MR. MACKENZIE: No, not higher taxation, but with Protection. I claim that if there is a country where Protection may possibly exist without doing infinite harm to the people, the United States is that country. I deny that Protection has promoted the prosperity of the United States. That country has prospered in spite of Protection, and not because of it. Our present taxation is very heavy. In proportion to our means, our debt is even larger than that of the United States, and any increase of it at the present time would, in my opinion, be a very serious calamity to the country. The hon. the Minister of Finance and his leader has, on several occasions, endeavoured to picture the growing prosperity of the country at this moment, although they know that the present exodus, from this country, was never equalled, and although they know there is intense dissatisfaction, especially in the Lower Provinces, with the policy of the Government. The hon. gentleman seems to think that there is no alternative between the severance of the Union and the adoption of their Railway policy. Well, if the Union must be severed—if the east or west must be chosen—I would select that portion which contains the smallest number of people to be severed, for hon. gentlemen cannot shut their eyes to the fact that the people of the Lower Provinces are openly complaining that they have been deluded in joining in Confederation, that they have been cheated, by its terms and promises not being fulfilled. We, on this side of the House, would take our stand on the resistance of increased taxation, especially for purposes which can only benefit a very small number; and as it is impossible in our situation to adopt the policy of the Government, without increased taxation, there is nothing for it but to vote for delay in the more expensive and useless portions of the work, and those which will confer the least benefit to the people. I believe very much depends on the expression of public opinion in relation to this matter, and while we shall all be glad if we are able to carry out in its entirety the Treaty o-called, the hon. gentleman opposite made, we must be content with carrying out as far as our means will permit, those portions of the Railway which were of most use to the greatest number of people. And with regard to the patriotism of this proposition, I maintain that that man alone is truly patriotic who looks beyond the present, who entrusts no one with unlimited power of taxation in order to carry on works which were of no immediate benefit to the great mass of the people, and which is opposed to the general sentiment. Why it is intolerable that nearly 4,000,000 of people who live on the eastern side of the Rocky Mountains should be taxed to such an enormous extent as they are now, and will be in future merely to keep up the appearance of complying with Terms which, in their strict interpretation cannot possibly be complied with. The late Government was bound by Parliamentary Resolutions, passed after the Terms of Union were agreed to, to the same extent as hon. gentlemen opposite and no more, and when accused of lack of patriotism or loyalty, I can only reply in the manner in which Burke met a similar accusation in the English House of Commons. Burke, when accused of disloyalty in opposing some measures of the Ministry, replied that: "He yielded to no man in his loyalty to the Queen, but he did not feel bound nor at all inclined to extend that feeling of loyalty to her Majesty's manservant, her maid-servant, her ox, nor her ass."

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: We have heard that before.

MR. MACKENZIE: Yes, I think I have had occasion to say that before, and to an audience, to some considerable extent, the same as the present one. The hon. gentleman was certainly present at the time, but he cannot have it repeated to him too often. The hon. gentleman and his party think they have a divine right to rule this country, and, not only that, but to say who shall and who shall not be ranked as patriots. As we believe every man in the country is not only entitled to express his opinion freely on all such matters, but will fail in duty if he does not do so, the sooner we have this question discussed on its business and political merits the better, instead of accusing people of being actuated by motives they are constantly obliged to repudiate. I have endeavoured to meet the points in the speech of the hon. the Minister of Railways, who endeavoured to throw the blame of all mistakes and misdeeds on the late Administration, and then to show, by contrast, how much better the present had managed affairs; I have shown that, as to the chief points on which he claimed credit, he is entitled to none. The only point on which he is entitled to any credit, or discredit, is the new plan of degrading the Railway into a track that will not be fit for heavy traffic—for adopting a plan not at first contemplated, and which, though it will be of material advantage, running 200 miles into the prairie country, of which I doubt the wisdom. I thank the House for the patience with which it has heard me, one of my objects being to describe the country, including the desert, and show its capacity for sustaining a large population, in which our whole principle of action depends. If it has that capacity, the Railway will the sooner pay. If the quantity of good land is not comparatively very great, then I think the calculations of the hon. the Minister of Railways will fail, although we shall still have a very large emigration into the country. But it must enter gradually. It is impossible to expect the vast numbers to reach that country in the time predicted by hon. gentlemen opposite. It will be difficult to procure the settlement of some parts of it under any circumstances. I can only hope that hon. members will decide on this question dispassionately, and after consulting the authorities on the various points raised. Hon. gentlemen opposite, no doubt, calculate upon their majority, as usual, but the majority in cases where a moral wrong is committed will not always adhere. I am satisfied that the opinion of the country generally, in this matter, is thoroughly with the course we pursue in asking for a postponement of the work to a great extent, the cost of which will be so great while promising, immediately, so little result.

MR. PLUMB: The attention of the House and country has been painfully drawn, within the last four or five days, to the important discussion proceeding in this House. We were prepared for a very able review of the fiscal history and policy of the country by the notice given by the hon. member for West Durham, and the expectations of the House and public have been in some degree justified by the elaborate manner in which that hon. gentleman has treated the great questions reviewed by him. He has made a speech which must be regarded, in connection with that of the hon. member for Lambton, as the pronunciamento of the fragment of the party which they lead and represent. The hon. member for West Durham has been distinguished by his erratic course. He first joined the Administration of the hon. member for Lambton, being for a time a Minister without a portfolio. Then the hon. gentleman quitted the Government, and re-entered it, remaining until it was overthrown.

MR. BLAKE: No.

MR. PLUMB: He continued to be a member of the late Government at least until the last Session, in which it was dominant, was over—an erratic and uncertain coadjutor, first without portfolio, then after sitting one Session on the back benches, he re-entered it in succession to Mr. Fournier, as Minister of Justice, then again, taking the chair left vacant by his colleague, Mr. Cauchon, he gave up the Department of Justice to another colleague, Mr. Laflamme. The hon. gentleman went in and out and shuffled about so many times that it is difficult to follow his movements. His last utterance on a public platform during the election campaign was at Teeswater, in his then constituency of South Bruce, when the country was anxiously waiting to hear him defend the Administration of which he was a member. His friends were greatly disappointed. He scarcely referred to the issues of the campaign so far as they turned upon the acts of his Government, and his and half-hearted support of his associates was their implied condemnation. He did not fail, however, to deal most minutely with matters connected with his own Department of Justice, claiming great credit for having achieved, without difficulty, what his predecessor (Sir John A. Macdonald) had failed to accomplish—for having cleared up accumulations of business left on his hands, I infer, by Messrs. Dorion and Fournier, who had gone to their reward on the Bench where electors cease from troubling, for having despatched promptly and with ease the ever-increasing business of the Department; and yet, at the following Session, the hon. gentleman did not hesitate to support a measure of his Government for the division of the Department, and the new appointment of an Attorney-General at a salary of $7,000 a year, on the ground that the labour was too heavy for one chief officer. At the Teeswater meeting it was noted that the hon. gentleman was very lukewarm in justifying the course pursued by his colleagues. He was amply able, if he had so chosen, to find arguments, whether sound or otherwise, for the defence of the Government of which he had been a member; but though he failed to do so, the public has always held him responsible, and will always hold him responsible, for the whole course of the Administration of which he formed a part. We have heard for the first time, now, the conditions upon which he says he took office under the hon. gentleman who led the late Government (Mr. Mackenzie). The chief characteristics of the hon. gentleman's political career are its capricious inconsistency and its utter inconsistency. At one moment, "letting I dare not wait upon I would," he refuses a seat in the Government; at another, he accepts a position befitting his professional standing; at another, retires from it to a comparative sinecure made vacant by the promotion of a colleague whose presence was a perpetual reminder of unsavory transactions, while his own place was filled by an arrangement for which he is directly responsible, and which ought to have received his indignant opposition. The hon. gentleman says he retired, but he carried with him the responsibilities of which he cannot rid himself, complicity with every act of which he had been cognisant while he remained in office. We were then told that the hon. gentleman intended to withdraw from political life. He doubtless knew far better than we did the sins which he would be called upon to justify if he remained. The anxious electors of South Bruce sent urgent delegations to him urging him to accept re-nomination, and he at last, when they brought him a requisition having a formidable array of signatures, "vowing he would ne'er consent, consented," but wisely left his supporters to fight the battle while he turned his back upon the campaign and remained absent from the country until the elections were over and his own signal defeat had been secured. Again he coquetted, month after month, with those of his party—and they were not by any means the whole of his party—who desired to bring him back to the present Parliament, one Session of which had been held without his presence. When it was announced last autumn that the retirement of Mr. Burke had been arranged, and that the hon. gentleman would accept the nomination for West Durham, we waited with much curiosity to hear what ground he would take in the platform for his canvass. We expected to hear additional theories, unsubstantial as those of the Aurora declarations, and perhaps more startling and disturbing, for at one time he appears as the advocate of radical changes in our political system, involving a progress which is almost revolutionary, and which many less ardent but perhaps more sincere and practical levellers deem dangerous. At other times, as we have just now heard, he calls upon us suddenly to halt in the midst of our career, to make a swift retreat and entrench ourselves behind the dismantled and decaying fortress of 1871, a retreat that would involve the abandonment and surrender of all the great advantages we have gained since that period. When, however, at West Durham he proclaimed his platform, we were surprised to find that part of his speech—and a very large part of it was—which bore upon the National Policy, was made up of stale quotations from the Globe—was in fact an argument prepared apparently out of the threadbare editorial articles of that paper. He entered Parliament and took a seat on the back benches with ostentatious humility. He has shown that he is not to be contented with that position. He has now placed himself in such an attitude that his utterances must be dealt with as of a party character, and it is almost distressing to see the manner in which his late colleague, and I may now say his late leader, the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie), humbly takes up his argument, and even goes further than the hon. gentleman himself in decrying the ability of the country to build the Pacific Railway, which was the gravamen of that hon. gentleman's argument. I followed him (Mr. Mackenzie) through a great part of his speech with surprise and deep regret, as I have no doubt did many other hon. gentlemen who noted its tone and spirit. There has been nothing said or done in the House so well calculated to dishearten and discourage this country as the remarks of both those gentlemen. The speech of the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) especially, was a funeral dirge from beginning to end—a doleful sound from the tombs—a wail over the lost Israel of power—a Jeremiah, like the lamentations of the Hebrew Prophet whose name has become an adjective. He warned us we were going too fast, that we had no justification for claiming that we were making healthy progress; that this country could offer no attractive inducements for emigrants; that the Teutonic races were led to form settlements in the United States by common political sympathies and Democratic sentiments: that the Celtic expatriation was always towards the great Republic, which heard and responded to the appeals of down-trodden Ireland, and that the expatriation would now be checked by reason of the change in the Imperial Government, in the "so-called United Empire,"—and we marked the sarcastic, sneering emphasis with which he pronounced these words—and we might hope through that change for the sunburst of Home Rule, and for the resulting justice so long denied or delayed. He said we had practically nothing to look for to take up our vacant lands except the immigration of a few English tenant farmers, who would be attracted to the Dominion by similarity of institutions and political sympathies; that there was no hope for us except in immediately reversing our whole policy; that otherwise the country could not possibly meet its pecuniary engagements, or sustain the burthens which could not be thrown off. But the hon. member for West Durham did not utter warnings of this kind during the five years of the rule during which he sanctioned by his presence on the Treasury Benches the diastrous depletion of the Treasury, the reckless increase in Departmental expenditure, and the extravagant and blundering Railway policy of a Reform Government that had nothing to reform except their own mal-administration. During the great depression under which the country was suffering in that trying period, when the colleagues with whom he was associated were proceeding with the extravagant schemes he now denounces—were engaged in expensive enterprises of which they have thrown upon the present Government the necessity of carrying forward—building railways, opening up new territory, and increasing in every manner, which the hon. member for West Durham now eloquently condemns, the Public Debt, while the Treasury suffered from increasing deficits, for which no provision was suggested by the hon. gentleman, or by his immediately culpable colleagues, he did not lift up his voice of warning. He did not take the position he now assumes, though there was a greater reason for it then. He allowed his friends to go on and deplete the Treasury; he saw the House filled with contractors, yet never uttered a word in denunciation of that iniquitous system by which the late Administration disgraced the country. He was a consenting party to everything done by it, and it does not become him or anyone on his side to hint at an exploded thread-bare scandal, when they have proven scandals of their own of ten times its magnitude. In his attack upon a sister Province he spoke of the madness of throwing our gold into the canyons of British Columbia; he charged us with squandering the public money in the undertaking of the construction of the railway line along the Fraser, an undertaking we feel ourselves bound in honour and good faith to proceed with. For the first time I heard in this House, during this debate, that there was never any sincere intention on the part of the gentlemen on the opposite side to build any portion of the Railway in British Columbia. I supposed that when they accepted the Carnarvon Award—when they introduced the Bill to sanction the construction of the Nanaimo and Esquimalt line, and especially, latterly, when they transported the rails provided for that line to a convenient point on the main land, and drew attention to the fact as an earnest of their good faith, they intended in all honour to carry out the scheme agreed upon. That agreement was ratified time after time by the House, and while the Carnarvon Terms were accepted, the hon. gentlemen were so intent upon fulfilling them that they left out the proviso in respect to increase of taxation, which had been adopted in all previous legislation, and, it is said that the resolution offering that reservation was an afterthought of the hon. member for West Durham, who put it in the hands of the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross) by whom it was moved several days after the debate on and acceptance of the Carnarvon Terms, in a speech in which that hon. member propounded the doctrine that emigration into the North-West must precede railway construction. I can scarcely undertake to follow the hon. member for West Durham in his five or six hours' speech. In the array of figures that he produced during his treatment of the financial branch of his argument, I think I recognised a practised hand, one that can make figures assist an argument on one side as well as on another. The hon. gentleman from West Durham himself used them as a pleader handles a brief on which he must make an argument, before he has time to study it. It was evident that his forte was not statistics compiled from the Public Accounts, and in deductions therefrom he was evidently at sea. The state of things which my hon. friend has brought forward does not prove his case. It is useless to say that this country is not in a state in which we may look for progress and improvement. If there has been no satisfactory progress attained since 1873, we all know where the responsibility belongs. It does not belong to the hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, who have honestly endeavoured to promote the public welfare, but it lies upon those who, from the moment of their accession to power in 1873, whether on the Treasury Benches or in opposition, have endeavoured in every possible way to alarm capitalists and prevent them from investing their money in undertakings which would enhance the prosperity of the country. My hon. friend complained a little while ago that we charged him with being unpatriotic. I say the charge is a general one against his side of the House, although I regret to say that the chief offender of all, because I believe he sins against light and knowledge, is the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), whose utterances are still ringing in our ears. It is painful to hear what that hon. gentleman has said of the state of affairs in this country, and it would be still more painful to hear it if we did not know that it was but a mere figment of his bilious imagination. It is more than two years ago since the late hon. Finance Minister jauntily predicted, from his place in this House, that the culminating point in our commercial depression had been reached. That hon. gentleman, when it suited him, could speak as cheerily about the prospects of the country as any one upon this side of the House. But he wished merely to cover his shortcomings; he had no actual knowledge that the time had come when the depression was to pass away. But that hon. gentleman never tired of pointing out the condition of the United States as an example to be shunned. He told us that that highly protected country, having committed suicide by adopting a protective system, was in a state of fiscal ruin, from which it could never recover. Now the tune is entirely changed. Consistency cannot be expected from desperate partisans, and I was not surprised to hear the hon. member for West Durham lauding the United States, and quoting it as an example of prosperity which we could not hope to reach, or even approach. But when I ventured, as I thought I might, to ask him whether that country which he was so highly lauding, was not a highly protected country, the hon. gentleman, instead of answering me candidly, put his hand upon his heart, and said he was too feeble to be interrupted, and trusted he would not question him and allow him to go to the end of his speech with interpellation. I have always endeavoured to treat that hon. gentleman with the courtesy to which I think every hon. gentleman has a right. I refrained, therefore, from pressing for a reply, although I believe that the interpellation had its effect, and will take a place in the official reports as a parenthesis in the hon. gentleman's speech, and be, perhaps, a small antidote to a great bane. My hon. friend said there was a large increase of population in the United States. He must remember that the system of exclusive protection was initiated in that country in 1861, when the Morrill Tariff was passed, and the great increase of population and the rapid growth of prosperity to which he refers, notwithstanding the civil war, dates from that period. But the hon. gentleman did not state half the case when he gave the quantity of the sales of land that had been made in the Western States, and built upon it an argument against the calculation of the Premier. He then only stated the sales the Government had made, which are not, I venture to say, although I have not made the calculation, 10 per cent. of the entire sales. The great sales of lands in that country have been made by railway corporations holding enormous grants of the public lands under the very system we propose to adopt here, that of building railways in advance of settlement, and trusting to their sale of lands to recoup the outlay. The railways of the Western States preceded the influx of population which the hon. gentleman emphasises, and acted as potent colonising agents. Kansas, which the hon. member has specially referred to, would be nothing without the great railways which run through it. It was by a combination of railway charters, with land grants, that the Western States had been built up, and have increased so rapidly in population. Northern Missouri and Illinois were largely populated by such means, and Illinois was one of the first which felt the influence of that system. The Illinois Central Railway was greatly instrumental in filling that State with inhabitants, and giving it wealth and power. Now, we have proposed to take a leaf out of the book of that country, which my hon. friend says is so prosperous, and which, under his commendations, we may, perhaps, venture to imitate. Why should not the same system prove successful here that has proved so successful there? What have they got which we have not? What advantages have the North Western States which our own North Western Territories have not? The whole argument of the hon. gentleman opposite is that our country does not present advantages to intending emigrants which are presented by the States upon the borders of Manitoba and southward, including Texas; that owing to the difficulty of transport of supplies, absence of markets, isolation, and many other objections, with which we have been made familiar, emigrants will not be induced to take up our lands, that the climate is inhospitable and last and worst, that the system adopted by the Government is calculated to deter actual settlers, and throw the lands into the hands of speculators. It is claimed by the hon. gentlemen opposite that the experience of the Western States confirms their provisions. I think they are greatly mistaken. We have seen that the great Railway which extends from the Missouri to the Pacific Ocean has been built by private enterprise. Notwithstanding the enormous sums spent upon it, there has never been a day in which the bonds of the California Central Railway have below par, even in the greatest period of depression. We are told now that we must halt after having expended millions on our Pacific Railway, after having fully committed ourselves and the country to the great enterprise, although we believe we are fully in accord with public sentiment in the course we are pursuing, and that the country reposes full confidence in the wisdom and prudence of our leaders in respect to the rate at which the work shall proceed, although we feel assured that the task can be accomplished without permanently, or presently increasing the public burdens. My hon. friend from West Durham presents his budget to the House containing a dismal, but, I fear, not a candid array of statistics, and demands that we shall abandon a scheme which the Government of which he was a member, equally with that which I support, are bound to fulfil. Nothing can be imagined which would be more detrimental to the interests of this country than the acceptance of this proposition. I undertake to say that, if the policy he urges were adopted, our securities in the English market would immediately fall, and continue to decline in price. To adopt that policy would be a confession of judgment, and we should soon see the effects of it. The hon. gentleman is trifling with the best interests of this country when he proposes to go back upon our word in regard to that great undertaking. I have never advocated going on with it.

n such a way as to press unduly upon the tax-payers of this country. But the first act of the hon. gentleman and his friends, when they came into office, was to increase the taxation by a sum declared by the late Finance Minister to be $3,000,000. It is useless for them to say it was because there were other obligations resting on the country than that of building the Pacific Railway which were to be thus provided for. It can be shown that money raised under the Tariff of 1874 was spent in the abortive Pacific Railway schemes of the late Government, contrary to the solemn pledges of Parliament. I was surprised at the disingenuousness of the manner in which the hon. member for West Durham brought before the House the charge—so often repeated and never substantiated—that there was something culpable in the increase of the expenditure of ten millions in 1874, as compared with 1867. I took the pains to examine every item of the increased expenditure; I produced them here, and challenged our friends opposite to show where there had been an increase in any one of them which was not necessary and justifiable. I pointed out that there had been no objection made to them at the time by any member of the then Opposition. I asserted, without contradiction, that nearly a million of dollars of the expenditure, properly chargeable to 1875, was fraudulently thrown upon that of 1874. The hon. gentleman instituted a comparison between the expenditures of 1871 and 1874.

MR. BLAKE: I made no such comparison.

MR. PLUMB: My hon. friend will not interrupt me, because I claim the same privilege that he did. I say fraudulently, in a political sense; and I say that the hon. gentleman can easily be shown that the growth of the country—her recognised obligations and her necessary duties, to say nothing of her best policy—absolutely forbids and makes it impossible for her to go back to the scale of expenditure of 1871, which he urges, as one that should be adopted. And I defy my hon. friend to take up item by item of the increased expenditure, which he so strongly condemns, and show a single instance, up to 1872, to which there was any objection made at all. In the spring of 1873, I acknowledge that the

hon. member for Centre Huron (Sir Richard J. Cartwright) did make a feeble criticism of the Budget of my hon friend then, and now the Finance Minister. He had previously confined his financial criticisms to a few feeble utterances upon the Militia Estimates. In 1872, it will be remembered, the Globe newspaper denounced that eminent financier as a mixer and muddler of figures, and violently opposed his election; but my hon. friend from West Durham accepted him as a colleague holding the portfolio of Finance, in 1873; and is from that time responsible for every act which he sanctioned by remaining in office. Between 1867 and 1874, every item of expenditure had been made necessary by circumstances and obligations connected with the Union of the Provinces and the extension of our territory; and I defy the hon. gentleman to point to a single item of expenditure which has not been accepted and continued by the Administration which succeeded the Government overthrown in 1873. They were entirely untrammelled when they came into power—and I would ask: Why did they not cut off that expenditure; why did they not reduce that expenditure; why did they not fulfil their loud-mouthed promises of economy and retrenchment? We may admit, for argument's sake, that they were bound by the Pacific Railway agreements with British Columbia, although my hon. friend argues that they were not. But why did they go on with that expenditure, as a Government work, when, as is asserted on the other side of the House, our scheme had failed? Why did they make the obligations larger year by year? Why did they at the outset throw away immense sums on useless telegraph lines, long before the railway line, to which they were to be an adjunct, had been located or even surveyed? I defy my hon. friend from West Durham to answer those questions satisfactorily. I would like my hon. friend to explain whether he and his colleagues in one single instance reduced, without injury to the country, one single item of the expenditure which they assert had been so reckless, so extravagant, and so corrupt. When those hon. gentlemen came into power, they found an overflowing Treasury. They found that there had been a large surplus year by year, notwithstanding a heavy remission of taxes, in taking off the duty on tea and coffee, during the Administration that held power from the time of Confederation till 1873. During that time over $10,000,000 out of the surplus Revenues had been spent in public works, properly chargeable to Capital Account; and there was no deficit impending when they took the keys of the public chest. There could not have been a deficit in that year or the next. Upon meeting, in the spring of 1873, the Parliament, which had been elected the previous summer, my hon. friend (Sir Samuel L. Tilley), then as now the Finance Minister, stated that engagements which had been and would be entered into would probably involve an ultimate necessity for increased taxation. He said that the Revenue for the coming year would be sufficient for all purposes and leave a moderate surplus, but that he would probably find it necessary to deal with the Tariff at the next Session, and that when he did so he should keep in view the protection of our home industries, and promote the interests of this country in that direction as far as practicable. He was succeeded by the hon. the ex-Finance Minister (Sir Richard J. Cartwright), who, it is well known, commenced his career by denouncing his predecessors in the most violent terms, by grossly overstating and misstating the extent and character of the obligations under which they had placed the country. He roundly asserted that the Pacific Railway they had undertaken to construct would cost the country more than $150,000,000; that they left above $131,000,000 to provide for; that it would create a greater public debt, in proportion to our resources and population, than the National Debt of England; and that they had left upon him $131,000,000 of obligations which, poor man, he had to provide for—but he added that he was fully equal to the task. He painted everything in the blackest colours, he stated that the country had been ruined by the extravagance of the Ministry that had just then retired. The hon. gentleman then increased, or permitted the increase, of the public expenditure in every possible form. He piled deficit on deficit, he made no provision for those deficits, except a notable suggestion that the yearly contributions to Sinking Fund should not be charged against the yearly expenditure on income account, and when he went out of office, the necessity devolved on my hon. friend of providing for them. I have not heard my hon. friend from West Durham, during the course of his long and exhaustive oration, touch at all upon any plan which he would have proposed to bring forward to relieve the country from the burdens which had been thrown upon it by the gentleman with whom he has been associated for five years. The hon. gentleman is a special pleader. He takes his pleas from his brief with great ingenuity, energy and eloquence, but after all it is nothing but special pleading. Every one who listened to the hon. gentleman during the whole of his oration, felt that he was endeavouring to present from his point of view, arguments, not as a statesman, not as [the rising hope of a great party, to whom the young men of Canada at one time looked for better things, but as a pleader of a special case, for a special purpose, which every man who listened to him felt was nothing more nor less than the word of a trained advocate, and an ingenious hair-splitting counsel. The speech of the hon. gentleman gives us the raison d'être of his again coming in the flesh among men, and claiming to take a part in the affairs which he affected to have done with forever. Less than a year ago he described himself as a ghost revising the earth whose interests he has ceased to interfere with. But the hon. gentleman soon tired of playing the rôle of a wandering spirit cut off from his familiar associations and ambitions, and he comes, like Banquo, with twenty mortal speeches in his mouth, to push his late leader from his stool and usurp his place. The hon. gentleman's temper is too excitable, and his nature is too imperious and arbitrary, and his organisation is too nervous to bear the brunt and stress which must be borne by a party leader, especially the leader of a forlorn hope, disorganised and demoralised like that which now confronts us and is not at unity with itself. The hon. gentleman could not refrain from a malignant attack upon the sister Provinces in his denunciation of the policy by which they have been misled into Confederation. According to him each one has been guilty of a lapse of virtue which is little better than shameless prostitution. Nova Scotia was secretly bribed, and then, half reluctant, forced into consent. A disgraceful bargain seduced Quebec. New Brunswick sold her wares in the market and pocketed the price of her dishonour. Prince Edward Island yielded to the tempter and fell. Even weak Manitoba made some show of resistance, which was but coyness, and became an easy, if not a willing victim; but the crowning shame was the foul bargain with British Columbia, which was made, according to the hon. gentleman, "on the first day of April, 1871," "fitting day for fitting deed." Do we understand the hon. gentleman, that he considers the bargains, if such they are, of a nature that they should now be repudiated, or is he willing to abide by a wrong, provided he can rule the destinies of a Union which he so eloquently denounces. To go back to 1871 would be to cast off British Columbia and Prince Edward Island, and disfranchise Manitoba and the North-West. Is it part of the hon. gentleman's programme, one of the issues of his new departure, to untwine the bonds that unite the Provinces? The studied effort to sow discontent among them would seem like it, but it is impossible to measure the depth or height of the hon. gentleman's arguments. As he said at Aurora, he is always fond of making disturbing speeches, and he is also always "ill at ease," and "linguishes for the purple mists" of chimeras which every one but a vague political dreamer knows to be unsubstantial and unattainable. His gloomy utterances might have found some response when our community were bowed down by the disasters through which we were passing three or four years ago, and the bravest held his breath while the financial tornado and hurricane was at its height, but now he is as one born out of due time. There is a hopeful feeling, a spirit of enterprise abroad, and the instincts of a young, energetic country are entirely antagonistic to his sepulchral doctrines. The hon. gentleman from Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie) has just told us that when he came into power, he found that the negotiations of Sir Hugh Allan and his co-directors, in respect to obtaining means for building the Pacific Railway under the charter that they held, had wholly failed, but that his Government, recognized that they were the trustees of the preceding Government and of the people, in so far as the agreement to construct the road was concerned. They were, however, free from the trammels of any previous legislation in respect to the manner of constructing the road, and they chose to undertake it as Government work. My hon. friend is never tired of repeating, both here and elsewhere, that when he brought down the Pacific Railway Resolutions in 1874, they were passed without an amendment having been proposed, without the change, as he said on one occasion, "of the dotting of an 'i' or the crossing of a 't.'" The hon. gentleman was then backed by an enormous, unreasoning, over-bearing, mechanical majority. When the hon. gentleman brought down his Resolutions, they were rushed through at a late hour. At three o'clock in the morning the debate was choked off ruthlessly, and there are gentlemen now present sitting in this House to-day who know that when the hon. gentleman stated that no amendment was offered to those Resolutions, either his memory was treacherous or he intentionally stated that which was not the case. The hon. gentleman, if he will look at the Votes and Proceedings of that day—I have them here—will find there were three amendments proposed, one by the hon. member for Frontenac and two by the hon. member for Vancouver. They were voted down, of course, by the large majority that sat behind the hon. gentleman, ready at all times to submit to his dictum. The hon. gentleman, in the course of the next Session—early in 1875—laid on the Table of the House two Pacific Railway contracts: One for No. 13, being for grading and bridging the then contemplated line from Fort William Town Plot to Shebandowan westward, forty-five miles, for $406,904; one for section 14, from Selkirk, on Red River, to Cross Lake eastward, seventy-seven miles, for $402,950. In the summer of 1876 he entered into Contract No. 25 for Section 25, from Sunshine Creek, where No. 13 was terminated, to English River, eighty miles, and for ballasting and track-laying from Fort William to English River, 112½ miles, for $1,037,061; and in January, 1877, for No. 15, from Cross Lake to Keewatin, 38½ miles, including ballasting and track-laying of No. 14 and No. 15, for $1,594,486. When asking the House to sanction the contracts for Sections 13 and 14, he, at the same time, asked authority to let Section 15, from Cross Lake to Keewatin, and some discussion arose between the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mackenzie) and the hon. the present Minister of Railways (Sir Charles Tupper) who said :

“The statement made by the Premier (Mr. Mackenzie) afforded one of the most apt and forcible illustrations of the unwisdom of undertaking to let contracts without any such surveys as would put contractors in a position to know anything like the amount of work required to be performed.”

Mr. Mackenzie said in reply :

“It so happened that a most elaborate survey had been made of this section. It would be impossible to have a more careful survey, or closer examination, than had been made in these thirty-seven miles. There had been no such survey on the Intercolonial.”

