERMITS ACT

CHARGES RESPECTING EXPORTATION TO PAKISTAN OF ELECTRONIC EQUIPMENT

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of External Affairs. It concerns Canada's complicity with the government of Pakistan in obtaining Canadian knowledge and expertise in Pakistan's and other Islamic countries' goal to develop a nuclear bomb. Can the minister inform this House why no serious charges, other than minor customs violation charges, have been laid against three individuals for attempting to export from Canada to Pakistan certain electronic equipment, similar, I might add, in nature to those inverter components banned from export from Britain in 1979? Why is it that these things, which are to be used to develop nuclear potential or a nuclear bomb in Pakistan, have not been exposed and discredited, as explained on the exposé on "The Fifth Estate" last evening?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, a police investigation of a shipment of general electrical components was seized by the police and, as a result of that, charges were laid under Group 9 of the Export and Import Permits Act. The police laid what charges seemed appropriate to them after the investigation, and it is not for the government to suggest to the police what charges should be laid. The act provides that equipment originally imported into Canada from the United States cannot be re-exported without a permit, and the charge was laid under that provision.

I should like to add that we broke off nuclear co-operation with Pakistan in December, 1976, because the Pakistan government was unwilling to give us the non-proliferation guarantees that we sought, and it has not since that time entered into the nuclear non-proliferation agreement. Our decision on that is quite firm. We have received assurances from the Pakistan government that nuclear material from the existing Canadian reactor in Pakistan will not be used for any purposes of a warlike nature.

Mr. Rose: Madam Speaker, since the minister has told us that Canada has broken off relationship in this regard with Pakistan since 1976 because Pakistan has refused to sign the nuclear non-proliferation treaty, I wonder if he could explain to the House why Canadian visas were given to atomic energy officials of Pakistan to come to Canada to organize a conspiracy to export these components, to export nuclear technology to Pakistan; and further, why has the Government of Canada not protested in the strongest possible terms this entire matter, which is so dangerous to the peace of the world? Why has there been a cover-up of this whole thing on the part of the Government of Canada?

Mr. MacGuigan: Madam Speaker, this is a matter which is in the courts and it seems to me that we ought to allow it to be decided by the courts. Those Pakistani officials to whom the hon. member refers were not given this permission, as I recall. My hon. colleague, the Minister of Employment and Immigration, may want to comment on this, but my recollection is that they sought admission to Canada for an entirely different purpose. There certainly was no approval given to them by the Government of Canada to enter for a purpose of the kind suggested by the hon. member. It is the courts which will determine whether the charges which are laid against these people in Montreal will be sustained or not.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

DATA BASE FOR INVESTMENT TAX CREDIT

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Madawaska-Victoria): Madam Speaker, in view of the motion under Standing Order 43 put earlier today by my friend and colleague from New Brunswick, the hon. member for York-Sunbury, I should like to ask the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion if he would be prepared to publish the base data used in the establishment of the special 50 per cent investment tax credit program in designated regions. Could he also confirm that the program is being put forward as a pilot endeavour for the next year?

Hon. Pierre De Bané (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Madam Speaker, I was absolutely shocked by the statement made by the member and which, of course, reflects upon the integrity of both my department and the Department of Finance. I take full responsibility for the designation. The criteria are public. I have sent them to every member. They are based on official statistics furnished by Statistics Canada. Of course, I would have never dared make those designations either on gut feeling or arbitrary decision. They are census divisions. I took the 5 per cent of Canadians who are in most need, and in no province could I designate more than 40 per cent. All the statistics have been made public, and I cannot accept such an irresponsible statement.

ENERGY

OIL—STEPS TO ENCOURAGE DRILLING IN CANADA

Mr. Len Gustafson (Assiniboia): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In light of the most recent forecast by the Canadian Association of Oil Drillers that 66 rigs will be moving to the United States in the next few months, the fact that 79 rigs have been idle through cancellation of long-term agreements and that 50 additional rigs have been cancelled due to winter cancellations, can the minister inform this House what steps his department is prepared to take to encourage Canadian companies to drill for oil in Canada for the Canadian people?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, such action has already been announced in the budget and in "The National Energy Program".

[English]

Mr. Gustafson: Madam Speaker, a couple of weeks ago, in answer to a question in the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works, the minister informed the Canadian public that there were too many rigs built in Canada, that the industry had over-built. Will the minister apologize to this House and take steps to assure that Canadian rigs will have work in Canada next summer?

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, the information I gave to the committee came from the officials of the drilling association themselves, who said that indeed there had been over-building in the industry over the last few years.

Mr. Wilson: Totally misrepresented.

PETRO-CANADA

PURCHASE OF FOREIGN-MADE DRILLING RIGS

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is also directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. I am informed by sources in Edmonton—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: They laugh at the mention of the region.

Mr. Andre: I am informed by private sources in Edmonton that Petro-Canada has ordered four new drilling rigs, three from United States manufacturers and one from Japan, even though there are several drilling rig manufacturers in Edmonton who are amongst the best in the world and could easily fulfil this contract. I wonder if the minister could confirm that information, and could he tell the House just what policy directives he has given to Petro-Canada with respect to purchases such as this?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): No, Madam Speaker, I cannot confirm that. Furthermore, the general guidelines given to Petro-Canada are that this corporation must indeed, whenever possible, as far as competition and prices are concerned, encourage Canadian manufacturers. That is the policy which Petro-Canada consistently follows.

[English]

Mr. Andre: Madam Speaker, Petro-Canada has hired a Bermuda company to design its logo and a New York company to find it office space, and has contracted with a Liechtenstein company to construct an office building. The minister is writing a letter to Petro-Canada ordering it to give $40 million to Imperial Oil, a multinational which, incidentally, found a Canadian company to develop for it an office building in Calgary. I wonder if the minister could attach a paragraph or a P.S. to that letter asking Petro-Canada, the national oil company, to see if it cannot find some Canadians with whom to do business.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, the position of the Tory party on Petro-Canada is well known, and I see that it has not changed. I invite my hon. friend to look at the role played by Petro-Canada since it has been set up.

Mr. Andre: Answer the question.

Mr. Lalonde: The Conservatives are like the old Tories in England in the last century; they learn nothing from history or from election defeat. Petro-Canada has been doing a first-rate job in this country in terms of helping Canadian companies and working with Canadian companies, and it is doing everything in its power to expand its activities with Canadian companies and with the support of Canadian companies.

IMMIGRATION

RECOMMENDATION RESPECTING ENTRY OF JOHN DEXTER

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of Employment and Immigration whether his officials recommended allowing John Dexter to enter Canada.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, as the Leader of the Opposition should know, in making a decision like this we consult a number of sources, including a wide variety of officials. That is advice which I take as being my position and my judgment. As I said earlier to another hon. member, I make the judgment in my ministry, not the officials.

INQUIRY WHETHER MINISTER CONSULTED

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, I would like the minister to answer the question, although I think we can probably take it from his refusal for the fifth time today to answer a question on this matter that his officials recommended against the action he took.

Let me ask his colleague the Secretary of State and Minister of Communications, presumably the minister responsible for cultural policy in this country, whether he was consulted with regard to the Dexter decision by the Minister of Employment and Immigration prior to that decision having been taken.

Hon. Francis Fox (Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): Madam Speaker, I was indeed consulted by my colleague. He and I share the view that the Stratford Festival is indeed a national institution. Both of us are very concerned about the situation which has developed. Both of us are very interested in seeing the Stratford company perform again during the course of next summer.

The minister discussed the matter with me. I am in full agreement with his position as, as a matter of fact, are Actors Equity, ACTRA and most of the people on the board of the Canadian Conference of the Arts with whom I had the opportunity to discuss this matter last week.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, my question was whether the consultation occurred before the decision.

Mr. Fox: Madam Speaker, the answer is yes.

ATOMIC ENERGY OF CANADA LIMITED

DISPOSAL OF NUCLEAR WASTE

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg-Birds Hill): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, and it relates in particular to the issue of the experimental underground vault for nuclear waste at Lac du Bonnet, which I have mentioned before in this House, and in general to the whole question of AECL's policies with regard to nuclear waste disposal. I have with me a copy of an internal AECL report concerning the nuclear fuel waste management program which advocates changes in the process of obtaining community approval of such undertakings. It states that initiatives are being taken to avoid having local councils express their opinions by way of resolution of these projects.

My question for the minister is whether he approves of this attempt by Atomic Energy of Canada to solve the problem that it has been unable to sell its projects by circumventing the democratic process and the local communities affected by these projects.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I have not seen the document to which the hon. member refers but, as the hon. member knows, there have been constant consultations with the government of Ontario. The federal government and the government of Ontario are both elected democratically.

As to the procedure which should be followed in this respect, a decision has been taken jointly by the two governments to examine possible sites and to make surveys of possible sites on Crown land, unincorporated land, so as to avoid possible conflicts with local authorities or councils who may not wish to have any such surveys taken inside their areas of jurisdiction. All the democratic processes have been respected and followed, as far as I can assess. No survey will be taken inside municipal territory without consultation and the agreement of local authorities.

Mr. Blaikie: Madam Speaker, Lac du Bonnet is in Manitoba, and the fact remains that these dump sites are now intended to be put into place over the heads of local communities, which have, through the democratic process, rejected this.

My supplementary question to the minister has to do with the whole question of nuclear power and the fact that the national energy program indicates a further commitment to nuclear power. Can the minister tell us whether the government has finished its so-called internal review of nuclear power, or can he tell us that there never really was one; and would he confirm to this House and to the Canadian people that we are now committed to going ahead with nuclear power and that the public will never have an opportunity to debate, discuss and publicly present their views on this crucial and, I think, unfortunate energy decision by the government?

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, the answer is no.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

EXPORTATION OF NUCLEAR TECHNOLOGY—PART PLAYED BY PAKISTANI OFFICIALS

Hon. Allan Lawrence (Durham-Northumberland): Madam Speaker, if I may, I would like to revert to the certainty that Pakistan is close to making a hydrogen bomb using the enriched uranium method, partly as the result of past Canadian government policies. Canadians have recently been involved in, and Canada has been a shipping point for, prohibited nuclear and military technology exportation to Pakistan. My question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs, who has been involved in ministerial discussions about this very matter.

Is the Government of Canada considering any protest to the Pakistani government or the embassy here in Ottawa about the part played by Pakistani government or embassy officials in this matter?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, during my meeting with the Pakistani foreign minister a month or two ago I made very strong representations to him on behalf of our government with respect to our feelings as to the development of nuclear explosive devices. I received from him an absolute commitment that Pakistan was not engaged in the development of such nuclear explosive devices and, in addition, that no Canadian nuclear material or technology was being used in this respect.

● (1500)

It seems to me that we have a case before the courts here. It involves materials and components which can be used for a range of purposes, not solely for a purpose connected with nuclear technology, and we should allow this case to be decided by the courts.

EXPORT AND IMPORT PERMITS ACT

INQUIRY WHY MINOR CHARGES LAID

Hon. Allan Lawrence (Durham-Northumberland): That is a devious answer, Madam Speaker, because the minister knows that it is not Canadian technology which is being exported, it is American technology.

My supplementary question is to the Solicitor General who was also involved in these ministerial discussions which have resulted in the watering down or diluting of the charges laid by the RCMP and the security service. My question to the Solicitor General is this. Why were minor charges simply laid under the Customs Act relating to customs offences in this matter rather than the more serious charge of dealing and trafficking in military and nuclear technology to a banned or prohibited country? Why were more serious charges not laid in this matter after the ministers discussed it?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, I am not prepared, and neither was the hon. member in the former government, to confirm or deny the particular details of an investigation or case which was being viewed by the security service, and I am not prepared to do that in this case.

I repeat the clear policy of the Canadian government, that Canada would not contribute its products, its resources or its technologies to the preparation by any country of nuclear weapons. It is the object of the security service to perform surveillance to counter and to deter any attempt by foreign agents to do so. That is the policy of the security service, and apart from repeating the policy, I do not think it is in the national interest to give details of the operations of the security service in any particular case.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CLOSURE OF POLISH BORDER—POSSIBLE THREAT TO WORLD PEACE

Mr. Jesse P. Flis (Parkdale-High Park): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the fact that the Soviet Union has ordered the East German-Polish border sealed off, and in view of the fact that the Democratic Republic of Germany and the Soviet Union have moved military forces along the Polish border, thus threatening world peace and jeopardizing further East-West detente, would the minister please brief this House on what steps the government plans to take to convince the Soviet Union and the Democratic Republic of Germany to keep their armies out of Poland and to respect the principles of the Helsinki Final Act?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, the Government of Canada regards the border situation around Poland with utmost seriousness. As the hon. member himself has mentioned in his question, it would not be compatible with the Helsinki Final Act for any country to use force or even to threaten to use force against another country. It is the opinion of our government that it is extremely important that the Polish question be settled by the Poles themselves and by no one else.

The Government of Canada is taking certain initiatives with respect to this crisis, but I think it would not be in the international interest to reveal those at the present time.

PETITION

MR. DOMM—INTRODUCTION OF METRIC SYSTEM

Madam Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that the Clerk of the House has laid upon the Table the thirty-third report of the Clerk of Petitions, stating that he has examined the petition presented by the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Domm) and finds that it meets the requirements of the Standing Orders as to form.

I have notice of a question of privilege from the hon. member for Kootenay East-Revelstoke (Mr. Parker).

PRIVILEGE

MR. PARKER—ANSWERS GIVEN BY MR. LALONDE

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East-Revelstoke): Madam Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege concerning answers given to me on two separate occasions by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) and with regard to a statement released by the minister's office last Monday and carried by the Canadian Press wire service. It is my contention that the minister has seriously misled both me and this House, and furthermore that he has challenged my privilege as a member of Parliament by correcting these misleading statements in the press before doing so in the House. With your indulgence, Madam Speaker, I should like to recount briefly the history of this matter.

On Friday, November 21, I first asked the minister whether he would be willing to take action to assist four of my constituents whose land had been summarily expropriated under the antiquated provisions of the Railway Act. At that time the minister assured me that:

> As far as we are concerned, we have succeeded in obtaining a commitment from the builders that they will settle on the basis of the rules put forward in a bill in the Senate by Senator Olson which represented a significant improvement on the old legislation. Unfortunately this bill has not yet been passed by the House, but the applicants are ready to consider themselves bound by it.

I found that answer surprising, Madam Speaker, so I asked the minister to clarify it, and he assured me as follows:

> —we have succeeded in reaching a situation whereby the private companies building the pipeline agree to be bound by the particular bill introduced by Senator Olson in the Senate. So in effect, the people concerned can benefit from the provisions of the bill which unfortunately has not yet been passed by the House.

At the time I knew the information was incorrect because I had copies of writs issued under the provisions of the Railway Act to four of my constituents. So, knowing it was incorrect, I gave the minister yet another opportunity to correct the record. On Wednesday, November 26, I offered him exactly that option. His answer was the following:

> I have told the House, however, that Foothills had indicated that, as far as compensation is concerned, Foothills is ready to work out compensation arrangements on the basis of the bill introduced by my colleague, Senator Olson, which has not yet been passed by Parliament. Foothills voluntarily agreed to follow the rules proposed in that particular bill. As far as I can see, nothing has happened which is contradictory to what I indicated to the House or what Foothills had indicated publicly before.

I could not believe this answer, Madam Speaker, since it was directly contradicting what was taking place with regard to my constituents. So I gave the minister one last chance to correct his statement, and once again he said:

> —my information is to the effect that the company has indicated they are ready to pay compensation on the basis of Senator Olson's bill. I fail to see the problem raised by my hon. friend if the company has agreed to pay compensation on the basis of the bill proposed by Senator Olson.

Quite frankly, Madam Speaker, I was dumbfounded because I knew the minister was not telling the truth. I had given him four opportunities to correct the record on the floor of this House, and four times he had repeated the same incorrect answer.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Parker: As a backbench opposition member I had already imposed too heavily on my party's meagre allotment of questions and I had failed to get the minister to correct the record. Despite my attempts to raise this obvious bending of the truth with the national media, the minister refused to budge even slightly. Feeling a great deal of displeasure at the way I have been treated by the minister, I decided I could not pursue the issue any further. Then, to my absolute horror, I saw the CP wire story on Monday, December 1. I should like to quote extensively from this story, Madam Speaker, because I think it says better than I ever could how the minister misled this House.

> Energy Minister Marc Lalonde forgot to mention a key bit of information about procedures being used to expropriate land in southeastern British Columbia for a pipeline, a spokesman for the minister said Friday. Lalonde assured the Commons earlier this week that Foothills Pipeline (Yukon) Limited, now expropriating land for the Alaska highway natural gas pipeline, would use new rules to determine the compensation paid to landowners affected. But the spokesman for the minister said Friday he should have added that the new rules contained in a bill that has never been passed by Parliament won't come into effect until the legislation is approved. That means that expropriation and compensation will continue to be determined by the 1919 Railway Act, the law now in effect.
> Lalonde had said that while the Railway Act is the law now and must be used for obtaining court orders, Foothills had agreed to follow the terms of the new act in determining compensation.
>
> But his spokesman said the minister should have added that Foothills has said it would make adjustments that reflect the new approach only after the new act is approved.

• (1510)

It is unbelievable. On four separate occasions the minister stood in the House and told me that this "wonderful" agreement with Foothills will solve all the problems of my constituents. He even went so far as to practically insult me for making outrageous statements. Then, when all the furore died down, he got some unidentified flack to go to the press and tell them he forgot to mention that all Foothills agreed to do was to follow the law, if and when it is ever changed. By the way, it is really marvellous that Foothills has assured the minister it will abide by the law. I wonder how much he had to give into them in order to get such a strong assurance.

In conclusion, I should like to sum up the reasons I feel that I have a prima facie case of privilege. First, the minister has seriously misled both myself and the House on four separate occasions. As I have shown, this is not a debatable point. There is no question that what the minister told me on four separate occasions was not correct as it was later determined. Second, and more important was the way in which the minister set the record straight. Since this is where the incorrect statement was made, it seems to me this is where it should have been corrected. Surely the minister owes me, as a member of Parliament, at least that much. Before having some unidentified aide correcting his statements in the press, surely the minister has enough respect for me and for Parliament to rise in his place and correct his statement on the record in my presence.

For these reasons, if Madam Speaker finds that there exists a prima facie case of privilege, I am prepared to move that this entire matter be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I have listened with interest to the comments of the hon. member. I appreciate the fact that we had an opportunity to speak about it last night. I want to assure him that if he has been misled in any way, certainly it was not intentional and I would have no problem apologizing for it whatever.

But I should like to put the record straight. First of all, I did not ask any unidentified aide to make any particular statement. Some member of the press probably asked for further information, and it was provided when requested. If the hon. member knew that the answer was incorrect on November 21 and on November 24, I am surprised he did nothing about it until today. But, leaving that aside, I want to say there is nothing in my answer which I believe misled the House.

I indicated that Foothills was willing to pay compensation on the basis of a new bill which had not yet passed the House. In answer to a question by the hon. member on November 26, as reported at page 5089 of Hansard, I said:

> I certainly have no power or authority to instruct any of my colleagues, but I will be very happy to raise the problem which my hon. friend has pointed out with Senator Olson.

Also I indicated that there was no way I could force that particular company to do anything other than act under the existing legislation, that is, the Railway Act. But the fact is that the company gave a commitment to pay compensation on the basis of the new legislation. It is true that it will only be able to do this once the bill is passed, but it is ready to do it not only with all the people whose property has been expropriated, but with the people with whom it made deals in the past. This is the information I have. So, there is an opportunity for all people who will make settlements with Foothills to come back at a later stage once the bill introduced by Senator Olson in the other place is passed. Senator Olson and I have indicated our support for this type of legislation. We appreciate the fact that Foothills has agreed to be bound by that legislation once it is passed.

Mr. Deans: They have no choice.

Mr. Lalonde: My hon. friend from Hamilton is always going through the roof without listening to the facts. The company will not be bound by that rule unless it is made retroactive, but it appears that it agrees to be bound retroactively with the piece of legislation.

Mr. Deans: That is not what was said the other day.

Mr. Lalonde: I think my friend should keep his cool and realize what is the situation, but I will deal with my hon. friend from British Columbia who is much cooler.

As soon as the bill is passed and if it comes into law prior to the completion of the Alaska gas pipeline project, Foothills has indicated that it is prepared to make adjustments which reflect the new approach provided under Bill S-12.

I regret if there has been any misinterpretation, or if my friend feels that he was misled in any way, shape or form. There was nothing in my answers which indicated any such intention to mislead, or any statement which was wrong or false. Also as reported at page 5089 of Hansard, I indicated:

> There is no way by which Foothills can act other than under the provisions of a law which is in effect in this country, namely the Railway Act.

I think I have made the record pretty clear. If there has been some confusion, I apologize. I am happy to have had the opportunity today to clarify this matter on the record so that there will be no confusion.

Mr. Parker: A point of order—

Madam Speaker: No, the hon. member for Kootenay East-Revelstoke (Mr. Parker) cannot speak twice on this question of privilege.

Mr. Parker: Madam Speaker, I should like to raise a point of order with regard to the minister's answer.

Madam Speaker: It is the same question. The hon. member cannot transform it into a point of order. Does the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell) want to speak on this same question of privilege?

Mr. Waddell: Yes, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: Will the hon. member resume his seat? It is quite obvious to me, having heard the hon. member for Kootenay East-Revelstoke, that there is no question of privilege in the matter he raised. That is quite clear to me, just having heard him. So, I do not feel I can allow any other interventions in a case which is already clear.

The hon. member for Kootenay East-Revelstoke said that the minister misled him. If he did, the minister quite clearly apologized for it. I believe we are faced with a different interpretation of facts.

Article 19 of Beauchesne says that a dispute arising between two members as to allegations of fact does not fulfil the conditions of parliamentary privilege. The failure of a minister of the Crown to answer a question may not be raised as a question of privilege. Statements made outside the House by a member may not be used as the basis of a question of privilege. So, that is quite clear in this particular case. Therefore, for that reason I will not hear any other interventions on this question of privilege.

POINTS OF ORDER

MR. HOWIE—STATEMENT MADE BY MR. DE BANÉ DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Hon. J. Robert Howie (York-Sunbury): Madam Speaker, just a few moments ago the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. De Bané) suggested that my motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43 today reflected upon the integrity of his department. My motion was not accusatory, nor was it intended to be. Unlike Canada Works and similar programs, the data base for the minister's program to which I referred is not available to me. I do not have it. I cannot get it, and I want it. If the minister would simply table it or tell me where I can get it, he will meet the thrust of my motion.

Hon. Pierre De Bané (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Madam Speaker, I should like to indicate that whatever decision is made, of course it is open to debate. I would never say that a decision I made is perfect. I already committed myself when I appeared before the Parliamentary Committee on Regional Development that, during the year, I would try to refine the designation to try to correct it as such.

● (1520)

What I would like to emphasize is that those designations were not made on arbitrary, gut feeling criteria. The Department of Finance, jointly with DREE, asked Statistics Canada to designate the different census divisions which met the following three criteria: the highest family unemployment rate in Canada, the lowest per capita income, and an isolation factor. In no province should the regions designated cover more than roughly 40 per cent of the population of the province, otherwise there would be no incentive. I would gladly supply those economic indicators from the different census divisions to the hon. member. Again, I will never pretend that there is no room for improvement. I have already committed myself to see if in the next few months we should not try to refine and do it better. I want to assure him there is no arbitrary designation here.

Mr. Howie: I would like to thank the minister very much for the information he has supplied. I will be making some very constructive suggestions in the days to come.

MR. WADDELL—STATEMENT MADE BY MR. LALONDE

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. My point is simply this: in the interests of fairness could the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) clarify to this House, and especially to the residents of southeastern British Columbia, just exactly what is his position with respect to the expropriation? He said clearly in the House that company, Foothills, would pay compensation with respect to Senator Olson's bill. He has now said today that the company will pay for compensation for the expropriation with respect to Senator Olson's—

An hon. Member: Order!

Mr. Waddell: If you will give me a moment I will come to the point. It is very important for the residents. They will pay retroactively. I think the minister should inquire of the House, if he is indicating to the House that, in fact, that bill will be brought to the House, as we may never—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I was listening to see what the hon. member had in mind. He can ask for a clarification but he cannot refer at all to the ruling I have just made. I understand that he wants to ask for a clarification but he has transformed it into a question, which seems to me is prolonging the question period.

Mr. Waddell: On a point of order, Madam Speaker, this is a crucial question for our people in southeastern British Columbia. I ask the minister to clarify that point, which is whether he is bringing in legislation to cover what he just said today in the House—

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

PRIVILEGE

MR. MALONE—ALLEGED LAUGHTER BY MR. LALONDE

Mr. Arnold Malone (Crowfoot): Madam Speaker, I rise today with hesitation, on a question of privilege. I feel there is some purpose in my rising to deal with the behaviour of ministers of the Crown in relation to how they respond as much non-verbally as verbally in this House. I am referring to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde).

Madam Speaker, as we know, with respect to questions of privilege we are talking about the equality of our ability to participate in the House of Commons. That equality must be accorded, no matter where a member comes from in the country. In the attitude of the minister of energy I detect a reflection downwards on those people who come from the province of Alberta. I refer to an instance earlier this week when a member posed a question beginning "In quoting from a Calgary newspaper . . ." and there was a loud guffaw from the minister of energy. Today the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre) raised a question in which his very first words were, "In quoting from an Edmonton source . . ." and the minister of energy again burst into laughter. Surely we must ask why a minister of the Crown who associates with the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), who says he speaks for all of Canada, degrades some part of this region.

I rise on what I know, and what you will soon find out, is not a question of privilege. I rise simply to raise this grievance. I am in agreement with you, Madam Speaker, that a point of order can only deal with the procedures of the day, and a question of privilege can deal only with that which allows reflection upon how one participates in the House. There is a hiatus created, and this House should find a method by which these grievances can be dealt with, because they offend me deeply as a member of Parliament. I resent the behaviour of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources when he degrades a region in an attempt to make political gain elsewhere in the country.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I do not want to waste the time of the House on this issue which the hon. member has raised. My only comment to him is that he is obviously sick and he needs some rest.

Mr. Beatty: That is irresponsible.

Mr. Lalonde: If the hon. member was in the House at the time, he must have seen there was general good humour and laughter all around the hon. member, on the Tory side. I saw many members from Alberta laughing as well. The laughter had nothing to do with the subject matter under discussion, but it was the way in which the hon. member prefaced his question which exposed him to laughter from his own colleagues. So I suggest that the hon. member should go home and rest for a few weeks before coming back feeling a little better.

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I hope the minister of energy will reflect upon the quality of the response he has just made with respect to this matter. It is not conducive to what we are trying to achieve in the House of Commons. This House is supposedly representative of a place of understanding where members from all parts of Canada can represent Canadians, in both languages, and where there are no differences in so far as regions are concerned. That is the essence of Canada. If I may say so, with great respect, the minister ought to apologize to the hon. member.

Mr. Lalonde: He should be the one to apologize.

Madam Speaker: I cannot hear the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Malone) twice on the question of privilege.

Mr. Malone: It is a new question.

Madam Speaker: As a matter of fact, the hon. member for Crowfoot has assisted me in the ruling I am about to make. He has already told me that he did not think he had a question of privilege. I agree with him and I thank him for assisting the Chair in determining whether or not it was a question of privilege. At last here is a member who is addressing himself to that very specific and important point. That is something hon. members do not always do. The hon. member has touched on those reasons himself. Some hon. members feel there are not sufficient occasions to air grievances in this House. The Standing Orders do provide for times when hon. members may air grievances, and I need not mention those to the hon. member. I am sure he is as familiar with them as I am.

I must tell him that facial expressions are not dealt with in the Standing Orders. I am at a loss to rule on a facial expression which might have been made by any hon. member. The hiatus to which the hon. member referred could be dealt with in the Standing Orders if all hon. members agree. This would enable hon. members to air grievances rather than raise questions of privilege.

• (1530)

MR. MALONE—NOTICE OF INTENTION TO RAISE QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Mr. Arnold Malone (Crowfoot): Madam Speaker, I am rising on a new point, and to say that I want to reserve my right—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member would help me if he made it clear whether he is rising on a point of order or whether he wants to speak again on the question of privilege. Would he make it clear?

Mr. Malone: Madam Speaker, it is not a point of order and it is not in reference to my previous question of privilege. It is a new question of privilege and it arises from the very derogatory remarks, which reflect on me as a member of this House, made by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) when he made the comment that he thinks that I am sick. At this time I merely want to reserve my right to raise that question the next time the two of us are in the House together.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 1,503, 1,532, 1,534, 1,538, 1,618 and 1,659.

[Text]

SMALL BUSINESSES LOANS ACT—ANNUAL REPORT

Question No. 1,503—Mr. Huntington:

For the total amount 1961 to 1979, as described in table 1 of the 1979 annual report of the Small Businesses Loans Act, what were the claims paid under the act, not recovered by (a) lending institutions (b) the province?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): In so far as the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce is concerned:

(a) Claims paid under the act between 1961 and 1979 amounted to $5,841,561. This figure, as allowed for in the act, includes legal cost, administration expenses, and accrued interest as well as principal owing. Figures of amounts recovered by lending institutions prior to a claim being submitted for payment are not available.

(b) Provinces do not recover loans made under the Small Businesses Loans Act.

REGIONAL AIR CARRIER POLICY—MINISTER OF TRANSPORT'S POSITION

Question No. 1,532—Mr. Mazankowski:

1. What is the Minister of Transport's position with respect to regional air carrier policy?

2. What is his position on allowing regional carriers limited access to transportation centres, such as Toronto or Montreal, outside their designated area of operation?

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. The minister intends to seek cabinet approval to release for public comment a proposed new domestic air carrier policy, which will concern, in part, the role of the regional air carriers.

2. The proposed new domestic air carrier policy will address the question of regional air carrier access to centres outside their designated area of operation.

SEAWAY ADVISORY BOARD

Question No. 1,534—Mr. Mazankowski:

1. Does the Minister of Transport intend to create a Seaway Advisory Board to enable industry, labour and communities affected by the seaway to have a say in its operations?

2. Is the government planning a further increase in tolls on the Welland Canal and/or the seaway and, if so, what level of toll increases is planned and over what period of time?

3. Will the minister guarantee that full consultations will be held with all interested groups before any commitments are made with respect to toll increases?

Order Paper Questions

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The St. Lawrence Seaway Authority advises as follows: 1. For the present the minister has endorsed a more informal consultative mechanism than the advisory board concept. Two "Information Sessions" have been held attended by the administrator of the Canadian Marine Transportation Administration, seaway officials and representatives of the users of the seaway. This approach was well received and may prove more productive than a formal structure. The concept of a board of directors or an advisory board is, therefore, being deferred for the time being.

2. According to an exchange of notes on March 20, 1978, between Canada and the United States there is to be a mandatory review of the seaway tariff of tolls every four years, beginning in 1981, for "the purpose of achieving, through the tariff of tolls and revenue sharing arrangements, economic viability for each section of the seaway based upon recovery of annual operating costs and equitable return for depreciation and capital investments, having regard to the need to encourage the optimum utilization of the existing seaway facilities". Decisions on the future toll levels on the seaway will be made in the context of this mandatory review.

3. The minister will ensure that consultations are held with major seaway interest groups during the course of the 1981 review of the tariff of tolls, and prior to any commitments being made with respect to toll increases.

GRAIN—EXPORTS TO U.S.S.R.

Question No. 1,538—Mr. Mazankowski:

1. In each of the past ten years, what were the level of grain exports sent to the U.S.S.R.?

2. For the same years, what was the average annual export of grain to the U.S.S.R.?

3. What level of exports to the U.S.S.R. is considered "normal" by the government in reference to the statement made by the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board with respect to his decision to end Canada's participation in the grain embargo?

4. What is the minister's reasoning behind his definition of "normal" if it exceeds the yearly average?

5. Does the minister feel that more than the embargo limit of 3.8 million tonnes of grain could have been sold and delivered to the U.S.S.R. in the last crop year and, if so, on what does he base his assumption?

6. Does the government intend to compensate farmers for losses incurred due to the embargo and, if so, when will this be paid and in what manner?

7. Does the minister agree with the steps taken in response to the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan and does he support the United States in its efforts to ensure that such communist aggression is not ignored?

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): In so far as the Canadian Wheat Board is concerned:

1.	1970/71	328,964 tonnes		1975/76	4,662,598 tonnes
	1971/72	3,460,256 "		1976/77	1,164,671 "
	1972/73	5,017,046 "		1977/78	2,398,995 "
	1973/74	1,125,985 "		1978/79	1,554,657 "
	1974/75	351,532 "		1979/80	3,795,600 "

2. 2,386,030 tonnes.

3 and 4. It has been normal for Canada, as the only country which has exported grain to the U.S.S.R. every year since 1963, to sell at levels in relation to Canadian supplies, transportation capability, and world and U.S.S.R. demand.

5. No.

6. Yes. An interdepartmental committee is currently preparing a report for cabinet on the extent of losses suffered by Canadian farmers. A decision covering timing and manner of payment will be made following consideration of this report by ministers.

7. Yes.

ADMIRAL FALLS' GRAND PIANO

Question No. 1,618—Mr. Cossitt:

1. With reference to the answer to question No. 1,205 which stated in part, that the government purchased a Yamaha grand piano for the residence of Admiral Falls in Brussels at a cost of $4,057, in what country was the piano made?

2. Is the government aware that the Heintzman Piano Company in Canada is closing down due to the lack of business and, if so, for what reason was the piano not purchased from the company in order to assist in Canadian jobs?

3. (a) What are all of the reasons that the taxpayers have paid for a piano for Admiral Falls and, specifically, is he personally a pianist (b) what are the names of all persons making use of the piano?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): 1. In so far as the Department of External Affairs is concerned, the piano provided Admiral Falls' official residence in Brussels was purchased from Yamaha Canada Music Ltd. of Scarborough, Ontario at a cost of $4,057, with a promised delivery of three months. The piano was manufactured in Japan.

2. At the time of purchase the government was not aware that the Heintzman Company was closing down. However, they were asked to submit a quotation on the piano. The Heintzman Company confirmed that the smallest grand piano manufactured by them would cost $7,900 and the delivery would be six to eight months. The decision to purchase the Yamaha piano rather than the Heintzman piano was based on these factors:

(a) The cost differential of almost 100 per cent;

(b) The smaller size of the Yamaha piano could be better accommodated in Admiral Falls' house;

(c) The earlier delivery promise of Yamaha permitted us to consolidate its shipment with the other Canadian manufactured furniture, thus resulting in a significant saving in its shipping cost.

3. (a) and (b) Admiral Falls does play the piano; however, the provision of the piano was based on representational requirements not the personal factors. Representational functions at which the piano is to be used include recitals of visiting Canadian artists and social functions.

TRANSPORT—BROCHURE—THE CANADIAN AIR TRANSPORTATION ADMINISTRATION

Question No. 1,659—Mr. McKinnon:

Did the Department of Transport authorize the printing of a brochure entitled The Canadian Air Transportation Administration and, if so (a) on what date was it printed (b) how many copies were printed and at what cost (c) to whom was it distributed (d) for what purpose?

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Yes.

(a) On or about November 22, 1978;

(b) 258,525 copies, $65,029 (including $6,750 federal sales tax);

(c) The brochure was distributed to Transport Canada headquarters and to the six regional offices of Transport Canada (Air) to be used in a potential market of approximately 250,000 persons, both internal and external to Transport Canada. The market was seen to be the general public, specifically the air passengers; the aviation industry; the 650 (approx.) licensed air carriers in Canada; pilots and air crew; aviation associations; suppliers; provincial aviation councils and their support employees;

(d) To describe the role of the Canadian Air Transportation administration.

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

APPROPRIATION ACT NO. 2, 1980-81

House in Committee of the Whole on Bill C-47, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the Government of Canada for the financial year ending March 31, 1981—Mr. Pinard—Mr. Ethier in the chair.

The Deputy Chairman: Under the provisions of the order passed on Tuesday, April 29, 1980, the Committee of the Whole will proceed today with consideration of the estimates under the item transport of the schedule to Bill C-47, an act for granting to her Majesty certain sums of money for the Government of Canada for the financial year ending March 31, 1981.

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT:

Vote No. 1

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Chairman, I thought that I could use the opportunity given to me, that is, the consideration of my departmental expenditures to mention some progress made in the transport area, more especially some achievements in which I have been involved since my appointment to Transport Canada in March last. My speech will be deliberately and openly optimistic because I feel that once in a while one should point out what is going well especially in a country like ours where we tend, too easily perhaps, to be pessimistic. Besides, one can be optimistic without being complacent, smug and self-satisfied. I shall have to recognize, in the next two days, that many things still have to be done, which we will do. The beauty of Canada is that most of its problems can be solved, or at least I think they can.

Mr. Chairman, I hesitated before deciding whether I would present my few observations by mode of transport, that is, air, sea, or land, or else, by area, that is the west, the east and the centre. I opted for the latter, but I shall often have to switch from one to the other. I trust I shall be forgiven for doing so.

[English]

Let us look first at what is happening in western Canada. Economic growth in that region has been greater than in the rest of the country as a whole since 1971. This trend is expected to continue throughout the 1980s. Of course, it will have major implications on the transportation system. The federal government is resolved that the transportation capacity in western Canada will be equal to increasing traffic demands.

Let me give some illustrations of that determination. I would like to recognize once and for all the work which has been done by my predecessors and by other members of this House. It is sometimes advantageous to be at the end of a story, rather than at the beginning, which will be the case in some of the instances I will mention. I say that so that I will not have to repeat it too often as I go along.

Mr. Mazankowski: You're trying to get us off our guard.

Mr. Pepin: I am trying to butter you up. The first subject is ports on the west coast. Last summer three major issues were resolved. Hon. members will remember that the Roberts Bank port development had been held up because of a federal-provincial dispute over ownership of the bed of Georgia Strait. The agreement was signed in August by the Hon. Don Phillips, representing the government of British Columbia, and myself on behalf of the federal government. Under this agreement the province provides for the transfer of land and water lots to the National Harbours Board without prejudice to the final resolution of legal ownership. This allows the National Harbours Board to proceed with the development of three additional terminal facilities. An amount of $47 million has been allocated to the project by the port of Vancouver, of which Roberts Bank is an integral part. By 1985, an estimated 25 million tons of coal will be shipped from Roberts Bank annually, compared to the present shipments of 11 million odd tons.

The second accomplishment which I would like to underline is the project taking place at Ridley Island at Prince Rupert. On the grain side, in line with the memorandum of understanding signed by my predecessor in July, 1979, agreement was reached with the grain consortium last September. Three or four contracts for ground preparations have already been allocated and work has begun. The federal contribution to this part will be approximately $22 million. As everybody knows, a grain elevator worth about $200 million and a dock worth $12 million to $14 million will be constructed by the consortium of grain pools and grain companies.

On the coal side, negotiations are now in their final stages with the Japanese. Perhaps I should not say that, because negotiations such as these can have temporary interruptions. I understand that things may not be concluded. At any rate, the federal government has committed itself to $3 per ton rate at the port which, as far as one can determine at this time, would be equivalent to a grant of some $15 million to $20 million.

The third piece of good news is in relation to Duke Point at Nanaimo. Last August I had the pleasure of signing another agreement with the B.C. government and the Nanaimo Harbour Board, committing $6 million to this $21 million project which will make Duke Point the major lumber port on the west coast.

I must mention in all this good news, another agreement, which has not received too much attention in the press and which I signed, also in August, with the hon. Mr. Fraser for the government of British Columbia, dealing with a joint marine terminal study to determine what facilities will be needed on the west coast to the year 2000. This agreement should be an important instrument in policy formulation in the coming years.

The major remaining port problem on the west coast has to do with the status of the port of Vancouver. For a number of years now the Vancouver port community has requested more autonomy in the management of its business. During the last election, the Prime Minister made a positive commitment to that effect. The subject is also of interest to many other ports, if not all of them, under the authority of the National Harbours Board.

As my hon. friends know, this subject of port management has been the object of three bills in the last five years. The debate has been going on for a decade. Bill C-50, which was the last incarnation of that debate in the House of Commons, was not generally supported.

I have had many meetings throughout the summer with members of the Vancouver Port Authority and other port authorities. Together with my distinguished marine administrator, we looked at the whole issue. As a result of these meetings, the marine administrator has now prepared a position paper in consultation with port authorities. This paper is almost ready for presentation to the cabinet committee. I can indicate the general lines of that position paper. They are very practical ones. We recognize the different categories of ports, although most of the attention goes to the National Harbours Board Act. The idea will be to develop two types of ports and to establish a relationship between the two. In the internal jargon, we call them "mini" and "maxi" corporations. The Harbour Commissions Act of 1964 would not be changed in any substantial fashion.

The legislation will be practical. As I understand it, this is in keeping with what interested parties involved in port administration want, as well as the people of Canada.

With respect to grain handling and transportation in western Canada, I have made a couple of speeches recently on that subject.

The Canadian Wheat Board says that annual grain exports could grow by 50 per cent by 1985, and farmers have accepted this challenge. The Canadian government has accepted the challenge of providing the best transportation facilities. As everyone knows, the government record is pretty good if one considers that in the last decade it has invested a sum of about $1.3 billion in improving the western rail transportation system, although I might add that the hon. member for Medicine Hat, others and myself, say that it is still not good enough yet.

Mr. Hargrave: Amen.

Mr. Pepin: There is still a lot to be done even when one admits that quite a lot has been accomplished in the last decade.

To correct this situation, that is, make the system as good as it should and could be, most people agree that there are two major areas to tackle. One is the upgrading of the railway facilities. The other is the modernization of the Crowsnest Pass freight rate. It is possible that my parliamentary secretary, the hon. member for St. Boniface, will want to say more about that. However, I will be in a position, I hope, in the upcoming discussion to answer most of the questions as to what is taking place now by way of branch line rehabilitation, boxcar rehabilitation, branch line subsidies, the grain transportation co-ordinator, and so on.

During the summer I had the good fortune to see CN and CP equipment in the mountain region. At the time federal and provincial ministers saw new signalling equipment, new tracks being laid by extremely modern means, hot box detectors linked with electronic equipment. It was very impressive. I think CN and CP are now quite proud to show the progress which has been made.

I will not repeat speeches I have made about the Crowsnest. I will just say that more and more people agree that some change must take place. On November 15, 1979, my predecessor, the hon. member for Vegreville said the following as reported in Hansard at page 1359:

> Not everyone agrees with the solutions and not everyone agrees with the diagnosis of the problems that are before us.

He went on to say:

> —there are different views as to how we might best turn the system around.

Partly through his efforts, and partly through the efforts of the previous minister of transport, and also through the efforts of a number of leaders in that industry in western Canada, I think one can say that the consensus on the need to modernize has grown substantially in the last year. On December 1, 1980, the hon. member for Medicine Hat was saying just about the same thing. As reported in Hansard at page 5219, he said:

> There are many farmers in western Canada who do not completely understand what is behind the Crowsnest Pass freight rate and what it does—

And I want to emphasize the words "and what it does". The hon. member went on to say:

> —to the total agricultural economy and the total Canadian economy.

Many other people and I have been saying that, and I just want to associate a westerner with an easterner in saying those things, to strengthen my credibility on the matter.

In any event, I spent a lot of time, not as much as I would have liked to last week in Calgary and the week before in Regina, discussing those matters with leaders in the industry and farmers. I have been trying to express my great desire about contributing to the modernization of the western grain handling and transportation system.

There is a passage in the budget speech concerning the Western Development Fund which attracted the attention of a lot of members when it was read by the Minister of Finance. Like everyone else, I hope this fund can be helpful in solving or improving upon the Crowsnest situation at this time.

Both inside the department and outside we have worked hard on this subject. We have produced a position paper which is in the decison-making pipeline. As the hon. member for Medicine Hat has promised his support in advance, in due course I will be looking for the support of all members on all sides of the House on the initiatives which will be taken.

I would like to mention something else concerning western Canada. It has to do with the bilateral air agreement with the United Kingdom, signed in September last. A number of people wrote telling me how important this bilateral agreement was to western Canada in its air relationship with Europe, in particular, and also in its air relationship with the Far East, by way of Vancouver and Hong Kong. When this agreement was signed, unfortunately not too many people wrote to say they were pleased. However, I guess that is the story of our lives. It is good news to me, and I hope that my western friends share in that sentiment.

There is also the search and rescue program which is of interest to western Canada. The opposition increased the budget last year when they were in government. We have gone further this year for next year. The coast guard base was opened during the summer and four new ships have been assigned to the west coast.

I would have liked to have talked about the CN rail relocation in Regina and the multimodal station. I presume my friends will raise some of these subjects.

With respect to central Canada, I am very much aware of the preoccupation of some members regarding the lack of visible progress on a number of very ticklish issues. I refer to the sale of Nordair to the private sector, the transfer of air routes from Dorval to Mirabel, the Toronto-Ottawa-Montreal STOL project. All of these are very difficult problems. In my view progress is being made, particularly in the last mentioned one. I hope to be in Toronto in the coming days to meet with all interested parties, and that further progress will be accomplished.

I have more good news. The seaway made a profit for the first time. The port of Thunder Bay is thriving. The port of Montreal is doing very well. A decision on a third terminal at Malton will be made soon. The first steps have been taken on the expansion of the Hamilton airport, etc., etc., etc., as the Minister of Agriculture would say.

I would like to single out two progress areas, one being VIA Rail and the other the coming agreement with Quebec on Montreal urban transit.

VIA is a great challenge. There is no doubt about that. As my note says, it is nothing less than a reversal of historic trends of declining clientele, of increasing operating deficits, of deteriorating facilities and equipment. It is a great challenge, but again progress is being made. It is not at the speed at which the hon. member for Regina West would like, but nevertheless it is progress.

Mr. Roberts, the president of VIA, said that the number of passengers was up by 41 per cent since 1976. The load factor this year to date has been 50 per cent compared to 35 per cent when passenger transportation was handled by the railway companies. One way of looking at the progress of VIA is that they are not losing as much money as the railways say they would have lost had they continued to operate the passenger service.

A number of new initiatives are currently being undertaken. I can only tick off what they are: first, a major capital investment program to refurbish old equipment and replace it, as necessary, with new equipment. Hon. members know about the purchase of $90 million worth of Light, Rapid and Comfortable equipment. There is the computerized reservation system, Reservia, introduced in April, 1980. This has been an improvement. In its first days I received a tremendous amount of mail, as I am sure other members did. The fact that I no longer get any is a clear indication of an improvement. It is better than a Gallup poll.

[Translation]

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the minister but his time has expired. However, he could continue with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[English]

Some hon. Members: No.

The Deputy Chairman: I heard some noes.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Chairman, I am sure the minister will have ample time to conclude his remarks throughout the course of today and tomorrow. I thank him for his summary. I note his degree of optimism in his review of progress that has been made. I suppose I could make the comment that in his review he merely recapped a number of the initiatives that had been started. What has transpired over the last nine months is essentially a recycling of a number of programs, perhaps dressed up in Liberal wrapping and Liberal press releases, especially when he suggests that Prince Rupert and Roberts Bank are great achievements. I am sure everyone knows those projects were well under way to being concluded at the time the minister took over this office.

The minister talked about the desire and the necessity of increasing transportation capacity in western Canada. I thought he would seize upon that opportunity to outline some new initiatives on how that would be achieved. He merely mentioned it in passing, and went back to reviewing some of the projects that have been before us for some time. I am rather disappointed that the minister did not come forward today and announce some new initiatives which we would welcome. Perhaps, if they were substantive, we might even conclude this debate earlier than originally anticipated.

The minister talked about grain, and here again he reviewed the past. He did not announce anything for the future in terms of what may be done with respect to the port of Churchill. I sense that that port is no longer a priority. As a matter of fact, we were told that the MV Arctic was going to return to Churchill some time in the month of November.

Mr. Pepin: It has. That is public knowledge.

Mr. Mazankowski: I am not sure whether it is going to come in January, or later on in December. I hope that Churchill is still a very important component in the movement of grain for export.

Reference was also made to the fact that a paper has been prepared on the statutory freight rate. Naturally, we will await that with interest. It will no doubt be the subject of some very interesting debate. I hope that members of Parliament, and hopefully the committee, will have an opportunity to examine in detail some of the options and the direction in which he intends to move.

Our party chose the subject of transportation for the express purpose of reviewing progress or lack of progress in a number of areas. It is a very important element in this country. We sense that because of the government's preoccupation with constitutional and energy matters, some of the very basic bread and butter issues related to transportation have been relegated to the back burner. The government has now been in office for some nine months. I think I am fair in saying we regret very much the lack of progress and of any new initiatives being undertaken by this administration and this minister.

I am going to raise a couple of points. Hopefully the minister can respond. My colleagues will be opening up a number of other areas. The hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East will be dealing primarily with marine issues, an area in which he has long held a very attentive interest that has contributed very much to the development of policy in this country.

I want to deal first with rail passenger policy. I am pleased that the minister included VIA Rail in his remarks. We had the good fortune of having Mr. Roberts, the president of VIA Rail, before our committee in the past week or so. I think all members of the committee were pleased with his enthusiasm, notwithstanding the very difficult job and the challenges which he faces. However, there are some areas which require government attention and some improvement.

● (1600)

The president of VIA Rail, Mr. Roberts, pointed out the difficulty that VIA Rail is having with respect to the open-endedness of the contracts that have been signed with the two respective railroads and the fact that there was an additional $30 million supplementary estimate which now increases the subsidy toward rail passenger service to the amount of some $455 million. He indicated it was because of additional charges that were levied by the railways, notwithstanding the fact that a contract had been entered into.

The contract that is in existence is open-ended so that the railways can come back a year or so later and bill VIA for additional charges. That makes it very difficult in terms of planning and in terms of route structure and cash flow. Naturally, VIA Rail has filed a dispute with the CTC. Because of the lack of disclosure of cost information data they must rely upon others, so the matter has been referred to the CTC. If we look at past history, it will not be dealt with for perhaps two or three years. That makes it very difficult in terms of their being able to plan ahead.

Mr. Chairman, I am sure the minister will agree with me there has to be some move towards a fixed price contract for at least a 12-month period. That has to be put in place. While the minister may not be directly involved, I would hope that he would provide the necessary moral support to VIA Rail in order that that might be achieved.

Notwithstanding the fact that this element does create difficulty in long-term planning, we asked the president of VIA Rail to provide the committee with a five-year plan and submit it to the committee so that we could look at it, analyse it, and ask some questions on it. In doing this it would give us some indication of where VIA Rail intends to move over the next five-year period. The president indicated he was unable to provide a five-year detailed plan. He said:

> There is a cabinet document that has been put together by Transport Canada that will be going to cabinet in the near future, and that will show what is contained in our five-year plan, and when that is approved then we will have—we want to make sure that five-year becomes a public document so everybody knows exactly where we are going.

The fact of the matter is, according to Mr. Roberts, that Via Rail is unable to provide the minister and indeed the committee with a five-year plan because there is no long-term policy developed. I know from past experience that much has been done in terms of developing a long-term rail passenger policy. There has been a tremendous amount of detailed and background work done by Transport Canada officials. Unless there have been some dramatic shifts, or unless there is a dramatic alteration in government policy, it would seem to me that it would be only sensible that this discussion paper and formulation of a cabinet document which was put in place during the time of our administration in December, 1979, should be moved forward. Perhaps there are some details that should be changed. I find it very disturbing that this has been neglected and not proceeded with.

I should like to ask the minister, given the fact that he has had access to the discussion papers, the background information, and the very comprehensive analysis provided by his officials, why the delay? Why the foot-dragging? Why do we not have a comprehensive rail passenger policy so that VIA can conform to that policy and we can have some long-term planning?

It seems to me that it is the only sensible way to go and thereby eliminate some of the ad hocery that takes place. Can the minister answer that question and, at the same time, give some indication to us of what his initial reaction is to the recent study that has been provided for Transport Canada by the Canadian Institute of Guided Ground Transport, Queen's University? It seems to me this is a forward-looking document which may very well provide the impetus for some revolutionary changes in terms of our transportation industry, and particularly with respect to rail passenger service in terms of rationalizing all modes of transportation. I hope that the minister might answer those two or three questions without utilizing the balance of my 20 minutes so that I may get on to a couple of other subjects.

Mr. Pepin: On Churchill my hon. friend would love to know, I am sure, that the MV Arctic has been there last month to pick up 25,000 tons of wheat for Italy. I tried to provoke a question in the House at the time but I could not get anybody to ask it. It is good news, and the opposition is not normally as interested in that as in the bad news.

On the subject of the Crow modernization, I recognize that I talked mostly about the paper now in front of cabinet committee. In my recent speeches in the west I went further than that and did say a number of things about the spirit of the exercise we had been conducting during the summer and about the procedure that will be followed. I happen to believe that a negotiating commission would be helpful. There is common ground between the western agricultural conference and the commodity coalition—a number of common elements—but my view is that it would be very useful if this, as I said in Regina, were "massaged" further and carried as far as possible. Then the government would state its position on the modernization of the Crow. I can see very well that the transportation committee will want to give the bill, when it comes, a lot of attention.

As far as the railway-VIA pricing agreements are concerned, indeed one cannot be too satisfied with the system that exists now. I have referred to it as the Japanese thirteenth month, that is, the possibility of adding to the 12 payments. VIA is charged by CN and CP on the basis of the famous costing order R6313. As my hon. friend said, it is slightly open-ended. The current contract between CP, CN and VIA is in the process of being renegotiated. VIA hopes very much to improve the situation when a new agreement takes place next April, and my department and myself will certainly support the interest of VIA in this matter.

The five-year plan was prepared by VIA in the framework of its capital budget. The five-year plan is being reviewed now. It has been reviewed by the department, of course, and will be reviewed by cabinet in January as part of the long-term options on VIA. I hope to share with hon. members that review once the cabinet has expressed its own beliefs on the matter. In considering all this, my hon. friend, others and I should be conscious of the fact that VIA has really been moving for only two years, so we are still at the origin of this transformation, and consequently I do not feel uneasy about not having talked in clearcut terms about the VIA experience and about where VIA will be going from now on. In other words, the phenomenon is still quite new.

On the subject of the institute study I am sorry to say that I have not read it. Consequently an expression of views on the subject would be a straight transfer of the views of my officials, and I do not think hon. members are interested in that.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Chairman, given the urgency of developing new public forms of transportation, particularly in the rail passenger sector, as a result of the energy crisis and a number of other influences which have come about since the adoption of VIA, I wonder if the minister would not consider it of paramount importance that a long-term strategy be developed and clearcut government policy be developed.

I know from experience that a lot of work has gone into that, and I think it would really benefit this House and Canadians at large to hear a clearcut statement of government policy with respect to the future of rail passenger service, the rationalization, what particular area it will be deemed to serve the best, and where we might be able to rationalize and develop a truly integrated intermodal system in this country because, in my view, that happens to be the best way to approach this whole subject. I urge that the minister indeed reconsider the importance of the adoption of a long-term policy so that we can have it and judge the performance of the minister and of the government commensurate with that stated policy.

I hope the minister will also respond with respect to urban transportation policy. Here again we have an absence of a comprehensive and clearcut urban transportation policy, which is something which has been lacking for many years. The whole approach to urban transportation seems to be based on ad hoc decisions rather than on any global approach.

I know that there has been a very comprehensive document prepared by the minister's officials which clearly sets the stage for the evolution or development of a comprehensive urban transportation policy. The document sets out the current setting, provides alternatives, discusses those alternatives, and sets out the various implications and the effects they might have. I would like to ask the minister whether this work has been ignored. Is it being utilized? Has it been scrapped? Is it being upgraded? In short, what is happening?

When we look at the budget and the energy policy, we really do not see any clear indication from the government with respect to providing any funding for the encouragement of new forms of public transportation, particularly surface public transportation both in urban centres and intercity. I wonder why there has not been any advancement in that area as well. I know there have been negotiations over the years with the province of Ontario, the city of Montreal and the province of Quebec in relation to some rather comprehensive schemes for urban transportation.

It seems to me that the time has come for us to deal with this in terms of establishing an over-all urban transportation framework. We recognized this when we were in office and attempted to work toward not only the establishment of a comprehensive policy, but also within the framework of that anticipated policy, meeting some of the ongoing needs of the respective cities. For example, the city of Hamilton—

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but his allotted time has expired.

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Chairman, I am sorry that the limit of 20 minutes places some severe strictures upon the minister, the hon. member for Vegreville, myself, and all the rest of us in this kind of debate. However, hopefully over the next 12 hours on this particular department many members will have an opportunity to question the minister, the minister will respond, and perhaps some of us will even get a chance to rise a second or third time. I hope government members will raise the questions they want to raise where they might have the best chance of success. I wish them well in their own caucus and in a few other places, but we do not have access to the minister in those places.

Mr. Collenette: We are all equal, Les.

Mr. Benjamin: I want to raise a matter which I am sure will generate some sympathy and agreement from the minister and from the hon. member for Vegreville, who was the previous minister. Besides the Minister of Transport, the President of the Treasury Board and the Minister of Finance should really also be sitting here. Whether I or anyone else agrees with the programs, commitments and policies of the present minister, his predecessor and the one before, is not the point; they are repeatedly turned down by the cabinet or the Treasury Board on the ground of what I still call the mindless Proposition 13 syndrome about too much government, cutting back and reducing expenditures. The programs which are still waiting to be implemented would not be expenditures. They would be investments, and the return on those investments to the Canadian economy and to provincial, municipal and federal governments would more than recover the costs.

I have listened to this minister and four of his predecessors since I came here, and I must say that I give this minister first place for announcing the things he will look into and is still looking into. Questions are asked by me and by other members, including some on the minister's own side of the House. He is going to look into a number of things, including the Crow rate. He is still doing that. There never has been any argument that a change in the system has to be made. The argument is only about how the change should be made, not that a change should be made. That is agreed to by everyone in the country.

The minister and his two predecessors refused to listen to a commission appointed by his government several years ago. Mr. Justice Emmett Hall made a definitive analysis, the best ever done before or since. If the minister would just implement Mr. Justice Hall's recommendations there would be no fight left out in western Canada regarding the Crow rate. However, the minister is still looking into it.

The minister is the greatest looking-into minister I have ever known. He is going to look into the airport issues in Toronto. They are still being looked into, yea, these many years. He will look into the number of safety inspectors. That is still being looked into. He will look into the question of asbestos tailings being used in ballast on railway lines. That is still being looked into. He will look into short takeoff and landing. That is still being looked into. It has been looked into for 11 years. He will look into rail line relocation, airport terminals, multimodal transportation centres. These have been looked into until hell won't have it.

