Betty.

O, has thy crushed and bleeding heart No soothing balm yet found? To ease thee, from the blackened sky,— The dark, dull, cheerless ground,— From the deserted hearth,— and from The silent room, that rests In every room her presence lit,— On all her fingers press— Her, who made life to thee so fair, Who dying, left thee, with despair.

Look, look beyond the lonely spot That holds thy treasure now; When does this world, when living, meet; But stamp on cheek and brow, The lines, first burned upon the heart With agony's own brand? Then why not raise thy tearful eye To that kind gracious hand? That took her eye one care could bright Her fair young brow, or spirit bright.

Guileless she was, and lovely, as The sweetest bird of Spring And dark and bitter is thy cup, Yet God, can gently bring The warmth each beat it gives, A purer and more lasting love, Than e'er with nature lives, May it be thine, to light thy way, Which now seems shrouded o'er for aye.

As honest man, attend and hear The serious fact—the times are dear; Who owes a bill, 'tis just as clear As straight in the winter, That he should come without delay— That if he can—the bill to pay, And ere he puts his purse away, 'Tis work over for the day.

The Printer's check is seldom red— The fine machinery of his head Is working when you are in bed, Your true and faithful Mentor; All day and night he weaves his shoes, And brains, to furnish you with news; But men of conscience ne'er refuse To pay the tolling Printer.

His wife and little prattlers, too, Are now depending upon his due, And if you pay the score that's due, 'Tis just as clear as day to her; But if you don't, 'tis known the mole, 'Twill through your conscience eat a hole, And brand the forehead thus: 'No soul! Of him who cheats the Printer.

The cats will mew between your feet, The dogs will bite you on the street; And every arching that you meet, 'Till you are weary of the street, 'Look to your pockets—there he goes, The Chap that wears the Printer's clothes! And proud, though every body knows The grab, he gnaw'd the Printer.

MISCELLANEOUS SELECTIONS. THE GOVERNOR'S FIRST LOVE. BY EMERSON BENNETT.

If there is any one who needs the philosophy of this world's changes, to make him wiser and better, by bringing hope to his despair, or humility to his pride, let him take a given number of individuals, and a given number of years—say twenty of each—and observe the condition of the different parties at the beginning and end of the period named. The result in all cases will be astonishing—in many it will be wonderful.

I old friend, reader, think back twenty years, and see where and how you stood in the world, with nineteen others, selected at random from all you then knew. Take the names that first present themselves to your memory, and write them down, with the condition and prospects of each individual annexed; and then, underneath, write the condition and prospects of each at the present moment; and if you find not the result almost startling, and a suicide's death.

Next I recall an aspiring youth—proud, wealthy, and ambitious—bending his whole energies to academic honors and collegiate distinction. His promise was a brilliant career, with living applause and posthumous fame—his reality a loss of sight, mental disease, and a suicide's death.

The third, comes up before me a poor, pale, blue-eyed cripple, whom one loved, a few pained, and the rest despised. His promise was a short and miserable existence—his reality was a honorable position, great wealth, and plenty of what the world calls friends.

And so I might go on, disposing of the number one by one; but there are two whose names rise together and blend in my memory, and who may more properly fill the limits of my space—for theirs is a history "to point a moral and adorn a tale."

Twenty years ago, then, a slender, pale young man, thin but decently clad, was one old evening hurrying his steps over the ground that divides his own humble home from the large and somewhat aristocratic dwelling of a neighbor. As he drew near the mansion, which looked up white, and occasionally cold and proud, in the frosty, star-like air, the pale features of the young man flushed, and the hand that timidly knocked at the door trembled not a little. The door was almost immediately opened, by a blooming, beautiful girl of eighteen, who said, in a soft, sweet, and apparently excited tone: "Oh! Walter—oh! is it you? Walk in!"

"I hope I see you well this evening, Mary," returned the young man, in a slightly tremulous tone, that seemed to result from strong but partially repressed emotions.

"Oh, I am well," replied the girl hurriedly, as she closed the door and led the way to the sitting-room, where she motioned her guest to be seated, though without showing any inclination to sit herself.

"You got my note, I suppose?" she interrogatively asserted, in a quick and hurried manner, hastily turning her flashing features from the keen scrutiny of his eye addressed.

"Yes, Mary Ellsworth," replied the other, more slowly and distinctly, "I received a line or two from you, saying all the family would be absent to-night except myself, and you desired to see me a moment or two."

The young man paused, keeping his fine, hazel eyes steadily fixed upon the other, who now, with an averted head, seemed much embarrassed and disconcerted. Stepping forward a few paces, she dropped into a chair, and, still without replying, appeared to busy herself in looking at the jeweled rings on her fair, soft, lady-like fingers.