The hon. gentleman (Mr. Mackenzie) now makes the disingenuous statement that he let the contracts upon the surveys which had been made by his predecessors, but he knows perfectly well that the line was not fixed upon to Kaministiquia in preference to the Nepigon, until after he came to power, therefore, there could have been no close survey previously of the line which he adopted. The Fort William Town Plot had not previously been a make-weight in determining the terminus. Mr. Fleming has stated, in his evidence before a Committee investigating the letting of the contracts, that, when the line from Fort William to Shebandowan was put under contract, they did not know where they were going, and it turned out, in fact, that they did not go to Shebandowan at all, and we have, in evidence taken before that Committee, of which the hon. gentleman was a member, that it was found impossible to get a practicable line to Shebandowan. When the contracts were let, Mr. Fleming, if he was a party to them at all, was acting under the direction of the hon. gentleman ; and I must say that I never heard anything on the floor of this House more unfair and ungenerous in its character than an attack the hon. gentleman made on his Chief Engineer to-day, in the desperate hope of screening himself. It was in evidence that the contracts were let without the most elementary knowledge of the line ; that they were let upon bills of works containing specific quantities, which were merely guess work, not ascertained by actual survey, but made up here in Ottawa ; that no survey whatever had been made, not even a trial line, on Section 14 ; that Section 13 had been let when the engineers did not even know where the line was to run ; that the elaborate and exhaustive survey of Section 15 was a line run by eye and compass only, by Mr. Carre, who says that no mortal man—upon the data he had thus obtained, the only data that the quantities were based upon—could have given an idea of the cost. Mr. Fleming says that Section 13 was not thoroughly surveyed before letting ; that “it was done hurriedly,” and that he “represented to the Minister that the quantities given had no pretensions to accuracy as to the final cost of the line, and were simply a means of comparing tenders.” When the work was let, he says, “we did not know where we were going to.” The whole thing, he tells us, was done hurriedly in the office at headquarters, simply upon the rough profile furnished by the engineer in charge. The men who were taken up by the contractors to work on Section 13 were kept for some time idle, while the engineers were locating the line ; and the contractors were paid by the Government for the lost time. The engineers arrived on Section 14 to make the survey, when the contractors, who had taken the work, went up to commence operations. As to Section 15, we have seen that the survey was simply a trial line, and it turns out that the surveys of Section 25 were in no better state for letting contracts. The results are that the quantities in some cases are enormously increased, and in others suspiciously reduced ; that, in all cases, the cost of the four Sections, which was emphatically stated by the hon. gentleman to be $24,500 a mile, or half that of the Intercolonial, is so enormously increased that it will reach $40,000 a mile ; that that increase took place under the hon. gentleman’s Administration, and must have been, or ought to have been, known to him when he repeated his statement as to the cost ; and it must have been known to him that he had no authority from Mr. Fleming to make such a statement upon the hypothetical amounts of the contracts. These remarks apply with directness to Sections 13, 14, and 25. As to Section 15, the hon. gentleman claimed that elaborate and exhaustive surveys had been made, but the hon. gentleman must have had, or ought to have had, some evidence of those surveys before he made the positive statements in the House in 1875. Where is the record? We have seen that nothing can be more fallacious. Important engagements, committing the country to termini at Fort William and at Selkirk, the former involving a flagrant job, and the latter, at least, a costly blunder that has cost the country, as we are told by Mr. Carre, the Division Engineer, $360,000, from fault of location alone, and contracts hurriedly let on imaginary quantities, were made by the hon. member for Lambton, who was the responsible Minister; and no one who knows the hon. gentleman will believe for a moment that he was not wholly responsible for all those lettings, and that he was not, or ought not to have been fully cognisant of the state of the surveys upon a line that he had himself fixed upon. It is of no avail whatever for that hon. gentleman to attack his Chief Engineer for errors, or worse, for which I believe the country will justly hold him entirely responsible. In Contract 13, taken at $406,494, but part of the work was done, but in that the ratio of cost was considerably exceeded. Contract 14 was for $402,950; the work executed under it amounted to $722,264. Contract 25 was for $1,037,061; the work executed under it amounted to $1,384,639. Contract 15 was for $1,594,085; the estimated cost up to January, 1879, was $2,525,000. In all these cases certain quantities stated on the contracts were enormously increased. In Contract 25, for instance, the earth excavation, at 33c. a yard, was increased from 1,000,000 to 1,950,000 cubic yards. In Contract 15 the earth excavation was increased from 80,000 yards, at 37c. a yard, to 1,657,000 yards, and it is said that there will be a further increase of 1,300,000 yards. There was a radical change in the plan of executing Section 15, dispensing with trestle-work and substituting rock and earth. This change took place in the summer of 1878. An attempt was made to lead the Committee to believe that the change was not made upon Mr. Rowan's return from Ottawa at that time, but the evidence in the Committees of the House and Senate prove otherwise. There had been three sets of tenders prepared and advertised for on Section 15. The final advertisement was made for September, 1876. The plan was to construct the fillings of the hollows with trestle-work—to have no earth-work except the stripping of the rocks. Strange to say, this would involve the use upon the line of a stretch of nearly fifteen miles of timber of a size that the country could not furnish. When the lettings were made, and, in fact, when the tenders were advertised for, it will be found that Mr. Fleming was not in Canada. Mr. Marcus Smith, Acting Chief Engineer, was in the West, and he telegraphed the hon. member for Lambton from Winnipeg, after the bids were opened, if the contract had not been let, to wait till his return. This, however, did not suit the hon. gentleman. The tenders were received—twenty-one of them—that of A. P. Macdonald and Company, for $1,443,175, was the lowest. They were notified to undertake the work, and arrangements were made by them for executing the contract and furnishing the security; but they heard while their arrangements were pending, that two years' extension of time for finishing Contract 14 had been given. Their contract included laying track over that section, and its completion within the time first agreed on was necessary in order to enable Macdonald and Company to get in supplies to Section 15. The contractors for Section 14 were Sifton, Ward and Company, of Petrolia—staunch friends of the hon. gentleman—and I have good reason to believe that the extension was made when it was found that the bid of A. P. Macdonald and Company was the successful one.

MR. MACKENZIE: No such thing.

MR. PLUMB: I do not accept the hon. gentleman's "no such thing," for I rather think that, if the matter came to the test, that I could prove it.

MR. MACKENZIE: Well, prove it.

MR. PLUMB: Messrs. A. P. Macdonald and Company contracted under the impression that the Government would hold Sifton, Ward and Company to the completion of the contract within the specified time. They wrote to the Department stating what they had heard, and said that the prices at which they had tendered were based upon the supposition that Sifton, Ward and Company's contract would be finished in time to enable Macdonald and Company to lay the track over Section 14 by August, 1877. They conclude by asking if such an extension had been granted, and say: "It would be imprudent for us to enter into the contract unless we were put in possession of the advantages which the specifications and forms of tender led us to believe and base our calculations upon." What was the answer to that reasonable request? We must bear in mind that this tender of A. P. Macdonald and Company was that of a perfectly responsible firm, whose contract anybody, acting in his own private interest or having the public interest solely at heart, would have been anxious to secure. The Government gave no satisfactory explanation whatever. Mr. Braun briefly requests them to execute the contract immediately. Messrs. A. P. Macdonald and Company reply:

"MONTREAL, 16th October, 1876.

"SIR,—In reply to your communication of the 14th instant, we beg to state that we cannot enter into contract for Sections 14 and 15 Canadian Pacific Railway, on account of reasons stated in our letter of the 13th instant.

"We therefore most respectfully decline to sign said contract, but beg to add that if the hon. the Minister of Public Works should see fit to change his decision we would most gladly enter into contract.

"We have the honour to be, Sir,

"Your obedient servants,

(Signed) "A. P. MACDONALD,

"ROBERT KANE.

"F. BRAUN, Esq.,

"Secretary Public Works Department,

"Ottawa."

Martin, Charlton and Company were the next lowest bidders; the amount of their tender was $1,540,000, nearly a hundred thousand dollars more, it must be noticed, than that of A. P. Macdonald and Company, whose bid was warned off. The next award was to them. Mr. Charlton seems to have been the negotiator, and he spent several weeks in offering securities of different kinds for the fulfilment. It would not be unfair to say, to obtain delay, that for some purpose or other, seemed to be his chief object. While an active correspondence is going on between him and the Department, another actor suddenly appears, no other than Mr. Joseph Whitehead, whose characteristic letter to the hon. member for Lambton I will give in full:

"OTTAWA, November 28th, 1876.

"DEAR SIR,—It is the general impression outside that you are going to give the contract, Section 15, to Charlton and Company, and he is going to turn the contract over into the hands of some Americans from New York, and according to the feeling, you are going to make a great mistake if you allow such a thing to be done, as it is well known that Charlton says that he never intended to put a spade into the contract, Section 15; he only wants to make some money out of it, the same way he did out of the Grenville Canal, when he sold out to Cooke and Jones, and got six thousand dollars.

"Now, if you will give the contract, Section 15, to Sutton and Thompson's tender, I will guarantee that the grading, track-laying and ballasting shall be done and completed; the engine into Section 15 by the month of August next; and further, the whole of Section 15 shall be finished, completed, by the fall 1878, and for every day over and above, if any, you shall have the best of security that the Government shall be paid five hundred dollars per day for every day over and above the two dates named above, and this is the only way to put some life into the Pacific Railway, as there has been no life in it yet.

"Now, I hope you will pardon me for taking the liberty of writing you this note, as I have no other object in view than to let you know the feeling outside, as you must admit that Sutton and Thompson's tender is not an extravagant one, only I know what I have said in this note can be done.

"I remain,

"Your obedient servant,

"JOSEPH WHITEHEAD.

"Hon. ALEXANDER MACKENZIE."

The bidders next on the list were the firm recommended by Mr. Whitehead; Sutton and Thomson, of Bradford, Ontario, whose bid was $1,594,085; or, as stated by Mr. Mackenzie, in a memorandum which I shall give, $1,594,155, a trifle of $150,980 over that of A. P. Macdonald and Company. Not long after Mr. Whitehead's letter was written, the unready Mr. Charlton seems to have become discouraged. He writes as follows:—

"I have met with so many unfortunate difficulties in procuring security for so large a sum, so as to satisfy the demands of the Government, and have been so worried and disheartened by the difficulties of the position in which I found myself, and consequent failing health, that I am reluctantly obliged to say that I cannot now undertake so serious an enterprise, more especially as all the most experienced men whose advice and assistance I have asked, have convinced me and my friends that the work cannot satisfactorily be performed for the price tendered for.

"I beg, therefore, to ask that the hon. the Minister of Public Works will allow me to withdraw my tender, and will please to return to Mr. Beard, of Brooklyn, who proposed to join in the work, his deposit; and also return to me the papers which I deposited as given to make up the balance of the security required.

And in a final agony of despair, he soon afterwards sends the following telegram:—

"MONTREAL TELEGRAPH COMPANY,
27th December, 1876.

"(By Telegraph from Montreal.)

"F. BRAUN,

"Public Works Department—

"Dissension from within, added to extraordinary pressure from without, has left no alternative but withdrawal.

(Signed) E. J. CHARLTON."

Mr. Martin seems not to have been then aware of Mr. Charlton's dilemma and its unhappy consequences, but on learning that there had been a failure to furnish the security, on the part of Mr. Charlton, he writes as follows, two days after the date of the mournful but suggestive telegram:—

"OTTAWA, 29th December, 1876.

"SIR,—Re-Section 13, Canada Pacific Railway. I have just learned with much surprise, through your Department, that E. J. Charlton has withdrawn from our joint tender to build said Section 15, Canada Pacific Railway. His withdrawal was without my knowledge or consent.

"I am prepared to deposit the security required by the Government, and am prepared to perform the work mentioned in or contemplated by said tender.

"And I now offer to comply with the conditions and requirements of the Government, as specified in the advertisement calling for tenders for said work, and, in our said tender I protest against any and all acts depriving me of said contract.

"Trusting that justice will be done me in the premises,

I have the honour to be, Sir,

"Most respectfully yours,

(Signed) "PATRICK MARTIN,

"To the Honourable Minister of "Public Works of Canada, Ottawa.

No reply seems to have been made to Mr. Martin's protest. And it may be noticed here that the ingenious Mr. Charlton seems to have had a wide connection, for on the 28th of December Messrs. Baird and Company of New York, wrote to the Department complaining that he had used them shamefully; that they had gone to Montreal to meet him, and had stayed there three days, but had been unable to find him. They asked to be allowed to deposit cash security, and take the contract under Charlton's tender. The next lowest bidders were Messrs. Sutton and Thompson, the acceptance of whose tender we have seen was strongly recommended by Mr. Whitehead; a memorandum signed by Mr. Mackenzie, in the following words, recommends that their tender be accepted:—

(Memorandum).

The undersigned reports that tenders having been invited for construction of Section No. 15, Canadian Pacific Railway, twenty-one have been received at schedule rates, which, when extended, are found to vary between $1,443,175 and $2,950,000.

"That the firms whose tenders are first and second lowest respectively Messrs. McDonald and Kane and Messrs. Martin and Charlton are, unable to furnish the necessary security.

"That the third lowest tender is from Messrs. Sutton and Thompson, of Brantford, amounting to $1,594,155 (one million five hundred and ninety-four thousand one hundred and fifty-five dollars).

"That this firm are prepared to make the necessary five per cent. cash deposit, and proposes to associate with themselves Mr. Joseph Whitehead, contractor, of Clinton, Ontario.

"The undersigned, therefore, recommends that the tender of Messrs. Sutton and Thompson be accepted, and that they be allowed to associate Mr. Whitehead with themselves accordingly.

"Respectfully submitted,

(Signed) "A. MACKENZIE.

"Minister Public Works."

Thus it will be seen that on the day after Martin offered to put up the security, and three days after Charlton withdrew in such moving terms, the contract was awarded to Messrs. Sutton and Thompson, and, strange to say, the disinterested Mr. Whitehead consented to put a little more life into the Pacific Railway by becoming, first a partner nominally of that firm, and lastly by taking the whole work himself. It will be observed that the memorandum of Mr. Mackenzie, which I read a few moments ago, as a reason for giving the contract to Sutton and Thompson, states that A. P. Macdonald and Company, and Martin and Charlton, have been unable to furnish the necessary security. As to P. A. Macdonald and Company, we have seen that there was no lack of ability, but that they were apparently forced off in another way. There was no good ground whatever for this assertion as respected Martin and Charlton, for Mr. Martin, in his letter just quoted, distinctly proposed to furnish ample security, and protested against the contract being taken away from him. Every contractor has a right to make as good a bargain as he can, of course, and I do not intend in anything I have said or shall say, to make any charge against Mr. Whitehead, or to blame him in any way. In the tender of Messrs. Sutton and Thompson, the timber was taken at prices so low, and the quantity required was so enormous, that it would have been absolutely impossible to deliver it. It could not be had in the country, nor was it to be found nearer than the head waters of the Mississippi, and I say that the hon. the Minister of Public Works, when he adopted a radical change in the plan of construction of the section, which he seems to have decided upon just before the tenders were advertised for, and in the absence of his Chief Engineers, should have ascertained that the timber could be found in the neighbourhood of the work, and I want the House and the country to understand that he was responsible for the letting, for the principle adopted in the plan of construction, and he does not pretend that it was decided upon when Mr. Fleming was in Canada, or that the letting was under his advice. Mr. Whitehead had not long been at work on his contract when Mr. Rowan, the resident engineer, recommended that the work should be radically changed by substituting rock and earth embankment for trestle work. His letter recommending the change stated that the trestle work was perishable and liable to take fire. I suppose most men could have known, without a professional opinion, that wood was a substance that would decay in process of time and might perhaps take fire if exposed to ignition; but Mr. Rowan was careful not to state that the trestle-work timber could not be obtained in the country. Anyone could see the trestle-work plan was a dangerous and imprudent one. But I believe it suited some purpose of the hon. gentleman to have the letting made at a comparatively low figure, and he seems to have acquiesced with commendable alacrity in the necessity of awarding the contract to bidders who were $140,000 higher than the lowest, and he did not at all object to Mr. Whitehead. It would not be far out of the record to say that when he let the contract on the timber plan he had no real expectation to have it fulfilled upon that plan. The timber was taken at ruinously low prices, the earth and rock at extravagantly high prices, and consequently, when the timber was released, and earth and rock were substituted, the charge was enormously in favour of the contractor. The quantity of loose rock at $1.75 a yard was exactly doubled. The solid rock at $2.75 was increased from 300,000 to 525,646 yards. We have seen that the modest little quantity of 80,000 yards of earth at 37 cents a yard—not so modest a little price—was increased to 1,657,000 yards, and we hear that 1,300,000 yards more is to be done. Mr. Fleming approved of the proposed change, and wrote a letter recommending it to the late First Minister. The latter, in his evidence before the Committee, says that he himself approved of it, but he did not see fit to recommend it to the Council; but Mr. Rowan, the engineer, directing the work, left Ottawa under the full understanding—the full conviction, as he states in his own evidence—that that change was to be made. Mr. Fleming left for England the next day, after he had written an approval of Mr. Rowan's proposed change, and believed that his recommendation was approved of. Mr. Mackenzie states that he had constant communication with Mr. Marcus Smith, after Mr. Fleming's recommendation was made, prior to the departure of Mr. Smith for the North-West, and discussed railway matters exhaustively with him. Strange to say, he never thought it worth while to speak of the proposed change of Section 15, one of the most important matters connected with the whole subject. When Mr. Smith reached Winnipeg he found that the work was proceeding on the changed plan, for which he disclaims, and, I think, justly disclaims responsibility. Mr. Rowan's evidence was not quite satisfactory, but I will not refer further to that. Mr. Fleming certainly

I must say in all fairness, cannot be held culpable for the laches of his chief, the late Minister of Public Works. Mr. Fleming's leaning towards work of a character, perhaps too expensive for the road-bed required for the North-West, is well known. It is scarcely possible that he would have risked his reputation in recommending so flimsy, and, in fact, so impossible a plan as that on which Section 15 was let, and no one can doubt for a moment, not only that the change he recommended was a proper one, if it was not an imperatively necessary one, but that the present Government had no alternative but to accept it. The mischief was in the inception. The late First Minister cannot throw the responsibility of that upon any one else, and he ought not to attempt on the floor of this House to place it upon one who, from his peculiar position, is not able to reply or to defend himself. The fact is that no one seems to have been responsible. It seems intended that there should be some convenient method by which the responsibility should be evaded, and it is cowardly and shameful to say that the responsibility rests on Mr. Fleming. The hon. gentleman knows that Mr. Rowan's reports upon the progress of the work after the change, were not made as promptly and regularly as they ought to have been. The contract was taken in such a way as to increase the estimated expenditure more than one million dollars, and the end is not yet. It was the same with the Georgian Bay Branch. As to the reckless rushing into a contract in utter ignorance of the nature of the country to be traversed, we have heard the hon. gentleman on the floor of this House to-night accuse the Government of having neglected to build the Georgian Bay Branch, and of having been unfaithful to Quebec. The extraordinary contract with the late Mr. Foster has been condemned from time to time, and in regard to it we have received no satisfactory explanation. That contract, too, was made for work upon a line which no engineer had ever seen. Although the hon. member for Lambton has attempted to shirk all responsibility in respect to these contracts, I shall hold him responsible for them, and the country will also hold him responsible for them. I repeat that the hon. gentleman ought to have known, if he did not know, that there were no surveys worthy of the name when those contracts were let. The hon. gentleman stoutly asserts in the face of these facts that he was perfectly justified in going before the country and saying that he was building the line embraced in the four contracts for one-half the cost of the Intercolonial Railway. I knew the hon. gentleman was inaccurate in his estimates when he made them. It is too late for the hon. gentleman to attempt to throw the responsibility on others; it rests with him. The responsibility also rests on him of the hybrid system of navigation, the mixture of mud and water which he attempted to "utilise," to use his favourite word, between Port Savanne and Keewatin. If the hon. gentleman had succeeded in carrying out his scheme, he would have been able to transport over his portage, according to first tender, exactly five car-loads of grain per day, or 1,665 bushels, and if he had done so steadily from the opening until the close of navigation, he would have carried 280,000 bushels, or about six vessel loads. If he had found for it employment from the end of the harvest till the close of navigation, about eighty thousand bushels would have been all that could have been carried, or a cargo and a-half would have been all the hon. gentleman would have been able to transport to market by his line. At one end of the line there were 112 miles of railway that were to cost, according to the latest estimate, about $40,000 per mile, that is $4,400,000; at the other end a line of the same length at the same figures, $4,400,000 more—making a total of $8,800,000. He was to spend on Fort Frances Locks, and the improvement of navigation by railway, river and tramway, say $500,000 more, and all this expenditure would be incurred for the purpose of a line having, at the utmost, during the whole of its navigable season, a carrying capacity of 280,000 bushels. The mere interest on capital, therefore, would have been $2 per bushel for every bushel that could possibly be carried over the line. The hon. gentleman rose in his place to-day and advocated that policy. If the hon. gentleman had thrown into the sea every dollar that was expended in the Fort Frances Locks he could not more effectually have wasted it. There is not one point of utility in connection with that undertaking. The hon. gentleman quoted extensively from reports in relation to the North-West. I have no doubt he was at great pains to take out of those reports anything unfavourable to that country that he could find. I believe the hon. gentleman carefully passed over many a page that would have refuted his own argument. He seemed impelled by a mocking, imperious and cruel fate to follow in the wake of the hon. gentleman who preceded him (Mr. Blake), and to be forced to assist him in condemning the Great West, and the schemes which he has advocated everywhere himself, and which never till now failed to receive his strong support. The Opposition seem to have proceeded upon a settled plan in their tactics this Session, inspired, no doubt, by the new aspirant to the leadership. First, the whole chorus rang changes on the utter failure of the National Policy, and the utter and hopeless ruin of the country, with no prospect of its revival. Next the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), brought forward his Resolution condemning the Government land policy in the North-West, and it was his patriotic endeavour to show there was no possibility of utilising them, and that the country to the south had every possible advantage over ours, so that we could not compete with it in the advantages offered to settlers; but an overwhelming majority of the House negatived his proposals. He must have been surprised to find he was utterly at variance, in his ideas and policy, with the great organ of his party in Toronto. The next act in the dismal drama was the speech of the hon. member for West Durham—the logical sequence of all that had preceded. We have now had the strongest and darkest presentation of their unpatriotic course that could have been made by hon. gentlemen opposite. We may congratulate ourselves we have heard the worst, and it is worse than anything that could possibly be urged by hon. gentlemen who wish well to the country. Even had they had some warrant for their contention, it was not patriotic to present the dark side of the shield; but more unwarranted, misleading statements never were made. I regret that the Opposition have been led into a course which, I think, they will regret before a year has passed. The hon. member for Lambton, who is now apparently in most points at one with the hon. member for West Durham, ventured, however, to differ with him in respect to the entire prosperity of the United States. He tells us that its protective policy has ruined its shipping trade. The following extract from an authority that he will not venture to gainsay, refutes that assertion:—

“We have at our doors all the illustrations and experiences of Protection and its benefits required for our guidance. The United States have adopted a protective policy, under which their manufactures have been fostered and promoted, until, in 1870, their products reached the sum of $4,253,000,000, giving employment to 2,000,000 operatives, and disbursing over $775,000,000 in wages.

“It has been charged that protection has prevented the extension of foreign commerce in that country. That may be true; but it is estimated that the domestic commerce of the United States, last year, reached the enormous proportions of 200,000,000 tons, valued at $10,000,000,000. What is the foreign commerce of that country compared with the vast domestic trade that goes on increasing, without the fluctuations or risks of foreign trade? Look at the progress of the cotton trade in that country. Previous to the import duties on foreign cottons, in 1824, British manufactures crushed out all efforts to establish factories in the Republic, but the imposition of 25 per cent. duty on foreign cottons had the effect, in a few years, not only of building manufactories, but led to the production of an article better in quality, and lower in price, than the Americans received from the British before their own industries were established.

“In 1860, the United States were exporters of nearly 10 per cent. of the whole cottons manufactured.

“When a protective duty was imposed, iron manufactories were established, and, in a short time, the price of iron was brought down several dollars a ton, and it is now sold cheaper than British iron was ever offered for in that market.

That is the statement of a gentleman who has had a large commercial experience, and whose utterances are entitled to great consideration when dealing with statistics only—I mean the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton). That was a portion of his speech, delivered in this House four years ago, as I find it in the official record. Then, Sir, he ably and judiciously advocated Protection, upon which he spoke with much force and sincerity. The right hon. the Premier has been greatly strengthened by the organ of the Liberal party in Toronto, in his late estimates of the value of our North-Western lands. That paper has given no uncertain sound with regard to the lands which we hope to sell to defray the cost of constructing the Railway, and with regard to the great promise and value of the country which it will develop. I believe that no statement of the hon. the First Minister exaggerated the value of our great domain, portions of which will be purchased by capitalists for profitable investment and cultivation, as well as by our own people and settlers generally seeking comfortable homes. I believe the menacing labour question in the United Kingdom will compel its statesmen to face it, and consider the best method of disposing of the enormous population depending on manufactures for support, that is increasing in a far greater ratio than the food supply can be increased. In that direction we offer to England a priceless boon, which no other country can offer, a region and soil best adapted to the development of the Anglo-Saxon race—a country possessing the laws, traditions and loyalty of that race, and practically as near to England as Land's End was to Glasgow forty years ago. We have a new world to place at the disposal of the over-crowded Mother Country, and British statesmen will soon be forced to turn their attention to some system of co-operation with this Dominion for the development of the soil of that new world. The hon. member for West Durham speaks of the preference of the Teutonic and Irish races for the United States, doubtless with some truth, but we have large and flourishing settlements of Irishmen, Scotchmen and Englishmen, and of races from the North of Europe, too, with every prospect of their extensive increase. Besides, the sentiment of loyalty, overlooked or excluded by hon. gentlemen opposite, will attract to our territory, through preference and sympathy, multitudes of the British people. In respect to our financial policy, so virulently attacked by the hon. member for West Durham, I do not believe the present Government desire to emulate the reckless expenditure of their predecessors, or continue building costly works while incurring growing deficits. I believe they will take a different course, so different that the country will appreciate at its fullest value the contrasted policy of the late and present Administrations in this respect. I believe that this discussion was artfully contrived to alarm the timid and deceive the unwary and ignorant; but I venture to predict it will fail in its object, and that the hon. gentlemen, compelled from their position to sustain this Resolution, will find they meet with no sympathy elsewhere, and that they have plunged still deeper into that abyss from which I believe there is no political resurrection.

MR. CHARLTON: I have listened for some time to the remarks of the hon. member for Niagara (Mr. Plumb), who has travelled over a good deal of ground. He certainly came dangerously near the question, in one or two instances, but I think he did not touch it. I must do him the justice to say that he evidently struggled to reach the question, and he reminded me in his struggles of a stanza of John Hay, describing a steamboat stranded on a sandbar on the Missouri river, with her spur spars set upon the bottom, and her crew working at the pulleys in an attempt to heave her over:

“She hove and set, and hove and set,
And high her rudder flung,
And every time she hove and set
A wusser leak she sprung.”

The hon. gentleman had as poor success in his attempts to reach the question as the boat had—according to the description of John Hay—in getting off the sandbar. As usual, the hon. gentleman referred to the Fort Frances Locks, and read a quotation from the speech made by the hon. member for North Norfolk. What he would do without these two subjects for a speech I can scarcely imagine. I do not know that it is necessary to refer to that oft-quoted speech of mine. I may remind my hon. friends, however, on the opposite side, of certain circumstances which existed at the time that speech was made. It will be remembered that the hon. member for Centre Huron (Sir Richard J. Cartwright), then Finance Minister, proposed to increase the Tariff by 2½ per cent., and that the hon. the present Minister of Railways denounced that proposed increase as the thin end of the wedge of the hateful policy of Protection, and if I made a qualified defence of Protection, it was that degree of Protection which existed under the 17½ per cent. Tariff. The ground I took in that speech was distinctly and explicitly to defend a 17½ per cent. Tariff as affording a sufficient degree of Protection, and I have never taken any position inconsistent with that speech since. I am ready, to-day, to defend the policy that was inaugurated then to defend a Tariff giving 17½ per cent. duties, and thereby affording that incidental degree of Protection which I believed then, and believe still, is all that this country requires. We are considering, to-night, a question of very grave importance. We are considering the question of the rapidity with which we should build the Canadian Pacific Railway, in the light of the experience of many years. We know better now, than at any previous period in our history, what are the difficulties we are likely to encounter in the prosecution of this great enterprise. We know better than at any previous period what are the public capabilities of this country as to bearing new burdens. We know now, better than at any previous period, that this is a question of great importance indeed, and the decision arrived at by this House upon this question is one fraught with serious consequences to this country, if the decision is, as I believe it will be, a vote in support of the policy of the Government. The step that I believe we are about to take is an irrevocable one, and it will bear disastrous fruits I predict here to-night. This question being one of so much importance should be approached in a dispassionate spirit. We should endeavour to examine it impartially, and free from partisan bias. But that is the very last thing, probably, that our friends on the other side will do. I do not suppose the arguments brought forward here will influence a single vote. I do not suppose, so far as the result of this question is concerned, that the magnificent speech made by the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), the speech made by the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie), or any other argument that may be advanced, will have the slightest effect whatever. But, nevertheless, it is the duty of this Oppotion to lay all the facts bearing upon this question before the country, to protest against what they believe will be a step which will prove disastrous to this country; and in the discharge of that duty we rise here to protest against this policy. We rise here, not so much to address the gentlemen who sit on the Ministerial Benches, as to address this country, and to arraign this Government before the people of this country, for this policy, which we believe is conceived in a spirit that will prove disastrous to the country. Every speaker who rises in the opposite ranks rings changes upon a charge of a want of patriotism. Want of patriotism? Want of loyalty? In what respect are we to be charged with want of patriotism, because we warn the Government that the policy they are adopting will, as we believe, produce disastrous consequences? Why, Sir, no more absurd than this would be a charge brought against the watchman upon the deck of a ship, bearing down under full sail, at midnight, upon a rock-bound coast, who, for giving the warning cry of "Breakers ahead," should be upbraided by the crew and passengers for interfering with the pleasure and harmony of the voyage. Now it is evident from the speeches of the hon. gentlemen who support the policy of the Government, that there is no unanimity upon that side of the House as to the proper route of this Railway. The hon. member for Victoria (Mr. DeCosmos) told us this afternoon that the best route was by the Pine River Pass, and he predicted that that would ultimately be the line. Now, one of the essential conditions that we should look at before locating this line of Railway, is an intimate knowledge of the country through which it would pass, such a knowledge as we do not in full measure possess. The very fact that that difference of opinion exists, which was developed by the hon. member for Vancouver, is, in my opinion, the best argument that has been produced on the floor of this House against the propriety of sinking millions of dollars in the canons of the Fraser River. I believe an expenditure of money there upon that Railway, or in any portion of British Columbia, is premature, until the road has reached the Mountains. Under such circumstances it is evident that caution in the prosecution of this work, caution in incurring the liabilities that it is proposed to incur is necessary—

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: Did not the hon. gentleman refuse to vote, last winter, that the location was premature.

MR. CHARLTON: It was not in reference to the contract for expending money in the Valley of the Fraser River, it was in reference to the adoption of a route, without any reference to letting the contracts or the expenditure of money. I am not prepared to say, to-night, that after the road has reached the Rocky Mountains, if the proper time had come for the prosecution of that work in British Columbia, that upon the evidence we now possess, I should prefer the route to Burrard Inlet.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: The case stood in this way: the late Government stood pledged; they had completed the surveys, and located the road and commenced construction, and we asked the hon. gentlemen to say if it was premature to commence construction and they refused to vote that it was premature.

MR. MACKENZIE: That is not the way to put it. It was premature to adopt that line. The hon. gentleman said the country had not been sufficiently examined to decide upon the line. The House was asked to declare upon that point, and my hon. friend joined in the refusal.