The minister and his predecessors say they agree that they want to do a certain thing, they make announcements and commitments and come to agreements with provincial governments and municipalities, but when it comes to getting the money put on the barrelhead for federal participation, the provincial governments and municipalities are turned down. Then they come back to the House of Commons or they go out to the people with whom they made agreements, or to whom they made commitments, and say, "Well, the Treasury Board has turned us down," as though they were helpless.

I want to suggest to the Minister of Transport that in view of the number of things he wants to do, with some of which I and other hon. members agree, it is about time he went to the Treasury Board and said, "Look, this is our government's policy. This is the commitment we made, these are the agreements we signed. You will either put up the money or I quit." It is about time that he had some guts in dealing with the people in his own outfit. This does not just apply to this minister; it applies to several others. We have had four successive announcements and press conferences in Regina, from three ministers of transport, about rail line relocation and commitments and agreements on cost-sharing.

I should like the minister to make note of one question which I shall put to him, and I hope I will leave him some time to answer it. If not, I will send him a letter. Is it true that Saskatchewan has agreed to use $3 million of the funds allocated to that province under UTAP, which is really supposed to be for grade separations, and the whole $9 million is supposed to be spread around the whole province? Is it true that Saskatchewan has agreed to use $3 million of the $9 million for phase I of the Regina rail line relocation? If it is true, then when the hell will he get the other $40 million out of Treasury Board? We must get started on it. We have been waiting four years and a host of other things have been held up. It is a commitment and a promise of government policy. When in God's name will he do it?

The minister mentioned that he would deal with issues on a regional basis. Since I only have a few minutes left and my colleagues will be raising numerous items in this discussion, I should like to raise a couple of other matters. The minister spoke about the sale of Nordair. Let me remind the minister that Air Canada had no choice. In fact they were given two choices: it was either compulsory or they had to do it. When PWA and Transair were provided with prairie routes into Winnipeg and in the prairies, Air Canada had to give up $12 million worth of passenger revenue and two flights a day in and out of Regina and Saskatoon, and Edmonton-Calgary.

Air Canada was replaced by Pacific Western and, according to the agreement, in exchange the $12 million would be picked up by Nordair flights between Winnipeg and Toronto. If the minister approves the sale of Nordair, the whole $12 million of lost revenue given up by Air Canada will go down the drain. This is damn strange when it comes to developing a regional air policy under the so-called private enterprise competition theory. After Air Canada has built up its routes with the taxpayers' money, as soon as it starts making money, here come the free enterprisers. Where the hell were they when we needed them? The money-paying routes are taken away from Air Canada, which prevents it from providing reasonable service to people in isolated parts of Canada where they lose money. As a result there is a reduction of services in small and medium-sized cities and in the isolated parts of Canada. Surely that requires a fundamental change in the air policy of this country, and I hope the minister will comment on that.

The minister has mentioned VIA Rail. It did not have a good beginning with all the handicaps which plagued it at the start. It was started in exactly the same way as Canadian National was in 1923. It has a debt load which it will not live long enough to pay off unless a subsequent Parliament, years from now, writes it off or transfers it into shares. VIA Rail was stuck for $70 million in equipment from CN and CP which it should have had for $1 a car. Both CN and CP received great benefits in tax write-offs and depreciation. For that equipment they did not deserve more than $1 a car. That is the kind of thing with which VIA Rail started off. It will be held up as a terrible example of a rail passenger service which does not work, or of a corporation that is no good. If you started off in that kind of situation, what the devil can you expect? I am amazed at the good job they are doing, given the circumstances and the framework under which they have to work.

The operating agreement between VIA Rail and CN-CP is one in which the minister and the Canadian Transport Commission have to intervene. They must make available to VIA Rail the unit cost which CN and CP use. VIA Rail does not have a clue as to what the devil it is paying for. It does not know how much it is being charged for the use of a railway station, hot water, steam, or whatever. All this information is kept confidential by the railroads. It was turned over to the Canadian Transport Commission and to the minister, but they will not turn it over to VIA Rail, and VIA Rail has to negotiate an operating agreement blind. Surely that must stop.

When it comes to operating trains in Canada, the kind of operating priority that CN and CP can give to a unit coal train, unit grain train or any kind of unit freight train, is amazing. The minister and the CTC have to require both CN and CP to give the same kind of priority to a unit passenger train. We should be able to move people in this country as fast as we can move pigs.

On the matter of STOL, Mr. Chairman, this is an elitist, bourgeois operation for deputy ministers, business executives, and members of Parliament to fly between Ottawa, Toronto and Montreal. That is not what we need from short takeoff and landing aircraft. We need them on our east and west coasts, we need them in the north in the territories, and we need them in the northern parts of our provinces where it is not necessary to build big airports and where all the little isolated communities can be provided with a decent service. You can land and take off on a gravel strip or a beach, if you have to. That is where you put STOL aircraft. We can say to the workers and to the manufacturer, "We will need more of STOL aircraft for that purpose than we would for some elitist service out of Toronto Island." It is a total waste and total duplication.

Perhaps the minister would care to read the study which he commissioned from the Canadian Institute of Ground Transportation. We need a fundamental change in policy. We need people in the Department of Transport who do not have propellers or jet engines for brains. We can move people from Toronto to Ottawa and to Montreal in that triangle, let alone to Quebec and Windsor, at speeds of up to 160 miles an hour and at a cost recovery price of $22 a person, versus $55 cost recovery per passenger, on average of conventional air travel and STOL. That $55 cost per passenger does not include airport costs; those are still handled by the taxpayers.

This nation must develop something that all of Europe, Japan, Australia and New Zealand have done, that is, the electrification of the urban transit system and railway lines. The Soviet Union has electrified 100,000 kilometres of railway track in the last 25 years. If you were to electrify 10,000 miles of lines in Canada, that is just 20 per cent of our trackage, to handle 75 per cent of our freight and passenger traffic—I wish the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources were here—the amount of diesel fuel saved in one year would be enough to seed and harvest many crops in the three prairie provinces. We are up to here in electricity and we will have a surplus of it. We will start exporting even more electricity to the United States. It is not a case of just the production of energy; it is making better use of our energy resources. We can be electrifying urban transit systems.

● (1630)

As I say, we can electrify 20 per cent of our main rail lines, and if they transfer just 20 per cent of the increasing volume of traffic from air and road to electrified rail, the amount of diesel fuel saved would be enough to seed and harvest 12 prairie crops in one year; it would be enough to run all interprovincial buses in Canada for 25 years; it would be enough to heat hundreds of thousands of Canadian homes, the ones stuck with heating oil because natural gas was unavailable to them. Surely this is a sensible and rational way in which to reorganize the transportation system. It requires a fundamental change in present and past government policy.

I will sit down in a minute and let the minister reply in whatever time I have left, but I want to assure him that if I and my colleagues have another chance to raise this matter and other items today and tomorrow, we will do so. We will continue to do so on every other available occasion until there is some new direction and new national purpose, because one of the best contributing factors to national unity is transportation. All we have to do is read what Sir John A. Macdonald and Sir Wilfrid Laurier had to say.

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Regina West is well known for his dedication to railway transportation. He is not alone. No doubt there is a future for railway transportation. What I have said about the progress of VIA is in line with his conviction, but occasionally I think he goes too far. The other day in committee he more or less invited me to stop all contribution to any other mode of transportation, and to concentrate all the money which could be found in the Department of Transport on railway transportation.

Mr. Benjamin: No, I did not say that. I said that you should be a little more even-handed about it.

Mr. Pepin: The idea of coming out after the government review of the VIA plan with some paper, be it white, green, yellow or whatever, submitting it to the Standing Committee on Transport and hearing witnesses, is quite attractive to me. I concede that the members of that committee are somewhat frustrated and might occasionally prefer to spend their precious time thinking in wider terms than questioning me only on relatively small matters. I share that conviction, and I believe the hon. member has known me for a long time. I go along with the suggestions of the two previous speakers, but first I should like to talk about air transportation.

The hon. member expressed his disgust for the STOL concept; that is a matter of taste.

Mr. Benjamin: Only in Toronto.

Mr. Pepin: It seems to me there might be a place for STOL in the particular context in which it is being studied now—Toronto-Montreal-Ottawa—and in other situations as well. Just throwing it out the window and calling it elitist is not a great contribution.

Mr. Benjamin: It is wasteful.

Mr. Pepin: I remember travelling from Ottawa to Montreal when I worked in the private sector. For a long time I used that mode of transit and found it extremely useful and money-saving. Consequently, this is the approach I took to it. If the proper financing facilities can be found, in conjunction with Ontario metropolitan cities, certainly I will have a more positive look at it than my hon. friend.

The member referred to the transfer of Air Canada routes to PWA. If I may say so, it is part of the division of routes in Canada to accommodate national, regional and local travel. If one goes back to the origin of air travel in Canada, Air Canada had everything. Hypothetically Air Canada could be the single airline. A number of people believe that regional and local airlines could do a better job than Air Canada. So, there is a balancing act at three levels, and even at the top level, and there is a distribution of responsibilities and benefits between Air Canada and CP Air.

Mr. Benjamin: We have worse service now with two airlines than we had with one.

Mr. Pepin: It does not shock me that there is a movement of routes between airlines in the manner described. As a matter of fact, this is somewhat the name of the game.

On the subject of a regional air policy, I am sorry the hon. member said that I too often announce studies and decisions to come. Well, I will be there to see the decision; it takes time to get these things through. We have produced a revised regional air policy which will go to cabinet very soon. There is only—

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order, please.

Mr. Benjamin: Give him another minute.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: I should like to take a moment to advise hon. members that I think the best procedure is if I am rigid on the matter of the 20 minutes, so that the procedure will be equally fair to each and every member. I regret to interrupt the hon. minister, but I will treat all hon. members equally.

[Translation]

Mr. Deniger: Mr. Chairman, I am very happy to be able to speak after people as knowledgeable in the area of transport as the Minister of Transport, the hon. member for Vegreville and the hon. member for Regina West. I particularly appreciated the comments of the minister because he gaves us a list of all that is going on in the Department of Transport. Unfortunately, he was not allowed to complete his remarks.

However, I agree with the hon. member for Vegreville that, in the nine months we have been in power, the Department of Transport has not had such a high profile as it should have had and as the hon. member and myself might have wished. This is because our government has dealt mostly with the constitutional and energy policies. Nevertheless, Mr. Chairman, the Standing Committee on Transport, under the able leadership of the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi (Mr. Dionne), has been one of our most active committees and has heard a great many witnesses. Because of this, all members of the House have been able to participate and to understand fully the decisions that the government must now make in Canada.

During the 20 minutes allotted to me this afternoon, I would like to concentrate strictly on air transport, and especially on two aspects of this means of transport: First the absence of policy concerning regional carriers, and second, the Nordair file. The minister said that he had nearly completed or was about to present to the cabinet a policy paper on second level carriers, and I am happy about this because the present situation in Canada is quite impossible.

The most recent policy concerning second level carriers goes back more than ten years. This was when Don Jamieson was transport minister and at the time he had divided Canada in five regions. Since then, the Canadian Transport Commission has had to make several rulings on this policy, and because this is provided in the legislation, several of these judgments had been appealed to cabinet. In fact, Mr. Chairman, cabinet recently reversed the ruling of the Canadian Transport Commission concerning an application and a decision of the commission involving CP Air and Eastern Provincial Airways. CP Air had applied for permission to go as far as Halifax and Eastern Provincial Airways for permission to go to Toronto.

Without passing judgment on whether or not the decision of the cabinet or the Canadian Transport Commission is justified, it is now obvious that any regional carrier application to the CTC for any route whatsoever in Canada is now useless, except to get a decision that will be appealed, because the policy, which in fact no longer exists, unfortunately, is such a mishmash that I wonder sincerely what the commission will do in a few weeks when it studies the application of Québecair for landing rights in Toronto. If we go back to the policy of Mr. Jamieson, we realize that granting Québecair access to that area, that is, to Toronto, would be contrary to that policy. And if it is in fact contrary to that policy, then the CTC should say no. So, considering the irregularities or weaknesses in the policy as it now applies, the ruling of the CTC is absolutely useless because a final decision will come from cabinet which, once again, on an ad hoc basis will indicate to the Canadian people what its policy is with regard to regional carriers.

Mr. Chairman, I am happy to see that the minister is about to submit a policy to cabinet because the examples I have just given really prove the dangers of a lack of policy, for which I do not blame him because he inherited it, but still, a lack of policy just the same. I feel it is imperative for the CTC to have, the sooner the better, specific instructions so that all Canadians and all carriers who need permits, who need routes, can go before the commission knowing that it has a policy to apply, and how cabinet will react under normal circumstances.

I should now like to deal with the Nordair file. When one is a member of Parliament the best way to make headlines is to say that the government is trying to put one over the province you represent. The best way to make sure that you will be seen on television in the evening is to attack the government. The best way for the hon. member for Joliette to make the headlines in the evening is to state, in his unique style, that Quebec is being conned. And that is what they say about the Nordair file. Furthermore, I would have liked the former transport minister, the hon. member for Vegreville, in the few minutes he had, to tell hon. members of the House what was the solution he put forward in the Nordair file because, as we know, he was about to submit such a solution to cabinet, and according to what I heard in the department, I tend to believe, Mr. Chairman, that the hon. member for Joliette perhaps would not have been pleased with the decision of the hon. member for Vegreville when he was minister of transport.

I would have liked him to tell us that but, of course, he did not say a word about his policy on Nordair. The hon. member for Joliette has told me that he intends to participate in the debate tomorrow. Therefore, I am looking forward to hearing what he is going to tell us, and I also hope that he is going to repeat that at the Progressive Conservative caucus when they meet, because I agree with him.

The last thing I want to see happening is for Quebec to be gypped and I am convinced that such is not the case but I would not feel so certain if the former government were still in power. Mr. Chairman, let us take a closer look at this file as it is and I do not want to indulge in petty partisanship in this respect. I do not want to say that because Nordair is actually located in Montreal all interests in this company should be held by Quebeckers. Perish the thought, Mr. Chairman. However, I do say that the minister has been presented with two serious applications, one from the Lizotte group and the other from the Desjardins group. The expertise of these two groups in aeronautics is outstanding; it is a well-acknowledged fact. Both have current expertise in aviation. Therefore one can say that they are both equally qualified. Both groups have attracted various investors, co-op style groups or certain other elements that do not necessarily happen to be located in the province of Quebec.

And it was precisely toward a majority share in the Lizotte or Hamel—also called Desjardins—interests that the department's policy seemed to be directed. Even though the matter seemed to be progressing fairly well, there was a certain uncertainty; both parties wanted a quick decision, they wanted the minister to skip a few steps, but I think he was wise in waiting because the situation was not ripe. I agreed with the minister's view. But I became concerned when the newspapers reported that the minister wanted a 40-40-20 division, with 40 per cent of the interests in Ontario, 40 per cent in Quebec and 20 per cent to Air Canada.

I would first like to comment on Air Canada's equity. Basically, I see no problem because in any investment scheme Air Canada would bring a certain wisdom, a financing capacity, and an unquestionable expertise. But in a 40-40-20 scheme, effective control goes to Air Canada, in cases of controversy between the two groups, and I am not sure that I would want to give that power to Air Canada, because, as we all recall, the government policy was to save Nordair by asking Air Canada to purchase it and to sell it off afterwards to the private sector, and that policy, as far as I know, remains unchanged. But if Air Canada retains control by having the number of shares necessary to vote in cases of controversy, then I see problems. Without being against Air Canada having equity, I want to make sure that the distribution of Nordair shares would not allow Air Canada to exercise such power.

But I see especially serious problems in the 40-40 Quebec-Ontario split because I do not think that, in air transport specifically, decisions should be based on a geographical map, and that is precisely what the minister's advisers are trying to achieve. The worst thing that could happen to Nordair—and I do not dare think that it may happen—would be splitting the company into "Air Ontario" and "Air Quebec". I think that would constitute a major step backwards in Canadian air policy. I realize that some ultra-nationalist groups would like you to do so, but they ignore the basic facts of the air industry in Canada and they serve very short-term and nationalist purposes when advocating a policy which would be prejudicial to Canada. Indeed, Mr. Chairman, the best and most basic aspect of any air policy is that no province is involved and that it has no frontier.

So I think the minister ought to avoid a 40-40-20 split. I consider that such a distribution is senseless. However, as I said earlier, it does not mean that I would remove any minority or majority interest of a few provinces or businessmen within those provinces. Far from it. But an arbitrary 40-40-20 split as suggested would give rise to some serious problems. Is Nordair a Quebec or Ontario carrier? Mr. Chairman, I refuse to answer such questions because how can we identify a Quebec or an Ontario company when most of its flights are between Montreal and Ottawa, Montreal and Hamilton, Montreal and Pittsburgh and Toronto and Pittsburgh? What happens then? Is it an Ontario, a Quebec or an American company? It is above all a Canadian company and this is the fact that should not be forgotten. Basically, Nordair must remain under Canadian ownership.

There are now suggestions that most of Nordair's business, the major part of their traffic is not in eastern but central Canada. As far as Nordair is concerned, people who analyse the matter—and I am sure the hon. member for Vegreville will agree on this—those who look at the routes realize that the $15 million invested by Nordair in those passenger routes have not been recovered yet and that in effect, in terms of return on dollar investments, its passenger traffic is in the red. It must be realized that Nordair's profitable routes are not the passenger ones but the northern routes serving the Dew line, defence bases, the Inuit and the Indians. That is where Nordair is making its money. For that reason I refuse to identify Nordair in a 40-40-20 per cent split. So there are these two groups, the Desjardins group and the Lizotte group. I suggest we should use an approach along the lines of Solomon's judgment. I suggest we take the most favourable aspects of both applications.

Unquestionably, the best element on the Lizotte group side is employee participation. This is something that I, as a member of Parliament, would like to see more often in our Canadian corporations. It could go as far as having one or two employee representatives on Nordair's board of directors. Mr. Lizotte himself does not preclude the possibility, were his group's application to be turned down, of joining forces with the Desjardins group, with employee participation. I read this in a report by Claude Beauchamp in the Montreal journal Les affaires. Mr. André Lizotte said so in so many words. I am not making this up. The best aspect of the Lizotte group being employee participation, let us now apply that to the other group, the Desjardins group. We see that the Desjardins group is made up by Alfred Hamel and the Provost family who are without doubt known in Quebec as the leaders in transportation in that province and whose expertise is established in multimodal transport by road or by air, Mr. Chairman.

As we are clearly dealing with strong personalities, with Mr. Lizotte on one side and Mr. Hamel on the other, the solution would then be to regroup all that under an umbrella which could be the Desjardins Investment Company. Again, the reputation of this financial institution is well established, its vitality is well-known and it is led by respectable Quebeckers one of whom we met recently, Mr. Guy Bernier, the president of that company.

I would therefore suggest that the leadership be given to the Desjardins group which could combine the best aspects of the Lizotte group, employee participation, Alfred Hamel and Mr. Provost. We would then have a very dynamic team. But the reason for a decision must be taken into consideration.

When the government took over Nordair, it was fully aware of the economic problems the regional carriers were facing at that time. Therefore, we must clearly remember that any regional policy in Canada must stem from an attempt at rationalization. We must make sure that both companies are healthy and that our goal is not to cause competition between them but to combine their organizations, and I know you will agree with me on what both Quebec and Canada want, regional carriers in good standing.

[English]

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to interrupt the minister if he wishes to respond to that eloquent plea, most of which I think we can agree with although I would remind the hon. member that it was the government which caused the problem in the first place. There are many items which will be raised over the course of today and tomorrow while we are on estimates. I myself have some 13 points to raise, and I wish that we had twice the length of time that is allotted to deal with the matter. I will touch on my points briefly and then I will narrow in on specific areas with questions to the minister.

I will talk about pending legislation on matters with which we can deal. I would like to discuss the sense of commitment of the minister with respect to the export of our raw resources, specifically, coal on the west coast, and the requirements for imported oil to the west coast. These points will be raised in the context of the commitment which was firmly entered into by the previous government, and by the government prior to that, with respect to the re-establishment of Canada as a cargo shipping or deep-sea shipping nation.

In connection with this matter I will deal with the minister's attitude with respect to cargo preference laws, particularly in the bulk trades. I want to know what the minister has done or intends to do about closing the waters north of 60 degrees, including Ungava Bay, Hudson Bay and James Bay. I would like to discuss safety at sea and the current emphasis on education. I want to discuss the upgrading and expansion of certain of our Canadian coast-guard facilities. I would like to know from the minister the government's direction with respect to our shallow water ice-breaking capabilities, and I again want to emphasize my growing concern about unprotected bridge piers in navigable waters in Canada.

I want to continue the philosophizing which the minister initiated late one afternoon in committee on the propriety of Canadian National investing, through order in council, in Cast Shipping sufficient moneys through the purchase of class A preferred shares to the extent that—I presume at its will—it can take up the option of full management and control. In that regard I will put a specific question to the minister as to whether or not he continues to believe it is proper for Crown corporations such as Canadian National to invest taxpayers' dollars in companies which are essentially foreign owned. For example, Cast Shipping is registered offshore in tax havens. This company does not employ Canadians and, indeed, provides very little residual economic benefit to our country.

Perhaps in another context later on the minister could give some indication as to when the St. Lawrence River will close, and some indication of the anticipated onboard grain storage on the lakes this winter. As I indicated, those are some of the general areas with which I would like to deal.

I would like to come back to Cast Shipping for a moment. I would like the minister to give the chamber the benefit of his expertise in this area and tell us exactly how much money the government has authorized for investment in that company. Would he tell the House what percentage of the class A preferred shares of that company were purchased by Canadian National? Also, it is my understanding that in some 13 or 14 months Canadian National will have to indicate its intention to the government. I would like to know generally what the minister's attitude is concerning this, specifically, whether or not the government is in agreement.

● (1700)

In today's Globe and Mail we notice that Cast, which is a foreign company, although it is owned by Canadians domiciled in Europe, is moving to acquire the St. Lawrence Stevedoring Co. of Montreal together with major bulk cargo handling facilities at Montreal and Quebec City. Cast uses Canadian tax dollars. Its profits go offshore. Consequently the company is not properly taxed here in Canada. Its ships' crews are foreign. Therefore, no tax dollars accrue to the Canadian government.

It would seem that Cast, with CN's AAA credit rating is about to run around the country and buy everything up hoping, I suppose, to avoid the objections of Canadian National doing this openly and under its own name. By using Cast, CN, when it has purchased and taken control of those facilities in its immediate interest, could then exercise its option for class A preferred shares and take over full management and control of that company. As I have said, this is a company whose basic corporate structure lies outside Canada. I am somewhat disturbed by it. I am a little frustrated that we have not had quite as much openness with respect to this matter as would seem to be appropriate. I would like to know where CN is going and to what degree it intends to use Cast to do things CN otherwise is not prepared to do.

For many years another area of continuing concern to me has been the redevelopment of a Canadian merchant marine. I see distinguished members of the National Harbours Board are with us today. It was not necessarily the age of the Canadian merchant fleet in the late 1940s which caused its demise. It was not necessarily high crew costs. It was not directly "labour" which led to the very drastic reduction in the number of Canadian-owned and registered ships on the oceans of this world. It was not those factors alone. Indeed, the greatest factor was the deliberate decision by government to unload the old Park Steamship Company. With that and the government's deliberate decision—not an accidental one at all—not to lend assistance which would have enabled the private sector to replace that capacity, this contributed, in my opinion, to the loss of Canada's presence on the high seas. At that time Canada's shipping fleet was among the top seven or eight in the world.

Today, while we may have 100 or 120 Canadian-owned ships offshore, they are not registered in Canada. In some cases they carry some Canadian crew but in other cases they carry no Canadian crew. These ships are registered, without exception, in so-called countries of convenience for tax purposes. That has been the situation. Government by its deliberate policy has supported that position, believing that Canada was well served and continued to be well served by foreign shipping.

In the last three or four years, and I am sure the minister is aware of this, the situation has changed. No longer are the forces of shipping nearly as dependent upon market forces as they are on the forces and influence of government, in other words, political forces. That has changed the scene. From Mr. Howard Darling, we have a caution. We had signals that we should be changing our direction, that we must look at our sovereignty and that we must not act necessarily as other countries do, but we must act in our own best interests if we want to continue to enjoy the assurance of being able to move our goods.

The $3 billion to $4 billion that we now pay to foreign cartels is inexcusable. This situation should be turned around. We have the capacity in Canada. We have the trained seamen. Crew costs are now no longer a major factor. I doubt if 10 per cent separates the highest paid and lowest paid crews of any flag in the western world. The cost of fuel oil has been the great reducing force. It has been the great leveller. All of these things brought together have created an atmosphere in which countries, such as Canada, should move toward the development of their own fleets.

The former minister of transport, the hon. member for Vegreville, went very far in pursuing active conversations with the interested community and with Canadians generally. Had we carried on in government I am sure at this point in time we would have had before the Canadian public not only the framework within which to redevelop the Canadian presence on the oceans of the world, but we would have had a fair amount of meat on that framework.

Perhaps the minister could deal with the Cast situation and then give us some idea concerning a Canadian merchant marine. Perhaps he could tell us where these plans start. So that he will not think that I am after him too much and once we have seen on paper what is being proposed with respect to changes in the ports act, if there is nothing hidden in it and it is a straightforward attempt to correct a very serious situation, he will find that over here we are, most of the time, a co-operative and friendly group and we will be prepared to deal with it quite quickly.

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Chairman, there are so many questions, one has a choice. The hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East has mentioned Cast and the deep sea fleet. First, I might say with regard to Cast that CN acquired 18 per cent of that company in 1976. In July, CN moved to invest $7 million to maintain that 18 per cent position. Now, with the approval of cabinet, CN has invested $42 million in the project by way of preferred shares. These preferred shares can be converted at a later date—I do not remember the date exactly, but I think it is in 18 months. However, the decision has not been made. In the meantime, CN will have to answer a number of questions and explain to me, as Minister of Transport, and to my colleagues, the desirability of continuing or getting further into this project.

To conclude, the most recent decision does not affect the percentage ownership of CN in Cast. It does not prejudge either on this being or not being a contribution to the development of a deep sea fleet in Canada. In other words, it is a temporary situation. My colleague saw it as a good investment for CN, and I believe it is. The hon. member keeps saying that Cast is foreign owned. My information is that it is a Canadian company.

There is no doubt that the CN investment in Cast raises a number of questions as to CN's role. There are so many things that CN can do it is almost unbelievable. They have done a good number of these, one only being railway development. The company is into a deep sea fleet operation, port operation, ferry operation, and a great many others. Of course, there are some who say they should not go too far. Others, and I am one of them, see CN as being dynamic, aggressive, and forward moving. If there is a role for CN to play in the development of a deep sea fleet, why not? That is my position. As a Crown corporation, CN has a role in the development of government policy and consequently can be used as the avant-garde on a number of moves. That is the way I see it, and I do not apologize for it.

On the subject of a deep sea fleet, I am delighted to know that my predecessor had a solution. I will gladly take it from him immediately after the House recesses. Seriously, the hon. member indicated there is a debate in Canada. It is a lively one. The disadvantage or the advantage, depending on where you stand, is that the free system as it now exists, to use a well-known phrase, has served the country well.

Some people see all kinds of dark clouds on the horizon in terms of government intervention, reduction of fleets of convenience in the world, with a cargo reservation between countries on a bilateral basis, the UNCTAD formula and so on. There are others who do not think that way, and they are still in the majority. Therefore, there is no agreement on what is ahead.

I believe, along with my marine administrator, that we should be careful. We should try to hedge our bets. Consequently, the department and the minister have encouraged shipbuilders, ship owners and shippers to debate that subject extensively, and they are doing that. There have been a number of meetings with the Canadian Manufacturers' Association and the Canadian Export Association to that effect. That is a condition sine qua non, as Shakespeare would say: if there is no agreement among the people interested in the subject, how could you impose a policy? Therefore we have encouraged a consensus development.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Pepin: My friends laugh unnecessarily. This is very serious.

We are also exploring specific possibilities. I have very seriously done that along with the Minister of Finance with regard to coal, oil, and wheat. We are looking at the possibility of using tax incentives. The subject is very much alive and I am very interested in moving ahead.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: I might just explain that the hon. member for Manicouagan has been generous and has offered to cede his place. I would have ordinarily recognized him next, but the hon. member for Lisgar is obliged to leave the House. This will not interfere with the normal ratio of speakers. It is merely two members who will reverse their opportunities to take the floor.

Mr. Murta: Mr. Chairman, I wish publicly to thank the hon. member who so graciously stepped down to allow me to make a few remarks and direct a few questions to the minister. I hope I have not inconvenienced him.

My questions to the minister will have to do with the resolution, hopefully, of one of the most important issues in western Canada, the Crowsnest Pass rate or the statutory grain rate. I hope the minister's reply will be reasonably short so that there will be time to ask a few more questions.

My first question has to do with the whole matter of the statutory grain rate. The minister commented at various farm meetings that he is looking at setting up a task force on this very important question. My questions have to do with the task force and not necessarily the pros and cons of the Crowsnest Pass rates, how the money should be paid or anything else. That is a question that should rightly be left to the interests of western Canada.

Can the minister indicate whether he will be proposing a task force? What will be the size of it? Has the proposal gone to cabinet and, if so, has it received cabinet approval? I presume that if he is proposing it, cabinet has given its approval.

Can the minister also indicate the time frame he is looking at for resolution of the whole question? Some of us feel that a reasonably short time, six to eight months, would be best for this kind of task force. Can he indicate his or the government's thinking on this issue? If everything goes according to plan, when will the task force begin its work?

I understand there is general agreement that something be done in terms of a resolution of this very important problem on the prairies. I further understand that the organization to take the longest to agree that something should be done is the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool. They have tentatively agreed that some change is needed. The various organizations have different ideas for change. I presume this is what the task force will examine. Possibly the minister can reply to that so that the members here and the people of Canada will know his intentions. That would be most helpful.

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Chairman, I will answer as briefly as I can. Normally, I would not be giving precise answers to these questions because this is all before the committee. However, so much is already out that I can only confirm some of the news that has come out.

What is before the committee of the cabinet at this time is an approach, not a fully developed plan. This is being debated now in a friendly atmosphere, not in an atmosphere of confrontation as the press has suggested. I do not know where they get their facts. On top of that, they stated that I said it, when I said the opposite. In any event, the approach is now developing.

In simple terms, the approach is that the government would state a number of principles or beliefs, a number of things it holds to be true, as the Americans would say. It would then create a task force which would further explore the consensus which has developed in western Canada in recent years, particularly the western agricultural conference and the commodity coalition positions. They have a number of factors in common. We know what they are. There are other areas in which they have differences. The western agricultural conference, referring to the participation of farmers with regard to the freight rate, used the word "negotiate". I understood that to mean a desire to look at different possibilities. That would be the role of the task force. It would be under and would report to the Minister of Transport. On the basis of that report, in the hope that it will further the consensus, the government would then announce the policies. The task force will be small in number, possibly three or five members.

Mr. Benjamin: Put me on it.

• (1720)

Mr. Pepin: Yes. If it is essentially a consultative instrument. The difficulty is that some farmers, whose representatives now say that they do not want a royal commission because the discussion on the subject has been exhausted, may very well come back, if we have it in another committee of the House of Commons at that moment, and say "we want to be heard". That is the difficulty I am thinking about. So much for the size of it.

Finally, what is the timetable? Bluntly, one advantage is that the government has the time to do it. Hopefully this government will remain the government for four years. We can take it from there—one year for the benefit of the Crow modernization to become evident to westerners; one year to implement it; one year to legislate it; one year to think about it. So, this is the program. We have been thinking a lot about it. I am delighted some of the members on the other side have expressed their views before me on the subject and there is a fair degree of consanguinity, as we say in French, of communality.

Mr. Murta: I thank the minister for his comments. We have viewed some of the happenings of the last few weeks with a little puzzlement. Given the almost direct opposition to any change by Senator Argue—I know the minister might want to comment on what Senator Argue is thinking; however, I do not know whether anyone else knows what he is thinking in terms of a grain boycott, grain embargo or whatever—nevertheless, there is divisiveness within the Liberal cabinet which is of some concern to people in western Canada.

• (1730)

There are two other questions I would like to direct to the minister. The first, I suppose, is from a personal point of view, and it has to do with Senator Olson's and also, I understand, Senator Argue's insistence or request for some kind of inquiry into the CPR before we get into the whole question of the statutory grain rate. Since I understand that the proposal came in the first place as a Liberal campaign promise and was put forward in that light, I for one—and I am speaking personally—cannot see any point whatsoever in going through this kind of process again. I think it would have a detrimental effect on the present activity among the farm organizations themselves in western Canada in terms of a resolution, one way or the other, of the whole question of the Crowsnest Pass rate. I pass that on and, if the minister wants to comment on it, I would be very happy.

The other question is about branch line rehabilitation. Now that the branch lines are basically in place in western Canada so that the industry, farmers, government officials and others know where we are going, certainly until the year 2000, I would like the minister to comment, if he could, very briefly on the amounts of money the government has allocated or intends to spend on this very important operation in the next number of years, because obviously without the infrastructure we will not be able to move grain, and it appears now more than ever that agricultural exports, especially grain, will be one of the saving graces in terms of our balance of payments in the years to come.

Would the minister comment in the short period of time he has left?

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Chairman, I will do my best. The hon. member is asking me for some very personal views. He said that he expressed his own views. He has more freedom where he sits now than I have as I sit here. Be that as it may, I think Senator Argue must have found comfort in the recommendation which was made at the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool the other day which, generally speaking, espoused the western agricultural conference approach and then, of course, took a fallback position which returned to the Crow. Senator Argue must have found satisfaction in that and, if he did, I will also.

Reference was made to an inquiry with respect to the CPR. Yes, indeed this was a resolution of the Liberal party at its last convention in Winnipeg. My views tend to go along with the views expressed by my hon. friend, that it would be difficult to carry the two enterprises in parallel line. However, it could be done. Some people would welcome that inquiry as having a cleansing effect on the reputation of the railway. I have heard that argument, but I personally hope—and I think this would be the approach—that an inquiry into the behaviour of CP would not influence the orientation or the progress toward Crow modernization.

On branch line rehabilitation, I remember that $240 million has been spent up to now and, as the hon. member knows, the total amount to be spent in the future under the program is $700 million over a period of eight years. That has not changed. A number of people say it might be a good idea to accelerate that program, and some in this regard, as in others, look with covetous eyes to the western development fund.

[Translation]

Mr. Maltais: Mr. Chairman, I am glad of this opportunity to take part in the proceedings of the Committee of the Whole on the matter of transport, because I think the riding of Manicouagan can be readily identified with transport. In a sense, I am of the same mind as the Minister of Transport in that I do not know where to start, by Baie-Comeau, Blanc-Sablon, Schefferville, Fort-Chimo or Sept-Îles, because if one considers the size of that riding, one readily realizes that transportation is not only a local but also a regional priority. It is with some emotion that I take part in this debate since a good friend of mine, who happens to be the mayor of Longue Pointe de Mingan and is also a pilot, has been missing for 48 hours. God be with him! But when talking about municipal airports or about means of transport in our country, one must take into account the human dimension of it all on top of the financial or administrative aspects because when it comes down to it, all this technical equipment is there to help people. One realizes that it is important to have adequate equipment that works all year round when somebody is reported missing, like Mr. Leblanc.

First, I want to commend the Department of Transport for upgrading the airport facilities in some parts of my riding. I will deal later with some negative aspects but for now I want to underline the great improvements made to the Sept-Îles airport within the last three years. We now have quite a beautiful air terminal at a cost of $9.2 million. The same thing holds true for the equally modern Baie-Comeau airport which will benefit from some $4.5 million investments over the next five years. The same applies to the Natashquan airport which has now a paved runway; this may perhaps seem strange to hon. members, but I will just say that only a few weeks ago in a small community about 60 miles east of Natashquan, planes were landing on a runway lighted by oil lamps. The Natashquan runway is now paved, which is important locally since it allows landings and takeoffs regardless of frost and thaw.

The same holds true for the Gagnon airport where the Department of Transport is going to invest, as it was confirmed to me by the minister's office, over $4 million in the next two years, first of all to build an aircraft parking area because the people of Gagnon now have to walk 300 to 400 feet between the air terminal and the aircraft when often the runway is swept by strong northern winds. Those who have visited the place will find it is no luxury to have the aircraft come quite close to the air terminal. Because, when we board the plane at Gagnon, we really feel like refugees, we have to carry our luggage as best we can, and when we get off the plane, the situation is much the same.

All in all, things seem to be improving in the larger centres of the riding of Manicouagan, but in remote and isolated areas, they certainly are not. In that connection, I would not only ask the minister but also the officials who accompany him to listen with all their ears because I often have the feeling that I am crying in the wilderness and writing to God knows who, since the replies are often disappointing. I would even go further, Mr. Chairman. At times, I get the feeling that the civil servants are not always our allies, although I must say that we also have friends since we do get elected in our ridings by telling people the facts, whether we sit on one side of the House or the other; we are still convinced that we know our areas quite well. And that is mainly why people elect us—to represent them.

When we have to consult senior officers from the Department of Transport we feel that we are facing a brick wall and that we are not dealing with people who are prepared to untangle the administrative jungle and plead our case. We feel that they put on the brakes not simply to slow us down but to bring us to a full stop. In that sense, it becomes very frustrating for members who have received a mandate from their voters to find out that instead of working with allies they have to put up with systematic blocking.

And I can assure you that I know what I am talking about when I remember the file on the airport of Havre-Saint-Pierre, a ten-year old file. I do not want to accuse anyone, to put the blame on both sides; I do not intend to pass judgment on that but I think I spent more energy on that file than on all the other files of the constituency of Manicouagan put together. I had to phone. I figured out that I made 267 calls over a year and a half.

I did the same thing with various ministers because at that time I had to call Mr. Mazankowski, Mr. Pepin and Mr. Lang and it is very difficult to feel the administrative and the political will. When you live in a remote part of the country, and I refer as well to constituencies such as Témiscamingue, Abitibi and Bonaventeure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine, you really feel at times that you are alone in those battles. I understand that there is always the financial side, of course, but there is also a matter of priority, and this is where it fails apparently.

The question I will ask, because with 20 minutes one is very limited, is the one about the policy regarding small municipal airports. Some six months ago I requested a meeting with the minister. The minister was very polite and he told me that he had asked his officials to prepare a few scenarios before presenting them to the members who are always quite inquisitive.

The minister asked for a policy statement on municipal airports to be drafted in order for it to be tabled if possible before Christmas. I would like to ask especially of the department officials because they are those who are the closest advisers to the minister, if, at the level of their administration, there exists a distinction between those municipal airports which are, in my opinion, closer to the definition of flying clubs and those which are primarily municipally oriented airports such as Blanc-Sablon, Saint-Augustin, la Romaine, l'Abitibi, Ungava Bay, James Bay, the Magdalen Islands. Are there truly established distinctions between the two types of airports?

In my area, between Havre-Saint-Pierre and Blanc-Sablon, there is a 400-mile stretch where there is no road. So when I raise the matter of municipal airports, I think in terms of mail, in terms of passenger service, of course, and in terms of transportation of patients and food supplies. So obviously we have no choice. The same thing applies in the case of the Magdalen Islands. There is no road between the islands and the mainland. For about a decade, we have been fighting over the kind of equipment necessary, over the type of aircraft. These days when men go to the moon and when we are contemplating with great emotion the rings of Saturn, I wonder how it can be possible that we should fail to solve such minor problems. I would not want to speak for the people in Sherbrooke or Drummondville, but surely a municipal airport in these areas is less important and deserves lower priority than in areas like mine. Here is my question to the minister: what is being done for municipal airports, in terms of policy? I would like the officials to keep in mind that this is a priority for the people of our regions.

There is another important issue in the area of transport. I mean the maritime issue. We had in Baie-Comeau what was a rather special and, in my opinion, extremely simple problem, which was to discover the condition of the wharf before condemning it. DPW waited four months before making its report, after which DOT took some action. In the meantime, the Quebec government decided that repairs would cost $100,-000 and they should go ahead as a priority without consulting the federal government. I believe it is about time jurisdictions were defined in such cases, and DOT should be able to make decisions more quickly without always having to wait for other departments. It should at least be able to put pressure on DPW to get it to act quickly. The wharf was condemned on June 6. I myself was in Baie-Comeau on the 7th, the report was ready on November 4, and the report had not been ordered before October. So what happened between June 6 and the early days of October? That is the question I ask and I would like to get an answer.

Another aspect in which I am deeply interested is the air transport rates. I would like to know from the minister whether there are special rate structures, that is, public assisted rates for areas in Canada or in Quebec other than Manicouagan. People living in Schefferville, Sept-Îles, Gagnon and Fairmount have no choice concerning transport. As I used to say, they are living in the Siberia of Quebec or Canada, that is, they are quite isolated and they always have to travel by airplane.

Right now when we consider fuel prices and overhead costs which increase every day, I can understand why airline companies, in this instance Quebecair, have to raise their fares. What I cannot understand is why the department has not provided for a subsidy scheme or a tax credit for those users as they have no choice but to fly. I think that some other airline companies which link Newfoundland and the mainland get some public assistance. If a verification is not warranted in this case, what then can be done? I for one would prefer a tax credit formula which would go directly to the people, for if a company receives a direct grant the rates skyrocket after eight months or a year and then it is back to square one.

Therefore I think we should resolutely and officially study such cases and take strong action. And while I have the floor this afternoon I say that I wonder if anything will come out of this to show the strength of my belief, for I am often under the impression that we are talking to a wall when discussing such issues I wish that people listening everywhere in their offices and people who will read Hansard tomorrow would keep my questions in mind and come up with some answers. Nothing is worse than the lack of interest within the public administration. I often think that it is hon. members' daily lot, and I really wish that the civil servants would be aware of that and that the minister would follow up on this subject and even go beyond. I even wonder if the Department of Transport ought not to be divided in three sections so as to be really able to follow up on all these files. When we are speaking of transport, we are speaking of air, sea and land transport, and it is very hard for one man to be aware of every aspect of the issue. I therefore believe that for effectiveness we should perhaps consider splitting the department and creating several ministries under the direction of a titular minister to be sure that some progress is being made.

I have had the opportunity to travel throughout Canada with the transport committee in the company of my colleague opposite from Regina East and other members, and we saw for ourselves that there are many problems. People often complain, not necessarily about identifying a problem, but about the time it takes after a problem is found to exist and before action is taken or even before an answer is received.

These are facts that we have been able to verify during the first two weeks of September, and everywhere in Canada we realize that the lapse of time between the moment when a problem is identified and the moment when action is taken is such that very often the problem has changed considerably. I therefore believe that the minister should perhaps review the operational methods of his department. I am not in any position to tell him what to do in this area, but it is my view that people for whom transportation is a daily experience, and to me in my area it is all in a day's work, those people feel that the department must be reorganized to become more efficient, with a higher degree of delegation to the regional level. I for one have to be called almost every day for 15 days at freeze-up time, because in my area aircraft cannot land on the lakes, for lack of ice. The plane does not stop, there are no roads and no water transportation services.

We have the same problem during the spring, there is a three-week thaw period on a 400-mile coastline, with a population of 5,000. Airplanes cannot land because we have no instruments, no equipment. At that time people call us to complain there has been no crossing for three or four days, and sick people have to be moved out. This requires helicopter services, but we are not authorized to order helicopter transportation. These are everyday problems in an area like Manicouagan. When we write or speak about this, it has a frontier, a folklore flair. Well, to us it is unacceptable. I realize the Manicouagan district may be the most expensive, per capita, to the Department of Transport.

I can understand that but is it a valid reason to leave things as they are? I admit that there has been much progress in the past 20 years, but not enough. And even more, I notice works that are being done in the constituency which are perhaps less necessary, which are even luxurious, but some cuts could be made in some places to give elsewhere. I do not ask for more funds in the constituency but I ask that the investments be more judicious and I will give you a specific example. A parking lot is now being built in Baie-Comeau at a cost of $350,000 yet not more than 40 cars use it in a week. Is it necessary? I doubt it.

With the kind of equipment installed at Sept-Îles, one has to pay 50 cents to park for a full day when next door it actually costs 75 cents an hour. Imagine! And they advertise that to boot. It costs 50 cents to park a whole day yet the other lot next door charges 75 cents an hour. You see what I mean. That is what we get from the Department of Transport. One has to take a ticket. If you are about to board a plane and you do not have 50 cents to put in the slot to get a ticket, you have to go through the airport.

It is forbidden to park in front of it, and you have a bill so you then have to get some change and come back to park with your 50 cents. No one is bright enough to put someone in the little box at the back who could at least make change. It is all those things that make administration absolutely flabbergasting; I wonder why we are not consulted about things like that because I claim to know my riding better than some people.

I can understand that things have to be done like that in Montreal or Quebec City where parking has to be better controlled, but in places like back home, those things cost a fortune. It is a matter of deciding what should be uniform in public administration and what special measures can be allowed from time to time. That is what I would like to see the civil servants of the department look into.

Of course, I understand that the minister should be put on the spot because he is not aware of all those problems. The primary function of department officials is to give advice but, good grief, one has to know the place to be able to do so. That is my bone of contention. Frustration becomes so bad that we have it up to here. There comes a time when we are getting really impatient and when we want action. I for one intend to keep after the Department of Transport because it is vitally important to us. Of course, when you go to the doctor's you do not tell him what is right, so what is happening this afternoon is about the same. I point out more often what is wrong, but we should admit that certain things are right. I have to commend the minister and the National Harbours Board for putting $45 million to $50 million in the national harbour of Sept-Îles over the next three years. This is fundamental.

I should also commend the minister for the decision he made at last, after ten years, authorizing the airport of Havre-Saint-Pierre, and I should like to ask him in the same breath whether he intends to confirm the regional vocation of that airport. Recently I asked that question in committee. I was told that the situation was being re-examined. Quebecair has applied for landing rights in Havre-Saint-Pierre and the company Fer et Titane which has some facilities in Havre-Saint-Pierre would like to expand there, and I think we have all the elements to make a decision. If you make other types of decisions regarding this issue then I think it will be against the public interest and against regional and local interests in this area. That is an important dimension of this issue.

I would have many other things to add. I would have liked to speak about Ungava Bay, James Bay, Fort Chimo, Sugluk and some other communities. Maybe we can come back on the subject at a later time. Perhaps I should let the minister answer. I know that this is a broad subject, that time is limited but I think that our people are becoming restless and the time has now come to act.

[English]

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: The minister has approximately a minute and a half in which to reply.

Mr. Pepin: May I say the following, for the record.

[Translation]

I listened with a great deal of pleasure of course to the impassionated speech by the hon. member for Manicouagan who spoke of the individual member's frustrations, and I understand that. I must add, however, that in the two examples he gave he won his case. He forgot to mention it for both Havre-Saint-Pierre and Baie-Comeau. He at least got part of what he wanted, which shows that time and patience are more productive than strength and frenzy. But I sympathize with this and if I had more time I would speak of the frustrations of ministers and public servants. Despite the impression to the contrary that ministers and public servants may sometimes give, we also suffer from not being able to grant all requests made to us, especially when they are justified as in so many cases.

I also want to say that there is a sense of frustration, but I am not going to whine on the floor of the House, on the part of public servants and ministers, and it is annoying for anybody not to be able to please everyone.

Finally, it is a question of dollars. My department had a small airport aid program of limited scope. It had $3 million, which was taken away before I arrived, so I cannot accept responsibility for what was done before my time, no doubt for very good reasons. That was what the restraint program required at that time. We could theorize at length on the priority concept. What is a priority? A very nice phrase from the hon. member. There are less necessary things that some view as luxuries and necessities to others, and some necessary things that appear as luxuries. That could lead to a philosophic discourse on the concept of luxury and the concept of the necessary. We all know very well that what was a luxury yesterday could be necessary today. That also applies to us, as members of Parliament. I am doing everything I can to revive that small assistance program for small airports to provide for the cases the hon. member has referred to, but as a rule my department—and I say so without affectation—has suffered greatly in the area of investments for airports and equipment. The figures will tell you that five or six years ago the budget was around $250 million. It is now down to $85 million or $95 million. Obviously all that shows, and the result is that fewer good causes can be accommodated.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order, please. Before recognizing the next member to speak, I should like to indicate that the Chair is faced with some problem because of the change of turns which took place by the consent of two members, the hon. member for Manicouagan and the hon. member for Lisgar. Subsequent discussions indicate that an hon. member to my right ordinarily would be the next member to be recognized. The difficulty the Chair faces is the proper proportion of speakers. As a result of comments made to me a few moments ago, I will recognize the hon. member for Mississauga North, but in doing so the Chair will ensure the proper ratio is preserved and that hon. members on both sides get the proper amount of their time.

Mr. Knowles: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman, I should like to talk about the progress the government has made to date on the transportation of hazardous goods. I think it is an appropriate thing for a member from Mississauga to do, a year after the famous Mississauga derailment.

On the anniversary date of the derailment a conference took place in Toronto which attracted international experts and produced a lot of opinions about the government's progress so far. One person who was sharply critical of the federal government and its standards a year ago was the mayor of Mississauga. Subsequently I spoke with her about the government's progress over the past year, and I think I can fairly say that some genuine progress has been made of which we now can be proud. I should like the minister to give us a progress report on this matter, because as I travel around Mississauga I am asked regularly whether in fact a similar accident can be prevented.

I have served on the transport committee and had the pleasure of working on the two bills passed last spring. The first bill brought container standards up to international levels, and the second and more famous one dealt with the domestic transportation of hazardous goods.

Under the second law we were able to bring about standards which affect both accident prevention and accident reaction. In that law we allowed for the provision of regulations which will enforce safe standards for designing containers, packages, and moving equipment. We require proper labelling and handling so that ordinary people who must deal with these goods will know what is going on and not only how to react after an accident but how to prevent one. Also in this bill there is a provision for inspections to ensure the standards we set actually stick. The labelling and inspection powers we have set out will also help us—and this was a crucial point raised at the conference; undoubtedly it will be a point which Mr. Justice Samuel Grange will discuss—to react properly after an accident, as well as to prevent an accident ahead of time.

The work we undertook in the spring was in order to give the government the power, capacity or authority to do it. It does not necessarily mean that the government will have the will-power or the desire to do it, but I was heartened by the progress of the Department of Transport. Indeed it is an indication that the department has the will-power and desire to prevent future derailments like the one at Mississauga.

I should like to refer to an article which appeared in The Financial Post dated November 29, in which an unidentified federal official said the following:

"The act provides for the setting of safety standards for the equipping of a means of transport. If we feel that a certain regulatory agency is slow to regulate standards . . . we can write them into our regulations. We may be stepping on a few toes, but it has to be done."

Comments such as those indicate a real desire to go ahead and get the job done, and not just to put a lot of cosmetic legislation into place.

If I ask the minister to reply now, his report will be very short because of the remaining time. I wonder if I might leave with him until tomorrow the idea that I should like a comment on the progress. I should like him to comment on his negotiations with the provinces and his review of his own regulations. I should like him to take a look at the ways he has beefed up his inspection standards and personnel. I should like to know something about his budget commitments. Perhaps he can tell us about the sources of information which will be set up for individual communities so that they have access to information to help prevent accidents and to react to accidents. By setting the law in place we in fact indicated we were very serious about this question and that we were not going through simple cosmetic procedures. I hope the minister will give us the details which will inspire some confidence in the people in my area, so that they will know another accident like this is not likely to happen.

In view of the fact that it would be logical to break my discussion at this point, may I call it six o'clock?

Mr. Huntington: There is one minute to go.

Progress reported.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): It being six o'clock, this House stands adjourned until two o'clock tomorrow afternoon.

At six o'clock the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

DREDGING CONTRACTS—CALL FOR PREFERENCE TO BE GIVEN TO CANADIAN COMPANIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to propose a motion of urgent importance. In view of the fact that large foreign dredging cartels are being given a decided advantage in bidding on multimillion dollar federal dredging contracts in the Canadian Arctic, in the Miramichi Channel and at the Roberts Bank superport in my riding, and whereas these dredging projects should instead be carried out by Canadian contractors using Canadian crews and vessels manufactured and registered in Canada, I move, seconded by the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Howie):

That the Minister of Public Works and the Minister of Transport, together with the responsible officials in the National Harbours Board, be directed to stop giving favoured status to foreign dredging companies, for example, those of Dutch origin, which seem to be popular with some government officials, and that the government be required instead to show clear preference for Canadian-owned dredging companies, many of which are presently working at only a 20 per cent utilization factor.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

UNGAVA BAY—CALL FOR WITHDRAWAL OF PERMITS ISSUED TO SHRIMP FISHERMEN—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Peter Ittinuar (Nunatsiaq): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that the Department of Fisheries and Oceans entered into a verbal agreement with Imaqpik Fisheries whereby Imaqpik would undertake a study of shrimp stocks in Ungava Bay and in return the federal government agreed to restrict other vessels from the area until the study was completed; and in view of the fact that another vessel harvesting illegally in the area was later given special ministerial permission to remain, and subsequently the department issued permits to six additional shrimp processing vessels, thereby directly violating the agreement with Imaqpik Fisheries, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans immediately withdraw the six additional permits issued to shrimp producers in Ungava Bay until such time as substantial scientific studies in the area have been completed.

MIRABEL—REQUEST FOR INQUIRY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to ask for the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a motion dealing with an important matter of pressing necessity.

Considering that a highly privileged document handed over last September 29 to Labour Canada was published by a regional daily last Monday; considering that this document has clearly shown that all initial expectations for the Mirabel project have proven to be entirely wrong; and finally, considering that according to some government members current conditions are absolutely intolerable, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Kilgour):

That the House unanimously urge the Minister of Transport to convene as soon as possible the standing committee of the House to enable all hon. members to deal with the matter.

Madam Speaker: The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under Standing Order 43, such a motion cannot be put without the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

WESTERN SEPARATISM—CALL FOR APOLOGY FROM MEMBER FOR CHAMPLAIN—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Madam Speaker, I, too, rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of some urgency. In light of the statement yesterday to the National Press Club by Claude Ryan, leader of the Liberal party in Quebec, that he believed the threat of western separatism is now a greater problem than the threat of Quebec separatism has been over the past ten years, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski):

That the hon. member for Champlain apologize to the House for the Standing Order 43 he presented yesterday criticizing the Leader of the Opposition for pointing out the serious nature of this threat to Canadian unity, and to make the same effort to inform himself about the serious issue of western separatism as has Mr. Ryan.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

COMMENTS OF MINISTER—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton-Strathcona): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Two months ago the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacGuigan) publicly chastised the government and politicians of the United States. Last week the same minister publicly rebuked the High Commissioner of the government of Great Britain. Yesterday the same minister publicly criticized the government of France. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro):

That the Secretary of State for External Affairs provide his personal hit list to this House indicating which countries he is planning to attack in the future, so that Canadian immigrants, tourists and businessmen might be made aware of what they can look forward to and, further, that the same minister indicate whether the Soviet Union will at some time be added to his list on the basis that his public rebukes, criticisms and public attacks seem to be reserved exclusively for our allies at a time of extraordinarily sombre developments in Europe.

RISING INTEREST RATES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, I rise, like all other motions under this standing order, to move the following motion of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the recent astronomical rise in interest rates and the expectations of yet higher rates today, is it any wonder that Canadians who have seen the movie "Network" are now saying to the government, "I'm mad as hell and I'm not going to take it any more"? Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House instruct the Minister of Finance to at least say to the governor of the Bank of Canada, "It is time to end your policy of tying Canadian interest rates to those in the United States and to pursue an interest rate policy made in Canada", in order to halt skyrocketing mortgage costs, declining industrial production and unemployment levels that will be the worst since the depression of the 1930s.

THE CONSTITUTION

CONDEMNATION OF ALLEGED MISLEADING PUBLICITY ON EMPLOYMENT IN QUEBEC—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Madam Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I request the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion dealing with an important and urgent matter.

As the government whose constitutional philosophy is sovereignty-association has been broadcasting, several times each day, erroneous and biased publicity on the mobility of the Canadian labour force; as that publicity would have us believe that Quebec workers will see their jobs threatened by the workers of Ontario, and even Alberta, should the constitutional resolution now under study ever be adopted; and I quote an excerpt from that publicity:

Until now, it has always been considered normal for a Quebecker to find himself a job with the James Bay project. But Ottawa is asking us to rejoice because workers from Ontario—

—-or Alberta—

—could take over his job tomorrow—

I move, seconded by the hon. member for Mégantic-Compton-Stanstead (Mr. Tessier):

That the House condemn that type of publicity as resorted to by the Quebec government in its anti-constitutional campaign, and confirm that the proposed constitutional resolution now under study threatens in no way provincial jurisdiction over labour and professional qualifications.

Madam Speaker: Under Standing Order 43, such a motion cannot be put without unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

CANFARM—LACK OF FUNDING—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. John Wise (Elgin): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In light of the betrayal by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan), who has said that he has fulfilled his commitments to Canfarm, in spite of his unwillingness to provide that organization with $1.2 million for the fiscal year 1981-82—a promise and, indeed, an agreement that he made in 1979—and in view of the fact that Canfarm might close down before the end of the year because of its lack of cash to meet its payroll and other day to day expenses, thereby throwing about 150 people out of work just prior to Christmas and jeopardizing the economic health of its clients, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Simcoe-North (Mr. Lewis):

That the Minister of Agriculture urge his cabinet colleagues, especially those on the Treasury Board, to reconsider their decision and grasp the leadership role expected from the Minister of Agriculture to save that organization, which has such worth-while potential to Canadian farmers and to Canadian agriculture.

That the federal government not contribute to a Calgary coliseum on a site that will destroy residential neighbourhoods which have been rehabilitated with millions of federal dollars and, furthermore, that the minister responsible for CMHC support local residents who want to save Victoria Park and lobby the Alberta government and Calgary city officials to move the coliseum elsewhere.

FINANCE

EFFECTS OF RISING INTEREST RATES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Finance. The Bank of Canada rate today has gone to 14.76 per cent—

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Crosbie: —from 13.95 per cent, up 81 basis points. I might point out to the minister that that is far in excess of what it was during the months we were in office last year, so he no longer has that excuse or that irrelevancy to present. I want to point out to the minister that the vice-president and chief economist of the Toronto-Dominion Bank predicted last week that rising interest rates will push Canadian unemployment over the one million mark this winter, and that the high cost of borrowing money threatens home and auto sales and plant investment. He also said that Ottawa has left inflation-fighting to the central bank and that the Bank of Canada has only interest rates and the money supply to use to try to control inflation.