"Mary," spoke Walter Harwood, after an impressive silence of more than a minute, "what is the meaning of this?"

She played nervously with her fingers, but still remained silent.

"Mary," continued Walter, placing a chair and seating himself in such a position that he could catch a partial view of her features, "let me remind you exactly how we stand in regard to each other; and then speak frankly and say why you seat for me?"

He paused a moment, passed his hand rather quickly and nervously along his high, white forehead, and then proceeded—

"I am four years your senior, Mary, and have loved you from infancy. It was my delight as a child when you were a mere infant, to hold you in these arms; and even then, young as I was, and strange as it may seem, I often prayed that I might grow up a strong man, and be ever able to support you and protect you through the journey of life."

"We were playmates when little—we grew up companions—and there was never a period of your life that I did not love you, and daily pray to be loved in return. But your father was rich, and you were poor, and I was poor, and still existed, between the families of Ellsworth and Harwood; though I will do you the justice to say, that I do not believe you ever intentionally made me perceive the difference I allude to; but I did see, and know and feel it; and though loving you almost to madness, I dared not venture to tell you so, lest my motive might either be thought mercenary, or myself too presumptuous, and thus all my brightest hopes and fondest dreams be in an evil moment blasted."

"But why dwell upon this which I have many times told you already? Rather let me come to the point at once."

"About one year ago, then, Mary," the young man went on, with deep feeling, while his listener grew deadly pale trembled violently, "such an opportunity presented itself for declaring my passion, that to delay it longer seemed dying in the very face of fortune; and carried away by an almost uncontrollable impulse, I poured out my very soul to your listening ear, and received in return such assurance of your affectionate regard, the happiest being in the wide, wide world. Ah! Mary—Mary—you may not love me now—you may never have loved me—but you will never be so loved by another as you are by the poor miserable wretch who now addresses you."

"Well! I went home happy, as I have very long time told you already; and I was next—displeased; the second time you seemed troubled and displeased; the third time you were dignified; the fourth reserved; the fifth cool; the sixth cold; the seventh stern; and then we ceased speaking altogether, and I have been an unhappy being ever since. Now, after a long painful lapse, your note has brought me to you, and I have come trembling with hope and fear. Oh! Mary—dear Mary, shall I venture to call you?—am I here to learn from your lips that the past is forgotten? and that henceforth I am to be again enraptured with your esteem, your regard, your—"

"Secondly, then," pursued the other, "is there any one you esteem, or love, more than you do me?"

"I—I would rather not answer that question," replied Mary, turning away her head in confusion.

"Enough!" rejoined Walter; "I am answered. I know that Henry Wilder had been a somewhat regular visitor here for the last six months; but I did not allude to it sooner, because I feared you would think me captious or jealous. I understand all now!" he continued, rising and presenting his hand, which the maiden took almost mechanically.

"Farewell!" he added, in a faltering voice, his trembling form and quivering lips betraying his deep and painful emotions. "Farewell, Mary Ellsworth: it is not likely we shall ever meet again. Yet one word of caution before we part: Beware of him if you are asked: He is a man not a true and honest man, and I speak from personal knowledge. Oh! give him not your hand and heart, as you value your peace and happiness; which will always be dear to him you now reject. God bless you, and prosper and guard you from the misery I now suffer, shall ever be the prayer of him who now bids you an eternal adieu!"

Saying this, he gave the hand he held a strong, nervous pressure, and rushed madly from the presence of the fair being he so wildly worshipped; who, for a few minutes, remained as one speechless with a strange surprise, and then gave way to her emotions in a flood of tears.

A week later it was known to all in the vicinity, that Walter Harwood had gone abroad, perhaps never to return. Three months later, a gay bridal party assembled at the mansion of "Squire Ellsworth," to witness the beautiful heiress give her hand to him against whom she had been warned.

Nineteen years passed away—a short period of a long one, according as existence has proved bright or gloomy, happy or miserable—and in a Southern city, which shall be nameless, the Governor of the State sat reading in his library, when a servant in livery announced to his Excellency that a lady in black most urgently craved a few minutes audience.

"Conduct her hither," replied the Governor; and as she appeared, he rose advanced a few paces, politely handed her a seat, and resumed his own.

The lady who was dressed in deep mourning, with a black, heavy veil entirely concealing her features, trembled violently, as she hurriedly but silently reached forward a paper to his Excellency, which he quietly and courteously received.