MR. CHARLTON: I was about to say that, in 1876, I made a speech in this House, taking strong grounds against the expenditure of money in British Columbia, before the Railway was built to the border of that Province from the east. These are the views I have always held. My views throughout upon this matter, as publicly expressed, have been the same. If, as I said a few moments ago, this road was built to the Rocky Mountains, if we had arrived at that point where it was to be determined which route to take, then I should be in favour, on the information we now have, of the Burrard Inlet route. But I hold now, that to expend money in British Columbia until we reach that Province from the east, is an act of folly. What object is to be gained by the rapid construction of that road. What objects are to be gained in the building of that road in British Columbia, previous to reaching that country, and in spending millions there and opening a portion of the road in British Columbia, merely that you may have it ready when you reach the Rocky Mountains. Are the advantages so great to be obtained by building that road a few years earlier than otherwise would be the case? Are we to develop an overland trade with China and Japan, that will compensate for the premature outlay? The hon. member for Victoria, this afternoon, lamented that San Francisco was getting the start of Victoria in this respect: that they were establishing lines of communication with China, Japan, and Australia, and that before we completed this road the prize would have slipped from our grasp. Are we ready, to-day, if we had the road built to Victoria, to subsidise steamship lines? Are we ready to subsidise lines with China and Japan, and Australia? Are our burdens not already great enough without undertaking any enterprise of this kind? One of the advantages we have to gain by the construction of this road is a portion of that inconsiderable Asiatic trade that the American Pacific road now gets, and the trade with British Columbia; but both of these trades will be insufficient to pay the running expenses of that road. The cost of securing these two objects will be vastly disproportionate to the benefits we would derive from them. The hon. the Minister of Railways, the other day, in his speech on this subject, referred to the Pacific Railway. He told us that the Union Pacific Railway—I suppose he meant the Union and Central Pacific Railway—passed through 1,000 miles of desert. The Union Pacific is but 1,024 miles long, and passes through the fertile valley of the Platte River, but the Canada Pacific Railway was to pass the same distance through a garden, although this garden has not yet been brought under cultivation. I fear that it will prove but little more productive than the country that the Union and Central Pacific Railways pass through. He went on to tell us that the completion of the Canadian Pacific Railway was to be accomplished in the teeth of a factious opposition, as had been the case with the American Pacific Railway. Now, I was not aware that any factious opposition had ever been offered to the completion of the road. I was not aware that the Americans were not one and all of them unanimous, and all the time anxious that the road should be constructed ; but they approached the undertaking of the great work of building that road with discretion, and I wish to draw the attention of this House to the difference between these two countries at the time these railway projects were started. In the first place, the American scheme was not even talked of, was not even thought of until the United States had a population of 20,000,000. In the next place, the American scheme, after being discussed, and after ample time had been expended in making elaborate surveys, after the utmost precaution was taken to secure the best route, the American road was not commenced until the United States had a population of 32,000,000. At that time the population of the Pacific slope—of Oregon and California—was 500,000 souls. At the time that road was commenced, the city of San Francisco had a population of 75,000 inhabitants. What is the comparison to be instituted between the two countries? The American Pacific slope had a population of 500,000 inhabitants, while British Columbia has a white population of, perhaps, 12,000. On the line of that road, in Utah and Colorado, were 50,000 inhabitants. If we compared California and Oregon with British Columbia, what do we find? The one country abounding in corn and wine, with vast fertile belts and plains extending for seven hundred miles. The State of California is one of the finest States in the American Union, possessing capacity for sustaining a population of four or five million inhabitants. Contrast this country with British Columbia, with less than 2,000,000 acres of arable land, and with Vancouver Island, having less than 400,000 acres of arable land, and it will be seen that we have nothing to induce us to commence or to carry forward to completion an overland railway compared with what the Americans had. I shall treat this question entirely apart from any consideration of treaty obligations. I wish to treat it upon this basis: what would be the common sense and prudent course to take in reference to this Railway, in the interest of the Dominion of Canada. We have a population flocking into a portion of the North-West, into Manitoba and the Saskatchewan Valley. That population requires an outlet. The Pacific Railway is to pass through that valley. Now, the common sense course would be to build that Railway from the chain of great lakes to the Red River. That is being done ; that is perfectly proper. Having reached that point, the course would be to push that road westward, as the wants of the country required. The Government would be perfectly justified in doing that. Beyond that the Government are not warranted, in the interests of the public, in proceeding with the work. What is meant by exceeding the limited expenditure? I have indicated it means simply this: an unproductive investment, the putting of money into a railway that will, for the present, give no return. What is the character of our present railway investment? We have borrowed millions and millions of dollars, and have expended these millions in public works which are all unremunerative. They had a crisis in the United States some few years ago, and the cause of that crisis was unproductive railway investment. They had built thousands of miles of railway in advance of the wants of the country. Very few American lines were paying dividends on their costs. This system was carried on until the country succumbed beneath it. Jay Cooke and Company's failure precipitated the crisis. The cause of that crisis was the unproductive nature of those enterprises. An expenditure of thirty or forty millions of money among the rocks of British Columbia will make no return for years to come, and that section ought not to be built until it can be reached from the east. Many speculations have been entered into in regard to the arable land in the North-West. It was stated by the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Macdougall), eleven years ago, that the North-West contained 300,000 square miles of arable land, but the more accurate our knowledge of that country becomes, the smaller are our expectations. From the estimates, as to the extent of the arable land in that country, given by the hon. member for Lambton, it would appear that the total amount of arable land south of the north line of the Railway Belt really does not exceed seventy millions of acres. I have no doubt this is a very liberal estimate. In addition to that, in the region north of that line, known as the Peace River country, we may have some arable lands. The arable lands of this region would all be contained in a section of country bounded on the south by the north line of the Railway Belt, on the east by a line projected north from the east end of Lesser Slave Lake, on the north by the line of 57° latitude, and on the west by the Rocky Mountains. This region would contain, by a rough estimate, 30,000,000 acres of land. The arable land contained in this region, and all the arable land to the north of it, would not make a total of more than 20,000,000 acres, so that we may safely conclude that the entire arable land of the entire Canadian North-West does not exceed 90,000,000 acres. It is barely possible that it may reach 95,000,000 acres. I believe this is a liberal estimate, and that, it will be found, when the country is better known, or that there will not be more than this amount. What was formerly known as the American North-West which included the States of Michigan, Indiana, Illinois, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Iowa, Kansas, and Nebraska, and the four Territories of Dakota, Wyoming, Montana and Colorado—in these eight States and four Territories are 634,000,000 acres of land, and it is supposed that of that amount 400,000,000 acres are arable land. The area of arable land in that region is, at least, four times greater than that which exists in our North-West. The hon. the Minister of Railways declared that our North-West was the granary of the world. The hon. gentleman has a fertile and poetic imagination. If that North-West ever is to be the granary of the world it is something which we will see developed in the future. We ought to have been in a better position to judge of the capability and character of that country. In 1873 a motion was made in this House for a thorough geographical and geological exploration of the North-West. That motion was never acted upon with energy. It would have been better if it had been. Now, I suppose I will be accused of being unpatriotic, because I do not indulge in the same flights of fancy, as to the prospective value of that country that have been indulged in by the hon. the Minister of Railways. I ask is it unpatriotic to ascertain the value and to justly estimate the disadvantages and drawbacks under which our Dominion suffers. Is it not proper that we should estimate truly, the conditions and value of this country. Is there not a special necessity for our doing so since the hon. the Minister of Railways has informed us that on the value of these lands hinges the entire Railway policy of the Government. The hon. gentleman was pleased to refer to some predictions that I made, regarding this country, in a former debate. Well, Sir, I predicted that the country had a great future before it, and that a great number of people would settle in it; but, prophetic periods are often long periods, and I did not predict that the destiny I foretold for that country would be realised in ten years or twenty years, or in any given length of time. The hon. gentleman goes on to say that the North-West would make the most inviting field for emigrants in the world. While we are not sure as to the extent of arable land, can we be sure as to the character of the climate? How will it prove to be about summer frosts and winter blizzards in the north part of the Railway Belt? With regard to the climatic character of the country, I propose to read a few brief extracts. I will first refer to some remarks of Mr. Sandford Fleming, who says, with reference to the Peace River region:

“The explorers unite in the opinion that the fertile area is of great extent, and the whole region is certainly well adapted for stock-raising. But the explorations do not establish beyond question its adaptability for the systematic growth of the higher cereals. Cultivation has been attempted on a limited scale at the Hudson Bay Forts in sheltered spots in the valley of the Peace River, but no portion of the plateau has been placed under cultivation with the exception of very limited areas in the vicinity of Lesser Slave Lake and of Sturgeon Lake.”

Dr. G. M. Dawson, of the Geological Survey, says, as quoted by Mr. Fleming:

“Last year, summer frosts occurred at different times; they were severe in the latter part of August.”

At page 10, in his recent report, Mr. Fleming says:

“The wheat patches around the Hudson Bay Forts, at the bottom of the valley, at Hudson's Hope and Dunvegan, were injured by the frost. On the plateau there was frost on three occasions, in August; on the 21st, at points a hundred miles apart, 12° and 14° of frost were recorded."

What does fourteen degrees of frost mean in August? It means death to all vegetation that can be injured by frost. At page 13 of this Report, Mr. Fleming says:

"The first step is to obtain general information respecting the principle features of the country, the character of the soil, the climate and its minerals. I pointed out last year, that although the prairie region had been seen by many travellers, and that the country east of the Rocky Mountains had been traversed on many trails, and a great deal of information collected, still the Territory is of such vast extent that comparatively little of it was known."

At page 54 I find the following extract from H. J. Cambie's Report:—

"Hudson's Hope, July 27-29. The soil in the garden is a good sandy loam, and onions were very fine; all other crops had been injured by a severe frost. About May 15th, beans were killed, so were the potatoe vines, but they had started afresh. A little patch of wheat had been frozen, but had grown up again and a few stalks were forming ears. * * * Returning then September 14—16 we found the potatoes had produced a very poor crop, and the wheat had again been frozen while the grain was in the milk stage, rendering it useless."

This is not very encouraging. Mr. H. A. G. McLeod, writing regarding the summer frosts, says:

"During our stay in the country (August), we experienced frost occasionally. On the 6th ice formed in the water bucket at night, and on the 21st there were 14° of frost four miles west of Mud River and about twenty miles south of Peace River."

Mr. Speaker, all these things show that we want to know more about this country before we can say it is fit for settlement. There is severe cold in the winter, and summer frosts to an extent that will certainly render it less attractive than we have been led to expect by the exaggerated accounts given us; and it is important when embarking in an enterprise of such magnitude that the Government should not be deluded as to the value of these lands. The North-West of our Dominion is not the only country for settlers. We have a rival in the South which still possesses a vast unoccupied extent of territory. They have 700,000,000 acres of land unsurveyed and in addition to this they have a great many million acres surveyed and ready for settlement; and these lands are in a milder climate than our own. They have a variety of climate, from the tropical to one very little milder than our own. It is well known, from careful observation, that emigration substantially follows the line of latitude. Emigrants from Pennsylvania go to the Western States in the same latitude. The bulk of emigrants in Minnesota go there from the New England States. This tendency is very marked, and this being the tendency of emigration, you cannot expect to draw American emigration so far north as to the Canadian North-West. Moreover, American appliances for securing emigration are very superior. Their pamphlets and literature of a descriptive character, relating to their lands for settlement, are sent broadcast over the world. Almost every State has its Bureau of Emigration. The most powerful of all influences for securing the flow of European emigration into the United States, is the fact that up to July 1st, 1879, 10,150,000 foreigners have settled in that country, and the influence of this great element in attracting friends in the same direction is resistless. These foreigners are constantly corresponding with their friends in the Old World, and the latter naturally wish to go where their friends have settled. This fact would inevitably draw the great bulk of foreign emigration to the United States, if there was no other reason to be mentioned. There are also in round numbers 550,000 Canadians living, to-day, in the United States, and naturally a large proportion of the emigration from the older Provinces will drift to that country. I think, in view of the circumstances, that we must not expect that we will draw any considerable emigration from the American Union to our North-West. Apart from any climatic reason there is an aversion amongst American and naturalised foreigners to leave the United States Territory. We may expect, therefore, to draw almost entirely from our own population in order to people the North-West, as the foreign element will be exceedingly small, in fact, the only foreign element which will naturally go to that country will be the Scandinavian element; the Teutonic and Celtic races will not emigrate there to any considerable extent. The hon. member for Cumberland (Sir Charles Tupper) tells us with poetical fervour that the eye of the civilised world is concentrated on our North-West. I venture to say that nine-tenths of this civilised world have never heard of our North-West. I venture to say that nine-tenths of the people of the United States, even, do not know anything about that country. I hold in my hand a statement showing the population, at various periods, of what was formerly known as the American North-West—a region which formerly bore very much the same relation to the older States that our own North-West now does to the older Provinces. This region now comprises the eight States and four Territories which I referred to at an earlier stage of my remarks. The population of this region, in 1800, was 5,641; at that time the population of the United States was 5,308,000. In 1810 the population of the American North-West had risen to 41,564; in 1820 it was 211,000; and in 1830, 532,000. The population of the United States was 7,239,000 in 1810; 9,633,000 in 1820; and 12,866,000 in 1830. The foreign element of the population of the North-West was only estimated at 4 per cent. of the whole in 1810; 5 per cent. in 1820, and 6 per cent. in 1830; and it had only risen to a trifle less than 13 per cent. in 1850, at which time the first classification was made by the Census. These statistics show that the foreign element in the population of the American North-West was very small in the early period of its settlement, and that its population was mainly supplied from the older States, as will unquestionably be the case with our own North-West. They show, also, that it took more than thirty years to give that country a population of 532,000 souls, though it was a more attractive field than our own North-West, and easily accessible by means of the Great Lakes and the Mississippi; and at the commencement of the period the States from which emigration was to be drawn had a population more than 1,000,000 in excess of the present population of the Dominion. And yet, in the face of these suggestive facts, it is estimated that a population greater than that of the American North-West—at the expiration of thirty years from the time that an active emigration movement commenced—will be poured into the Canadian North-West in ten years.

MR. PLUMB: Between what period was that?

MR. CHARLTON: From 1800 to 1830.

MR. MCCALLUM: There were no railways or steamboats then.

MR. CHARLTON: But then, as now, the American people were a migratory people. I wish to refer again to the estimates of my right hon. friend the First Minister, with reference to the rapidity with which the public land in that country is likely to be purchased by settlers. I will now devote my attention, for a few moments, to the right hon. gentleman's estimate of the results likely to be derived from the land sales in that country. I desire to prove the utter absurdity of these estimates. The hon. the Minister of Railways tells us that, so far from involving the country in difficulties, his policy will lift him out of them, his project being based on calculations that we will realise, in the next ten years, from the sale of lands, $38,000,000 in cash and $32,000,000 in bonds and mortgages. I fear the Government will find mortgages rather poor security. Suppose the people of a district or township decline to pay, what is the Government going to do?

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Going to sell the property to others.

MR. CHARLTON: Are you going to eject them and send up police to expel the defaulters?

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: That will not be necessary.

MR. CHARLTON: I know the case of the celebrated Holland Company, which bought the greater part of Western New York, at the close of the Revolutionary War, and sold to settlers on credit, with easy terms of payment. They found great difficulty in making collections, and were, in the majority of cases, glad to remit interest, and, sometimes, a portion of the principal. So I venture to predict it will be in the North-West, if the system of credit land sales is adhered to. The Government will find then mortgages poor security.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Why?

MR. CHARLTON: All history points to that result, in the case of extensive credit sales of land by Government. The hon. Minister of Railways bases his estimate on an average price of $3 an acre for the lands sold. The correct average, under present regulations, for homestead lands is $1.75, and for Railway lands, $2.13. The hon. gentleman has made a serious error. He estimates that, in the next ten years, 10,880,000 acres of Railway lands will be sold—the same number of acres of preemption lands sold, and the same number of acres taken up under the homestead law, making a total of 21,760,000 sold, and a total of 32,640,000 acres sold and settled upon under the homestead law. This calculation is based upon the estimate that 550,000 people will go into that country during that period. Now the American North-West has a useful and instructive experience for us with reference to the sale of such lands in a new country which is about to be settled. The statistics I am about to give will show the quantities of land sold and the amount of population that flowed into that country. As I have previously shown it took thirty years to place in that country the population that the hon. First Minister expects will flow into our own North-West in ten years. I find, by the United States Census returns, that, in 1850, when those States and Territories of the American North-West had 2,740,000 inhabitants, the amount of land held in farms was 34,956,327, or an average of 12⁷/₁₀ acres per head; in 1860, when the population was 5,609,000, the number of acres in farms was 67,442,639, or an average of 12²/₁₀ acres per head; and in 1870, when the population was 8,664,000 the number of acres in farms was 96,259,853 acres, or an average of 11¹/₁₀ acres per head. I propose to take the highest average and apply it to our estimated population at the end of ten years. On the basis then of an average of 12⁷/₁₀ acres of land per head, and a population of 550,000 ten years hence, the total number of acres in farms would be 6,930,000 acres, divided as follows, as per proportions of different classes of public lands given in Government estimate:—

Homestead Grants.....	2,310,000
Preemption Lands, $1 75	2,310,000
Railway Lands, $2 13	2,310,000
Add for Speculators.....	1,000,000

represent, at present prices, under the land regulations, \$10,962,000 in cash and mortgages, in place of \$71,000,000. Has the hon. gentleman any reason to suppose that our settlers will hold any more land, on the average, than was held in the United States North-West in 1850? If so, experience will show he is mistaken. Now, Sir, if we make an estimate on the basis of 750,000 settlers in the next ten years, and on the basis of the land-holdings in the United States in 1850 as before, we have 9,410,000 as the number of acres that will be held in farms; one-third of the amount being in homestead, one-third in preemption, and one-third in Railway lands as before. If you add to this amount 1,200,000 for speculative purchases, you have disposed of 10,610,000 instead of 32,640,000. The amount from this that would be received in cash and mortgages is \$13,587,000 instead of \$71,000,000. But suppose the population would be less than 350,000 within the next ten years—if it reach that number, settlement will be much more rapid than in the United States North-West, under similar circumstances—he will find, taking the average holdings in that country, he will have disposed of 4,410,000 acres; in farms derived one-third each from homestead grants, and preemption, and railway land sales, 1,470,000. If we add, for sales to speculators, 750,000 acres, it will make a total of 5,160,000 acres, representing in money and mortgages \$6,670,000, instead of \$71,000,000. But I predict he will not see 350,000 in our North-West in ten years. I have not taken interest into account in these calculations, nor made any charge for the cost of surveys and sales. I think that these comparisons, based on the experience of the United States, must satisfy every hon. member that the hon. gentleman's calculations are likely to fall far short of realisation. His estimate, with reference to the expense of sales and surveys, is about 3½ per cent. of the receipts. The American Land Office statistics will give us some information, I think, which will demonstrate the fallacy of that calculation. The total sales of land, in the United States, up to the 30th June last, realised \$204,547,812. The expenses, from 1796 to 1857, only cover the cost of surveys—not the expenses of the General Land Office at Washington, or those of the land offices in various parts of the States; with those omissions, the expenses reached \$34,718,000, or 17 per cent. of the amount of sales. I find that from 1852 to 1879, the receipts from sales were \$71,993,000. During the same period there were granted or certified to railways somewhere about 46,000,000 acres of land, after deducting lapsed, forfeited and reverted lands, during the same period, the homestead grants were 47,143,000. I find that the expenditure of the Land Office for that period, covering the expenditure of the General Land Office, at Washington, the various District Land Offices, the expenditures for the Surveyor-General in the different States, and the cost of explorations and surveys, was \$35,139,000, or averaging \$1,254,000 a year. So that while the cost of the United States Land Department was $17\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. upon all their sales from 1796, without counting General, Local and Surveyor-General Office expenses, which were much the heaviest items, for the first ten years, and were for the period, from 1852 to 1879, nearly one-half the total amount of sales. He expects to run his Land Department at a cost of $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. of the sales. Well, it is about as near the truth as his other calculations, but it is absurdly wide of the mark. The hon. member for Niagara told us that the sales in the West, by the Government, amounted to about 10 per cent. of the total land sales.

MR. PLUMB: I said the Northern Railway sales.

MR. CHARLTON: I can scarcely comprehend how this can be, since the United States absolutely reserve within the Railway Belts one-half the lands, and as the Railway Belts do not cover one-tenth of the entire country, I think the hon. gentleman had better revise his calculation. If he reversed it and said the railways sold about 10 per cent. of all the land that was sold, he would be much nearer the mark. What does all this show as to the estimate of increased population? It think it shows conclusively that the calculations made by the hon. gentlemen on the Treasury Benches are extravagant. What does all this show as to the question of the arable land? It shows that the estimate made by the hon. the Minister of Railways, that we have 150,000,000 acres of arable land in the North-West, is exceedingly wide of the mark. He is deceiving himself and he is deceiving the country. He is guilty of a great wrong to the country if he involves it in a great expenditure, in the belief that the proceeds of land sales will repay the outlay. What does it show as to the prospective revenue from lands? It shows that in place of receiving an average of $7,000,000 a year from land sales for the next ten years, he is not likely to realise a net return of one-seventh of that amount. I think, Mr. Speaker, that I have shown that the various calculations made by the hon. gentlemen opposite are extravagant and visionary, and if this is the case, the fact, I think, should be held to cast much doubt upon the wisdom and the ability to manage great public concerns, of those gentlemen who made the calculation. Now, at the risk of being considered unpatriotic, I wish to place before the House some facts which have a very intimate bearing upon our own interests, and which are well worthy of our own consideration. I wish to make some comparison between the present condition of this country and the present condition of the United States. I wish to show to this House and to this country, that we are, at this moment, in a critical position. I wish to show that the burdens this country has incurred have already placed it in an unfavourable position as compared with the United States. I wish to show that it is high time, if we wish to keep going forward in the race of progress and to secure a permanent prosperity, to put on the brakes and to cease to add to the burdens already placed upon the people. In 1871 we had a total population of 3,601,000 souls, that is in all that is now comprised in the Dominion of Canada. If we estimate the increase of the present decade at 13 per cent., nine-tenths of this increase will give us at the present time 4,025,000 population, and I estimate that that number is very near the mark. Now, the gross public debt of this country, according to the Accounts last brought down, is $183,974,000; the net public debt is $147,481,000, but whether the assets, which are deducted from the gross amount of the public debt, are all good or not, I cannot say. But I will assume they are, and I will treat this question of the liabilities of the country upon the basis of the net public debt. That amount is equal to $36.64 per head of our present population. The interest charged upon the net amount of debt is $6,660,000 a year, or $1.66 per head of the population. Now, I wish to contrast our present condition with that of the United States, and I wish to say that it is a matter of the utmost importance that we should not allow the public burdens of this country to exceed those of the United States—that we should not allow this country to become more severely taxed than the United States, because if we do we shall be placed at a great disadvantage compared with that country. The public debt of the United States, last year, was $1,996,000,000, which amounted to $44.42 per capita of the population. The interest paid last year was $83,773,000, which was a charge of $1.69 per capita. Now, that public debt, since the last statement, has been reduced by $46,814,000, and $14,000,000 of that reduction was in the month of March, so that the net amount of the public debt is now $1,950,000,000. It is expected that the reduction of the debt by the 30th June next will have amounted to $60,000,000 for the year. The United States have reduced their debt since 1865 by $806,821,000. A considerable proportion of this reduction has been made during a period of six years of great depression, from 1873 to 1879. But the country has passed out of that depression and the tax paying powers of the country are greater now than ever, the population is increasing, the interest charges are being reduced, and the reduction of the public debt will go on in a much greater ratio in the future, than it has in the past. That country has already paid off three national debts. It paid off the debt which was incurred in the Revolutionary War, the debt which was incurred in the War of 1812, and that which was incurred in the Mexican War, and it will, in my opinion, pay off its present national debt within the next thirty years. It is certainly reducing that public debt with great rapidity. Now, our expenditure was, in 1879, including expenditure chargeable to Capital Account, $30,103,712, or $7.47 per capita. The expenditure chargeable to Consolidated Fund, and including that upon Capital Account was $24,455,381 or $6.07 per capita. The expenditure of the United States for the same year, including all that class of expenditures that we charge to Capital Account, was $245,393,712, or $5.17 per capita. The Revenue statistics last year, for the two countries, were as follows:—

	U. S.	Canada.
Customs and Excise.....	$250,811,000	$18,291,000
Per Capita	5 08	4 54
Total Revenue.....	273,827,000	22,577,000

The revenue of the United States for the three-quarters of the present fiscal year that have expired, was $248,766,000, equal to $331,168,000 for the year. Our own Revenue during the same period shows no such increase. During the last year the United States have not only largely reduced their debt, but they have reduced to a still greater extent their interest charge through the funding of a large amount of their debt at a lower rate of interest. The amount of their debt on the 1st of June, 1880, may be assumed at $38.34 per capita, and the interest charge at less than $1.58 per capita. What does this mean to us? It means that, on June 30th next, our interest charge will be some 12c. or 13c. per head higher than the interest charge in the United States. It means that our debt per head will be fully equal to that of the United States, and that it will continue to increase rapidly. Our expenditure is relatively heavier than that of the United States, and the relative proportion will continue to increase. Our Revenue is smaller than theirs, and, while their revenue is swelling in amount, it will be with great difficulty that our Revenue can be increased. We are increasing our debt very rapidly, whilst they are reducing theirs. We are loaded down with unproductive investments. We have the Intercolonial Railway, and other Railways in the Maritime Provinces which are falling far short of paying running expenses, and we are building our Canadian Pacific Railway, which, I fear, will, for a long period, prove unproductive. We have Canals that are not paying a tithe of the interest on their cost. This means that we are placed at a disadvantage with the United States, which, as a Government, has no unproductive investments. It means that the great disparity which has hitherto existed between the growth of this country and the growth of that will be increased. It means that we are rapidly approaching a great crisis in the history of this country, and that it is high time that the hon. Ministers, who govern this country, who shape its policy, should take these facts into consideration, and put on the brakes. The policy announced by my hon. friend from West Durham is the only safe policy at this juncture. Who, Sir, is the patriotic man? He who warns the country of its dangers, or he who stands up and endeavours to choke off discussion, and attribute disloyal and unpatriotic motives to those who are warning the Government, and the people of this country, that the course pursued is fraught with mischief and danger. Under these circumstances are we justified in spending $30,000,000 or $40,000,000 on this British Columbia section. We will be warranted only in building this road as the imperative wants of the settlers in the North-West require. In doing more we shall be false to the interests of this country. I can sympathise with the hon. gentlemen from British Columbia; I know they are loyal to their Province; I know they desire communication with the Atlantic sea-board; but in objecting to the construction of this branch of the road, it is not that we love British Columbia less, but we love the whole country more. What is the record of the men who propose to rush into this extravagant expenditure. It is a record unrivalled for its blunders. Are not these the prudent, cautious men who threw 8,000,000 into the sea in building the Intercolonial Railway, as they did when it might have been made a paying investment by selecting a common sense route? Are not these the men who promoted rebellion in the North-West? Are not these the men who admitted British Columbia on these absurd terms which, periodically, come up to plague and vex us? Are not these the men who were guilty of scandalous misconduct in connection with this self-same Pacific Railway, which, when the disgraceful scandal became known, drove them from power? Are not these the men who made the absurd estimates we are dealing with to night? Men capable of making such estimates are not fit to run a railway, much less to govern a country. The hon. the First Minister proves, by his astounding ignorance, in his estimates, in reference to the sale of lands, that he is unfit to grapple with these questions. The hon. the Minister of Railways, in his extravagant ideas in regard to the North-West, proves that he is unfit to counsel the country. The hon. the Finance Minister proves it by a senseless attempt to enrich the country through a process of depletion; and as a justification of his narrow, restrictive policy, pointing to the example of the United States, forgetting the radically different circumstances of the two countries; forgetting that that country is a miniature world, with every variety of soil, climate, and production; a zollverien, in fact, of thirty-nine independent nations, enjoying among themselves the benefits of Free-trade, and so vast in extent and diversity of productions and resources, that the evils of the restrictive system are neutralised by a semi-world-wide self-sustaining power. He draws a comparison between that country and Canada; and because that country, with its vast resources, has progressed, their policy, forsooth, is just the policy for Canada. The entire Cabinet prove by their past record that they are unfit for the position they hold. The propounding of such a policy as calling for an expenditure of 30,000,000 of dollars in British Columbia, while we have such heavy burdens weighing on the people, proves to me, and will prove to every reasonable man, that these gentlemen are unfit for the position they occupy, that they are unwise and unsafe counsellors, rushing us on to ruin.

SUPPLY—CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY.

ADJOURNED DEBATE.

House resumed the adjourned Debate on the proposed motion (Sir S. L. Tilley): That Mr.

Speaker do now leave the Chair, for the House to go again into Committee of Supply, and on the proposed motion (Mr. Blake) in amendment thereto.