In view of this increase in interest rates, does the minister agree or not with the prediction of the economist of the Toronto-Dominion Bank as to what the results are going to be of these higher interest rates? What action is he going to take to try to ameliorate these effects? What action does he now propose to take in this situation to help the ordinary people of this country?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I do not agree with the conclusions of the distinguished economist quoted by the hon. member, because he no more than any one of us can predict with any assurance the future movement of interest rates. The rates revealed today obviously have increased but they have still not reached the peak that existed in April last, a situation which changed very quickly. I have drawn to the attention of the House several times the rather roller-coaster performance of interest rates that we have experienced, not as a result of concrete developments in Canada, but because of the response in the Canadian market to—

An hon. Member: Your budget.

Mr. MacEachen: —the current, rather large gap between interest rates in Canada and the United States.

An hon. gentleman said something about the budget. He does not know very much about what is happening in the economy, because these changes took place considerably before the budget date of October 28.

Mr. Crosbie: Madam Speaker, it is true that this rate is not the top Liberal peak. The top Liberal peak was 16.2 per cent with the prime bank rate at 17.5 per cent. I suppose the minister is aiming for that again. Let me remind the minister that when he brought his budget down on October 28, the bank rate was 3 per cent below what it is now; the Canadian dollar was worth 85.22 cents in terms of the U.S. dollar, and yesterday it was down to 83.74. We have had serious deterioration in the economic situation since then.

Given these facts, will the minister tell the House whether he is going to carry out the commitment of his predecessor, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, who said on November 6, when we had much lower interest rates, "it is right and necessary for Liberals to take a new approach and a new look at interest rate policy". Is the minister going to do that, or is the new approach to let them go up out of sight, as he did last May and as he apparently plans to do again?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, the hon. member is confused on so many points. I thought he was my predecessor, not the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, in the finance portfolio. The hon. member knows perfectly well, if he believed for a moment the kind of statement that he made when he occupied the post of minister of finance, that these particular rates that exist in the country now have very little to do with any of the policies contained in the budget. They have to do almost entirely with the movement of interest rates in the United States, even though at the present time, with the policies that we are following, short-term rates are considerably lower than those prevailing in the United States. He ought to give some credit to the flexible policy that is pursued at the present time by the monetary authorities, who have succeeded in maintaining rates in Canada, because of the flexible administration of the policy, consistently below those prevailing in recent months in the United States.

• (1420)

Mr. Crosbie: Madam Speaker, this is my final supplementary question. Yes, flexibility is Liberal policy. The Liberals are the most flexible creatures Canada has ever produced. Their policy is very, very flexible.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Canada has been flexed again.

An hon. Member: Flexible like a snake.

Mr. Crosbie: They are like the India rubber snake. There are 877,000 Canadians unemployed today and we are heading toward one million unemployed. In Toronto on January 10, the Prime Minister promised that he was going to fight recession with every weapon at his command and that he was going to control and combat inflation. When will the minister start to carry out those commitments of the Prime Minister which were given in his famous platform speech in Toronto at the Liberal campaign college on January 10?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, as I stated before the presentation of the budget, I intended to produce a budget which would be fully—

Mr. Crosbie: Flexible.

Mr. MacEachen: —consistent with the campaign pledges made by the Prime Minister. I want to repeat today that every commitment made by the Prime Minister with respect to fiscal policy, economic policy and energy policy has been fully implemented in the budget and in the national energy policy.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

HOUSING

RISING MORTGAGE INTEREST RATES—ASSISTANCE TO HOME OWNERS

Mr. Doug Lewis (Simcoe North): Madam Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for housing. An official of Canada Housing and Mortgage Corporation has stated that it is going to be a tough situation for a lot of people when their mortgage interest rates increase to 15 per cent. That statement was made earlier in the week before today's increase in the bank rate, which will mean a 0.75 per cent increase in mortgage rates. Increases in realty taxes, home heating and other household costs have put further pressures on family incomes. My question to the minister is this. Why has the minister done nothing for the Canadian home owner who is faced with renewing a mortgage?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, first, on approximately March 28 of this year the government's response to that phenomenon was that under the AHOP program we said we would move to assist those people who found they had to direct more than 30 per cent of their income toward shelter costs under programs sponsored by the government. Second, the Minister of Finance authorized that officials of the corporation and I meet with the lending officials of banks and mortgage companies, and so on, early in the spring. We discussed opportunities and devices by which assistance could be given to individual home owners who are facing untoward difficulties. What I think the officials said, and what the hon. member opposite did not indicate, was that under a mortgage roll-over situation, with a five-year mortgage maturing, even if there is a 50 per cent increase, since we all know that incomes have increased over the five years, the picture my friend presents is not the sort of severe hardship that he would have us believe.

Mr. Lewis: Madam Speaker, I think it is ridiculous to suggest that everyone's income has gone up 50 per cent. That is not the case. In response to questions from this side of the House, we have had a litany of excuses and distractions. We have talked about housing starts, MURBs and the Matthews report. Today we are not going to talk about housing starts because housing starts went down in November. Why does the minister not have a specific plan for the Canadian home owner?

Mr. Cosgrove: Madam Speaker, my hon. friend is being selective in the information contained in his question and in his preface to the question as well. Housing starts did go down 10,000 in November but he forgot to say that housing starts went up 25,000 in the month before. He forgot to indicate that in the third quarter of this year starts on an average for the year will approach 162,000, much better than we anticipated when we saw the starts at 125,000 in June.

● (1425)

We know the housing industry has come through a difficult period. The challenges that are facing families in terms of the mortgage rollover situation we appreciate are also difficult. But I do not think anyone in this present day economy expects things to be easy. We asked people to look at whether they are being treated equally and fairly in respect to other Canadians. As was said in the Speech from the Throne, the government knows people will accept sacrifice but not inequality.

Oral Questions

ALSANDS PROJECT—INQUIRY RESPECTING FEDERAL FUNDING

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. "The National Energy Program" outlines the government's Canadianization program. It speaks of the importance of Canadian ownership and control. We saw in this House the first action of Canadianization when the minister gave $40 million to Imperial Oil. We now have the Alsands project and the tar sands, which is 87 per cent foreign controlled, mainly by Shell Oil, a company which the minister knows in the last six months had its profit increased by 70 per cent and which took $200 million outside Canada in dividends over the last five years. Yesterday in Calgary, Mr. D. W. Menzel, chairman of the nine-member consortium for the Alsands project, said that Ottawa had offered Alsands financial help.

Can the minister tell this House how much money he offered Alsands? Also, how does this Alsands project, with 87 per cent foreign ownership, which the minister approves of, fit in with the Canadianization of the oil and gas industry?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, no financial help has been offered Alsands.

Mr. Waddell: I have another question for the minister. I gather he is repudiating what Mr. Menzel said. I want to ask about "The National Energy Program," which appears to be a fine program. However, when you read it closely you see that it is quite flawed in spite of its slickness. The program mentions a price regime for the tar sands of $38 per barrel plus increases through a linkage with the consumer price index, estimated at up to $80 a barrel by 1990. Previously the minister said that Alberta was holding up the tar sands project. The same Mr. Menzel—and perhaps he was wrong again—said yesterday in Calgary, and I quote:

—Alsands also has problems with the pricing schedule proposed by the federal government . . . Alsands does not believe that deal will provide an adequate rate of return—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): How long are we going to listen to this question?

Mr. Waddell: Is the minister in agreement that there has been no deal with the oil companies there? Is the figure absolute, the $38 plus up to the $60—

Mr. Nielsen: That's enough.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Isn't there a 20-minute time limit?

Mr. Waddell: Madam Speaker, let me just rephrase it.

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Is this Committee of the Whole?

Madam Speaker: Order. The question has been posed. The hon. member is becoming argumentative.

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker—

Mr. Andre: True or false?

Mr. Lalonde:—I have some difficulty answering the question or questions put by the hon. member. I have said that we are willing to undertake further negotiations with the government of Alberta in order to reach an agreement covering both conventional and non-conventional oil. This is where the matter stands at the present time. There has already been a meeting between officials and I hope there will be further meetings in the near future.

Mr. Waddell: The point is this. Mr. Menzel says—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Madam Speaker: Order. If the hon. member does not put his question immediately, I will have to refuse to recognize him.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (1430)

Mr. Waddell: Madam Speaker, my question is simply this. Are these the final figures that are set down in the national energy policy with respect to the price of tar sands oil from the Alsands plant, or is the minister to change those figures in order to get an agreement with the Alsands consortium?

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, I have just indicated that we have begun further negotiations with the government of Alberta. I have indicated before that while those discussions are going on I will not comment on any specific aspect of pricing.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

POLAND—POSSIBLE THREAT TO WORLD PEACE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister and concerns the mounting gravity of the situation around and in Poland. Since the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom, the President of the United States and the leaders of the European Economic Community have all issued warnings and uttered their condemnation that any aggressive action taken by the U.S.S.R. or any of its satellites against Poland would be totally unacceptable and would lead to a drastic deterioration of East-West relationships, I ask the Prime Minister when the Government of Canada is going publicly to add its voice to the pressures that are being brought against the Soviet Union? In the light of what many consider to be the worst situation since the Second World War threatening the cause of world peace, how long is the Prime Minister of Canada going to remain silent?

Mr. Trudeau: One more minute.

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, the Government of Canada is certainly making its views known, but we do not believe that the cause of world peace would be furthered at this time by public declarations or sabre rattling.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacGuigan: As the hon. member said, this is a very difficult and critical time for Poland and we do not believe that at this time any public interest could be furthered by a public statement.

Miss MacDonald: Madam Speaker, it should not surprise anyone that the Prime Minister of Canada is reluctant to speak out on a matter of this kind. Everyone in the country feels strongly about what the Soviet Union is doing except the Prime Minister of Canada. I should like to ask the Prime Minister if, in the last few days, he has publicly contacted his co-partners in the Economic Summit to ascertain what economic and political sanctions could be invoked against the Soviet Union in the event of aggression, and how these could be publicly released so as to deter any action the Soviet Union might take.

Mr. MacGuigan: Madam Speaker, we are in close touch with our summit partners concerning this problem and I might say that I am very surprised at the comments which the hon. member made. This is too important a matter for petty politics.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: What a shoddy performance.

Miss MacDonald: Since the Secretary of State for External Affairs declines to give any details about what the government is prepared to do in this regard, could he say if he has called in the Soviet ambassador to relate to the Soviet ambassador personally the concerns that millions of Canadians have in this regard? Has he at least taken that step?

Mr. MacGuigan: Madam Speaker, we are making our views known, but not through that channel. The problems of Poland are for the Poles to solve and not for any other country. We have stated publicly on many occasions in the last number of weeks and months—we stated this clearly to the Soviet government—that the problems of independent countries of the world are to be solved by those countries and not by the Soviet Union.

INQUIRY RESPECTING GOVERNMENT ACTION

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, if I might attract the attention of the Prime Minister—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Miss MacDonald: He is not interested in this subject.

Mr. Clark: The Prime Minister smiles while the danger to world peace accentuates in Europe. We now have it clear that the Government of Canada is not prepared to speak out strongly in the way that other governments have. It is clear now that the Secretary of State for External Affairs has not yet called in the Soviet ambassador. The Secretary of State for External Affairs tells us that the government is doing things but that those things are too important and too secret for the people of Canada or for the Parliament of Canada to know what they are.

Will the Prime Minister of Canada tell us what the Government of Canada is doing in the name of trying to preserve a situation of peace and trying to prevent the conflagration that could occur if Canada and other nations that want to speak for freedom and for peace do not defend the values for which this country stands?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I understand the impatience of the opposition to see some public stand taken by the government. I think the Secretary of State for External Affairs was right in indicating that we were acting but in ways that we did not yet want to indicate publicly.

If the Leader of the Opposition insists, I suppose I can recite some of the concerns we have and the concerns I have shared with Helmut Schmidt, the Chancellor of West Germany, with the Premier of France and with the President of France, and since then in correspondence with every other summit leader.

Mr. MacKay: And an old camel driver?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, the Tory opposition is concerned with camel drivers and this is not an occasion for me to answer that type of snide remark.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, what the House of Commons and the people of Canada would like to know is this. In a situation where the leaders of other countries—the United Kingdom, the United States of America, and leaders of the European community—have spoken out on this matter, why is the Prime Minister of Canada adopting such a position of silence? Why is the Secretary of State for External Affairs of Canada afraid to call in the Soviet ambassador?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I will again attempt to explain to the Leader of the Opposition that action is being taken. We would not like to see a repeat of the situation at the time of the Afghanistan invasion by the Soviet Union when most western nations acted on their own to condemn that invasion and to indicate that they were not only opposed to the invasion but that detente was severely threatened, that they would take various measures to protest that invasion. The Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition was then prime minister and I do not have to remind him that we succeeded less in showing our condemnation of the Soviet Union than showing the extent to which the western nations were divided, whether it was over the Olympics, the grain boycott, or the interruption of visits and of detente with the Soviet Union.

If the members of the opposition want greater elaboration on that, I will gladly do that, but I think the events are clear enough in the memories of the former prime minister and the former secretary of state for external affairs. In this very serious time for the peace of the world we in Canada do not care to show again that kind of division which existed when the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition was prime minister. We are hoping that the western nations will be able to react in a more united way to this very serious threat. That is all I want to say.

• (1440)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, the fact is clear that most of the nations of the western world are acting in a united way but that there is one nation standing alone. The nation which is standing alone is Canada. Canada is standing alone in silence. Why is Canada standing alone in silence?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I cannot accept the premise of the question of the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition when he says that all of the western nations except Canada are acting in a united way. For instance, I will ask him if he knows how the various nations are reacting to the very serious economic difficulties in Poland brought about by the fact that to achieve peace with the trade unions a few months ago the Polish government had to make undertakings which it will find very difficult to keep. Does the Leader of the Opposition know which countries are wanting to help Poland through its near bankruptcy and which are taking the opposite position, that we should let it flounder? Does he know what position the NATO countries are taking on this and to what extent they are united?

An hon. Member: Do you know?

Mr. Trudeau: He was being completely fallacious and it was just a sign of ignorance which the Leader of the Opposition showed when he was prime minister when he assumed we were all united on Afghanistan, or when ours was one of the countries which was party to a boycott which most of the other countries could not carry out. We do not want the same kind of division, disunity and chaos to be shown in the west as was shown when he was leader of the government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, what we know is that the leaders of Great Britain, the United States and other countries in the European Economic Community have spoken out, but Canada has stayed silent. We do not know what Canada is doing because the Prime Minister of Canada and the Secretary of State for External Affairs for Canada will not tell us, except to say that they have not even taken the elementary step of calling in the Soviet ambassador to this country.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Clark: What action, other than silence, is the Government of Canada taking? Why is the Secretary of State for External Affairs for Canada reluctant to call in the Soviet ambassador? Why is the Government of Canada not joining with other nations in a public way to try to bring pressure which might stop dangerous events from occurring in the world? Why the silence? What is being done?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I thought I had indicated in my first answer that I had been in personal meetings with at least three of the leaders of the western nations and that I had been in contact by personal correspondence with the others. If the Leader of the Opposition chooses to call this inaction and silence, that is fine. It would be easy for us to break the silence, as other nations have done, by saying we condemn any danger or pressure arising from the Soviet Union; but what would we be doing collectively to take steps in a united way to show that if the worst threatens or happens we will be acting in a united way? Does the Leader of the Opposition suggest that we boycott some other things, or does he suggest that we help Poland financially, or that we—

Mr. Hnatyshyn: You can do both.

Mr. Trudeau: I wish the hon. member for wherever he is from—

An hon. Member: Saskatoon West.

Mr. Clark: It is in the west; that does not matter to you.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Come on, Joe.

Mr. Trudeau: I think the Leader of the Opposition has made his effort. If he wants to condemn us for not making great statements, that is his privilege.

Mr. Clark: I want to condemn you for abandoning our allies.

Madam Speaker: The hon. member for Regina West.

FEDERAL LANDS

REPORT RESPECTING MIRABEL PERIPHERAL LAND HOLDINGS

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina West): Thank you, Madam Speaker, finally. I would like to address a question to the Minister of Public Works, about which the Minister of Transport no doubt also has concern. I would like to ask the Minister of Public Works about a report which the press in Quebec has been dealing with recently concerning 79,000 acres of land owned by the Government of Canada called "Mirabel peripheral land holdings". The report says, among other things, that the local residents have suffered significant losses due to the destabilizing of the area, that budgets have allowed only for hasty and superficial repairs in most cases, which has resulted in a vicious circle, and that these residents do not have any security of tenure. The government has spent $130 million to buy the land and $42 million to repair buildings and properties.

Has the minister made any decision as a result of that report? What measures does the government propose to give the people who live there more security of tenure, so that they can fix up their homes and farms?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, the report to which the hon. member refers was indeed prepared for the Ministry of Public Works in preparation for a cabinet submission. The cabinet committee involved is charged with taking a long-term look at the problems which have continued in the Mirabel area. I might say that the control and management of an area of 79,000 acres is no easy task. I met residents of the area as late as Monday of this week and received briefs from them. I also met the local members of Parliament who had input into that decision-making process. That report will be before the committee on government operations on December 12. It sets out a number of long-range options which we hope will be a long-term look at what the problems will be in trying to accommodate an international airport in any section of this country.

Mr. Benjamin: Madam Speaker, the minister still cannot make up his mind. In addition to the acreage the government owns, the government spent another $10 million developing an industrial park which nobody will use. Mirabel ranks forty-sixth of all the airports in Canada in terms of take-offs and landings. It is No. 10 in terms of passengers handled. Nobody will use the industrial park on which that $10 million has been expended. In addition to doing something about security of tenure for individual residents and farmers on those lands, what does the minister intend to do to have some use made of that industrial park? Will he consult the Minister of Transport with respect to following the recommendations of the Canadian Institute of Guided Ground Transport which could move people to Mirabel airport by fast rail at a cost of $4 per person?

Mr. Cosgrove: Madam Speaker, I am happy to say that the Ministry of Public Works has been in close consultation with the ministry of transportation and communications. We cannot approach this problem in isolation. A number of ministries have had input into this decision.

The question of industrial use, of course, goes hand in hand with the security of tenure of people in the area. People who would move into the area and put in industrial plants would, of course, want to know where their labour market is. They would want to know where their sales market is. At the same time they have to know what is the general stability or otherwise of the community. It is a complicated land use and community development concern that we have and, as I say, we cannot forget at all that this land surrounds an international airport. We do not want to have a repeat of the problems, for example, that we have in connection with the Toronto International Airport, where there are conflicting uses and conflicting problems which persist to this day.

ENERGY

ESTABLISHMENT OF PETROLEUM RESEARCH PLANT IN MONTREAL—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Jacques Guilbault (Saint-Jacques): Madam Speaker, I wish to ask a question of the hon. Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

To begin with, I would like to remind everybody that Montreal is a petroleum products refining centre of extreme importance for the eastern part of the country and that in the Montreal area there are many people who would like to have a heavy oil upgrading plant built there. The hon. minister will recall that some time ago a request was made for a feasibility study regarding the construction of such a plant in Montreal.

Could the minister let us know if this study is now completed? What are its main conclusions? Can Montrealers expect soon the establishment of such a heavy oil upgrading plant in their city?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, the government had asked Petro-Canada to complete a study during the summer regarding the creation of a heavy oil upgrading plant of the Montreal refineries. This study was completed some time ago and according to its conclusions, such a plant should be built and peferably in Montreal. Since then, a committee has been formed with the Montreal refineries for the purpose of concluding the details of this study by April 1 of next year. This project could cost up to $1 billion and the recommendation is to the effect that such a plant be built as soon as possible.

PUBLIC WORKS

DREDGING CONTRACTS—STEPS TO ENSURE CANADIAN TENDERING

Hon. J. Robert Howie (York-Sunbury): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Public Works; I am sorry I did not have an opportunity to give him notice. Like his predecessor, I suspect the minister is concerned that in the interests of consistency and national development we help Canadian companies develop a capability in Canada for doing their own dredging operations, despite the unfortunate history of some Canadian companies. Will the minister tell the House what steps, if any, he will take to assure Canadian participation in dredging, in view of the fact that tenders have recently closed on some multimillion dollar dredging contracts?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, I too am sorry the hon. member did not give me notice of his question. The objective of the ministry is exactly as he indicated, that is, to attempt to ensure that Canadian companies are protected and that labour and management specialties in this area are given secure opportunity for competition. I will be happy to take the member's submission under notice, and if the tenders are being processed, I am sure it is an item the ministry will take into consideration and review.

Mr. Howie: Madam Speaker, I thank the minister for his answer and look forward to the supplementary information.

My supplementary question is much simpler and does not require notice. While the dredging of the Miramichi River in New Brunswick has been postponed—on several occasions it has been sought after and very much promised—will the minister be making a tender award for this project soon, and could he tell us when it will commence? Will the project be cost-recoverable, or will the government, in its great wisdom, treat it as a development project, as it should be?

Mr. Cosgrove: Madam Speaker, the short answer is that it is not a cost-recovery project. The question of cost recovery is still a policy under consideration by the government. The project is under way and the efforts of the hon. member should not go unnoticed. As many members of the House know, the member has pushed for this for a long time.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

DUMPING OF TOXIC CHEMICALS BY UNITED STATES COMPANIES

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina East): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment. Given the already serious pollution problems in the Niagara River, a situation which has been known to politicians and public servants for several years, and in light of the recent announcement that dioxins, the most toxic chemical known to man, have been found in gull eggs in the Great Lakes, will the minister finally reverse the passive position both he and the previous minister of the environment have taken with respect to the pollution of boundary waters and initiate the toughest measures possible, including court action if needed, to prevent American chemical companies from using the Niagara River and the Great Lakes as a sewer for toxic chemical waste products?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, the hon. member mischaracterizes the position the government has taken. We have been forceful in our representation to the American authorities and have repeated those representations on an extraordinarily frequent number of occasions. We are exploring every possible means at our disposal to try to ensure that limitations are brought to bear against those in the United States who are guilty of this kind of pollution, including an examination of the possibility of applying procedures by which legal action might be taken.

Mr. de Jong: Madam Speaker, I am glad to hear the minister is considering possible court action. I hope he will cease his passive attitude and also oppose the action of SCA Chemical Waste Services Inc. which will pour millions of gallons of toxic waste into the Niagara River.

My supplementary question concerns the discovery of chlorophenoxy acid herbicides, such as 2, 4-D; 2, 4-DP; and 2, 4, 5-T which contain dioxins, in surface waters in western Canada, the highest concentration being recorded in the Qu'Appelle River district of Saskatchewan. Given the fact that these toxic chemicals are being introduced into the environment through agricultural spraying as well as municipal and industrial effluents in urban areas such as Winnipeg, Regina and Edmonton, what specific steps will the minister take to prevent further contamination of the environment of western Canada with these toxic substances and to alert the public of any possible dangers to health?

Mr. Roberts: Madam Speaker, perhaps I could refer the hon. gentleman to my answers in the House of Commons two days ago in relation to these issues. If he has not received the press release and the background information which I released two days ago, I will be happy to ensure that they are sent to him, including all the information we have in relation to western Canada.

The problem concerning the dioxin question is that the generation of dioxin does not come through the utilization of herbicides and spray. It comes through the manufacture of 2, 4, 5-D and phenoprop. The origin of that as a problem arises as a byproduct of manufacture, and perhaps springs as well from combustion, in all aspects and not simply in relation to the destruction of these chemicals. As far as we know, if properly used there is no consequential hazard from the utilization of these herbicides at the present time.

AGRICULTURE

INQUIRY WHETHER CANFARM WILL CONTINUE OPERATION

Mr. Normand Lapointe (Beauce): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture but as he is not in the House I shall put it to his parliamentary secretary. Since the Agricultural Producers' Union has adopted an aid policy in order to give its regional tax agents responsibilities as developers with a view to helping the financially depressed Canfarm organization, can the parliamentary secretary tell us, in light of the discussions held the day before last with the board of the organization, whether the department is considering helping this co-operative pursue its activities, which are important to the farmers in my riding as well as to those all over Canada?

Mr. Marcel Ostiguy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, last Tuesday night we met with the heads of Canfarm. The organization is now asking the government for a $2.5 million grant. In view of the financial slump in which Canfarm finds itself, because of lack of participation by Canadian farmers, we have asked its directors and its chairman, Mr. Peter Hannam, to try to find people who would be interested in buying the corporation in the near future.

Within a week, the department should be able to give a satisfactory answer so that Canfarm employees can be paid before the end of the month. Last Friday in Montreal, we met with APU chairman Pierre Gaudet, and it would appear that the union is now quite interested in making Canfarm an offer to purchase.

NATIONAL ENERGY PROGRAM

ALSANDS PROJECT—REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE OF COMPLETION

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. I was encouraged by the comment he made in answer to a question asked earlier in the House regarding Alsands that discussions are taking place to resolve this very tense situation. Will the minister give his absolute assurance that satisfactory negotiations will be completed to ensure that this project does not die, since this would be absolutely catastrophic for the nation?

● (1500)

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I must tell the hon. member that I cannot give him that assurance, for the good reason that he asked me whether we will have a satisfactory agreement or a resolution of the differences at the present time. I cannot speak for the government of Alberta. I can tell him that if he looks at the record, particularly with regard to tar sands plants, he will find the federal government has always been very forthcoming and ready to make sure those projects will take place. If there has been any delay it has not come from the federal government in the past and I do not think it will come from us in the future.

Mr. Shields: Madam Speaker, in a serious situation like this the minister of energy blames the government of Alberta, when he knows full well that blame lies equally in his court.

I would like to ask the minister if he can confirm something for me. In a recent interview the minister indicated he does not feel that time pressures are against him because of the potential production from Canada lands offshore and in the high Arctic. Does the minister feel that the high Arctic and these Canada lands production projects coming on-stream would make oil sands development unnecessary? Is that the position of the minister? If he confirms that it is, would he table in the House information he might have which would give credence to that position?

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, I have always taken the position that Canada needs all these projects, whether they are offshore, in the Arctic or in the tar sands, the heavy oil area. That is the position we have taken and it is the position I have taken consistently.

I have indicated, however, that there may be large discoveries taking place offshore, or in the Arctic, which may change the general context of the situation and might reduce some of the pressure to proceed immediately with some of those plants. I can only tell the hon. member that this is speculation, but speculation which arises out of very public facts released by the companies concerned about the potential which exists in the offshore and the Arctic. I hope we will be able to proceed with all those projects.

I remind the hon. member that in the National Energy Program we forecast self-sufficiency in this country before 1990, without taking into account any discoveries offshore or in the Arctic. If those discoveries were made in the meantime that would again improve the situation very considerably indeed.

ENERGY SUPPLIES ALLOCATION BOARD

ASSURANCE OF ENERGY SUPPLIES FOR FOOD PROCESSORS AND FISHERMEN

Mr. Maurice Harquail (Restigouche): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the great dependence on energy supplies, particularly by Canadians in the Atlantic region involved in the processing of essential, perishable food products and commercial fishing, could the minister indicate to the House if he is in the position to give some assurance with respect to energy supplies for these food processors, and can he guarantee protection for commercial fishermen?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I am happy to confirm that the Energy Supplies Allocation Board, following numerous representations from farming groups, fishermen's groups and in particular from many members of Parliament on this side of the House, has come to the conclusion that the highest priority should be given to agricultural products and fisheries products. This will cover perishable food—fisheries as well as agricultural products. So the highest priority has been given to those products under the Energy Supplies Emergency Act. I welcome this decision of the board.

PRIVILEGE

MR. McKNIGHT—LETTER WRITTEN BY MR. DE CORNEILLE

Madam Speaker: The hon. member for Kindersley-Lloydminster (Mr. McKnight) on Tuesday rose on a question of privilege concerning a letter written on House of Commons stationery, in which the hon. member for Eglinton-Lawrence (Mr. de Corneille) solicited support for A National Committee for a Human Rights Charter, of which he is chairman. The hon. member for Kindersley-Lloydminster suggested it was improper to use House of Commons stationery for such a purpose.

I have examined the matter carefully and I cannot find any grounds upon which the Chair ought to intervene. There are no grounds upon which privilege might be claimed in this case, nor would the House expect me to act as a censor for any hon. member. There are rules regulating the contents of the householder mailings, but members must take full responsibility for material mailed under their frank and written on official stationery.

MR. FLIS—REMARKS REFLECTING ON POLISH HERITAGE

Madam Speaker: I have a question of privilege in the name of the hon. member for Parkdale-High Park (Mr. Flis).

Mr. Jesse P. Flis (Parkdale-High Park): Madam Speaker, my question of privilege arises from questions, and answers given in this House with regard to the situation in Poland. I lived in Poland ten years ago when the food riots took place, in which there was a lot of bloodshed. Today the workers have achieved miracles without an ounce of blood being shed. My heritage, which happens to be Polish, was disgraced in this House because of the official opposition reference to camels and what-have-you. Madam Speaker, I would like to read the "blues" before speaking further on this question of privilege.

Madam Speaker: I must remind the hon. member that certain interjections made in the course of debate do not constitute grounds for a question of privilege, unless the hon. member is able to establish that the one mentioned is unparliamentary, which it is not. If the hon. member has to read the "blues" in order to ascertain whether that expression is a breach of his privilege, then I am afraid it is probably a bit far-fetched. I do take note of his point but I do not feel that he has a question of privilege. We will leave it at that.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, it being Thursday I wonder if the government House leader is able to tell us, following this six-day period for the consideration of estimates under the special order, the government's legislative program between now and the time he estimates we will be rising for Christmas. Perhaps he does not have an estimate in that respect today, but if he does he may give us that information in his answer. I would be grateful to him if he can do so.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, the House is perfectly aware of the order of business for the next few days. The House is in Committee of the Whole until next Wednesday inclusively and then, unless a last minute change occurs, in which case I shall advise my hon. colleagues opposite as soon as possible, we intend to proceed with consideration of the bill concerning oil and gas in Canada.

Now, as for the other items of business until the holiday season recess, I would urge my colleagues to wait until next Thursday because there will still be time for me to inform them further.

I shall take the opportunity to inquire about how much time they are prepared to devote to the study of the bill concerning oil and gas in Canada which I have just mentioned. It would enable me to submit a list of other bills, perhaps non-controversial bills, which could be disposed of before Christmas.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. BENJAMIN—RECOGNITION OF MEMBERS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina West): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order to thank you for trying to correct a severe imbalance which was occurring during question period. I hope you will continue to do that. The spokesman for external affairs for the official opposition and the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) cannot get their act together. They required seven questions because they fumbled, which took up a major portion of the question period. I was happy to see Your Honour recognize fewer members of the official opposition after that, although you were not able to succeed completely in correcting the imbalance.

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): On the same point of order, Madam Speaker, one of my responsibilities is to keep meticulous daily records on the number of members the Chair recognizes. I know the Chair keeps similar records. For instance, today there were three members of the New Democratic Party, one of whom was the member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell) who went on as if he was writing a book, and there were three members of the Liberal party recognized, as opposed to a total of six members of the official opposition, that is, the Conservative opposition, the real opposition in this House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (1510)

Mr. Nielsen: A total of six members were recognized from the Liberal-NDP coalition and a total of six members from the Conservative party, the real opposition in this House. I could, but I will not at this stage, raise my observations about the imbalance which has risen. Certainly it is not due to any unfairness exercised by the Chair, but there has been an imbalance and it concerns me. I propose to seek an audience with you, Madam Speaker, at some future date next week to discuss this matter. But, in the meantime, there is no cause for complaint from that little red rump over there.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, I am sure that the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) would not want to mislead the House. I take his word with regard to the number of questioners and it is very nice of him to keep track of what is occurring in the House. I am sure, Madam Speaker, that you appreciate it. The hon. member did state that there were six questions asked by the official opposition, three questions by the NDP, and three questions by the Liberal party. I assume that the hon. member's figures are correct, but what he did not say was that the questioners from the official opposition asked many supplementary questions. The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) must have been up on five questions.

Mr. Nielsen: Four.

Mr. Collenette: The hon. member says four. In fairness, if one takes the total number of questions asked during question period, the official opposition did very well and perhaps a little better than usual.

Madam Speaker: I would like to make a few comments about the way in which question period proceeded today. I took it that the hon. member for Regina West (Mr. Benjamin) was congratulating me on the way in which I had conducted the question period, rather than lodging a complaint.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: There are some days that are more difficult than others to keep a balance, and today was such a day. Some days I have relied on time rather than the number of questioners. The hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) was right when he stated the number of questioners recognized from the official opposition, but I would remind him that there was more than one supplementary question for some of those questioners.

I allowed these extra supplementary questions because when a debate such as the one which took place today occurs in the House of Commons, I do not think it is my duty to inhibit it. Of course, such debate cannot go on every day, but on special days when the situation in my view warrants it, I allow that kind of debate to continue. That is why I did not penalize the NDP in its usual number of questioners. Nevertheless, I believe that the allotment today was fairly balanced.

I would like to make a point about the number of questioners on the government side. There were three questioners, but they asked only three questions. None of them had supplementaries. If there is a third questioner from the government side, he or she is usually recognized past three o'clock so that it does not take anything away from anyone. These three questioners in actual fact accounted for only one question and a half, not three questions.

MR. ELZINGA—"NOTLEY" NOT "NOOTLEY"

Mr. Peter Elzinga (Pembina): Madam Speaker, my point of order is in reference to the motion put under Standing Order 43 by the hon. member for Kitchener (Mr. Lang). In the interest of maintaining more co-operation between the Liberal party and the New Democratic Party, I suggest that the hon. member learn to pronounce correctly the name of his co-leader, the New Democratic Party leader in the province of Alberta. His name is Mr. Notley, not "Mr. Nootley".

Mr. Peter Lang (Kitchener): Madam Speaker, on the same point of order, I will take a "nootley" on that. Thank you.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, on House business, I wonder if, in the absence of the President of the Privy Council, his parliamentary secretary would indicate to the House what has happened to the freedom of information legislation which has been promised for some time.

Mr. Nielsen: It is secret.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): The President of the Privy Council has indicated that we would be dealing with the oil and gas legislation. We have been waiting far too long for this freedom of information legislation to be tabled in the House for second reading. We have indicated that we are prepared to co-operate with the government. I am wondering why the government is not prepared to bring this long overdue legislation in next week at the earliest opportunity.

Mr. Collenette: Madam Speaker, the government did give notice of its intention to bring this bill forward last Monday provided the House dealt with Bill C-34, the Judges Act. But, as hon. members will recall, the debate on that bill was lengthier than had been anticipated. As a result, the House did not get to the freedom of information legislation. I will take note of the hon. member's representation and perhaps we will be able to proceed with that legislation at an early date. But as the President of the Privy Council just stated, the House will deal with other energy legislation of high priority which must pass before Christmas.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, I would like some clarification from the parliamentary secretary who knows that the full day on Monday was allocated to the Judges' Act. Is he now suggesting that for some reason there should have been additional time that day for the freedom of information legislation? Why can the parliamentary secretary not give us a commitment that on Thursday or Friday of next week the government will table, for second reading, the freedom of information legislation?

Mr. Collenette: Madam Speaker, at one point a few weeks ago we on the government side were under the impression that both the judges' bill and the access to information bill would go through very quickly, and that perhaps both would go to committee within a single day. Perhaps, in believing that, the government was a bit too optimistic. Concerns were expressed with regard to the Judges Act. As I have said, the debate on the Judges Act was lengthier than had been anticipated. We will take the hon. member's representations very seriously and I will pass them on to the President of the Privy Council. I am sure that the hon. member's House leader will raise the matter again in the normal way.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. ANGUISH—REMARK MADE IN DEBATE BY MR. SHIELDS

Mr. Doug Anguish (The Battlefords-Meadow Lake): Madam Speaker, my point of order arises from the debates of December 2 when unparliamentary language was used by the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Shields) in response to a speech I had made that evening in the House. I did not raise this point of order at the time of the occurrence because I was unable to hear over the noise in the House. I did not become aware of the matter until I read the comment in Hansard the following day. The hon. member is reported in Hansard as saying, in reference to myself and the New Democratic Party:

—the contribution of my hon. friend in the New Democratic Party and his verbal diarrhea.

Since I was the previous speaker, the hon. member must have been referring to me. I would like to have this language ruled as unparliamentary, Beauchesne's fifth edition, chapter seven, section 320, subsection (s) refers to—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. It is true that there is a list of unparliamentary language and that I must refer to that list when I am ruling on what seems to be unparliamentary language. However, there is also another element in this whole matter. If the use of certain language by an hon. member causes a disturbance or some trouble in the House, that also becomes a factor which I must take into account when ruling on such unparliamentary language. The hon. member was not, obviously, insulted since when the comments were made he did not even notice, nor did he immediately bring up the matter the next day. I believe it is a bit late to complain about what the hon. member considers to have been unparliamentary language, and I would ask him not to pursue his point.

Mr. Anguish: Madam Speaker, I thought I explained quite clearly to you that it happened on December 2 and that I had read the comments in Hansard on December 3 as I sat at my desk after question period and the point of time for raising such matters had passed. This is the earliest opportunity on which I could raise the matter. I could not hear the comment at the time because of the noise in the House as the hon. member for Athabasca was making his opening remarks. On that basis, Madam Speaker, I would like you to recognize it at this time because I think these activities are indicative of the way the Conservatives conduct themselves in this House, in an unstatesmanlike manner. I would like you to accept my point of order at this time on the basis that I was not here that evening. I read it the following day, this being the next day after having read it in Hansard. I would like you to accept it, please, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: What I can accept is that the hon. member has made a point. He has complained about the way the hon. member has referred to him in his speech. That does not either constitute a question of privilege or a point of order. These kinds of exchanges occur in the House and inasmuch as they do not create too much disturbance, the Chair is not obligated to intervene.

HALIFAX EXPLOSION—PENSIONS TO INJURED SURVIVORS

Question No. 1,429—Mr. Crosby:

1. Did the government take any action in respect to a motion passed under Standing Order 43 on December 6, 1979, respecting the increase of pension benefits to injured survivors of the Halifax explosion and their dependents and, if so, what was such action?

2. What is the total amount being paid in pension benefits and what would be the cost to give a 50 per cent increase in the pension now being paid to survivors and their dependents?

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Acting Minister of Veterans Affairs): 1. On February 1, 1980, all pensions paid under the Halifax Relief Commission Pension Continuation Act were increased by 5.3 per cent. The Halifax explosion pension account is carefully examined each year, and an actuarial forecast of expenditures is prepared. Based on this forecast of expenditures and revenues received by the trust fund, the amount of pension paid to the recipients is established for the next period. It is intended to adjust pension payments annually, but any adjustment will be made to take into account the actuarial realities. With the exception of these annual increases, there are no plans at this time to further increase these awards.

2. The pensions now being paid cost $12,965.63 per month or $155,587.56 per annum. To increase them by 50 per cent would cost $6,482.81 monthly or $77,793.72 per annum. The department of insurance has estimated that it would require a deposit of $644,500 into the trust fund, to provide such an increase.

AIRPORT MANAGEMENT TASK FORCE

Question No. 1,527—Mr. Mazankowski:

What is the Minister of Transport's position on the Airport Management Task Force and its recommendations with respect to the management of the department's airports?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): I have not yet formulated a final position concerning the recommendations of the Task Force on Airport Management. I expect to discuss the task force findings with my colleagues in the near future.

AIRPORT—FREDERICTON, N.B.

Question No. 1,574—Mr. Howie:

What developments are planned for the Fredericton, New Brunswick Airport and what is the time-frame in which these are intended to be accomplished?

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The following developments are planned for Fredericton Airport:

1981/82: Enlarge reservoir & upgrade pumps
Upgrade field electrical facility

1982/83: Upgrade waste water treatment plant
Perimeter fencing
Extend firehall

1983/84: Expand air terminal building
Replace boiler—Central heating plant

1984/85: Resurface public car park

1985/86: Resurface aircraft parking apron.

The implementation of these projects will be subject to Treasury Board approval, national priorities and the availability of funds.

THE CONSTITUTION—TRAVEL TO LONDON, ENGLAND OF CABINET MINISTERS

Question No. 1,654—Mr. Cossitt:

Were the two cabinet ministers sent to London, England, in October, 1980, on the matter of the constitution, Anglophones and, if so, for what reason was there no Francophone representation?

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): The Secretary of State for External Affairs, who is responsible for relations between Canada and other countries, and the Minister of the Environment and Minister of State for Science and Technology, who shares responsibility with the Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development for the constitutional patriation process, travelled to the United Kingdom to acquaint Her Majesty the Queen and leading members of parliament with the proposals of the Government of Canada concerning the Canadian Constitution. A greater number of ministers was not required. If any questions had been posed in the French language, both ministers could and would have responded in the same language. Both ministers have extensive professional and parliamentary credentials in constitutional matters.

THE CONSTITUTION—CHOICE OF CABINET MINISTERS SENT TO LONDON, ENGLAND

Question No. 1,655—Mr. Cossitt:

Was any consideration given by the government to sending the Minister of Transport to London, England, in October, 1980, as part of the cabinet delegation on the constitution in view of (a) the fact that he is a Francophone (b) his acknowledged experience on the matter of Canadian unity and (i) if not, for what reason (ii) if so, for what reason was he not sent?

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): See reply to question No. 1,654 answered this day.

THE CONSTITUTION—PATRIATION

Question No. 1,656—Mr. Cossitt:

Was the Minister of the Environment sent to London, England, in October, 1980, to meet with British officials in regard to the matter of the constitution and, if so (a) for what reason (b) is there any aspect of the Department of the Environment's activities that have anything whatsoever to do with patriating the constitution?

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): See reply to question No. 1,654 answered this day.

I ask, Madam Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Madam Speaker: The questions enumerated by the parliamentary secretary have been answered. Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

APPROPRIATION ACT NO. 2 1980-81

The House resumed from Wednesday, December 3, consideration in committee of Bill C-47, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the Government of Canada for the financial year ending March 31, 1981—Mr. Pinard—Mr. Ethier in the chair.

The Deputy Chairman: House again in Committee of the Whole on Bill C-47, an act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the Government of Canada for the financial year ending March 31, 1981. When the committee rose on Wednesday, December 3, 1980, Vote no. 1 under Transport was under consideration, and the hon. member for Mississauga North had the floor.

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT:

Vote No. 1.

Mr. Fisher: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Before we ended our discussion yesterday I had some questions that I directed to the Minister of Transport to learn from him our progress following the passage of the bill dealing with the transportation of hazardous goods. At that time I pointed out to him that questions had been raised in Mississauga about the follow-up to that bill and there had been comments made, particularly by the mayor, that a year ago the federal presence was not adequate. It is my feeling that considerable progress has now been made. I posed some questions to the minister about inspection procedures, about negotiations with the provinces, about budgets, and about a variety of other areas. I hope that the minister will take this occasion to answer these questions.

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Chairman, I will do so as rapidly as I can in order to release more time for any of my hon. friends who care to have it.

We are talking about transportation of dangerous goods. The member for Mississauga North asked me a number of very specific questions. He asked me if the bill had been proclaimed, and it has. I think November 1 was the date. He asked me if other provinces had adhered to the legislation because this is what is meant to happen, as he knows. This is legislation that is open to the provinces to come into, not only legislatively but administratively. There was a meeting of ministers of transport in Toronto some weeks ago at which time I pleaded—I didn't sink to my knees, but almost—that they would come in, that they would pass their own legislation or orders in council in order to satisfy the objective of this legislation which is a co-operative federal-provincial approach to matters of transportation for dangerous goods.

Ontario is going ahead and I understand B.C. is preparing itself for that too. I am using this opportunity again to remind them although I am sure they have not forgotten, and to plead with my provincial colleagues that they will move as rapidly as possible in order to give this legislation the full federal-provincial use it is meant to have.

The regulations are in their fourth draft. Final consultation is taking place with interested groups and we hope to have the regulations gazetted—I do not know where the accent is—by next summer.

The hon. member for Mississauga North asked me how many inspectors we would have, and here we are witnessing an evolving situation. The legislation is not applicable yet in terms of the regulations not being available yet, but the department and the transport commission are preparing themselves for the time when it will be. By way of illustration, I understand that the CTC had seven specialists, experts, inspectors, and we have added four to that, so now there are more than 11 altogether. They are going to be specialists in the transportation of dangerous goods. Similarly, I understand the department is hiring, or has hired, six air inspectors who are already in position in the different regions of the country. They are going to be specialists in the transportation of dangerous goods by air. This is just to indicate that progress is being made. I want to use this opportunity to thank members of the transportation committee who have worked extremely well during the last part of the session to bring about this result.

Mr. Fisher: Because the regulations are still being negotiated with industry, and because the minister and the CTC are still trying to set their priorities on these matters, I would like to stress now the importance of what I think is a crucial element, the importance of good inspection, particularly with the railroads. It seems to me that our policy up to this point has been to trust the railroads and to trust the companies, and it seems to me, as well, that that places an unfair burden on the companies. The companies exist to make a profit, to provide good service for their customers, and to keep their trains rolling on time. They have a variety of other concerns, and safety has to fit in with those concerns. It seems to me that the question of safety must be the first concern for any public body. That has to be the fundamental question that we examine.

The minister mentioned that the Ontario government has already committed itself to follow our legislation and to co-operate with it. They have already started with problems associated with truck shipments. I would like to use that as an example. When trucks in Ontario are carrying dangerous goods, they will be subjected to a wide range of inspection. They will be regularly examined at weigh stations. They will be subject to inspection by provincial police authorities and by local police authorities. The companies will be able to maintain their own standards and they will be able to seek their own goals to try to get a profit, but the public will also be assured that the trucking industry will have a degree of safety because of the regular inspections that will occur. I am not so sure that we can make that same claim today about our railroad system.

We do not inspect our trains as thoroughly as Ontario will be inspecting the trucks that run on its highways. I think the public should be given the assurance that we will upgrade inspection procedures, because public safety is such an important question. I would very much appreciate a few comments from the minister about his plans to improve the inspection and general safety procedures of the railways.

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Chairman, the only comment I can make is that we are moving similarly on the question of the safety of railway transportation.

• (1530)

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Chairman, I am almost certain the hon. member has had his allotted 20 minutes.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. The Chairman is guided by the clerks who always check the time allotted to speakers. Each speaker is allowed 20 minutes. I am sure that when the allotted 20 minutes have expired, the clerks will advise me and I will notify members.

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Chairman, similar movement is taking place with respect to railway safety, which is more of a preoccupation of the CTC. My understanding is that the CTC expects to increase their force by 30 inspectors. I thought I had referred already to the presence of 11 dangerous goods inspectors. However, as my hon. friend knows, all these things are subject to national priorities as well as to the approval of Treasury Board. Much as I would like to be more enthusiastic, I must throw some cold water on these expectations because I know this hope will be subject to very close analysis.

On the subject of railway transportation, there was some news in yesterday's newspaper which I must rectify. It was reported that the Grange report had been tabled. The Grange report concerns the railway derailment at Mississauga, and my hon. friend is aware of that. We have, however, received the draft of the report of Mr. Justice Grange, who is using the facilities of the department for printing and translation purposes. I want to emphasize that I have not seen it nor will I look at it because I understand Mr. Justice Grange wants to present his report to me personally early in January. If there are leaks, they will not be from me, my office, or from officials in the Department of Transport. This is a service which the Department of Transport is giving to Mr. Justice Grange. He requested this service, the purpose being to use administrative facilities which exist, instead of creating new ones.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman, I want to underline what the minister has just said. Inspection for railroads is indeed a question of priorities. When we take a look at the issues, the expense involved in providing numerous and proper inspectors is not as great an expense as providing for some of the other facilities in the ministry. Perhaps the minister will take as my representation this comment about the importance of the inspectors. More people benefit from adequate rail inspection than would benefit from some of the other facilities which his department finances.

When the Mississauga accident happened, it covered a geographic area extending approximately one-half mile away from the railway tracks. According to Statistics Canada there are some 250,000 people living one-half mile from the CPR tracks between Streetsville and Agincourt. Those people are vulnerable whenever a train carrying dangerous goods runs along that track. When we start to examine vulnerability in that sense, we begin to see how important is the question of public safety.

I want to congratulate the minister for increasing the number of specialists, but I hope that he will take a look at the whole question of rail safety and inspection and increase the number of inspectors, perhaps at the sacrifice of other facilities until he can provide funding for them as well.

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Chairman, by way of a caveat I should note, and I am sure my hon. friend will agree with what I have to say, that people listening to us might wonder whether those are the only inspectors the Canadian Transport Commission has and they will be surprised at how few there are. The CTC and the department inspectors are not there to replace the inspection made by the railways or by the airlines. They are there to inspect the inspectors. They are there to monitor what the inspectors have already inspected. There is practically nothing which can replace people's efforts—

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): You have exceeded your four minutes.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. I have heard certain unpleasant remarks about the time allotted to certain members. I would like all members to know that the hon. member for Mississauga North had six minutes last night and 14 minutes today, and that makes 20 minutes. That is the time allotment which will be accorded to each member.

Mr. Hargrave: Mr. Chairman, I have a short intervention. First, I would like to express my thanks to the member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain for allowing me to speak at this time because I have a commitment to keep later on this afternoon. His courtesy is most appreciated.

I want to talk briefly about the movement of grain by rail all across southern Alberta in 1980. As I am sure the minister is aware, southern Alberta is served almost entirely by the Canadian Pacific Railway. There is only a short CNR branch line coming into the northern part of that whole southern area.

Nineteen-eighty has not been a good grain shipping year, particularly when it comes to the railways. It should have been much better. After all, most of the usually severe winter months were wide open. There were no reasons why almost normal summer rail movement could not have been maintained. So, it was not because of the weather. However, there were two main situations which contributed to this poor grain movement throughout most of 1980. First, there was the labour situation on the Revelstoke subdivision line which is in the interior of British Columbia which went on for months. The Revelstoke line is part of the main line of the CPR.

There was hardly any mention of the labour strike in the newspapers. It did not make headlines, and the public at large were not aware of the situation. Perhaps even those in southern Alberta did not realize it was a most serious factor until the situation was almost over. However, I am sure the minister is aware of this. The situation was caused by a small portion of a railway union. There were perhaps as few as 20 members who objected rather strenuously to the fact they had difficulty in getting one hot meal a day away from their base. That seemed to be the main thrust of the complaints. As a result, there was a horrendous holdup of massive amounts of prairie grain shipments which should have gone forward throughout the several months this strike was in progress.

The Grain Transportation Authority had suggested a goal of 1,500 unloads per week for this main line of the CPR of which the Revelstoke subdivision is a part. The 1,500 unloads of grain, not total, per week was their objective. During the strike that unload figure dropped to between 600 and 800, less than half the objective. By week number ten, the Revelstoke labour strike situation caused a shortfall of up to 5,000 cars of grain. That, of course, was in addition to all other commodities which were held up during the same period because of the strike. It made a fantastic difference to the shipments out of southern Alberta as that is the one rail system which serves us most of the time. It is true some of our grain is shipped through Thunder Bay, but most is over the CP mainline through the Revelstoke subdivision.

The second factor which contributed to this was that, when the new hard red spring quotas were announced at the beginning of the current crop year, there were no quotas allocated to the four shipping blocks which covered all of southern Alberta. This really hurt the grain shippers at that time. I need not dwell on it too long because I am sure the minister and his parliamentary secretary are aware of how urgently needed these early quotas are in order for farmers to have their cash requirements, meet their accounts payable, and so on. For some considerable time there was no quota for all for southern Alberta. In fact it was the only region in the designated Wheat Board area where there were no quotas for hard red spring wheat.

There are two questions I wish to ask the minister. First, there must be some built-in routine to deal with selected key railway strikes, such as that in the Revelstoke subdivision which tied up millions of bushels of grain movement to the west coast. It tied it up at the most critical time of the year when normally the maximum volume of grain should be moved. It could not have happened at a worse time with respect to the traditional volume moving time. Will the minister indicate what action he has taken on this specific situation, and what policy changes he feels would be appropriate to prevent such critical holdups in our grain handling situation in the future?

The second question arising out of this dissertation I have been enlarging on with the minister is with regard to grain quotas or, more properly, the lack of grain quotas in southern Alberta. Why should all of southern Alberta be the only region in western Canada to be completely deprived of a hard red spring wheat quota, as it was at the beginning of the crop season this year? It lasted for two and a half months.

It is rather significant that I raised this matter with the minister in private conversation, and again raised it in a motion under Standing Order 43 a day or two later. That was in October, I think. Within one or two days, the initial quota was finally announced. It is less than proper that I should have to stand here and ask for quotas which should have been almost automatically struck for hard red spring wheat at the opening of the quota year.

I want to give the minister plenty of time to reply. The minister will know that the strike I have been talking about ended on November 6. While it is now over, the situation we went through surely suggests that a policy must be arrived at to prevent such a holdup in the future. I would appreciate a response from the minister to the two situations in question.

Mr. Pepin: First, Mr. Chairman, with regard to the Revelstroke situation, this is a situation my hon. friend and I have been aware of for a number of months. I must say that on some days I was rather impatient, but I must underline the fact that a good number of people worked at trying to solve this labour problem. The grain co-ordinator, whom the hon. member referred to, was involved, as well as the CTC western branch and, obviously, the Department of Labour. I understand there were some agreements reached, but they could not be implemented. There was frustration all the way through. I might say that I do not think this is a problem for the Minister of Transport. It is a really a problem of labour relations and, consequently, I will pass it on to my colleague, the Minister of Labour.

This morning I was looking at the figures with regard to the west coast. The hon. member went through the different weeks. I have week 17. Possibly I am one week ahead of him. I noted that over-all deliveries in Canada were 6.5 per cent higher this year over last year. Therefore the situation is good. This would have been even better without the problems referred to by the hon. member.

On the west coast this year 47,309 cars were unloaded, compared to 46,786 last year. Already the delay has been made up, partly due to a good interchange between CN and CP, particularly in Vancouver. Therefore the situation has picked up.

I might observe in passing that the "vessels waiting" situation is good. There are only two ships on the west coast and none in Thunder Bay. Although the strike caused a difficult situation, fortunately the delivery schedule was not damaged to any considerable extent. I agree with the hon. member that situations such as this should not be allowed to drag on unnecessarily, but that is the price of democracy. We must accept a certain amount of that if we want to accept that principle. My parliamentary secretary might want to talk about hard red wheat.

Mr. Bockstael: Mr. Chairman, I am sure the hon. member for Medicine Hat knows better than I that quotas are always established by the Wheat Board. When this matter was drawn to our attention, it was also referred to the Wheat Board in order to try to rectify the situation. We appreciate how important it is for the producers of southern Alberta to get their quota early so that they can have some income from their early spring wheat. Other than that, I have nothing to report.

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Chairman, if I may just add to that, unfortunately I do not have the information regarding the quotas with me at the moment. I attended to the situation the hon. member described, as quickly as possible. I was told that the necessary adjustments were made and deliveries were taking place normally. More recently, I understand that some grains from this area were included in a sale to the Soviet Union. The board assured me through the minister responsible that there would be no problem with regard to the sale of red spring wheat from southern Alberta in the coming year. They will be able to sell everything that is available.

Mr. Hargrave: Mr. Chairman, I want to come back to the minister for a little amplification on the matter of the aftermath of the railroad strike. I appreciate the minister's response, but surely the situation warrants some action by the Minister of Transport and the Minister of Labour, to whom he suggested he would pass the buck. Is the minister going to take this matter up with the Minister of Labour in order to try to come up with a policy to handle the situation a little better and in a more alert fashion, as I am sure it is only a matter of time until this occurs again?

With regard to the quota situation, I appreciate the sudden response we got after my Standing Order 43 motion, and I thank the minister for that. However, neither he nor his parliamentary secretary responded on why southern Alberta was discriminated against in the first place. It had to be the only area throughout the western prairies without a hard red spring wheat quota for several months.

● (1550)

Mr. Pepin: I am a bit frustrated because I had a card which demonstrated that the situation was not as serious as indicated. The Canadian Wheat Board gave the delivery permit at the right moment, but I cannot prove it because it was all indicated on the card I had. I will gladly send a copy when it is recovered. Just to assure the hon. member that the situation will be attended to, although at the moment I am sure it does not exist in the sense that the farmers in this area are not being handicapped regarding delivery quotas. I will assure the hon. member that this will remain that way. With respect to the Revelstoke situation, I will talk again to the Minister of Labour and see what he can do.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I should like to use some of my time to talk about the pensions available to railway workers. I am sure this will come as no surprise to the Minister of Transport, and I hope he may surprise me by offering to be a little more active on this matter than he and his predecessors have been.

Before I get into that subject, I should like to take a moment to register my very strong protest against the issuing of the permit for the building of the Sherbrook-McGregor overpass in the city of Winnipeg. I realize that there are those—I refer to people in some other parts of the city of Winnipeg—who favour this overpass, but I stand here speaking on behalf of people who live on either side of the Canadian Pacific Railway tracks and who will be affected by the building of this structure.

The people who live in the Sherbrook Street area just south of the CPR tracks, and the people who live in the McGregor Street area just north of the CPR tracks, are in the constituency of Winnipeg North Centre. The prospect is very bleak to some of them with respect to what the building of this structure will do to those areas on either side of the Canadian Pacific Railway tracks.

I am leaving the main remarks on this to be made by one of my other colleagues from Winnipeg, depending on how many of them are able to take part in today's debate. Any one of them, be it the member for Winnipeg North, Winnipeg-St. James or Winnipeg-Birds Hill, can make the case. As a matter of fact, if the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport were on this side of the House he would make the case too. He knows what this structure is going to do to the area that I represent, and to the whole of downtown Winnipeg. We think it is a mistake. This decision is an insensitive one and, as I say, if my colleagues get the floor today they will join me in this protest we make against this permit having been issued.

I said, however, that I want to speak mainly about the pensions of railway workers, and to make an appeal to the Minister of Transport. I wish I could see his face.

An hon. Member: What for?

Mr. Knowles: I appreciate the help that the public servants are giving to the minister, but I am very serious about this. I would like the Minister of Transport to quit being a messenger boy who reports to the president of Canadian National Railways and the president of Canadian Pacific Railway that certain members in the House of Commons are raising issues about the pensions of railway workers. After all, both of those railways owe their existence to the government and the Parliament of Canada, and both of those railways get all kinds of financial assistance from the taxpayers of Canada through this Parliament and through the government.

I think the Minister of Transport has the responsibility to discuss seriously with those railways their unfairness to their pensioners and the several aspects of the matter. I have gone over this issue so many times that I hardly need to go over it again, but let me sketch the main points which are disappointing to railway pensioners.