"This," he said, after a few minutes of silence, during which he was engaged in unrolling and perusing a lengthy document, "is a petition—signed, among others, by quite a number of influential citizens—praying for the pardon of one—"

"The name of the petitioner for the term of five years, for Southern City, Madam, what is this man to you?"

"He is my husband, your Excellency," faltered the woman, trembling nervously.

"I am sorry for it, madam—because it is hard for a man of feeling to deny the petition of a wife in behalf of him she has solemnly vowed to love and honor; but my sense of duty becomes paramount to feelings, and I must refuse your prayer. This man, though your husband has no redeeming antecedents, and I am sorry to say I do not think he merits executive clemency."

"Oh! say not so, your Excellency!" cried the young man, suddenly starting from her seat, and dropping down upon her knees before the Governor. "He always meant to do right; but he has been unfortunate; and in a moment of insanity—I can call it no less—insanity caused by want and a husband's and father's desire to give bread to his starving wife and children—he wrote another man's name to a note, and got it cashed, intending to take it up before it came due; but was discovered, arrested, and is now groaning out his life within the dark gloomy walls of a prison! Oh! pardon him, your Excellency! pardon him; as you hope God to pardon you; and I solemnly declare to you, he shall immediately leave the State, and never again offend against its righteous laws!"

While she was thus speaking, in a wild, impassioned strain, she impulsively threw back her heavy veil, and revealed to the astonished gaze of her listener, the pale, careworn, but still beautiful features of a woman fast verging upon forty. At the sight of this face, the Governor started back, clasped his hands, and like one petrified with amazement, kept his eyes riveted upon her, without further gesture or motion, and with even his breath suspended.

"Do my eyes deceive me? or do I behold in this kneeling figure the once happy Mary Ellsworth?" he exclaimed the moment her musical voice ceased.

"Just Heaven! who speaks that name?" almost shrieked the kneeling petitioner, starting suddenly to her feet, clasping her temples with her hands, and fixing her eyes in wild amazement upon the ruler of a State.

"Mary," he groaned, "it is Walter Harwood you see before you—the once poor, penniless man, who always loved you better than his own life, but whose soul you rejected, and whose existence your rejection has ever since rendered miserable; for blessed Governor of a State, Mary, and for blessing, as men call it, with honors, wealth and power, I am at least a lonely, wretched being, who lives because it is a duty, and with only the hope of finding happiness in a better world. Would to God we had never met again!"

The interview between these two beings, after a lapse of nineteen years, was, if anything, more painful than the one already recorded. She freely told him of all her troubles and sorrows; how her parents, having been induced to sell their property to enable her husband to enter into some speculation, had soon been stripped of all, and had died in poverty; how her husband had since squandered all he could by his hands on, and then, falling into habits of dissipation, had gradually sunk lower and lower, till crime had been added to his other faults and errors, and he was now, under the assumed name of Thomas Calcraft, suffering the penalty of broken law, and finally, low as herself, dooming him never, through good and evil, to see her again.

"What a strange world is this to him who sits down to note the changes of a few revolving years!"

They sat—A more sneaking, cowardly, fawning liar than "they say," does not exist. That personage is a universal scapegoat for personal gossip, envy and malice; without form of flesh and blood, when invoked, and yet stalking boldly in every community. The character is a myth, and yet real; intangible and yet clutching its victims with remorseless power. It is unseen, and yet from an envious, quivering wing it poisons arrows from day to day. And no mail is proof; no character, position, or sex escapes; no sanctuary is too sacred; no home is bulwarked against its assaults. When one base heart wishes to assail some person's character or motives, "they say" it is always invoked. That is the assassin who strikes in the cloud—the Thug who haunts the footsteps of the offender, and tortures from careless word or deed, an excuse for the stiletto. Men dare not always reveal their feelings. With smiles and pretended friendship they present the camouflaged shaft, as coming from "they say." Be sure reader that when some villainous tale is told of you, and the relator cannot give an author more tangible than "they say" for it, it is the creation of the heart by that side and reeking with the poison of envy and hatred, and earnest with a wish to have the falsehood of "They say" become reality, and become current coin in the community.

"They say," we repeat, is as cowardly as it is false and fawning; a phantom creature which smiles, while it is loosing a broad of vipers to crawl in your path, and blast by their venom. To retail the stories of "they say," is to snook behind an intangible personage and put in circulation the infamous influences and calumnies which, from raw material are forged nearer home.