MR. WHITE (Cardwell): Mr. Speaker, —It is impossible to over-estimate the importance of the subject which has, for the last three or four days, been engaging the attention of this House. It is difficult to imagine any question more fraught with interest for, or more affecting the future well-being of, the Dominion than that presented to us for solution. It assumes two phases, to my mind, namely: that viewed from the standpoint of the national obligation, and that from the standpoint of the material interest of this Dominion. The hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), in relation to the first view of the question, referred to what had been said by the hon. the Minister of Railways as a "delving into antiquities." That hon. gentleman, as a lawyer, knows this: that all our rights depend upon a delving into antiquities. If he has any legal question in dispute between man and man, he determines it by delving into antiquities; and we have to do the same thing in questions arising between communities, or individuals, or parts of communities. It seems to me that it did not come well from the hon. member for West Durham, to sneer at the hon. the Minister of Railways because he referred to the past history of this question, and to describe that reference as a "delving into antiquities." Notwithstanding that sneer, I shall, with the permission of the House, take the liberty of delving into the antiquities of this question, with regard to the relations between the Dominion and the Province of British Columbia, the duty we owe to the Province, and the obligation imposed upon us to perform the terms entered into with that Province. It is not necessary to refer to the earlier history of the Railway. It is well known to those gentlemen who have any knowledge of the circumstances in connection with the construction of the Pacific Railway, that it was originally by no means a party question, that both parties were in favour of its construction; and hon. members who are in the habit of studying what has taken place will remember that the strongest language was used by the leading organ of hon. gentlemen opposite in denunciation of those who forgot that the construction of the Pacific Railway from ocean to ocean was a duty, to neglect which would be to inflict upon us the liability of being accused of want of patriotism, and as being hostile to British connection. It was not a question whether we should build the Pacific Railway, that was urged upon us by the leaders of both parties; but it was the manner in which it was to be built, the time it should take to build it. That became a question engaging the attention of Parliament, and upon that a division took place between the two political parties in this country. When British Columbia was incorporated in the Dominion we incurred the responsibility of building the Railway, to commence it within two years at each end, and undertake to complete it within ten years. The Government of that time, under the instructions of this House, let the contract in accordance with the determination arrived at, that the road should be built by a private company, aided by a subsidy of money and a subsidy of land; and if that company had succeeded, I think it would have been a great advantage to this Dominion. Who would not now gladly give 50,000,000 acres of land and $30,000,000 to see that Railway built from ocean to ocean? But that scheme failed. I am not going to discuss the causes of that failure, which were many. Sir Hugh Allan, who obtained along with his associates, a charter for his company, was, as I think, unfortunately mixed up with other railway enterprises which brought against him the strong hostility of the most powerful Canadian railway corporation in London. He proposed not only to build a railway across the continent, but a railway from Quebec to Ottawa, to be continued to the Sault Ste. Marie, with a branch to Toronto, and then again by the Great Western to go further west, and thus secure competition with the Grand Trunk. As a consequence of that scheme, he met, in London, with the bitter hostility of the Grand Trunk directors and shareholders, who did everything they could to prevent his success. This strong corporation, with all the influence it had in London, was aided by circumstances on this side of the water. I am not going to say the hon. gentlemen opposite were not justified in endeavouring to turn out the Conservative Government of that day ; but, I think, looking back to the past, that everyone will admit it would have been the more patriotic course, considering the interests the country had at stake, and that those hon. gentlemen had pressed strongly the construction of this Railway, had they held their hand, and not aided, by a political crisis at the moment, those on the other side of the Atlantic, who were doing their best to defeat the enterprise. I believe that, in spite of the opposition of the Grand Trunk in England, Sir Hugh Allan would have succeeded, and that we should have had enormous sums of British capital expended here for the construction of the road had that opposition not been aided by the political crisis here. The road would thus have been built by a powerful company, whose interest it would be to aid the settlement of the country, and which, through its President, controlled a magnificent line of steamships—and which had spread over the United Kingdom, 1,200 agents, passenger brokers, everyone of whom would have been an emigration agent for this country, and would have aided in filling up our North-West Territory. But the Allan Company failed ; the Government of that day was defeated, and hon. gentlemen opposite took office. If the statements we have heard since this debate commenced are to be accepted, I think we may fairly say it was open to the late Government, had they chosen to have said to British Columbia :—“ We cannot fulfil the bargain made, and, therefore, must ask you to release us, and we will build the Railway as rapidly as we can, consistently with our financial position.” They did not take that course. On the contrary, they recognised, by their first act, the obligation of the Dominion to construct the Railway, and that, in spite of the fact that they, according to their statements, made then and frequently since, were not bound to go on with the work except as the finances of the Dominion would permit. In a report of the Committee of the Privy Council, dated 8th July, 1874, on the mission of Mr. Walkem to England, and a cable message received from the Colonial Secretary—a report in which the Roman hand of the hon. member of Lambton is visible in every line—we find this statement as to the position in which the bargain stood :

“ Mr. Trutch, the delegate of the British Columbia Government, present in Ottawa during the discussions on the Terms of Union, expressed himself as follows at a public meeting, in order to reassure those who were apprehensive of the conveyances of so rash an assumption of such serious obligations :—

“ When he came to Ottawa with his co-delegates last year, they entered into a computation with the Privy Council as to the cost and time it would take to build the line, and they came to the conclusion that it could be built on the terms proposed in ten years. If they had said twelve or eighteen years, that time would have been accepted with equal readiness, as all that was understood was that the line should be built as soon as possible. British Columbia had entered into a partnership with Canada, and they were united to construct certain Public Works. But before one would protest against anything by which it should be understood that the Government were to borrow one hundred millions of dollars, or to tax the people of Canada and British Columbia, to carry out those works within a certain time, he had been accused of having made a very Jewish bargain ; but not even Shylock would have demanded his pound of flesh if it had to be cut from his own body.”

“ These expressions show very clearly that the terms agreed to were directory rather than mandatory, and were to be interpreted by circumstances, the essence of the engagement being such diligence as was consistent with moderate expenditure, and no increase in the then rate of taxation.”

Then, again, in another report of the Council, dated 23rd of July, the hon. gentleman more tersely and more emphatically stated the same fact. He said :

“ It was distinctly understood by the British Columbia delegation, at the time the Terms of Union were agreed upon, that the taxation of the country was not to be increased on account of this work beyond the rate then existing.”

Now, it was with that understanding of the agreement that the late Premier entered into the negotiations with which we have now to deal. He might then have said to British Columbia : we cannot pretend to build this Railway, at present, but will do what we can to carry it across the continent and meet you at the earliest possible moment consistently with the proper expenditure of the public money, and you must depend on our good will and good faith. And he might the more readily have said this in view of the position of the finances at that time.

The hon. the Finance Minister had just imposed $3,000,000 additional taxation, so that when he sent his delegate to British Columbia and entered into the Carnarvon Terms, he had actually increased the burdens of the country by upwards of $3,000,000. He did not take that course. He sent a delegate, Mr. Edgar, to the British Columbia Government and made it an offer, without any pressure, in accordance with his own conception of the obligation of this country towards British Columbia. I do not propose to refer to the incidents of that mission, as I wish to detain the House not a moment longer than is possible. In the report of the Committee of the Privy Council, to which I have already referred, the proposals made by the hon. member for Lambton, of his own motion, are thus succinctly stated :

“The propositions made by Mr. Edger involved an immediate heavy expenditure in British Columbia not contemplated by the Terms of Union, namely, the construction of a Railway on Vancouver's Island from the port of Esquimault to Nanaimo, as compensation to the most populous part of the Province for the requirement of a longer time for completing the line on the mainland. The proposals also embraced an obligation to construct a road or trail and telegraph line across the continent at once, and an expenditure of not less than a million and a-half within the Province annually on the railway works on the mainland, irrespective of the amounts which might be spent east of the Rocky Mountains, being a half more than the entire sum British Columbia demanded in the first instance as the annual expenditure on the whole road.”

How Lord Carnarvon understood these propositions of the Government may be inferred from the despatch which he himself sent out, dated the 16th August, 1874 ; and as it is important to emphasize distinctly the voluntary offers which were made by those hon. gentlemen when they were responsible for the government of this country, it is well to have Lord Carnarvon's own words, as giving his understanding of those proposals :

“The proposals made by Mr. Edgar, on behalf of the Canadian Government, to the Provincial Government of British Columbia may be stated as follows :—

“1. To commence at once and finish as soon as possible, a Railway from Esquimault to Nanaimo.

“2. To spare no expense in settling as speedily as possible the line to be taken by the Railway on the mainland.

“3. To make at once a waggon-road and line of telegraph along the whole length of the Railway in British Columbia, and to continue the telegraph across the continent.

“4. The moment the surveys and road on the mainland are completed, to spend a minimum amount of $1,500,000 annually upon the construction of the Railway within the Province.”

Lord Carnarvon suggested two amendments to these terms. He suggested first that the annual expenditure should be two million dollars, instead of one million and a half ; and he suggested, secondly, that the road should be completed before 1890. The Government accepted the first of these propositions in these words, which I think I may fairly assume are the words of the hon. member for Lambton :

“In regard to the second proposal, the committee recommended that Lord Carnarvon be informed (if it be found impossible to obtain a settlement of the question by the acceptance of the former offer) that the Government will consent that, after the completion of the surveys, the average annual minimum expenditure on the mainland shall be two millions.”

Then, as to the second, or time limit, which Lord Carnarvon desired to impose, the hon. member for Lambton said :

“There can be no doubt that it would be an extremely difficult task to obtain the sanction of the Canadian Parliament to any specific bargain as to time, considering the consequences which have already resulted from the unwise adoption of a limited period in the Terms of Union for the completion of so vast an undertaking, the extent of which must necessarily be very imperfectly understood by people at a distance. The Committee advise that Lord Carnarvon be informed that, while in no case could the Government undertake the completion of the whole line in the time mentioned, an extreme unwillingness exists to another limitation of time ; but if it be found absolutely necessary to secure a present settlement of the controversy by further concessions, a pledge may be given that the portion west of Lake Superior will be completed so as to afford connection by rail with existing lines of Railway through a portion of the United States, and by Canadian waters during the season of navigation by the year 1890, as suggested.”

And finally, when we come to the agreement actually made, as stated by Lord Carnarvon in his despatch of the 17th September, and I read that with a view of completing this part of my statement. These were the agreements that were made by Lord Carnarvon and accepted by the Government of that day :

“1. That the Railway from Esquimault to Nanaimo shall be commenced as soon as possible and completed with all practicable despatch.

"2. That the surveys on the mainland shall be pushed on with the utmost vigour.—On this point after considering the representations of your Ministers, I feel that I have no alternative but to rely, as I do most fully and readily upon their assurances that no legitimate effort or expense will be spared first to determine the best route for the line and secondly to proceed with the details of the engineering work. It would be distasteful to me, if indeed, it were not impossible, to prescribe strictly any minimum of the time or expenditure with regard to work of so uncertain a nature, but happily, it is equally impossible for me to doubt that your Government will loyally do its best in every way to accelerate the completion of a duty left freely to its sense of honour and justice.

"3. That the waggon road and telegraph line shall be immediately constructed.—There seems here to be some little difference of opinion as to the special value to the Province of the undertaking to complete these two works; but after considering what has been said, I am of opinion that they should both be proceeded with at once, as indeed is suggested by your Ministers."

It is worth while remarking that these two works, the waggon road and the telegraph line, were not asked for by British Columbia, but, on the contrary, British Columbia intimated that they were useless, and that she did not desire them; but they were forced upon her and forced upon Lord Carnarvon by the hon. gentlemen opposite when they occupied seats on this side of the House:

"4. That $2,000,000 a year and not $1,500,000 shall be the minimum expenditure on Railway works within the Province from the date at which the surveys are sufficiently completed to enable that amount to be expended on construction.—In naming this amount I understand that, it being alike the interest and the wish of the Dominion Government to urge on with all speed the completion of the works now to be undertaken, the annual expenditure will be as much in excess of the minimum of $2,000,000 as in any year may be found practicable.

"5. Lastly, That on or before the 31st of December 1890, the Railway shall be completed and open for traffic from the Pacific seaboard to a point at the western end of Lake Superior, at which it will fall into connection with existing lines of Railway through a portion of the United States, and also with the navigation on Canadian waters.—To proceed at present with the remainder of the Railway extending by the country northward of Lake Superior, to the existing Canadian lines ought not, in my opinion, to be required, and the time for undertaking that work must be determined by the development of settlement and the changing circumstances of the country. The day is, however, I hope not very distant when a continuous line of railway through Canadian territory will be practicable, and I therefore look upon this portion of the scheme as postponed rather than abandoned."

We had an appeal by the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), the other evening to the hon. gentlemen from the Province of Quebec, and we had a suggestion from him that this scheme of the Government, this disposition to expend money only on the western end to the exclusion of that portion north of Lake Superior, was in fact an attack upon the interests of the Province of Quebec. But here we find in this arrangement, which was made by the hon. gentlemen opposite when they occupied seats on this side of the House, a positive agreement to expend at least two millions, and as much more as they possibly could, every year in British Columbia upon the mainland; and that the line north of Lake Superior should be postponed indefinitely, abandoned, in fact, so far as any present indication to construct it was concerned. Now, here are the words in which the Privy Council accepted those terms. The report is dated 18th December, 1874:

"The Minute of Council of September 17th contained a statement of reason showing why some of these modifications should not be pressed, but the Government, actuated by an anxious desire to remove all difficulties, expressed a willingness to make these further concessions rather than forego an immediate settlement of so irritating a question, as the concessions suggested might be made without involving a violation of the spirit of any Parliamentary Resolution or the letter of any enactment."

So that the very reason for the offer to expend two millions a year at least in British Columbia, after the surveys were completed, in addition to the expenditures upon the eastern end of the line, was that that could be done without involving a violation of the spirit of any Parliamentary Resolution or the letter of any enactment. That was after $3,000,000 of additional taxation had been added to the burdens of the people of this country, in excess of the rate of taxation existing when the Province was admitted to the Union, and the first Resolution limiting the obligation of the Dominion, so frequently referred to, was passed by Parliament. The report of Council proceeded:

"The Committee of Council respectfully request that Your Excellency will be pleased to convey to Lord Carnarvon their warm appreciation of the kindness which led his Lordship to tender his good offices to effect a settlement of the matter in dispute, and also to assure his Lordship that every effort will be made to secure the realisation of what is expected."

When, Sir, Lord Carnarvon reads the debates which have taken place in this House; when he compares the different statements made at different times by the hon. gentleman then at the head of the Government, and of one of his supporters who had a short time before been a member of the Government, and who a short time afterwards was again a member of the Government, he will be shocked at the perfidy of Canadian public men. The comparison will certainly not be calculated to raise us in the estimation of British statesmen. Lord Carnarvon accepted in the spirit in which they were given the thanks awarded him, and said, on the 4th of January:

"It has been with great pleasure that I have received this expression of their opinion. I sincerely rejoice to have been the means of bringing to a satisfactory conclusion a question of so much difficulty, of removing, as I trust, all ground of future misunderstanding between the Province of British Columbia and the Dominion, and of thus contributing towards the ultimate completion of a public work in which they, and indeed the whole Empire, are interested."

The hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) in his speech, stated that within a few months after this correspondence had taken place, after this interchange of compliments with Lord Carnarvon, he entered the Government upon the distinct understanding that these terms were to be abandoned. I think too much of him and of the hon. member for Lambton, to believe that any such compact could have been made. It is true that he contends that the defeat of the Esquimaux and Nanaimo Railway destroyed the Carnarvon Terms. And he contends that the offer of $750,000 was to be regarded as a compensation for the abandonment of those terms. It was nothing of the kind. The Esquimaux and Nanaimo Railway was promised in excess of the Terms of Union, and as compensation for the non-fulfilment of the condition to build the main line by 1881. When the Bill providing for the building of this Railway was defeated in the Senate, the duty of the Government was to provide a substitute for the compensation for the delay on the mainland. They offered that compensation in the form of a money grant of $750,000, that being in fact, as stated by the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie), the sum which he proposed to give as a subsidy to a private company to build the Island Railway. This offer, therefore, so far from being an abandonment of the Carnarvon Terms, was a confirmation of them, an admission of their binding character, a doing, in fact, in another form, precisely what was agreed to be done in those terms. But, Mr. Speaker, we are told that we ought not to go on with the road because there is an obligation on the Government not to go on if it will involve increased taxation. Whatever force there may be in that argument, members of the late Government have deprived themselves of the right to use it. The late First Minister when he entered into the Carnarvon Terms, when he made the contract with British Columbia, actually appropriated $3,000,000 of additional taxation to enable him to carry out those terms. Here is the statement made by the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie) in the Minute of Council of the 23rd July, 1879, sent to England for the information of the Imperial Government on this question. He said:

"So anxious, however, were the present Government to remove any possible cause of complaint, that they did take means to increase the taxation very materially in order to place themselves in a position to make arrangements for the prosecution of the initial and difficult portions of the line as soon as it was possible to do so; and, at the same time, a special confidential agent was deputed to British Columbia for the express purpose of conferring with the Government of that Province, and to endeavour to arrive at some understanding as to a course to be pursued which could be satisfactory to British Columbia and meet the circumstances of the Dominion."

That was the statement made to the Imperial Government on the responsibility of hon. gentlemen opposite; that when they sent their agent to British Columbia they sent him armed with the fact that $3,000,000 had been appropriated to the carrying out of terms to be agreed upon in reference to this Railway; and yet hon. gentlemen now say that we must dishonour ourselves, because the carrying out of the terms, which they made a show of carrying out by the infliction of $3,000,000 increased taxation, would involve a very much smaller increased burden on the people. But we have another report. In order to enable the Government to fulfil the terms, and so that no excuse might be allowed for supposing that they were unwilling to carry them out, we find them stating, in another report of the Privy Council on the 8th of July, that they had raised the average rate of taxation 15 per cent. The actual statement thus made is as follows:—

“In order to enable the Government to carry out the proposals, which it was hoped the British Columbia Government would have accepted, the average rate of taxation was raised at the last Session about 15 per cent. The Customs duties being raised from 15 per cent. to 17½ per cent., and the Excise duties on spirits and tobacco a corresponding rate, both involving additional taxation exceeding $3,000,000 on the transaction of the year.”

That is a statement made by the authority of the Government that this increased taxation was made expressly to enable them to carry out these Carnarvon Terms, and yet we have from these very gentlemen now, an appeal to the country to oppose the policy of the present Government in the direction of carrying out those terms, on the ground that it may increase the taxation of the country, and that in spite of the fact that the proposals of the Government will not involve anything like so large a burden. The hon. gentleman, as I shall be able to establish, has never, until this year, gone back upon that record. Session after Session we have had the statement of the hon. member for Lambton that he recognised the obligation resting upon him to carry out these Carnarvon Terms. Every Session we have had his assurance to that effect. Let me read two or three such assurances given by him, when submitting his yearly statements to the House. In his speech, in submitting the Pacific Railway policy in 1876, he said—and at this time the hon. member for West Durham was a member of the Government, and is, therefore, responsible for every word uttered:—

“We have felt from the first that while it was utterly impossible to implement to the letter the engagements entered into by our predecessors, the good faith of the country demanded that the Administration should do everything that was reasonable and in their power to carry out the pledges made to British Columbia, if not the entire obligation, at least such parts of it as seemed to be within their power and most conducive to the welfare of the whole Dominion, as well as to satisfy all reasonable men in British Columbia, which Province had fancied itself entitled to complain of apparent want of good faith in carrying out these obligations. * * * Let me say, so far as the work itself is concerned, that I have always been an advocate of the construction of a railway across the continent, but I have never believed that it was within our means to do it in anything like the period of time within which the hon. gentleman bound Parliament and the country.”

That is by 1881. After an elaborate statement of surveys, and a suggestion of the advantages of the Pine River Pass, he said:

“But this route is open to the objection that if we were to decide upon surveying that country, it would be practically putting off the construction for some time longer than would be necessary by adopting the line we have already surveyed. If British Columbia were to act with consideration for national interests with regard to the obligations assumed by the Dominion at the time of the Union, it undoubtedly would be the policy any Administration would seek to carry out to examine the country more thoroughly before action. With the irritation that is felt by many in British Columbia, and the constant complaints made, it is doubtful whether the country would be justified, even for a permanent advantage, unless that one of so decided and conclusive a character as to be apparent at sight, in pursuing such a policy. Assuming, therefore, for a moment—and assuming what I may call almost a certainty—that the Jasper House Pass will be the crossing place in the Rocky Mountains, we have the line tolerably clearly defined from east to west.”

Thus, Sir, at that time we had a statement that further explorations must not be undertaken lest delay might occur in the work of actual construction. The hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) at that time sat beside the then First Minister. And speaking of taxation, the late Finance Minister, that very same Session, the Session in which this statement was made by the hon. member for Lambton, came down and announced that there was a deficit of $1,900,000, and amended the Tariff with the view to still further taxation. Yet, in spite of that deficit, and of that increased taxation, we had the statement of the hon. member for Lambton that so important was it that this arrangement should be carried out and the terms fulfilled by an immediate commencement of the work of construction, that he was actually prepared to forego further explorations unless the advantages of such explorations were apparent at first sight. The hon. gentleman in the same speech said :

“Our policy was this : It is utterly impossible to commence the construction in British Columbia until we have overcome the initiatory difficulties by carefully surveying the country and ascertaining the line which would have ultimately to be adopted. From the statements I have made it will be seen that an enormous force has been engaged and a large amount expended in that Province, and it is unjust in the people of British Columbia to complain that we have not prosecuted this work with all due diligence. Directions were given by the Government to the Chief Engineer, and by him to his staff, that anything that could be done was to be done in order to push the work forward as rapidly as possible.”

In the same speech, in order to give additional proof of his sincerity and of his determination to carry out this work, he referred to the steel rails which had been sent to British Columbia. He said :

“It has been assumed that as this road is not to be constructed, the rails shipped to British Columbia are therefore utterly useless. That is a great mistake. If we are able to commence the work of construction this coming year in British Columbia, these rails would be required. It may be said to be impossible to commence the construction of the road in British Columbia without having the rails on the spot.

“There are five thousand tons in British Columbia, and if we have erred in sending them there we have simply erred in our earnest desire to show to the people of British Columbia that we are desirous of keeping faith with them, that our speeches were not mere empty promises, and that we are resolved to place ourselves in a position they could not misunderstand.”

That was the statement in 1876, made by the hon. gentleman from his place on the Treasury Benches. The hon. member for West Durham sat beside him at the time, and was responsible for every word he uttered. And yet the hon. gentleman comes here and tells this House, and he tells this country, that he had before this made an arrangement that this work was to be postponed. Let me read another extract from the same debate. The hon. member for Cumberland said :

“He had followed the hon. gentleman closely, and failed to learn what was proposed to be done in regard to the great question of the Canadian Pacific Railway. The British Columbia papers merely showed that the Government had succeeded in bringing matters to a deadlock, and the Premier was bound to tell the House before asking it to vote this large amount what he intended to do.

“Hon. Mr. BLAKE—The last paragraph in the papers will show.

Mr. WHITE.

“Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—I said our policy from the first was to do everything in our power to keep the bargain the hon. gentleman and his friends made, and nothing will be lacking on our own part to bring it to a successful conclusion in British Columbia. I have shown pretty conclusively that nothing I am aware of has been left undone that could be done. I do not know what the hon. gentleman wants.”

That is to be taken as the interpretation of the arrangement made by the hon. member for West Durham when he entered that Cabinet. But we have another authority as to what the late Government intended to do, which, to my mind, seems utterly to negative the suggestion made by the hon. member for West Durham, that he entered the Cabinet upon conditions which would have dishonoured the Government that accepted him on such terms. Lord Dufferin, then Governor-General of Canada, was sent to British Columbia in 1876. I should, perhaps, not use the word “sent,” but he went to British Columbia, though judging by his speech, perhaps I am right in saying that he was sent there. He went there at any rate. He went through the country. Hon. gentlemen who have been endeavouring to decry British Columbia will do well to read Lord Dufferin’s speech on that occasion, wherein he described what he calls “this glorious country.” But, Sir, the then Governor-General of this Dominion, after his return from his tour through the interior of British Columbia, and just before he embarked for San Francisco, made a speech in Victoria. How serious he felt that speech to be may be gathered from one expression, which I will read, and which was an extraordinary expression for a nobleman in his position to use :

This statement was made in order to convince British Columbians that what he said, he said from a knowledge of the facts, with a resolution to say nothing but what he knew to be absolutely true. The hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), as a good constitutionalist, knows that being a Minister at the time, he was responsible for every word Lord Dufferin then uttered. Here is an extract from the speech :

“Let me then assure you, on the part of the Canadian Government and on the part of the Canadian people at large, that there is nothing they desire more earnestly or more fervently than to know and feel that you are one with them in heart, thought and feeling. Canada would indeed be dead to the most self-evident considerations of self-interest, and to the first instincts of national pride, if she did not regard with satisfaction her connection with a Province so richly endowed by nature, inhabited by a community so replete with British loyalty and pluck, while it afforded her the means of extending her confines and the outlets of her commerce to the wide Pacific and to the countries beyond.”

Well, Sir, at that time there was a suspicion prevailing that the hon. member for Lambton had not acted in good faith in connection with the Carnarvon Terms. There was a suspicion prevailing, because two hon. gentlemen of the Senate, prominent friends of that gentleman, who were known to be so good party men that one could hardly conceive their voting against any measure which the Government sincerely decided to see passed—yet voted against this Bill—there was a suspicion that he had procured the defeat of the measure for the construction of the Esquimaux and Nanaimo Railway in the Senate; and referring to that suspicion Lord Dufferin said:

“Had Mr. Mackenzie dealt so treacherously by Lord Carnarvon, by the representative of his sovereign in this country, or by you, he would have been guilty of a most atrocious act, of which I trust no public man in Canada or in any other British colony could be capable. I tell you in the most emphatic terms, and I pledge my honour on the point, that Mr. Mackenzie was not guilty of any such base and deceitful conduct; had I thought him guilty of it, either he would have ceased to be Prime Minister, or I should have left the country.”

I ask you where is the difference between conspiring to secure the defeat of the measure in the Senate which had passed the Commons, and which the Ministry pretended to be in favour of, and conspiring to arouse public sentiment as those hon. gentlemen are doing to-day, in order to prevent the carrying out of the Carnarvon Terms. Lord Dufferin proceeded:

“I saw Mr. Mackenzie the next day, and I have seldom seen a man more annoyed or disconcerted than he was; indeed, he was driven at that interview to protest with more warmth than he has ever used against the decision of the English Government, which had refused, on the opinion of the law officers of the Crown, to allow him to add to the members of the

And yet these hon. gentlemen come here now and ask us to postpone the construction of this Railway, to postpone the carrying out of these terms which have been entered into, this solemn bargain which has been made, and in order to carry which they, at that time, four or five years ago, actually tried to violate the Constitution by creating additional members of the Senate. Well, Sir, after discussing the question of the action of the Senate, Lord Dufferin said:

“But there is one thing I admit the Senate has done, it has revived in their integrity those original treaty obligations on the strength of which you were induced to enter Confederation, and it has reimposed upon Mr. Mackenzie and his Government the obligation of offering you an equivalent for that stipulation in the Carnarvon Terms, which he has not been able to make good.”

Then he refers to the offer of $750,000 as compensation for the failure of that part of the Carnarvon Terms which the Senate had made it impossible to make good:

“My only object in touching upon them at all is to disabuse your minds of the idea that there has been any intention on the part of Mr. Mackenzie, his Government, or of Canada to break faith with you. Every single item of the Carnarvon Terms is at this moment in course of fulfilment.”

The hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) is responsible for that statement. Lord Dufferin pointed out how this was the case, and then he went on to say—and I beg the hon. member for West Durham to listen attentively to what he did say in relation to the conduct of those who, being strong in numerical majority, would try to oppress a small Province because it had not sufficient members to compete with them:

“Your numerical weakness as a community is your real strength, for it is a consideration that appeals to every generous heart. Far be the day when on any acre of soil above which floats the flag of England, mere material power, brute political preponderance, should be permitted to decide such a controversy as that which we are now discussing. It is to men like yourselves, who, with unquailing fortitude, and heroic energy, have planted the laws and liberties, and the blessed influence of English homes amidst the wilds, and rocks, and desert plains of savage lands, that England owes the enhancement of her prestige, the diffusion of her tongue, the increase of her commerce, and her ever-widening renown, and woe betide the Government or the statesman who, because its inhabitants are few in number, and politically of small account, should disregard the wishes or carelessly dismiss the representations, however bluff, boisterous, or downright, of the feeblest of our distant colonies."

I draw to those words the special attention of the hon. member for West Durham, who, for the moment, has permitted himself to sink the statesman who can think of the next generation, into the parish politician who thinks only of the next General Election. That was the position in 1876, and I think I may say that I have established beyond controversy, beyond the possibility of controversy, the fact that the hon. gentlemen were at least committed, the hon. member for West Durham amongst the rest, at that time, to the honest fulfilment of the bargain which they had made. In 1877, it was reported—I do not know what truth there was in the report—that it was in consequence of Lord Dufferin's visit to British Columbia, the question of the selection of the Burrard Inlet route came up for the first time. Up to that time that route had hardly been heard of, and the hon. member for Lambton was known to be in favour of the Bute Inlet route.

MR. MACKENZIE: I have no objection to tell the hon. gentleman that Lord Dufferin had nothing personally to do with it. It was adopted purely upon practical engineering reasons. The hon. gentleman is quite correct in saying I was in favour of the Bute Inlet route for a considerable time. In fact I was in favour of it until I got something better.

MR. WHITE: Who suggested the change is not a matter of any consequence to my argument. I simply give the report as it was current at the time, and the hon. member knowing the facts contradicts it. In 1877 the Burrard Inlet route came up for the first time, so far as Parliament was concerned, and so far as the suggestion of it as a serious route was concerned. The hon. member for Lambton, in reply to the hon. member for Cumberland, who asked whether, in connection with some other statements which he made, he proposed to settle that question and put the line under contract without the consent of Parliament, that being apparently the intention of the Government, from the speech of the hon. gentleman, Mr. Mackenzie replied: "Certainly not; I think I stated we hoped to have the tender submitted to Parliament next Session." So that in 1877, as in 1876, there never was a thought of abandoning the line in British Columbia, or violating the Carnarvon Terms; but on the contrary the Government of the day were acting in good faith in their desire to carry out those terms. Well, Sir, in 1878, the hon. gentleman, the last time he had the privilege of making a statement from the Ministerial Benches, referred to the great surveys which had taken place in connection with the proposed road through British Columbia. Throughout all his speeches on the subject, from first to last, there runs a line of argument showing how sincerely he was devoted to carrying out the scheme of beginning the work on the mainland. He pointed out that 47,000 miles of country had been traversed by the various parties who were sent out to explore the country, and that there had been "actual instrumental surveys laboriously measured, yard by yard, of not less than 12,000 miles or nearly five times the length of the road when completed from Lake Nipissing to the Pacific Ocean." Then he gave his reasons for desiring to go on at once as follows:—

"If there were no political considerations governing the action of the Government, and these political reasons referred to our obligations with the British Columbian Government and people to proceed as fast as possible—or as the hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. Bunster) says two or three times every day, 'proceed immediately'—if there were no considerations of that kind to govern our action, it might be, I have no doubt it would be, desirable to spend another two years exploring the country which is yet comparatively unknown. The governing considerations then, Sir, are all in favour, as it appears to me, of adopting the views of the Chief Engineer in respect to this line. The Government have not at the moment formally resolved upon the adoption of this line, but it is the opinion of the Government that the considerations to which I have alluded in these remarks are such as must govern their action if they are to attend to this matter purely in the public interest."

That was the statement made by the hon. member the last time he addressed this House from the Ministerial Benches. What occurred afterwards? Parliament was prorogued the General Elections were coming on, and the hon. gentleman advertised for tenders for the construction of that very portion of the Railway which we are now asked to postpone. Now, what are we to infer from that? Governments do not do those things, on the eve of General Elections, which are likely to be unpopular with the country. He advertised for those tenders simply because the public mind of this country had been thoroughly imbued with the fact that the honour of the country was pledged to the carrying out of this arrangement. He had been going on through four Sessions, making the only condition of commencement, the completion of surveys, not the question of taxation, but the fact of the completion of the surveys, and as soon as the surveys were completed he advertised for tenders. It is true he has suggested, and I am bound to say I was astonished at the suggestion, and I am sure this House will be astonished when I offer them the proof I am going to offer—it is true he suggested he did not intend to build the road, although he advertised for tenders, intimating that he advertised for tenders simply in order that he might find out how much it was likely to cost. After all the surveys made and all the reports obtained, we are actually asked to believe that he had advertised simply with the view of obtaining an idea of the cost. The only object he had in view in sending this advertisement from one end of the Dominion to the other, inducing contractors to make enquiries about them and to go to the expense and incur the loss of time in getting up their tenders, was simply to ascertain the probable cost without any idea of practical work. All I can say about it is this: he deceived his own friends most wonderfully, if that was his intention. Here is a statement in the Toronto Globe of the 20th September last. I do not quote it because it is in the Globe, but because it is an evidence of what was the popular impression as to his intention in advertising for tenders:

“Sir Charles Tupper's Pacific Railway Resolutions proposed to construct 125 miles of road in British Columbia during the present season. By that promise the British Columbian members were induced to vote for the Tariff, so injurious to itself and to their Province. They have been amused ever since by tales of explorations, surveys, guarantees, purchases of steel rails, and announcements that operations would soon begin. It is now late in the year, nothing has yet been done, and very little could be done before winter if the work were now begun. Had Mr. Mackenzie remained in office, a large portion of the line would now have been constructed, and access to the interior have been given. The people of British Columbia may well wonder at their folly in parting with the ‘bird in hand.’”