• (1600)

First may I say that we have lost a decade on this issue. Back in the early 1970s we were pressing pretty hard. Motions were passed by various committees, we thought something would happen, and then the present Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, who was then minister of labour, arranged—and we welcomed it—for the setting up of an industrial inquiry commission into railway pension plans. He did this at a time when we were trying to settle a railway dispute and, since pensions were not included in the settlement, the setting up of this industrial inquiry commission was supposed to relieve our minds.

It took two or three years for that commission, headed by Dr. Noel Hall, to produce a report. It finally came down in 1976. By that time we had lost two or three years in the seventies, and then that report did what so many reports do—it began to collect dust.

Here we are four years later, and very little that was recommended in that report has been implemented. For example, it urged very strongly that the Canadian Pacific Railway be called upon to put its pension arrangements at least on a par with those of Canadian National Railways, and then it called on both railways to improve their pension plans. There was a proposal for the setting up of a heritage fund—this was even before that name became so well known in Alberta in another connection—out of which moneys might be available to index, escalate, or supplement the pensions of retired railway workers.

Back in the early days of escalation when some pensions were being indexed by a percentage point, or by two percentage points, the railways did it for a while. Canadian National did it first, and Canadian Pacific did it a little, but there never has been an acceptance of the proposition that railway pensions ought to be escalated automatically year by year in accordance at least with the rise in the cost of living, and in recent years things have fallen so far behind that older pensioners are way out of line in their incomes with what has happened to the rise in the cost of living.

As I say, I think it is time that the Minister of Transport played a role more than that of a messenger boy. He should talk to the railways about their responsibility to meet the retirement needs of their former workers. The ones who are still working, of course, have a chance through collective bargaining to try to win certain improvements in their pension plans, and they have won some improvements. The main desire on the part of those who are still working is that there be provisions for early retirement without penalty for such early retirement but, as I say, the main group of persons on behalf of whom I plead are the retired railway workers at both Canadian National and Canadian Pacific whose pensions have gone way out of line with the cost of living.

I urge very strongly that the minister act on this. If I repeat myself, I apologize, but I will do it anyway. So often when we raise matters like this the minister simply stands up and says, "I will make this known to the president of Canadian National or the president of Canadian Pacific". Well, it is time they were told what they ought to do.

In this connection there is a reform in pensions which simply has to come. I assert that it has to come in all pension plans, not just in those of railway workers, but what better place to start than with the railway workers, since the railways receive so much assistance from the taxpayers and the people of Canada generally? I refer to the provisions in both railway pension plans regarding widows. It is a rule that is in many other plans, but that does not make it right. That does not detract from the fact that it is antiquated and does not fit modern thinking at all.

Both railways have the provision that if a pensioner dies there is a 50 per cent pension for his widow, but if the wife dies first and the old man lives on as a widower, his pension is 100 per cent. Compared with the days when pension plans did not provide any survivor benefit, of course that was something to crow about, but surely in this day, when we say we believe in equality between men and women, there is no justification for continuing that arrangement in a pension plan under which, if the woman dies first, the husband receives a 100 per cent pension, but if the husband dies first the woman receives only a 50 per cent pension.

Various suggestions have been made about this. Some suggest that it should be 100 per cent for the first year, and then something like 75 per cent. Any improvement would be an improvement. I suppose one could say that we do not look for the ultimate right off the bat, but I suspect that if I were a woman standing here I would say, why not? If it is fair to do it, and to put women in an equal place with men in this respect, why not do it now? Why wait for a decade or two down the road? I urge very strongly that the minister press upon both railways that it is time to recast their plans so far as the pensions of widows are concerned.

As I have already said, if I were a woman I would plead for the perfect plan right now, but surely at least there should be a provision for widows to get 75 per cent of the pension instead of only 50 per cent, and if it meant that there would have to be some adjustment to put it on an equal basis, such that either survivor would get 90 per cent instead of one getting 100 per cent and the other 50 per cent, something like that might be worked out.

I have discovered in my work in the field of pensions that this has become an issue across the board which is felt pretty strongly. More people have pension plans now than was the case when I first came to this House of Commons, so they are aware of these things. Workers are getting older. Veterans are getting older, and they are getting more concerned about their widows than they were some years ago. But this is one of the important things railways workers do press, and I would like to see the minister go to the mat with the two railways on it.

Speaking of widows, there is another provision which still exists and which seems to me out of date, and that is the provision which says that the widow of a railway worker gets no pension if she married the worker after he retired. In most cases where this happens, she is the second wife. I have quite a job trying to explain to some of these widows that it is not because they are the second wives but because they married after the husbands retired. However, they still come back with the point that the contribution was made. It was there. There are cases in which the second marriage lasted longer than the first marriage, and yet we have the older railway worker having contributed to the plan and facing the prospect that he might die first and leave his widow, in the knowledge that if that widow was married to him after he retired, there is no pension for her at all. If this requires some adjustment in the rates, or some actuarial changes, let us make them, but surely it is time for us to move forward in this area.

I know a few years back there were pension plans which had no survivor benefit at all, so it was a great thing to achieve a survivor benefit of 50 per cent. But surely we do not stop there. Surely fairness, and the concept that men and women should be equal, should apply.

Someone may come back and say, "What about the other way when it is the wife who works, dies, and leaves a pension?" I am for that too, but the experience so far is largely that it is the man who is the wage earner and who is out there in industry or out there in the workaday world. But surely we do not have to argue any more that what he is able to do is very largely made possible by the support of his wife and by her maintaining of the home and raising the family, and there should not be any second-class status so far as the wife is concerned.

I want to leave the minister time to answer these points, and for me to answer him if that should be necessary, so I will leave it at that. I would be glad to have his comment on the first point I raised, even though some colleague of mine will raise it later today. That first point was the unfairness to the people of my constituency, as a result of granting the permit for the Sherbrook-McGregor overpass. However, in the main I would like to hear from him now on what he is going to do in terms of talking turkey to Canadian Pacific and Canadian National about putting the indexing of railway pensions on an automatic basis fully equal to the rise in the cost of living, and about doing something to put pensions to the widows of railway workers on a basis that is fair and equal.

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Chairman, my learned parliamentary secretary will answer questions on the overpass when they come.

I will try—very rapidly, for obvious reasons—to deal with the pension situation. The first time my friend, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, raised this question, I paid great attention and went about finding out if that was one of my main responsibilities. I was told a number of things. The first was that the determination of pension is the subject of contractual agreements between employers and employees. I know that if the hon. member were in my position he would want to decide what should be paid in all agencies of government, but I think on second thought he might not want to do so. Anyway, I do not determine the salaries and pensions of Canadians employed by government agencies. With respect to government departments, for example, that is in the hands of the President of the Treasury Board, and I was told in no uncertain terms that this was the subject of negotiation and that it was not under the authority of the Minister of Transport. So today I behaved like a good messenger boy.

● (1610)

I asked the parliamentary secretary to find out from the Minister of Labour whether he has something to say on the subject, and I will gladly give him some of my time when he comes back. I want to tell the hon. member, however, that I spoke to the president of CN on these matters and invited him to be generous in them. I know something about this because my father was a CN employee for 45 years. If I am here today, it is most certainly because of the good wages which CN has paid to its employees throughout these decades. I think CN has been a good employer. That was the reputation it had when my father was with that company. Their pension plan in particular was good. So I am quite sure that my hon. friend does not wish to chastise CN. He just wants it to give better and better treatment to its employees, and I compliment him on that.

Mr. Benjamin: We are talking about pensioners, not employees.

Mr. Pepin: To become a pensioner you must have been an employee first, and then you become a pensioner, following which an adjustment is made to the pension plan—

The Deputy Chairman: I regret to interrupt the minister, but the agreement is that the 20 minutes must be shared between the questioner and the member who answers the question.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Chairman, I welcome the opportunity to participate in discussion on these estimates. I should like to open my remarks by congratulating the backbench members of the Liberal party for taking advantage of this long lost opportunity of bringing up problems not only affecting their own constituencies but of the country as a whole, because this is the only occasion that parliamentarians have to put their viewpoints and their problems before the minister with a chance of them being heard. However, I should like to congratulate in particular, on behalf of all backbenchers of every parliament in the world, the young member for Manicouagan for the contribution he made yesterday.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): I do not think that any person who heard his remarks could have failed to hear that he was speaking for every backbencher of every party which has ever sat in parliament. The trouble we have as members of Parliament in breaking through this tremendous mess of an overloaded bureaucracy, and in trying to resolve simple problems, is one of the heaviest loads we bear, so I think the hon. member for Manicouagan is owed a debt by all of us for speaking so frankly.

It is expected of us in the opposition to try to put our best foot forward on these estimates and to try to get our points across, so I will attempt to do the same thing. I think you will notice, Mr. Chairman, that the points made by the opposition yesterday and today have been largely constructive and helpful to the minister. This gives the minister arguments which he can use with his officials and with his colleagues in cabinet and the Treasury Board to get some changes made a little more expeditiously.

I should like to speak on two subjects. The first one deals with the Canadian Wheat Board. Even though I address my remarks to the minister, I know the parliamentary secretary will be listening. My remarks are very brief. It is a request to the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Transport to ask the minister in the other place in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board to put before his legal officials an amendment to the Canadian Wheat Board Act to correct an injustice which takes place from time to time in the administration of that act. I am referring to the fact that a regulation of the Canadian Wheat Board Act gives the farmers the right to ask if they may transfer their payments from the pool in one crop year to the next pool. That right was granted by Parliament through this regulation of the Canadian Wheat Board to all producers under the Wheat Board's jurisdiction. In effect, that right is denied to farmers who hold permits under the Canadian Wheat Board Act because of a condition which occurs periodically.

I have the details on what I am now saying but I will put it in general terms. Under the Canadian Wheat Board Act, every farmer has the right to deliver to the elevator of his choice a number of bushels of grain up to the amount of the quota allocated to him. The technique of doing that is that the Wheat Board asks the leading elevator company how much space is available for a certain type of grain. When the report comes in and the railway cars are dispatched to pick it up, every producer in that elevator area has the right, equal to that of every other producer, to deliver that grain.

When a mistake is made, and the figures given as to the amount of space that is available and the amount of grain on the farms do not match up so that a number of farmers in the area cannot get the allocated bushels into the elevator in that crop year, then the Wheat Board Act allows for an extended delivery period. But the Canadian Wheat Board Act says very precisely that if a person delivers grain during an extended crop period beyond July 31, he must become part of the pool of that crop year which ends on July 31, which takes away from that producer, through a mistake made by someone else, his right to deliver that grain during that crop year and put the grain into the elevator in the next crop year for pooling purposes of the final payment. It is not a deliberate and evil contradiction, it is a normal thing which happens in the administration of a complicated marketing system such as we have.

The minister knows all about this. He has spoken to producers who have had trouble in that regard, and he knows that these matters were brought to the Canadian Wheat Board, which treated the matter facetiously and said, "You lost out in the gamble." I am asking the parliamentary secretary to take this up with the minister in charge of the Wheat Board and to tell him that the first thing to do is to adopt a simple amendment to the Canadian Wheat Board Act. The second thing to do, in my view, is that when an injustice is done and mistakes are made, the principle of compensation should be considered and accepted.

The incident I spoke about happened in 1978, over two years ago. One company, which I will not name, found out about this injustice because several farmers who had delivered grain to their elevator could not get their grain in, as they had the right to do on an order of the Canadian Wheat Board, and had to deliver their grain during an extended marketing period. So they lost their right to go to the next pool. The company compensated those producers for their loss. But another grain company said to its customer in the same situation, "No, you lost the gamble, you did not get it in." We know that it must have been either the fault of the grain company that it had not informed the Wheat Board accurately, or it was the fault of the Wheat Board that they issued the order without knowing exactly what the situation was. The fault does not lie with the producer.

It is no use going to the Canadian Wheat Board and asking for their advice in this matter.

No civil servant at any level ever wants to disclose a mistake. So I am asking the parliamentary secretary to speak very candidly to the minister who understands this type of thing, and ask him whether he could get his legal officers to correct an error which exists in the present Wheat Board Act and which makes it impossible to carry out the regulation dealing with joining in the second pool. I think that is fairly simple to those people who understand the situation.

● (1620)

If the Hansard record is shown to the minister, I am sure he will consider my requests. The first request is for an amendment to the Canadian Wheat Board Act, and the second request is to consider compensation being paid by whoever is responsible for the mistake. Either the Wheat Board or the grain company, either one or the other, should compensate the farmer who loses out through no fault of his own.

I should like to deal with railway transportation and the Hall commission report. When the report came down, speaking on behalf of the official opposition I stated that it was the magna carta of western producers. One reason why I made that statement was that the government periodically was under heavy pressure to change the Crowsnest rates which farmers consider to be a moral agreement that should not be destroyed. The Hall commission recommended that the Crowsnest rates be retained, but it laid down a positive, constructive proposal, showing how it would not cost the railways anything.

In very simple, blunt terms, the proposal was that railways should haul more than just grain. Every Canadian knows that the bulk of the wealth of Canada comes from the area west of the Great Lakes. Not only grain produces that wealth. Every year there is a rise in the number of shipments of every type of product. The products about which I am talking at this moment are the bulk ones which are most suitably carried on railways, particularly potash and coal.

The Government of Canada, along with the government of the United States, signed an agreement in good faith on approximately February 18, 1980. It committed the coal reserves of the United States and Canada to Europe and Japan. We will do all we can to supply their desperate need for coal over the next 40 or 50 years. If one looks at where the coal is located and the quantities necessary to meet the rising demands of Japan, Taiwan, South Korea and the entire Asian theatre, as well as the demand in Europe, one realizes that it amounts to many millions of tonnes per year and that this coal for Europe can only come from Saskatchewan and Alberta. Of course the coal for the Pacific market will come from British Columbia. I am talking about thermal coal, but it applies also to metallurgic coal.

If one looks at where coal is located in Saskatchewan and Alberta, one will soon find out that it is in the southern part of Saskatchewan and in the northwestern part of Alberta. I am not talking about the Crowsnest deposit which is orientated toward the Pacific market. In order to make it physically possible, we need a north-south railroad, from southern Saskatchewan going north into Churchill. All the parts of that railway are in place now as joint sections between the east-west lines going into Churchill, except for three little gaps.

If we want to send ten million tonnes of coal a year to Europe, it means the Churchill port will have to be kept open eight to ten months a year. We can do that, and the department is working on it. If we take ten million tonnes of coal out of Alberta and Saskatchewan at a freight rate several times per tonne greater than that at which wheat is carried, we will provide an income for the railways as great as the income from carrying all grain. If we ship an extra four or five million tonnes of potash a year through Churchill, which is the direct route, to the European market, the railways will earn four or five times more than they would carrying the same weight in wheat.

The incomes of the railways sharing in that carriage will be doubled or tripled by the simple act of completing the railway from southern Saskatchewan up to Churchill. The cost of building these little links is small, except for the engineering difficulties of crossing the Qu'Appelle River. It fits into the Hall commission report to build a new grain terminal elevator in Yorkton so that the dry protein grain of the south can be mixed with the lower protein grains of the north in order to increase the standards of grain to the levels wanted by the European market. It will be a direct route to Europe, so we will double the wheat movement, not to mention feed grains which are increasingly needed in Europe.

The minister knows about this. He has indicated a favourable attitude toward it, but his only hurdle to overcome is to convince one railway company that the rewards of getting across the Qu'Appelle River are far greater than the cost of getting across it. Engineers have known for some time how to do it.

The government of Saskatchewan is very anxious to move coal and potash into the markets of the world. Because of the surveys conducted in the last five years, we now know more thoroughly how much potash and coal there is in Canada. I think the plans of the provincial government of Saskatchewan for developing the Qu'Appelle River could be combined with the needs of the railway to get across the river, and the solution would be beneficial to the province of Saskatchewan and to all the people of Canada. We would be able to complete our obligations under the agreement to provide coal to Europe and Japan.

What I have just described is not mentioned in the Hall commission report. In chapter 9 or 10 it deals with how we can make the railways pay for themselves by hauling more products. I have given, in quantative amounts, the rough parameters on how to make a north-south railway in eastern Saskatchewan pay for itself. Not only will it help the entire country, but certainly it will relieve the pressure on western grain producers which hangs over their heads like the Sword of Damocles, that some silly ass some day will say that we must change the Crowsnest rates.

In 1966 the minister of transport admitted in the House that there was no necessity to change the Crowsnest rates if the railways were making money out of hauling. So, let us make money for the railways in spite of themselves, but it must be done with the strong, strong support of the Minister of Transport. We cannot talk to the railways as we would talk to a group of music teachers. They must understand just one thing—they must be able to explain to their directors and shareholders why they are turning down the opportunity to make money. Once we have said that loud and clear to the railway company heads, they will agree, because they would not dare to stand before their directors and shareholders denying that they should make money.

I would think my remarks are sufficient and hopeful enough to get the minister really interested. He should not take the attitude that he wants to learn more; he should simply get out there and say, "This is what we want to do; let us find the difficulties and clear them up one after the other". In so doing there are several small things he must remember. There is an application before the Board of Transport Commissioners now to pull out one of those little lines which run north and south, on the grounds that it is not economic. This rail line is called the Corning subdivision. It was recommended for abandonment by the Hall commission report and it was turned down by the other study which followed, but it did not consider the subdivision as part of this north-south concept I have just outlined.

Both the Hall commission people and the later study failed in their responsibilities to bring into the over-all global picture what we are trying to do. This matter was put before the so-called Neil study under the authority of the then minister of transport, who gave the solemn promise that if any grain company would say they would keep their elevators in place on these lines which were up for abandonment, then the government would guarantee they would be put on to the permanent lines of the railway system until the year 2000.

Several railway lines were given this status by orders in council as a result of this policy by the former minister of transport. Two of these lines were late in getting their information in, and the then minister of transport promised that he would pass on the recommendation in writing to the new minister of transport, which he did. He asked the new minister to honour his commitment to these producers, in view of the fact that the government was changing. The present minister has not seen fit to honour that commitment to the Corning line. In view of what I think is a reasonable and fair view of the picture, I would ask him if he would not consider answering the letter of the previous minister of transport and say he will honour all the commitments made under the policy announcement. This should be done for two reasons: one, for the sake of being honourable and not taking advantage of a minister who made a commitment, who did not want to act on it because the government was changing and, two, since it is part of a long-range strategy of making the railway, which I think the minister supports—

The Deputy Chairman: I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his allotted time has expired. The minister will not have time to answer.

Mr. Foster: Mr. Chairman, I am happy to have the opportunity to say a few words this afternoon to this committee on the estimates of the Department of Transport. I think the debate which has already taken place indicated the tremendously wide scope the Minister of Transport has to cover when we consider all the modes of transportation—water, rail, road, and air. In connection with that wide scope I think we ought to congratulate him on at least two Crown corporations which, during the past year or so, have made a profit. They are Air Canada and CN. Notoriously, Crown corporations do not often make profits so when they do I think we should draw attention to it.

I want to mention also a program that people might not associate with the Minister of Transport. In my constituency we have the north channel cruising and sailing area of Lake Huron. During the past couple of years the Minister of Transport established a program for water safety called the inshore rescue program. A couple of years previous to that the department established a coastguard auxiliary program in which individuals can work in units in co-operation with the coastguard in promoting water safety and search and rescue programs. Certainly in this area where we are very dependent on tourism, in particular boating, these two programs have been most useful and I congratulate the minister on establishing them. I hope he will continue them and expand them in the future.

There is hardly another department of the government which can carry out this vital work which is so important in our area. As well, the boater safety programs are equally important in preventing accidents. For instance, the inshore rescue program has two stations, one located in Batchawana on Lake Superior and one in Blind River on Lake Huron, in which young students carried out important search and rescue programs and boater safety programs during this past summer.

I would also like to raise a number of concerns that have surfaced in my constituency relating to airports and air safety. This past summer the Department of Transport carried out an important paving program on the apron of the Manitoulin Island airport, which serves the entire Manitoulin Island and district. However, this was carried out late in the season and some problems have been identified with the paving program. If the program which was carried out this past year is to be fully beneficial to that airport I think it is important that the paving of the main runway be carried out during 1981-82 so that the full benefits of this improvement will be realized. We are hoping that those airport facilities, which particularly serve the tourist industry of Manitoulin, will be increased, because the customs service has agreed to expand their program in the coming year, which will provide customs service right from the airport and, as well, will hopefully provide the direct phone-in service. The phone-in customs service has been operating in the Sault Ste. Marie area for the past year, and will be especially beneficial to Manitoulin airport if established there. I am hoping those two improvements will take place in 1981. That would move up the date for the paving of the main runway, which is scheduled for 1982, from 1982 to 1981. This would enable the necessary remedial work to be done to the apron improvements which were carried out this past summer.

I also want to mention the Sault Ste. Marie airport, which is also located in the Algoma constituency. I mention it because during the next couple of years there will have to be important improvements carried out there as well. The services have outgrown the size of that airport. We have several carriers in there now, including Nordair, whose facilities will be expanded next spring. This will result in the manager of the airport being removed right out of the airport into an auxiliary building. Air Canada has two or three auxiliary buildings as well, which points to the need to expand the facilities of that airport terminal building. In the next couple of years, not only for additional carriers, but to improve the baggage area which is very poorly set up at present. The restaurant facilities, too, are totally inadequate and in need of improvement.

I also want to mention the third airport which is located in the Algoma constituency. It is located at Elliot Lake. The town of Elliot Lake is growing rapidly from some 15,000 people to what is projected to be close to 25,000 by the middle of this decade. This is due to the expansion of the uranium mines in that community. Along with this increase in population has come an increase in the use of the airport.

The federal government spent some $300,000 in 1979 to expand the runway from 2,500 feet to 3,500 feet. Included in the $300,000 figure was the provision of lighting to the runway. The air boardings and the use of the airport have expanded dramatically since 1976 when there was something in the range of two boardings a month as compared with over 1,000 boardings a month between the two commercial carriers which operate there now. Last month there were over 120 charter flights operating out of that airport. We actually have four communities feeding services into the Elliot Lake airport: Chapleau, Sault Ste. Marie, and Sudbury to Toronto, with nine scheduled flights a day.

Plans are going forward in the next fiscal year to improve the taxi way, the lighting on the taxi way and the car park at the airport. Other needs will become apparent with the expansion of the use of the airport during the next three or four years. Certainly in the next couple of years the small metal building which serves as the terminal will require expanding as the town grows. I know that proposals will be coming forward from the Elliot Lake airport committee and the town council for the expansion of that facility. The expansion is necessary because of the growth of the community and in the general area, the growth of air traffic, the development of the Eldorado uranium refinery at Blind River, and the general expansion in the uranium mining industry.

Another problem which the town has faced for the past two or three years is with regard to the atmospheric environmental service at the airport which is currently being provided under an arrangement with Norontair, the principal air carrier in the area. However, the way in which this arrangement works out means that a small town of 15,000 people ends up subsidizing by $75,000 a year the atmospheric environmental service which is normally provided at airports by the federal government through the Department of the Environment. Surely, as the traffic grows this airport will grow, and the responsibility for this service should be assumed by the federal government rather than maintained by a community of this size. It is interesting that this weather information is fed into the national weather service. Obviously the responsibility ultimately lies with the federal government.

More urgently, I want to raise the matters of navigational aids, air traffic control, and radio communication at the Elliot Lake airport with the Minister of Transport. There is a large amount of air traffic at this airport every day, which has nine commercial scheduled flights. At the present time MOT plans are going forward to instal a new non-directional beacon by the summer of 1981 and I understand that negotiations are taking place to have this beacon located at an appropriate spot west of the airport. I also understand that there are plans going forward to move the peripheral UHF radio station from Blind River, some 15 miles or 20 miles away, to the airport to help air traffic control cover this airport.

I am told that we have quite a dangerous situation at the present time because we do not have air traffic control.

Considering the number of flights and considering the bad weather during the winter months, a great deal of concern is being expressed by the airport committee, pilots and the commercial air carriers, that because there is not proper air traffic control, action should be taken immediately. I hope that the minister will see that action is taken to provide air traffic control, better navigational aids and better communications aids, because they are essential to this airport.

I would like to congratulate the minister on the action which was taken to provide a new air navigational aid at Wawa, which is just west of my constituency. The device was installed this past year at a cost of some $800,000. It will be very useful to that entire area on the north shore of Lake Superior, north of Sault Ste. Marie. I understand that this is the first air navigational aid of its type to have been installed outside the Rocky Mountain area of western Canada. Certainly it is important to air safety in that area on the north shore of Lake Superior.

I would like to leave some time for the minister to respond to the several questions which I have raised about airport facilities and air safety in the Algoma constituency, namely, an earlier start to the improvements at Manitoulin-Gore Bay, the terminal facilities in the Sault Ste. Marie, and an increase in the number of navigational aids and the safety facilities at the Elliot Lake airport. I think that it is important that the minister respond to these matters.

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Chairman, I will respond to the remarks made by the hon. member for Algoma on the needs, both air and marine, in his constituency. At the same time I would like to take this opportunity to inform the hon. member on what the life of the Minister of Transport entails. I can in all honesty say that the sort of representation he has made is reiterated by almost all the 282 members in this House, including the hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton, who occasionally decides that his riding also has an airport.

My department pays attention to all the matters which are raised, and I am particularly sensitive to those representations. I wake up in the morning thinking about such matters, or go to sleep at night dreaming about radar, ELTs, runways, aprons, parking concessions, and so on and so forth. It has become a major preoccupation.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Tell us more about your dreams.

Mr. Pepin: Strangely enough, there has been a change in values. On the subject of safety, the hon. member for Algoma made some comments with which I agree. The preoccupation will be great and the department is very much concerned about safety. When one listens to what is said on air safety, one forgets to look at the record in Canada, particularly with respect to regular scheduled carriers. We have been very fortunate because the number of accidents in Canada is extremely low, and in most years it has been zero. I am looking at my air administrator for his blessing as I am speaking, but most years the fatalities have been zero. This would suggest that there is a lot of good equipment and much attention given to such matters.

I would like to report very rapidly that the first operating station of the joint en route terminal system at Moncton was opened last summer. This is the first of seven such terminals which will be located across Canada. A rather expensive radar modernization program has been developed which will cost, if I remember correctly, $147 million.

I would like to use this opportunity both to agree with the representations of my friend and to say how expensive this equipment is. The department and the minister try to be as fair as possible in distributing the advantages around the country, but the demand is almost unlimited. I welcome the kind of interventions made this afternoon and last night, particularly by the hon. member for Manicouagan who laid it all out on the floor of the House with regard to his frustration, to which I replied in part by saying a few words on the frustration of the minister.

I also welcome what the hon. member for Algoma said about the coastguard auxiliary program. This has been very, very helpful, and it is one of the main objectives of the department to continue that expansion.

I wish I had more time to deal with the matter of search and rescue, but I want to tell members what is happening. There has been an increase in the number of accidents, particularly on the west coast, due to the increase in fisheries, the increase in commercial transport and the increase in the number of recreational boats. This applies to the Great Lakes as well. Accidents have increased. The Department of National Defence has the primary responsibility in this matter but the Department of Transport has the marine responsibility, and it is spending a lot more money on this particular aspect of its responsibilities as years go by.

I want to thank the member for Algoma and tell him that I will be particularly mindful of Manitoulin, Elliot Lake, and the coastguard auxiliary force.

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Chairman, I want to apprise the minister—I am sure if he was here last November when we had that problem in Mississauga—that certain representations were made in the House by the member for Mississauga North, and I think they should be corrected.

The tragedy of Mississauga occurred at 11.50 p.m. on November 11. On November 12 at two o'clock in the afternoon when the House opened, this House unanimously directed the minister of transport to have a full and independent inquiry into the activities that happened in Mississauga. As soon as possible the minister organized a public inquiry under Justice Grange. As the minister knows, it is not easy to get a public inquiry going. You have to get a judge, then counsel, and so on. The then minister moved as expeditiously as was possible.

Secondly, the minister directed the CTC to have a Mr. McGee at the site throughout all of the investigation problems, and throughout all of the period when the evacuation was taking place. If the member for Mississauga North lived in Mississauga, if he had even recognized where Mississauga was on November 11, he would have known that. The member is talking through his hat. He does not know what the minister of transport in the last Parliament did. That minister of transport did everything for the benefit of Mississauga that could conceivably be done.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Chairman, I want to direct a question to the minister about air transport. The minister will know that in Mississauga we have probably one of the most profitable airports in Canada, and certainly one of the most busy airports in Canada. The minister will also know that study after study has been made of this airport. I refer him to the last study, the Southern Ontario Modal Passenger study, completed in September, 1979. That study recommended all sorts of things be done. If the minister would direct his attention to Malton, I would like to know what the minister has done with respect to a terminal that was supposed to be built within 12 months from the date of that study. Fourteen months have passed and nothing has happened.

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Chairman, I am surprised at the ferocity of the tone. I am flabbergasted, as a matter of fact. I am not used to it. But the short answer was already given to a member from the Toronto area some days ago in the House when I said that the terminal is the subject of a study at the present time. Unless my air administrator contradicts me as I am speaking, the decision on the terminal is expected to be made early in the year.

Mr. Blenkarn: Tell us when construction will commence.

Mr. Pepin: First of all, the matter has to come before cabinet and Treasury Board. After that we start planning with architectural designs and that sort of thing. I would think that it will be anywhere between two or three years before the actual construction will take place. Another subject which is being explored now is the financing. A number of people have suggested that in view of the limited financial capacity of governments these days, and in view of the tremendous need across the country for facilities of this kind, we should consider other forms of financing for airports.

As my friend already knows, my department has been through a study exercise on airport management. Unfortunately, its recommendations have not met with unanimous support in all parts of the country, so we are trying to adjust it in order to make it more acceptable to a greater number of people. Thus, there is all this talk under way about both the third terminal at Malton and the financing of it.

Mr. Blenkarn: I must say that three or four or five years is not acceptable. There is terminal crowding now that is seriously interfering with service in Toronto. The terminal could be financed without any expenditure of public funds. Indeed, the terminal would make a profit from day "go", and the minister knows that. There seems to be no reason whatever for the holdup and delay in getting on with this needed terminal building. I would like to have a better commitment than three, four or five years, and study after study, from the minister on this matter. It is about time that the minister took his responsibility for this problem seriously.

This airport presently takes in airplanes like the Cessna 172, and it even rents out space to people in which to park their Cessna 172s. Can the minister tell me what it costs to tie down a Cessna 172 at Toronto international airport?

Mr. Pepin: I am very familiar with the increase in the recent landing fees. I have good reasons—something like 67 good reasons—judging from the number of letters I received from members of this House. I answered in kind, in the sense that I sent an explanatory note to my hon. friends to explain what had been happening. I am familiar with the increase in landing fee from $1.65 to $5. I explained that and a great number of other things to hon. members, in my letter. The first thing is that this is not vengeance. This is not an attack on general aviation. This is simply an effort to make sure that people using these facilities at the four major airports, namely, Mirabel, Dorval, Malton and Vancouver, make a just and fair contribution to the cost of operating these airports. I have inquired about the price elsewhere in the world and I am told that in Boston and New York it is closer to $50 than it is to $5. Unless my memory does not serve me well, it is more expensive in other airports in Canada also.

Another argument which I have used is the fact that people who are using these airports—and that applies to the four already mentioned, and to the others—should be mindful also that the department does have to recover some of the investments it makes. Why does it have to do it? Because there are other locations in Canada, other groups of people, who would like to have small airports or big airports, and don't. It is a question of fairness.

On the subject of the timing for the construction of the third terminal in Malton, if I was slightly reluctant to indicate a date—and by the way, my hon. friend transformed the two to three years, which I used, to three to four years. Suddenly there was a year added to my timetable. If the terminal were built by private enterprise it could be built more rapidly than if built by government. So I go along with the argument he is trying to make. I suggest to him that we are investigating that possibility now.

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Chairman, may I ask the minister about tie-downs. A tie-down is a place where a person can rent a space at the airport to tie down their airplane so that it will not blow away. Does the minister know you can, in fact, rent a tie-down for a Cessna 172 cheaper at Malton than at the Brampton Flying Club?

• (1700)

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Chairman, that proves how difficult it is to assess what people actually pay for the services they get. People who own aircraft have to pay a number of fees. For example, there are fees on fuel, and there is this one on tie-downs. There are landing fees, and so on. Presumably there is the cost of alcohol at the bar, too. However, this should be seen as a general proposition. In the letter which I sent to members I explained the very substantial rise in the cost of landing fees at Malton and three other airports. I indicated fees have not been increased in other areas of the airport.

Mr. Blenkarn: I was not really concerned about the landing fee charges. It is my feeling that a major airport should not be used when there are problems with respect to runway capacity, as there is in Toronto. In my opinion, people should not be allowed to fly in and out of a major airport in private single engine aircraft which are unable to land at speeds comparable to jet aircraft. Toronto international airport is probably our busiest airport in Canada. It certainly has most of our commercial traffic. By allowing planes which have to land at less than 70 knots per hour, this delays all sorts of jet traffic.

When is the minister going to treat Toronto international airport as an international airport? When is the minister going to supply general aviation with other facilities away from the jet-age traffic so that general aviation can have a place from which it can operate with proper IFR facilities? If he handles it that way, he could leave the capacity at Toronto for regular commercial flights and regular business activity using jet aircraft which can land at speeds appropriate to the jet age.

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Chairman, I can only say that the argument which my friend is using is one which I refrain from using. This argument is qualified as unfair by a number of people. It is all right to say that you should use Cartierville if you are in Montreal instead of Dorval, or St. Hubert; to say you should use Buttonville or Maple if you are in Toronto. I was told this is not a very good argument. It is possible that a person who has a plane may not be in a position to use those satellite airports. I did not want to make that as a part of my argument, but if my hon. friend wants to, he can suit himself.

I think it makes some sense in these big international airports used by the larger aircraft, and although I am not an air traffic controller it would appear to me that getting in all the pipsqueaks at the same time must delay the operations of the big planes. I was told not to use that argument because it would not wash well, both intellectually and psychologically.

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Chairman, the minister knows that you cannot use the argument of small aircraft being permitted to land at Toronto international as an excuse to go through a big process of building an airport at Pickering. Would the minister give us a commitment to supply the satellite airports with the IFR facilities so those airports can be used to their fullest extent? The problem is that you cannot fly into Toronto Island airport in all weathers. That is why a person cannot leave his aircraft there. That is why business cannot use that airport to its fullest extent. You cannot use the Maple, the Brampton Flying Club airport or the Oshawa airport the way one would like, simply because the air control facilities are not there. The traffic protection facilities for IFR flying are not there. Will the minister do something to make it possible for people in general aviation to have an airport to go to so they do not have to take their lives in their hands and compete with the jumbo jets?

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Chairman, that just proves demand is great. I was going to use the word "unlimited," but that may be an exaggeration. My predecessor used the formula at Vancouver when he offered Boundary Bay airport to private investment. That is an idea.

Mr. Mazankowski: It is a good idea.

Mr. Pepin: The idea has been explored. Yes, I said that even in the absence of the hon. member for Vegreville. Even when he is not in the House, I say kind things about him.

My air administrator says that consideration is being given to limit the use of Malton by small aircraft on the basis of pilot licences and weight of plane. This makes sense, and we have just agreed on that. As a counterpart to that, maybe we can try to pay particular attention to the improvement of facilities at the satellites so we can have a compensating balancing factor.

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Chairman, the minister will recall that I asked him in the House about the estimated cost of putting navigational aids into the Toronto Island airport. I suggested to him that it would be about $5 million. Will the minister confirm his investigations with respect to what he has done about my question on the Toronto Island airport?

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Chairman, I have these figures somewhere. Apparently $5 million is correct. However, if I recall, there are two amounts of $5 million; one is for the airport itself and one is for the facilities leading to the airport. If the two are put together, it makes sense. If the Toronto community and the relevant authorities—metropolitan, the city and the government of Ontario—are interested enough to put the STOL project into operation at Toronto Island, then there might be a division of labour and expenditures between the federal government and the other interests and orders of government.

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Chairman, I appreciate there is a $5 million charge to put a bridge or a tunnel into the airport, but it is not necessary to build a bridge or a tunnel because there is a ferry service available. It is my understanding from the minister's figures that $5 million spent on navigational aids would indicate a repayment of the $5 million in about four years with any STOL service. Will the minister confirm that is the case? Will he confirm that if he spent the money on navigational aids there is enough business ready to go there, particularly if he gives the licence to people who want to run the STOL service, and he will get the money back in four years?

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Chairman, I tiptoe into this debate because there are so many ifs in the air. The first if, as the hon. member for Mississauga indicates, is the participation of whoever is going to get the licence from the Canadian Transport Commission. I do not know who it is. One of the difficulties of the decision is by not choosing, because of the uncertainties, the Transport Commission made it more difficult for me to bring this matter to a conclusion.

Had a candidate been selected by the CTC, we could have talked to that person to find out to what extent financially he could get involved in the costs of developing the facilities which my hon. friend has mentioned. That has created difficulties. It is now an "après vous Alphonse, après vous Ernest" situation. I now have to do the work. That will start in the coming days. I will find out what other orders of government are willing to do to get this project on the road. I make puns voluntarily. I will then find out to what extent the successful applicant could be involved in this. We will get through it.

• (1710)

The Chairman: This is the last question for the hon. member for Mississauga South.

Mr. Blenkarn: The minister will know the government has spent a great deal of money supporting STOL technology in de Havilland. There were at least three applicants who want to use the airport facility at Toronto Island.

An hon. Member: Five.

Mr. Blenkarn: Five. I suspect the minister will know that every member representing Toronto from his side of the House is probably in favour of it, and I suspect that almost every member from the Toronto area on this side is in favour, with the possible exception of the hon. member for Beaches. The new mayor of Toronto is in favour, as is the chairman of metropolitan Toronto and the Toronto Board of Trade.

Will the minister now tell me why he has to talk to more people about that possible airport, which could conceivably pay for this service in four years, before he interferes, and does something to make STOL technology available to Torontonians and others in the Toronto area?

The Chairman: The hon. member's time has expired. Possibly the minister can reply briefly.

Mr. Pepin: Just a couple of sentences, Mr. Chairman. I am perfectly aware of the distribution of intelligence or lack of it in this House and elsewhere. With the possibility of one or two, I know who is for and who is against. If I am doing it this way, it is because the steering group had been created for that purpose by my predecessor once removed. I believe my immediate predecessor had the same intention. Therefore, there seems to be some wisdom around the decision to develop a consensus among the different parties. We will talk money at the same time. That is why I am doing it in this fashion. If I were not doing it that way, the hon. member would say I am being despotic and Napoleonic, or something of that nature.

Mr. MacLellan: Mr. Chairman, it is a pleasure for me to speak during these estimates debates. I want to mention first that I feel the Department of Transport is probably one of the most difficult departments of the federal government over which to gain administrative control. It is my feeling that the present minister has done an excellent job from the point of view of Atlantic Canada. He has had to cope with matters which have been very difficult to oversee.

In recent years Crown corporations have been turned over to their own control so that at the present time the federal government does not exert much jurisdiction over them. One such corporation which is gaining strength, power and authority, and which ought to be very mindful of the needs of Canadians, is Canadian National. CN has a great influence on the lives of Atlantic Canadians.

VIA Rail has recently become a separate company. Although it is no longer a part of the CN system, it is no less important. The maintaining of passenger rail service in the maritime provinces is of the utmost importance. I was glad to see that VIA has put new coaches on the Nova Scotia runs and has made its rail cars considerably more attractive.

In recent years, probably within the last 12, there has been a very disturbing problem in my constituency. That is the erosion of CN Marine, which provides ferry service from North Sydney to Newfoundland. That service is guaranteed under the terms of union with Newfoundland.

This very important service has deteriorated to the extent that approximately five years ago it employed about 1,000 men on the wharves and today employs less than 500. Of these 500, a great many are not working full time and are merely on call. This has been a source of concern to the communities of North Sydney and Sydney Mines, and to me personally as the member of Parliament for that area.

This deterioration continued through the years. This year, with the help of the minister, we were able to obtain a study on the problems of CN Marine. I want to thank the minister very much for interceding in this very desperate situation. The study has not yet been completed. We are hopeful it will point out where the problems have been in this industry and with this community. Once we know the source of the trouble, I am hopeful that steps will be taken to rectify a good part of the difficulty. With this report the minister has provided to the people of North Sydney the feeling that the Department of Transport is not only interested in the future of this very valuable asset, but in the well-being of that community.

The most current and pressing difficulty regarding the CN system is CN Express. I do not need to tell of the difficulty the closure of CN express terminals in Atlantic Canada is creating, particularly in my constituency. The CN Express terminal in the city of Sydney will be closing completely. This will mean a loss of 52 jobs. The economy there, without the closure of CN Express, is very, very shaky. Therefore, this is a very bad time for the economy of that area. The economy will improve with the coming of the mining industry and steel industry, but at this critical juncture the loss of jobs and services will be very damaging.

In the last month, three businesses on the main street of Sydney ceased operation, and rumours are that other businesses will be following suit. These are difficulties that businesses are facing before Christmas. Imagine what it will be like after Christmas. The difficulties facing these businesses, particularly the merchants, with the closure of CN Express will be absolutely devastating. I ask the consideration of the Department of Transport in that regard.

The additional cost of unloading parcels at Stellarton, the closest terminal, but many miles away, and loading them on to another truck owned by another company will drastically increase the cost of shipping from other points to Cape Breton Island. The economy of Sydney cannot absorb that additional burden.

In view of the hardships facing the merchants of Sydney, is the minister prepared to assist the community in overcoming this very bleak scenario?

● (1720)

Mr. Pepin: The hon. member for Cape Breton-The Sydneys puts me in a very difficult situation. The difficulty is really the behaviour of the minister with Crown corporations. It is not a new problem. Every minister who has been around has experienced this. In the case of CN, it is a schedule D corporation and has a great amount of freedom. That is the way the system works. When Crown companies have less freedom and independence, they are put in different category from that one. The minister must be aware of that. My predecessors have taken the same position as I, that is, we do not tell them what to do. We discuss with them, we try to bring forward other points of views manifested by members of Parliament, bring factors to their attention, and so on.

An hon. Member: What about the president's salary?

Mr. Pepin: Well, even at that, the present salary he receives is probably half of what he would get elsewhere. That applies to us too, but we have special dedication.

In this particular case, I have agreed with the purpose of CN Express and have said so on the floor of the House, because CN Express indicated that they could not do a good job of competing in small parcel express. They tried it and, because of the nature of the beast, they cannot. There are various truckers and others who are more keen and capable of doing it. It is a confession on the part of CN Express that for small parcels they are not able to compete with other companies which are lighter, specialize in certain areas, and do a better job.

Another reason why I cannot agree is the behaviour of CN Express with workers in terms of pre-retirement, relocation, pre-pensioning and retraining. Another reason was the attitude they are taking with respect to communities, in that they will not leave the responsibility to fly-by-night operators but try to accommodate the communities by way of developing subcontracts, interlining and so on. So, they were mindful of their responsibility.

What we are witnessing now is that CN Express is trying to accommodate, in a civilized fashion, the interest of the communities. What we are hearing now is that there might be some accommodations for Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island, and Cape Breton-The Sydneys, in particular. Maybe they can develop another modus operandi so that there would be only one centre, Moncton, but there would be trailer facilities going from Moncton to those other areas which would reduce the number of employees who would be laid off. Again, I do not want to tell CN Express how to do it. They are, very conscientious people and I told them to do the best job they could in the light of the philosophy that they expounded when they told me that they intended to retrench the small parcel business. I hope the end result is acceptable to the greatest number of people.

Mr. MacLellan: I am sure the minister appreciates the seriousness of the situation. As I mentioned to him, it is not only a question of jobs in this particular case but the actual survival of a downtown area, an area which is, at this particular time, undergoing considerable hardship.

● (1730)

I think probably very kindly, CN Express is providing pre-retirement pensions and has offered to give displaced employees job opportunities in other branches of CN. In many areas this might be satisfactory. Unfortunately, in an area in which all arms of CN recently laid off employees who are now on call and on standby, to take men from CN Express and to give them the first opportunity for employment in another branch of CN is merely postponing the opportunity for people in that other branch of CN once again to obtain gainful employment. In the context of the high level of unemployment in industrial Cape Breton, I think what should be considered very carefully when Dr. Bandeen, CN and CN Express look at this question, as I think they must, is what the final situation for the CN Express facility in industrial Cape Breton is going to be.

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member has made his case very eloquently. It used to be said of CN that it is both a business and a responsibility. That is the balancing act it has to do regularly.

CN is a business, and it is not there to lose money. I heard an hon. member say this morning that this was the first time he could report that Crown corporations were making money. But if every time they make money—and in business circles this is one of the indications that you are doing a good job—we say they have to lose that money, we take it away, what then? It is this balancing of responsibility between business enterprise, efficiency and so forth that those schedule D corporations must achieve. They must reconcile themselves between being in business and exercising responsibilities, and there is no formula in the textbooks of this House or in the government which will give us a good definition once and for all. In every instance that balancing takes place, and hopefully it will be done well again this time.

[Translation]

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Chairman, I have listened carefully to the minister's replies to the various questions put to him today. I also had the opportunity to read part of yesterday's Hansard. I recognize that the minister shows much sympathy for the problems raised by his various colleagues in the House. He will admit that it is not enough to sympathize with the frustrations of some members—the minister has stated that he was frustrated himself in several cases, even the officials are frustrated—but those are not the answers expected by the Canadian people and by hon. members.

The minister has referred, of course, to the appropriations, which are always restricted. I shall try to ask a few quick questions in the hope of obtaining brief and concrete answers. Since I have a few questions to ask and my time is limited, I will deal first with a matter which does not require additional estimates.

I had the opportunity to inquire in the House on two or three occasions about the future of Nordair. Yesterday, the member for Laprairie (Mr. Deniger) felt that he was justifiably concerned considering the interest shown by some Quebec groups, considering the circumstances since the matter has been discussed, and since the government is committed to resell that corporation to private interests. Could the minister tell us quickly how the matter stands and whether the sale will be completed before January 1?

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Chairman, if the hon. member can settle the matter, why did he not do so when his party was in power? Obviously, I would have been the first one to be relieved. If he did not act himself with his colleague the minister of transport at the time, it is because the problem is particularly difficult. Some people refuse to accept that, but I feel that in this case especially they are not showing much sense of responsibility. The matter is extremely complex and has become symbolic in a way. But once again, I tell myself that it is not of my own doing.

Compromises should be made by the shareholders in the matter of the balance between shareholders within what is known as Regionair, a holding company grouping various persons and companies. They should come to terms among themselves; the Quebec side and the Ontario side of the group should come to an agreement. Now, if the hon. member insist that I should take care of the Quebec group only, which I doubt he will do because it would be a disservice to the cause, I would remind him that though Nordair has its head office in Montreal, it does in fact operate in Ontario. So it is quite proper for the Quebec government to be interested in the case, just as it is for the Ontario government to be concerned with it too. What is good for one is good for the other. All those aspects have to be taken into account and it is with that rather tricky balancing act that we are now busying ourselves. I met once again the Regionair group a few days ago and I shall surely do so again in the next few days. We are trying to find a balance in the matter. It is not just a matter of the shareholders coming to terms, but also that of accommodating the people who work for the companies and the people who manage them. They are entitled to some attention too. In many cases, they are responsible for the success of the company. Their interests deserve some consideration.

A third group must also be accommodated: the unions. They have a say in this as well and they have a right to be concerned about the outcome. I feel it is our duty to respond to that too. In addition, we have to think of the future of the company, future investments and the services it will offer its passengers, and so on. So I think this is a very serious matter. Some of my friends have told me that I agonized too much over it, but I would rather be accused of agonizing too much than too little. So, that is why it has taken so much time and is still taking time, but I do think the problem will be solved one of these days.

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Chairman, the minister tells me that this is a serious matter. Of course, it is a serious matter. We considered that matter. We did a lot of work on that case. A responsible minister pursued that study, Mr. Chairman; however, I think there are limits to the decisions a government must make, and I asked the minister whether he was in a position to tell me at what date he was going to make a final decision. If we consider that the study by both governments is a two-year study, in any case the minister responsible has almost ten months. I think that the people of Quebec, Canada and Ontario are interested in that matter, and I am aware of it. Following the representations which have been made to him by his colleagues, can the minister at least say whether we will have to wait ten months, two months or three weeks longer? Mr. Chairman, this is the question I ask the minister today.

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member knows that I am favourably disposed towards him. But if he wants to contribute to that debate, why does he not tell us this afternoon how he would have solved the problem? I shall listen with the greatest interest.

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Chairman, today we have an opportunity to put questions to the minister responsible, and the fact the minister is asking me questions astounds me as well as the Canadian people. It is his responsibility to provide answers, it is his responsibility to make decisions. He has not decided anything in ten months. I do not care at all if he accuses me of failing to make decisions in a seven-month period. We made progress regarding that matter, and the minister has just proven something once more today, and he has disappointed the hon. member for Laprairie and others who take an interest in that matter and are concerned about certain formulas. I am simply asking the minister. Of course it interests Quebeckers, Mr. Chairman, and it interests them enormously. They are also interested in the principle of a certain majority of shares in Quebec interests, without disregarding the interests of Ontario for all that. There is lobbying around, we are aware of it. I ask once more of the minister: How long are we going to wait for an answer to that question?

Mr. Pepin: I cannot say. And in this matter as in many others, I discharge my responsibilities. If some of my friends feel that I am not going fast enough in this matter, it is their privilege to criticize me. The hon. member is exercising his privilege now. I have consistently stated that matters have to settle in the Nordair case, and this is now taking place. Some may feel that the process is too slow, that I am not, should I say, bold enough, gambler enough, that I should decide and things would settle down once a decision had been taken. Be that as it may, everyone plays that game with his own gut feelings, and mine would be rather cautious in that kind of thing, especially in a case like this when there is a symbolic significance. We must be especially cautious when a case like this takes on a symbolic significance, which this one has had right from the beginning, and do not blame me for that.

So I tried to be nice this afternoon as I told the hon. member he was missing a golden opportunity to indicate how he would have solved the problem. Because when I took over this department, all the problems were not solved. Yesterday, my friend from Vegreville seemed to be saying that the only problems to have been solved were those he had solved himself. But such was not the case; many problems had not been solved when he took over the department, and I inherited many from him. This is normal. It is a classic situation.

As I was saying to the hon. member for Joliette, he missed a good opportunity to contribute to the solution of the problem if he so wished, but he did not. He asked me a question and I replied by pointing out how difficult it was to solve the problem. He is now asking me to tell him what is my deadline, but I cannot do so because the negotiations are still going on. However, I am giving this matter all the attention it deserves.

Mr. La Salle: I can assure the minister that we respect the principle of giving priority to the interests of Quebec without, however, neglecting Ontario.

What I can tell the minister if he will not or cannot reply today, is that what concerns the hon. member for Laprairie and many others is the priority given to Quebec's interests. I want the minister to know this.

Another matter of great interest to Quebec is the confidential report submitted last September 29 to the federal Minister of Public Works, and since it concerns the famous Mirabel project, the Minister of Transport is certainly involved to a large extent. Has the minister seen this document, as I imagine he has, and would he care to comment on what I would call the nearly disastrous situation outlined to the Department of Public Works concerning Mirabel? Nearly all those who live or work there are shocked to see that the initial plan has yet to be carried out. There is much concern because of the amounts that would still be needed to improve all aspects of this project which was supposed to bring about great economic and social benefits and which has fallen far short of its goals. Could the minister comment briefly on this report if he has read it?

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Chairman, if my hon. colleague is referring to my department's report, I have indeed read it. I do not know whether there is another report. There may have been another on the peripheral zone, on Mirabel's cattle exporting potential. I do not know exactly what he is talking about, but my department has indeed produced a report, to which I have referred in the House, which deals with the situation at Mirabel, the reasons behind the problems.

There are reasons, the main one being Montreal. For reasons which would be too long for me to explain today—because I do not want to take up the hon. member's time—Montreal has simply not been as booming as one could have expected when the building of Mirabel was being considered. That often happens. Forecasters are wrong sometimes one way or another. For example, in Calgary, the department of the day was accused of lacking vision, and volume has increased twice as fast as forecast. What I mean essentially is that economic conditions explain the situation. There are some purely technological conditions, if you want. Aircraft are getting bigger and bigger and cover ever greater distances.

I saw a few days ago that Iberia, which used to route all its flights to Mexico via Montreal, has now routed part of its flights directly from Madrid to Mexico without going through Montreal. This is another one of the factors which have caused the expectations concerning Mirabel to fall through. Several departments are involved in this issue. The Minister of Public Works has a responsibility as concerns the peripheral lands, the Department of Agriculture has some responsibilities concerning the use of the airport for cattle exports, and there is a committee which regroups all of this.

I should perhaps say a few words about the Department of Transport report which I mentioned earlier. I said that the department is studying the factors which have brought about the present situation and that it then makes certain hypotheses. There are now seven scenarios, from moving only a few elements to moving the whole facilities, and each of these scenarios is then analysed on the basis of seven factors, such as passengers, cargo, carriers, and so on. This report should be made public in the next few weeks. The reason I have waited is that three aspects which I consider extremely important are not covered in this report. These are the costs for the passengers, the costs for the carriers and the costs for the governments. I thought that a study which did not cover these three elements left a lot to be desired. This will make up the second phase of this study, and this is what my department is now working on.

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Chairman, some time ago, following a speech made by the Secretary of State, a newspaper reported that after a commitment on the part of the Liberal caucus during the election campaign concerning the second phase of the project, the Secretary of State himself had abandoned this project, and I would like to know if he was stating the position of the minister and the government and whether it is true that the second phase, which included, I believe, an airport and a runway, will be definitely postponed as the newspapers have reported?

Mr. Pepin: No, Mr. Chairman, that is not true at all. Perhaps what was meant was—well I do not know what was meant, but the investigation is going on. The cost analysis concerning the three components that I mentioned earlier is going on. What we have done is to eliminate some of the possible scenarios that I mentioned earlier. We have kept only the first, which was the status quo, the sixth, which concerns the transfer of everything except the shorter routes, and the seventh which is a complete transfer. This has narrowed the analysis to be made and the study is now much more limited. It is within this more restricted context that we shall now know what the costs would be.

For my part, I do not know whether my colleagues think that I am too careful. Perhaps I am, but I have always been this way. I have not changed. However, I believe it is very important to make cost analyses, before making such vital decisions, because even though many people were willing three years ago to move everything from Dorval to Mirabel, many others are not. Many people would like Dorval to develop as it has been since the second year of the project. Before undertaking any move, the government wants to ensure that there will be some industrial development in the Dorval area to replace the people who will work elsewhere. This is what is going on and it takes a certain time; becoming impatient will not solve anything. I want to accommodate as many people as possible, but in such a matter, I believe that the public will agree that it is better to look twice before leaping.

The whole situation is undergoing a maturing process, a certain evolution. Of course, after what happened in the last few years at Dorval, if the plan continues, if new facilities are provided, the next few years will see new growth, new balance and, in the final analysis, people will not be perturbed to any great extent. At least, that is what I hope.

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Chairman, the minister is surely aware of some of the comments of the hon. member for the area who, for instance, is concerned about the delays, that long overdue development, the projects that could be integrated at Dorval, at Mirabel; he even wonders if the civil servants may not be somehow responsible for those delays. In light of the study on train services between Mirabel and Montreal, the future use of Dorval versus possible progress and changes at Mirabel, is the minister in a position, for instance, to indicate whether or not he intends to conduct public hearings at which all interested parties, in Montreal, and Mirabel, as well as probably all hon. members who are interested in the Mirabel project, can be heard, through his own committee or a special committee that could be instructed to look into the matter and see what changes are indicated? There is doubt about it: the viability of Mirabel is important to the government and, as a consequence, to the voters, the citizens. Can the minister tell us whether he would consider an open study of the matter to allow all those whom the project interests to comment on it and participate in it?

The Chairman: The time of the hon. member has now expired. If the minister wants to reply very briefly, he may do so.

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Chairman, the study is in progress. It is the type of question that could lend itself to open discussion once the study has been completed. With regard to the use of Mirabel, I would like to refer to the recent change that happened when First Air received the mandate to cover Ottawa-Mirabel, while Air Canada had only one daily service. First Air will have three round trips. This is the kind of optimal utilization the ministry is striving for in the case of Mirabel to improve utilization, to encourage people in Ottawa to use Mirabel when travelling abroad, to the Caribbean or elsewhere, so they will go there rather than elsewhere.

Mr. Roy: Mr. Chairman, I am pleased to take part in this debate on the estimates of the Department of Transport. The minister stated he wanted to add additional information to the matters raised by the hon. member for Joliette. I will give him later an opportunity to do so, because I also have certain questions for him.

I am amazed to see how eager the hon. member for Joliette was to get answers he already knows. It will be remembered that when he was minister for the northern region, wherein Mirabel lies, his remarks or press conferences earned him nothing more than a reputation as a minister for patronage, because he stated he was ensuring that people doing the census came from the Tory organization. Certainly everyone must remember that speech by the hon. member for Joliette. He looked more anxious to ensure that the people doing the federal 1981 census would be members of the Tory organization.

● (1750)

On his second contribution to this debate, Mr. Speaker, the member for Joliette is suggesting another public study, but as far as I am concerned it seems to me that we have had enough of them, and when the minister says that he is very careful, I can only agree with him about that.

However, I am quite conscious of the complex nature of the responsibilities of our Minister of Transport. He is responsible for maritime, air and land transportation in this country. I have had an opportunity to learn a bit about his activities when I was parliamentary secretary and at that time I had mentioned, like other colleagues, that the present structure of responsibilities within the Department of Transport which covers the field of air, maritime and land transportation, not to mention the Canadian Wheat Board, made it humanly and physically impossible to ask a minister to be responsible before the House for the management of all its activities and I have not changed my mind on this subject.

Mr. Chairman, we are speaking of the Department of Transport, of its activities. Because of its strategic location in the northeastern corner of North America, Montreal has become a natural hub of all modes of transportation: surface, rail, water, and air, both domestically and internationally. As member for Laval, in greater Montreal, I am convinced, having seen them speak in caucus, that all my colleagues agree we must take this opportunity to make the minister and his staff aware of our concerns as members of Parliament for the development of greater Montreal in the transport sector.

There are 80 million people in a 1,000 kilometre range around this city of three million residents. Because of its privileged position in eastern North America, Montreal has become one of the most industrialized and richest cities in America and since the beginning of aviation in this country, it has become the main port of entry to the rest of the country and the main jumping off point for Europe and the rest of the world. Air, marine, rail and road transport operators converge on the city to make it into an international transport centre. With that objective in mind, we Liberal members of that area will continue to call on the minister to ensure the development, as was mentioned earlier, of Mirabel international airport. Situated 1,500 kilometres from the ocean, the Montreal harbour allows large ocean going vessels to get to the heart of the continent; well situated at the head of the St. Lawrence Seaway, it controls all movements from the ocean to the Great Lakes.