THE DOOM OF THE WORLD.—The North British Review, discussing on the doom of the world, has the following remarks:

"What this change is to be, we dare not even conjecture, but we see in the heaven themselves some traces of destructive elements and some indications of their power, the fragments of broken planets—the descent of meteoric stones upon our globe—the whirling comets wielding their loose material in the solar surface—the volcanic eruptions in our own satellite—the appearance of new stars and disappearance of others are all fore-shadows of that impending convulsion to which the world is doomed. Thus placed on a planet which is to be burned up, and under heaven which are to pass away; thus reading at we see, on the cosmetics, and dwelling upon the maundering of former worlds, let us learn the lesson of humility and wisdom, if we have not already been taught in the school of revelation."

LAW OF NEWSPAPERS.—1. Subscribers who do not give express notice to the contrary, are considered as wishing to continue their subscription. 2. If subscribers neglect or refuse to take their paper from the office or place to which they are sent, they are held responsible until they settle their list and give notice to discontinue their subscription. 3. If subscribers move to other places without informing the publisher, and the paper is sent to the former direction, they are held responsible. 4. Refusing to take a paper periodical for the office, or removing and leaving it uncollected, is evidence of fraud.

THE TOOTHACHE.—"My dear friend," said H.—"I can cure your toothache in ten minutes." "How? how?" inquired I. "Do it, in pity," instantly, said he, "Have you any alum?"

"Yes." "Bring it, and some common salt." They were produced. My friend pulverized them, mixed them in quantity, then wet a small piece of cotton, causing the mixed powder to adhere, and placed it in my hollow tooth.

"There," said he, "if that does not cure you I will forfeit my head. You tell this to every one, and publish it everywhere. The remedy is infallible." It was as he predicted. On the introduction of the mixed alum and salt, I experienced a sensation of coldness, which gradually subsided, and with it—alum and salt—I cured the torment of the toothache.—Mandville Reader.

WORDS ON APPLE TREES.—I have tried several things with indifferent success. I have not seen anything so complete and easy as a little red ochre mixed with lard oil into a paste and applied with a brush somewhat profusely but closely to the wood. It forms a yielding surface, a matter of importance—very impervious to rain, and completely protects the tree from bleeding. It injures my feelings very much to travel my orchard and see the bark black and killed, by neglecting to cover the wounds.

CUSTOM CALCULATION.—If a pin was dropped in the hold of the Leviathan the first week of the next, and the next 365 days, and so on doubling the number each time for a year (52 weeks) the number of pins deposited would be 4,603,509,673,709 pins; the weight of them (allowing 200 pins to the oz.) would be 23,017,548 tons; and the number of Leviathans, of the tonnage of 22,500 tons each, required to carry them, would be 1,023.

FROM OUR LONDON CORRESPONDENT.

LONDON, March 11, 1856.

Mr. Disraeli gave the assurance so much desired in Europe; and when the Right Honourable gentleman said that England would see her influence to induce France and Austria to evacuate Rome, the applause was tremendous.

The news from the Continent, though during the week it assumed a more encouraging character, was still disappointing.

There was a panic in the Vienna Money Market, which dates from the 23rd. Tea and Silks advanced.

London, March 10th.—War is more imminent. Consols closed at 95 1/8. Wheat firmer; Flour unchanged.

Arrival of the "Niagara."

New York, March 30. The steamship Terzia and Kangaroo arrived. Parliament proceedings unimportant.

Nothing authentic as to Lord Cowley's mission to Vienna, but it is believed that it is to be hoped for. The Paris correspondents consider matters growing more critical.

The Nord distinctly asserts that no negotiations are pending. Napoleon consented to the insertion of the article in the Monitor, to show his moderation.

The Paris correspondent of the Times describes the Emperor's attitude as a wilful misstatement. It was, he says, submitted to the Emperor on midnight on Friday.

Arrival of the "Niagara."

HALIFAX, March 7. The steamer Niagara, Capt. Miller, which sailed from Liverpool at 2 P.M. on the 12th, arrived at 1 P.M. on Sunday the 27th.

The Niagara reports on the 13th, passed Emily A. Hale, at a distance of 100 miles out of the harbor, at 4 P.M. passed steamship Africa, from New York.

The Alpa, bound for Halifax and Boston, left Liverpool about the same time as the Niagara and entered Halifax harbor together with her.

The Indian arrived at Liverpool at 2 A.M. on the 10th, the Lebanon at noon on the 11th.

The London Times editorially remarks:—Every appearance within the last few days justifies the anticipation of a complete change in the foreign policy of the Emperor of the French.

The monthly returns of the Bank of France show that cash on hand increased nearly thirty-three million francs.

The Paris correspondent of the Herald, in his letter of Thursday:—The hopes of peace which were daily melting away under the influence of the war articles which the semi-official journal instructed to publish; they steadily repeat that no change has taken place in the Emperor's policy...