That was the impression the hon. gentleman made. Well, Sir, a short time afterwards it was announced that the Burrard Inlet route had been agreed upon, and that the Government were advertising for tenders for the construction of a road in accordance with that decision. And here is what the Globe said on the 27th October in reference to this question:

“Just a year ago Mr. Mackenzie, as Minister of Public Works, was making preparations for the letting of contracts to build a line from Yale to Kamloops, about 120 miles, and the work of transporting the rails from Esquimaux to the mainland was actually begun. As soon as the present Government came into power, the order for the transportation of the rails was countermanded, and the project of building the Yale Kamloops line was abandoned. * * * In other words, they are shut up to a choice between acknowledging that they have by their incompetence lost a whole year to the construction of the line, and confessing that they never meant to give it up at all, and sought only to temporise in the face of difficulty at the expense of feelings and hopes of the unfortunate Islanders.”

That was the opinion of the Toronto Globe in relation to the action of the hon. gentleman. There was then no suggestion that the road should be postponed, but a suggestion that time had been lost in not having gone on with it earlier. I have evidence still stronger than that—the evidence of the hon. member for Lambton himself—which hon. gentlemen opposite will perhaps accept. Last year the hon. member delivered a speech on the floor of this House. He had no responsibility of office upon him; he was in a position, if he had chosen to do so, to have done then what he has humiliated himself by doing on this occasion. But he did not do so. Here is the assurance that he gave to hon. gentlemen on this side:

“They will always find that gentlemen on this side will be prepared to consider all such questions from a truly national point of view. We recognise the obligation resting upon us as Canadians, and while I assert, in the most positive manner, that nothing could have been done by any Administration during our term of office that we did not do or try to do, in order to accomplish or realise those expectations which were generated by the Government of hon.

gentlemen opposite in their admission of British Columbia into the Confederacy. I say, at the same time, we endeavoured, not merely to keep the national obligations, but we ventured to a great extent our own political existence as administrators; we risked our political position for the sake of carrying out to completion, in the best way possible, the course which hon. gentlemen opposite had promised should be taken."

They are evidently not going any longer to risk their political position for the sake of carrying to completion, and in the best way possible, the obligations which hon. gentlemen opposite had so emphatically rivetted upon the Dominion. Then he gave to this country from the Opposition Benches, as he had before from the Ministerial Benches, a declaration of his policy :

"Our proposal was this : We endeavoured in the first place to obtain some modification of the terms. We despatched an agent to British Columbia, and Lord Carnarvon ultimately offered his good services in order to arrive at some understanding with that Province, and we reached the understanding that we would endeavour to build a Railway from Lake Superior to the Pacific Ocean by 1890, that we should expend a certain sum per annum in British Columbia after the surveys were completed and the line adopted. The line never was surveyed sufficiently to enable us to reach that conclusion till last year, and as soon as we had information to guide us we adopted the Burrard Inlet route and immediately advertised for tenders for the construction of that line."

That is the statement of the hon. gentleman; but I have another passage from his speech stronger than that. It will be remembered that the policy of the hon. the Minister of Railways was this : He asked this House to declare that the selection of the Burrard Inlet route was premature, to give him permission to make further and other explorations, and further to allow him to let 125 miles of railway where he might determine after these explorations were made. What did the hon. member for Lambton say to this proposition? Here is an extract from his speech, and I beg hon. members to note it well :

"I do not see how it is possible that this House can authorise the Government first to select a line, and, at the same time, when that line is not made known to Parliament, that we should authorise the Government to enter into a contract for building 125 miles of the Railway. If the Government ask for power to let out contracts on lines that have been already thoroughly surveyed and are located, I would not blame those who approved of the policy of the Government, for giving them that power, and if they ask for the power to build 125 miles on the line which I believe to be best, I will be prepared to support that proposition, but I am not prepared to support any proposition to place power in the hands of any Government to expend money in building a portion of a railway without, at least, communicating the place where that money is to be expended."

Now it comes to this, that had the hon. member for Cumberland been less anxious to select the best possible route for British Columbia, had he been willing to come down here last year and ask permission to let 125 miles of railway on the Burrard Inlet route, the hon. member for Lambton would have supported him, and, I need not say, the whole party at his back would have supported him as well. Now, Mr. Speaker, what has brought about this change? Certainly the financial position last year was not better than the financial position this year. Certainly the business outlook was not better last year than this year. Certainly the prospect in this country in relation to the filling up of the North-West was not better last year than this year. Why then was he prepared last year to give his support to the precise expenditure asked for to-day, while this year he advocates a postponement of the work. There is a reason for it. An hon. gentleman who was not here last year, has returned to public life. We have the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) again in this House. That is why this opposition is put forward. Those who have watched his political career since 1867 knows that he never brooked leadership, and that he does not brook it now. He is to-day aspiring to the leadership of his party; but I will tell him, if he will permit me to do so, that a man who does not know how honestly to follow will never successfully lead. Well, what is the result? Not satisfied with placing his party upon a new platform, not satisfied with subjecting his leader to the deeply humiliating position of turning his back upon himself, he has done more than that. Those who have watched Parliament, as I have watched it from that gallery, know that the incorporation of the North-West Territories has always received the support of the hon. member for Lambton. He has always been in favour of filling up the North-West, and never until last night has he ever uttered a single sentence of discredit against that North-West Territory. But those who have, as I have said, watched the course of events in this Parliament, will remember the almost open rupture that took place between the then hon. member for South Bruce (Mr. Blake) and the hon. member for Lambton, because the latter supported the policy of the Government in regard to bringing in this North-West Territory; and they will also remember that the then hon. member for South Bruce ultimately left the House in a pet and did not vote at all. Not satisfied, I say, with placing his leader in the humiliating position in which he has placed the hon. member for Lambton by inducing him to turn his back on his political record, he compelled him to devote two hours last evening in that triangular speech of the hon. members for West Durham, North Norfolk and Lambton, the details of which were announced in advance by that hon. gentleman, to reading extracts from reports and books calculated to discredit the country, and to prove, if the statements were true, that the then hon. member for South Bruce was right in his refusal to incorporate the North-West with the Dominion, and that the hon. member for Lambton was wrong in supporting the Government on that question. The hon. member for West Durham referred to the question of Western development, and he stated that that Western development had been most marvellous. There is one thing that will strike every hon. member in this House that according to the hon. members on the other side everything American has been marvellous and everything Canadian has been the reverse. He selected two States—Kansas and Nebraska—as illustrations of progress, and in order to prove that we had no reason to look for any such progress, he gave reasons showing the great advantages enjoyed by the Western States as compared with the Canadian North-West. The hon. gentleman dwelt strongly upon what he called the vast recruiting ground which the Western States possessed in the United States, and as an illustration of this, he pointed out that of the increase in the population of the states and territories, west of the lakes, between 1850 and 1860, 81 per cent. was native and 19 per cent. was foreign; and that between 1860 and 1870, the proportions were 79 per cent. native and 21 per cent.

foreign. Then he went on to show that there was no possibility of our copying that wonderful development in our North-West; that we had no such native recruiting ground as the Western States. It will be perceived that while the hon. gentleman is pleased to build up a Chinese wall as against emigrants coming into this country, he pulls it down when Canadians are to go into that country. Mention has been made two or three times of the large number of Canadians going into the United States. There is no doubt that such an emigration has been going on. But it is worth while to point out that by the Census of 1870, it appears that of the population of the United States there were 1.26 per cent. of the whole population Canadians, and that in British North America 1.85 per cent. was of American birth. That rather pulls down the Chinese wall on both sides, and shows that the people do come and go from and to both sides. But after proving to his own satisfaction that we could get comparatively no population into our North-West, the hon. member for West Durham went on to ask of what value the population going there will be to the older Provinces; and referring to the suggestion that the manufacturers of the east will find a market in the west, the hon. gentleman asked, with one of his most cynical sneers, whether the National Policy was to have no effect there. Well, Sir, it is well known that in the United States, where Protection prevails in the west as well as the east, western development has resulted in home markets for eastern manufacturers. So much is this the case, that the group of manufacturing States has increased in population in an equal ratio with the whole United States. I think it will be admitted by everyone who knows anything of the progress of emigration, notwithstanding the suggestions of the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) that emigration has always gone on lines of latitude, that the tendency in the United States is for the emigrant to go into new territory. Places that were the centres of emigration only ten years ago are now the recruiting ground for emigrants going still further westward; and as we have, at this moment, in our North-West, the newest regions—almost the only places remaining on the North American continent entirely new—we shall have the same process or movement from east to west, into our territory, in the future, in addition to the large emigration from the Old World. Then the hon. member for West Durham told us, as another reason why we could not hope for much emigration to that country, that the people of Ireland were not likely to come into Canada; and we had an appeal to Irish sympathies as a means of signalling, perhaps, the advent of Irish leadership, and the downfall of Scotch ascendancy in the Liberal party. If he had been disposed to deal fairly with his own country, he might have referred to the fact that there is no part of the North American continent where the Irish race occupies a better position than in Canada. What is the fact in the United States to-day? The governing party are bitterly opposed to the Irish race; and the most effective cartoons of the great Republican caricaturist Nast, are those in which he appeals to Irish antipathies among native Americans. Do we find anything of that kind here? On no other part of this continent have the national and religious feelings of the Irish Roman Catholics been recognised as in Canada. Even in the Act for opening up our new territory, there is a constitutional provision made for supplying the Irish Catholics with schools in accordance with their own religious convictions. The hon. gentleman might, when making that appeal to Irish sympathies, and endeavouring to secure a new alliance, with a view to the building up of his party, have said this much in relation to the Irish race in Canada. Nowhere, whether in politics, commerce, or the professions, has the Irish race achieved greater renown or a more preeminent position than in the British North American Provinces. But I am glad he admits that the railways in the United States have been the secret of their development. There is no doubt of it. In the Republic in 1860, only eighteen years ago, there were only 36,635 miles of railway; in 1878 there were 81,841; the average mileage built every year for the last eighteen years was 2,845, equal to the entire length of the Canadian Pacific Railway. Though he admits that it is to those railways is due the rapid peopling of the American North-West, giving an example of a movement of population and of settlement of a scale never before seen, yet he seeks to place his party on the platform of building no more railways in Canada. The hon. member for North Norfolk, referring last night to the impossibility—for that seems to be the theme on the opposite side—of building up our North-West country at all, alluded to the small progress made in the Western States from 1800 to 1830. When he had to go back that far he was hard pressed for an argument. At that time it is quite true the Western States were not peopled at all. Their population was, I think, about 760,000, the whole population of the country being 12,866,020. But since, and in exact proportion to railway development, the Western States have been developed. Up to that time there was scarcely any emigration from the Old World to the United States. It is rather a curious fact that from 1815 to 1840, the emigration from the British Isles to the British North American Provinces, actually exceeded the whole emigration from them to the United States by 82,000. Down to 1847, the year of the Irish famine, and the terrible ship fever, the emigration from the British Isles to Canada was 746,163, and to the United States, 780,048, the difference being only about 24,000 in favour of the United States. But since that year emigration has been on a large scale to the United States, in consequence of those very western territories, attracting the people from the Eastern States, who left room for the people from the Old World. By the Census Returns, while 645,608 people came from the United Kingdom to Canada, from 1847 to 1870, 3,692,624 went to the United States. We have in our Mother Land an important recruiting ground for emigrants to this country. In spite of the enormous emigration from the Mother Country, the population still increases. From 1860 to 1870 its emigrants to all parts, including Australia, Canada, and the United States reached 1,571,729, despite which its increase of population was over two and a half millions. That shows how important a recruiting ground the British Isles furnish for this Dominion. We are told we are not going to get much money from our lands in the North-West. The hon.

member for West Durham stated that 11,770,000 acres were sold in the United States from 1860 to 1869, and from 1869 to 1879, 47,170,000 acres.

MR. BLAKE: Not sold, but granted and sold to settlers.

MR. WHITE: I understand—located, or taken up. But he did not refer to the railway lands disposed of.

MR. BLAKE: I mentioned that that number did not include the railway lands.

MR. WHITE: I so understood you. But what do we find? That the United States Government granted to its railway companies 192,308,311 acres, and that the companies sold to June 30th, 1879, 43,698,068 acres. Thirteen railway companies in the United States sold in 1877, 1,006,266 acres, and in 1878, 2,570,744. Sixteen companies sold their lands at an average of $5.70 an acre. So there is proof that the railway companies in the United States have succeeded in outdoing the Government, and that people have actually gone west and paid large prices for railway lands, when they could have got homesteads and preemptions for little or nothing, showing the advantages and good results that have flown from a perfectly organised system in inducing these companies to cooperate in the settlement of those lands. The total receipts from the sale of lands in the United States for this century are $204,447,473. Those figures show that the lands of that country have been yearly growing in attractiveness; that there has been a greater demand, a larger number of sales, and more competition for the land year by year. We may fairly assume, then, in connection with our North-West, the settlement of a large population in it at no distant day. Another reason urged by the hon. member for West Durham why we could not hope for success in selling the North West, was that we have a large debt in Canada. We have. I very much regret it is so large. But we are incurring obligations, perhaps in the hour of our greatest weakness, that will suffice for years. We are building up large enterprises, such as those connected with the Canals; deepening our rivers, erecting lighthouses on our coasts, in the interest of that great commerce that must come to the country in the future. These expenditures make additions to our debt.

But those improvements go on adding, not by way of direct return—which the hon. gentleman seems to think is the only possible return a nation can have for its expenditures—but in the development of our industries, of our trade and commerce, and in the promotion of that prosperity which is very much more valuable than any question of so many dollars as tolls from those works. Take the Welland Canal; it does not yield us a great deal in direct returns. And yet who is there in the country who would oppose the expenditure on its improvement? Who would even dream of looking for a return from that work from the tolls on the vessels passing through it? It is simply a means of bringing the largest vessels from the western lakes into Lake Ontario, to enable Canada to compete with the United States for the shipment of grain to Europe. Nothing could be more unfair than to refer to the debts for such Public Works as if they had to be repaid from year to year. They are sources of development which the people have voluntarily undertaken in view of the great advantages to result from them. The hon. gentleman should have dealt honestly with our debt, which he told us had increased from $77,706,000 net debt in 1871, to $147,485,070 in 1879, or about 89 per cent.; and he went on to compare that increase with the increase in European States, whose large debts have been incurred, not for the purpose of development, but for destructive objects and great armaments. But with all this great increase, it will be admitted that the measure of the burden of the debt is the annual interest paid upon it. Now, what is the fact? That while the net debt has increased about 89 per cent., the actual interest on the debt has increased rather under 40 per cent.

MR. BLAKE: I stated that.

MR. WHITE: Yes; but the hon. gentleman so emphasised his statement as to cause the fact to be overlooked. That is the real position of affairs as to the increase of debt upon which the hon. gentleman dwelt. There was no object, I think, speaking in the interest of his own country, in throwing into the face of those who might desire to take advantage of the fact, that a large increase has taken place; no object in giving an opportunity to those who are opposed to Canada, and who are watching this debate, ready to use the expressions of the hon. gentleman to the detriment of this country in England and Europe generally; no necessity to refer to an increase of the debt in a way to cause an erroneous impression in regard to it. In that increase about $14,000,000 are debts of the Provinces which have been assumed by the Dominion; that is no real increase but a transference of debt.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT: That is a mistake.

MR. WHITE: Does the hon. gentleman deny that view?

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT: Certainly.

MR. WHITE: I think I am right; and I do not think the hon. member for West Durham will venture to say that the assumption by the Dominion of the debts which had to be paid by the Provinces, is any addition to the burdens of the people; it is a mere transference of the obligation from the Provinces to the Dominion, the taxes coming from the same people all the while. Then the hon. gentleman referred to the annual expenditure in Canada, which was, if I remember aright, $6.69 per head, while in the United States it was $6.13 per head. Well, what is the fact with regard to our expenditure? It is well that our condition, as compared with the United States, should be understood when the whole policy of hon. gentlemen opposite is to show how much more desirable a country from every standpoint is the United States to settle in than Canada. The hon. gentleman referred to the large decrease of debt which is taking place there, and happily taking place, because it is well that all free governing communities should be as lightly taxed as possible. But the hon. gentleman in taking that ground, ought to have pointed out that the expenditures of the Dominion of Canada practically include the expenditures of the Provinces, and that there is one item, the subsidies to the Provinces, which, it seems to me, ought always to be considered in presenting the expenditures of the Dominion of Canada. What are the state debts in the United States? What are the debts outside altogether of the debts of the Federal Government? The last official Census of 1870 shows that there were state debts, county, town and city debts, independent altogether of the Federal debt, amounting to $868,676,758. The amount raised by direct taxation in the United States in connection with the state, county, town and city debts, amounted to no less than $280,591,521. In 1860 those direct taxes, outside the Federal taxes altogether, outside the Revenues of the Federal Government, amounted to $94,186,746 for that year, and in 1870 they had increased to $280,591,521, or an increase during that period of $196,404,775. The hon. gentleman referred to another point. He says: Look at the enormous taxes involved in the Customs' duties. Under the Customs' Tariff we have the large sum of 19.62 per cent. of everything that is imported into the country going into the Dominion Treasury, and he urged that, I presume, as a reason why people should go to the United States rather than come to Canada. Well, he might also have stated that in the United States, of the total imports, free and dutiable, no less than 29.44 per cent. goes into the Federal Treasury. Or if he came to dutiable goods alone he might have pointed out that, while in Canada it is somewhere about 24 per cent., in the United States it is 45.28 per cent. of everything that is imported that goes into the Federal Treasury. That is a specimen of the kind of argument with which this House has been treated, in order to prove that this country is hardly a fit country to live in, that we have neither present nor future to hope for, and that all sensible men should feel that the proper place to go to, if they want to change their homes at all, is into the United States and not into Canada. And now, Sir, I come, for a moment, to the question of British Columbia itself. It seems to me that in relation to British Columbia there is a determination from one end of the country to the other to belittle that Province. We have heard about the 12,000 people there; we have heard about the enormous injustice done to this country by the representation given to those 12,000 people; we have heard about British Columbia being a source of large expenditure and as practically returning nothing to the Treasury; we have heard of it as a country utterly useless; we have heard hon. gentlemen say, wish a flippancy which I am sure every one must regret when you come to remember the position they occupy, that if it is a question between building this Railway and letting British Columbia go, they say: Let her go—they almost say, let her go whether the Railway is built or not. What are the facts with regard to this Province? I do not repeat the remarkable figures given by the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. DeCosmos), in the speech he has addressed to this House. He gave us figures which, I think, will have a very considerable influence in educating the public sentiment in this country in relation to British Columbia. What was the revenue, last year, of that Province, which we are asked to regard as being utterly valueless, which has not yet commenced to be developed, but which, I think, will be found to contain natural riches—I was going to say hidden riches—which, in the near future, will make it, if not the richest, one of the richest Provinces of this Dominion? The revenues last year, from Customs, Seizures, Excise, Mariners' Fees, Stamps, etc., amounted to $572,955.29. Sir, what was the Expenditure? I do not admit that the Expenditure on surveys can fairly be chargeable to British Columbia. British Columbians would have been glad, I have no doubt, if the Dominion of Canada had consented to begin the road without a survey at all. The expenditure for surveys in British Columbia have been made for the exclusive benefit of Canada as a whole. They have been made with the object of finding the cheapest and best route for the Railway with a view to future saving and future advantage, and therefore they are in no way chargeable to that Province solely. But taking the expenditures on Subsidy, Collection of Customs, Excise, Lighthouses, Coast Surveys, Fisheries, Salaries of Lieutenant Governor and Receiver-General, Penitentiary, Hospital, Indians, Administration of Justice, Public Works, Post-office,—taking all these, we find the expenditures were $462,172, so that there was an annual balance in favour of the Dominion last year of $110,782. That was the position of British Columbia in connection with the Dominion of Canada.

MR. BLAKE: Have you included the interest on the debt and the subsidy?

MR. WHITE: I have included the subsidy only.

MR. BLAKE: And the interest on their share of the debt?

MR. WHITE: How much is it? Will the hon. ex-Finance Minister kindly say how much it was?

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT: According to the statement of the Deputy Finance Minister it was $97,000.

MR. WHITE: Then we have still a balance in favour of the Dominion. But what I want to point out is this: that the Revenues have been progressing in that Province. In 1874, the revenue from Customs, which I take as a fair test, not having had time to examine the others in detail, was $306,436; in 1875, $337,451; in 1876, $490,226; in 1877, $405,650; in 1878, $426,607; in 1879, $517,261, showing a steady progress every year, with the exception of 1876, when the revenues increased by nearly $90,000, by some means which I have not been able to learn. With the exception of that year there has been a steady progress from $306,436 in 1874 to $517,261 in 1879. Then there is another point which I think indicates that the people of British Columbia are somewhat progressive. There is no better test of the progress of a people than the post-office. I find that the collections in the post-office of British Columbia amounted last year to $18,438, while in Prince Edward Island, with its one hundred thousand inhabitants, a Province which we all admire, the garden Province of the Dominion, the receipts were $20,840, or a difference of only about $2,400 between British Columbia with its 12,000 inhabitants and Prince Edward Island. This indicates an activity on the part of the people of British Columbia, an enterprise and intelligence which augur well for the future of that Province. Sir, why should we not expect that this piece of Railway in British Columbia will return something to this Dominion in the form of regular tolls, and by the development of the Province itself? If anyone will take the trouble to look over the Library, they will find that in 1860, 1861 and 1862, almost everybody seemed to be engaged in writing books about British Columbia, showing that that Province contains within itself sources of wealth which are certainly equal to those which are to be found in any other part of the Dominion. There is nothing more unfortunate than the disposition to measure all national wealth by the grain-producing power of the country. We have our prairies where wheat can be raised; we have in Nova Scotia our magnificent mines of coal and iron, which are going to make that Province very wealthy in the future; we have in New Brunswick forests of timber and the shipbuilding industry which are the distinctive features of that Province; and we have in British Columbia great resources of riches, and particularly of coal, iron and other minerals, which have always been the basis of powerful states, and which, I venture to believe, will make British Columbia one of the wealthiest Provinces in this Dominion. Apart altogether, therefore, from the considerations of national honour, which seem to me to be strong, and which have been presented with so much force by hon. gentlemen opposite when they occupied a position on this side of the House, that they cannot now escape from them. I say that on mere grounds of material development and national well-being, we ought to do something towards the development of that Province. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) talked last night of an expenditure of $30,000,000 in British Columbia. There is no such expenditure demanded from the House at this time. As I understand the policy the Government has announced, it is this: Hon. gentlemen opposite admit that we must complete the portion of the road we have already under contract from Thunder Bay to Red River, and the 200 miles west of Red River. I understand the policy of the Government is to build the 125 miles of Railway which open up the best section of British Columbia, and which gives entrance to a great length of navigation, and will open up such portions of that Province as are capable of development and improvement; and that the work of the Pacific Railway shall go on in accordance with the wants of settlement in the prairie regions. There is no necessity in British Columbia for the continuance of that road to the Rocky Mountains until the Railway across the plains is ready to meet it. But as the road goes on over the plains in advance of settlement, the intermediate country will become filled with people, and when we get to that point where we shall be receiving advantages, which I venture to believe will be considerable, then the question of the connection of the line on the prairies with the line which is now proposed to be constructed, will become an important question for this Dominion to decide. That does not become an important question at present, and it is not right, therefore, for the hon. member for North Norfolk to talk of an expenditure of $30,000,000 in connection with British Columbia. I venture to believe that if the policy which is announced to us here is fairly carried out, if the policy is determined upon to build these Railways with the least possible expenditure of money consistent with the safe working of the Railway, if everything is done that can be done to put people into these western prairies, if we devote ourselves to the development of these enormous sources of wealth which are to be found in British Columbia itself, I think we may fairly look forward as a result of that policy, to such resources in the future as will enable us to carry on to completion the great works which we have undertaken. Hon. gentlemen opposite have chosen a different course; they have determined to cry halt; their disposition is to ignore altogether the obligations which they have entered into; but I mistake the people of this country if any party can hope to build up success upon national repudiation and national dishonour.

MR. ANGLIN: If there is any part of the policy of the hon. gentlemen opposite which has more than another proved a failure, if there is any part of their policy which, more than another, has proved injurious to this whole country, it is their policy with respect to the great North-West. Years ago, when the time seemed to have arrived for receiving the North-West Territories into this Dominion, they then, going to England, in my opinion, rather as the agents of the Colonial Office than as Ministers of this Dominion, made a bargain respecting that country into which they never should have entered. The responsibilities for opening up and settling that country then rested entirely upon the Imperial Government. The people of Canada were willing to accept the charge of that territory, but they had a right to expect that the Imperial Government would hand it over to them free of any embarrassment. The British Government chose to sustain the claims of the Hudson's Bay Company to the sovereignty of that whole region, and to compensation for the rights and privileges which it was assumed that they possessed. Our Government, instead of demanding, as I believe they should have done, that the Imperial Government should transfer the territory to them free of encumbrance and contribute largely to the cost of opening up and settling that territory, agreed to pay the Company $1,500,000, leaving them, moreover, the right to select 5 per cent. of the land, where they please, in each section set off for settlement. This is entirely ignored by hon. gentlemen on the other side who have agreed as if all the proceeds of all the land in the North-West must go into the Treasury, whereas 20 per cent. of the most valuable of these lands, and the choicest, are the property of the Hudson's Bay Company. Well, having blundered so seriously in the acquisition of that territory, they blunder still more seriously in their legislation with regard to it. They involve this country in a war with the people of that region, which fortunately did not lead to much bloodshed, though much heart-burning and ill-feeling resulted and lasted for some years after. Even then their blundering did not cease. It was resolved to annex British Columbia to this Dominion. We were told that, unless we made terms with British Columbia, the 10,000 or 12,000 people of that Province would annex themselves and their territory to the United States. Hon. gentlemen spoke as wildly and as unreasonably on that matter as they do with regard to the subject now under consideration. Hon. gentlemen again showed themselves very desirous of carrying out the policy and wishes of the Colonial Secretary for the time being. British Columbia, prompted no doubt by the Colonial Office to seek admission into the Union, came forward with certain demands. The hon. gentlemen not only consented to that demand, but pledged the country to this enormous undertaking to commencing the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway within two years, and completing it within ten years from the time of the admission of British Columbia into the Union. Now, I quite agree with the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. DeCosmos) that it was not within the competence of this Parliament, after having deliberately adopted that address, to alter very materially the terms of the agreement by its own action, and, therefore, although that cannot bind us as to anything absolutely impossible, or anything that might seem ruinous to this country, nevertheless, I have always felt that this Dominion was bound to carry out the terms of that arrangement, strictly in the letter, and in the spirit, were that possible. But hon. gentlemen on the other other side of the House, who had entered into this extraordinary agreement, which any man of common sense would have known it would be impossible to carry out, deliberately proposed and passed a Resolution declaring that the burden of the country and the rate of taxation must not be increased in carrying out that agreement. They next proposed to get the road built through a company, offering them a bonus of $30,000,000 in money and 50,000,000 acres of land. This plan failed months before the Government of hon. gentlemen opposite fell, and they never prepared another. We opposed the Union with British Columbia, on the terms submitted to Parliament, as strongly and as persistently as we could, because these terms were unreasonable. We were not opposed to the Union with British Columbia on unreasonable terms. We opposed their having six members in this House to represent a number of white people not equal in number to any one of the constituencies of the hon. gentlemen who are sitting around me. We were opposed to having three members representing them in the Senate while their population was so small. We were opposed to the obligation that the road should be commenced within two years and completed within ten years, as we felt that to do this would tax the resources of the whole British Empire. We opposed it because, as we stated then, and as we say now, the Terms were of unreasonable and impossible fulfilment, but we did not oppose it because we were opposed to the amalgamation of the Provinces of British North America into the whole, call it Dominion or nation. Even those of us who proposed the original scheme of Confederation, did not oppose the carrying out of the grand scheme of uniting British North America to which we then found ourselves committed. But we were opposed to a scheme which we believed then to be perfectly wild and impossible, and which everyone now believes to be what we then described it. We were opposed also to the mode in which the Government of that day proposed that the obligations incurred should be fulfilled, because many of us felt that if that Company, created by the Government of that day, commenced actual operations, $30,000,000 and 50,000,000 acres of land would not be all that we would be compelled to contribute towards that work. We know what was revealed in the famous correspondence that was submitted to this Parliament and the country. We know that the hon. gentleman, who was at the head of that Company, boasted in that correspondence that he had a number of gentlemen in this House under his control, who were bound to vote as he pleased; and recent events have shown that hon. gentlemen on the other side were willing to play into the hands of Sir Hugh Allan and his associates. Although the Act of Parliament required that $1,000,000 should be deposited as security for carrying on the work—and it was stated that the $1,000,000 was deposited—the deposit we have known was the merest sham. Accepted cheques were given by some banks on the express stipulation that the payment of the money they were supposed to represent, should never be demanded. Well, that whole speculation broke down. Sir Hugh Allan went home and tried to put bonds for $180,000,000 in the money market, but entirely failed. The capitalists in Europe could not see sufficient security for the vast sum required for this gigantic undertaking. They looked for something substantial, and found nothing but the $30,000,000. They did not attach the value, attached by hon. gentlemen opposite, to the 50,000,000 acres of land. Hon. gentlemen opposite were very fond of charging hon. gentlemen on this side with having caused the entire failure of Sir Hugh Allan's negotiations in England; but that charge is unfounded. What hon. gentlemen would have done had they continued in power, we can only conjecture. They have never ventured to say what they would have done on the failure of their grand scheme. They pretend, indeed, now, to say that the country was never bound to do more than they actually did towards carrying out the engagement to build that great work; and they allege that the Government of the hon. member for Lambton went further than they should have gone, and imposed upon the country obligations which they never would have imposed. The actual obligation, however, upon this country is contained in the Royal Proclamation, and incorporated in our Constitution. It is the undertaking to commence the road within two years of the admission of British Columbia, and to complete it within ten years from that date. The hon. member for Cardwell laboured successfully, in his very elaborate speech, to show that the hon. member for Lambton felt the great weight of the obligations which rested upon him when his predecessors went out of office and he formed a Government, and that he went earnestly to work to fulfil those obligations in their entirety. But British Columbia was not satisfied. British Columbia was discontented even before hon. gentlemen opposite left office. They insisted upon the letters of the bond. Nothing would satisfy them but the pouring of the largest measure of the public money of Canada into their coffers. The hon. member for Lambton sent out a staff of surveyors to explore the country, and he was accused, over and over again, with wasting the public money on surveys. It was important that the best line should be discovered and adopted. It is not necessary at this time to say whether any money was or was not wasted on those surveys. The hon. gentleman did exactly what it was his duty to do, but British Columbia was not satisfied. An appeal was taken to the Colonial Office. That appeal was not wholly improper. The Imperial authorities were, to some extent, parties to the arrangement made between that Province and the Dominion, and might have had a right to do something towards enforcing the fulfilment of the Terms of that agreement. But the Government, led by the hon. member for Lambton, did not, as has been alleged, join in that appeal or consent to accept the arbitration of Lord Carnarvon, or to be bound by any decision he might give, nor when he made suggestions, did they bind themselves in any way to carry out those suggestions. They gave to those suggestions the weight to which they were entitled; but they prudently and properly declared that the Resolutions and the Acts of Parliament, which provided that the rate of taxation must not be increased, would be duly observed. The Minutes of Council states the whole case plainly. Now that, Sir, was what they assented to in these suggestions of Lord Carnarvon. They never did assent, or agree in any way, that Lord Carnarvon should have the right to direct what Canada and the Government of Canada should do, but they were willing to leave it to him as one of Her Majesty's Ministers (Secretary of State), as a man of high character, to say whether they had or had not done all that was incumbent upon them to do under the circumstances. The negotiations proceeded, and Lord Carnarvon undertook to state what he believed Canada ought to do, and those Terms, as they have been called, have been much commented on. Hon. gentlemen opposite stated, over and over again, that in accepting those Terms, the Liberal Government laid new obligations on Canada; and the hon. Minister of Railways in particular spoke as if Canada, up to that time, never was bound to do anything, but that this was absolutely the first time any positive obligation was laid upon the country, although, in reality, this was a modification of the Terms of Union entirely in favour of Canada, giving us nineteen years to do part of the work, the whole of which hon. gentlemen intended to complete in ten years—a vast modification of the Terms of Union. But even that modification the Government of the day did not absolutely accept; they did not absolutely bind Canada to carry out these conditions. It is well that the words used in the Minutes of Council, respecting those Carnarvon Terms, should be again put on record, and be known and understood by the people of this whole Dominion, whom hon. gentlemen opposite have so persistently endeavoured to mislead as to the character of these Terms. The Resolution was the original Resolution, that this road should be built, but in such a way as not to add to the burdens of the people of Canada. The enactment there referred to is plainly the Act introduced by the hon. member for Lambton, providing for the construction of the road, and making that Resolution part of an Act of Parliament. So they plainly indicated in their answer to Lord Carnarvon, in this Minute of Council, that they would only carry out his suggestions so far as it could be done without violating any Resolution or enactment of Parliament relating to an increase of taxation. Here we find the whole matter put upon an intelligible and satisfactory footing; and then, Sir, to follow the history of this matter, which has been so misunderstood, let us see what followed. The hon. member for Lambton, in the following Session of Parliament, introduced a Bill to give effect to one portion of the suggestions—I will not call them terms at all, as that is a word not applicable to the Carnarvon suggestions—to introduce a Bill authorising the Government to construct a Railway from Nanaimo to Esquimalt. Hon. gentlemen talked of that as if it was an addition to the original undertaking, and spoke of all the mischief thus wrought by the hon. member for Lambton and his colleagues. The hon. the Minister of Railways asserted that they had by this means added four millions of money to the cost of the Pacific Railway, as projected by himself and colleagues. Why, as the hon. gentleman has been already reminded, one of the very first things done by hon. gentlemen opposite after the Union, was to pass a Minute in Council fixing Esquimalt as the Pacific terminus of the Railway. The hon. the Minister of Public Works in the previous Conservative Government (Mr. Langevin), visited the Western Province and was, no doubt, heartily received by the people of Vancouver Island. He came back and it was upon his report, I believe, that the Order in Council was passed, making Esquimalt the terminus of the Railway. So that, even if this Railway had been gone on with by the late Government, they would only have been carrying out the expressed intention of hon. gentlemen opposite, of carrying out what was a pledge made by them to the people of Vancouver Island, and there would have been no increase to the cost of building the Pacific Railway as originally intended by those hon. gentlemen. Further, had their own grand original idea been carried out, it would have been necessary to bridge the Straits, at an expense estimated by Mr. Fleming, of some 20,000,000, in order merely to get down from the head of Bute Inlet to the coast, and thence cross to Vancouver Island, one of the most stupendous works ever conceived in the history of railways; and yet this hon. gentleman, the hon. the Minister of Railways, who really committed himself to that extravagant project, who really was one of the Council that deliberately resolved that it should be done, had the coolness to charge the hon. member for Lambton with having added $4,000,000 unnecessarily and unprofitably to the cost of the Railway on the side of the Pacific. We know that the Bill passed through this House; we know that the majority of the members of this House, although many did not approve of the Carnarvon suggestions, passed that Bill. It went to another House, and there it was defeated; and now the hon. member for Lambton is charged with having, somehow or other, caused the defeat of that measure, at all events of being responsible for its defeat. The hon. the Minister of Public Works, talking on that point some evenings ago, calmly asserted that if the hon. member for Lambton had chosen to exert his influence in the other House, that Bill might have passed, and therefore he was responsible for the failure, and guilty of a breach of good faith in this matter. All the gentlemen in the other House who voted against that measure were, with two or three exceptions, then, as the survivors of them are to-day, in thorough and entire sympathy with hon. gentlemen opposite. We know, from the history of that House, that the majority of its members sympathise with hon. gentlemen opposite, and rarely do anything to run counter to their wishes, thwart their projects, or cause them any embarrassment. Had hon. gentlemen opposite chosen that the Bill should pass it would have passed, but Liberals, either of this House or of that are not made of such metal as hon. gentlemen opposite hammer into any shape they please. We generally think and judge for ourselves. We are willing, sometimes, to give up our opinions because of expediency, or because the general interests of the country seem to require that we should consent to measures which we regard as somewhat questionable in their character; but to do that which they believe to be absolutely wrong, and in violation of principle, is what Liberals are seldom found capable of; and, therefore, it is that we are taunted so often by hon. gentlemen opposite, and their admirers throughout the country, with that want of unity and compactness which distinguish those who prefer party to principle.