World aviation capital, Montreal houses the seat of the International Civil Aviation Organization and the International Air Transport Association. Situated at the heart of the most travelled rail corridor in the country, Montreal is also where two transcontinental railway systems have their head offices. From all directions, major highways penetrate Montreal's urban fabric whose topography is criss-crossed by all sorts of expressways.

It is, therefore, recognizing Montreal's strategic importance in international transportation, that I rise tonight to speak in this debate. It is obvious that these characteristics were taken into account when the site of Mirabel airport was originally chosen. I do not intend to go over all the points that have been made thus far, but I would like to take this opportunity to find out in what direction Mirabel international airport is headed.

For months, not to say years, the members who are working at the regional level have studied several departmental papers to ensure the development of Mirabel. However, it seems to be almost impossible to know what direction will be taken. I was wondering this evening when the Minister of Transport was answering the member for Joliette and listing the number of departments involved at Mirabel if he does not think that the present structure was not too cumbersome. The minister said that when a decision concerning the peripheral areas of Mirabel was made the Department of Public Works had its say. When livestock exports are concerned, the Department of Agriculture gets in the act. The Department of Transport, as well as the Department of Finance, Treasury Board, etc. are, of course, involved in the development of Mirabel.

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, in light of the facts acquired after almost ten years of experience, while the economic context is different, that the planning and development schemes have been altered, but I feel that the structure is too cumbersome and that decisions are not taken because studies are multiplied and consequently Mirabel is endangered.

If the minister is willing to hear me, I would like to make a suggestion. Unlike the member for Joliette I will not refer once again to another public inquiry or anything else. The member of the area, Mr. Chairman, have been considering the problem for many months. Given the complexity of the structure and the fact that the Department of Public Works, the Department of Transport and the Department of Agriculture all have their say in any decision, I take this opportunity to suggest to the minister that we should lighten the structure, set up a board of directors at the airport who would be responsible to the Minister of Transport and would co-ordinate the activities of Mirabel, Dorval and Saint-Hubert. In addition, the board of directors at the airport would endeavour to develop the area and the trade at the industrial park of Pica. The board of directors would also be asked to organize step by step the implementation of the Mirabel plan. It is a suggestion I am making to the minister. The present organization seems to me to be extremely heavy. Decision-making takes an enormous amount of time and we now find ourselves in a dilemma. When a minister becomes responsible for the administration of the airport, new studies are undertaken and it causes further delay. I make that suggestion. The problems seem to have been identified.

I am thinking about the problem of transferring flights from Dorval to Mirabel, of completing the development of a road transport system, of rapid transit on rail or otherwise. I have made perhaps ten speeches in the House on the importance of developing roads to Mirabel. A very modern airport for passengers as well as cargo has been built, but there is no road system and the province of Quebec under a PQ administration does not have any confidence nor any interest in developing Mirabel. We have been told Mirabel did not rate as a priority. It seems to me it is up to us to ensure the development of a road system to try to improve the situation.

I should like to ask the minister a question about commuter trains. I am addressing the minister, Mr. Chairman. With regard to commuter trains, I asked in October what the policy of the Canadian government would be, while abiding by the fact that urban transportation comes under provincial jurisdiction. We have had the sad experience of the abandonment of road transportation, of CP rail service. The province of Quebec refused to take responsibility for providing service to users. Then the Quebec transport minister wrote to the CP Rail director once again to express pious thoughts, and not only was the service discontinued but after my conversation with CP Rail authorities, it was suggested that the Lakeshore service could also be discontinued in December if the provincial government, that is the government of Quebec, does not fulfil its responsibilities in that area. I should like the minister to tell us about his policy on the improvement of commuter train service.

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Chairman, I must say that to be able to make a comment on the administrative structure, on the structure the hon. member for Laval is suggesting for Mirabel, I should ask him first two questions: Does he suggest the establishment of an executive board or an advisory board? I have to know that. And I have to know what kind of source of financing he has in mind. What will be the financial responsibility of that board?

Mr. Roy: Mr. Chairman, I am pleased to answer that question. To me, that board should be administered somewhat like the National Harbours Board; it should be a kind of board of administrators with such powers that decisions would be a little closer, we would have a much closer centre of decision. I made that suggestion because it seems to me that as far as current structures are concerned, given the involvement of three or four departments in the decision-making process, the results we have seen so far fail to indicate that the present structure is the most efficient. There are some Crown corporations—I refer to schedule C—whose board of directors reports directly to the minister, and I am now thinking of a board like Canadair's, class C. That board has some powers and is directly responsible to the minister.

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Chairman, if the hon. member for Laval did not see the study the department made on airport management, that will demonstrate that great minds think alike because that study advocates something along the lines of the hon. member's suggestion. It even indicates how we could conciliate the local board with the management of the Department of Transport since the department must assume some reponsibilities for the security aspects, for example. According to this study, which proves that studies are sometimes very useful, the Department of Transport and that local board could share the responsibility and the authority. I could go on, but I will not. This study also shows how the financing could be shared, how some taxes could be earmarked for these airports and how the airport administration could raise funds to extend the runway, to build a roadway or a parking lot, which goes to prove that great minds think alike.

But the problem is that this study made by the department met with quite a bit of opposition in the country and it is interesting to note that it has a lot to do with psychology and culture. In some areas, people say that these airports—I am talking about Mirabel for instance—are too fraught with responsibility to be entrusted to ordinary people who are not qualified to assume these responsibilities. It is therefore very difficult for me to sell this policy by showing to what degree it is applied across Canada.

But to encourage the hon. member I would say that the second part of his speech is also very pertinent because some people suggested at the same time that it might be risky to entrust the local administration with this responsibility, that it might be advisable to establish the equivalent of the harbours board at the national level, with subsidiaries at the local level and this body would be the same across the country. That, I think, is what the hon. member for Laval was saying at the conclusion of his speech.

In any event, we will try that line of action with harbours. Because as I stated yesterday we have a document addressed to my colleagues in which we are trying to establish a structure which would consider the National Harbours Board as a strong super-corporation with mini-administrations in Montreal, Vancouver and elsewhere. We will test that system. We will see if the response of cabinet to this approach is positive and if its application to harbours can be extended to airports. I thank the hon. member for his contribution to our consideration and this area.

[English]

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Chairman, I am delighted to take the first opportunity I have had to participate in a debate of this sort. It gives one an opportunity to get into some of the problems which cannot really be dealt with in question period, for example, and it enables one to bring to the attention of the minister concerns which are better dealt with through an exchange across the floor rather than in correspondence. Correspondence can go on interminably.

It seems to me that one of the suggestions made in the speeches up to this point is that the minister had been expecting that nine months of Conservative government could have solved the problems created in the preceding 11 years. I think those of us who have had a few years in this House can remember the word "mess" being used in connection with the Department of Transport by one of the minister's own predecessors from that side of the House. So it is understandable that there are problems there.

I am wondering if the minister in his visits across the country in his ministerial jet was able to take a few minutes out to visit some of the airport facilities on his route, or whether he is rushed off by the staff through the side gate. I would like to ask the minister if in either the Kamloops or Victoria airports he has ever gone into the airport to examine the facilities.

Mr. Pepin: Certainly not in the aiports the hon. member has mentioned, no.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): That is unfortunate. I wonder, then, if he is aware that, aside from there being a study into the Victoria airport expansion, which has been going on for three or four years now—I hope he is aware of that—there is a problem between management of the airport and Air Canada and PWA with respect to the ticket counter and baggage-handling facility. Has the staff ever made the minister aware of this problem?

• (1810)

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Chairman, if the hon. member is suggesting that the minister get involved in such matters, he is either having some fun with me or he has not reflected on the matter. It is impossible for me to be kept informed on all the discussions with employees at the counters at all the airports in Canada. It is the job of the hon. member to bring such matters to my attention, whereupon I would be delighted to investigate for him. But for the life of me, I cannot visit all the airports and ports, large, medium or small, in the country. I have taken a sampling here and there. I would go nuts and be unable to do the job which is required of me as minister if I were to satisfy the apparent demands of the hon. member.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Is the minister aware of the development study with regard to expansion at Victoria international airport?

Mr. Pepin: I am aware that there is a plan for the airport and that it covers such areas as runways, terminals and so on. I am aware that the matter is being debated in the community and of the excellent discussions between my officials and the community. My officials have been praised for their part in the discussions with the community of Vancouver. If that is not the case, then it is the responsibility of the hon. member to tell me so.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): I am talking about Victoria international airport.

Mr. Pepin: I thought you were talking about Vancouver.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): I am talking about the Victoria airport, and I can see it in front of me as I speak. I will concede that perhaps the minister does not have a spare five minutes to view the terminal facilities when he arrives at an airport. We heard yesterday about a dash of some 300 feet from an air terminal to the aircraft. I wonder whether the minister realizes how far that is. Ottawa was a fine example up until two years ago, because we all had to go outside the building to get to the aircraft. I think I am correct in saying that Victoria is the only capital in Canada which does not have proper boarding facilities of a regular terminal design. I hope the minister will ask his staff to look carefully at the arrangements which are being made for Victoria.

I would like to put on record, so that his officials may look into the matter, the fact that there is a problem at the Victoria airport which could result in a strike, I refer to the handling of baggage from the ticket counter to the baggage-carrying belt. Perhaps it would serve the minister well if he were to take a commercial trip from time to time and go through some of the processes at Victoria international airport, or at Kamloops airport where the same problem exists. While in Kamloops a couple of months ago, I learned that the airport has a converted outhouse just outside the airport terminal which is used to house freight and unclaimed baggage. It is an absolute disgrace, as is the space available for the staff at that airport.

If I heard the minister correctly, he said at one point that $47 million has been made available for modernizing the radar system across Canada. Am I correct?

Mr. Pepin: You are being too modest. It is $147 million.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): And it is for modernization? I ask the minister what sort of radar is being used for this modernization. Is it the same type as that used at the Moncton area control centre?

Mr. Pepin: The hon. member is referring to JETS, the joint enroute terminal system. The first major installation has been established at Moncton, and there will be six more such installations across the country. It is a control system which connects with local systems.

What I was referring to is the radar program which is known as RAMP. I have indicated the price. The equipment is being developed now and we are trying to get the money from the usual source. The system should begin to be implemented by fiscal year 1984-85, and Victoria has a good position in those plans. The reason for the change is that the radar system in Canada is beginning to age. It has an average age of 20 years. It has been kept in excellent condition, which is typical of the Department of Transport; consequently, there is no hazard to safety, but the time has come to modernize the system, and that is what is taking place now.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): The minister mentioned the RAMS system. Is that an acronym?

Mr. Pepin: Yes. It stands for the radar modernization system.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): It is not a type of radar which involves installing JETS across the country in the six locations and elsewhere? Or is it just where terminal installations are required?

Mr. Pepin: JETS stands for the joint enroute terminal system. RAMP stands for radar modernization program. They are two different programs.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): So there is a program presently in progress to instal these JETS, the joint enroute terminal system; there is one installed in Moncton and five more to be installed. Is the minister aware of when these systems were developed, and how modern are they?

Mr. Pepin: I will have to get advice on that topic. Could the hon. member go on with other contributions?

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): My understanding is that they are obsolete, but I do not know why I should be giving the minister the answer to the question. I think I have just done so.

Mr. Pepin: That was not my intent. I merely wanted to ask my air adviser about the matter. On the general point, the debate among experts as to the quality of a particular piece of equipment is the same as the debate among experts on all other subjects. There are always people, and we read about it every day in the press, who will say that a certain piece of equipment is the greatest invention since sliced bread. Then others will attack that same piece of equipment as if it were of no use at all. There is a similar debate on the quality of the equipment purchased by the department, or by any other department for that matter.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): I am not talking about the quality of the equipment; I am talking about the obsolescence of the equipment and the technology that is involved. The minister should be aware that the equipment is at least 20 years old. I find it very strange that the department would continue with the installation of obsolete equipment while putting across to the general public the illusion that it is modernizing or bringing up to date the radar system across Canada. Is the minister prepared to comment on that point?

• (1820)

Mr. Pepin: I am not prepared to give advice on what is the best equipment. The department has a lot of qualified people for that particular purpose, and they have discussions. I take the advice of my officers on these matters. I am not competent to judge, nor do I know anybody in the cabinet who is, what is the best radar available in the market now. I really do not know what the member from Esquimalt-Saanich expects me to say at this particular moment. Does he want to say that I have personal views on this matter? I have none. I take the advice the air transportation administrator gives me when he says that this is the most modern piece of equipment available. We could have a debate on the importance of rail compared to buses, or buses compared to airlines, or big jets compared to STOL aircraft, and so on and so forth.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): I think we were talking about radar. I wonder whether the minister could tell us to which corporation the contract was given to develop this system for installation.

Mr. Pepin: It has not been given. I have also received correspondence from Raytheon to the effect that they should be given the contract without competition, but this is not the view of the department, and this is being attended to now.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Perhaps the minister could tell us whether CAE Electronics is in this operation in any form.

Mr. Pepin: Well, that sort of proves the point I was making, that another company feels it should be given this contract, I understand, almost automatically. Others would like to participate in it too and, of course, this is what is happening now. It will be an open tender.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Will it be given to those who have expertise in the development of radar equipment, or will it be given to those who have been developing simulator equipment for training pilots? I wonder whether the minister is aware of that part of it.

Mr. Pepin: If I were aware of all these questions I would be senior air adviser. I am sorry, but my hon. friend is old enough, he is experienced, he is a former diplomat, he is a great intellectual, he is a great thinker, and so on and so forth, and he knows very well that there is no minister on earth who can explore and find out all about the different pieces of radar equipment. The answer is that there is an interdepartmental committee involved in ensuring open competition and that all developments and purchases are in accord with government policies and practices.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Does the minister become involved in this committee once it has decided what it is going to do, or does the minister have any say whatsoever in this?

Mr. Pepin: I would not care to give advice to Mr. McLeish on which of the radar systems would give the best bang for the buck in Canada at this time. Really I am at loss to find out what the role of a minister is. I read MacGregor Dawson and he tells me on page so-and-so that the minister should not be an expert. I do not want to teach political science to my hon. friend. I am not supposed to be an expert. I am not going to say, "Hey, McLeish, buy this radar, it is the one I like", because it is red or blue or whatever it is. Is that the role of a minister, according to my hon. friend?

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): I wonder if the minister has ever been brought up to date on some of the problems confronting air traffic controllers at Victoria international airport? Is he aware, for example, that within the last six months there have been near misses reported at the rate of at least one a month? I also hope he is aware—if he is not, he has not been listening to my question—that there is no radar in use at Victoria international airport.

Mr. Pepin: I am certainly aware of it because my hon. friend has taken very good care to make me aware of it. As to the radar system, he asks me the question every time he sees me—on elevators and everywhere. So how can I not be obsessed by it? I have consulted people who know about these things and they have assured me, on a stack of Bibles, that Victoria is not in trouble now, that the service is covered from Vancouver, that the distance is not an abnormal one, and that this is done in all other civilized parts of the world. There is nothing abnormal about it. I keep repeating that to my hon. friend, and he keeps not believing what is being said.

On the subject of misses, near misses, separation, or whatever you want to call it, he brings all of these cases to my attention. I pass the information on. The department makes inquiries, surveys, analyses, investigations, and what-not, on location. I am assured that this is not the case. I pass on the news to my hon. friend who keeps not believing what he is being told. Maybe that is why he was such a distinguished ambassador. He never believes what he sees but prefers to go and find out for himself. So, be my guest. Is there anything else I can humanly do to satisfy his curiosity? Am I not being responsible in what I am doing?

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): I hope on the next visit to Victoria international airport the minister does not have a near miss. Has he had any feedback from his officials, from Mr. McLeish or anyone else, about aircraft going into Victoria international airport through parachutists—through 20 or 30 parachutists?

Mr. Bockstael: Mr. Chairman, that report was verified. I read it. Radar would not pick up parachutists, even if we had radar that was operating at that time. That question from the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich has been brought up several times. The term "near-miss" is an expression used by the media. There is great variance between what a civilian considers a near miss and the certain minimal loss of separation that is required to be reported to Transport Canada.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): I would like to ask the minister one final question with regard to civilians. One of these incidents was reported by an RCMP officer, and I think his testimony could be relied upon. I suggest to the parliamentary secretary that parachutes and parachutists do not grow up out of the ground; they are dropped from aircraft. The aircraft, at least, would be picked up by radar if radar were being used. These were American parachutists and they were over American soil. Why is there no co-ordination in that area, particularly on a flight path? I think this situation is worth inquiring into. Why is there no co-ordination with Vancouver when there is going to be a parachute drop on the flight path to Victoria international airport, which is presumably controlled by Vancouver? Why is there no co-ordination between Vancouver and the military in the United States which are going through an exercise? Has there been no report on that? If there has, why has it not been made public?

Mr. Pepin: I am sure there is such co-ordination between the United States authorities and Canada.

I just want to say I am sorry I showed a bit of impatience a moment ago. It is part of the exercise, presumably; I apologize. What made me a bit impatient is that I thought I had done my job in these matters. I had brought these situations to the attention of the officials who had conducted the inquiry in the Victoria situation. I remember regularly signing correspondence to my hon. friend on these matters. I want to philosophize for half a second. It is strange the way things are seen. The last time I was in Victoria—which was in recent times—I forgot to go and see the radar system. I must say I regret that, though I would not have understood it anyway.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): It is not there. There is no radar.

Mr. Pepin: I remember the baggage tray located outside the airport. I thought it was beautiful. I thought it was remarkably poetic, pretty, useful, convenient and what-not. I took it that the assumption was that it never rained in Victoria, and I regretted not having accepted an invitation some years ago to teach there.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): I was not talking about that.

• (1830)

Mr. Pepin: I thought you were talking about baggage facilities.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Yes, but behind the baggage counter.

Mr. Pepin: That is what I am talking about. If that is not what the hon. member is talking about, I am sorry.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order, please. I did permit a last question, but with the news that the question and answer are dissociated from one another, I have no choice but to recognize the hon. member for The Battlefords-Meadow Lake.

Mr. Anguish: Mr. Chairman, I have a number of questions I would like answered. These concern the closure of express offices throughout Canada. There was an article in The Globe and Mail on November 18, 1980, which reported a decision of CN Express to close about half its 70 terminals in Canada, many before the end of 1981, starting with 15 express terminals in the Atlantic region.

I have a letter with me from employees of CN Express in Nova Scotia in which they express their concern at the reduction of about 40 per cent of the services. This will result in the loss of 254 jobs in the maritime provinces alone and over 1,100 jobs across Canada. At the same time someone from Newfoundland phoned me. He was concerned about what was happening to the rail service in that province and its turnover to Terra Nova Transport, the company now responsible for rail services in Newfoundland.

My first question is this. When the ten-year period is up—the amount of time which was given by a previous minister of transport, the Hon. Otto Lang, to prove whether the rail service in Newfoundland was a profitable venture or not—will the rail service be pulled out completely? What will happen to the fellow who called me with 35 years' seniority in CN? Will he be out of a job along with many others? At the end of the ten-year period which Mr. Lang talked about when he was minister of transport, will you reassess the situation and look at the service which is called for under section 262 of the Railway Act, or will you close down the rail system in Newfoundland?

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Chairman, I welcome this participation. I meant to speak about the railway situation in Newfoundland in my opening remarks but I did not finish my remarks because of the time limit. The hon. member for Regina West knows all about the railway and he is always on track.

Mr. Anguish: Don't use my time on him.

Mr. Pepin: If my memory serves me correctly, the Sullivan report came out in 1977. One of its recommendations was the elimination of the railways in Newfoundland, not because that board did not like railroads, but because the railroads did not fit into the transportation system. Since then there have been a number of debates and federal-provincial meetings. There have been only a few in the last year or so because of the two elections, among other reasons. However, the officials were still in contact, but the warmth of the relationship was not as good as that which normally exists.

A few weeks ago I went to St. John's. I met the premier and the minister of transport for that province. We had a very good conversation. I tried to sell him the idea of trade-offs. This idea of trade-offs is in the Sullivan report. One of the fears provinces have, particularly in the east, is that the federal government will not continue to support them financially as well as they have in the past. My hon. friend is aware of the tremendous sums of money which go into the subsidization of transportation in the Atlantic provinces.

The idea is to create a transportation envelope, a sum of money going from Ottawa to province X. The province, then being assured of that minimum sum of money, could then begin to allocate money, in consultation with the federal government, to the best form of transportation for the province. That is the philosophy. In other words, envelope, trade-off, multimodal and so forth.

That is the notion I was trying to sell to the province of Newfoundland. In that context, knowing that the money which goes to the railway now would not be lost, it might be that the province could look at transformation or maintenance in a slightly different light. Anyway, that was my purpose. I was trying to convince the authorities in Newfoundland to accept a five-year global transportation plan and a five-year railway plan, with an experimental phase to find out whether the railway was a viable proposition. It was with the thought that, if the province itself realized that it was not a viable proposition, the money would not be lost; it could be used to build roads, buy buses, or whatever.

An hon. Member: So much for your energy program.

Mr. Pepin: It is debatable which is more costly, a full bus or an empty train. Officials have met since that time. I have not had a report because I have been too busy here. In any event, this exercise will be continued in the coming weeks.

Mr. Anguish: Mr. Chairman, I take it that we will not know what is to happen when the ten-year period is up, as announced by the Hon. Otto Lang. He said that the rail service would terminate under Terra Nova Transport. However, I am still concerned about the closure of the CN Express stations across Canada. I have mentioned the people who will be losing their jobs in the maritime provinces. At the same time, I am also concerned about western Canada.

Prior to the announcement on November 18, as reported in The Globe and Mail, I knew that the express station in The Battlefords community in which I reside had closed on October 24. Even after much protest from the community and from myself as a member of Parliament, the station closed. We asked for a hearing to be held. We made reference to section 262 of the Railway Act. We mentioned the erosion of services in the area over the past number of years. We wanted all of this looked into very closely. If I look back over the years I have lived in The Battlefords-Meadow Lake area, which is a part of western Canada, I have seen the rail service deteriorate, even in my young years. The constituency of The Battlefords-Meadow Lake covers over one-third of the geographic area of the province. There is no point in the constituency where you can have rail passenger service. The train goes through there, but there is no passenger service at any point in the constituency. There is no mobile operator in The Battlefords. There is one mobile operator in the Meadow Lake area. Then we had the closure of the CN Express station in The Battlefords. There is no service at all in The Battlefords-Meadow Lake constituency from rail, other than for the movement of grain, which has not been very effective either in past years. There is a story of plugged grain elevators from Medstead to Robinhood, Meadow Lake and many other points in the constituency. I am concerned about this.

My next question on this erosion and closure of service is whether this is because the service is too costly to upgrade and keep in place. Are these closures a money saving item, or are they because of the bad service provided by the railways in the past. Which of those two is it?

Mr. Pepin: With regard to CN Express, Mr. Chairman, I have already answered a number of questions today and on previous days. I emphasize that even if money was an important consideration, it was not the only one. It may not even have been the most important. However, the money aspect is there. CN Express lost $14 million in 1970. It is now losing $57 million or $58 million yearly. If it goes on, it will lose more and more money. I explained that this afternoon. As I said earlier, because of the nature of the beast, being relatively heavy in administrative terms, it is not in a position to compete with smaller operators, operations of ten guys with five trucks. They can operate faster, working weekends, off hours and so on.

Mr. Benjamin: CN used to do it, and they quit.

Mr. Pepin: The argument being made is an understandable one. In any event, they are not in a position to compete because the smaller companies can specialize, carrying smaller parcels and so on. CN decided to get out of this area while continuing with larger shipments. There is a technical word which escapes me at the moment—less than carload, I am told. We are witnessing the consequences of this.

Some people will lose their jobs. I stated previously that CN Express has guaranteed that up to 90 per cent of those affected by these moves will be pre-pensioned, relocated or retrained. They are going out of their way to act in a humanitarian fashion.

Mr. Anguish: Will 1,100 people across Canada be retrained and put in other jobs?

Mr. Pepin: Yes. CN says they are guaranteeing the employment of all those people.

Mr. Anguish: Can you promise those 1,100 people they will not lose their jobs?

Mr. Pepin: I am repeating the guarantee CN has given to the union which, by the way, is co-operating in this. The president of the union is co-operating with CN Express.

Mr. Anguish: He is not very happy with 1,100 people losing their jobs.

Mr. Pepin: I am saying that co-operation with the union is a fact. The hon. member can verify that if he wants. The 90 per cent figure is one that CN used in a communique they issued on this matter. The biggest problem, accepting the fact that employment is an important one, is with the communities. A number of communities feel they will be affected too harshly by this. Discussions are now going on. This afternoon I raised the question as to whether it would be possible for CN Express to maintain one point in Prince Edward Island, to establish a slightly different kind of relationship between Moncton, which will be the headquarters for CN Express operations in the maritimes, and Halifax, Sydney, and so on. This is the sort of adjustment which is now taking place.

Mr. Anguish: I thank the minister for that reply. I have a couple of questions following up on that. Will the minister agree that the services I describe to places such as The Battlefords have decreased over the years? Second, does he relate the closure of the express stations to an expenditure item, the fact that the railways will save money? I would like to know how money would be saved by the closure of express stations. The minister must keep in mind it cannot be a total saving. Other carriers have to be paid, such as Kindersley Transport which does the interlining in the area of Saskatchewan I represent. How much money will be saved? Does the minister agree there has been an erosion of service over the years?

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Chairman, in all of these discussions there is a bit of a philosophical base. The hon. member appears to believe the government should play a major role in all of these matters. He has been well trained by the hon. member for Regina West in believing that section 262 of the Railway Act orders the railways to deliver wherever in the country there is something to be sent. That has been contradicted by the Supreme Court, yet the hon. member for Regina West will believe it "until death do us part". This is the debate.

What happens when CN Express leaves a community because it cannot compete as it operates differently than it used to, is that somebody picks up the work. It may not be the same person who gets the work. That is why CN is offering pre-pensioning and relocation. However, the work does not disappear. Somebody else does it. It is no longer the Government of Canada through CN Express. That is why so much of the debate is in the minds of the two members. I do not believe the Government of Canada has to do it all directly. If the private sector can do a job as well and cheaper, why not?

Mr. Anguish: Will the minister please answer how much money will be saved by closing the express stations as opposed to bringing in by carrier? What is the dollar saving? There was a meeting in the Battlefords with Mr. Dawson of Winnipeg who told us that a great deal of money will be saved. He stated that the reason for closing the express stations was to cut the deficit of CN. How much money will be saved?

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Chairman, I do not know exactly how much money will be saved in the Battlefords. However, the general impression I have gained is that there will be a reduction in losses when the program is complete. I am advised $50 million. I do not know exactly what these figures mean. I would like a bit more discussion on this subject. The figure I have in mind is $57 million, and increasing. Presumably CN Express hopes that by getting out of small parcels and remaining in the less than carload trade, it can cut its losses. Because it hopes to cut losses, it is in a position to be rather generous to its employees who will be affected by this move. As I said, the employees will be pre-pensioned, relocated or retrained. I have repeated ad nauseam that the information I have is that up to 90 per cent of those affected will be so treated. It is difficult to stop the world, to prevent change or transformations from taking place. This is one of them. CN Express is trying to do it in as responsible a fashion as possible.

Mr. Anguish: I think I have time for one final question. I sincerely believe there is a problem. We understand the railways are losing money. With the loss of passenger service, express service and mobile operators, all the railways will do is haul grain, and they do not do that very efficiently. Will the minister, under section 262 which he referred to and the member from Regina West referred to, hold a hearing in the Battlefords area into the lack of services not only for the Battlefords but for places like St. Walburg, Turtleford, Medstead and Meadow Lake to see what the people in those areas have to say and what their concerns are about the loss of services? The area is going through an economic boom right now. They are into heavy oil, they are into mining. It is an area of the country that is developing. We need better rail service and not a deterioration of that service. Will the minister consider holding a hearing in The Battlefords-Meadow Lake constituency, preferably in the Battlefords, so that the people there can express their concerns to the minister and to the Canadian Transport Commission?

● (1850)

Mr. Pepin: The Canadian Transport Commission knows what it has to do. I do not have to give them instructions on these matters. I will not contradict myself to the point of asking the Transportation Commission to do that. I have been standing on the floor of the House today, and last week, defending what CN Express is doing. Since they cannot compete, they want to get out of the transportation of small parcels rather than defend the way they are doing it. It will have to take place.

As a general proposition, CN are not in business to lose money. They have CN Express, on which they always lose money, so they want to lose less money so they can pay the Government of Canada better dividends next year than they were able to pay last year. That is what I meant when I talked about CN being both a business and a responsibility. This is where the balancing act takes place, and no one has written a description of that because it varies from one circumstance to the other. If CN find out that there are a number of things they do not do well and others that they do better, then they should do what they do best.

Mr. Collenette: It is somewhat novel for me to be speaking on a matter of substance rather than procedure or points of order, or questions on the order paper. It reminds me of the old days when I was vice-chairman of the transport committee. I want to inform the House, for those who do not realize it, that the members of the transport committee, over the years, have worked very well together and basically co-operated with one another on a very non-partisan basis. I would draw the attention of hon. members to the fact that the member for Vegreville, the former minister of transport, the member for Regina West, and the member for Dartmouth-Halifax East are here. All of us worked together on a non-partisan basis to improve passenger rail service in this country.

I am not that immodest that I would not take credit along with those individuals I have mentioned for the fact that VIA Rail was created in 1977 at the behest of myself and other members of that committee who have been concerned about the deterioration of passenger rail services, for years and years. I think that credit must be given where it really falls, and that is to all members of this House who have supported passenger rail. I might say to hon. members, Mr. Chairman, and to the minister, because he was not here between 1974 and 1979 when we had that really tough fight to get passenger rail service re-established, that it was a tough fight. It was a fight that was won, over the resistance of people within the Department of Transport.

I commend the minister's predecessor, Mr. Lang, and those senior officials in his department who recognized that the formation of a totally dedicated passenger rail corporation would be in the best long-term interests of this country, and was long overdue. I commend to the minister certain parts of the speeches made by the hon. member for Vegreville and the hon. member for Regina West on the subject of VIA Rail, and I can say to him that I share some of their concerns.

I share the concern of the hon. member for Regina West about the unenviable position VIA Rail was put into when it was first started, in that it had to take CP and CN equipment which was not maintained properly or well. In the case of CP it was in an absolutely disastrous state. The locomotives were so run down that I believe many of them were actually written off. And we expected a passenger rail corporation to do a credible job! I think Mr. Roberts and the people at VIA Rail have done an excellent job over the last three years, but they are going to need a lot of help from all hon. members on this side of the House because, as the hon. member for Vegreville pointed out, with the escalating energy costs and with the shortage of oil something must become apparent to the government and the officials in the Department of Transport. It certainly has been the case with me for many years.

What must become apparent is that the future for transporting large numbers of people in this country has to be passenger rail in the corridor areas. I know that the government gave about $200 million to VIA for the purchase of the new LRC equipment which will be coming on-stream next year but, with all due respect, that is not enough.

Mr. Benjamin: Right on.

Mr. Collenette: Mr. Roberts, the president of VIA Rail, wrote a letter to me. I have regular correspondence with him. We should write a book. I try to keep up my interest in passenger rail, and I have the letter here. I have Mr. Roberts' permission to make this public, and at the end of my remarks I propose to have it appended to Hansard, if there is the unanimous consent of the House. Some of the things Mr. Roberts says in his letter are quite startling and contrary to the given line—when I say the "given line", I say that with all due respect—by the department over the years as to why we cannot have in this country a truly rapid, viable, passenger rail service in the corridor. I will not read the letter now because I hope I will get the consent of hon. members to append it to Hansard—

Mr. Benjamin: Agreed.

Mr. Collenette: —but the president of VIA Rail talks in terms of plans which are now on the drawing board of VIA Rail. VIA Rail would like to realize within the next five years a travel time between Quebec and Montreal of one hour and fifty minutes; Montreal and Ottawa, one hour; Ottawa to Toronto, two hours and forty minutes; Toronto to Windsor, two hours and thirty minutes; and Montreal to Toronto, three hours and forty minutes. This is the first time I can recall that the president of VIA Rail has actually been pinned down to the fast service members of this House have been advocating for years.

In his letter Mr. Roberts went on to explain to me how this is to be done. It is to be done largely through a solely passenger dedicated track operating from Quebec City right through to Windsor. This involves using part of the special tunnel in Montreal, the Mount Royal tunnel, and negotiations have to be undertaken with the railways. It involves using the CP line from Vankleek Hill, which I understand was built about 80 or 90 years ago by Canadian Pacific to take trains, in those days, at speeds of up to 95 or 100 miles an hour and which has been allowed by that railway to become run down over the years. Only one train runs over it just to keep the company's options open. I think that is "The Canadian" passenger service which has now been taken over by VIA Rail. That goes through Vankleek Hill, Ontario. That is one aspect.

The other aspect would be going through Smiths Falls, and we all know about that problem. It is absolutely ludicrous to visitors to this country who take rail between Ottawa and Toronto. It is fine from Toronto to Brockville, but then they have to be switched. It takes about half an hour to switch them on to the track. I believe it is a CP track to Smiths Falls. I may have it the wrong way around, but the track between Brockville and Smiths Falls has a slow order of 25 miles an hour on it because the track is so rotten. I have been stuck on that train many a night. I do not know whether the tracks have seized up, or the trains have seized up.

I think that not to have the nation's capital lined by rail to the second largest city in the country is indeed unfortunate, and something which I am sure the minister will correct, because I have talked with the minister here and there about these concerns, and I know that he really would like to see an improvement. It must be seen within the context of my remarks that I note good faith on the part of the minister and the government in trying to improve passenger rail.

Mr. Roberts also talks about building a new 60 kilometres line to link Smiths Falls with Belleville. That would be a completely new track. It would join the main line and then go right to Toronto.

I do not really want to make too much of a speech because I would like the minister to reply, and I am sure he is making notes of some of the things I say. On the main line a few years ago there was a special run of the Turbo at 142 miles an hour. That was clocked going through Kingston. Admittedly, Department of Transport personnel were involved in the test. All the crossings were closed off. It was done at a quiet time of day, but I submit that if that could have been done three or four years ago under very strict supervision, we do not have to bury all the underpasses and we do not have to build bridges and involve astronomical costs to make the main line truly viable.

I became frustrated in the Standing Committee on Transport when I heard people from the department and Mr. Lang at the time, saying it would cost half a billion dollars or a billion dollars to improve this section of track. That does not seem to be the case, because I think that with the appropriate crossings and signalling equipment we can run trains much faster.

One specific thing I would like the minister to answer is who it is who determines that no train can run more than 95 miles an hour along that stretch of track when, in the test run a few years ago, a train was clocked at about 142 miles an hour. I asked Mr. Benson a few years ago because I was always told by the minister—I am not talking about the present minister but the former minister—that the CTC was the one. The railway said it was the CTC. I talked to Mr. Benson in committee, and he said, "No, it is the railways". I would like to find out who is responsible for artificially limiting the speed of passenger trains on the main passenger rail line in this country.

Mr. Roberts also mentioned the fact that the corridor service is not limited to Quebec-Windsor. It also involves Edmonton to Calgary. I understand that there are discussions under way with the Alberta government on building a high-speed demonstration track between Edmonton and Calgary. It would be cheaper than building a new four-lane highway, with all the extra costs involved.

If it is agreeable—I know I cannot table documents other than those pertaining to official government business in my role with the Privy Council—I will ask for the unanimous consent of the House to append Mr. Roberts' letter to me of October 29, 1980, to Hansard.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: The House has heard the suggestion made by the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council to the effect that he be permitted to append the document he has in his hand to today's Hansard. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: So ordered.

[Editor's Note: For text of above letter see appendix.]

Mr. Collenette: I hope I get the letter back because I did not make a copy before I came here. I am sure I will because it will be in Hansard. I think the comments in Mr. Roberts' letter will be beneficial to the minister and all members of this House. As I say, I have the permission of Mr. Roberts to make that letter public.

I want to deal with another aspect just briefly, and to throw out an idea. I am not an expert on western Canada, and I defer to those hon. members here from western Canada who know their region best, but the government announced a $4 billion western development fund in the budget.

Mr. Benjamin: That is after you take out eleven.

Mr. Collenette: One of the premises involved is that, by virtue of the fact that more moneys will be accruing to the federal government, the oil and gas industry will in a sense be channelling money into this western development fund. The federal government has undertaken that, with the excess revenues it will get, there will be a $4 billion fund. I am in favour of that because one of the things I fervently believe in is Canadianization of the oil and gas industry.

I throw this out as a novel idea. It may get me into trouble, but I have been in trouble in the past, and I am not worried about that. I think it might be a good idea to look at it. If we expect the oil and gas industry to contribute a higher amount of moneys accruing from oil and gas—and I agree with that—then perhaps we should also—and I am sure Mr. Ian Sinclair will quiver or quake when I say this—look at the fact that Canadian Pacific was granted enormous land titles a hundred years ago. Yes, it was private capital which built that railway, but it was back here every year to John A. Macdonald and his successors, cap-in-hand saying, "Give us some more money".

I think Canadian Pacific International, Canadian Pacific Investments, CPR or whatever its official title is—I know there are a number of companies—is a great standard bearer for Canada throughout the world. I have great respect for Mr. Sinclair as an individual, and for the members of that company, but it seems to me that if we are to ask the oil and gas industry to pay a royalty back to western Canada and to Canadians in general—I suppose that is what we are doing with the extra money coming from that—then perhaps we should also look at the fact that it is long overdue for the people of this country to receive a dividend from the land we gave Canadian Pacific a hundred years ago. I think a good case could be made that that kind of dividend should be paid to the people of Canada.

I know that CPR is investing heavily in electrification and in other improvements to its track. I fully accept its plans, and I think they are made in good faith, but CP has been a successful company. I should leave a few minutes for the minister to respond. I think this might be an idea which might be worth the government's consideration.

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. The hon. member has made some points about the CPR. I wonder if he knows that in addition to 34 million acres of land and hundreds of millions of dollars, Canadian Pacific owes the people of Canada $1 billion in deferred taxes, that that is why CP is making a profit, and that that is why it appears to the hon. member to be successful.

Mr. Blaikie: An excellent point of order.

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Chairman, I will comment on that last remark. This subject is a popular one, as my friend the parliamentary secretary knows. It was the object of a resolution at the Winnipeg Liberal convention. An investigation into what CP has done with all the money it received way back is a popular subject.

I understand that CP has been investigated a number of times. Whoever made the decision came out with a balanced judgment that yes, indeed, CP received great favours and yes, indeed, it served Canada well, so perhaps there is a need for another one of those. I do not know.

On the subject of rail, the parliamentary secretary reminded us that the government created VIA and supported it strongly through the first two or three years. I said this morning that it was a bit too early to conclude, but I did recite a number of the good things VIA is doing now and pointed out the great aspirations the government has that it will continue to pursue. I spoke yesterday about load factors, lower losses than anticipated, and all that, so I do not want to repeat it.

With respect to Mr. Roberts' letter I will read it with great pleasure, I am quite sure, because I want to know if he has estimated what will be needed in order to reach the high speeds on the line mentioned. When my hon. friend asked who makes the decisions as to what speeds can be reached—is it the CTC, the government or VIA—I felt like shouting "the bed". The bed of the track itself decides what speed can be reached, because I presume this is what gives out first. I questioned Mr. Marsham on the subject, and he tells me that our railway beds in Canada are freight beds. They were built for freight and not for passengers, as opposed to the beds in Europe. I am talking always about railway beds, not ordinary beds, in Europe, for example, or in Japan.

• (1910)

In Japan, the bullet train runs very rapidly on a specialized passenger railway bed, be that as it may. What the minister sees in all that, just to be confidential for a minute, is the competition. We had an expression of that yesterday when the hon. member for Regina West said he believes the Minister of Transport should help only the railways.

Mr. Benjamin: I did not say that.

Mr. Pepin: The hon. member said it in committee, and I am quoting him with a smile on my face because I know the hon. member for Regina West was making his point with a slight exaggeration. However, there is competition between the different modes of transportation. Each of them thinks the other one has more advantages. That is what they have in common. I received representations from owners of bus companies who have said, "What the heck are you doing spending some $420 million on railway transportation when we, the people operating the buses have no subsidies whatsoever?"

Mr. Benjamin: Highways.

Mr. Pepin: Yes, that is the kind of discussion that could start now. All I want to do is to make this one observation. I think that theory will not carry you very far in these matters. It seems to me that we must save the best of railway transportation and occasionally move to STOL, notwithstanding some opposition to it, because it is a mode of transportation which is convenient in certain localities and for certain tasks.

Mr. Benjamin: In the right place.

Mr. Pepin: Yes, indeed. I just want to say on this occasion that I am not being theoretical. I think there is a balancing act between the different modes of transportation in Canada. With respect to railways, I want to say that I am almost as romantic on the subject as are my friends.

I am the son of a railway employee who worked for 45 years in Drummondville, Quebec. It is almost unbelievable that the CN tracks go right through the town of Drummondville. They will be coming up for a relocation program one of these days. The CP goes the other way. The house where my parents lived was right in between those two, so we were woken up in the mornings by the sound of locomotives. One could say I was born with smoke in my nose, and perhaps that has something to do, although quite remotely, with the fact that I became Minister of Transport, which is obviously the climax so far as I am concerned.

Mr. McKenzie: Mr. Chairman, I wish to discuss, in the minister's estimates, the Sherbrook-McGregor overpass, and to call on him once again to reimburse the city of Winnipeg for $2.5 million for the cost overrun which is the direct responsibility of the federal government.

I wish the minister would listen because this is a rather important matter. It is the Sherbrook-McGregor overpass. I am once again calling on the minister to reimburse the city of Winnipeg for $2.5 million which is the direct responsibility of the federal government for delaying the permit which was originally to be issued between December, 1978, and February, 1979.

I want to quote from a letter which the minister wrote to the mayor of Winnipeg this week, which was received only a couple of days ago. I will not read the whole letter. In the letter the minister points out that the city made a request in 1977 for a permit and for financial aid in the building of a structure to span the CPR railyards, which is the Sherbrook-McGregor overpass. Mr. Otto Lang, the former minister of transport, realized that if he were to approve such a grant on a simple application for funds, he would forever after be subject to criticism for making this serious and locally significant funding decision without knowledge of the cost of the alternatives, and one example is rail relocation.

As I pointed out to the minister before, $1,100,000 worth of studies had been done prior to December, 1978. Here is one of them, and I suggest the minister read it sometime to see all the work that has been put into studying railway relocation and the overpass. There is no need for any more studies, and I will be covering that in a little more detail in a moment.

In the minister's letter to the mayor, he also stated:

> Consequently, he replied that it would be normal to consider the approval of a grade separation grant only after having assurances that the alternatives had been investigated to the extent that would support the decision being requested. The response on the alternatives containing the basic decision factors was not provided by the city.

That is a false statement. The city was not asked to provide any additional information, and I will refer to the dates in just a moment.

The letter goes on to read:

> As a result, the federal government was required to undertake its own study to assign a cost to the rail relocation options before taking the decision to fund the construction of the bridge. I must advise you that in this situation the federal government cannot accept any additional financial responsibilities.

That is for the cost overrun. The city of Winnipeg has good grounds to sue the federal government if the department does not reimburse it for $2.5 million. I will go into the chronology of events right now. What is disturbing to me is that the man who is aware of the chronology of events and of all the details, is the gentleman sitting to the minister's right, his parliamentary secretary who was on the city council at the time when all of this was happening. He knows all about it. He knows perfectly well that the contents of the minister's letter to the mayor are incorrect.

I will go into the chronology of events to bring the minister up to date. By December, 1978, the then minister of transport, Otto Lang, had approved the construction of the overpass, and his approval was to be forwarded to the CTC for its approval. The $7.6 million in initial costs of the federal share was approved as well. Design work would have begun immediately and construction could have commenced two or three months later. Mr. Lang was ready to give authority to CTC to issue the permit, and design work could have been started immediately. But, as the minister well knows, it was owing to the interference of the present Minister of Employment and Immigration who put pressure on Mr. Lang that the permit was withheld. Otto Lang was ready to issue it, and he did not ask the city of Winnipeg for any further studies.

On December 6, 1978, Mr. Lang telegraphed the mayor of Winnipeg saying that the federal government was giving its approval in principle for the construction of the Sherbrook-McGregor overpass, funds to be provided under UTAP. On December 20, 1978, the mayor sent an acknowledgment to Mr. Lang expressing his delight that the overpass had finally been given approval. The mayor then asked for details on how to proceed with the project, but there was never any correspondence, telegrams, or anything else saying that they wanted an additional study from the city of Winnipeg. The hon. member for St. Boniface, who is sitting beside the minister, knows that only too well.

On February 7, 1979, Mr. Lang replied that there was little to do. All that was needed was an agreement from the province that a portion of the UTAP money would be assigned to the Sherbrook-McGregor overpass. On February 16, 1979, Mr. Mercier, the attorney general of Manitoba, wrote to Mr. Lang and confirmed that the 1979 budget included the provincial portion. This project was given top priority by the province in its 1979 budget. So there was no request at all for a further study which the minister wanted from the city.

I will now ask the minister to make an apology to the city of Winnipeg, in writing, for the contents of his letter. The information contained there is incorrect. The department never asked for any further study to be done, and I am asking the minister once again to reimburse the city.

● (1920)

If the minister has any evidence or proof that he sent any letters, telegrams or anything to the city of Winnipeg requesting a further study in December of 1978, it is the minister's obligation to produce that documentation. I was in touch with the mayor's office today and was told that they have never received such a request from the minister, his official, or whoever was in charge of the department at that time. As I indicated previously, the mayor was happy that Mr. Otto Lang was to issue a permit and give Winnipeg the funds to proceed with the needed overpass. They never received any request for a further study. I challenge the minister to produce the documentation.

We all know why there was a delay of the permit. It was caused by the present Minister of Employment and Immigration who was then a member of the Manitoba legislature. I refer to an article which appeared in a Winnipeg newspaper in December, 1978. It was headed: "Local lobbying stalls funding for new bridge". It had nothing to do with asking the city to conduct another study. The caption under the minister's photograph read: "Lloyd Axworthy . . . wins round". In part the article indicated:

> Lobbying by Liberal MLA Lloyd Axworthy . . . has killed, or at least stalled, special federal funding for the Sherbrook-McGregor overpass.
> Deputy Mayor Bill Norrie said Tuesday federal Transport Minister Otto Lang told him in effect that the city's request for $3.9 million in special funding has been turned down.

This was because of the interference of the hon. member for Winnipeg-Fort Garry; it had nothing to do with the city not conducting another study.

Also I should like to point out to the minister and the hon. member for St. Boniface some of the comments made in the Manitoba legislature about this chain of events. As reported in the Winnipeg Free Press on April 29, 1980, a Manitoba MLA called "the myth of rail line relocation . . . one of the cruelest hoaxes ever perpetrated by any level of government".

When the hon. member for Winnipeg-Fort Garry contacted Mr. Otto Lang, he should have asked him to hold the permit for one week until the minister of finance and the president of the treasury board were asked whether there was any funding for rail relocation. If he had done that, he would have found out that there was no program, no funding, and no intention of getting into a rail relocation program. Then he could have said, "That is it, you will have to issue a permit for the Sherbrook-McGregor overpass". But, instead, he interfered all the time, which cost the city of Winnipeg an additional $2.5 million.

In June, 1980, a city of Winnipeg councillor attacked the federal government for suggesting that the $168.6 million relocation project is still possible. He said:

> It's a pipe dream. It will not happen, it cannot happen and it's about time we said so.

There was never any reference to the federal government asking the city for another study. Also the urban affairs minister, Mr. Mercier, as reported in the June 17, 1980, edition of the Winnipeg Free Press, said that the federal government should pay the $2 million additional cost because it caused a delay in construction. That additional cost has now risen to $2.5 million.

On September 11, 1980, Mayor Bill Norrie said:

> I don't agree with what they're doing because they're not being realistic. There isn't enough money for rail relocation and they should recognize that reality.

In that instance "they" meant the federal government. Also the Leader of the Official Opposition questioned the Minister of Finance and the President of the Treasury Board a few months ago in the House about funding for rail relocation. I have never witnessed two more evasive answers in my life. They had absolutely no intention of providing any funding for rail relocation in Canada. They simply did not have the money. If it was ever given to one city, they would have to provide the funding to other cities as well.

I find it somewhat strange that while I am asking the minister questions in Committee of the Whole he should walk out of the chamber; it is a real "sweetheart" arrangement. I want some answers to my questions. I hope the grinning parliamentary secretary, who thinks it is a big joke that the citizens of Winnipeg are required to pay this additional $2.5 million, will run out to the lobby and bring the minister back in here to provide some answers.

Mr. Bockstael: Mr. Chairman, I should like to point out that the Minister of Transport has been sitting here since the commencement of oral questions at two o'clock. He has been granted permission to go and get a bite to eat.

Mr. McKenzie: In the middle of my question.

Mr. Bockstael: I welcome this opportunity because I do not know how many times the hon. member for Winnipeg-Assiniboine challenged me in the House saying that I do not speak in the House, that I will not answer, that I do not pressure the minister.

A couple of days ago I was fortunate enough to move a motion under Standing Order 43. It was challenged because members opposite felt that a parliamentary secretary should not rise to ask any questions or to move such motions in the House. The hon. member has been a member much longer than I; he knows the rules, yet he attempts to make his point in such a way that people will believe I am not doing my job. I speak to the minister in his chambers, I have his ear, and I make representations on behalf of Winnipeg and Manitoba.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bockstael: I was part of the Winnipeg city council. I came here with Mayor Norrie, Mayor Steen and Gerald Mercier who is now the attorney general of Manitoba. We saw Otto Lang; we made application for UTAP funds. UTAP funds are based on a per capita rate. With one million people living in Manitoba, over five years Manitoba is entitled to $10,500,000. The province of Manitoba indicated that it was willing to dedicate $7.5 million of its UTAP funds to build the Sherbrook-McGregor overpass. There was no escalation clause, it was Manitoba's per capita fund. If that province wishes to attribute it to a certain project, it may do so; but there is nothing in UTAP funding which provides for an escalation because costs have risen.

The second point is that the city of Winnipeg never conducted the pre-required studies to consider rail relocation versus overpasses. It is customary for a city to pay 25 per cent or 50 per cent of the cost of a study, yet Otto Lang's department agreed to pay $90,000 or 100 per cent of the cost of that study. The study was completed and the city received its permit from the CTC to go ahead with the overpass. Last week the executive policy committee indicated that it would go in reverse, that it would conduct a study and consult with the people to see which project should be followed—the overpass or rail relocation.

I should like to refer to rail relocation because I think the facts should be on the table. Rail relocation was estimated at a cost of $168 million. One could say it was high or low. But, I was part of the executive policy committee which went to see

Ed Schreyer, who was the premier of Manitoba at the time, and I am able to say that rail relocation requires the consent of the provincial government. The city of Winnipeg made its case to the government of the day, and the government of the day indicated that it would consent to the relocation of the yards but that it would never consent to the relocation of the lines.

When main lines are relocated, one must know where they are to be placed and one must have the consent of all municipalities affected. One is supposed to make a study to determine where the lines are to be relocated. None of those studies was ever perpetrated. The city of Winnipeg indicated that it did not want to make the proper application, but that it would like to find out in advance. It was similar to a person going to a bank manager and saying, "Lend me some money; I do not have a plan but I will build something some day. How much will you lend me?" This was the manner in which the city of Winnipeg and the province of Manitoba approached the federal government.

The fact of the matter is that even if the federal government had $80 million or $85 million for rail relocation, the city and the province would say that it was not a priority with them. If they had the $85 million, they would spend it somewhere else. It is time the facts came out. The hon. member did not come forward as a spokesman for Winnipeg, when Winnipeg itself did not make its case.

• (1930)

Mr. McKenzie: We now have more grounds for the city of Winnipeg to commence a lawsuit, after the absolute rubbish we have heard from the hon. member for St. Boniface.

I guess he was not listening to what I was saying. He was chatting to the minister there when I spoke earlier. The $7.6 million in initial costs of the federal share was approved by the minister, Mr. Otto Lang. He was to issue the permit before the member for Winnipeg-Fort Garry talked him out of it. You were not listening when I mentioned that to you.

On December 6, 1978, Otto Lang telegraphed the mayor telling him that the federal government was giving its approval in principle for the construction of the Sherbrook-McGregor overpass. He did not ask for another study as the minister says in his letter of this week to the mayor. He did not ask for another study. How many times do I have to say that to get it across to you? He said "We are going to issue the permit."

The mayor sent an acknowledgment to Otto Lang—I must keep repeating this, Mr. Chairman, because it is so difficult to get it through to some of these people—the mayor sent an acknowledgment to Lang expressing his delight that the overpass had finally been given approval. He did not wire back and say "We will do a study" or "What study are you talking about?" He thanked him for saying that he was going to issue the permit to build the overpass. The mayor then asked for details on how to proceed with the project. Lang replied that there was little to do. He said there was little to do. He did not say, "Do another study". He said that there was little to do. All that was needed was an agreement from the province that a portion of their UTAP money would be assigned to the Sherbrook-McGregor overpass. Do you understand that?

Mr. Bockstael: Much clearer than you do.

Mr. McKenzie: I am not finished yet. The attorney general then wrote to Mr. Lang—

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order, please. I regret to advise the hon. member that he is finished, unless there is unanimous consent for him to continue.

Mr. McKenzie: I will just read one more sentence.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: I must recognize another member, unless there is unanimous consent for the hon. member to read one more sentence.

Mr. McKenzie: They do not want to hear it, that is for sure.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Chairman, despite some of the inferences and suggestions by the hon. member for Winnipeg-Assiniboine, I wish to go on record and say to the many good people in St. Boniface that they ought to be very proud of their member of Parliament. Not only does he serve them well and with distinction, but he serves this country very well as the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport.

I think congratulations are also in order for the Minister of Transport, who in recent months has had to grapple with a great many difficult issues. Many of those issues are in Atlantic Canada. I must say he has done a great job in the short period of time in which he has held that portfolio. With reference to one particular instance in my area of the country, he made a substantial allotment of funds to the Canadian Coastguard College. In making that announcement and in making those moneys available to that institution, it speaks well for our area and that particular institution.

Notwithstanding some of the positive things that the minister has been able to do in his short tenure in that particular portfolio, I take issue with one of the very serious announcements made by Canadian National Express, that is, the announced closure of various CN Express offices in Atlantic Canada. I have gone on record before, Mr. Chairman, to oppose this particular decision, and I wish to reiterate that here this evening.

Mr. Crosbie: Why do you vote with the government then?

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Chairman, I hear the very paragon and defender of the little guy from St. John's West.

Mr. Crosbie: Why are you supporting them?

Mr. Dingwall: The great thing we did for this country was defeat him on February 18. I hope he continues to sit on that side of the House providing his barrage of what I would call stupid commentary.

Mr. Crosbie: Why are you voting to support him if you are against this move? What bluff!

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Chairman, I am in opposition to this particular announcement by CN Express. I believe it is wrong in principle. If one is trying to develop Atlantic Canada this is certainly not one of the tools one should do away with. In addition to providing the service to the business community of industrial Cape Breton, CN also provides in excess of 52 jobs. Those jobs are important to industrial Cape Breton where we have high unemployment.

I would like to raise a few other concerns with the minister and his officials with respect to the urban transportation assistance program. It is my understanding there was a five-year allocation of some $8 million for Nova Scotia. I am wondering if the officials or the parliamentary secretary could indicate to me if any of that money will be going to industrial Cape Breton. I understood, particularly, that there was a proposal before the provincial government to provide some sort of bus service from the town of Dominion in the area better known as Sydney-Richmond. I am wondering if the parliamentary secretary has any better information with respect to those two areas.

In addition to those concerns I would like to raise another. It has to do with the airport which is in my constituency, the Sydney airport. The present landing systems which are being utilized at that airport leave a great deal to be desired. The present system is better known as the instrument landing system. This particular system is in competition with a new modern system called the microwave landing system.

The new system has a great many advantages, not only for the Sydney airport, and if it were utilized in other airports across the country I am sure Canadians, as well as the experts in that field, would see it would prove worth while. First, it provides high precision for zero landings and multiple approach passes for jets and helicopters. It has 200 frequency channels as opposed to the instrument landing system which has only 40. There is minimal site preparation needed, and it can be set up anywhere, from large airports to remote strips, to helipads, oil rigs, etc. I am advocating that the minister's department go for the microwave landing system.

I think it is a fact that the international civil navigation organization agreed that in 1983 they would embark upon the use of the microwave landing system and that it would be completed by 1995. This means that all airports would have the microwave landing system. I am wondering if the parliamentary secretary could indicate whether or not the airport in Sydney would be one of the first chosen and, if not, when it might happen in that area.

There are a number of other concerns I would like to raise in relation to the Sydney airport. Some of these concerns are quite appalling, Mr. Chairman. One is in relation to the baggage handling facility at that particular airport. The Sydney airport is very well maintained by the staff there. Unfortunately, the baggage faciity is somewhat old and it is not providing the type of service travellers out of Sydney should have. When you go across the country and see various airports with modern baggage handling facilities—

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): What about in my constituency?

Mr. Dingwall: The hon. member mentioned the facility in his own constituency and how great it is. But in our airport we do not have a great baggage facility. I would like to see some renovations and improvements made to it in the next few years.

Another concern of mine is in relation to the provision of a gate for passengers to use when getting on and off planes. When one goes to the airport to embark upon a trip to other parts of the country or, indeed, to anywhere in the world, one must walk 700 or a thousand feet in stormy or wet weather. We do not see why people in my constituency and the people of industrial Cape Breton have to put up with that when other areas of the country have facilities which are much more modern.

I hope the department will give consideration to these requests, particularly the baggage facilities, the gate facilities, and the request for turning toward the microwave landing system. I have some other concern in relation to the Sydney airport with regard to the extension of the runway, but perhaps I could get into that matter at a later time and make specific representations to the minister himself.

Another area of concern is with regard to the enlargement of the customs office. I am in the process of making representations to the appropriate minister. While I raise my concerns I am aware that everything cannot be done within a six-month or eight-month period, but I am hopeful that over the next couple of years we will be able to rectify some of the major shortcomings in an area which is deserving of a modern facility and which looks forward to having that facility in the very near future.

Mr. Bockstael: Mr. Chairman, I can say to the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond that the Minister of Transport has made representations to CN to consider the continuation of some of its express operations in Sydney. I am hopeful that he will be successful. The minister has also made representations to CN that the express service at Charlottetown be continued. However, these matters will be dealt with tomorrow, and we should have definite results early next week.

The program to which the hon. member referred in Cape Breton comes under UTAP. Two such programs have been approved; the transit vehicle acquisition which is receiving a contribution of $800,000, 50 per cent of which is being provided by UTAP; and a transit facility which is estimated to cost $750,000, with UTAP's share being $600,000. I refer to the bus portion of the Atlantic Provinces Transportation Program. The Mount Cabot bus line is to receive assistance of $31,000. To date it has received $5,400. Further details will be forwarded to the hon. member by letter, if requested.

The hon. member spoke of improvements to the Sydney airport, which is being served by ILS. The Department of Transport has made a commitment to ICAO that it will commence with microwave landing systems, and it is now in its early development stages. As to which airport will have priority, the decision has not yet been taken. The whole matter of the implementation of that kind of program will be taken into consideration, and then the priorization will be established.

The hon. member also spoke of baggage facilities, improving the handling of cargo customs clearance, improvements to the terminal, another runway and passenger gates at the airport. Many of the passenger gates are owned by the airlines. One of the problems which we face, for example, in Winnipeg, is that there are not enough of these passenger gates. When people come down from the north and the temperature is 30 below, they feel as though they are discriminated against because there is no gate at their facility and they must put on parkas to get from the aircraft to the terminal.

A committee on transport has travelled across the nation. The Ministry of Transport is expected to look after 24 national airports, 76 regional airports, 455 local commercial airports, and 503 smaller airports, for a total of 1,058 airports. As we made that trip, we also learned the demands and requirements of all the principal cities we visited and all the provincial governments. If we had $15 billion, we could not meet all the requests. The budget of the Department of Transport is approximately $1.2 billion, and one does not have to be a master mathematician to understand that we cannot meet all the demands in one year, that we must rely on priorization and consider all the statistics as to passenger demand, number of flights—both incoming and outgoing—and so on, and we are doing the best we can with the dollars we have. In fact, that is why we should hurry and approve the estimates and budget of this department so that we may get on with the job.

Mr. Dingwall: Just one final comment, Mr. Chairman. Perhaps I do not need to say so, but I would remind the parliamentary secretary that on some of the questions which I raised he was not able to give specific information. I hope that he and his officials will follow up in writing with the answers to my questions.

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Chairman, I am disappointed that the minister is not here. Oh, there he is. I have some serious questions on some serious issues. I am not here to make a speech, but merely to get some information.

Mr. Fox: That is good news.

Mr. Crosbie: It will be news if I get answers. On September 30, 1980, I wrote to the minister about the drydock and the famous synchrolift which was announced by his predecessors, Messrs. Jamieson and Horner, on December 29, 1978, at St. John's, Newfoundland. On June 20, Canadian National wrote to the Department of IT and C about proceeding with the installation of the synchrolift. On August 6, Canadian National wrote the minister about the delay and setting out the alternatives. On August 22 the minister was sent another letter from Canadian National advising him that the government of Newfoundland had provided an acceptable offer of financial assistance and stated that if the Government of Canada would not go ahead, the province would. In that letter it was also stated that the province and CN had reached an agreement and that CN was asking for the transfer of land, and there were comments on other matters.

I also understand that the minister was sent a letter from Mr. Bandeen of Canadian National on November 20, 1980. The exchange of land with National Harbours Board has been approved. Approval is needed for certain land owned by the federal government, other than the land owned by the National Harbours Board, at the dockyard to be transferred to CN. As far as I know, Mr. Bandeen in waiting for the answers to three questions with regard to whether the Government of Canada will permit CN to go ahead, along with the province, with the project, as an alternative to the federal government continuing its direct involvement itself.

The first question is, Will the federal government provide the necessary funding as outlined in this correspondence? If the federal government will not, although of course it should, will it permit the province to provide the financing in accordance with an agreement worked out with CN? The third question, as I understand it is: In the event that the province finances the synchrolift, will the Government of Canada convey title to the dockyard at St. John's to CN to operate that dockyard, or will it give them a 99-year lease so that it may go ahead with the modernization and save the dockyard?

I would remind the minister that the Economic Council of Canada report of a week or so ago shows that Newfoundlanders receive only 53.6 per cent of the national average earned income of Canadians. One-twelfth of all total personal income in Newfoundland comes from unemployment insurance as compared to one-fortieth, which is the average across Canada. Through these projects I have mentioned, we have a chance to secure jobs for 350 people and provide for 150 more.

So, Mr. Minister, you have a letter from the president of CN dated November 20. I want to know if it has been answered and, if not, when it will be answered. Every day that passes is a vital day if construction is to begin next spring. Hopefully, the minister will answer the question.

• (1950)

It is vital for the operation of this drydock at St. John's that Russian crews be permitted to use Gander airport as they travel back and forth from Russia, when their ships come in to be repaired. Canadian airlines cannot provide the service from St. John's to Montreal. The Air Transport Board has given permission for Aeroflot to be used for these purposes, operating through Gander until the middle of December. It is vital that this continue or the whole Russian repair business will have to stop. This year, by the way, 31 Russian vessels were repaired in the dockyard of St. John's. That is $2.5 million worth of business. Of these, 25 were scheduled and six were emergency repairs. There is a contract for next year for 25 more vessels. That will go up to 50 or 60, once the synchrolift is installed.

Will the minister urge the Air Transport Board to allow the flights of these crews to take place through Gander by Aeroflot, rather than having them travel via Montreal in view of all these troubles and difficulties they had last year. Those are my first questions.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order, please. Before the hon. minister answers, it has been brought to the attention of the Chair that I have permitted hon. members to address one another in, grammatically speaking, the second person. I do not want to convert the House to the more serious rules of formality, but Hansard, tomorrow, I am told, will rewrite some of the addresses made by members so that they will refer to one another in the third person, as is the custom in the House. I would ask hon. members if they would assist the Chair and continue in that tradition.

Mr. Pepin: On the subject of Aeroflot coming directly to Gander to pick up people working on the Russian fishing fleet, as I understand it, this agreement has been reached. Authorization given as of November 1, so this is actually taking place. In other words, on a temporary basis, Aeroflot does not have to come to Mirabel and then have some other airline take the Russian citizens to Gander or other places. When I heard that, I inquired about it and was told of the advantages to the Russians of doing it in this fashion. I was also told that EPA was not now available to do that job. I inquired whether proper attention had been given to other carriers, and I was told that it had. So, on a temporary basis, it is being done.

On the subject of synchrolift, we are faced with two situations. One has to do with the relationship between CN and the government of Newfoundland in connection with the construction of the facility itself. It is well known that IT & C does not disagree with the government of Newfoundland taking over that responsibility, and that discussion is going on now.

Other talks are going on between the National Harbours Board and the CN as to the land on which this will be built. CN and the National Harbours Board, have been discussing this matter for a number of days and I understand that they have reached agreement in principle. There are still some money matters to be concluded, but that discussion is on the right track too, and should be concluded very, very rapidly.

On the first matter, negotiations between CN and Newfoundland are progressing, as I said. CN apparently needs to know what sort of financial agreement they will have with the National Harbours Board before concluding the first one. My information is that things are progressing quite normally, and that they will come to a conclusion very soon.

Mr. Crosbie: The hon. minister's information is not correct. These things have all been concluded—I have it right from the horse's mouth, if you want to call it a horse. There is a letter to the minister, dated November 20, from Mr. Bandeen, setting out that the exchange of lands has been agreed to with the National Harbours Board. There is some other federal land about which they now need the minister's formal approval in order that it can be transferred to the dockyard for this synchrolift. He wants a decision from the minister. If the federal government is not going to carry out its obligation to finance its own shipyard's extension of the synchrolift—if that is reaffirmed as being the case—then he wants the minister, on behalf of the Government of Canada, to agree that he may go ahead with the agreement the company has with the province. They have reached agreement with the province. CN is putting up $14 million and the province $7 million. There is an agreement with the province. If the federal government confirms it will not meet its responsibilities, then he wants the minister's consent to go ahead with the province.

If they do go ahead with the province, CN wants title to these assets at the dockyard—the land—the synchrolift, the machinery and the tools that are there, because the Government of Canada has never put one red cent into the dockyards; only CN has. If the province of Newfoundland puts in the money for the synchrolift, CN wants to own the operation, and no longer just hold it as an agent of the federal government. There is a letter from Mr. Bandeen, and every day it passes unanswered, is another day's delay.

I will ask the minister again whether he would look into that matter as soon as he gets a chance, and answer the letter. The next step is to advise the consultants to prepare the final plans and specifications and try to get ready for tender calls next spring. That is a very favourable time, because the construction companies in Newfoundland are hungry for work then, and will offer very good prices if they can go ahead. The letter is there. I am not going to argue or go into the details of the behaviour of the Government of Canada, I just want the minister to agree. If the government is not going ahead, it is out to punish the people of St. John's West for electing me, which is what it has done. There is $2.5 million provided in the estimates for this project to go forward this year. The government should at least let the province do it, so that Newfoundland can get some economic development.

By the way, the temporary agreement made through the Air Transport Board is only valid to the middle of December. The dockyards cannot deal seriously with the Russians who want to plan their schedule for next year, if they cannot be assured that they will be able to exchange crews and have this arrangement continue for a considerably longer period. Therefore, I would ask the minister or one of his officials to check into that and try to get the extension approved beyond the middle of December, for a few months at least, particularly since Canadian airlines cannot handle the business. Their service is unsatisfactory and the cost of their charters has doubled over a period of months. This is an immensely important economic project for St. John's, and the province has a fantastic unemployment problem.

There is another point. A committee has been set up, comprising federal and provincial officials, to study transportation issues and spending on transportation on Newfoundland. There is a three-year agreement on the Trans-Canada highway. It is called the Canada-Newfoundland primary highway strengthening and improvement agreement and it terminates on March 31 next. Under this agreement, and Newfoundland had $60 million to spend on it; it was to be a 50-50 division, federal and provincial. In effect, the agreement this year is 25 per cent federal, 75 per cent provincial. It is of immense importance to the government of the province of Newfoundland, to know if there is to be a renewal of this agreement, and what the financial basis of it will be. The Trans-Canada highway in Newfoundland is a very inadequate highway. It is an extremely dangerous, two-lane highway, which carries a huge amount of traffic. It is deteriorating rapidly and needs further work. Is the government going to enter into another Trans-Canada highway strengthening agreement or not, and if so, what are the financial terms?

When is the minister going to make known to the Newfoundland government, through his officials, just what the transportation spending envelope is for Newfoundland? That is the new jargon. No one seems to know what it is. There is supposed to be a long-term strategy. There was a meeting on November 23 of federal officials and Newfoundland officials, on the long-term strategy—the usual palaver is an envelope based on last year's spending. It does not include DREE spending. Federal officials do not know how much money they have. There is some suggestion that it might be a $25 million total program, half federal and half provincial, which is entirely inadequate. What is the position on that?

What is the position on the Sullivan transportation royal commission report? What is the federal position on the latest statement from Premier Peckford on the program for the revitalization of the Newfoundland railway, and on the studies done by a project management and design company and by Canadian Pacific's consultant services in Montreal? As hon. members know, they want to integrate the Newfoundland railway with the North American railway system by converting to standard gauge. The province of Newfoundland wants a new federal Crown corporation established to own the Newfoundland railway and the railways assets of CN in the province. They no longer want CN there. With reference to the railway, they want a new federal Crown corporation. There are other recommendations. The province has said it is now prepared to sit down with representatives of the railway unions, the CN and the federal government to implement that program. What is your reaction to that? What is happening on the Newfoundland transportation scene? There is no province in Canada where transportation is more vital and where there are greater problems.

Before sitting down to give the minister a chance to respond, I have one other item. It is the situation respecting DREE agreements. No DREE agreement has been signed since the new government took office. There has not been a DREE agreement since May, 1979. Apparently DREE does not want to spend any money on roads. All road spending under DREE is going to vanish. Is that true or not? What is going to happen with respect to road construction in Newfoundland.

Is any planning being done for the St. John's harbour facilities. A fire tug is badly needed. It has been requested for the city. There is no tug in the harbour, yet St. John's is located only 160 miles from the new Hibernia development. Here is a port with all this activity going on which does not even have a tug which can go outside the narrows. The only tug, the Glenmount is not allowed outside the narrows. There is no fire protection; there is no fire tug. Will any action be taken by federal government to do anything to meet this fantastic need, particularly in view of all the offshore activity? All we hear about are pilotage fee increases. Another attempt is being made to get a pilotage fee increase. What is to happen there?

The minister might also deal with the St. John's airport and the need for an improvement in the ILS landing system. I think runway 11 has to be used when there is an east wind. Runway 0826 and runway 11 need to be upgraded to standard category 1 or category 2 ILS. There is also the question of whether St. John's can be used for international service. These are some of the questions of great moment which occur to me and I would like to hear from the minister on those, if I may.

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Chairman, let me take them one by one, if I can remember them all. First, concerning Aeroflot. As I have indicated, permission has been granted to Aeroflot to stop at Gander. This is a temporary measure in order to give us time to work out a satisfactory permanent arrangement with Aeroflot. My officials are talking to the Russians now. The present situation is that Aeroflot stops at Gander on its regular Moscow-to-Montreal route. These flights drop off fresh fishing crews, pick up tired crews and continue to Montreal, returning non-stop to Moscow. It is a temporary arrangement to permit negotiation toward a more permanent situation.

On the subject of Synchrolift, my hon. friend has an advantage over me. He appears to have copies of correspondence which I do not have here with me. But the latest piece of paper I received today at noon says: "CN is waiting for their final cost analysis of the project before making a firm commitment with the government of Newfoundland." If my hon. friend is better informed than I am, I will bow to his competence. However, that is the situation now. It may be somewhat of a chicken-and-egg situation but we will try to get the chicken out as fast as possible. I am assured by all parties, the CN and the National Harbours Board, that I should not worry because there is no problem. There is no prevention of progress at this point. Consequently, I will not lose sleep on this matter. I will get to it first thing in the morning to be absolutely sure that what I am saying now is correct.

Mr. Crosbie: Thank you.

Mr. Pepin: On the subject of the primary highway strengthening program, my hon. friend gave a description of it. This is coming to an end now, both with respect to the maritime provinces and with respect to Newfoundland. The maritime provinces and Newfoundland have returned for a second round. Both parties have justified what they have done with the money in the first round. I will indicate what they will want to do in the second round, though we still have to find the money. It is the question of money again. However, this is where we are at now. It is in the famous envelope stage with which my hon. friend is familiar.

Again, this highway reinforcement program should be seen in the light of broader Newfoundland transportation interests. This is where we refer to the Sullivan report and to present negotiations presently going on. If there is one thing on which I will not stand too much chastisement, it is on this subject. I indicated my interests very early in the game. Since then, delays have not been caused by me or by my department. The delays have been caused either by circumstances or by the government of Newfoundland.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. minister but unless there is unanimous consent, his allotted time has now expired. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: I recognize the hon. member for Capilano.

Order, please. I apologize to the hon. member for Capilano. I should have recognized an hon. member to my right. With the hon. member's permission, I will recognize him after I have recognized the hon. member for Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine.

Mr. Huntington: You have my permission, Mr. Chairman.

[Translation]

Mr. Bujold: Mr. Chairman, I am pleased to take part in the debate this evening and especially to have the opportunity to question the minister and perhaps also to make some suggestions and criticisms which are meant to be constructive. I hope that by making some suggestions and criticisms which are not necessarily aimed at the minister or at his officials but rather at the unwieldiness of that large department which has to deal with problems throughout the country, he should necessarily find some solutions.

And it reminds me that last night the minister referred specifically to the problems in his department. And he said very eloquently that time and patience are more productive than strength and frenzy. However, I would tell him that with too many scruples we would never have accomplished anything. I heard him this afternoon repeat to my colleague from Algoma (Mr. Foster) that he understood his frustration and that of his colleagues. Last evening he spoke about the frustration of civil servants. I agree with him that there is surely some frustration within the department but I only want to point out to him a certain difference which exists among the public servants, some very able individuals who are aware of the issues and are working for the common good but it is merely that such a difference exists only at 5.30 or at 6 p.m. When civil servants go back home, they do not have to return to their constituencies or to travel across the country to face the electors who also feel frustrated when they see how slow the decision-making process is. Sometimes all they know about is their local administration or their local problems. People find it hard to understand why decisions are not made more quickly.

Mr. Chairman, as I said, that is the big difference for civil servants who are extremely competent men and women, who know their files. That is the big difference. I should like to tell about a little incident I experienced in 1978, when the former minister, Mr. Otto Lang, sent to the Magdalen Islands a civil servant from headquarters in Ottawa to become acquainted with the problems first hand. That civil servant had to face a blockade in Gaspé, to be more precise. The people there blocked the aircraft on the runway, with the civil servants and the people representing the government aboard. The civil servant came back and reported that he simply could not have imagined that the problem was as serious as it was in fact.

So, Mr. Chairman, having said that, I could perhaps deal with two points my hon. colleague from Laprairie brought up yesterday, to make some contribution and tell the House how I see them, namely, the problems of regional carriers and Nordair. With regard to regional carriers, I see the minister spoke to the problem again today, saying how eager he was to solve it; according to the newspapers in the last two days or so, the department is about to submit to cabinet a policy on the matter.

I should like to point out to the minister the extreme importance of reunification and the need to have a coherent policy in the field of regional carriers. In an area of the country such as eastern Quebec or eastern Canada, it is imperative that there be some correlation between the various regional carriers.

In vast areas that are sparsely populated, regional carriers are needed that can co-ordinate the means of air transport. At the present time, eastern Canada has three regional carriers. Now, when one has to cover as short a distance as 200 miles, and yet has to change carrier three times, to deal with the three airlines that serve the area, how can there be co-ordination or correlation between the three? I am sure the minister, to whom I addressed the question, will bear in mind those extremely important problems when he discusses his policy with the regional carriers.

With regard to the Nordair problem, colleagues have spoken about it even as recently as this afternoon. Our hon. colleague from Joliette mentioned it. Our hon. colleague from Montreal did so as well. Obviously, a decision will have to be made soon. The minister is perfectly aware of it. In his answer this afternoon, he pointed it out very clearly, but I find it hard to understand why there should be concern about the possibility for Quebec interests to be major shareholders in the company that might possibly take over Quebecair or Nordair? Why create problems, why ask questions about the fact that the people of Quebec, with other parties, even possibly from Ontario, and Air Canada, should hold at least 50 per cent of the shares of the company that would eventually become the main regional air carrier in eastern Canada? I fail to understand that fear. Obviously, as pointed out so eloquently by my hon. colleague from Laprairie, if the shares were split 40-40-20, with the 20 going to Air Canada, with Ontario interest, for instance, Air Canada would still hold extraordinary powers over the future company that is in the process of being created. I therefore beg the minister to take into consideration these facts and to act in such a manner that nothing serious, nothing disgracious for the Canadian government happens at the present time and to act in such a manner that a company with its headquarters in Montreal, with a majority of Quebeckers as shareholders, will retain at least 50 per cent of the shares of a company which would make a bid for the purchase of Quebecair and Nordair.

Mr. Chairman, this brings me to another extremely important problem for our region, in eastern Quebec and in eastern Canada and it has a little to do with the administrtion of Transport Canada. You are aware, Mr. Chairman, of the fact that I represent a riding that encompasses the Gaspé Peninsula and the Magdalen Islands, this little group of islands located right in the middle of the Gulf of St. Lawrence where we must face two levels of administration be it in the field of air, sea or rail transportation, namely the Quebec regional administration and the Atlantic regional administration.

So, Mr. Chairman, I do not know if you can imagine the kinds of problems we must face when we discuss a particular problem and have to deal with two separate administrations. When I am in the Magdalen Islands discussing the harbour in Cap-aux-Meules with CTMA, which operates the ferry service between Prince Edward Island and the province of Quebec, they tell me: Of course, in Cap-aux-Meules a Quebec company operates the service but its administration comes under the Atlantic region with regards to the seaport. So I must try to get explanations from two administrations. It is easy to imagine the communication problems that exist when two directors general must meet to discuss certain things. That requires a great deal more time, and despite the good will shown by Department of Transport officers, it can take months before discussions can begin.

I would be grateful if the minister would consider, whenever it is administratively feasible, to give back to Quebec, to the Quebec region the administration of those small centres which pose no problem. For example, the harbour in Cap-aux-Meules or in Havre-Aubert, in the Magdalen Islands could come under the Quebec region. I see no reason why the administration of those two seaports could not be transferred to the Quebec region.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to touch upon another issue which is of great importance in our region, and the minister will no doubt appreciate the problems this can cause for the people in our area; I am speaking of intermodal public transportation. In eastern Quebec and eastern Canada in general there are three main means of transport: the airplanes, the railways and Voyageur bus in Quebec and other bus companies in eastern Canada.

Because of our weather, one can leave Quebec City in the morning under bright sunshine and get into Rimouski under cloudy skies and finally arrive in Gaspé in a snowstorm. If someone flies from Montreal, he or she can be told in Rimouski that he or she cannot go any further, that a snowstorm has fored the airport in Gaspé to close down. But, if there was such a thing as intermodal transportation, the traveller could hop on the bus or the train. But no, Mr. Chairman, the plane from Montreal or Quebec City arrives in Rimouski at 9.35 a.m., the bus left at 6.10 a.m. and the train at 5.20 a.m. so the only thing that person can do is rent a car and continue his or her journey.

However, Mr. Chairman, if we had intermodal transportation, that person could get there by plane then, a half hour later, take a train or a bus and continue on towards eastern Canada into the maritimes or to Gaspé. The same applies to the return leg from Gaspé to Montreal. The plane flies out of Mont-Joli at 9.15 p.m.; the Gaspé-Quebec City bus gets into Mont-Joli at 10.49 and the train coming from eastern Canada and the Gaspé peninsula goes by at 1.15 a.m. This means that once again we have three transport companies serving the same area where the temperature can change very quickly, where small towns are strung along the coast of the Chaleur Bay, both on the New Brunswick side and the Quebec side, where the population is scattered among those towns and where three companies are fighting for customers who have the means to travel. It is extremely important for the Department of Transport to discuss with these three companies, two of which are private companies, namely Voyageur and an airline, and another which is the Crown corporation VIA Rail. All of them should sit down at the same table to determine whether they can arrange their schedules so that people can take the bus and transfer to the train or board an airplane.

At the present time, those three companies are fighting to get the greatest number of customers that they can among an extremely sparse population, since there are only 120,000 inhabitants in the 600 miles around the Gaspé peninsula. These three companies now have deficits in this area and are constantly fighting to get more passengers.

I hope, Mr. Chairman, that the minister and his department will be able to study this whole issue. I know that there are certain firms which would ask nothing better than to co-ordinate the schedules of these companies. We could have plane service from Quebec City, for instance, to Mont-Joli, and then take either the train or the bus from Mont-Joli to Gaspé.

Mr. Chairman, this brings me to a third matter which is closely related to the two others, namely, the railway problem.

Last summer, a study was made concerning the Gaspé area which clearly shows the importance of transport in our region. As I said earlier, we have a population of 120,000, but the number of people from Gaspé who live elsewhere is much larger. These are people who come and go often, and they need some means of transport. This study made last summer shows that 69.5 per cent of these people travel by car. And heaven knows the great distances we have to cover! In view of all the problems caused by the price of gasoline, which will increase even more in the future, we have to think about developing some type of public transport to solve this problem, which brings me to the train service. In this regard, Mr. Chairman, I would like to quote some extremely revealing figures. At the present time, a round trip from Gaspé to Rimouski over a distance of 310 miles costs $138.25 by car and $30 by train. A round trip from Gaspé to Quebec City over a distance of 490 miles costs $218.54 by car and only $46 by train. The trip from Gaspé to Montreal, which some people make regularly every weekend because the people in our area are not afraid of covering great distances by car in spite of the weather, this trip of 600 miles costs $390 by car. By train, it costs only $50 for the round trip.

So, Mr. Chairman, I am saying to the Minister of Transport how important the train can be in an area where, as I said before, the majority or most of the people in the Gaspé peninsula have relatives or friends living in Quebec City, Montreal or Toronto. These people badly need a low cost means of transport they could use during the Christmas holiday or the summer vacation either to go back home or to visit their relatives outside the area. That means finally how extremely important it has now become to provide these people with a means of transport they could benefit from.

So, Mr. Chairman, we in the Gaspé peninsula have a train which leaves Halifax in the morning and arrives in Montreal the morning after and this train links with a sideline at Campbellton for the people coming from the bay.

As I was saying a while ago, maybe we should ask our officials, or our minister, if he has time for that, to leave Gaspé at four o'clock in the afternoon—and I do not know if the minister has young children—and arrive in Campbellton in the evening, after managing to put his three or four kids to sleep around 9.30 or 8.30 so that when he arrives at Campbellton at 10.15 he must then wake the whole brood up and change to another train. And again you have to spend so many hours to put them back to sleep again, while they are bothering the father and the mother who are in turn upsetting all the other train passengers. That is what we do, Mr. Chairman. We the representatives of this area have to live through that each time we go to our constituency. I wish our officials could go through this routine for although they are conscientious persons they unfortunately do not always have time for such experiences.

Let them come to see us with their families, let them visit our beautiful area, and by the way let them take that train. During the winter, even during snow storms you have to wake the kids and change trains at 10.30 in the evening. There is not even a light at the station. I invite them to try the experience. This is what the people in eastern Quebec, the people in the Gaspé peninsula must put up with every day.

The frustration of certain colleagues referred to by the minister, it is the frustration of the people in our areas. When we go back home and meet our constituents, when we attend political or social events in the area, this is the constant complaint we hear. How can we help sharing that frustration?

Speaking of that train, and the two administrations I referred to earlier—the Atlantic region and the Quebec region with a train leaving Montreal in the evening for the Atlantic region—why not have one or two trains only? One could serve all of eastern Canada, the other could go to Gaspé. This way we could avoid the Campbellton connection, a serious deception for people who have to use the train.

Mr. Chairman, with the figures I referred to earlier, do you know who takes the train in an area such as ours? It is the people most in need, those who have a minimum of opportunity to travel by other means. Families boarding the train cannot afford to take the bus let alone the plane. They are the people who have the least, who can hardly make ends meet, who fortunately once or twice a year can come to Montreal and visit relatives who were forced to leave the Gaspé peninsula or other jobless areas of the country, and who must put up with those annoyances. Those are the same people, Mr. Chairman, who each time we meet them tell us how frustrated they feel when they realize the government that is supposed to look after their interests cannot solve their problem.

Those were the points I wanted to make, Mr. Chairman—

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

[English]

Mr. Riis: Thank you very kindly, Mr. Chairman. I must say it is a real pleasure and a real opportunity to stand before the Committee of the Whole to address this topic of transportation. It is a topic in Canadian history which has been fundamental to the success and to the development and certainly will be to the future of Canada, starting from the early canoe routes across the country, followed by the canals, the railways, the air services throughout the north and more recently by the ships connecting Canada to the rest of the world. Indeed, transportation has been a factor that has welded this very diverse and varied country together.

● (2030)

Transportation is an integral element of Canadian development. When we consider the tremendous costs associated with transportation development and the very high cost connected with infrastructure development within Canada, we are encouraged to ask where we should be spending our money. Should we be spending it in the more depressed areas of Canada which are experiencing economic recession? Should we be spending it in the parts of Canada where development is neutral and where growth is minimal or perhaps static? Or should we be spending it in areas of Canada which are recognized as growth areas in our economy where sound economic development is accelerating on a daily and weekly basis?

I want to paint a picture of a part of Canada for the Minister of Transport. I recognize that British Columbia and western Canada are experiencing some of the lowest levels of unemployment in the country. We are generating the highest rates of real growth in all of Canada. British Columbia and western Canada are increasingly attracting labour from all regions of Canada.

We are experiencing high rates of investment in new productive capacity in British Columbia. This year investment is up by more than 16 per cent over the corresponding period last year. In western Canada and British Columbia we are experiencing tourist growth the like of which we have never experienced before. The total number of United States vehicles entering British Columbia is up by more than 30 per cent over the past year. Rogers Pass westbound traffic is up this year 14 per cent, indicating that the number of visitors from central Canada and the prairies is increasing. Of course, there is increased traffic on the Yellowhead highway. This very crucial route is often referred to now as the "route to the resources", and traffic on it is certainly up from the corresponding period last year.

Within the Kamloops-Shuswap area itself, economic growth in 1981 will unquestionably be higher than the national average. Population is growing, and there are major new developments as a result of the major newly-found copper deposits in the Kamloops-Shuswap region. The growth of the region is illustrated by the following: the value of building permits issued in Kamloops during the first ten months of this year totals in excess of $72 million compared with $34 million in the same period last year, an increase of over 100 per cent.

In the Salmon Arm area, the centre of the Shuswap area of British Columbia, the value of building permits jumped to in excess of $11 million in the first ten months of 1980 compared with $5 million in the same period last year, an increase of well over 130 per cent.

Retailing is the second largest industry in the Kamloops-Shuswap area and, as in most other parts of Canada the great majority of retail stores are small, independently owned and operated enterprises. The strength of this sector in my riding reflects what is happening throughout the west. In the 12 months ending June, 1980, retail sales in Kamloops totalled $5,245 per capita compared with the national of $3,596 per capita. By 1985, per capita expenditures in Kamloops will likely reach $8,200. This buoyant local and regional economy provides a confident environment for the establishment of new business. So far this year 770 new business licences have been issued in Kamloops and 160 in the Salmon Arm area.

The conclusion to be drawn from the picture I have painted is that a very strong local and regional economy exists in this area of central British Columbia. Yet the transportation infrastructure which is so crucial to continued development is lacking.

Back in 1969, for example, the Kamloops airport served fewer than 100,000 passengers and experienced what was at that time referred to as a major expansion. A new coffee shop was added and a few additional feet to a lobby space. Then in 1975 there was a proposal by the government for a major expansion. In 1979 the number of passengers served was in excess of 200,000. In 1980 another significant expansion occurred at the airport. An addition was made to the baggage-handling rack. Expansion has always been promised but always put off. Expansion never took place. On July 28 I received a letter from the Minister of Transport indicating that expansion of the Kamloops airport facility had been postponed again until 1983.

Let us recognize that we are talking about a part of the province of British Columbia which is experiencing tremendous growth. Access to the area and the opportunity to leave the area for business purposes and for moving labour in and out has become crucial, yet the facility which existed in the sixties remains in place unchanged. We need an airport which can handle more traffic. We need an airport which is dependable under varying weather conditions. We need an airport which can provide an adequate and acceptable level of service. We heard earlier today about problems associated with Mirabel and the tremendous sums which have gone into the Mirabel airport near Montreal. Yet the returns are somewhat questionable. One has to ask whether it is unreasonable to request that a few dollars be spent to expand and improve the terminal facility in this dynamic part of the country and to invest in the economic development of that area.

Is an improved terminal and improved landing facilities to allow access to the airport under inversion layer atmospheric conditions too much to ask? Can we ask the minister to reconsider the decision to hold off any expansion to that airport until 1983? I will put the question to the Minister of Transport: Can we ask for an acceleration? Can that date be moved up to one more acceptable to the people and the entrepreneurs of that area?

Mr. Bockstael: Mr. Chairman, I want to thank the hon. member for Kamloops-Shuswap for the very encouraging picture of his area he painted for us. Economic growth is advancing there, and that certainly reflects the need for good transportation facilities.

Since the program to upgrade the Kamloops airport is deferred to 1983, his question is whether it can be brought forward. Well, it is not in this particular budget. In 1978 we spent $37,000 on a garage, and $44,000 on runway stabilization. In 1979 we spent $205,000 acquiring some land. The hon. member for Kamloops-Shuswap drew attention to the need for specific improvements to the terminal and to runway facilities.

Members of the Chamber of Commerce from Kamloops appeared here in delegation and pointed out that the inverted fog layer which exists over the airport prevents aircraft from landing at Kamloops—they must carry on to another airfield because of the level of the present runway. They even went so far as to suggest that Kamloops needs a whole new airport at another level which would not be subject to that kind of influence from the atmospheric buildup over Kamloops.

Some hon. members have several airports in their ridings, and individual members come to the Ministry of Transport saying that conditions at their airports warrant higher priority than others and asking that improvements at theirs be advanced. At this stage there are no reserves to include Kamloops in this year's budget, but I am sure the minister and his officials are willing to look at the hon. member's proposal to see whether there is any possibility of taking his submission into account when preparing the next budget—and they look forward to doing that.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Chairman, I appreciate those remarks, and I certainly encourage a re-examination of the priority and the timing of the expansion of that airport, in recognition, perhaps, that it is time to be investing more money in airports. Such investments would perhaps result in more money flowing back to the Canadian government than investments in other locations at this time.

Speaking along the same line, we recognize that the centre of economic gravity is moving to the western provinces. Alberta and British Columbia are becoming more important all the time in terms of the country's economic development. The Yellowhead highway is a major interprovincial route, increasing in importance, and sometimes called Canada's road to the resources. It links up the Pacific coast to northern Alberta particularly. The daily traffic counts on that highway are now higher than on corresponding sections of the Trans-Canada highway. One of the major uses of the Yellowhead route is for heavy industrial traffic in recognition of the industrial development which is taking place in the western provinces. Would the minister comment for a moment on whether or not he sees any possible cost-sharing program to provide for present and, perhaps more important, for future needs, from the $4 billion western development fund to encourage the improvement and development of this crucial highway system?

Mr. Bockstael: Mr. Chairman, may I say to the hon. member for Kamloops-Shuswap that I had the opportunity of assisting at the Yellowhead highway convention in Saskatoon about a month ago. The problem stems from highway improvement programs which were based on cost-sharing with the four western provinces. Some of these agreements were signed earlier; they were five-year programs. I do not remember the particular ones which were started in 1975 and which terminate in 1980, but there are some that have a couple of years to go. It is relevant to me that under a federal-provincial agreement, the provinces take their allocation and decide to apply it to highways which have priority in their mind. As they have not applied these funds to the Yellowhead highway, they are now hoping that the government will see it as a parallel to the number one Trans-Canada highway to the south. They put forward many arguments, they produce figures regarding the volume of traffic and other statistics, but it is a matter which has to be negotiated between the provinces, the ministers of transport of the provinces, and the federal government. When a certain program has expired and there is no allocation in the budget of additional funds for such a program, special legislation or supplementary dollars would be required in order to arrive at such an agreement with the provincial counterparts as is suggested. I do not believe the western incentive program was designed to be applied to highway programs.

When I went to the convention, I had a list of the moneys which had been made available. When I met the B.C. minister, he said to me, "You have only given us $8 million for our highway. You should have given us a lot more." That is the type of demand the Ministry of Transport receives from all the provinces. If I may digress for a moment, let me point out that one usually sees a big sign saying, "This is a provincial highway program". And on the bottom of the sign it says, "A little bit of it was funded by the federal government."

Mr. Riis: I thank the parliamentary secretary for his response. I would say, if that is what it would take to get funding for such a highway system to provide better economic opportunities to that part of Canada, I would be quite prepared to see the federal government take the top part of that sign and put it in neon lights every few hundred yards along the highway. That would be fine with me if it encouraged the federal government to provide that kind of funding. I would ask, however, that consideration be given to investing money in highway systems which would guarantee returns to the Canadian government.

I want to refer now, Mr. Chairman, to a point which was introduced earlier by the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond regarding the cutbacks in the express stations particularly along the CN rail. I think one would recognize the problem clearly if one saw it in the context of the lay-offs by CN and CP over the last 20 years which have resulted in something like 60,000 positions being cut back. As a result of the decision to reduce the CN express service, we have seen a loss of about 1,100 jobs across the country, affecting places such as Kamloops, Kelowna, Victoria, Prince Rupert, Terrace, and Smithers. A similar situation has arisen in other regions of Canada. In some parts of the country this has resulted in a complete lack of express service by railroad or by highway and dependence upon very expensive air services. I wonder, if the effect of this move has been considered, what kind of impact it will have on the small community.

I would like to give one example of a small business which received a support grant from the federal government of $150,000 to open up a modern pottery factory exporting goods out of the region. It depended upon the freight rates established for CN express service. When this service was eliminated, the cost of freight of the goods in and out of this centre doubled, which made it impossible for the entrepreneur to compete with the national and multinational firms throughout the region. As a result, we saw another bankruptcy, another small business caving in because of the cutback in the express service.

We see a cutback in rail transportation jobs. I understand that earlier the minister indicated that perhaps 90 per cent of these positions would not be lost, that individuals would be moved into other parts of the rail service. But I would like to ask him whether there is a need to continue the phasing out of this service, particularly during these crucial energy times when it is recognized that to move goods by truck costs four times as much in terms of energy per freight mile as it does by rail. To me this does not necessarily seem the most logical progression when we are concerned about the conservation of energy. Also, I should like to remind the minister that section 262 of the Railway Act compels the railway by law to handle all traffic offered for carriage, which means the government can step in and require that the express service be maintained throughout all parts of Canada.

Will the minister explain why this absurd cutback is occurring which is costing Canadians jobs, service, and, perhaps most important of all, jobs in businesses which will fold as a result of increased transportation costs because of this particular decision?

Mr. Bockstael: Mr. Chairman, may I say in answer to the hon. member for Kamloops-Shuswap that I believe his area is served by CN express, is it not?

Mr. Riis: By CN and CP.

Mr. Bockstael: It is not the desire of the department to cut back on services or to elimitate a service. It is simply that CN has been losing $53 million a year in its express operations because in many areas CN is facing competition from other operators. To use an example, in Amherst, Nova Scotia, when CN speaks of cutting out its services, it is reported that 12 private contractors are willing to take on the job and replace them in providing that service. Essentially it is a lack in the traffic volume or the high cost of operating the express services traditionally provided by the railways.

The hon. member gives the example of a pottery firm. His colleague, the hon. member for Regina West—

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the parliamentary secretary, but the time allotted to both members has expired.

Mr. Huntington: Mr. Chairman, it is indeed a pleasure to have this opportunity to question the minister through you, Mr. Chairman. I was fascinated by the minister's answer to my colleague, the hon. member for St. John's West when he said, "money, money, money". The minister talked about the brown envelope question which was introduced by this side. It is very interesting how easy it is for the government to find $28,400,000 for propaganda purposes just like that; it is not even in the estimates. The excuse the minister gave the hon. member for St. John's West that there is not money is just hogwash.

● (2050)

Also I was fascinated with the minister's answer on JETS, the radar problem or dilemma in Canada. I was told by officers of the Air Traffic Controllers Association that the JETS system is approximately eight years old and is completely obsolete. There is one installation in Moncton, and now it is planned to instal others across Canada over the next three years. Updated systems are already in place in the United States. JETS are computer simulators which predict by calculation where aircraft will be, and now there is a system of live definition of where aircraft will be. JETS are obsolete, yet they are continuing to spend millions of dollars on them. The system is so obsolete that it cannot even transfer aircraft from one zone to another in Canada.

The executive of the Air Traffic Controllers Association of Canada has invited industry representatives to luncheons so that they might understand the problem the association is having with the Department of Transport. I appeal to the minister to invite the executive to lunch so that he will hear the same lecture they are giving to industry representatives throughout the land. The minister should not lecture them; he should listen, because they have an interesting and valuable story about how our aircraft communication can be first class. It is ridiculous to continue to spend money on an obsolete system.

I should also like to question the minister about the government's offshore sickness. It seems everything is in place to serve interests offshore rather than Canadian or domestic ones. For example, the matter of tax treaties and banks lending subsidiaries of foreign corporations money from Canada was raised in the House. The interest on this money comes back into Canada tax free through various wrinkles of the Canadian government tax treaty. One matter which pertains to the minister's responsibility is the 25 per cent of one one hundred and twentieth of duty and taxes paid on dredging and other marine equipment on an as-used basis. If a Canadian corporation builds or owns a Canadian dredge, it pays all its duties and taxes up front in cash, or "baby, you just don't get it". But we allow foreigners to come in and pay 25 per cent of one-one hundred and twentieth of duty payable over a ten-year basis and on an as-used basis. How can Canadian plants compete with that gimmick?

There are foreign dredges in the country. Our own Canadian dredging plant capacity is utilized only 20 per cent. The capital is sitting with an interest burden building upon it, yet there are gimmicks which allow foreigners a preferred status. There are three foreign dredges working in the Arctic with live-aboard crews. There is tokenism. They bring four or five Canadians up to these dredges to learn the foreign technology, but they are not allowed to touch one thing. They are nothing but deckhands. As a matter of fact, the minister might talk to a couple of them who have quit because they would not put up with it. The wages of the foreign crews are not subject to income tax. They are advanced money for expenses, little trips and holidays, but their wages are paid at home. What is happening to the country? Where are we in terms of common-sense? They are working against Canadian marine unions, and there is correspondence on file from the unions complaining about it.

I should like to refer to Mount St. Helens in Washington which blew its top. Great, massive quantities of mud came down and filled the river systems there. We saw tragic motion pictures of fish dying in the heat of the water. There was a national emergency on the west coast of the United States, and the U.S. government called for all the dredges it could get. They were brought in from San Francisco, Los Angeles, Long Beach on the west coast, from the gulf and even from the east to handle this national emergency. At that time there was dredging equipment in British Columbia which was not being used. It was available; it was absolutely ideal to bail the mud out of these rivers in Washington. But, the Jones act of the United States would not allow the use of any of that equipment, so the emergency situation did not provide any revenue to Canadian companies.

Moving from that situation on the west coast and the protectionism of the United States to the Miramichi bids which opened on December 3, I should like to indicate that four out of the five bids were foreign ones. Apparently a brand new company called Ledin is the low bidder. If a person in the dredging business was asked about the company, he would not have heard of it; it is a new company, and no one has ever heard of it. The low bid this year is $1 million higher than the Canadian bid of last year, but I am told by a responsible official that the bid is based on the leasing of a United States dredge. So, the United States piece of equipment will come here and take work away from a Canadian plant which is working at only 20 per cent capacity. I understand the dredge is being leased from Great Lakes Dredge and Docks Company.

What are we doing to ourselves? Let me deal with Roberts Bank which is close to my home. Canada has entered into coal contracts with Japan, but we do not have in place the dock capacity on the west coast to fulfil the coal and delivery contracts with that country. If there had not been a depression or a recession in the Japanese steel industry, we would have been called on for lack of delivery. We desperately need a second pad at Roberts Bank. This has been known for some years. It would put in place enough capacity in order to handle the contracts that already exist, yet it is not done. It was almost arranged and in progress a year ago, but what troubles me is that Canadian companies do not have the inside track. Who has the inside track on Roberts Bank? It is a foreign company. Somewhere in the system the definition and the terms for dredging contracts are such that Canadian dredging companies just cannot do the job within the time-frame set.

This is absolute insanity. What is the matter? Canadian equipment and crews are available. All of a sudden a design turns to a contract and our equipment is not big enough; only a foreign company from Holland can do the job. Is that not interesting?

I have in my possession one of the most amazing telegrams I have ever read. If the minister doubts me, let him listen. This telegram was received on December 3 from Holland. It is addressed to Sceptre Dredge and it is entitled "Subject—Vancouver, Roberts Bank Tender for Dredging and Reclamation". It is from Amstelveen, Amsterdam Ballast Dredging, a division of Ballast-Nedam Groep. That is the largest group of dredging operators, I guess, in the world. It says:

> Amsterdam Ballast Dredging, a division of Ballast-Nedam Groep, N.V. is interested in establishing a suitable partnership to execute the above works.

Can you imagine the audacity of this?

> It is our intention to carry out all or (of) the major part of the dredging and reclamation works and whereby your share would be the slope protection and servicing works.

● (2100)

Isn't that nice, Mr. Chairman? A foreign company says it is their intention to do the major part of the dredging work and "your share would be . . ." Mr. Minister, what the heck is going on in this country?

Mr. Siddon: Who is advising the minister?

Mr. Huntington: The telegram continues:

> Please advise us of our willingness to co-operate either on a joint venture or on subcontractor status, preferably by phone—

And the phone numbers are listed. It goes on:

> —or by return telex. We are primarily interested in the alternatives to complete the dredging in one season.

Isn't that fascinating? We had to go and set the terms for a big dredging contract to get a great big turning circle inside for the ships to turn around in so that we could dredge up three or four new pads. The turning circle on the inside basin was the reasoning behind that.

The secondary reason was that no Canadian company could do this within the limited time-frame the Department of the Environment set down since they say the dredging shall be done between this period and that period otherwise the crabs will get hurt. I am also told that the crabgrass they are trying to protect started to grow after the first dredging. Perhaps it is time we looked at some of these applied biologists and began to apply some common sense in terms of the total picture before us.

The point I am making is really an appeal: what the heck is going on? There are many Canadian dredging companies for the Arctic, Roberts Bank and Miramichi, yet we get into deals like this where somehow or other outsiders have the inside track, where they can make requests of Canadian companies such as this. I think something is very wrong.

Mr. Siddon: It smells fishy, too.

Mr. Huntington: I would like the minister to answer these questions. What are we to do about dredging in the Arctic? Why cannot Canadian equipment be used in the Arctic? Why must we have foreign crews aboard who are not paying their full share of taxes? How long do you think the Canadian maritime unions are willing to put up with this kind of nonsense? We have all this unemployment. We know what our needs are. We are dredging knowledge, yet find it taken over by foreigners. We are talking about the heart of a serious problem, a serious lack of communication between the department and the Canadian public at large.

Before I go on to the next subject I would like the minister to answer those questions.

Mr. Bockstael: Mr. Chairman, I would like to address the first—

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Huntington: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order. I wonder if the minister could answer these questions. He is here and I do not think he should have his parliamentary secretary answer for him.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. I see the minister is rising, now, to the satisfaction of the hon. member.

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Chairman, it was a matter of dividing the job between my parliamentary secretary and myself. I was going to speak after he was finished. He was to answer the first part of the hon. member's comments.

Mr. Nielsen: He is here and he is responsible.

Mr. Pepin: On the subject of contracting, and in particular contracting abroad, I want to emphasize that the hon. member took a one-sided approach to this thing. For example, he neglected all kinds of nuances. There is no doubt that allowing foreigners to contract in Canada on dredging has some good consequences. First of all, as to the lower cost and in providing more competition, obviously. I could quote chapter and verse with respect to that. Also, there are instances where the equipment is not available in Canada. There are situations where the equipment is not suitable.

Mr. Siddon: Who fed you that?

Mr. Pepin: There are all kinds of situations which really do exist—

Mr. Forrestall: You be careful how you respond to this.

Mr. Pepin: I am simply expressing that there are two sides.

Mr. Forrestall: Of course there are two sides. You had better be very direct and honest with the Canadian Seafarers in this country.

Mr. Pepin: I am simply making the point, and I will repeat it, that this is a two-sided story. When you close your bidding to foreign companies you may very well create problems for yourself, for example, in terms of competition on cases other than the one in which you are involved at the particular moment. I could give examples of that. It is not as black and white as has been presented here tonight.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): It is pretty muddy.

Mr. Pepin: With respect to the subject of the importation of dredges, I do not know if I understand the argument very well. I did take note of it. I do not know if I understand what the hon. member for Capilano said about the foreign importer only having to pay one-twentieth of the 25 per cent duty each month he has his equipment in place.

Mr. Huntington: Twenty-five per cent of one-one hundred and twentieth of duty and tax payable.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. Either we hear from the minister or we hear from the member for Capilano.

Mr. Huntington: I would like him to have the facts.

Mr. Pepin: I was trying to answer to the best of my capacity. What I understand is that he must pay one-twentieth of 25 per cent duty each month he has his equipment in place. The hon. member says that if a Canadian was to do that he would have to put 25 per cent up front. Is that it?

Mr. Huntington: He pays his duty and taxes up front on his own equipment.

Mr. Pepin: My understanding is that he is in exactly the same situation. If he imports the foreign dredge he would be in exactly the same situation as a foreigner would be.

Mr. Huntington: What about Canadian equipment? How will you encourage the use of Canadian equipment?

Mr. Pepin: I do not have that here and I will try to decipher it further. This does not seem to be the great injustice the hon. member is referring to.

I am impressed by some of the things the member for Capilano has said and I will certainly give that a lot of attention. I have already done this. I have suggested to the chairman of the National Harbours Board that Canadian dredging companies should be accommodated. I also expressed a wish that if foreigners were to be retained they should enter in consortia with Canadian dredging companies. I was told this might lead to difficult situations. I understand other people have said that the way for Canada to make the best of these situations is for the Canadian government to buy the equipment and then lend it back to the dredging companies.

Mr. Forrestall: That is a long-term solution to tomorrow's problem.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please.

Mr. Pepin: I am impressed by the argument—

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. minister but the time allotted to both members has expired.

Mr. Nielsen: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman. Obviously the minister is woefully ignorant of the point or he cannot answer the—

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please.

Mr. Nielsen: —very legitimate questions put by the hon. member for Capilano.

• (2110)

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please.

Mr. Nielsen: I am rising on a point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The Deputy Chairman: I have listened to a few words of the point of order and I fail to see a point of order.

Mr. Nielsen: I am rising on a point or order. The point of order is that the government in such an exercise is responsible to account to hon. members for their estimates. That is not happening because the minister has not informed himself or his officials have not informed him.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. The hon. member might not be satisfied with the answer he received, but I see no point of order in that.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Chairman, you have not even heard the point of order, so how can you make a judgment?

Mr. McRae: Mr. Chairman, once again, I am pleased to take part in this exercise. I think it is one of the better functions of the House of Commons. I certainly associate myself with the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain in praising this particular exercise. It seems to me the people of this country who are interested and who are watching the proceedings on television are seeing the House in one of its better moments. It is a good deal better than the question period, which is really a case of one-upmanship. In this exercise we get down to business, and individual members put national and local interests in front of the minister and receive replies.

I am pleased with the replies of the minister, both throughout today and yesterday. Transport is probably the most difficult department in any government and certainly in the government of Canada. It deals with a very large number of issues and a great deal of diversity, all of which makes it extremely difficult for the minister. In the few months in which the minister has held this portfolio, he has handled the problems extremely well. It may be very trite to say that transportation is of vital importance to Canada, but it is important to remind Canadians, again and again, of the importance of the industry.

There is probably no other country in which transportation is so important and so complex. I challenge anybody to name a country in the world in which transportation is as complex for a population of 25 million. The distances are great and there are all kinds of regional problems. A sophisticated transportation system is necessary to link those regions which are interdependent, if not totally dependent on such links. Canada has a high growth, sophisticated economy and there is a high volume of goods and service equipment moving across the country.

On a per capita basis no country in the world has as much export trade as Canada. Certainly, we are the world's number one exporting country. When I refer to transportation on a national plane, I am also thinking of my own community because it is one of the few constituencies where the national interest almost invariably applies directly to the constituency. So when I talk about transportation in Thunder Bay, I am usually talking about a key national interest, because that community is key to the whole movement of goods and services in this country.

Thunder Bay is located almost at the centre of the country geographically or, as we say, at the heart of the country. The distances to other parts of the country from Thunder Bay are very great. Without a doubt, that community is the largest exporting community on a per capita basis in Canada. No other community has the export trade in grain, pulp and paper, transportation of equipment and so on, at least on a per capita basis. This year was a record year for the port of Thunder Bay in the movement of grain. It was probably the greatest amount of grain moved through any port in the history of mankind in one year. It is a vital port in the movement of goods and services throughout Canada.

I would like to cite some of the problems which I foresee for Thunder Bay. The port came very close to its capacity this year. The Lakehead transportation study, which was part of the Central Access study of three or four years ago, said that Thunder Bay would not reach capacity for 20 years. But three years or four years hence we have already come very close to that capacity.

It is important that we begin to devote attention to Thunder Bay. One must not forget that almost two-thirds of all Canadian grain moves through it, and will continue to do so. We must begin to look at ways in which we can improve the situation if, indeed, we are coming close to capacity. I refer hon. members to a comment which was made by Doug Radke, the deputy co-ordinator and the acting co-ordinator at present of the Federal Grain Transportation Authority in the Montreal Gazette on October 7. He says there are problems with regard to turn-around time and sorting out trains in Thunder Bay and that action must be taken to improve the situation. He goes on to say that the turn-around time for most grain trains is approximately 14 days to 16 days, and comments:

> Reducing Thunder Bay's turn-around time is as good as adding more hopper cars to the system,... For instance, a 15 per cent reduction in the port's turn-around time would represent the same boost in grain shipping capacity as the addition of 4,000 hopper cars by 1985.

He goes on to explain in this article why Thunder Bay is not as efficient as it should be and how it can become more efficient.

I presented to the minister earlier this year a proposal designed to improve the movement of grain. I did not ask the minister for more money. I was suggesting that if the government intended to spend $1 billion on hopper cars and other items, it should look at spending $30 million at Thunder Bay as a better alternative. And Mr. Radke, three or four months later, supports me in this particular article.

The proposal which I made in the spring, Mr. Chairman, has been reviewed again. Comments have been received, some of which were adverse, from the department and from the grain companies. We are now looking at another proposal which we think will achieve some of the same results—perhaps it is a better proposal. This new proposal tries to solve the same problems as were outlined in the other, and it deals with the fact that most of the shunting by CPR is done on the main line. We went back to a proposal brought forward by CPR in 1969 or 1970 when it acquired land to the west of the city in order to build a yard so that the movement of grain and other goods could be improved. I bring this subject to the attention of the minister with the idea in mind that in the next two or three months a new proposal will be presented, and we hope it will receive very close attention.

As Mr. Radke says, a 15 per cent improvement in turnaround in Thunder Bay is as good as 4,000 hopper cars. We believe this would cost $30 million or $40 million, whereas 4,000 hopper cars would cost many times that amount. The community of Thunder Bay has become far more aware of its potential as a major port. It has set up a civic transportation committee to study these matters, and we hope we will be able to have the support and attention of the minister, with the idea that someone will appear before the committee or become part of that committee in the near future as we consider these larger problems.

We are also concerned about the future of the St. Lawrence Seaway. The transport committee had a meeting with Mr. Turner in Regina in September and it was very interesting. He put it to us that one of the problems the grain industry was really concerned about was the future of the Seaway. This was the line of reasoning that was used: They said, "Look, the Americans are going to increase their grain shipments and their exports in other areas very, very considerably, and their Mississippi waterway system is operating nearly at capacity. They are going to require much more of the Seaway. We will have to increase our tonnage through the Seaway considerably, particularly of grain; also, as energy problems develop, far more coal and other goods will he shipped, and so the pressure on the seaway will be very considerable."

The key problems are, I think, twofold: one is the Welland Canal, which is a bottleneck. I know the ministry is looking very carefully at this because we have had testimony to this effect in committee. The other problem is, of course, that we must keep the system competitive; Seaway costs cannot be allowed to grow any more than the market will bear. Those are two very significant concerns the grain industry has and which I share as a member interested in the movement of grain, along with our community of Thunder Bay.

In the two or three minutes I have left before I ask the minister to respond, I would like to say something pleasant about VIA Rail because so much is said about VIA Rail that is unpleasant. I think a lot of it is said by people who just do not use the service. I have had occasion in the last couple of months to use the Transcontinental and the Ottawa to Toronto rail service three or four times, and I have been very pleased with the improvement in the service. There is no doubt in my mind that we made the right move when we took the two major railways in this country out of passenger service and put the project into the hands of people who wanted to run a passenger service, and whose business is running a passenger service. I can tell you that the attitude, the cleanliness, the whole approach to the service shows great improvement.

Now, there are all kinds of problems, and I will admit that. There are problems with terminals not being clean and so on. But I think that on balance, in two or three years, we have come a long, long way, and that praise is due to Mr. Robertson, the whole VIA group, and all of the employees. With that I will give a minute to the minister to comment.

Mr. Bockstael: Our colleague from the constituency of Thunder Bay-Atikokan has agreed that I can answer his question.

We are very interested in his proposal regarding improvements that could be effected in Thunder Bay but since he has indicated that the proposal is under review and is being studied further, there will be no comment at this time, but we look forward to receiving that proposal.

On the subject of the seaway, research and development is perfecting its technique to keep the grain berths ice-free. We hope this will lengthen the shipping season through the St. Lawrence Seaway, and to that end an icebreaker, the Alexander Henry is based in Thunder Bay. It will be there, as required, at the close of the run. We will co-operate with all the grain shippers to achieve the earliest possible opening in 1981. He has our concurrence that the cost of shipping through the Welland Canal will be kept down. It is evident that this government is supporting VIA Rail in improving the service to passengers and it will continue to do so.

Mr. Ellis: Mr. Chairman, I want to spend, if I may, about ten or 15 minutes going into a subject that I discussed with the minister previously. I probably will discuss it with him again, and unless I get different answers, I definitely will. A few weeks ago I asked the minister a series of questions about general aviation. In fairness, I spoke rather quickly, and I rhymed off about eight separate questions in that exchange. I probably passed them by the minister so fast that he did not get a chance to answer them properly. He latched on to one of them and gave the stock answer that we have been given for some time.

This evening, Mr. Chairman, I would like to go back over those questions, which are all related to general aviation. Frankly, I intend to press again the concept that I put before the minister previously—that within the last decade the Department of Transport has taken an adversary position with regard to general aviation, a position that did not exist earlier. In the regulations it set down, in the manner in which it has dealt with organizations and groups within the general aviation, with reckless abandon the private aircraft operators in this country—country that has more private aircraft per capita than any other company in the world—it has incurred the wrath of a group of men and women who are, by and large, pretty law-abiding citizens, who normally pay their own way, and ask for nothing free from the government.

The first item, which I know the minister will want to answer in exactly the same way he has in the past, has to do with this confounded $5 landing fee that was imposed on private plane operators about five weeks ago. I contend now, as I have contended in the past, that it was put on for one purpose only—to deter private aircraft from going into four airports in Canada. Private aircraft operators and owners do not object to the user-pay principle. Rather, they object to the method that the department uses to collect the fee. Private operators are quite willing to pay their fair share through gasoline tax concession fees or taxes, but not by landing fees. I have been the recipient of those landing fee invoices. They are expensive to produce. Obviously, the $1.65 that was collected did not come near to covering the cost of them. The $5, it seems to me, will barely cover the cost of those multicopied computer-produced, sometimes erroneous invoices. I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that this is the wrong way to go about things. Surely, if any motorist driving through a major city in Canada were faced with a barrier at the edge of that city, and had to pay a $5 fee every time he drove in, he would raise particular hell. And you could not blame him for that. Private aircraft in this country fulfil an identical utility transportation function. I see no reason at all why they should not all be treated similarly. Motorists pay taxes on their gas. Private aircraft owners are already paying a much larger amount on the gas they buy. In fact, the amount right now is about 13.1 cents per litre. Unless that is changed, the tax on motor fuel is about two-thirds of that. If that is the case, why should we have to pay a landing fee, one that is difficult to administer, expensive to collect, and obviously a deterrent to landing at major airports?