MR. PLUMB: Hear, hear.

MR. ANGLIN: I hear the cheer of the hon. member for Niagara. It would be unparliamentary to say that he sometimes votes against his convictions, although sometimes it appears to me he votes very strangely. Well, Sir, the Bill was defeated, and, soon after, the hon. member for West Durham joined the Government, and that was held to be another proof that there was some deception with regard to the defeat of that Bill in the Senate. The hon. member for Lambton, no doubt, found out that the country at large did not quite approve of the Carnarvon suggestions, that his friends on the other side were not willing to cooperate with him in carrying out these suggestions, and, no doubt, he felt relieved by the action of Parliament which released him from that particular part, of what has been called an obligation; but when the hon. member for West Durham joined the Government a proposal, followed, almost immediately, that the 10,000 or 15,000 people in British Columbia should be paid $750,000 by the Dominion of Canada as compensation, not merely for the disappointment they had experienced in not getting this Railway built, but for the disappointment they would have to experience throughout, because the Terms originally entered into with them by this Parliament, led by hon. gentlemen opposite, were terms which could not be carried out to the letter, and they had some reason to complain they had been deceived. It was fair, perhaps, that Canada which, with eyes open, entered into the bargain, should compensate the weaker power for the violation of the Terms of agreement even though these terms were impossible of fulfilment. British Columbia, fortunately for the Dominion, refused that offer, and I hope it will be a long time before such another offer will be made. I was certainly much surprised that such an offer was made. Following up the history of this undertaking, we find that the hon. member for Lambton, and his colleagues, proceeded with the work with a degree of rapidity which was the best possible proof of their entire earnestness. We find them going to work between Lake Superior and Red River as rapidly as was possible, with due regard to the public interest. To-day they are charged with having proceeded too rapidly with that work, with having made contracts in that district without having had a single survey made, and without having had any idea of the character and extent of the work to be done. The hon. the Minister of Railways, whose intellectual power is so great, as compared with that of the pigmies who preceded him, boasted that he had pursued a very different course, that he would not let a single mile of the road until it had been thoroughly surveyed and the most careful calculations had been made, and until he had reduced the cost to an almost absolute certainty, binding himself, in every instance, by a declaration of what the maximum quantities should be—a declaration which, although so grandiloquent, means, under the circumstances, nothing at all. The hon. member for West Durham, referring to this particular branch of the subject some evenings ago, cruelly, if not maliciously, quoted from these very contracts of which the hon. Minister so boasted. What did he quote? He quoted a little foot-note in this contract, which stated that, in some cases, the quantities were roughly approximate, and in others were absolutely conjectural. Such is the accurate information, the careful survey, the precise knowledge of which the hon. Minister boasted, and which resulted in roughly-approximated estimates and merely conjectural quantities. Well, it was not an unusual occurrence for the hon. the Minister of Railways to wake up, after such boastings, to the consciousness of the fact that their real value had been discovered. We all know that he is apt to indulge in superlatives, and that he loves to describe everything he performs as done in the best possible way, and all that has been done, by his opponents, is of the worst possible character. He charged the late hon. Minister of Public Works with gross neglect in the letting of those contracts. We know that the estimates for one of the sections—Section 15—have been greatly exceeded by the amount of work done. The hon. member for Niagara devoted a whole hour to prove that the excess resulted in a very great waste of money, and that, to a very great extent, it was attributable to the very gross neglect of the hon. member for Lambton, to his extraordinary want of capacity, or to his want of knowledge of what was being done out there. Let me tell the hon. member that, although he was a member of the Committee appointed to enquire into this matter, and took a very active part in the proceedings, he proved himself, last evening, to be ignorant on a very material point, a point so material that his blunder spoils the whole of his argument. He alleged, last evening, that the excessive expenditure, up to the time when the investigation was held last Session, was caused by the substitution of embankments for trestle-work, whereas the evidence before the Committee shows that it was nothing of the kind. No embankments had been so substituted.

MR. PLUMB: Let the hon. gentleman read the Report.

MR. ANGLIN: I have read the Report of both Houses, and have heard some of the witnesses. The engineer in charge of the work—Mr. Rowan—stated that he had not, up to that date, made any such change; that he recommended a change; that Mr. Fleming approved of the change, and, perhaps, that the Prime Minister himself expressed his approval of it, but that he never received any instructions on that point, and that he did not, as he ought not, make the change at all. I think he stated also before the Committee of this House, or the other House, that the time had come when further delay should not be permitted, and he ought to have positive instructions.

MR. PLUMB: I would like the hon. gentleman to show this in the Report.

MR. ANGLIN: I believe the

hon. gentlemen opposite received their information, in addition, from Mr. Marcus Smith, the engineer. Mr. Marcus Smith was sent out there by the late Government to enquire into the cause of the excessive expenditure. He examined the whole place. He saw Mr. Rowan, and he relates, in his evidence before the Committee, what Mr. Rowan told him, with regard to this trestle-work. He stated, also, that the increase was caused by the substitution of embankments for trestle-work, but it was found afterwards that he was entirely mistaken; that, although he was sent there to make enquiry as to the extraordinary causes of expenditure, he came back ignorant of what he should have known. He told some of the gentlemen opposite that he had ascertained that this substitution of embankments for trestle-work was the cause of the additional expenditure up there, but Mr. Rowan, when he was summoned before the Committee, contradicted that, stating that up to that time no embankment had been substituted for trestle-work. The result was that the majority of the Committee of the Senate, mostly composed of hon. gentlemen in entire sympathy with the present Government, condemned Mr. Marcus Smith very emphatically for his conduct. While this mode of building this particular portion of the road is of very great importance, while the manner of letting contracts is of great importance, they are not of such immediate importance as the question raised by the amendment which now calls for our attention. But as charges have been made against hon. gentlemen on this side, not only against the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie), but against his supporters, of having blundered egregiously while endeavouring to carry out this great undertaking, let me briefly refer to this extraordinary charge as made by the hon. the Minister of Railways. He said that in these sections, between Lake Superior and Red River, the surveys made under the Liberal Government were little more than explorations, and that the quantities of work stated, when the contracts were let, were only guess work: that the hon. member for Lambton had no such grand idea as his own of maximum quantities. I have here the Sessional Papers, and I find the specifications for these particular sections, covering several pages.

MR. ANGLIN.

These are the official papers, signed by Mr. Sandford Fleming, who had been in the service of hon. gentlemen opposite for years, and whom the hon. member for Lambton had no right to distrust. He received, from that gentleman, what he had a right to believe a carefully prepared and close approximate estimate of quantities. This was signed by Mr. Fleming, and he, the hon. member for Lambton, was bound to receive it and act upon it, unless he had reason to believe that that engineer was deceiving him, and that he would be justified in calling in some one else to revise what had been done. Leaving No. 14, we come to 15, and here Mr. Fleming says—

MR. PLUMB: Mr. Fleming was not in the country at the time.

MR. ANGLIN: This is signed by him as Chief Engineer. I want the most thorough investigation, and would like to hear every objection the hon. gentleman has to make, in order that all such objections may be dealt with at once.

MR. PLUMB: Section 15 was let in October, 1876, in Mr. Fleming's absence, and a communication was sent to that effect by Mr. Marcus Smith.

MR. ANGLIN: I am not aware that what the hon. member for Niagara says is not the case, but that is not very material. Mr. Marcus Smith is, no doubt, a man of ability; but any one who was a member of that Committee, knows that he is exceedingly fond of finding fault.

MR. PLUMB: I only say he was absent.

It being Six o'clock the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

MR. ANGLIN: I was endeavouring to show how utterly without foundation are some of the charges respecting the mode of letting the Railway sections between Lake Superior and Red River, which have been made by hon. gentlemen opposite. I showed, with regard to Sections 14 and 15, about the management of which the greatest number of complaints were made, that there was a bill of quantities in minute detail. It has been said that No. 15 was let without sufficient preparatory surveys, and without what, at that time, seemed to be a reasonable amount of precaution. The hon. member for Niagara (Mr. Plumb) admitted that he did not assert, or, I think, believe, that money had been wasted on those sections.

MR. PLUMB: I did not say so. I said I believed; I did not assert. There is a great deal of difference, as the hon. gentleman knows, between an assertion and a belief.

MR. ANGLIN: I admit that; and I am aware, further, that between the assertions and beliefs of the hon. gentleman, there is a remarkable distinction to be drawn, when attacking hon. gentlemen on this side.

MR. PLUMB: They are always based upon belief.

MR. ANGLIN: I am aware that hon. gentlemen opposite are able to build a very large structure on a very small basis. They have a knack of inverting the pyramid. They can weave extraordinary fictions founded on fact.

MR. PLUMB: I recognise the voice of Jacob, but the hands are Esau's.

MR. ANGLIN: Well, Sir, what I am endeavouring to show is that the charges of mal-administration, of incapacity and so on, with regard to this particular section, are unfounded. The bill of quantities was as minute as is any such bill with relation to any section let by the Public Works Department. The estimates were more than roughly approximate estimates. It was stated that there were 600,000 cubic yards of solid rock, 40,000 cubic yards of loose rock, 900,000 cubic yards of earth excavation.

MR. PLUMB: That is not the contract. That is number one.

MR. ANGLIN: It is here so reported. I am reading from the official documents; and I must prefer to accept them rather than the statement of the hon. gentleman, however much respect I have for his assertions.

MR. PLUMB: I merely wish to keep the hon. gentleman from getting into a false position. How much rock did the hon. gentleman say?

MR. ANGLIN: 600,000 cubic yards of solid rock; 40,000 cubic yards of loose rock, and 900,000 yards of earth excavation.

MR. PLUMB: There was no contract taken until October, 1876.

MR. ANGLIN: It has been stated that Mr. Fleming was not in Ottawa at the time, but that he was in England. The hon. gentleman has stated further that Mr. Marcus Smith telegraphed that the contracts should not be let because he had discovered some blunder.

MR. PLUMB: I did not say that.

MR. ANGLIN: Well, that some error had been committed.

MR. PLUMB: No; I did not say that.

MR. ANGLIN: Then we will drop Mr. Marcus Smith's share in that particular connection; one or other of them, I suppose it is meant, should have been in Ottawa when the contract was let.

MR. PLUMB: I did not say that.

MR. ANGLIN: But the plain inference was to that effect.

MR. PLUMB: I led to no such inference.

MR. ANGLIN: The hon. gentleman may deny that he said so in exact terms, but he cannot refuse me the right to draw an inference from what he did say.

MR. PLUMB: It was not essential that either of these gentlemen should be in Ottawa when the contracts were let.

MR. ANGLIN: It was made under the authority of the Chief Engineer. The preparatory work was unquestionably done in such a manner as satisfied him of its sufficiency; and within a few days. I presume we have all received a copy of a letter, addressed by the Chief Engineer to the head of his Department, in which he endeavours to justify himself against charges made, that, through his incapacity, or negligence, those extraordinary expenditures have been incurred on Section 15, and particularly at Cross Lake, in connection with the embankment through it. He does not attempt to take the ground that he is not responsible for the original letting, and the statements upon which it was based; but he alleges that this increase occurred in some way entirely incomprehensible to him; that immediately after his return from his last visit to England he took means to have some check put upon that expenditure, and caused an additional survey to be made, because he was not satisfied with the returns made by the engineer in charge of the work.

But, in his whole defence, the Chief Engineer never even hints that the slightest blame or responsibility, other than a mere official responsibility, with regard to this additional expenditure, rested upon the gentleman who was Minister of Public Works when that contract was let.

MR. PLUMB: May I ask my hon. friend a question: Will he tell me, on looking over those tenders, to whom that one was awarded? He has got the schedule before him.

MR. ANGLIN: I am not prepared to answer on that point.

MR. PLUMB: I think he ought to be prepared.

SOME HON. MEMBERS: Order.

MR. ANGLIN: Inasmuch as it is a matter of no moment in relation to the subject to which I address my argument, I took no trouble to ascertain who received the contract; nor did I consider whether the hon. gentleman (Mr. Plumb) had any grounds for the statement, last evening, that Mr. Whitehead was improperly admitted into the contract. I do not think that has any bearing on the point now under consideration.

MR. PLUMB: The hon. gentleman is discussing the matter of a contract made upon a tender and bill of works which he has not got before him. Messrs. Salter and Thompson, who got the contract, were not bidders for the $600,000. He is quite misled, and has made a statement utterly incorrect.

SOME HON. MEMBERS: Order.

MR. PLUMB again rose, when—

MR. SPEAKER said the hon. member for Niagara (Mr. Plumb) was allowed to put a question, but could not enter into a discussion while the hon. member for Gloucester had the floor.

MR. ANGLIN: I must leave the hon. gentleman to prove me incorrect if he can. I quoted from the Sessional Papers, No. 43, vol. 8, 1879; and if he chooses to enter into the matter, he can see whether these are or are not the bills of quantities, on which the contract was originally let. I am not prepared to say whether they are or are not. If those are the bills of quantities and notices upon which those works were let, as I have no doubt they are, then the charge that those sections were improperly and carelessly let falls altogether to the ground.

MR. ANGLIN.

The hon. member for Lambton has been much and often sneered at for endeavouring to make use—temporarily only, for the purpose of opening up the North-West and connecting with British Columbia more speedily—of the water-stretches. The line of Railway first fixed upon, west from Lake Superior and east from Red River, approached certain lakes and rivers closely on both the eastern and western sides. I believe it was, on the authority of the Engineer-in-Chief, and as a result of careful location surveys, thought those were the best lines that could be found, and it was thought desirable to utilise those waters to connect the two terminal sections of that portion of the Railway, and open up more speedily connection with the great North-West, and facilitate operations on the sections of the road first to be put under contract, and cheapen their cost. A great deal has been said about the Fort Frances Locks; and it has afforded hon. gentlemen opposite boundless satisfaction to be able to declare that the money expended on that work was wasted. But if the original views, with regard to the best mode of constructing that part of the Railway, had proved correct—if subsequent surveys had not shown that a better route could be had—unquestionably the building of that Lock would be regarded by fair-minded men of all parties, as a work the Government ought to have undertaken and executed as rapidly as possible. It seemed, then, to be a work which would not only be of great local use, but would cheapen the cost of the intervening portions of the road to such an extent as to prove the means of saving money to the people. The work was properly undertaken at the time, but that line was properly abandoned when a better and cheaper line was discovered. The late Minister of Public Works, as he often declared, was determined to build this road so as to make it a real, true, grand trans continental highway. If we look at the amount of work done on it, we shall see that there is no reason for the clamorous complaints of the hon. members from British Columbia. Considering the difficult and little known character of the country between Thunder Bay and Red River, we are forced to the conclusion that, in getting those surveys thoroughly made, in discovering the best possible line, from

Kaministiquia to the Red River—the line as it stands to-day, being, with a few trifling modifications, that selected under the management and control of the hon. member for Lambton—the late Government accomplished much useful work. The work on these sections is in magnitude quite equal to the work of building the Intercolonial from Rivière de Loup to Truro. On that road a survey was made by Major Robinson, twenty-five years before Confederation, and another by Mr. Sandford Fleming before Confederation, he surveying no less than thirteen or fifteen different lines for the Intercolonial. Notwithstanding all that preparatory work, and the important fact that, for a great many miles, the route lies through an inhabited country, and for many more through a country presenting no great difficulty for location or construction; notwithstanding the fact that there were old established highways along the whole line, and rivers connecting with the ocean, penetrating the country all along the line, affording facilities for carrying in supplies—that road commenced in 1867, was not completed till nearly ten years after its commencement. If ordinary diligence be used by the present Government, the road from Fort William to Red River will be completed in much less than ten years. So the progress made on this road appears to have been very much greater than that made by the hon. gentlemen opposite on the Intercolonial, when all the difficulties are fairly estimated. The hon. member for Lambton, and his colleagues, did not stop there, but prosecuted with the utmost diligence, and at extraordinary expense, extensive surveys in the western part of the country, and through the sea of mountains, in every direction, seeking the best route. I think the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) as much as admitted that the survey was prosecuted with very great diligence; and that when it was completed, and the hon. member for Lambton was able to determine where the terminus on the Pacific should be, and by what route it should be approached, tenders were at once invited for the construction of some sections in that quarter. But advertisements, previously published, invited tenders for the work as a whole on the condition that the portions then completed should be accepted, and that credit should be given for the moneys expended on those sections and on the surveys; and those notices and advertisements were still, I think, in the newspapers while the other notice invited tenders for the portion of the road through the Rocky Mountains. It is admitted by some hon. gentlemen on the other side, including the hon. member for Cardwell, that up to this point the hon. member for Lambton, and his colleagues, seemed very much in earnest in the prosecution of this work. We say they did all in their power to fulfil the obligation of the Dominion to British Columbia, and to open up that North-West country to actual settlement—all possible towards constructing this vast trans-continental road in a proper way and by the best route. The hon. the Minister of Railways, a few evenings ago, took ground which astonished me exceedingly. The hon. member for Lambton did not adopt that course, nor did he believe it open to him. He felt, with many of his supporters, that the solemn obligations of the Dominion were not to be lightly set aside; that they were bound to construct this Railway as soon as possible. They did not believe that Parliament had only bound the Government to construct the road by a company, and that when the attempt, so to construct it failed, they were relieved from the obligation. They held the bargain to be a solemn national obligation which they were bound to carry out, if the means of the country permitted; and they set to work to fulfil that obligation, not dreaming of repudiation. When the hon. member for Lambton issued his address to the electors, and stated that he felt it impossible to carry out this work within the time named, the right hon. leader of the Government of to-day, in a speech delivered, I believe at Kingston, declared that even that was repudiation, and that it would justify the people of British Columbia in seceding from the Confederation. Other speeches were made in the same direction, and more than once the hon. members from British Columbia were told that they had ample justification for seceding from Canada altogether. Well, there are some in this country who would not have regretted very much if they had seceded. There are some who believe that British Columbia is unreasonable in its demands, and in exacting the absolute fulfilment of the Terms originally imposed upon the people of Canada. It has been asked why hon. gentlemen now in Opposition, if they at one time regarded this obligation as so solemn and binding in its character, now ask that the work of construction in the Rocky Mountains should be suspended. The hon. member for West Durham, in moving his amendment, fully stated the reasons which actuated him. It may, perhaps, be well to summarise briefly the arguments advanced by that hon. gentleman in support of his Resolution. He stated, in the first place, and I think he proved, that even if the lands in the North-West are as extensive and as fertile as is alleged, even if as large an emigration as the hon. gentlemen opposite say they expect will flow into that country, even if the land can be sold in as large quantities and for the prices expected, nevertheless the net proceeds of the sales of these lands will not be sufficient to pay the cost of this Railway, or anything like it. The hon. gentleman pointed out the fact that two or three serious mistakes were made in the calculations submitted to the House by the right hon. the leader of the Government. In the first place, he made the mistake of merely adding together the price of one acre in each belt of land, assuming that that furnished a basis for calculating an average, and that average he calculated was $3 per acre on the whole. The hon. member for West Durham pointed out that these belts are all of different widths, and that the belt near the Railway is narrower than the belt immediately beyond, and, therefore, that the hon. Premier's mode of striking an average was erroneous. He pointed out also the fact that the purchasers of the preemption lots, even in the first belt, will pay but $2.50 per acre. He showed also that in the hon. Premier's calculation, the amount taken was of no interest in the cost of the construction of the Railway—an error of 18,000,000, as the hon. Finance Minister afterwards admitted. The hon. member clearly proved that the nett proceeds of all the lands to be sold in that country would be entirely insufficient to pay the cost of this Railway. He showed that if the road is to be such a one as we were led to expect, if, even on the prairie lands, we were not to have the construction slighted, and the road made a mere colonisation road, it must cost much more than the amount the hon. gentleman stated.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: Perhaps the hon. gentleman will allow me to make an explanation. The estimates first made were for a first-class road. The Government have changed that determination with the exception of building a road from Lake Superior to Red River, which will be a first-class road. It is proposed, to use the language of the hon. member for Lambton, to "degrade" the road and to build as cheap a road as will serve for colonisation purposes, and at the same time obtain the means of crossing the continent. Not only will the road from Red River to the Rocky Mountains be of the very cheapest description that will enable communication to be carried on with safety, but through the Rocky Mountains, in the canons of the Fraser, everything is to be done to reduce the cost of construction to the lowest possible point.

MR. ANGLIN: It seems rather remarkable that the estimates of the cost of this road have varied so much amongst hon. gentlemen opposite. The estimate of the hon. Premier, on which he based his elaborate calculation, was $75,000,000, if I remember rightly. Since that the hon. the Minister of Railways has submitted another estimate of $64,500,000. Then there was another estimate which appeared to have been furnished in writing, to the hon. the Minister of Public Works, which put the cost at $60,000,000 or $62,000,000. This would seem to indicate that hon. gentlemen on the other side have not yet quite made up their minds as to what kind of a road they intend to build; and I think it indicates also that they find it necessary to satisfy many hon. gentlemen who sit behind them, that this road will not cost as much money as Mr. Fleming formerly said it would cost. Somehow, if they are now to be believed, this land in the North-West is to yield more money than anybody ever imagined, and the road is to cost much less than anybody ever imagined it would cost. The cost of the road may be reduced in various ways. The road-bed may be made as narrow as possible and the gradients as steep as possible, and the curves as sharp as possible. Now, what a pleasant prospect it is for those wishing hereafter to travel over that road, to find themselves amongst the Rocky Mountains creeping round on the top of these canons 400 or 500 feet above a gorge, and find the railway-carriage grazing the rocks as they passed, the vast mountains frowning down upon them, the vast chasms yawning on the other side of the narrow, steep and crooked road-bed, and the train describing a letter S as it winds around the mountains. The hon. member for West Durham denied that the emigration into the North-West would be as great as hon. gentlemen opposite chose to calculate, or the quantity of land taken up as large. In order to prove that he pointed to two of the states of the neighbouring Union, in which the increase of population was larger than in any others, and taking all things into account he showed that the ratio of increase which hon. gentlemen expected in the North-West would surpass the ratio of increase in those states where it has been most rapid. He pointed out why we should not expect it to be as rapid. We have not the great home nursery of emigration which was furnished for many years by the Eastern States of the Union, nor have we, whatever the reason may be, the attraction for emigration that the United States have always possessed. There is no use in blinking the fact that the oppressed thousands of Europe, when forced to leave their homes, do not choose, as a rule, to come to what they consider a monarchical country. They do not know this country as we know it. They do not know that in this country, even when the hon. gentlemen opposite are in power, they may enjoy all the rights and liberties compatible with good Government and order. They have an idea that we are ruled from Downing Street to this day—a mistaken idea, but one which many hold. Germans, we find, do not care to come here, although they formerly came in large numbers. The Irish do not seem to care to come here in such large numbers as they formerly came. The hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) chose not only to say that the Irish hold as high a position here as they do in any part of the United States, that they are received more cordially here, and that they become more thoroughly identified with the other people of the country than in the United States—but he chose to go a little out of his way to say that for all that, they need not thank the hon. gentlemen on this side of the House very much; and then he proceeded to point out one as the strongest and most remarkable attractions that, in the North-West to-day, the Irish Catholics have in the constitutional clause respecting schools, a guarantee that their rights and privileges would be respected in that part of the Dominion. The hon. gentleman must have forgotten altogether who were the authors of that clause in the Constitution of the North-West, which he thought ought to be so acceptable to the Irish Catholics. It offers no peculiar advantages to Irish Catholics. It offers the same to French Catholics, and to all who prefer religious to secular education. But we are indebted for this, not to the hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, but to hon. gentlemen who now sit on this side, and who were formerly members of the Government of this country. The hon. member for West Durham spoke of our trade, and pointed out that our import and export trade is, to-day, relatively smaller than it was many years ago, that our revenues are smaller, and that our expenditures have enormously increased of late years. For all these reasons he asks, not that the Railway project should be abandoned, not that faith should be broken with British Columbia, not that anything should be done to drive British Columbia out of the Confederation, but simply that, under the extraordinary circumstances in which we find ourselves placed to-day, we should pause a little, estimating exactly our financial condition and difficulties, and should refuse to plunge ourselves into liabilities that may prove too weighty for us, and which, instead of hastening the construction of the Pacific Railway as a whole, may tend to delay its completion for many years. Some hon. gentlemen have chosen to speak of this Resolution as a repudiation of our obligations; but it is not that. The hon. member for West Durham, and all the hon. members on this side of the House, feel the full weight of the burden imposed upon them, and are quite willing to see the Railway from Lake Superior to Red River proceeded with as rapidly as possible. We do not want to adopt a cheese-paring policy. We want simply to proceed cautiously, and the circumstances of the country demand that we should proceed cautiously. The hon. the Minister of Public Works followed, but he did not attempt to grapple with a single statement made by the hon. member for West Durham. As no one has ventured to impugn the statements of the hon. gentleman, we may take it for granted that these statements are thoroughly accurate, and that the calculations submitted by the right hon. leader of the Government are inaccurate. The hon. the Minister of Public Works chose to charge the hon. member for West Durham with a grave dereliction of duty, because when he was not a member of this House or a public man—except so far as his character and reputation must always make him a public man—and even while he was in Europe, he did not take any steps to find out what the Government were doing or to protest against what they had done. How he was to be held responsible, in any way, for the proceedings of that Government, the hon. gentleman did not choose to state. Instead of disproving his statements or refuting his arguments, he resorted to the pitiable expedient of telling us that the hon. member for West Durham once abstained from voting, when, as he alleged, the interests of Quebec were at stake. The hon. member for Niagara spoke afterwards, but he did not successfully challenge one of the statements, or attempt to refute one of the arguments of the hon. member for West Durham. He said the hon. member was mistaken in what he said, with regard to the growth of Western States, and he chose to assert that our North-West would fill up quite as rapidly. The hon. member for Cardwell did make a faint attempt to prove that some of the conclusions of the hon. member for West Durham were erroneous. He contended that though we have not a large domestic nursery for emigration, we have in the Mother Land a magnificent nursery. The majority of emigrants, even from Great Britain, however, prefer the United States. The hon. gentleman stated, and no doubt correctly, that up to a certain time, I think prior to

1840, the emigration from Great Britain to Canada was larger than the emigration from Great Britain to the United States. The reason of this was the cheap passages furnished in those days by lumber vessels fitted up for the carrying of passengers, and many emigrants who intended going to the United States took passage to Quebec. But we know that, at the present time, all that is changed. But few emigrants arrive on these shores who do not come out in steamers. I do not want to argue that we shall not have a large number of people go to the North-West next year, but let me say, without intending any depreciation of the North-West, that I do not, for one, believe there is there anything like the amount of fertile land hon. gentlemen on the other side say there is. Even if this were established beyond doubt, it will not deter a single emigrant from settling in the North-West, where, I believe, there is abundant room for millions of people in the fertile lands that really exist; but, when we come to calculate on the land as a means of paying for the construction of the Railway, we ought to know, beyond doubt, whether we have as much land to sell as hon. gentlemen say. At $1.50 per acre, or thereabouts, which will be the average price, according to the calculation made by the hon. member for West Durham, it would take a very great quantity of land merely to pay the increasing interest on the cost of construction. Since the discussion commenced, I have looked very carefully into the pamphlet published in 1870, by Archbishop Taché, with a view of directing public attention to that country as a desirable place for settlement. The general terms of his description are these: Within our boundary, from the dividing line northward and westward, there are no less than 6,000 square miles of land unfit for settlement to any considerable extent. A large portion of it, he admits, to be slightly covered with what he describes as exceedingly nutritious, but unfit for agricultural purposes. All that district is nearly worthless. Of what he calls prairie lands, he says there are only 60,000 square miles all told, a large portion of which is comparatively inferior in quality. More than that he told us that a large portion must be regarded as uninhabitable to the average settler, and incapable of settlement on a large scale, because of the intensely cold winters, because of the absolute impossibility of obtaining lumber for constructing dwelling houses, and of obtaining wood for fuel, or in fact any kind of fuel. Large portions of the prairie can for these reasons only be used for pasturage purposes. He says that the portions most fit for settlement are those contiguous to the timber belts near the Rocky Mountains in the west, and towards what is now Manitoba in the east. Altogether, it must be concluded there are not more than 25,000,000 acres of land absolutely fit for settlement. That is a vast extent of country, but it is not the quantity of land hon. gentlemen choose to say we have wherewith to pay for the construction of this Railway. The hon. member for Cardwell took objection to one portion of a statement made by the hon. member for West Durham, and he asserted that last year British Columbia paid into the Revenue more than she received indirectly. Let me, in the first instance, refer to the assertion made by the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. DeCosmos), that the people of British Columbia paid a very large amount into our Treasury, and that if we could increase the population, it would continue to pay in a similar portion. The present population of that Province, like the people of Newfoundland, pay a large sum into the Revenue because engaged chiefly in one industry, and exporting what they produce they buy larger of the imported dutiable goods, but we cannot expect that if we were to put a large population into British Columbia, they would contribute very much towards the cost of this Railway. The hon. member for Cardwell was mistaken in his figures. During Recess, I took the pains to ascertain how the matter stands, and I find that in his statement he has omitted many items that ought to have been included. I am not charging the hon. gentleman with doing this intentionally, but he has made a very egregious mistake in his figures. The hon. member for West Durham was dealing with a series of years with regard to all the Provinces, and in doing this he stated that the receipts for British Columbia were $2,557,675, and that the expenditure was $3,441,461, leaving on that whole period a deficit of $883,786.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: That must include Railway Service.