Those of us who fly feel very strongly and, as a matter of public policy that this usurious fee should and could be dropped. I shall ask the minister to keep this in the back of his mind and remember that point because I am afraid of what his answers might be.

I shall go on to one or two other points on the long list I have and see what kinds of answers I get to them before the minister comes back to this one. One factor which supports my request those fees be dropped is that the ministry is not providing any alternate service. If, for example, at Vancouver there was an adequate airport at Boundary Bay or if at Toronto there was an adequate service at Toronto Island, there might well be a case. They are only a few miles apart. In an answer given to me some time ago, I heard that we should look at Hope airport. I am not in British Columbia very often, and I am sure my British Columbia colleagues will correct me if I am wrong, but the last time I drove from Hope to Vancouver international it was a very long drive. I would never consider it as being a substitute.

There are other things which bother aircraft operators. We are told that Toronto international is extremely busy. I have read it is the third, fourth or fifth busiest airport in Canada in terms of landings and takeoffs. But in the north end of Toronto international, runway 1028 is rarely used. In most major airports there are taxiways which would be perfectly adequate for light aircraft, up to and including the twins of the major manufacturers. There is no reason at all why those taxiways could not be used. These aircraft can land, unless they are extremely heavily loaded, in 1,500 feet to 2,500 feet and take off quickly. It would not take a great deal of expertise to have that happen. Yet, unlike many airports in the United States, the ministry in Canada will not allow this. Aircraft are used in Canada to a much greater degree than they are in any other country. I see the minister and his parliamentary secretary writing away feverishly, so I think I will go through my list. I will let them answer my questions and then I will make one final request at the very end.

One thing that bothers private pilots excessively is the extremely arbitrary system used when a pilot is discharged for medical reasons. There is no way a pilot can get a good second opinion and convince the ministry of his ability to fly. Pilots must use those medical officers—admittedly they are usually good doctors—who have been politically appointed. Pilots are not allowed to go to an independent specialist, particularly a cardiologist, to get a second opinion which would perhaps convince the department of their ability to fly. Surely the minister will recognize that probably one of the safest pilots is one who has had a problem and is taking proper medication, exercising properly and eating a proper diet. After all, that pilot has no desire to have a heart attack at 2,000, 10,000 or 20,000 feet.

Mr. Nielsen: The hon. member for Brandon-Souris is one of those.

Mr. Ellis: My colleague, the hon. member for Yukon has made a point that the hon. member for Brandon-Souris had a serious heart operation two and a half to three years ago. By looking after himself, he is probably in better physical shape now than he has been for many years.

Another item which plagues Canadian pilots concerns the regulations covering instrument ratings. The regulations in Canada are so difficult that there are more than 60 times as many instrument-rated pilots registered per capita in the United States than there are in Canada. Yet we have more pilots per capita in Canada. We have need of instrument rating because of our weather and because of long distance flying. We allow U.S. trained pilots to fly in our air space but we do not allow Canadians to become instrument-rated without complying with a particularly difficult set of regulations. Let me at this point toss in a little item—it exemplifies the type of thing which makes me state over and over again that the ministry has become an adversary to general aviation when it should be the support of general aviation. The department requires encoding altimeters at about 14,000 feet but the regulations with regard to installing an encoding altimeter in one's aircraft are maddeningly difficult and unreasonably expensive. It is not impossible, but it is very difficult to comply with them. Again, these are regulations with which they are not faced in countries where the aircraft are built.

I think I am getting close to the end of my allotted time, Mr. Chairman, but I want to put just one more question before the minister, his staff and his parliamentary secretary. It concerns the matter of emergency locator transmitters. I have been on my feet in this House about ELTs for all the time I have been here but I have not had a good straight answer to that question yet. The minister, and certainly his staff, will remember that private pilots were forced to put ELTs in their private aircraft. In principle, perhaps it was not a bad idea. If at that time the minister had admitted they had been warned that lithium batteries would cause difficulties, we could have made some representations. The Ministry of Transport was warned by manufacturers in the United States that the lithium batteries they were about to make mandatory in Canadian aircraft would cause difficulties, but the department neglected to heed that warning and went ahead and forced Canadian owners to put ELTs in their aircraft with lithium batteries.

When those batteries gave rise to difficulties and, indeed, caused a couple of serious crashes, the ministry backed off and said pilots were not required to have an ELT in their aircraft. I repeat, we are a country of people who fly. These pilots were forced to put in these ELTs at a cost of never less than $250. They were then told they could and should take them out.

We are now faced with a conflicting set of regulations. Frankly, as one who flies regularly, I do not know specifically what those regulations are. I put an ELT in my aircraft with other than a lithium battery. I hope it will work. The Ministry of Transport should take advantage of the size of this country and the number of aircraft here and develop an electronic locator transmitter which would be the envy of the world. We certainly have the brains and the technology to do that. The department deserves to do it and should do it for all pilots who fly in Canada. However, they are not doing it. I expect that very shortly we will again be told to put those ELTs in and pay for them again. I hope the minister will tell me this evening that if pilots are again forced to put in ELTs, the department will at least help pay for them.

I could go on and elaborate on this theme but I know my time must be running out. I ask the minister to tell me why the ministry has taken on the adversary position it has with the general aviation public in Canada.

The Deputy Chairman: The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. This exercise is an examination of the estimates for which the minister is accountable to the committee. That is the name of the whole exercise, the accountability of the minister. He should be answering the questions, not the parliamentary secretary. That is why he was given all sorts of notice for his department to be called. That is why he is here. It is the minister, not the parliamentary secretary who is accountable. Our practices and procedures require him to account to us on the questions that are put to him.

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Chairman, I do not have to teach you or the member for Yukon any constitutional law and practices. The member knows and Your Honour knows that the fact that I sit here makes me responsible for what my parliamentary secretary says. That is a customary practice and I would not think the member for Yukon would bother to raise that. It is anchored in our practices. I have seen it hundreds of times, as has he. If he has not, it is because he was not looking. It is done regularly. Therefore, I do not see why I should have to defend myself.

[Translation]

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. I recognize the President of the Privy Council.

Mr. Pinard: I only want to invite my colleague to read the Parliamentary Secretaries Act. It is very short and only says that the function of a parliamentary secretary is to assist the minister in his parliamentary duties. So I wonder why my colleague blames the parliamentary secretary for doing his duty. The minister is present in the House and the parliamentary secretary is assisting him in his parliamentary functions.

The hon. member is very lucky to have at the same time the minister and his parliamentary secretary to answer his questions as completely as possible. If he is really sincere, if he really wishes to obtain detailed information, he should be happy to get the red carpet treatment because he has here tonight to answer all his questions a minister and a parliamentary secretary who respect the law and three department officials. I wonder what more the hon. member wants. I wish I could understand the motives of his complaint. Is he sincere? I have some doubt about his real intent, but I give him the benefit of the doubt. I only tell him that he is treated royally and that he has no reason for complaining.

[English]

Mr. Nielsen: On a point of order.

The Deputy Chairman: The point of order has been disposed of.

Mr. Nielsen: No, it has not been disposed of. I want to speak further to the point of order.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member has spoken on the point of order. The Chair understood the hon. member to insist on having the minister answer the question. It is the privilege of the minister to answer or not to answer. In this case, when the parliamentary secretary wanted to answer, the minister rose and said that he was responsible for what the parliamentary secretary would say. I do not see why we should entertain further the point of order.

Mr. Nielsen: On a point of order.

The Deputy Chairman: I am prepared to hear a different point of order, not the same one.

Mr. Nielsen: You are going to hear the same point of order. The minister does not need you to—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The Chair has made a ruling. I have listened to the hon. member's point. He is not satisfied that the minister is not answering. The minister said he would be accountable for what the parliamentary secretary would answer. I have recognized the parliamentary secretary.

Mr. Nielsen: On a point of order.

The Deputy Chairman: If the hon. member has a different point of order, the Chair is prepared to hear him.

Mr. Nielsen: I move, seconded by the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings:

That the Minister of Transport be now heard pursuant to Standing Order 29.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Chairman, I thought it was the gracious thing to do. The parliamentary secretary is extremely competent in these matters.

Mr. Nielsen: On a point of order. Standing Order 29 is not debatable. The motion must be put now.

Mr. Forrestall: Put the motion immediately. It is not debatable. It should have been put two or three minutes ago.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. I have received advice from the officers at the Table. The hon. member has put his motion under Standing Order 29. I will read that Standing Order for the information of the hon. member:

When two or more members rise to speak, Mr. Speaker calls upon the member who first rose in his place; but a motion may be made that any member who has risen "be now heard", or "do now speak", which motion shall be forthwith put without debate.

Mr. Nielsen: That is the wrong one.

The Deputy Chairman: I did not see the minister rise to seek the floor. I then saw the minister rising to speak—

Mr. Nielsen: And I was on my feet.

The Deputy Chairman: The minister was not seeking the floor. Therefore the motion that he be now heard does not apply.

Mr. Knowles: What is happening to the time of the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings?

The Deputy Chairman: The rule states "when two or more members rise to speak". The minister had not risen to address the committee. The Chair did not make a choice one way or the other. The Chair recognized the only member who had risen, namely the parliamentary secretary. I then recognized the hon. member for Yukon on a point of order. If I failed to recognize the minister seeking the floor, and someone suggests that he now be heard, I stand to be corrected, but I did not see the minister rising to be heard. Now I see him rising to be heard. The Minister of Transport.

Mr. Nielsen: Now you see the two of us. Please put my motion.

Mr. Collenette: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman.

Some hon. Members: Question!

Mr. Nielsen: It is not debatable.

Mr. Collenette: It is out of order.

Mr. Nielsen: It must be put immediately.

Mr. Collenette: Mr. Chairman, I think you made yourself clear. The hon. member for Yukon did not have the floor in this debate. He was recognized on a point of order. He could only make that motion if he had the floor and was speaking to the debate. If the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings wants to make the motion, that is his prerogative. It is not the prerogative of any member on a point of order to move that a certain member be heard.

Mr. Nielsen: It certainly is. The minister could solve it all by answering the questions.

Mr. Pepin: I resent that—

The Deputy Chairman: This is the third time the minister rises to speak. I hope the hon. member for Yukon will accept that the minister wants to address the committee.

Mr. Nielsen: Absolutely.

The Deputy Chairman: Should I recognize the hon. member on a point of order rather than the minister? That was not a point of order. For the fifth time I see the minister seeking the floor. Perhaps later on the hon. member will want to seek the floor.

Mr. Nielsen: If the minister will answer the questions, I will gladly withdraw my motion.

The Deputy Chairman: That is not for the Chair.

• (2150)

Mr. Pepin: I consider the behaviour of the member for Yukon rather unfriendly. I have been here since three o'clock this afternoon enjoying myself very much. I have a very talented parliamentary secretary.

An hon. Member: Right on!

Mr. Pepin: I do not know how many times it has been said here that ministers are not making proper use of their talented parliamentary secretaries.

Mr. Nielsen: He can reply when you are away, and not on estimates.

Mr. Pepin: I explained my constitutional position very clearly. I am responsible and that is the name of the game. The hon. member for Yukon knows it very well. If anybody knows, he knows it very, very well. We are trying to answer questions. I was preoccupied, of course, by the round of questions directed to me previously. I was rereading while my hon. friend was speaking. I was reading the submission to the Treasury Board on the dredging at Roberts Bank, which is quite normal. The hon. member for Yukon would have done the same thing.

I have already been in committee and have answered the same series of questions the member is asking now to the best of my ability. The hon. member for St. Boniface, my learned, talented, distinguished and handsome parliamentary secretary was paying particular attention. One thing that was said troubled me very much and it was the claim that there is an atmosphere of antagonism existing.

An hon. Member: Adversary.

Mr. Pepin: I was troubled by that. I do not see it, but I will be looking into it and inquiring about it. My officials, as far as I know them, are extremely friendly. Maybe the member should talk to me personally about that and give me some examples. It is a very serious allegation.

I do not know how many times I have answered on the subject of increased landing fees; I have written to members on that.

Mr. Ellis: You gave the wrong answer!

Mr. Pepin: Well, I gave a long explanation and said it only applied to small piston engine aircraft under 7,000 pounds, and that it only applies at four Canadian airports. Five dollars is not the end of the world. It is a great increase from $1.65. It is less than what is paid at other airports. It is one-tenth of what is paid at Boston and the Kennedy airport. It is not indicative of an unfriendly disposition to general aviation. Other satellite airports are available, Buttonville, Maple, for Toronto; Pitt Meadows and Abbottsford for Vancouver. I have recited all these places. I cannot go on repeating them. My officials came to me and asked if I thought it would be too much. We debated it at length and made the decision. Some will think it is unfair. We have debated it in committee and here tonight.

On the subject of pilots' licences revoked by doctors, I am told there is an appeal procedure. There is a well-documented appeal procedure which reviews all medical evidence. I have received correspondence on almost all of these matters. An appeal can be made to the minister in the final analysis. Spread the message that the minister has very good judgment, is very thorough, very prudent—

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. Even after allowing time for the point of order, I think the hon. minister has taken up his 20 minutes.

Mr. Masters: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I think it is particularly appropriate that I should have an opportunity to speak on the subject of the Department of Transport because while we all recognize—and it has been said often during the debate—that transportation is vital to Canada it is especially so to the port of Thunder Bay. Thunder Bay is, as we know, the transportation hub of Canada. We are on the mainline of Air Canada, we are on the mainline of CP Rail, there are extensive CN operations in our area and we are an ocean port 2,000 miles from the sea. I was particularly pleased to note that at the beginning of this discussion on transport the minister mentioned the great growth which is taking place in the west and the anticipated growth which will be taking place there. We take a very special interest in that matter because by and large the grain from the prairies flows through Thunder Bay and, I am proud to say, very efficiently. We are also pleased to note that potash from Saskatchewan is being shipped more and more to the port of Thunder Bay and thence various points around the world. Coal from the west is used in Thunder Bay, reaching our port via rail. The coal which is not used in local plants is shipped elsewhere.

Built in 1959, the seaway showed a profit this year for the first time. It is certainly vindication for those men and women of vision who advocated the building of a project which has meant so much not only to Thunder Bay but to Canada as a whole. I also know that Transport Canada is eagerly awaiting, as we all are, a report from a seaway task force. The department recognizes that this mighty avenue to the world of commerce must be as efficient as possible. We need studies of this kind and we need this harmonious relationship between the federal government, the provinces and the ports themselves to make sure we have the transportation system we need and which we will need more and more in the future.

I remind the minister that we must continue to improve and upgrade our port facilities, our storage facilities and our cargo-handling capability. All ports in this country must be looked at including the port of Thunder Bay, the east coast, the west coast and the Arctic ports such as Churchill and so forth. We must be alert to maintaining our ice-breaking fleets, and we must improve our technology. I believe the parliamentary secretary made reference to that. We must continue to improve our technology to make sure that we can extend the shipping season through the cold Canadian winters. It has been proved that water transportation is still the most energy-efficient means of transporting volume goods, and therefore we think it is in the interest of the country to maintain programs which will allow us to extend the life of the seaway and the use of our ports closer to a year-round basis.

While I have talked a great deal, as did my colleague, the hon. member for Thunder Bay-Atikokan, about our port, I would like to make a quick comment about the rail service which comes into Thunder Bay. Rail, of course, was our first major way of linking the country together from sea to sea, and I am happy that we as a government are continuing to look to the rail service and giving it its due. As we all know, more money has been allocated to the rail service in the budget to make sure that the system works effectively, and I think when we see and note that Thunder Bay had a record season in grain shipment this year, we must acknowledge that the rail system is indeed working, and working well. I just suggest to the minister that we continue our studies and our improvements, that we look to ways to improve the efficiency of rail handling and that we also look to the subject of rail relocation in the many communities in Canada which want things done to correct the lack of planning of years gone by or to catch up with the changes in our modern communities. Those are long-term projects, and certainly no one would expect that we would see those things happen in a day or a year, but I hope we are looking at plans which will put us in such a position to set policies which will lead to that desired end over time.

The air service we receive in this country is also very vital to keeping this country together. I am proud that Air Canada is showing a profit. I believe we have a great Canadian airline; I believe it is being recognized and will enjoy a very prosperous and good future.

I note that the federal government is working in northwestern Ontario on the northern Ontario aviation master plan. This means that the Ontario government and the federal government are working closely to improve the air safety situation in the north. Northwestern Ontario counts very much on feeder airlines and small private planes flying about to cover the vast distances involved.

I hope that we continue the work we have been doing in Timmins, and the Thunder Bay airport, the Kenora airport, and at Dryden. The new air navigational aid which has been installed at Wawa gives us an even greater safety factor.

I have talked much about Canada's water, air and rail services, and I am proud that Transport Canada serves all of Canada so well. We can all suggest changes and find fault in individual situations, but I think that if we are honest with one another, we must encourage the Department of Transport to continue giving us one of the best transportation systems in the world.

Finally, I will give the minister a brief reminder and ask him to be sure that his department is looking ahead and planning for the future because long-term planning is required in these vital functions. I know that the minister will want to be sure to advise his department to look at the transportation needs of the country in a long-term way so that when we need additional services and improved services, they will be provided.

Mr. Neil: Mr. Chairman, I would like to make a few comments about prairie branch lines and then pose a few questions to the minister.

The minister is aware that under his predecessor some 1,000 miles of line were given protection by order in council, 600 to the year 2000 and some 400 with the intention of doing a study of off-line elevators. After the minister took over I found it rather interesting to listen to some of the comments he made as he travelled about the west. The indications seemed to be that he was the one who saved these lines. I have also noted that the former member for Assiniboia has spent some time suggesting that he and his party saved these lines. More latterly members of the NDP in Saskatchewan have been saying that they saved the lines. I think it is rather important to make it perfectly clear for the record that the 1000-odd miles of line which were protected were protected by the Conservative government under the then minister of transport, the hon. member for Vegreville.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Neil: It was interesting as well to listen to the comments of the minister, who said that he himself did not think the lines should be saved, but after talking to some of his colleagues he felt it was in the political interest of his party to do so.

After the minister came to power he examined the order in council of his predecessor and did in fact leave the guaranteed lines alone, but he took steps to pass an order in council to the effect that those 400-odd miles of lines which were set aside for off-line elevator purposes were taken off the protection list. In newspaper reports and on the radio the minister's comments with respect to the off-line elevator concept were to the effect that there was no evidence of any kind before him which he could study to determine whether the off-line elevator concept should be considered.

I found this rather interesting because there is a public document in existence. It was put out by the research branch of the Canadian Transport Commission, and it is entitled "Economic Feasibility of Off-track Elevators". The date of that report is January, 1980, yet the minister said there were no studies and nothing to indicate that the off-line elevator concept should be considered. I hope the minister will take steps to obtain a copy of this public document. I hope he will read it and give consideration to try the off-line elevator concept at least on one line. The former minister suggested the Fisher Branch line, which goes some 80 miles without an elevator or a station on it. The cost of rehabilitation, as I recall, would be about $10 million. There is grain at the top end of that line which has to be delivered to the elevator. In our minds it made sense that the off-line elevator concept should at least be given a try on that line. However, the minister simply threw the suggestion out on the basis that there was no study. He had nothing on which to base a decision, so he arbitrarily passed an order in council to refer those 400-odd miles of line to the CTC for consideration and abandonment.

The minister is aware, of course, that the steps taken by his predecessor were based on certain recommendations made to him in a report. I know he has said publicly on several occasions that he did not have access to that report and was therefore not in a position to really understand the reason for the recommendations. But if the hon. gentleman had been watching the news releases which came out of the office of the Minister of Transport, he would have found that on December 20 of 1979, the department issued a news release setting forth several recommendations which the then minister said he was prepared to act upon. One recommendation was to the effect—I hope the minister will consider it—that an advisory committee should be set up composed of representatives of the various elevator companies, the railways and the office of the grain transportation co-ordinator to determine priorities for the rehabilitation of the lines. The minister is aware that until this time the consideration of the priorities is a matter for consultation between the railways and the minister's office. The basis of the recommendation which the former minister was prepared to accept was that the elevator companies should have a part in the decision-making because their decision as to which elevators on which lines would be upgraded or where new elevators would be built had to be based on a decision with regard to rehabilitation. The minister accepted that recommendation. I should like to ask the minister whether or not he is prepared to consider that recommendation.

The other point I should like to make also concerns a recommendation adopted by the former minister. Many people throughout the prairie provinces have been concerned about the validity of the charges set by the railways when they are rehabilitating their lines. The recommendation accepted by the minister was to the effect that when the rehabilitation work could be done by contractors in cases where the engineering skill of the railroads was not required, public tenders should be called. If the railway wished, it could submit a tender, and if it happened to be the lowest tender, the railway would be entitled to do the job. The calling of tenders would mean that the public and the government would know they were getting value for their money in the rehabilitation of the rail lines.

My final question to the minister is with respect to the time-frame and the money to be spent on the rehabilitation of lines. I understand that, in 1979 dollars, the total cost of rehabilitation was estimated at some $1.2 billion. The government recommended the expenditure of some $700 million for rehabilitating the lines. I am told that the cost of rehabilitation appreciates at the rate of 10 per cent a year. So it seems to me that, at the present rate of expenditure, it is doubtful we will ever catch up with the rehabilitation of the lines which have been guaranteed to the year 2000. So my third question to the minister is: what are his intentions with respect to the financing of the rehabilitation. I hope he will not say to us that we will be using that $4 billion which was announced a few months ago by the government as moneys which would be made available for economic development in western Canada. That $4 billion is money coming from the west, and if it is going to be used for economic development, I suggest to the minister that economic development does not mean rehabilitation of lines.

I have posed my questions and I will now sit down. I would appreciate hearing from the minister in response.

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Chairman, let me say briefly that the reason I did not accept orders 16, 17 and 18 approved by my predecessor relatively late in his tenure was that there was no overt, known or public justification for what had been done. I found that to be rather strange and that was why I hesitated. I also hesitated because there has been quite a lot of debate on other ways of transporting grain. A number of people have come out in favour of off-track and off-line elevators, transportation by truck, and so on, and I thought that this issue should be aired and that a debate should take place before a decision was reached on the spending of hundreds of millions of dollars. However, what happened is that I went round consulting a great number of people. I did not talk about studies having been made. I just happen to have the notes that I used and the communique which I issued at that time. It says specifically that my recent extensive discussions with almost all the grain handling companies in the west have led me to the conclusion that the subsidized hauling of grain by truck, which was considered by some as a possible alternative to rebuilding the rail lines, is not generally accepted.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Pepin: There is so much division on those things that you are happy when you have a few friends around. That is what I said. I did not say that there was no study, I just said that my experience demonstrated that there was no great, passionate movement in favour of the subject. That is why I did not pursue order 17, inclusion in the basic network for a period of five years, which was based on the concept of off-line elevators.

On the selection of branch lines for rehabilitation, it is as my friend described it. The selection is essentially decided by the railways and the department. I presume it is still the case. I am told, and I assumed repeatedly that it was being done, that the department consults with grain companies before taking a decision, and now, presumably, it does so with the grain co-ordinator. My hon. friend knows so much more about it than I do, or he can easily claim he does, so he must be aware that very often the grain elevator operators are not too keen to let it be known that they intend to close an elevator in a certain place. They are keener, of course, to let it be known that they intend to build a new one, which is the popular thing to do. Closing an elevator is not as welcome. That is why the process and the procedure are informal. When grain companies or pool operating elevators want to make it known that they want the government to rehabilitate a branch line, they find a way. I have been exposed to that process. So unless my hon. friend insists, and talks to me afterwards about it, I see no major difficulty there.

With respect to the contracts that lead to branch line rehabilitation, I understand that a great number of them, or parts of them, are open to bidding on a local basis on some of the less specialized jobs. But when it comes to the more specific railway work which needs to be done, generally it is done by the railways themselves for a good number of reasons. One of them is that there is what I would call a respectable agreement between the railways and the unions that the railways will go to their own employees to do the work before contracting it out. So, my friend will have to make a decision—to whom does he want to be friendly?

I think the regular employees of railways deserve some consideration when it comes to specific technical work; I do not take objection to it. But this is not the debate. The debate really is—who will do best the technical railway work? I think the railways would do it best.

Mr. Neil: There is no question about that.

Mr. Pepin: Also there is the element of protecting the regular permanent railway employees, which is why more of the work is not contracted out. As far as I am concerned the explanation is justified. I hope it is justified to the hon. member as well.

With respect to the size of the budget allocated to branch line rehabilitation, the hon. member knows better than I that $240 million has already been spent. The total amount has not changed since the hon. member for Vegreville was the minister. It is $700 million over a period of eight years. The point raised or implied is a valid one. If we had more money, it would be a good thing to accelerate the process, for a great number of reasons, one being the advantage of concentration. There is no doubt if more work was being done over a shorter period of time that there would be sizeable advantages. But, things have not really changed. The same amount of money has been allocated, and one thinks about what one might be able to do if it could be accelerated.

Mr. Neil: Mr. Chairman, I have one quick comment with respect to the off-line elevator concept. With regard to the Valleyview line, if it disappears and there is no offline elevator—

Mr. Mazankowski: They do not have a line now.

Mr. Neil: My colleague advises me that they do not have a line, that it is gone. This means 700 farmers are hauling grain 100 miles. Where is the equity in that?

The Chairman: Order. Unfortunately the hon. member's time has expired, but perhaps the minister has a brief reply.

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Chairman, I was going to say smilingly that the equity is in the same place as it was when my predecessor was the minister. My information is that my predecessor suggested—and I do not want to go through all the details—that in this particular matter, circumstances being what they are, the initiative might be with the government of Alberta. Also I understand my predecessor suggested to interested parties that they should knock at Alberta's door first. I think this is a good idea.

Mr. Nielsen: What does that have to do with Moose Jaw?

Mr. Pepin: There could be discussions between Alberta and ourselves to see what the division might be.

Mr. Mazankowski: At that time there were good relationships between the two governments.

Mr. Hovdebo: Mr. Chairman, I have three questions which I should like to put to the minister. I will put them one at a time and hope that the minister does not use up all the time answering the first one.

My first question concerns the estimates on the Prince Albert airport, that is, the present, past and future ones. My second question concerns boxcar requirements, and my third concerns the consolidation of express across the west.

Dealing with the Prince Albert airport, Prince Albert is an area with 30,000 people. It has a marketing area of another 30,000 people, plus 30,000 people in the far north which it services as far as transportation is concerned. In the last few years Prince Albert has been treated to the chicken-and-egg syndrome. When it asks for east-west air service, it is told that it cannot have that service because the planes cannot land at its airport; that it does not have the terminal nor the necessary navigational equipment. On the other hand, when it asks for an extension of the runways, the necessary navigational equipment and the terminal, it is told it is no use building at the Prince Albert airport because there is no east-west service anyway.

Last year there was a proposed extension of the runway which did not come about; terminal work and navigational aids are to be completed in 1980-81. What happened to these items—the extension of the airports, the apron, the terminal work and the navigational aids?

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Chairman, I was hoping the member would continue with his points so that we could find the sheet relevant to Prince Albert. It is impossible for a minister or even his very bright parliamentary secretary to know what is going on at each airport in Canada. Sometimes I consult with those people who spend their days there and they cannot tell me everything.

Mr. Nielsen: Otto Lang would have known.

Mr. Pepin: The member should know that we are personally familiar with the one in Winnipeg and the one in Ottawa, just to mention two airports. If the hon. member wants to continue and elaborate on his other points, we will be ready to answer by the time he finishes.

Mr. Hovdebo: In the last few years there have been a considerable number of commitments to the building of boxcars, particularly hopper cars. What are the plans for the future? The Wheat Board has indicated that it needs 1,000 hopper cars a year for the next four or five years to ship the 30 million tonnes of wheat which will be shipped by 1985, and after that another 900 to 1,000 per year. What are the plans as far as the provision of hopper cars is concerned? How effective will the $4 million in the budget for rehabiltiation be? I wonder whether we are losing more boxcars than we are gaining by the process of rehabilitation. Also in the same area, what are the plans for more locomotives? Does the government have plans with respect to those? Last, does the government have plans to build five lakers which the industry suggests will be necessary within the next few years to move the grain out from Thunder Bay?

● (2230)

Mr. Bockstael: Mr. Chairman, in reply to the hon. member for Prince Albert regarding the airport at Prince Albert, completion of portions of runway extension, firehall and equipment and other improvements to the airport are dependent upon the air carriers selected by the CTC. There are two carriers competing for east-west flights, or, flights in both directions. One application was submitted in April this year, the other in May. It is contingent upon decisions by the CTC and as soon as that is decided upon the initiation of such flights will require the improvements to be in place. We will be governed accordingly.

Mr. Hovdebo: I would like to continue on that point, Mr. Chairman. I accept that answer but I take exception to it because we have been waiting now for three or four months for the CTC hearing. It does not seem to be coming off. We are being told there is no rush since we do not have the airport facilities anyway. That puts us back to the chicken and the egg situation. If we do not get those facilities we will not get the air transport. Therefore, let us get the CTC hearing on the road. Can the minister use his good offices to rush that CTC hearing?

Mr. Bockstael: The hon. member must recognize that the CTC is an autonomous body and it does not take instructions very lightly or directly from a minister. He can request the status of a hearing but he cannot order them to have one by a certain date.

Mr. Pepin: I am my own adviser on a number of aspects with respect to grain here tonight. With respect to hopper cars, it is well known the government has purchased 8,000 of them since 1973. If one begins to add others purchased by the Canadian Wheat Board and the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta—1,000 each—and the leasing by Manitoba of 540, the total amounts to 15,400 for 1981. I am sure the hon. member is aware of this. The question is: where do we go from here? By the way, the strike at Hawker-Siddeley in Trenton may be over and there are 600-odd cars which can be built there.

What about the future? We have asked the grain co-ordinator to look at it. He has produced a report in which there is a suggestion made that we will need, if my memory serves me correctly, 1,700 per year from 1982 to 1985. So we are considering three times 1,700. There is discussion as to whether it is too much or too little. Most people say "How do we predict it?" The situation for this year is very good, as everyone knows. There is no immediate problem. But as the hon. member seemed to imply, we must get into an anticipatory mood on this subject. We must try to forecast what will be needed; sometimes we will be wrong one way and sometimes right the other.

With respect to the use of the $4 billion western development fund for the purpose of purchasing hopper cars, I am quite sure the suggestion from the member for Prince Albert will not be well received in some quarters. People will say we used to purchase hopper cars before, why not continue.

If I may finish my assertions on this subject, this is closely related to the Crow question, with the modernization of the Crow issue. Obviously there is a relationship between the compensatory price and the purchase of hopper cars. If the railways were taking responsibility for the provision of hopper cars that would affect the compensatory price. But the general mood in the west is that one way or another the Canadian government, the Wheat Board and the provinces should continue purchasing hopper cars in order to make up for the neglect which has taken place in the past.

Mr. Hovdebo: I do not know where you heard I made the suggestion that the $4 billion be used for the purchase of hopper cars. I did not make any such suggestion.

Mr. Pepin: You said it.

Mr. Hovdebo: The next question I have is in relation to the Canadian National shutting down a great many of their express stations in the west during the last few months. For instance, in Prince Albert they have shut down their car lot station and they are pulling out of express entirely. This is happening in several other places as well. Have they not violated the terms which they accepted a little over a year ago when, if I am not mistaken, they closed down 55 railway stations? The suggestion at that time was that if they moved all the express into Prince Albert they would be able to provide much better service. Now they have taken it out of Prince Albert and put it into Saskatoon. My understanding a year ago was that if they closed those down they would have the service in Prince Albert. Are they not in violation of that agreement? Can the minister not do something to ensure that they do adhere to the Railway Act and the promises they made?

Mr. Pepin: I am not familiar with that situation, therefore I cannot deal with it. I will find out and consult with the hon. member on the subject of the number of hopper cars suggested by the grain co-ordinator. I indicated 1,700 for three years. I was extracting those figures from my memory. I now have other statistics in front of me, which show that the grain transportation authority recommends 1,290 for the four years, 1981-82 to 1984-85. My curiosity led me to try to find out what the difference was between the two sets of figures. Three times 1,700 is 5,100, and four times 1,290 is 5,160. So I was not too far out in my figures. The main point is we will have to participate and make sure that the hopper cars are in the system in time.

Mr. Collenette: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman. There have been discussions among the parties and we have agreed that in the last 80 minutes of debate there will be eight ten-minute speeches: four from the Conservative party, three from the Liberal party and one from the NDP.

Mr. Nielsen: On the same point of order, Mr. Chairman. Because I want to be friendly to the Minister of Transport, we do not mind at all if his parliamentary secretary answers his colleagues on his side, and the NDP, but we will be obliged if he will personally answer our questions.

Mr. Knowles: We agree to the proposition put forward by the parliamentary secretary.

● (2240)

Mr. Flis: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, it appears that we have just created two classes of members in this House. One class receives responses from the minister and the other class receives responses from the parliamentary secretary. It appears to me that it is up to the minister to determine whether he wants to answer or whether he wants to delegate that duty to his parliamentary secretary.

The Chairman: There is no point of order. There was an observation by a member of the opposition only. The House order relates only to the number of speakers and the length of the speeches.

Mr. Harquail: Mr. Chairman, I would like on this occasion to publicly congratulate the minister on his recent visit to my area in September for the inauguration and official opening of the new air terminal. The work of the Department of Transport is never completed, and certainly this is true in the minister's case. Transportation problems are continuous, and my area is no exception in that regard.

With regard to the highway strengthening program for New Brunswick, I would like to garner from the minister what type of understanding will be arranged with the Hatfield government and the provincial minister of transport to ensure that some of the additional funds to be negotiated for the program will be spent in northern New Brunswick, particularly on highway 11 and highway 17. I am told that once again the plan is to spend all the funds in the golden triangle area of Fredericton, Saint John and Moncton.

I would also like to take this opportunity to make a few suggestions to the Minister of Transport. Even if we cannot find the funds necessary for all the projects and even if we cannot obtain agreement from the bureaucrats and the officials who advise the minister on projects which we feel are absolutely necessary, could I at least receive agreement from the minister to assist us as members of Parliament by giving instructions to these officials to at least communicate to us some of the plans they have in mind?

I am thinking specifically of CN Express. I was surprised to return from the United Nations, after representing this country as a delegate there, and learn through the media that the great men of Canadian National had decided that they would close out certain offices thus laying off hundreds of Canadians in one fell swoop. I am sure the minister will fully understand why such a proposal is totally unacceptable to me. This is my first opportunity to say something on this matter, and fortunately we have more time left before CN implements its decision. I am told the date is August, 1981.

The other day I referred to this action as heavy-handed tactics. In so far as the good will and public relations of the head office of that corporation is concerned, it will have to learn to get a little closer to members of Parliament if it wants to enjoy our co-operation and support. I am talking about future estimates and expenditures and any other operations it might care to undertake.

The economy in my area cannot tolerate the closure of an office of such importance just when development is beginning to take place through DREE, regional projects, new mining operations such as a zinc smelter, modernization of the pulp and paper mill and so on. An amount in the order of $500 million is about to be spent on development which is beginning to show results, as indicated by the conference board; yet the CN seems to be in some other country or in some other space because it does not seem to know about this new development. Why would CN Express close out when a given region is just beginning to develop and will need its service?

We cannot afford heavy-handed tactics from the CN which would cause the loss of one job, let alone 30 jobs, as is the case in my constituency. I woud like the minister to convey my sentiments to the president of CNR. Right here in the House is the place for me to express my feelings directly to the minister so that he may personally pass them on to Mr. Bandeen.

I would like to move on to the subject of the dollars which would be spent on port development. My constituency has two ports, one at Belledune and one at Dalhousie. The minister may detect in my voice that I am just about out of patience.

[Translation]

It is not a question of being just about out of patience—I have lost patience!

[English]

We can all understand what happens to good will when one runs out of patience. It is not very pleasant, and I do not like to be put in this position. Based on the suggestion I made earlier with regard to corporations like CN getting closer to members of Parliament, I would also recommend that the officials responsible for marine and port development communicate and consult more with members of Parliament. When I say a little but more, I mean quite a bit, because those officials have not bothered to visit my constituency or advise me what their plans are. What is the rationalization for all the moneys which will be spent on the major ports of Halifax, Saint John and Montreal in eastern Canada? But I am speaking about the Atlantic region.

In years gone by there have been agreements to spend dollars for the expansion for the Belledune port. We know what the agreements were. They still exist, they are still available, and they are being updated. It is strange, for example, with regard to the potash question, that although economies could be effected by utilizing the facilities at Belledune, the government is not even interested in saving a few millions of dollars. It is going ahead in an area where there is a dispute over the use of the land, over the availability of funds to instal the facility and a question of time. The people are ready to ship that product, and they are not interested in any particular argument. They want to get the product to market.

I suggest that we talk to CN about getting a unit train price to portage potash from Sussex to Belledune where the equipment is already in the place to put the potash over the side. Perhaps the $25 million or $30 million will not have to be spent for a new facility at the other place in New Brunswick. Other members have said tonight they are happy to have the floor, and so am I. It is part of my responsibility to my constituents to tell to the minister exactly what the situation is.

I also want to take this opportunity to express my thanks to the minister for his assistance not long ago with regard to the new development in air transportation. But that does not mean the job is finished. We need air passenger service to the capitals of the four Atlantic provinces—Fredericton, Charlottetown, Halifax and Saint John. We need the co-operation of the people in the business, and that includes Transport Canada. My plea to the minister is for his understanding and assistance in this regard. I am not talking merely about an indication of good will; I am talking about action. I would like the minister in the coming months to give concrete, written instructions that this is the approach which could be taken in order to get a little closer to finding solutions to some of the problems to which I have referred this evening.

I am also talking about the whole question of whether Quebecair, Nordair or airlines in Quebec could come from the Gaspé to New Brunswick and make use of that new airport at Charlo.

● (2250)

I am speaking also about having more discussions about the other maritime airline, EPA which was considering a linkage, a regional service, an interprovincial service to the six cities in New Brunswick as well as the four Atlantic capitals.

We are, Mr. Chairman, a long distance away from Utopia. The job is far from completed—very far from completed. As I have indicated already, it has yet to be decided where these dollars should be spent, who is to be favoured with approval and what equipment will be needed to modernize and expand the port at Belledune as well as additional facilities at the port of Dalhousie. If the minister is successful in getting his officials to discuss these matters with the people who are interested and responsible for the developments in this area, we are likely to enjoy some success in this regard.

Insofar as CN express is concerned—

The Chairman: I regret to interrupt the hon. member but according to the House agreement made a few moments ago, his time has expired. The hon. member for South Shore.

Mr. Crouse: Mr. Chairman, I want to raise a few questions that are of vital importance to my constituency and they follow along the same lines as those of the previous speaker.

On August 15, I received a notice of hearing from the CTC informing me that the CNR had made application to abandon the operations of the Yarmouth subdivision from a point near Liverpool, Nova Scotia, to Yarmouth, Nova Scotia, a total distance of 135.68 miles. The reason given was that the line was operating at a loss and the losses for 1975 were listed at $2,181,000: for 1976, $1,831,000, and for 1977, $1,769,000. It stated that the losses for 1978 and 1979 would be given at the hearings. Naturally when these facts became known, numerous briefs from outraged businessmen were forwarded to me as their member of Parliament, and, of course, these were sent on to the minister. Unfortunately, as I stand here tonight, to date, I have not received a concrete response from the minister, so my first question to him is to ask why there has been no answer to the questions I have raised concerning this matter.

What is happening, Mr. Chairman, in my riding, is a far cry from the promises that were made by the Prime Minister when he was campaigning in my province on Friday, January 25. At that time he was full of promises for our people, promises which were endorsed by Liberal supporters and repeated ad infinitum up and down the various constituencies of Nova Scotia. On the front page, for example, the Halifax Chronicle-Herald, on January 26, we read among other things, these words as stated by the then leader of the opposition, now our Prime Minister:

> We will use revenues raised through energy taxation to make big projects happen—railway building, pipeline construction, a western electrical grid, and coal liquefaction are only a few of the projects that the energy boom could produce.

I ask you, Mr. Chairman, how you can equate that promise with the actual facts. If you would call removing 135 miles of railway line railway building, I do not know what you would call railway destruction.

To add insult to injury, on November 5, the province of Nova Scotia received another body blow from the CNR. The Canadian Transport Commission at that time, and I am quoting from their order No. R-31558, stated, in the matter of the application of CN Railways to phase out certain services in the province, that the applicants were authorized to remove the agency positions located in eleven listed locations. I would point out, Mr. Chairman, that seven of these are in my own constituency. The order goes on to say that the station buildings in eight locations will be put up for sale. Seven of these are in my riding.

I raised this matter in the House on November 18, as reported at page 4802 of Hansard, only to be told at that time by the minister that the action was necessary because CN Express was losing money. He had previously stated that the CN had lost $14 million in 1970 and will lose $57 million this year. When I asked him if he planned to close down Mirabel, which is also losing more than $50 million annually, he said no one should compare the two. I agree with him; for once he is right. He is right because the CNR in its express service is serving a vast area throughout the province of Nova Scotia, while Mirabel serves only one area. I say to you, sir, that if $50 million needs to be saved, the minister should close down Mirabel and use the money to upgrade and continue its CNR services in the entire province of Nova Scotia.

This is what the Chronicle-Herald said in part in a lead editorial, about the cut in our express service:

It has been announced that Canadian National is to cut back its express service right across the country. As a result of this decision, about half of its offices will be closed and 1,100 of a workforce of 5,500 will join the ranks of the unemployed. In the Atlantic region, it is estimated that some 254 jobs will be lost and 15 offices will go out of business.

In other words, this government, which is loud in its promises when it is campaigning in Nova Scotia, has now adopted a policy of "sock it to them. Sock it to the bluenoses." Close down the express service. As soon as they are in power that is the course they follow. Almost one-quarter of the personnel in all of Canada will be laid off in my province alone. Think of the economic impact that will have in a province which has less than one million people. I submit to you, sir, that this will be very disastrous.

The Deputy Prime Minister and the Minister of Labour—I regret that neither is in the House at the present time—also represent my province. They should hang their heads in shame, for supporting this type of measure which cannot help but be harmful to the people they were elected to serve.

Tonight, sir, I make a plea to this minister to call a halt to these disastrous measures. Canadian National must be faulted for applying for abandonment of unprofitable lines, while not putting forward its good case for continuing the lines it has in service. Once in a while we see an occasional advertisement on TV which shows one man pulling a freight car which reads, "Very low friction, a railway is energy efficient." It is a very good ad, but when I see it I cannot but ask: have we no energy problem in Canada, or does the left hand of CN not know what the right hand is doing? CN officials should be reminded that all Canadians—and that includes Nova Scotians, Mr. Chairman—have paid their share to forgive a CNR debt of many millions of dollars. This was done only recently, and now CN, through its present financial arrangements, can boast of large profits.

I submit, sir, that an obsessive drive for profits at any cost cannot excuse CN from its obligations to provide needed service. In my view, and in the opinion of my constituents, the profitable parts of CN's operations must carry the less profitable ones.

Finally, in support of my plea—and I hope my time permits me to do this—I wish to place on the record the brief prepared by the South Queens Chamber of Commerce concerning the proposed abandonment of service along the South Shore. I quote the following:

The South Queens Chamber of Commerce takes strong exception to the proposed abandonment of service, by CN Rail, of their Liverpool, Nova Scotia to Yarmouth, Nova Scotia, rail line. It has been apparent for some time that CN has been neglecting this rail service resulting in it becoming an unattractive and inefficient mode of transportation.

Listen to this, Mr. Chairman—

The crossings over public roads and highways are in such bad repair that highway travel is uncomfortable. Local automobile repair businesses are thriving on the undercarriage damage to cars using these crossings. The railway bed has deteriorated to the extent that trains travel at a reduced speed. (Roughly 15 miles per hour.) The cost to ship goods by rail is unreasonable considering the slowness and unreliability of the service.

It is my suspicion that CN through their neglect of this line, have created the inequity that they claim exists. To put it simply, if the line is losing money and has become unattractive to its potential users, CN must accept the blame and criticism.

Of particular importance to our county are the Bowater Paper Company and Steel and Engine Products Limited, our two largest employers. Both companies rely on rail service. With regard to Steel and Engine, abandonment of the rail line would probably cause this industry to relocate. The president and general manager of Bowater, Mr. Robert Weary, has suggested to me that the rail service is vital to that paper mill.

I have been informed by the Industrial Commission in Shelburne, Nova Scotia, that several industries in their industrial park depend upon rail service for a number of their materials. To threaten these businesses along the South Shore by abandoning this rail line, would appear to me, to defeat the political philosophy of our government. Although I disagree with many of the give-away practices of our federal government, this must be viewed as a necessary deficit situation. The people of the South Shore are proud, hard-working individuals who boast a low unemployment rate. We need the help of our government-sponsored Crown corporations in fostering growth for our communities.

Submitted by John L. Murray, president.

With the fuel problem in the world today, one which is predicted to become increasingly more severe, rail transportation is obviously a most attractive alternative to our petroleum-based highway service. The price of gasoline will increase dramatically in the very near future and some creative plans are needed. I strongly suspect rail service will play a prominent role in these plans of the future. Incidentally, many European countries enjoy efficient rail service and have had for many years. Could we not learn from their experiences?

The County of Queens and Town of Liverpool have begun to formulate a philosophy that will promote development in our area. Local and provincially sponsored plans have been studied and both councils have agreed to co-sponsor a development officer. The Queens-Liverpool Industrial Commission has broadened its scope to embark on an exploration of local industrial development. For the first time in years, there is evidence of growth.

Renewed growth in our inshore and offshore fisheries point to a trend toward new and creative means of transportation. Dried and salt fish are an abundant local product growing in number and importance. These products are potential rail users.

The Chairman: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but I must advise him that his allotted time has expired.

Mr. Crouse: May I just finish my last paragraph?

The Chairman: The hon. member may with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Crouse: We are led to believe that offshore natural gas will be on-stream within five to eight years. Any pipeline distribution complex will, according to the petroleum industry, not be extended into southwestern Nova Scotia. This will make it necessary for refined gas, or propane, to be shipped into our area. A complete rail line is the mode of transportation most often suggested as the most economical and most practical for this purpose. Let us look to the future and be prepared.

In summation, an adequate rail service is necessary for our present industrial needs. Unfortunately, our existing rail service is less than attractive. In light of my remarks concerning renewed industrial expansion and future needs, I strongly recommend that the present rail service not only be retained, but indeed, upgraded. This is the essence of equality for all Canadians.

Now that the minister has learned of these problems, I hope he will take some action to remedy them.

[Translation]

Mr. Leduc: Mr. Chairman, I have a few questions for the minister. The first one is as follows: The CN had given a contract to Marine Industries Limited for the construction of 1000 hopper cars for grain transport. Some time ago, the CN said that it wanted to back out of this contract and offered compensation to Marine Industries Limited. I would like the minister to tell us whether this commitment and the contract signed between Marine Industries Limited and the CN for the construction of 1,000 hopper cars still hold.

Mr. Pepin: I should say first of all that I have received letters from the hon. member for Richelieu giving me some background information. Of course, the situation of Marine Industries cannot be changed, and this contract was extremely important for the company and the representative of this constituency. I have spoken many times of this contract to Mr. Bandeen, and he told me this afternoon that he was now able to confirm that he would maintain his order for 1,000 cars. The order was for 1,000 hopper cars to transport goods other than wheat even though they could be used for wheat, and the CN and Marine Industries are discussing the possibility of changing this order to 700 hopper cars and 300 gondola or open top cars. I am happy to give this good news to the hon. member.

Mr. Leduc: Mr. Chairman, I now come to my second question. There is a coastguard depot in Sorel. There was a rumour some time ago that this depot would be moved to Quebec City or Montreal. Can the minister confirm that this coastguard depot, where buoys and boats belonging to the coastguard are repaired, will remain in Sorel? It has been there for over 150 years.

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Chairman, I know that I have already written to the hon. member about this. I sign about 25 letters every day, but if my memory serves me right, some changes were made some months ago, and if I am not mistaken, some boats have been moved and this has brought about the transfer of personnel. Unless I am mistaken, there have been shifts between Sorel and Trois-Rivières, but number one in the maritime division of my department tells me that he does not foresee—or at least his big books make no mention of any—any unpleasant changes for Sorel.

Mr. Leduc: Mr. Chairman, I now wish to speak about the merchant marine. Naturally, it is of great interest to me since we have a well-reputed dockyard at Sorel. Does the minister believe that Canada might have a merchant marine in the relatively not-too-distant future? We already have one but it should be enlarged to enable us to ship our goods abroad, especially the heavy material, and also to pick up abroad the goods we need for the well-being of our people; something should be done in that regard. Naturally, it is a major problem but I feel that Canada should have a high seas merchant marine as well as a coastal fleet. The present situation is a scandal. We have to hire foreign vessels to handle our inshore trade. It will probably be possible to build a coastal fleet for the St. Lawrence River and our coastal waters along the Atlantic. Might that be possible for the not-too-distant future?

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Chairman, I dealt with the subject in my opening remarks yesterday—is it yesterday only or a few days ago—but I would hesitate to deal with it in depth because I would not be doing it justice; still, one thing must be kept in mind and that is that Canada has quite a sizeable merchant marine in the Great Lakes, the St. Lawrence, etc. When we speak of the need for Canada to have a merchant marine, we are really thinking especially of the high seas, of international shipping; one of the main things I have learned is that ships belonging to Canadians carry 90 per cent of the freight handled on the Great Lakes. That really impressed me. We must therefore not underestimate ourselves as Canadians to the extent of thinking that we have no merchant marine; when we express the wish of having one, we are really thinking in terms of ships registered in Canada and built in Canada. That is an objective; to sum it up in one sentence only, I doubt that such an objective can be settled philosophically because our main rivals with regard to an international merchant marine, a deep sea fleet, are the manufacturers, the shippers. And what they fear is that they may be forced some day to use ships registered in Canada and that because of that it will make them less competitive on the world market because they will have paid a higher price for the advantage of using ships built in Canada and manned by Canadian crews.

The main opponents of a high sea Canadian merchant marine are the manufacturers: they will have to be convinced that such is not the case and this is now being done because the owners and the Canadian shipbuilders, thinking and in my opinion partly rightly so, that the future calls for a Canadian high seas merchant marine, have started educating their friends in the manufacturing sector, have met with the Canadian Export Association to make them aware of the usefulness of a high seas merchant marine. That had to be said and I thank the hon. member for his question.

The Chairman: The hon. member for Richelieu may put one last question.

Mr. Leduc: In Sorel, we have a gravel airstrip. The pilots of planes and jets do not want to land, they are afraid a stone will hit the engine or something, I do not know exactly. Even the pilots of propeller aircraft are afraid that a piece of gravel will hit the propeller, and apparently the cost of repair is prohibitive. Does the Minister of Transport foresee that in the near future that strip could be paved, and I am thinking not only of the Sorel strip but also of the one in Dolbeau where I landed last winter and which is full of potholes. Those strips should be paved so that jets could land safely and easily?

Mr. Pepin: Unfortunately, the department cannot deal with that in the same way as it does with Mirabel, Moncton or Dorval. In that sort of case, the department does not really feel it has to take action for the simple reason that, unless there are reasons I am unaware of, it cannot force the people to maintain the strip after it has been paved. I would advise the people in Sorel to think this over carefully, to consult the people in Trois-Rivières, the people in Sherbrooke, especially, who are having trouble with their airport these days and who might be in a good position to give some advice to the people of Sorel on what not to do.

[English]

Mr. Friesen: Mr. Chairman, I would like to talk to the minister about the Fraser River Harbour Commission. As he knows, the commission ports pay no tax or grants in lieu of tax. I would like to know when he is going to bring in the ports act so that the commission ports will stop bilking the municipalities out of thousands of dollars each year. Please do not use the argument that the commission ports bring socioeconomic benefits to the community. If they do that, and I do not argue that they do, so do all the other industries in the area which pay taxes. It is about time the commission ports pay either taxes or grants in lieu of taxes. But they will not do it and cannot do it until the ports act is passed. We see the anomaly of the Fraser River Harbour Commission with an annual report showing a profit of $1 million and freeloading off the municipality at the same time. I wish the minister would give me an answer to that question.

Second, in the case of the Fraser River Harbour Commission, there is a port for fishermen called Gunderson Slough. The chairman of the commission, Mr. Chris Brown, has been telling me for the last couple of years with a very benign and beatific smile, how much he plans to do for the fishermen, how he plans to improve the harbour and how he cannot wait to get all of the riparian rights so that he can build this great harbour for the fishermen. He has not yet turned a spade or put in a plank. He will not even have the harbour dredged. However, he insists on hanging on to the Gunderson Slough. He loves to control it, but he does not want to do anything concrete for the fishermen. I might point out to the minister that I have a private members' bill abstracting Gunderson Slough from the Fraser River Harbour Commission and turning it over to the minister of fisheries who might take a little more interest than the Fraser River Harbour Commission does in Gunderson Slough.

I met with Mr. Brown last spring. He promised to bring together two other departments which have an interest in this, fisheries and public works. They were to have a meeting in the spring and Mr. Brown was to report back to me. Of course, I never heard from him again. The meeting took place. I did hear, though, from the Public Works office in Vancouver. They said, and I quote from a letter of June 19:

> The current policy of Small Craft Harbours was developed in 1975 and is applied to "scheduled harbours" only. This schedule could be enlarged but in the case of Gunderson Slough it would require an agreement with the Fraser River Harbour Commission.
> In order for Gunderson Slough to qualify as a public scheduled harbour there would have to be a sizeable public float installed, say in the order of 400 lineal feet.

That is still, and probably will be for a long time, under the control of the harbour commission which refuses to do anything. When the fishermen left the harbour last spring, they grounded; $20 million worth of boats had a hard time getting out of the slough. Public Works dredged 1, 2 or 3 feet out of the slough. When the fishing season was over in the fall, the boats grounded again when coming back into the harbour.

A boat that draws five feet was bottomed. It stuck. Public Works should take notice there are no navigation buoys in the harbour. Mr. Brown wants to control the harbour, but he does not want to do anything for the fishermen.

I would like to know the minister's department's attitude and policy toward that aspect. Is the minister going to take the Fraser River Harbour Commission to task and make sure that he delivers service to the fishermen who deserve it, or is he going to turn it over to public works or small craft harbours so that at least one department of the government will assume responsibility rather than have confusion among three departments.

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Chairman, I thank the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock-North Delta for the information he has given me. It is the first time I have heard about the Gunderson Slough. I am not even sure I can pronounce the name properly. I will rehearse tomorrow.

With regard to the status of the harbour commission, under the 1964 act, the hon. member said they were neither paying taxes nor grants in lieu of taxes. I am suspicious that Mr. Chris Brown will not be particularly grateful for the intervention tonight. It is an advantage that he is not too keen to proclaim. I will not continue because I do not want to incur his wrath.

Be that as it may, Mr. Brown's argument is that the harbour commission makes a very important contribution to the development of the surrounding area in economic terms. He feels that is the way the harbour makes its contribution to municipal taxation.

Mr. Huntington: How was that again?

Mr. Pepin: I am not commenting on it. I am just passing on the message with some conviction on my part because this is a good case. As is well known in maritime circles, that is one of the reasons Mr. Brown has never been particularly keen to pay allegiance to the National Harbours Board. He has always expressed great satisfaction in being under the Harbour Commissions Act. When I met Mr. Brown again recently, I referred to him as "64". He understood very well what I was talking about. He is a legendary character in the area. We all like his cherubic smile, as my hon. friend referred to it, and praise him for the great job he is doing in the area. Be that as it may, I will look into the problem raised by the hon. member.

Mr. Friesen: Can the minister tell me who the wharfinger is for the harbour commission? Second, will he agree that Mr. Chris Brown is not only the commissioner but the port manager as well?

Mr. Pepin: Yesterday I appointed a list of wharfingers. I can assure the hon. member that they are all believers in free enterprise, the future of the country, peace, harmony, good government, stability of laws and other virtues.

The Chairman: The hon. minister for Surrey-White Rock-North Delta.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Friesen: I appreciate the promotion, Mr. Chairman, but not to this government. I would like a clear and unequivocal answer to this. Why is it that the Surrey municipality has been denied an opportunity to appoint a nominee to the commission?

Mr. Pepin: The situation with the Fraser commission is that a number of municipalities got together to appoint a member for all of them. If memory serves me well, there was a bit of a problem the last time.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Pepin: How can a guy remember all that? There was a bit of a problem because one of the municipalities did not want to go along with the others. Finally, I had to take the bull by the horns or the horns by the bull—

Mr. Mazankowski: You should have taken him by the tail.

Mr. Pepin: In accord with the principle of democracy, I had to decide for them, for the majority.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (2320)

Mr. Parker: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I would like to direct my questions to the issues of railway safety and air transport. About two years ago there was a serious railway accident involving robot trains in which some 76 cars were derailed. I think the average speed they were supposed to be travelling was around 18 miles an hour yet their speed was over 60 miles an hour. The Railway Transport Commission studied this wreck and about six months ago they made recommendations and expressed certain views as to how things should be done. Can the minister tell us whether those recommendations have been implemented yet or whether they are considered serious enough to be brought in?

Mr. Pepin: I must admit I am not familiar with this particular case, but I know of similar cases. For example, the last difficulty at MacGregor, Manitoba, led to an inquiry by the CTC. The CTC made a whole series of recommendations some of which involved the CTC itself, some the Department of Transport and some the railways. I know how the system works.

Mr. Parker: I am not asking that question. I am talking about the Revelstoke mountain subdivision of CP Rail in the Revelstoke to Golden areas. These recommendations were made to the effect that when snow reaches—three inches or more on the rails—ploughs would be run and so on. While this investigation was going on there was a reduction in the tonnage to be hauled. Instead of hauling 14,000 tons, I think they reduced the weight of this train to somewhere around 9,000 or 10,000 tons. Before the report came in they allowed CP Rail to increase it to 14,000 tons. Two days ago in Elkford, on a piece of track that allows trains to go ten miles an hour, a robot train with 14,000 tons and approximately 76 cars went out of control and derailed.