MR. ANGLIN: No. I will give the hon. gentleman, in a moment, all the items for the past year, so as to show that the hon. member for Cardwell must have made several omissions. That amount does not include at all the cost of the surveys, or anything relating to Dominion expenditure for Civil Government and the like. Let me take the year ending the 30th June last, and we will see exactly how the matter stood. The receipts of that year were unprecedentedly large, those from Customs amounting to $577,262, as compared with $426,682 the previous year, or about $90,000 of an increase. For Excise, the receipts were $32,097, as compared with $35,000 the previous year. The receipts from Post-offices were $18,612; Sick and Disabled Seamen's Fund, $62,866; Inspection Fees, $621. Weights and Measures, for no doubt there was some attempt to put that law in operation, gave $40. Then there were various seizures, for it seems that in that remarkably high-toned Province there is some smuggling going on, and the good share of the seizures amount to $674, making a total revenue received last year of $572,192, as compared with $478,857 for the year before, or very nearly $100,000 more. So that last year was the most favourable that could have been selected for making a comparison between the expenditure and the receipts. Now, I will give the details of expenditure for that year—there is interest on the debt, which the hon. member for Cardwell first forgot and afterwards recollected, $97,314; Subsidy, $208,093; Governor's salary, $9,000; Administration of Justice, $35,604—a very expensive luxury in that part of the Dominion; Penitentiaries, $23,312; Marine Hospital, $4,167; Pensions, $4,346; Militia and Defence, $7,801; on one class of Public Works, $6,973; Ocean and River Service, which I think the hon. gentleman for Cardwell omitted, $54,000; Light house, $15,153; on account of Fisheries, $1,424; Steamboat inspection, $12,165; Indian grants, $48,532; Collection of Customs duties, $21,056—I think the hon. member for Cardwell omitted that; collections in Excise, $5,766; Weights and Measures expenditure, $561; Post Office, $77,265 ; Public Works of another class, but entirely of a local character, not connected at all with the Railway, $57,014 ; and then some minor expenditures, $358, making altogether, $672,913 expended last year, as against $572,192 received from all sources. If this is correct, and I think it is exactly accurate, the hon. member for Cardwell will see that he must have omitted much that he ought to have charged, if he did not take credit for something he is not entitled to.

MR. WHITE : Was all this expenditure on account of Consolidated Revenue ?

MR. ANGLIN : There is one item of Public Works to which I have drawn attention already, which may be charged to Capital Expenditure, but all the rest come out of the Consolidated Fund, and that also I am just now assured.

MR. WHITE : There is undoubtedly a great deal of difficulty in selecting items from Public Accounts, but I select them with a great deal of care, and they are substantially the same as those of the hon. gentleman. I think he will find some of his figures are on account of Capital.

MR. ANGLIN : I have no doubt that the hon. member believed his statement to be accurate, but he was mistaken, and I thought it would be well to point out the fact that he was mistaken, and I give him the exact account, so that he may be satisfied, and others may be satisfied he was mistaken. With regard to the Province from which I come, I might have said also that the statement of the hon. member for West Durham was calculated in one sense to mislead. It was perfectly accurate, inasmuch as it was taken from the Accounts. But in the Province of New Brunswick the amount of goods entered at our local Custom-houses was not last year quite $5,500,000, whereas, fourteen years ago, it was over $10,000,000, and for some years before that it ranged from $8,500,000 to $9,000,000. It would be impossible to suppose, much as our people are impoverished down there, that in that time the consumption of imported goods has not considerably increased ; but the fact is, that in late years, as the hon. gentleman from Cardwell stated, our position has changed, and we have been buying more and more in the markets of the Upper Provinces, so that a great deal of the duties for which we ought to get credit is paid in the Customs-houses of the Upper Provinces. Now-a-days also we import more largely the manufactures of those Provinces, and if no part of the money of our people paid for these goes into the Treasury, it goes into the pockets of the manufacturers. Nevertheless, that does not at all affect the accuracy of the statement made by the hon. member for West Durham. On the whole he showed very conclusively indeed, that unless we have some reasonable grounds for expecting that our revenues will largely increase in a year or two, we ought to hesitate before plunging very much further than we are already involved into obligations and debt. Our debt was, on the 30th June last, $147,000,000. The hon. member for Cardwell very properly said that the rate of interest has been very considerably diminished of late years. It has been ; but, Mr. Speaker, I must remark here that it is not quite fair to judge of the rate of interest we pay now-a-days by looking merely at the amount, as calculated upon the basis of a stated debt, because in former years we sold 6 per cent. debentures—I think at one time we paid a higher rate than 6 per cent.—at a premium as high as 9 or 10 per cent. in some cases. Let me remark en passant, as an interesting little item, in the accounts of the surplus rolled up during these years, that the amounts received as premiums on the sales of those debentures was taken into account as part of our Revenue, and I think, altogether, that amount reached about $1,500,000.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY : No ; it was on the first loan made by the Hon. John Rose, of 5 per cent. guarantee, and the amount then undisputed was $500,000, the question being whether it should be taken as Revenue or not.

MR. ANGLIN : I think we realised a premium on bonds sold subsequently.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY : A very slight premium.

MR. ANGLIN : It went with the Revenue Account ; and I remember myself having objected to this, and in the Committee of Public Accounts asking why it was not, as premium on the loans, credited to the work for which the money was borrowed. I was told accounts could not be kept in that fashion. Of late years we have been selling at a discount, promising to pay a £100, after a certain lapse of years, for the £93 or £94, which is the average price of our Four per cents; so that we calculate interest on the £100 we have not received, and we are, in reality, paying a higher rate of interest than appears on the face of the accounts now published. There is another little point. Last year the discount on the last loan effected by the hon. the Finance Minister was some $607,000, and I do not know that that was put to the debit of the Revenue Account at all. I think it was found quite possible when the balance was on the wrong side to keep accounts in a different manner than when we sold bonds at a premium.

MR. PLUMB: Does the hon. gentleman think that it ought to be charged otherwise?

MR. ANGLIN: I say the other ought not to have been put to Revenue, but if the other was properly put to Revenue Account, this should now be properly charged against Revenue. I think that no man can very well entertain the hope on the other side of the House, even the most sanguine, that we will realise, from the sale of lands in that far west country, enough money to pay for the construction of the road, even if the cost be reduced to $62,000,000. There is no possibility of raising so large an amount within a few years from the sale of these lands. Hon. gentlemen have talked of the sale of lands in the United States, but the average amount received during the whole century by the United States would not equal the amount hon. gentlemen expect to derive from the sale of lands in the North-West. They calculated on receiving much more than the $2,000,000 a year, which is the average received by the United States for sale of land in that period. If that is true where are we to look for this money? We are asked why the hon. member for Lambton, his colleagues and supporters although who, hitherto, have shown such zeal in attempting to fulfil the Terms of Union with British Columbia, now wish to postpone the construction of that portion of the road which it is proposed to build in British Columbia. Our reason is this: We have no money. In 1876 we had a deficit. In 1877 we had a deficit, and we were obliged to borrow money to pay a part of the interest on the debt. In 1878 we had a deficit, and we were obliged to borrow money to pay the interest on our debt. During these years all who wished this country well hoped that the time of depression would soon cease, and that we would have a revival of trade and business; that our revenues would increase and the necessity of borrowing money to pay interest on our debt would cease, and that no necessity for imposing additional taxation would arise. But in the year past, in 1879, the year for which I say hon. gentlemen opposite are responsible as far as the expenditure is concerned, we had an enormous deficit of nearly $2,000,000, and we were obliged to borrow money to pay nearly $2,000,000 on the interest of our debt. This year again we have a deficit of $500,000 more, to which amount be added $1,300,000 of the Revenue of last year, as stated by the hon. the Finance Minister, we will, therefore, this year, be obliged to borrow $1,800,000 to pay the interest on our debt, or take this amount from the proceeds of loans already effected. Under these circumstances, and with little hope of an increased Revenue next year, should we not pause? Hon. gentlemen on this side are quite willing to see the works in which we are already engaged pressed speedily to completion, we have other obligations also which must be met. We must complete as soon as we can the work of enlarging our Canals. The Welland Canal will require a loan of $2,250,000 at least to complete it, and that money ought to be expended within a year, if possible. The Lachine Canal ought to be finished at once, and that would require $1,120,000 more. There is an expenditure of $3,407,000 absolutely necessary on these two works, which we must raise by borrowing and the interest on which we must endeavour to provide—let us hope not by borrowing, but by taxation. I do not know what the expenditure for the Carillon and Grenville Canals ought to be for next year, but I have heard it estimated on the whole as large as $2,000,000. Besides that, there is the work of enlarging all the other Canals, to which we are constitutionally as much obliged as we are to the building of the Pacific Railway. The Constitution expressly declares—there are some strange provisions in that Constitution—that these Canals should be enlarged as soon as the state of our finances would permit.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: No, it does not.

MR. MACKENZIE: The Resolutions adopted by the Delegates from the Province do so, and it has been upon these Resolutions that the fabric of Confederation is formed.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: It is no portion of the Constitution.

MR. MACKENZIE: Well, it is something.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: No, it is not.

MR. ANGLIN: I do not quite say it is the same thing. I speak from recollection of the Quebec Scheme, and from that day to this, the impression on my mind was that this was a constitutional obligation.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: There is no provision of the kind in the British North America Act affecting any works whatever.

MR. ANGLIN: I do not hesitate to say, under the circumstances, that this objection is not as binding as the constitutional obligation to build the Pacific Railway. However, it is not a constitutional obligation, but we are clearly bound to provide that $3,500,000, and the amount necessary to proceed with the Grenville and the Carillon Canals. If we take these latter works out, and accept the statement of the hon. gentleman that they have managed to reduce the cost of the Railway from Lake Superior to Red River to $17,000,000—an estimate which, as we shall find, will be far below the actual cost—and add the cost of the 200 miles to be built west from Winnipeg, which he estimates at $2,000,000—although my impression is that it will be $3,000,000—add to these sums the cost of the surveys, which is about $4,000,000, altogether we have $23,000,000. On the 30th of June last, as the Public Accounts show, $12,500,000 were paid to that date on Railway Account. This left $10,500,000 to be provided by some means or other. There is the $3,000,000 to be provided for Canals, making $14,000,000 to be provided this year, or within fifteen or eighteen months. We have already a large amount of interest to pay, but we will have to add largely to that. We are paying for interest nearly one-half of our whole Revenue from Customs. Hon. gentlemen, not in the habit of looking into the Public Accounts, do not always understand what these vast expenditures, when they are asked to vote, really mean. After taking $1,300,000 from last year's receipts, and adding that to the receipts of this year, we have still, admittedly, a deficit of half a million dollars. We have to provide that additional half million, and we are asked, under such circumstances as these, to undertake the work of constructing a Railway in the Rocky Mountains, which, at the estimate of the hon. gentleman, will cost $9,000,000, but which, I estimate, as the hon. member for West Durham put it, will exceed that, and reach some $12,000,000, everything being provided; and, when that road is opened, we cannot expect a Revenue which will pay working expenses. That road, when built, cannot pay running expenses, and in the country through which these 125 miles of rail are to be laid, at a cost of so much money, there are but a few small tracts of fertile land, or land fit for settlement. As has been said, all those lands taken together are only about the size of an average Ontario county, and only about large enough to support a population of some 30,000, when all the little nooks and valleys from the mouth of the Fraser to Kamloops are filled up. We cannot expect from such a population any such amount of trade as would pay the working expenses of the Railway, for the expense of such a railway will be higher than on a railway of an ordinary character running through a country of the ordinary description. So that, in addition to our existing debt, and the vast and additional expenditure of about $14,500,000, we are asked to incur this large additional liability for the construction of a portion of the road which, while it remained without connection, would be of very little value. How are we to raise the money? Are we to go on in this way, blindly heaping up our burdens? While hon. gentlemen, members of the late Government, were preparing for proceeding with the work there were some little grounds for hope, there was some little reason to expect that the dawn of better days was near, that prosperity was at hand, that the Revenue would soon mount up so as to exceed expenditure. They say that the Liberal Government imposed an additional $3,000,000 of taxation on the country. In one sense—in the ordinary mode of speaking of the imposition of taxation—that is correct. There can be no doubt, mystify matters as we may, confuse them by any amount of verbiage, that that large increase of taxation was owing to the fact that we had this North-West country and this said road project on our hands. If we had not to pay the interest on the price we paid for the North-West, and on the cost of our little war in the North-West, and on the cost of opening up and governing that country, and had not to subsidise the Indians, paying them rents for those lands; if we had not to support an armed police to prevent the Indians from being troublesome; if we had not taken in British Columbia on such terms, and had not to pay the expenses of Government in Manitoba, we would have had no deficit, and there would have been no necessity for imposing additional taxation. There is no use of us passing Resolutions that we will not increase the rate of taxation, while we incur liabilities which render such increase inevitable. It is because we have the Pacific Railway to build and the North-West on our hands that we find ourselves in the financial difficulties in which we are now placed. Then, Sir, we have a Tariff, one of the most cruel, grinding and oppressive that the world ever saw, since the pirates, Moors and Algerians swarming out of Tarifa and the other ports on the Barbary coast, levied their Tariff on the merchant vessels which they plundered and destroyed. We have a Tariff which may be well called Algerian, for it is cruel and oppressive beyond description. It is well-named a Tariff. And still with such a Tariff the hon. Minister has a deficit that can be fairly counted up to $2,000,000. We have this deficit staring us in the face, and another most probable deficit looming in the near distance of the coming year. Should we next year be prosperous beyond the expectations of the most sanguine; should we have abundant crops and a plentiful harvest, as I trust we may; should that thin, grey streak now glimmering in the eastern horizon, brighten into the roseate hues of morn, and should we enjoy a revival in the lumber trade—that waning industry so despised by the hon. the Finance Minister—and of our shipping business, and of all our other important trades, notwithstanding this Tariff and the load of its oppressive influence on the industries of our country; and if prosperity do return to those industries, it will be through the operation of duties over which we have no control; it will be almost miraculous. We may be able to avoid the great financial disasters which threaten us if, without a decided improvement in our Revenue and our resources, we are now compelled to spend for a work nearly useless in itself—this $12,000,000, in addition to the $15,000,000 which we must necessarily spend at once. It is because this is the position of Canada to-day, because for five successive years we have been forced to borrow money to pay the interest on our debt, because even with our present grinding Tariff we have a deficit, because there is little prospect of any material improvement in our condition this year or next, and because the present load of our debt and liabilities is greater than the country in its present condition can bear, that we ask the Government, that we ask Parliament, that we ask the people of British Columbia, if they have sense of justice and fairplay, to pause and to forbear. We do not ask Parliament to abandon this project, as some have alleged, or to repudiate any obligation into which it has entered, but to wait until we have ascertained how much we may reasonably calculate upon receiving towards the cost of this vast undertaking from the sale of these lands which the road now in course of construction, and the proposed extensions into the prairie, will fully open up for settlement. Wait until we recover from the exhausting effects of the great expenditures we have already made and of those to which we are absolutely committed; wait until this business depression shall have passed away, and settling prosperity shall enable us to raise a revenue equal to our expenditure, and give us not only courage to undertake, but strength to bear further liabilities and additional burdens. We but ask the Government and Parliament to give due weight to the facts and circumstances which should mould our policy, to proceed cautiously and carefully, so that the country may not be involved in the difficulties and disasters which may bring pain to the people of the older Provinces, and retard the completion of the Pacific Railway for many and many a year.

MR. MACDOUGALL: I rise with some reluctance, and—I may as well confess it—with some trepidation, to offer a few observations upon the Resolution or question before the House. We have been debating the Pacific Railway, and its relations with British Columbia, for three days and for three nights, and the question is still before us. My impression is that the speeches we have had from the other side of the House, and the arguments employed to induce this House not to go into Committee, but to adopt a Resolution not to proceed with the Railway in British Columbia, would carry us—if we listened to them, if they had weight with us—a great deal further. For my part, if I viewed this question as the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) views it. if I believed the country to be in a condition of hopeless poverty, as he declares it to be; if I believed its financial resources were as limited, as unproductive as he represents them to be; if I thought our hopes of the future would not justify further expenditure on Capital Account, for any purpose whatever in the North-West, because the competition of the United States for the emigrant populations of the Old World will prevent us from selling, or settling, our waste lands in that part of the Dominion, instead of asking this House to declare that the further prosecution of the work of building the Pacific Railway should be postponed, I would take the ground that it ought to be abandoned. I should say, at least, that we ought not to proceed further than the Red River, and allow the settlement of the country beyond that point to provide for itself. The hon. member for West Durham, and some of his colleagues, on that side of the House, have presented to us certain alleged facts—I prefer to call them statements—and they have reasoned at great length upon them; but, admitting the premises, his conclusion, as I have said, is a very lame and impotent one. I will ask the indulgence of the House, while I go back to an earlier chapter in the history of this question, than that which the hon. gentleman detailed to us. I do so for the purpose of showing that there are reasons why members of this House ought not to concur in the doctrine set up, in some quarters, as to the obligations of Canada towards British Columbia, respecting the Pacific Railway. I deny that there is any evidence to support the statement that we are under a Treaty obligation with British Columbia to expend millions and millions of money, whether we can afford it or not, to build this Railway. In the first place it may be well to glance at the history of British Columbia, prior to 1867. In 1858, gold discoveries were made in that country. Prior to 1866, there were two Governments in existence, one for the Island of Vancouver, and another for the main land; but they were not popular or representative Governments. The population was very small, mostly miners and traders. It was composed of Americans as well as Canadians, and foreigners from various countries, who had gone into that country in search of gold to better their fortunes. In 1866, a single Government was established. It was that of a Crown colony, and was directly under the control of the Colonial Secretary; but when Canada and the Maritime Provinces had agreed to form a Confederation, and while the Act of Union was under discussion, a number of persons in British Columbia desired to bring about the Union of that Colony with the old Provinces of Canada. An agitation took place, public meetings were held, speeches were made, and Resolutions passed, declaring that such a Union was expedient in the highest degree. Canada had not then sought to induce British Columbia in favour of the Union, though it was no doubt a part of the great scheme of 1864, for uniting all the Provinces of British America under one Government. It was then contemplated that British Columbia would, at some time, become a part of the Confederacy, and provision was made that Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island and British Columbia might come into the Union upon such terms as might be agreed upon between Canada and them, subject to the approval of the Imperial Government. But up to 1868, British Columbia was a

MR. ANGLIN.

Crown colony; it was a Government controlled and directed from the Colonial Office, and it so continued until it became a Province of Canada. In 1868, a memorial, based on resolutions passed at public meetings, was sent to Canada. That memorial expressed the strong desire of the people to join the new Confederacy, and it was in consequence of these popular movements in British Columbia, that action was taken in Canada, an Order in Council passed, and negotiations begun with the Imperial Government. It might be as well to refer to the statements made at that time, by the citizens of British Columbia. In the Sessional Papers of 1867-8, we find the Resolutions as they were passed, and the Order-in-Council adopted by the Canadian Government thereupon. The following passages from that Order, under date of 6th March, 1868, will explain the position, at that time, of the Canadian Government:—

“The Committee have had under consideration, a Memorandum, dated 5th March, 1868, from the hon. the Minister of Public Works, stating that certain Resolutions, on the subject of Union with Canada, adopted at a public meeting of the inhabitants of Victoria, British Columbia, on the 29th January last, transmitted through the Hon. Samuel L. Tilley, to the Secretary of State for Canada, were on the 3rd instant, referred to a Committee of the honourable the Privy Council, and by the Council referred to him, the hon. the Minister of Public Works, for immediate report. That he has read and duly considered the purport of these Resolutions, the circumstances under which they were passed and the action which ought to be taken by the Government of Canada thereupon.

“That it appears from these Resolutions and the Memorial of the Committee appointed at the public meeting, which accompanies them, that the Legislative Council of British Columbia, on the 18th March, 1867, unanimously adopted a Resolution, requesting His Excellency Governor Seymour to take measures without delay to secure the admission of British Columbia into the Canadian Confederacy on fair and equitable Terms.”

It appears further:

“That neither the people of British Columbia, nor the Government of Canada have been apprised of any measures that may have been taken by the Government of British Columbia in pursuance of the Resolution of the Legislative Council.”

Then, after referring to the fact that this action of the people and the Legislative Council took place before the British North America Act came into force, and that farther action would, therefore, be necessary on the part of British Columbia under the 146th section of that Act, the hon. the Minister of Public Works—which office I then had the honour to hold—made a recommendation which the Order-in-Council recites in these words:

“The hon. Minister submits, that considering the peculiar constitution of the Legislature and Government of British Columbia, and that notwithstanding the Resolution of the Legislative Council, in March of last year, and the Resolutions of the public meetings, and the expression of public opinion through the Press of the Colony, before and since the Act of Confederation, in favour of Union with Canada, no official communication on the subject from British Columbia has reached this Government, he would recommend that Your Excellency communicate to His Grace the Duke of Buckingham a copy of the Memorial and Resolutions referred to, and request His Grace to instruct Governor Seymour to take such steps as may be deemed proper to move the Legislative Council of British Columbia to further action in terms of the Imperial Act. He further recommends that His Grace be informed that the Government of Canada will be prepared to submit to Parliament a proposal for the admission of British Columbia into the Union, in the expectation that the Imperial Government will lose no time in transferring the intervening North-Western Territory to the jurisdiction of the Canadian Government.”

The Privy Council concurred in these recommendations, and transmitted them to the Colonial Minister. But it may be interesting to the House to hear two or three passages from the memorial of the citizens of Victoria, and certain members of the Legislative Council, on which our Orders-in-Council was based. It informed us that:

“The people of Cariboo, the next most populous and influential portion of the Colony, held in December a highly enthusiastic meeting, and unanimously passed Resolutions in favour of immediately joining the Dominion of Canada.”

It informed us that all the newspapers except one, five in number, supported Confederation. The hostile paper was in favour of annexation to the United States. It informed us that:

“The Legislative Council, the only Legislative body in the Colony, is made up of a majority consisting of Heads of Departments, Gold Commissioners, Magistrates and others subject to Government influence, and cannot be relied upon to urge Confederation, as it ought to be at the present juncture,” and, therefore, they appealed to Canada to help them.

The Memorialists said :

“ We feel that without the help and support of the Government of the Dominion, the time will be remote when this Colony will be admitted into the Dominion, but with the aid which we solicit we believe that there is no obstacle to prevent our admission by the 1st of July next.”

And to allay all apprehension as to terms, they specified them as follows:—

“ 1. Canada to become liable for the Public Debt of the Colony, estimated at $1,500,000.

“ 2. Canada to provide for Federal officers and services.

“ 3. To grant a fixed subsidy and per capita subsidy sufficient to ensure the support of the Local Government, in addition to the powers of taxation reserved to Provincial Governments in the British North America Act.

“ 4. Representation in the Senate and Commons of Canada.

“ 5. The construction of a trans-continental waggon road from Lake Superior to the head of navigation on the Lower Fraser, within two years after the time of admission. This is regarded as an essential condition.

“ 6. Popular representative institutions, insuring responsible control over the Government.”

It will be seen that the British Columbians were very reasonable in their demands when soliciting our help to escape from an arbitrary and irresponsible Government. They did not even hint at a Pacific Railway then. And who were the influential signers of this memorial? The first is James Trimble, Mayor of Victoria; A. DeCosmos, member of the Legislative Council; J. H. Powell, M.D., member for Victoria in the late Assembly for Vancouver Island. The others I need not mention. Now, that was the initiatory proceeding for the admission of British Columbia into the Union. I think, Sir, that, recalling those circumstances, the statement of the hon. member for West Durham, that Canada applied any coercion, or was guilty of any improper solicitation for the purpose of inducing British Columbia to join Canada, is not borne out by the facts. The negotiations went on, and in the meantime, the late Sir George Cartier and myself were deputed to proceed to England for the purpose of arranging with the Hudson's Bay Company and the British Government for the acquisition of the intervening territory. In 1869, we completed an arrangement by which the great North-West became the property of Canada, at a cost of £300,000 sterling.

MR. MACDOUGALL.

Then the admission of British Columbia became a matter of serious consultation and interest with the Imperial authorities; and it was again pressed upon the Secretary of State for the Colonies that there was objection and hesitation on the part of the officials of British Columbia to come into the Union, except upon terms that would prove onerous to the Dominion, and he was urged to use his influence and authority—the policy of uniting all the Provinces and Colonies in British America having been affirmed in an Imperial Act—to induce the local authorities of British Columbia to agree to practicable and reasonable Terms of Union with Canada. That effort was made by the Colonial Minister, whose despatch to the then Governor of British Columbia, urging a speedy and amicable union with Canada is on record. Mr. Musgrave, who had previously been Governor of Newfoundland, and had taken a very warm interest in the subject of Confederation, was appointed Governor of British Columbia for the purpose of carrying out the wishes of the people as expressed in their memorial. The then Secretary for the Colonies, Lord Granville, in writing to Governor Musgrave, makes use of some expressions which have an important bearing on the view of the question I am endeavouring to present :

“ The question,” says Lord Granville, “ presents itself whether this single Colony should be excluded from the great body politic which is thus forming itself. On this question the Colony itself does not appear to be unanimous. But as far as I can judge from the despatches which have reached me, I should conjecture that the prevailing opinion was in favour of Union. I have no hesitation in stating that such is also the opinion of Her Majesty's Government.”

That definite instruction and command was communicated to the Queen's representative in British Columbia on the 14th August, 1869. As to the dependant and subordinate position of the Colony at that time, His Lordship observed :

“ The Constitutional connection of Her Majesty's Government with the Colony of British Columbia is as yet closer than with any other part of North America, and they are bound, on an occasion like the present, to give, for the consideration of the community and the guidance of Her Majesty's servants, a more unreserved expression of their wishes and judgment than might be elsewhere fitting.”

In consequence of that pressure from the Imperial authorities, upon the reluctant authorities of British Columbia—for, as I have shown, the people had already appealed to Canada for help—the negotiations for a Union proceeded. I will now read the “Terms” proposed by the Governor in Council of the Colony in more detail, and in official form, under those instructions and this pressure. I would call the particular attention of the House to those Terms as they were presented at Ottawa, especially the clause relating to internal transit, or “a trans-Continental road.” I find it expressed in the official and formal propositions of the delegates sent to Ottawa in these words :

“8. Inasmuch as no real Unions can subsist between this Colony and Canada without the speedy establishment of communication across the Rocky Mountains by coach road and Railway, the Dominion shall, within three years from the date of Union, construct and open for traffic such coach road from some point on the line of the Main Trunk Road of this Colony to Fort Garry, of similar character to the said Main Trunk Road, and shall further engage to use all means in her power to complete such Railway communication at the earliest practicable date, and that the surveys to determine the proper line for such Railway, shall be at once commenced, and that a sum of not less than $1,000,000 shall be expended in every year from and after three years from the date of Union, in actually constructing the initial sections of such Railway from the seaboard of British Columbia to connect with the Railway system of Canada.”