Is the minister prepared to recommend to the Railway Transport Commission that they immediately request a reduction of tonnage on these trains until the reports come back on this accident?

Mr. Pepin: I am quite prepared to have a discussion with the CTC on that subject. I am not prepared to commit myself and tell the railways how to run the railways.

An hon. Member: It's about time someone did.

Mr. Parker: May I remind the minister that less than three weeks ago I wrote to him after the investigation was made into the labour problems in Revelstoke? Some very significant problems were brought out in that report as to the operation of trains on this piece of track—not this specific piece but the piece on the Revelstoke Mountain subdivision. I requested that the minister consider sending some railway transport commissioners in to investigate the reports which came out of the labour relations investigation at Revelstoke. To date I have not received a reply although I had a very brief discussion with Mr. Charles Turner who has, I believe, made a suggestion to the minister's department. I am concerned about this matter and would urge the minister to look into it immediately.

I will go on to another area, if I may. During a health and safety standard tour by our party to Nova Scotia and New Brunswick we visited the air traffic controllers' building in Moncton, a new building which I think the minister opened a few months ago.

● (2330)

Some of these air traffic controllers were working double shifts—and in a brand new building—because there were not enough adequately trained people to do the job. Is the minister planning a major training program to train air traffic controllers so that the public does not have to travel in aeroplanes when air traffic control officers are working these extended hours?

The Montreal airport is short 60 controllers, Toronto is short 34, Vancouver is short 27, Moncton is short 25 and Gander is short 20. Is the minister not concerned that we are operating aircraft with these staff shortages? Is he prepared to start immediately setting up a major training program so that we can begin training people to handle the strenuous job of operating control towers?

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Chairman, the figures provided by my hon. friend are from the union, CATCA, and they tend to exaggerate, as we all do occasionally. The hon. member for Regina West does occasionally, and so do I.

The figures stated with respect to the need for more controllers at the airports mentioned are slightly exaggerated, which does not mean that I and the department are fully satisfied with the situation now, particularly when it comes to bilingual controllers, in which case there has been great difficulty simply because of the number who have left Quebec and gone to other provinces. However, that is not the main subject.

I now have the actual numbers with respect to what is needed. If the hon. member used the figure of 30, the department thinks seven might be adequate. As far as I am concerned this is an important subject. I think there should be more controllers to make the profession more open, and we should not be in the situation where we have to depend on these gentlemen to the point we do now. The department devotes much attention to the training of controllers, and I can only assure the hon. member that this is a subject with which I am preoccupied.

Mr. Parker: The figures I have given are from a report given to the inquiry into aviation safety. It was given by the Canadian Air Traffic Controllers Association which testified yesterday.

It was made very clear to us during our visit that there is a tremendous amount of stress and strain involved with this work and strain on the families of these people, who are called in to work extra hours and double shifts. This is something the Canadian people cannot tolerate. We must have a better system of training and more up-to-date facilities. The control tower to which I referred is tremendously updated, and to have such a facility understaffed is not acceptable.

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Chairman, I take these recommendations quite seriously. I have said that the figures might be exaggerated, and I have given other figures to demonstrate that view. This case has been put to the Dubin commission of inquiry. Mr. Dubin will begin to report in the new year, and I will give much attention to his report.

One of the difficulties with respect to the profession of air traffic controller is that the Canadian government is the only employer. This makes it rather more difficult to attract people to the profession. It makes competition a bit more difficult to bring about.

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Chairman, I have a series of questions to put to the minister. For a number of years the federal government has been a tremendous help to every province in Canada through the grade-crossing fund, and because of the joint efforts of the federal government and provincial governments—and municipal governments in some cases—we have saved hundreds, probably thousands, of lives across this country. For some reason the federal government is now cancelling any contributions to the grade-crossing fund for separations. In the short time allotted to me I would like to endeavour to indicate to the minister that this is a very bad policy.

In 1978 there were 65 deaths at rural railway crossings. Thirty-nine of those, or 60 per cent, were at unprotected crossings. In the same year at urban crossings there were 25 deaths and injuries, and 19 of them were at crossings where there was no protection. At every place where there was a grade separation—either over or under the railway tracks—there were no deaths or injuries. In other words, 90 persons were killed in that one year because there was no protection at those level crossings.

If the federal government continues to follow the policy of not contributing to separations, it will really be adopting a very tragic course because contributing funds to lights and bells only does not do the job. In 1977 at places where there were lights and bells 12 people were killed. In 1978, 25 people were killed. We do not have figures for 1980, but it appears that the figure for 1980 will be even higher. Lights and bells are not doing the job. The only way to make a level railway crossing completely safe is to put in a separation, so I urge the minister to go back to the policy which helped for many years to keep people alive, namely, that of contributing, through the grade crossing fund, to separations over level crossings. Seventy-five per cent on replacements and 50 per cent on new ones is a far better investment than contributing only to lights and bells. Why is the government cancelling its contribution to separations at level railway crossings?

The Greeks had a great hero by the name of Achilles. Achilles had one weak spot, and that weak spot led to his downfall. I am suggesting that the Achilles heel of transportation in Canada today is roads and highways. All the other modes of transportation are receiving more help than the provinces are with respect to highways and roads. Because of that, we are paying in one way or another. We pay for roads whether we build them or not. We pay for them in lost lives, in crippled bodies, in lost jobs and in repairs to our vehicles. I suggest that the Canadian government was wise when it contributed to the construction of the Trans-Canada highway, to the roads to the north, to DREE, to roads in some other parts of the country and, to some degree, to the Yellowhead highway and other highways across the country. The Canadian government, by withdrawing funds from all these highways, is holding back expansion, holding back jobs, and so on. I am not saying that too much is going to the other modes of transportation but highways are not getting a fair share of the dollar going to transportation. I ask the minister whether he would review the moneys spent on various modes of transportation with a view to giving highways a better deal. My third point concerns highways such as the Howse Pass highway. The David Thompson highway which goes west to the Banff-Jasper highway where an extension to Howse Pass is required. Part of the cost would come from the B.C. government and part from the federal government. It is relatively few miles long but it would make a splendid access for traffic, particularly for trucks going from central Alberta to Vancouver. I ask the minister to consider the construction of the Howse Pass highway.

My fourth point is on twinning. I should like to ask the minister whether he is really serious about carrying out the promise of the Prime Minister to twin the railways from Winnipeg to Vancouver. There may be parts of that railway which it would be sensible to twin. To stick to the promise and to twin the whole railway would be exaggerated, ridiculous, foolish and would be laughed at in the west. It would be folly indeed. The money could be spent otherwise much better. There is one place, however, where money could be spent wisely on twinning, and that is on the Banff highway. The provinces built it right up to the Banff gates and from there on it is a two-lane highway where thousands of cars are locked bumper to bumper every weekend and sometimes on work days. I wonder if the Minister of Transport, in conjunction with the Minister of Public Works and the Minister of the Environment, could take a very careful look at expanding and twinning that highway from the Banff and Jasper gates west. There, too, we would save lives and get the traffic moving faster. I would appreciate hearing the hon. minister answer those four points.

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Chairman, first of all, the Minister of Transport is always serious. Never ask him whether or not he is serious because even when he smiles a little he is serious. The first point I want to make is that one should not sound the alarm too easily on the number of railway accidents. I have the figures here but I do not think I have time to put them on the record. They indicate that notwithstanding increases in volume and activity, the trend in the number of incidents of derailment, injuries and death reported to the CTC is down. I am just trying to correct an impression which the hon. member might have left with members here and the audience at large.

● (2340)

He said also that payments for railway grade separation had come to an end. That is not correct. What happened in 1977 was a move from the railway crossing grade separation fund to the UTAP fund. The money which used to be in the railway crossing grade separation fund was partially moved to the UTAP fund, as I explained the other day, in order to give provinces with urban transportation needs other than grade separation access to money for other purposes. That is how the UTAP program became somewhat of a grab bag.

Also I indicated the other day, we may have to return to more strict federal responsibility in the UTAP program. If this takes place, more money would be going to grade separation and less to other urban transit, which I am sure other people will resent.

With respect to the department not paying enough attention to highways, essentially highways are a provincial responsibility, as I am sure the hon. member is aware, but I agree with him that the multimodal approach should be more generally accepted in Canada, so that we will not witness situations where railways are being improved at the same time as an adjacent highway is the subject of expenditures.

The Chairman: The hon. member for London East.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Turner: It looks like I am in trouble, Mr. Chairman.

An hon. Member: Are you retiring, Charlie?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Turner: Mr. Chairman, I respect and admire the minister and the officials of the Department of Transport.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Turner: But I must question the actions and policies of some of the giant corporations which operate under the jurisdiction of the Department of Transport.

I want to cite three recent examples of derailments or fires of serious consequence on the CPR: last November at Mississauga when the city had to be evacuated; last June 9 when again the CPR had a derailment and fire at Komoka, Ontario and the subdivision of Kilworth Heights was evacuated; then about a month ago when a freight car exploded on a CPR line at Thamesville, Ontario.

We can thank the police and firemen that there were no casualties at Mississauga and Komoka—which is precisely all the firemen from Lobo Township, Delaware Township, London Township and Westminster received for their efforts at Komoka when they responded to a mutual aid call, evacuated a subdivision, brought the fire under control, and remained at the scene until such time as there was no longer any danger to the community or the train. Mr. Chairman, these were volunteer firemen who lost pay from their jobs. They risked their lives to control this fire and when they submitted a bill to the CPR for their services they were advised that CPR has an assessment in Lobo Township of $4,900, they pay taxes and they pay $14.38 for fire protection, therefore, "we wish to thank you for your excellent service but we will not pay your account."

● (2345)

When further inquiries were made it was pointed out to the CPR that the normal ratepayer only makes .0285 calls per year while the CPR made seven in nine years. Are they a normal ratepayer? What was the value of that train and its cargo? A locomotive engine costs nearly a million dollars. How many engines were on that train? Two or three. What was the value of the boxcars, tankers, hopper cars and the cargo? I suggest to you, Mr. Chairman, that the rolling stock was worth several millions of dollars. And they pay $14.38 a year for fire protection and "thank you, volunteer firemen, for the excellent service. We will probably need you again soon. Be ready."

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Turner: I could not help but notice in a report by Dr. McIsaac and the Hon. Leon Balcer that the president of CPR receives a total salary of $568,515 per year—

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Turner: Perhaps this explains why this railroad cannot afford to pay these volunteer firemen for their services to extinguish fires on rolling stock. I believe if his salary were reduced to $528,515 and the difference in salary were used to pay these firemen, they would be happy and continue to provide the protection to the trains passing through their communities. This would, in turn, give peace of mind to both the president of the CPR and the insurance companies.

Mr. Chairman, if these firemen are not compensated for their work under such dangerous conditions then I would suggest the CPR and the CNR be forced by legislation or regulation to provide their own fire equipment to safeguard the public interest.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Turner: While these volunteer fire departments do receive a degree of compensation from their municipalities to purchase equipment they usually have fund-raising events to purchase lifesaving equipment, uniforms, etc. They are paid if they make a call to a fire on a provincial highway or a county road, and although they charged the same hourly rate for that near-disastrous call on June 9 to the CPR they are still waiting for the pay. In the meantime, the equipment maintenance requires funding. The volunteers have still not recovered lost wages but the president of the CPR still remains on the payroll at the rate of $10,932 per week.

Mr. Chairman, I say thank you, volunteer firemen, for your excellent work.

This is an outrageous situation. Surely a corporation as large as the CPR can be held accountable, not only to these volunteer firemen from the respective communities of Canada, but also to the farmers of western Canada. I hope when the Crowsnest Pass rate problems are past the persons involved will study the value of services provided against the current value of concessions made 83 years ago.

But in spite of these three accidents—I do not wish to comment on the causes until reports are tabled and translated—the number of accidents is diminishing, primarily due to roller bearings replacing friction boxes on the axles of the cars. In addition, the number of crossing accidents has dropped from a high of 1,074 in 1974 to 654 in 1980. This dramatic drop is due to the efforts of the federal government and the Department of Transport to create overpasses which eliminate grade crossings.

Recently I received the following letter from a railway engineer on the subject of dangerous commodities. It reads:

> Since the Mississauga derailment the movement of dangerous commodities has generated a great deal of interest. At present it could very well cause regulations of such complexity that they would be very hard and expensive to comply with.
>
> As an operating engineer I will attempt to give my views as to what I would like to see accomplished in the regulations as to my responsibility in the movement of these commodities.
>
> There is no reason why I should know the name or components of any cargo. I should know if the cargo is inflammable, toxic, corrosive, radioactive, explosive.

● (2350)

At present, our dangerous commodity placards cover all such cargo. To change the cards and brackets would be expensive and unnecessary. A visual identification method would be more efficient and safer than our present "696 book" which is the rules and regulations given to crews, and the master red book which we do not have. At present we often find we have either overprotected or underprotected the shipment. This is how the colour and number code system could work. In the case of a dangerous commodity with no special handling or immediate health hazard, the present card could be used. An inflammable commodity should carry the present card with a large red "one" stamped on it. The red would indicate inflammable, the "one" would indicate the marshalling requirements. With this method it would be possible to use five or six numbers and cards colour-coded red, orange or black to cover the requirements at the head-end.

The head-end crew should be able to identify the requirement of a dangerous commodity while pulling by at 15 or 20 miles per hour. This method would be simple, easy to apply by the crews and involve little or no additional expense either by the railway or the shipper. The simplicity of this method is probably its drawback. Experts have a habit of talking over people's heads and recommending regulations which only experts can understand. Crews should only be subject to regulations that are thoroughly understood and easy to apply.

In closing, I received a letter from a conductor who says that in form 696, general operating instructions, they are told that the response forms are not required for import traffic and that mixed loads or freight forward shipments are not required. Would the minister explain to me how this reduces the danger of items shipped? Also, the company, CN, is claiming that part-loads do not require response forms.

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Chairman, I want to thank the hon. member for London East for his brilliant participation in this debate. The reception which he received when he entered the chamber was prime ministerial in dimension and very well deserved. I will, of course, communicate the purport of his speech to the presidents of the two railways and obtain specific answers to the question he raised at the end of his comments.

This afternoon I witnessed a very interesting event when the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre raised a question on pensioners. Immediately the hon. member for London East rushed to his files and returned with a letter indicating that adjustment to the pensions of CN workers had been made very recently. I do not know if the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre was aware of that fact.

Mr. Knowles: Yes, but it is not enough.

Mr. Pepin: I have those figures in front of me now. CN has recently announced a lump-sum payment to pensioners and survivors to compensate for the increase in the cost of living, and the adjustment for retirees in 1972 and earlier. It will mean increases ranging from $65 to $226 per year. Survivors will receive 75 per cent of that figure. Every year since 1971 CN has provided voluntary adaptation adjustment for pensioners, survivors and so on.

Mr. Knowles: A dollar and a half per week.

Mr. Pepin: I have heard the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre over the years, and whenever pensioners receive $150 he stands to request $155 and he has had great success in that regard. He has had great success in doing that and we all love him for it. But I did not want to please him tonight, I wanted to please the member for London East—

• (2355)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Pepin: —and comment on the reaction that he had this evening which was indicative of a staunch defender of railway employees and transportation people in general. The sort of reaction he had was worthy of a distinguished member of Parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Chairman, I have already given my questions to the minister's officials. I want about seven minutes of good, solid responses.

I am very pleased to see you all out here tonight to listen to me—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Forrestall: I will make just one observation, Mr. Chairman. It was like watching an exercise in New Brunswick togetherness, to see the member from Restigouche trying to steal from the member for Saint John the little pittance that Transport bothers to give to that beleaguered city.

The principal purpose of my speaking at this point is to ask the minister if he would care to respond to several questions which are very pertinent and important to this whole matter of dredging and the capacity of Canadian firms to participate in dredging, for the government account. Specifically, I have given to the minister a number of questions in writing asking whether or not any senior officials in his department have at any point in the past been associated with, or were employees of, any of the firms which may be tendering for work in Canada. I want to ask the minister what response he intends to give to the telex dated December 1, signed by the SIU in which they set out these points. They make the protest in the strongest possible terms, and I will just read it, as follows:

> We wish to protest in the strongest possible terms at the inequity of this treatment, as the Canadian dredging industry is obliged to pay all duties and sales taxes on imported components at the time of purchase and construction.

They are responding to information which has come to their attention that foreign vessels will be allowed into Canada on a ten-year pay-out of duties and sales tax, this assessment being levied, as was pointed out earlier by my colleague, only when the vessel is operating.

They go on to make their point that this is not in the interests of Canadian entrepreneurship, nor is it in the interests of Canadian labour. Foreign labour is employed on these vessels, eliminating, as I say, the use of Canadian labour which is available. There are no personal income taxes, if any significance derives from this. The corporation tax, under the treaty is not payable in Canada by the foreign country. Many of these foreign vessels, for example, are registered in tax-free havens. As Canada is one of the—

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please.

Mr. Forrestall: This is vital to the continued growth of this country. There are presently three vessels of Dutch origin operating in Canadian Arctic waters. What does the minister intend to do about these questions? How does he intend to respond to the SIU, and how does he intend to respond to the telex dated December 2, 1980. I quote from the second paragraph of the telex, signed the SIU and the Canadian Marine Officers Union, as follows:

> The labour movement in Canada can no longer allow foreign labour to take away the bread and butter of the Canadian worker and we will do everything legally possible to disrupt the operation of any foreign dredges operating in Canadian waters.

That is a serious charge, and one that the minister, whether he is familiar with it or not, cannot let go unanswered.

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Chairman, may I suggest that you change the date from December 4 to December 5 so that we can go to bed?

The Chairman: With the unanimous consent of the House—

I hope the hon. member has leave of the House to complete his remarks, which I am sure he intends to do very shortly.

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Chairman, pursuant to the agreement which the House leader now wants to offend, which is his privilege if he wants to, I will conclude within seven minutes. I have spoken for three minutes and I want four minutes from the minister.

What short-term solutions will be acceptable in this dilemma? Is there a way by which we can make the treatment equitable with respect to these tenders and Canadian involvement? Will the minister at the very least extend the same favourable treatment in these circumstances so that Canadian firms can participate? Will the government take a look at providing this very capital-intensive equipment on the three coasts for service both in the private and the public sector? Will the minister do some of these things? Will the minister take a look at the questions I have submitted to him, hopefully with the indulgence of the Chair and only a partial eye on the clock, and because of the very serious nature of the questions, will he give us a few answers?

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member was kind enough to send me copies of the questions he would have raised. I think the hon. member and some of his colleagues raised an important point tonight about the tendering methods with respect to Canadian-owned and foreign-owned companies. The nine questions he raised will give me a chance, particularly in the context of Roberts Bank, to examine those matters properly. I will try to do so in the coming days. I will send him a written answer, which he can make public if he cares to.

Progress reported.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being midnight, the House stands adjourned until eleven o'clock tomorrow morning.

At 12.04 a.m., the House adjourned without question put, pursuant to special order.

LETTER FROM PRESIDENT OF VIA RAIL TO MR. COLLENETTE

VIA Rail Canada Inc.

October 29, 1980

Dear Mr. Collenette,

Thank you for your letter of September 9, 1980, and particularly for your comforting comments on the efforts of VIA Rail Canada Inc. to improve railway passenger services in this country.

In your letter, you refer to improved services between Ottawa and Toronto as well as between Montreal and Ottawa; I would like to explain our short and long-term strategies in this regard. On the short term, we are proposing to make schedule and frequency improvements while for the long term we are planning a high performance passenger line between Quebec City and Windsor. I might add that the same philosophy applies to another area of the country with similar potential, namely, Edmonton-Calgary.

The railway passenger service has tremendous potential for being the most popular mode of transport for distances of 100 to 500 miles. Between Quebec City and Windsor, for example, we are contemplating for the long term, a single passenger-dedicated line from Quebec City to Windsor going through Montreal, Ottawa and Toronto. Such a high performance line would allow speeds of 200 km per hr and could provide travelling times of approximately:

Quebec City-Montreal	1 h 50
Montreal-Ottawa	1 h
Ottawa-Toronto	2 h 40
Toronto-Windsor	2 h 30
Montreal-Toronto	3 h 40

Travel durations of this nature coupled with frequencies of one train per hour throughout most of the corridor would undoubtedly have a very high impact of the market. This would give central Canada a transportation infrastructure with virtually unlimited capacities with regard to the present and expected population densities.

The possibility to link Ottawa to Mirabel in about 45 minutes as well as Toronto to Mirabel in about 3 h 25 also opens all kind of opportunities for ground transportation acting as a feeder to large airports.

There are still many obstacles to overcome to effect these improvements such as: our relationship with CN and CP, the use of the Mount Royal tunnel as an integral part of this corridor, the construction of a new stretch of line of about 50 kilometres between Smiths Falls and Napanee and the yet to be determined detailed routing between Napanee and Windsor. Nevertheless some of the work could start as early as 1981 should the federal government approve our capital budget. There is still, however, some reluctance on the part of the department and the central agencies to invest in the railway passenger mode to the extent required to make it successful.

With regard to the work being done for improving the Ottawa-Montreal service, we have commissioned Canadian Pacific Consulting Services to perform a study on the rehabilitation of a stretch of line between Vankleek Hill and Ottawa. This segment is common to all routing alternatives of the high performance corridor. We expect to start some line upgrading in 1981 should we receive capital budget approval from the Federal Government soon.

The Ottawa-Toronto service is one that requires improvement as quickly as possible. The high performance line would require line construction as I mentioned above. I would hope that this could be started out in 1982 or shortly thereafter if capital funds are made available. We are also looking at a couple of short-term improvements to reduce travel time between these two capital cities but it is too early to give results; we will consider your alternative.

Your point about seeking parliamentary support for this important project is very well taken. We will be preparing a public relations program in this regard very shortly.

Thank you again for your comments and for your support and interest in railway passenger services.

Yours sincerely,

J. F. Roberts

PORTUGAL—DEATH OF GOVERNMENT MINISTERS IN AEROPLANE CRASH—EXTENSION OF SYMPATHY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Last night the world received the tragic news of the death of the Prime Minister of Portugal, his minister of defence and other members of their party in an aeroplane crash on the outskirts of Lisbon. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Brampton-Georgetown (Mr. McDermid):

That this House expresses its sincere sympathy and condolences to the Assembly and the people of Portugal on the untimely and tragic death of their Prime Minister, Francisco Sa Carneiro, and of other leading members of the government of Portugal.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Madam Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

INDUSTRY, TRADE AND COMMERCE

CALL FOR REVIEW OF INTEREST RATE POLICY BY STANDING COMMITTEE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. On Wednesday, October 10, 1979, the House unanimously agreed to a motion by the hon. member for Windsor West, now the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray), seconded by the hon. member for Saint-Maurice, now the Minister of Justice and Minister of Trade for Social Development (Mr. Chrétien), that the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs undertake an immediate review of interest rate policy. That review conducted by the Thirty-first Parliament was never completed.

In view of the fact there have been record increases in interest rates and rising interest rates have an adverse effect upon employment, business, especially small business, consumers and individuals in general, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen):

That this House immediately order the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs to undertake an immediate review of the interest rate policy of the government and of the Bank of Canada, and for this purpose the governor of the Bank of Canada and the Minister of Finance appear before it to explain their actions, and what they will be doing to solve the problems which the governor of the bank himself has said interest rates are now causing for individuals and for business.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

GUATEMALA—CALL FOR PROTEST OF MURDER OF CIDA-SPONSORED OFFICIAL—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bob Ogle (Saskatoon East): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pessing necessity. The savage and indiscriminate repression in Guatemala has been brought home to Canadians once again with the recent murder of Kai Yutah Clouds, an agricultural and community development worker in a CIDA-sponsored Canadian Friends Service Committee project in rural Guatemala. In view of the fact that even the lives of foreign aid workers engaged in non-political projects are no longer safe in Guatemala, I move, seconded by the hon. member for The Battlefords-Meadow Lake (Mr. Anguish):

That this House call on the Canadian government to protest publicly the murder of Mr. Clouds and to pressure the military regime in Guatemala to take immediate action to see that justice is done in this case and to ensure the safety of field workers with Canadian non-governmental organizations still operating in Guatemala.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

POSSIBLE POLLUTION RESULTING FROM ENERGY CONVERSION PROGRAM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom McMillan (Hillsborough): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. There is growing concern among scientists that dioxin, one of the deadliest chemicals in the world, may be emitted into the environment, along with acid rain causing emissions, from the combustion process in coal-fired power plants. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Hawkes):

That this House urges the ministers of the environment, energy, and health to launch immediately an interdepartmental investigation into all environmental and health hazards posed by the government's $175 million program to convert oil-fired electrical plants in Canada to coal; and that the House urges the government to proceed with its coal conversion program only after such an investigation has demonstrated that the program will not violate the environment nor will it threaten human health.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CANADA MORTGAGE AND HOUSING CORPORATION

STUDY OF AHOP PROGRAM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Doug Lewis (Simcoe North): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Of the total AHOP units 36 per cent will be coming off the program in 1981. In view of the number of units which were abandoned by home owners unable to meet their mortgage payments, the resulting losses to the government and neighbourhood real estate price disruption, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Brampton-Georgetown (Mr. McDermid):

That this House direct CMHC to carry out a complete study of the AHOP program in order to avoid the chaos of last spring and the obvious shortcomings of the program as a whole.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ENERGY

OIL—CALL FOR INCREASE IN PRICE PAID ALBERTA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Whereas the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) would make a deal with Saudi Arabia through PetroCan to buy oil at $38 per barrel, and whereas this is one more nail in the coffin of free enterprise as Prime Minister Trudeau leads us on toward his objective, namely a socialistic state, I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Western Arctic (Mr. Nickerson):

That this House urge the Prime Minister to pay Alberta—where the oil industry was built on, and operates on, free enterprise principles—75 per cent of the price he pays foreigners, which will make Canadians more prosperous, give Canadian jobs and be a giant step toward a united Canada.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

MULTICULTURALISM

1981 CENSUS QUESTIONNAIRE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Laverne Lewycky (Dauphin): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Whereas 1981 is a census year, and considering that professional academics in the area of sociology and population studies require valuable data for understanding our unique Canadian society, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That the Minister of State (Multiculturalism) consult with scholars working in the area of ethnology in our universities to see that questions on multiculturalism are included in our 1981 census questionnaire so that information on our rich cultural diversity will be available.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

AGRICULTURE

COMMITMENT OF MINISTER TO CANADIAN WINE INDUSTRY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Joe Reid (St. Catharines): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, particularly to those Canadians interested in agriculture. In light of the fact that the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Ostiguy) has formed an exclusive and closed Liberal club of wine connoisseurs on Parliament Hill, and given that this Liberal club—even though they give lip service to Canadianization—refuse to serve and supply the very fine wines of Canada, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker):

That this House instruct the Minister of Agriculture to live up to his total commitment to the Canadian wine industry by hosting the next meeting of this so-called elite club and serve only Canadian wines, so that his parliamentary secretary and colleagues might become more informed about the agriculture industry and the wine potential of our own country.

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

SOCIAL DEVELOPMENT

TRANSFER PAYMENTS TO PROVINCES—REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE OF NO CUTBACKS

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of State for Social Development and the Minister of National Health and Welfare, I direct my question to the Right Hon. Prime Minister. In view of the fact that interest rates have again increased, with the prime rate now at 15.5 per cent, thus increasing the grim spectre of one million Canadians unemployed before the winter is out, in view of the fact that this comes in the face of indications from the government that it is seriously considering a cutback in social transfer payments to the provinces, and in view of the effect, which cannot be overemphasized, that such a monetary policy will have on the slow growth areas, particularly the Atlantic provinces, would the Prime Minister assure the House and the provinces that, until there is complete economic recovery in this country, there will be no cutback in transfer payments for social programs to the provinces?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, on behalf of the Minister of National Health and Welfare, who I believe will be here later, may I say we have not even begun negotiations yet with the provinces. We will have to await the beginning of those negotiations before we can give an answer to the hon. member.

Mr. McGrath: Madam Speaker, my question was prompted by the budget of the Minister of Finance, in which it was indicated that in order to achieve savings in the area of social policy there would be cutbacks in the social policy envelope to "finance other initiatives in other envelopes". The Canadian Council on Social Development, whle appearing before the constitution committee yesterday, referred to this proposal as a smoking gun and expressed concern about the impact such a move would have on provincial planning to meet programs which are financed now jointly under the Canada Assistance Plan.

Give the prospect of increased unemployment this winter, which is predicted to go to the figure of one million, can the Prime Minister give the poorer provinces and the unemployed of this country a categorical assurance that there will be no cutback or consideratio of a cutback in funding of the Canada Assistance Plan, at least in order to allow the provinces the opportunity to meet the increased welfare rolls which will be a direct result of the government's monetary policy?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, in so far as the poor and the unemployed are concerned, I believe the minister has given that type of guarantee before. But what the hon. member is raising is a constitutional type of question which revolves around the desire of the provinces to exercise certain legislative authority but not to pay the bill. In this time of constitutional discussions and of sharing powers, we want to impress upon the provinces that if the wealthy ones are big enough to exercise certain powers, they should be big enough to pay the bill.

This, of course, does not apply to the less privileged provinces because they are compensated by equalization payments which will continue. The hon. member knows that these are the payments that we propose to guarantee in the constitutional project before the House, which the hon. member's party is so vigorously opposing.

CONTINGENCY PLANS TO MEET INCREASE IN UNEMPLOYMENT

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question will be directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. I would say to the Prime Minister, with the greatest respect, that we are not dealing with a constitutional question but with a bread and butter question. It involves the ability of Canadians to find work and the ability of the provinces to pay welfare payments because of increased unemployment.

The question which I pose to the Minister of Employment and Immigration is this. Given the prospect of one million unemployed this winter as a direct consequence of the monetary policy of the government, the prospect of increased interest rates with the spectre of shutdowns—for example, we already know that there will be a number of small retail operations forced to close their doors, which will mean additional people unemployed—what programs or contingency plans does the minister have, considering his responsibility, to meet this growing unemployment rate?

• (1120)

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, if the hon. member would look carefully at the budget presented by my colleague the Minister of Finance, he would notice that the major emphasis and priority of that budget was to stimulate the economy by putting the investment of this government into long-term economic development programs that would create long-term jobs for Canadians. That is quite in contrast to the budget presented by the government of which he was a member which, by its higher energy prices and its cutback in the deficit, would have created very severe unemployment in this country. So the whole emphasis and priority of this budget was to create major economic development initiatives, and I think that is the major priority of this government that he should support.

EMPLOYMENT

EFFECTS OF INTEREST RATE AND ENERGY POLICIES—REQUEST FOR INCREASED FUNDING OF TRAINING PROGRAMS

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Madam Speaker, I will stay with the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

Mr. Clark: No one else will.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hawkes: Did someone say the minister of unemployment and outmigration? I do not know the minister can stand in this House day after day and heap such praise on Black Tuesday, October 28. In face of the fact that small businesses in this country will have to pay 17 per cent to 18 per cent to borrow money as of this morning, the president of the Canadian Federation of Independent Business predicted on the CBC that there would be 50,000 bankruptcies of small businesses in the near future because of the economic policy of the October 28 budget.

Could the minister tell us whether he cares enough about the unemployed to go to the Minister of Finance and ask him, plead with him, argue with him, to reverse his interest rate policy, to reverse his energy policy—either or both—so that we can get some of those one million people back to work?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, in response to the hon. member, I would simply remind him that my own commitment and the commitment of this government to helping the unemployed was very amply demonstrated when we reintroduced direct employment programs that had been cancelled by the previous government, particularly those designed to help people in the high unemployment regions. I do not think there has to be any further evidence or proof of the contrast or difference in our expenditure of money to help those most severely in need. That is the priority of this government.

I would also remind the hon. member that within that budget presented by my colleague were a number of measures, including one to develop the bonding system for small business that would provide some relief and for some alternative forms of financing for small businessmen.

Mr. Hawkes: Madam Speaker, last June in this House the minister admitted that all he was creating was 7,000 man-years of employment. That is nothing to brag about in the face of one million unemployed. Since this government took office, in the first seven months 9,000 jobs have been lost in manufacturing, 14,000 in construction, 20,000 in agriculture and 8,000 in transport. The labour force survey showed a 44 per cent increase in the number of people who said they were no longer looking for work because they believed there was none to be found.

In the face of those facts, if the minister will not go to the Minister of Finance to ask for a change in policy, can he at least go to him and ask for an increased budget to provide training to those people who have been forced out of the labour market, so that when and if we have an upturn they can get a job?

Mr. Axworthy: Madam Speaker, again I would point out to the hon. member that he is rhyming off a number of facts which simply do not jibe with the statistics provided by Statistics Canada.

Mr. Clark: That is where they came from.

Mr. Axworthy: Madam Speaker, I should like to continue if my hon. friend would hold his response or his enthusiasm. The fact of the matter is that within the first ten months of this year we created something like 170,000 jobs in this country. We have the highest growth rate of employment of any country in the industrialized world, much higher, I would point out, than the employment growth rate in the United Kingdom which is administred by an administration that follows the same economic principles as those of hon. members opposite.

FINANCE

POLICY RESPECTING RISING INTEREST RATES

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, my question is addressed to the Prime Minister. During the 1980 election campaign the Prime Minister made few promises, but one that he was categorical about was that the Liberal party "would keep interest rates down and would make sure that they go lower". Interest rates are having a devastating effect now on farmers, auto workers, small businessmen and fishermen, to name just a few sectors of the Canadian economy. Can the Prime Minister tell the House why he is not implementing his policy but instead is following the disastrous escalation of interest rates in the United States?

• (1125)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I am not quite certain what particular quote the hon. member is attributing to me, but I am certain that it was placed in the context—if it is accurate—of fighting inflation and following the kind of policy which the Minister of Finance introduced in his last budget. This policy is one of attempting, at the same time, to keep prices under control but not do it in such a way as to cause too severe unemployment and unnecessary hardship on the Canadian people.

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, I am quoting from an interview which the Prime Minister gave during the election campaign as reported in the Toronto Star. In that interview he was categorical about his intent to have a lower interest rate policy for Canada. Considering the forecast which has just been made, for home owners alone this means that mortgages will go up by 50 per cent next year. This will not only have a devastating effect on those with mortgages, but will also depress the construction industry. Why does the Prime Minister not reverse current government policy and implement what he promised during the election campaign, namely an independent interest rate policy? When will the Prime Minister get off the disastrous American roller-coaster policy of high interest rates?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, the formula introduced by the Minister of Finance is precisely that, an independent interest rate policy. It is set by the free market in Canada. It is not tied to an automatic index of United States interest rates.

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, the Prime Minister knows that his phrase "free market" really means a continental market, meaning that interest rates here are being permitted, as a result of government policy, to follow American interest rates. In this context, why does the government, instead of boosting interest rates as a means to prop up the Canadian dollar, not allow the Canadian dollar to seek its own level? The consequence of that would be to encourage Canadians to buy Canadian produced goods instead of imported goods, leading to higher levels of employment next year rather than increased depression on which path the government is now taking us.

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, the hon. member must realize that to insulate Canada from what he calls the free market forces of continentalism would mean embarking Canada upon a policy of exchange controls and many other serious measures, which I do not believe even the hon. member's party would be prepared to contemplate at this time.

An hon. Member: What about wage and price controls?

ENERGY

SELF-SUFFICIENCY IN OIL SUPPLIES

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. This government and previous Liberal administrations have steadfastly avoided making a clear commitment to self-sufficiency in relation to purchases of offshore oil and the position to which this country is then exposed by these purchases of offshore oil. We have been advised today of another example of the inadequacy of this policy because the Mexicans have now called force majeure on the exportation of oil to Canada for December. Clearly a policy of oil self-sufficiency for Canada must be a top priority. We must aggressively pursue developing our own production within Canada so that we are not exposed to the decisions of these other countries.

Would the minister accept this as a paramount objective for the Government of Canada, and will he state clearly to the House that if other policy objectives interfere with this specific objective, he will ensure these other policies are amended?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I have no problem at all answering yes to the hon. member. I refer him to "The National Energy Program" which was tabled at the same time as the budget. Very clear steps are indicated in that program as to how this country will achieve self-sufficiency. That will be achieved not only by increasing supply, but also by increasing conservation and substitution in this country.

• (1130)

Mr. Wilson: Madam Speaker, I am very pleased to hear the minister accept that the policy of self-sufficiency is paramount, because there are many people in this country who believe there are other aspects which undermine the objective of self-sufficiency. I hope in future when the minister hears and has assessed these statements by others that he will make amendments to the policy, as he has just committed himself to do so to this House.

My supplementary question in relation to the Mexican oil contract is that a spokesman for Petro-Canada is reported to have said there will be no compensation for the cancellation of oil deliveries and no make-up deliveries in January or subsequent months for those deliveries not made in December. Will the minister confirm this? If it is so, will he take immediate steps to instruct Petro-Canada to renegotiate that contract so we are not left exposed to decisions on these offshore contracts which clearly leave us short of oil at a time when we need it most, the winter months of the year?

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, I am surprised if my hon. friend has just discovered that this government is committed to achieving self-sufficiency by 1990. This is clearly set out in the National Energy Program which was released at the time of the budget. The programs we put forward in that announcement are quite clear and they will achieve that purpose.

With regard to the second point raised by the hon. member, I remind him that the measures taken by Mexico are taken under a force majeure clause which is in the contracts with all of their clients. Canada is not being affected in any different way from any other country. I might also tell my hon. friend that with regard to oil inventories in the country at the present time, the refiners are used to seeing their supplies sometimes reduced from various sources and having to find alternate sources of supply. There is no reason to believe that the present very temporary difficulty with Mexico, caused by bad weather and technical problems, will not be remedied in January and the situation then return to normal. I am advised there is no necessity for taking any exceptional steps at the present time.

SHORTFALL IN OIL SUPPLIES FROM MEXICO—REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE OF SUPPLY TO EASTERN CANADA

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, I will direct my question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. The minister will recall that initially we contracted for 100,000 barrels a day from Mexico. We had that commitment from the Mexican government. It was reduced to 50,000 barrels a day by this government with its tail between its legs this spring. We now find it is going down to 25,000 barrels a day, or less. Since there has been a cancellation of deliveries, coming during the winter months—and the problem may well extend into the cold winter months—notwithstanding what the minister has said, can the minister give a categorical assurance, in view of the fact the oil companies are now scrambling to make up this shortfall, that there will be no shortage of supply in eastern Canada this winter?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, unlike the difficulties that Canada faced this time last year when my hon. friend was minister of energy, I can give a clear, unequivocal assurance that there will be no shortage of heating oil in this country this winter.

Mr. Epp: Ironclad?

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Madam Speaker, the Prime Minister may have his black belt, but the minister can never see a belt without trying to hit below it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I would like to ask the minister if he is serious about this situation, as the country is relying more and more on offshore oil under the policy of this government. We have the Iran-Iraq conflagration, the Mexican cutback and a number of other difficulties. Will the minister undertake to get together with the oil companies with respect to getting assurances from them that they will be able to pick up the shortfall, in the event that these very dangerous situations precipitate a shortage in this country? Notwithstanding that assurance, will the minister give us an undertaking that he will take steps to plan for the possibility of serious shortages this winter?

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, I did not think my friend wore his belt that high. I regret if I hit him where he did not expect it!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lalonde: We have just discovered he is wearing suspenders!

An hon. Member: Brace yourself!

Mr. Lalonde: I come back to the serious part of the question that was raised. There is no difficulty or reason to expect any difficulty this winter because of the announcement from Mexico. Every indication is to the effect that those difficulties are of a temporary nature. The Mexicans have said that they expect that by January the situation will return to normal. The total impact on Canada is marginal in terms of our total supply. We have no reason to believe there will be difficulties this winter because of those steps. Obviously, as the hon. member indicated, if there was to be a very large conflagration in the Middle East, there would be a completely different situation in the world, the western world in particular, and we would have to face that situation.

I wish to advise the member that the Energy Supplies Allocation Board is working very actively and effectively. Again this week they came out with an announcement giving the highest priority to agricultural and fisheries products. The board is functioning normally and properly. If there is any emergency, Canada will be ready to face it.

FISHERIES

PROTECTION OF FISHERMEN FROM HIGH INTEREST RATES

Mr. Ted Miller (Nanaimo-Alberni): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. It relates directly to the announcement yesterday by the Bank of Canada that the prime lending rate would be 14.76 per cent and the announcement today that the prime rate of chartered banks would be 15.5 per cent, and how this relates to Canadian fishermen attempting to finance vessels and gear for the coming fisheries season. The minister will be aware that his colleagues in cabinet have given some assurance to small businesses that they will be given aid as a result of the exorbitant interest rates permitted by this government. The minister responsible for housing announced some programs which will hopefully increase housing starts. The minister of Indian affairs announced programs which will alleviate some of the problems caused by interest rates. The government has given some assurances through Imperial Oil and Chrysler that they will be protected in this society from high interest rates and the declining economy.

In view of the fact that many fishermen are tied to floating interest rates which are now reaching 17.5 per cent, is the minister prepared to announce any program which might protect Canada's fishermen from the exorbitant interest rates this government is allowing?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for putting on record the many good things this government has done.

Mr. Clark: That's part of the deal.

Mr. LeBlanc: I wish the Leader of the Opposition would sometimes ask his own questions. In keeping with the policy of those who are in most need, we have already tendered assistance to Indian fishermen living on reserves who cannot under normal business transactions put up their homes as collateral. The minister of Indian affairs has already indicated some assistance in that area. We are monitoring the situation. The figures I have so far do not indicate an unusual amount of repossessions. In fact, the financial institutions have indicated they are willing to roll over loans and extend credit until such time as the position of fishermen improves, which I am quite hopeful will be next season. There are cases of bad management on the part of individuals who have overextended themselves and therefore get into some trouble.

● (1140)

Mr. Miller: The credit I was giving to this government relates to ad hoc programs which would never be necessary if we were following a proper interest rate policy in this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Miller: The minister is telling me he is willing to see fishermen of British Columbia and the Atlantic provinces mortgage their houses in order to make vessel payments. What is happening is that those fishermen are not only losing their homes but also their vessels. Why will the minister not get out and talk to these fishermen of British Columbia and the Atlantic provinces who will lose their vessels?

I should also like to mention the bad management within the fishing industry as a result of the government's program of allowing larger and larger vessels into the industry. The minister indicated there will be a buy-back program for those people who will lose their vessels. Would he now announce for the benefit of the banks holding those mortgages and the fishermen who are about to lose their vessels when that buy-back program will come into effect so they may get out of the industry with some dignity?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Madam Speaker, we have indicated that the buy-back provisions would not be a program which would be announced in a way which would cause an auction and thereby increase the price of fishing boats. In fact, the buy-back program will be undertaken in a normal commercial way and that is through brokers. In that sense, we will be ready in a matter of weeks to make some decisions.

PUBLIC WORKS

DISCUSSIONS CONCERNING CLEAN-UP OF OTTAWA RIVER

Mr. Carlo Rossi (Bourassa): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Public Works. Can the minister give us a progress report on the negotiations with the Quebec government on cleaning up the Ottawa River?

[English]

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, we indicated to the minister of the environment for the province of Quebec that the government is anxious to see the project for the opening of the sewage treatment plant in the Outaouais region completed. To that end I have made submissions to the Treasury Board requesting that the commitment of the National Capital Commission increase to 50 per cent. Indeed, I have asked officials of the Quebec ministry to consider the community services commitment program allocation increase for that project so as to assist meeting the additional costs of the project, all of which, I would add, had nothing to do with the operation of the federal government or our earlier commitment, but rather has to do with the difficulties of the Quebec government and the delay it has experienced in getting the project under completion.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

ANTICIPATED DELIVERY TO CANADA OF F-18A FIGHTER AIRCRAFT

Hon. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Supply and Services and the Minister of National Defence, my question is directed to whoever is acting Minister of Supply and Services. The U.S. Senate has recommended that all F-18A deficiencies must be corrected and tested before a final decision on production of the fighter aircraft can be made. Thus, this delays that decision for two years. Is the minister still labouring under the delusion that Canada will begin taking delivery of this fighter aircraft in October 1982?

Mr. Norman Kelly (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Supply and Services): Madam Speaker, the department is aware of those difficulties. At this stage there is no panic. Production problems such as the ones we have experienced are normal in the training period or trial period. In fact, that is why you have trial periods, so that you can identify the problems before production begins.

Mr. McKinnon: Madam Speaker, most trial periods are not delayed suddenly by a two-year term.

Article 34(12) of the contract ties Canadian industrial benefits not to the number of planes we buy but to the number of planes the U.S. navy buys. It is common knowledge in Washington that the U.S. navy is reducing the number of planes from 1,366 to 1,044. According to the contract, this will mean that all Canadian industrial benefits will be reduced by a like amount.

In view of this and the other matters which could be brought up regarding the problems with this contract, can the government indicate whether it can renegotiate or cancel this contract and at what cost, bearing in mind we are already into the program for about $50 million and are budgeting for $250 million for next year?

Mr. Kelly: Madam Speaker, the department is aware of all the nuances and subtleties of this particular program. It is monitoring it very closely and will make whatever adjustments are necessary.

F-18A FIGHTER AIRCRAFT—RENEGOTIATION OF CONTRACT

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, I take it, since the question to the member for Victoria was whether the contract can be negotiated, and the parliamentary secretary said the government will take whatever actions are necessary, that it is the view of the government of Canada that that arrangement can be negotiated. Will the parliamentary secretary or some responsible minister indicate whether the official view of the Government of Canada is that that arrangement can be renegotiated?

Mr. Norman Kelly (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Supply and Services): Madam Speaker, I do not have the information with which to answer the right hon. gentleman opposite. This question will be taken under advisement. The Leader of the Opposition may be assured of receiving the appropriate answer at the earliest possible time.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

POSTPONEMENT OF DAKAR CONFERENCE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Madam Speaker, I should like to address my question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. The Francophone summit that was supposed to be held at Dakar having been cancelled, the minister stated that he was under the impression that France does not want an international Francophone community. This morning, according to the newspapers, the French embassy categorically denied the accusation. In those circumstances, does the minister still maintain his accusation or will he take this opportunity to retract it since according to France, it is unfounded?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, this is the second time the French government has put off the Dakar meeting. The same thing happened in November. I feel, therefore, that this is a very reasonable conclusion to arrive at in view of the activities of the French government.

Mr. La Salle: Madam Speaker, unless I am mistaken, the minister refuses categorically to answer my question. I asked, on the one hand, whether he maintains his accusation that France rejects the idea of an international Francophone community. On the other hand, I would add that a distinguished Canadian from Quebec, Mr. Ryan, is also of the opinion that there should be ministerial participation within the Canadian national representation. Seeing Mr. Ryan seems to have excellent chances of leading Quebec in the near future it might be interesting to hear the minister tell us whether or not he would be more receptive to a request from Mr. Ryan of Quebec, under the same circumstances, than he has been until now with the present government?

Mr. MacGuigan: Madam Speaker, we agree with Mr. Ryan that Quebec must be associated with this conference and we made Quebec a generous offer to that end, but I indicated, which I repeat here, that France used Quebec as a pretext to delay the conference.

SMALL BUSINESS

REQUEST FOR INTRODUCTION OF DEVELOPMENT BOND LEGISLATION

Mr. Murray Cardiff (Huron-Bruce): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. It concerns his failure to bring in the legislation giving effect to the small business development bond provisions. Next Thursday an entire year will have passed since these bonds were first announced in the Crosbie budget and it is seven and a half months since the present Minister of Finance reintroduced them as a matter of policy. In view of the fact that farmers in particular have been waiting for confirming legislation, since many of them would have to incorporate their operations before they could take advantage of the small business development bonds, why does the minister not get this legislation before the House? Surely the minister realizes that the small business development bond issues are merely a trickle unless and until he brings in the legislation; and surely he realizes that the measure could be passed quickly since all parties agree that this measure in the Crosbie budget is a good one.

• (1150)

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the delay in bringing forward the development bond is caused by the fact that it is part of the over-all income tax bill which has been put before the public in accordance with the request of many interested parties; the moment we bring in the income tax bill, the development bond will, of course, be part of it. I will give consideration to the proposal as to whether we could deal with the small business development bond immediately without debate, if that is what the hon. member is proposing.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

F-18A FIGHTER AIRCRAFT—EFFECT OF DELAY IN DELIVERY ON PROCUREMENT AND PRICE

Mr. Terry Sargeant (Selkirk-Interlake): Madam Speaker, in the absence of both the Minister of National Defence and the Minister of Supply and Services, I would like to direct my question to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Defence. It relates to the same subject to which the hon. member for Victoria alluded a few moments ago.

In the past couple of days we have learned that there are more very serious problems plaguing our new fighter aircraft.

Aside from the two unexplained test crashes, we now learn that there are flaws in the engine of the F-18, so serious that they will require the redesign of at least three vital parts and the restricted use of seven other parts. Can the parliamentary secretary tell the House what effect these problems will have on the Canadian procurement, which is already threatened with delay for a number of reasons, and can she tell this House more particularly what effect these developments will have on the Canadian contract price?

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, perhaps when we discuss the contract price the question would be more properly directed to the Minister of Supply and Services. However, I would like to point out again that we are in a period of very intensive testing of pre-production models. Because it is a testing period, certain of these problems were already anticipated and, indeed, a certain time was allowed in the contract for these problems to be identified and corrected. Under the circumstances I do not think it is proper at this time to become too alarmed about certain reports which are coming from the United States and which, I might add, have not been confirmed by the U.S. navy.

Mr. Sargeant: Madam Speaker, the parliamentary secretary seems to be suggesting that they knew in advance that they were buying a bad aircraft. I would like to put aside for a moment the cost factors and the delay factors and turn to another subject. One of the selling points of which the government constantly reminds us when speaking of the great deal it made on the CF-18A is the industrial offsets package it negotiated.

My supplementary question to the parliamentary secretary relates to the fact that in the last few months McDonnell Douglas has laid off nearly 500 workers in Toronto. The reason given was that there were no orders for DC-9s or DC-10s. Given that done of the promised industrial benefits for 1980 was $83 million worth of work on DC-9s and DC-10s and a further $83 million in 1981, can the parliamentary secretary explain how she can expect McDonnell Douglas to fulfil its commitments in this area or, for that matter, in any other; or is this just another step in the boondoggle of Canadian defence procurement?

Mrs. Appolloni: Madam Speaker, I think there are a few things to be remembered about this F-18 program. First, we are talking about an aircraft which is in the front end of technology. Therefore, it is incorrect on the part of the hon. member to say that we anticipated difficulties, as if to say we were automatically buying a bad aircraft. We are anticipating an aircraft which is far in advance of any technology we have had to date. Therefore, certain pre-production problems have to be encountered. That is the nature of technology in the future. Under these circumstances, we do not anticipate any particular problems with respect to the industrial benefits which have been written into the contract.

Oral Questions

FINANCE

POLICY RESPECTING INFLATION AND INTEREST RATES

Mr. John Bosley (Don Valley West): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance which relates to the recent rise in interest rates. I am wondering if the minister is finally ready to recognize that it is his policy of increasing the federal share of the gross national product over the next two years and financing that increase through increased borrowings that drives up the expectations of inflation and interest rates and thereby leads to more inflation and higher interest rates. In other words, would the minister finally recognize that he is not, as he pretends, an innocent bystander waiting for somebody else to come along and drive the silver stake through Dracula's heart, but is in fact Bram Stoker, the author?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, one would have to be a poet and a prophet to answer that rather convoluted question, which was clothed in words indistinguishable from what I would call illiteracy.

Mr. Bosley: Madam Speaker, we have again from this minister today his Dr. Jeckyll mode of policy, looking for a place to "Hyde".

The figures to which my hon. colleague referred earlier indicate that we expect 50,000 business bankruptcies in the coming year. Figures which were released yesterday showed that knowledgeable experts expect a 25 per cent increase in personal bankruptcies in Ontario alone this year because of this government's policy of increasing inflation. Can the minister defend his policy of creating more work for lawyers and bankruptcy trustees by driving out of business small businesses which create work for people?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, the hon. member's question was based upon an assertion that we were increasing our share of the gross national product, and that the Government of Canada over the next number of years will add to inflation because we will be increasing our share of the gross national product. That, of course, is not true. If the hon. member looks at the forecasts and projections, he will find that over the period of the projection until the end of 1983-84 the share of the government in the economy will be precisely the same size as it has been in the past year. The hon. member's premise was quite erroneous and, as a result, all the verbiage following it merely decoration.

FEDERAL LANDS

NEPEAN, ONT.—RETENTION OF LAND FOR PUBLIC USE

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Public Works which concerns the federally-owned public lands at the corner of Woodroffe Avenue and Baseline road in the city of Nepean.

As the minister knows, there was a proposal that those lands would be developed by CMHC and kept within the public domain. There are rumours and stories afoot that that is not so. Could the minister confirm what the position is now with respect to those lands, whether there are proposals being sought from developers and whether it is the intention of the government to ensure that at least some of those lands are kept within the public domain or for public use?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, the objective of the corporation, together with the city of Nepean, is to ensure that housing of some type or other is developed on the site. However, it was because of the problems in working together and in realizing common objectives that time has elapsed, and the corporation now believes that in order to get housing, private sector involvement should be encouraged; and it is to that end that the corporation is working with the city officials. Some of the property is being held in abeyance for the possibility of public use. I refer, for example to public buildings for the public service in the Ottawa area.

NATIONAL REVENUE

SITE FOR PROPOSED TAXATION DATA CENTRE

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Minister of National Revenue. The minister knows that there have been plans afoot in the Department of National Revenue for the development of a taxation data centre in the national capital as part of the ongoing program of that department to improve its service to the Canadian public, and that particular site at the corner of Woodroffe and Baseline is being considered. I am not asking whether a decision has been made—although if one has been made I could be told—but could the minister please tell us whether it is still within his consideration that that site is at least one of those being considered for the development of such a centre?

Hon. William Rompkey (Minister of National Revenue): Madam Speaker, I can confirm that that site is one of a number being considered by the department. It was the policy of this government to decentralize federal services, and we planned for seven of these centres all across the country from Newfoundland to British Columbia.

● (1200)

We do intend to set up such an operation in the Ottawa area at some location. It could be an extension of an existing building. My own preference would be for a completely new building, but I will await those recommendations. We are considering a number of sites, including that one. I must say that I have had representations from this side of the House as well, but I will take the hon. member's representation under advisement on behalf of his constituents, of whom I am one.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

ALICE ARM, B.C.—DUMPING OF TAILINGS BY AMAX—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): My question is for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. In the media recently there has been some uncertainty as to the stand of his department on the dumping of tailings in Alice Arm from a mining project there known as AMAX, American Metals Climax. Could the minister set the record straight so that we would know exactly what is the view of his department with respect ot the plans of that company to dump its tailings into Alice Arm?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Madam Speaker, I think the record is quite clear on this issue. The decision made in 1979 to go ahead with the project, or to allow the project to be planned, was reviewed at my request some five or six weeks ago. The review in fact indicated that there was no apparent reason for changing the original recommendation. There is a recognized problem there and that is why a minoriting operation will be put into place. In fact, we are looking at the possible composition of the monitoring agency. We want to make sure that there is public participation. That seems to be the procedure we will follow in the months to come before the operation of the time starts.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): I have a supplementary question, Madam Speaker, with respect to the consultations which the minister may or may not have had with his colleague across the aisle, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, with respect to the misgivings that he might have had and the representations made to him by the Nishga tribe on this matter.

Mr. LeBlanc: Yes, Madam Speaker, I have been in constant contact with my colleague on this issue. He and I agreed that the monitoring agency should have more than governmental people participating and that in fact there should be an invitation to the Nishga to be represented on the monitoring group. I have no further information on this issue now.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. HAWKES—ANSWER GIVEN BY MR. AXWORTHY DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Madam Speaker, during the question period today, the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) misled the House by quarreling with my statistics. They are to be found in the document entitled Labour Force, put out by Statistics Canada, at page 15 in the October issue, which is comparable to another page in the March issue. I think the record should be corrected before we go much further in our deliberations.

Madam Speaker: I must say that that is not a point of order.

PRIVATE BILLS

TABLING OF DOCUMENTS RESPECTING BILL S-13 AND BILL S-14

Mr. Claude-André Lachance (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Trade)): Madam Speaker, on Monday, December 1, 1980, concurrently with the adoption of Bills S-13 and S-14 at both the report and third reading stages, I had agreed to provide the House with certain documents which were to be tabled. Later that day, at 9.45 p.m., there was unanimous consent in the House for another procedure to be followed, namely, that these documents should be appended to Hansard on the day on which I would wish to put these documents before the House.

Madam Speaker, I am now ready to table these documents which are now available and to have them appended to Hansard.

Madam Speaker: As requested by the hon. member for Rosemont, is there unanimous consent of the House for these documents to be appended to today's Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

FISHERIES AND FORESTRY

EXTENSION OF MANDATE OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, there have been discussions among the parties concerning the extension of a committee's mandate, and provided there will be no debate I would propose to move, seconded by the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Bossy):

That the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry be empowered to investigate further and report on all aspects of acid rain;

That the evidence adduced by any subcommittee thereof on the aforementioned subject while considering the main estimates for 1980-81, be deemed to have been laid upon the Table and referred to the said committee;

That it be an instruction to the committee that it appoint a subcommittee to consider the aforementioned matter and that the subcommittee and members of the subcommittee have the power to adjourn from place to place inside Canada for a period of two weeks and to travel outside Canada for a period of one week and that the necessary staff accompany the subcommittee and members of the subcommittee; and—

That the committee shall report to the House finally, no later than March 1, 1981.

Madam Speaker: Does the House give unanimous consent to the motion of the hon. member?

Order Paper Questions

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, as the parliamentary secretary said, there were consultations. I have referred the matter to the opposition critic on the environment, the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. McMillan). The motion which is before us is agreeable, and we are prepared to allow it to go through the House without debate.

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Yes, Madam Speaker, there were such consultations and we agree.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent to this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

POST OFFICE—CROWN CORPORATION

Question No. 75—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Does the government consider it advisable to make the Post Office Department a Crown corporation and, if so (a) for what reason (b) in what way would the service improve?

2. Would the same staff, unions, officials, etc., be involved as in the present postal system?

3. Would making the department a Crown corporation make it more remote from parliamentary control?

4. Does the government consider it essential that the Post Office Department be under the control of the elected representatives of the people of Canada?

Hon. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): 1. Yes.

(a) The government believes that a corporate structure will permit the post office to respond effectively to the environment of the marketplace in the planning and delivery of services and will permit direct management/labour interaction on questions relating to postal operations.