On presenting those Terms at Ottawa, and discussing them with the Canadian Government, an alteration of this clause was proposed to the British Columbia delegates, with respect to the Railway, as follows :—

That condition or term in the Act of Union was a voluntary proposal of the Government of Canada. The Government of British Columbia proposed that we should undertake the construction of a Railway at the rate of $1,000,000 a year, which, if the estimate of the Chief Engineer that it would cost $100,000,000 be correct, would require 100 years instead of ten to complete the Pacific Railway. My contention is, that, so far as this Parliament is concerned, we are not bound by the Terms of Union respecting the Railway in the absolute sense or to the extent which some hon. gentlemen even on this side of the House contend. It was a voluntary proposal of our own; a nudum pactum as lawyers would say, because we received no consideration for it. It is true the British Columbia delegates did not object to it. They were very glad to find that the people of Canada were so anxious to establish rapid transit across the continent. But that, like any other decision of Parliament, was subject to modification. The condition that the resources of the country would enable the Government to “secure the completion” of the work in ten years was always understood. Nay, more, it was expressly stipulated. We promised British Columbia, and we promised everybody, that we would build the Railway if we could. But Parliament did not deprive itself of its legal, natural, constitutional right to modify or repeal any law in the Statute-book, or any schemes or undertakings which might be found impracticable. British Columbia, being a part of the Dominion, can have no right to complain, unless it can show that we have the means, or that they are within our reach, and that it is to the interest of the country to proceed with the construction of the Railway in their Province. As members of this House, and representatives of a portion of the people of the Dominion, hon. gentlemen from British Columbia have the right to present their case in the best way they can. But to say that the transactions of 1871 are in the nature of a Treaty, that this Dominion consists of separate parts which have Treaty obligations one with another, and that we are bound at all hazards, and under all circumstances, whether we have the means or not, to carry out everything that a previous Parliament may have proposed in reference to public works in any Province—that proposition, Mr. Speaker, cannot be maintained; I, at all events, am not able to accept it. I come now to consider the position we are in to-day. We have undertaken the construction of this Railway. We have yielded to the demands of the members from British Columbia, on the ground that we undertook to perform a contract which happens to be advantageous to them, though it threatens ruin, or great embarrassment to the older Provinces. I find that we are actually engaged in the construction of the Pacific Railway from the head of Lake Superior to the waters of the Pacific. It has been surveyed, different lines have been proposed, and, at last, the leaders of the two great political parties in this country have concurred in the selection of a particular line in British Columbia, and the contracts have been given out for the purpose of constructing that initial section. We are now called upon by the hon. member for West Durham and the hon. member for Lambton, the First Minister of the late Government, to halt. The grounds upon which we are urged to adopt that course are, that the country is in a depressed condition; that we have neither money nor credit, or, if we have credit, we ought not to use it in borrowing the money to proceed with that work; that there is no country to be developed by this particular portion of the line in British Columbia; that the country through which the line is to pass on this side of the mountains, is not what it is represented to be; that it is, in fact, a poor country, and here, Sir, let me say I was much surprised and pained last night, to hear the hon. member for Lambton reading old volumes by the hour, for the purpose of showing that there was a great deal of swamp, a great deal of alkaline and sandy country, vast reaches of uncultivable land, between Red River and the foot of the Rocky Mountains. He told us there were only about 80,000,000 acres of good land in the whole country, which he seemed to think an insignificant amount, but if he will look at the area of some European countries, which make a considerable figure in the world, he will find they have less than 80,000,000 acres of arable land. Yet they maintain armies and fleets, and support very costly Governments. I regard that hon. gentleman as more blameable, more deserving of censure, than any hon. member of this House, for decrying the financial and material resources of our country, because he was lately at the head of a Reform Government, a Government that appealed to and was supported by the people, on the ground that they represented the party of Progress, that they would exercise economy in public affairs, that they would be careful of the public purse, which they said their opponents had dealt with extravagantly. Hon. gentlemen opposite were supported because of these pledges, and how did they redeem them? We find that soon after their accession to power, the public expenditure increased beyond all former example. We find that they had a succession of deficits during their entire existence as a Government. The previous Government had undertaken to complete this public work within ten years. That improvident bargain was the great point of objection. It was something terrible. The hon. gentleman, eloquent as we know him to be, especially on the stump, pointed out to the astonished electors that the previous Government were unworthy of confidence, because they had undertaken this enormous project to construct the Pacific Railway within ten years. Why, he said, all the money that could be raised by the Imperial Government would fail to carry out such a work in that time! It was of no consequence to tell the hon. gentleman that the "ten years" was mentioned in these terms merely for the purpose of indicating that the Government of the day would proceed earnestly and continuously with the construction of this work. He persisted in the assertion that time was of the essence of the contract with British Columbia, though neither the people of that Province nor their representatives had ever so understood it. They never contended that it was an essential condition, the non-performance of which would void the agreement, that the Pacific Railway should be completed in that particular period of time. Why, Sir, neither the Government nor their engineers knew at that time that it was possible to construct the Railway at all. It was not known as a matter of engineering that we could pass the canyons of the Fraser or penetrate the Cascade Mountains and thus reach the waters of the Pacific. I do not think it has been made quite clear yet, that we can do it without enormous expenditure. Under these circumstances, before there had been a survey, before we knew the character of the country beyond Lake Superior, before we knew what difficulties would be encountered in passing the Rocky Mountains and the Cascade Range, the hon. gentleman endeavoured to persuade the people that the previous Government had bound the Dominion to construct that work within ten years coute que coute. Sir, there was no such condition. It was never contemplated that that work should be completed within that time, unless an easy line could be found, and unless the circumstances and revenues of the country would permit it. It was so understood in this House. I was sitting on the Opposition side of the House at the time, and associated with Sir Alexander T. Galt and other independent members, insisted, in order to make the point clear, upon a Resolution of Parliament that this work should be proceeded with, provided it could be done without increasing the then rate of taxation. The right hon. gentleman, then leader of the Government, being absent in Washington, Sir George E. Cartier, who, in his absence led the House, found so many of his own supporters concurring with us, that he consented to adopt that Resolution, and it was passed while the delegates from British Columbia were sitting beside the Speaker's Chair. Now, with these facts in view, what course did the hon. gentleman opposite take when he came into office? He complained of this ten years' limit, yet he assumed the responsibility of constructing the Railway as a public or Government work, and he sent to England and invoked the interference of Lord Carnarvon, then Secretary of State for the Colonies.

MR. MACKENZIE: No.

MR. MACDOUGALL: What did you do?

MR. MACKENZIE: I invoked the assistance of no one.

MR. MACDOUGALL: Who invoked the interference of Lord Carnarvon?

MR. MACKENZIE: The British Columbia people.

MR. MACDOUGALL: Then the British Columbia people proceeded to England. I happened to be there myself at the time. Mr. Walkem came to London to complain of bad faith on the part of the Canadian Government, and the result was that Lord Carnarvon was invited to offer his services, and the hon. gentlemen opposite consented to accept his services, and agreed to abide by his arbitration as to the millions which were to be expended yearly by Canada up to 1890. Mr. Walkem talked over the matter with me, and I endeavoured to persuade him that he would not be serving the interests of British Columbia in taking any such ground as he proposed; that Canada would proceed, under any Administration, to open up the great North-West, and then the necessity of crossing the mountains to a Pacific terminus in British Columbia would be admitted by all parties, and he would get his Railway as soon as it was possible to obtain it, under any circumstances; that to quarrel with Canada, and attempt to enforce a literal fulfilment of these rigid terms, would result in failure. Lord Carnarvon did me the honour to confer, informally, with me upon the matter. I felt it my duty as a Canadian, and as a public man, to warn him against burning his fingers by undertaking to arbitrate between Canada and British Columbia in that matter. But that nobleman, being anxious to remove all obstacles to the consolidation of British North America, because he was the Minister under whose authority the scheme of Confederation was planned, undertook the difficult and, as I think, ill advised office of Arbitrator, and the hon. gentleman opposite, the great Reformer, the great constitutionalist, abdicated his functions as a responsible Minister, and placed this Parliament and the people of this country in a false position, when he left it to a person in no way responsible to us, to say that we should spend $2,000,000 a year in the construction of a Railway in British Columbia. That was a highly unconstitutional act in my view. It was a destructive blow aimed at the most essential principle upon which our constitutional system is founded. If the Government of the day can hand over the purse-strings of the nation to any one, even to the sovereign herself, to fix the amount and to specify the objects of expenditure, without, in the first place, consulting the representatives of the people in Parliament assembled, it has ceased to be the Government of a free country. The bargain was struck, the reference made, and the award of $2,000,000 a year in favour of British Columbia was rendered. The hon. gentleman brought down that proposition after the Arbitrator had given his judgment, and he succeeded in obtaining a quasi consent from Parliament. I do not know, for I was not a member of this House at the time, that it was ever formally approved, but assent, if any, was gained in such a manner, the case was conducted upon such false premises, that I, for one, was not surprised to find the vice of its origin prevailing it through all its stages. The hon. gentleman has been charged—I do not say justly charged—with having himself procured, by some underhand method, the defeat of his scheme in the Senate. Now, we have another Government in power and we have the Railway question still before us. We are called upon to say, by our vote on this Resolution, whether the work is to proceed in British Columbia or not. I confess, if I were free from these antecedent facts, which I think are binding to a certain extent upon this Parliament, I would hesitate to proceed. But as a supporter of the Government in one or two important matters, if not in all, I cannot well see how, in view of what has taken place between the British and Canadian Governments, in view of the money already expended upon surveys and actual construction beyond Lake Superior, in view of the fact that the hon. gentleman and his colleagues had adopted this very line in British Columbia, I can ask the present Government to reverse a policy to which most of its members have long been committed and refuse to proceed with at least a portion of the work in British Columbia. It is quite true if our financial position were such that we could not raise money enough to carry on the Government, and execute the great Public Works we have in hand, I should say that the Government must be carried on and the Public Works must stand. The interest on the Public Debt must be paid, the subsidies and charges for Civil Government must be paid, and many other items of ordinary expenditure must be met, whatever happens, and if I did not see a prospect of sufficient Revenue in the future, I would not hesitate a moment to say to hon. gentlemen on the Treasury Benches, "you must postpone this work." But is our condition desperate? Is it true, as was stated by the hon. gentleman who last addressed the House, that we cannot proceed with this work? Is it true that the amount required is so great that neither the Revenues nor the credit of this country are able to overtake it? I do not think so. If we look at the Railway Statistics of Canada we find that some 8,000 miles of railway have been constructed in Canada within a few years, costing $273,826,000. Of this sum the General and Local Governments have contributed about $80,000,000. But more than two-thirds of the entire amount has been furnished by private capitalists, and the purchasers of bonds sold in the market. I am not aware that the country has felt any severe pressure on account of the investment of this immense amount of capital in our railways, or that we have suffered from over-construction of railways beyond the needs of the country. I think if we look at the question in that light the dangers and difficulties that have been conjured up on the other side of the House will disappear. I believe railway men can be found with the capital at their backs to take up this Railway from Thunder Bay to its Pacific terminus at Yale, and for a subsidy of 40,000,000 or 50,000,000 acres of land as originally proposed, complete the sections that have not yet been contracted for. I believe there is no difficulty in finding a solvent company who would undertake to complete the Pacific Railway on those terms, and agree to keep it in repair and work it. The moment capitalists are convinced that this great Empire of ours in the West has within it even 80,000,000 acres of arable land, the moment they are satisfied that the immigration which has set in is likely to continue, that its climatic difficulties have been exaggerated, that wheat can be produced there in enormous quantities, and of superior quality to any grown in other parts of this continent, there will be no difficulty in finding a company willing to undertake the construction, at their own risk, of the balance of this great highway. I am told upon reliable information that at Minneapolis the millers will give ten cents a bushel more for wheat grown beyond the International Boundary than for wheat grown a few degrees south of it. For ages those vast and fertile plains have been covered with millions of buffalo, subsisting upon the natural herbage of the soil, and we all know that domestic cattle are closely allied to the buffalo. So we have there a country that can produce both meat and breadstuffs in abundance, and this fact alone, with conditions for the incoming settler as favourable as those offered to him in the United States, will, now that the tide of settlement is steadily flowing westward, guarantee ample traffic for at least one trunk line of communication. The fact is that the population going into the country and the products coming out of it will, from the day it is opened, pay the running expenses and the interest on the capital. I therefore have no apprehension on the score of ultimate indemnity, and while I feel confident that our position and prospects are such as to warrant the Government in going on with the work, I should like to be sure that no more expenditure will be made than is absolutely necessary until we are a little farther advanced. Hon. gentlemen opposite have stated that the Tariff is the great difficulty, and that its operation will tend to prevent the prosecution of the work. On that point I will just say, that in my opinion that question was most fully discussed and considered by the electors of this country at the last election, and with what result? 40,000 Liberals voted in favour of the candidates supporting the present Premier. Why? Not because of his antecedents as a party politician, or the principles he was supposed to hold, but because they had confidence in his statesmanship and patriotism and his intention to carry out his pledge to protect the industries of the country. Well, Sir, the people having demanded that the industries of this country should be protected by a rearrangement of the Tariff, I venture to suggest that it is no compliment to our institutions, no compliment to the intelligence of the people of this Dominion, to tell them, before the policy they resolved upon has had a fair trial, "You made a mistake in demanding that policy." On the contrary, I think the great mistake the hon. member for West Durham makes, as a politician, is this,—he is setting himself up against the declared opinion, the settled verdict of the people. He, a lawyer, for many years buried in his briefs, sets himself up as an expert in finance and trade, in opposition to the opinions of the commercial men, the manufacturers and the most experienced public men of the country, and contemns the judgment of the people at large in calling for the National Policy! He, a Liberal, a man of the people, comes here and declares that the Government is deserving of censure for carrying out the well-understood wishes of the people! Sir, it is a mistake to do this. The National Policy must have a fair trial. It has already proved a success, financially, inasmuch as it has given us, instead of a deficit of $2,000,000—the normal condition under the hon. gentleman and his friends—a deficit of only half a million. It is the duty of the Government to maintain and carry out this policy. It is also its duty to exercise economy in the administration of public affairs. I was afraid just before the opening of the House, that the hon. the Minister of Railways would attempt to carry out his idea of building the Railway on the north shore of Lake Superior, but I am glad to find that the hon. gentleman's colleagues have induced him to abandon that part of the line for the present. I am also glad to find that it has been decided to proceed cautiously with the work in British Columbia. Under all these circumstances, I shall oppose the Resolution of the hon. member for West Durham. If the mover of the Resolution were logical, he would demand the abandonment of the work in British Columbia. Instead of doing that, he only asks for delay, and thereby affirms that the road shall be built at some future time. But probably the Resolution was framed in this way, to denounce the hon. gentleman's former leader, and to contradict the assertion of the organ of his party, that the Railway should be pushed on as rapidly as possible. But the motion is also a declaration of want of confidence in the Government. In view of all that has been said in favour of the Resolution, as respects its language and form—which has been little—and as respects its political consequences, if adopted, which, though not expressed, we can infer, I believe no independent supporter of the Government can possibly vote for it. I, at all events, will not assist to turn out the present Government in order to turn in the Government of the hon. member for Lambton.

MR. McLENNAN: We had this afternoon, from the hon. member for Cardwell, a clean and through statement of the history of the Pacific Railway. We have just had from the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Macdougall), an equally clear statement of the earlier history of our relations with British Columbia, and we have had from other members of the House very exhaustive statements with reference to this question. I propose very briefly, to consider the aspect of the matter as it is before us to-day, and as it is before the country, and I propose to do it with reference to our obligations and the wisest course to be pursued under the circumstances in regard to fulfilling those obligations. In this connection we naturally revert to the condition that has been repeatedly imposed, and that is, that the work should be carried on without increasing the burden of taxation upon the country. In the statements of the hon. Minister, in the opening discussion, I think we have reasonable assurance that this condition is substantially continued, that the proposal implies a fair adherence to this principle, in the manner in which he proposes to go on with the work, and as far as this goes, I believe, there is an agreement so far between all the parties who have taken part in this discussion. I believe, Sir, there is no difference of opinion as to the necessity of completing the work that has been begun and is so far advanced between Thunder Bay and Red River. I believe there is no difference of opinion as to the necessity for extending for at least 200 miles beyond Red River upon the prairie land, and in the fertile country for the purpose of settlement. This point, I believe, is conceded by all parties, and if we can carry out that project, and the further undertaking in British Columbia, with fair adherence to the principle of keeping within our present taxation, the case of the Government is clearly made. I think that with this understanding, and this point reached, we can then clearly afford to wait a little, as has been suggested by some parties. In these 200 miles beyond Red River, through the belt of country extending from the 49° northward, about 250 miles to the line of Swan River, or thereabouts, we are quite within the fertile belt. Within that space we have, measuring the entire ground from Red River, 50,000 square miles of land, or 32,000,000 of acres. If we take about half of that area for water, for unproductive land, and for land held by speculators, we have left a space that, computing at twenty people to the square mile (which is a very small number), we have room for half a million of people; the number that the right hon. the leader of the Government suggested in the calculations that were laid before the House, in the discussion of the Land policy, we should get in within ten years. I suggest that we should wait about half that number of years, to make this experiment of settlement, upon which all, in the first place, depart. We have had elaborate calculations made by the mover of the Resolution before the House, as to the possibilities of human industry in a new settlement, and we have statements from the experience of Western States, of what men can do in improving a new country; and we have had estimates made of the number of men, that, under peculiar circumstances, might emigrate from the older Provinces to the new. It is a well-known maxim that in estimates of this kind it is the impossible which comes to pass. The same thing never occurs twice in the history of a country, or in a history of an undertaking of this kind. And when we are told that the settlers of the Western States occupy an average of 12½ acres each, it gives us no clue whatever to what may possibly be done in these fertile prairie lands, the descriptions of which, so glowing and so extremely interesting to us who are the possessors of that country, do not by any means exceed the truth. The difficulty involved in the Resolution that has been proposed to the House then, concerns only the undertaking in British Columbia, and in respect to the distinguished gentleman opposite, the mover of this Resolution, and his leader—if he is the leader—I must say they occupy a very peculiar position. The mover of this Resolution has been like that brook that our poet laureate has seen—"in and out and all about," in his relations to his party and to the Government of which he was lately a member, and I believe he may be excused if he does not come heartily to the support of this undertaking in British Columbia. But we have a very different condition in the case of the hon. member for Lambton. My hon. friend from Cardwell (Mr. White), did not overstate the case, to-day, when he said that hon. gentleman attempted the extraordinary feat of turning his back upon himself. If there is any undertaking to build this Railway in British Columbia, if there is any obligation, at this moment, existing, it is the obligation undertaken by that hon. gentleman. Now, there are various kinds of courage in the world. Some men have the courage of their convictions, some men have the courage of their word — and that is often but the courage of their folly. Then some men have a kind of courage that is known by the name of Dutch courage. The hon. member for Lambton got up his courage, last night, by reading several pages out of a Blue-book, certainly not to illustrate the subject, because every member of this House has a copy of that Blue-book, and if he desired to know what is in it he will be very likely to read it. I am quite sure the gentlemen who heard them were no wiser for the reading of the pages out of that book last night. It was, however, a painful effort by which the hon. gentleman wrought himself up to that difficult point of turning his back upon himself. He has left us for ever in doubt as to whether, in his dealings with British Columbia, he "paltered in a double sense," whether he meant in advertising for the construction of a section of road in that country "to keep his word of promise to the ear" of the people of British Columbia, while breaking that promise to their hope, or whether he really meant what he professed to do when he advertised for the contract for the work. I am afraid we shall never find out what the hon. gentleman opposite intended in that respect. The estimates for this undertaking in its entirety are very wide. My hon. friend the Minister of Railways has placed his estimate at $64,000,000 from Lake Superior to Burrard Inlet. Hon. gentlemen on the other side have reached nearly twice that amount in the estimates they have offered. Well, Sir, judging by our experience of the past, estimates of this kind are very uncertain, and I think that is another reason why we should make a test, in a moderate period of time, to see what can be accomplished to place settlers in the North-West, who will help to develop the country and by that means assist in the construction of the Railway. Another part of the project that has been discussed is one upon which I am not quite in agreement with my hon. friend the Minister of Railways, and that is the question of extending by the route of the Canada Central through Sault Ste. Marie. I have no objection to extending the charter of the Canada Central or any other company to build a Railway to Sault Ste. Marie, but I see great objection to the application of public money for the construction of such a work. I believe in the use of water-stretches to make a present connection, not a stretch of mud and water of nineteen inches in depth as was found at Fort Frances Lock, but a real water-stretch such as we have in Lake Superior. If that water-stretch is used from Thunder Bay to Sault Ste Marie, it can very well be used for the additional distance to Georgian Bay, where we have a choice of two ports with railway connections at Collingwood and at Midland. I believe that that is our true policy, and one which will meet the requirements of the case until it becomes practical to get our all-rail route by the north shore of Lake Superior. Some parties have an idea that by making a connection with Sault Ste Marie we should obtain a good deal of traffic from the Western States. I have no confidence that we should do anything of the kind. This is a matter which has been considered in various forms for a long period in the history of this country. In fact, since the first undertaking of the construction of the Welland Canal the idea has come up at different periods, that, if we could enlarge our channels of communication, we should obtain a large portion of the traffic of the Western States. People have come from the Western States that have been interested in these routes: a Committee of the Senate visited this country a few years ago, and travelled over all our route, and they went home again. And what did we find. We found as the result of all these enquiries at the different points, that the advantage we had by the St. Lawrence in the existence of a Tariff of 6½c. per bushel on grain upon the Erie Canal, the great advantage we derived from that toll was removed, and that the tolls throughout the length of the Erie Canal are to-day, as nearly as possible, as small a rate of toll as upon our own canals. The State of New York made that great sacrifice to retain the trade derived from the Western States and in doing so she had the advantage of her enormous capital, of all the appliances of ships and of men, ready for the enterprise, and to carry out all that was necessary to keep that traffic within their own control. We find also that the through trunk lines of railway in the United States adopted a similar policy, reducing their rates to such an extent, that many of them, for years after, paid no dividend to their shareholders, but they have kept the traffic and derived all the profit from this great carrying trade. We have discovered that we require something more than mere channels of communication, roads and canals, in order to obtain the advantage of a large carrying trade. We can only hope to obtain a measure of traffic that grows with our own people and by our own means, and with all the appliances that we can bring into use, in order to carry on that traffic; and in every undertaking connected with our canals and railways, we may assure ourselves that this is all we may expect, and that it would be folly for us to aim at anything more. The time has gone by when a small nation can hope to be the carriers of a larger nation; it never existed in conditions similar to those in which we stand in relation to the United States. We are competing with a people who have all the energy and all the enterprise that we have, and they will never let us take an important part of their carrying trade. In connection with this construction of the Pacific Railway, we have had again a re-hash of the National Policy. Hon. gentlemen on the other side have exhausted this subject, I think, at last. The hon. member for Lambton finds it difficult to shake it off, but keeps repeating that we have adopted a Tariff by which "a few monopolists are enriched at the expense of the great mass of the people." And we are told, among other things, that Protection has ruined the shipping interest of the United States. Now, I happen to find, in an American Statistical Almanac, a statement of the number of vessels built in the United States during the year ending June 30th, 1879. There were built 1,132 vessels measuring 193,031 tons. The statement of the hon. gentleman is one of those hap hazard statements which the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie) is in the habit of making, taking the chance that nobody will contradict him.

MR. BLAKE: How many of these are sea-going vessels?

MR. McLENNAN: About 408.

MR. BLAKE: Oh.

MR. McLENNAN: But, I think, that is a respectable number for a ruined trade.

MR. BLAKE: What is the tonnage of those?

MR. McLENNAN: You will find the tonnage at page 63 of the almanac, it is an almanac that is scattered about the House. Then as to the mass of the people—I would ask that hon. gentleman, and the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), if the condition of the working people in this country is not much better than that of the same class in countries of so-called Free-trade? My impression is that the people are much better off here than in Free-trade England. We continue to hear of the "grating and grinding" Tariff, in order to make the statement emphatic. The hon. member for Gloucester entertained this House by grinding his teeth, but I do not think it makes all these figures any more true. This subject is exhausted. The country has decided this question, and it may be relegated to school boys and debating classes. I notice in an English Review, a well known publication, an article on the subject of the "Wheat fields of Canada," that might have been written by some hon. gentleman on the other side of this House. It reads:

"If Canada could be persuaded so to modify her Tariffs as to encourage the import of those goods with which we can best supply her, she might almost monopolise the English trade, receiving in return not only cheap manufactures and implements of agriculture, but a splendid revenue, which she now sacrifices for the sake of protecting a few manufacturing interests, and of enabling scheming tradesmen to wax rich at the expense of the whole community. If, however, she persists in her present policy, other corn-growing countries will doubtless undersell her."

I think, Sir, there are as many fallacies as lines in this extract. The idea of importing agricultural implements, chiefly made of wood, from Great Britain, is the perfection of that sort of thing called Free-trade; and who are the "scheming tradesmen?" Then how are we to monopolise the trade in Great Britain in breadstuffs, or prevent all the world from competing, where we have no advantage, is something that requires a Free-trader to explain. The fact is, that a year ago we gave up the idea of being guided by the Free-trade theories of Great Britain; we decline to wear the old clothes of that or any other nation. But the hon. member for West Durham has something on his hands besides the Railway policy. The question of his Resolution is the subject of the construction of the Pacific Railway in British Columbia, but I think everybody has discovered that his object is to construct something much smaller—or larger, perhaps, to his views—than a Railway, that is: a platform. He appeals to the poor man in Canada, he appeals to the poor man in Great Britain, to the poor Irishman and to the German, he appeals to Ontario and Quebec, and he brings up that argument that we have heard so often of the great advantages of the neighbouring Republic; but he will have to try again. The Irishmen who have come to this country, for a great many years, find in this country that "beneficent" measure of Home Rule that we have heard so much about; I do not know any country under Heaven, where Home Rule exists more completely than in this country; the German is not to be misled; nor is the Irishman; he knows that his condition in this country is infinitely better than in Free-trade England. The hon. gentleman measured the value of the land by those going from the east, from the older Provinces into the new Provinces; he will have to begin earlier; he will have to begin with the Genesis of man, and consider all his relations, his rivals, and his helpers; he will have to take up the question of the potency of matter, and find some matter much more substantial to construct and maintain a platform than anything contained in his five or six hours speech.

Mr. BLAKE: Oh.

Mr. McLENNAN: But the hon. gentleman is in great haste; he thinks too highly of my hon. friends on the Treasury Benches. We, on this side of the House, have a good opinion of them, but we do not think them quite an immaculate conception—he should have waited a year or two, or three, when they might have made some mistake—committed some folly—as they are human, and therefore short of perfection—he would, perhaps, have found some subject upon which to base an attack upon them; but his great haste has led him into the great mistake of building up a platform of sand, that is crumbling under his weight.

Mr. BLAKE: Oh.

Mr. McLENNAN: The hon. gentleman, in attacking the hon. gentlemen on the Treasury Benches, in his long speech, has sounded a note of warning; he has told them that if they adopt economy in every branch of the Service, and endeavour to make both ends meet, they may have some success; that is really the important part of that long speech, and to that part of it I would call the earnest attention of my friends on the Treasury Benches. This is the little mouse that has crept out of that great mountain in labour, and I think my hon. friends will do well to listen to the wise counsel it offers, and to guard well their expenditure, to practice economy, not only in the vast expenditure on the Pacific Railway, but in all the Departments in every form. This Railway policy, their land policy, and their financial policy are sound, but they require this standing guard, and if this is kept applied, we may hope that our friends will keep these Benches long enough to lay broad and deep the foundation of our future prosperity.

Mr. DAWSON: I have listened very attentively to the debate on this important subject, and while on the one side the policy of the Government has been very clearly explained by the hon. the Minister of Railways, the difficulties to be encountered, and, I trust, overcome, have been very fully set forth by hon. members on the Opposition Benches. I was glad to hear the hon. Minister say that faith must be kept with British Columbia, and, if we may judge of the feeling of the people of that Province by the sentiments expressed by their representatives in this House, I believe they will not be unreasonable in their expectations. In the present state of the finances we must proceed slowly and with caution. The country west of the mountains, no doubt, presents great difficulties to railway construction, so that the choice of route has been a matter requiring extreme care; and I am not prepared to say, from any reports with which we have been favoured, that the selection of Burrard Inlet as the western terminus—a selection which was made by the late Government and approved by the present—is not the best that could, under all circumstances, have been made. The sections which have been placed under contract, extending as they do, one hundred and twenty-five miles inland from the coast, and connecting with an important stretch of navigable water in the interior, will render a large district of country available for settlement, in the meantime. I was always in hopes that the Dean Inlet, Bute Inlet, or the Gardener Channel might have proved to be accessible from the Ocean on one side, and from the Interior on the other. East of the mountains, the route by the lesser Slave Lake and the Pine River Pass is evidently the one which would best promote the settlement and development of the country, but if, by taking that route, the only port available on the Pacific coast would be Port Simpson, it is, of course, out of the question for the present. If any of the Inlets which I have mentioned could have been availed of it would without doubt have been the best. But Port Simpson, although a good harbour, seems to be too far north. It is much to be regretted that, notwithstanding the enormous expenditure on surveys the reports supplied by the Chief Engineer should have left the subject so much in confusion. Last year he recommended Burrard Inlet, while now, in his report of the 30th September last, he suggests that no selection should be made until the country shall have been still further explored. After nine years of survey, with unlimited means at his disposal, this is surely a lame and impotent conclusion. I have looked over the reports submitted within the past few days to the House, and among these, I have read the paper furnished by the Rev. Mr. Gordon, with a great deal of interest. He describes very clearly and graphically the intricacies and difficulties of the Pacific slope; explains the character of the climate of that region, and leads you, with the skill of an artist, through the passes of the Rocky Mountains to the wide-spreading plains of the Peace River. On reading his lucid descriptions of the country, and his very clear and practical views as to its adaptation for railways, one feels inclined to regret that he and the Chief Engineer could not change places, the Church might lose, but the public service would gain, at all events it could not lose. This report, so lucid and comprehensive, so cautious and truthful, is in striking contrast to the special pleading in favour of particular lines, which marks too many of the reports which we have hitherto had. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that the House and the country will endorse the policy of the Government in placing under contract the sections west of the Red River, as they will render available a very large extent of the region best adapted for settlement. Two hundred miles may not count for much in a territory of such vast extent, but the construction of these sections is a step in the right direction, and we must proceed slowly and cautiously in the present condition of the finances. West of Red River the line will pass near the Manitoba Lake and be the means of rendering accessible the beautiful and extensive country bordering on that magnificent sheet of water. I was glad to hear the hon. the Minister of Railways express himself so strongly and favourably in reference to the Sault Ste. Marie Branch. Last year I drew attention to the advantages of opening this line, and I pointed out that while it would be the means of developing a fine country on lake Lake Huron, it would enable communication to be kept up for a much longer period than it now can, through Canadian territory with Manitoba—we have, indeed, a country worth developing on Lake Huron. It is not quite so level as the far-famed regions of the North-West; but it presents advantages equal, if not superior, to those to be met with on the prairies. To the north of Lake Huron, there is a country of great extent presenting a pleasing diversity of mountain and valley, of river and lake. In the valleys, there are wide stretches of the richest agricultural lands and, all over the country, forests in which much valuable timber can be found. The new settler on the prairies shivers as the winter blasts sweep over the unbroken plains from which the slender boards of his new tenement afford but slight protection. In the valleys of Algoma he has always a generous log fire, and at least a comfortable hut; on the prairies, when the ground is deep in snow, he has no occupation. In the forests of Algoma he can always find work, even in winter, to remunerate him well. On the prairies, his hand must be often in his pocket, if only to purchase fence rails or a handle for a hoe. In the cozy forest, a few blows of his axe give the necessary supply. The prairies, no doubt, have their advantages, but on them a man requires capital to begin with, while in the friendly forests he needs little besides his axe. Settlement has been advancing fast, although but little noticed, in Algoma within the past few years. Five years ago the country was a wilderness, but wheat is now exported in considerable quantity from the Manitoulin Islands and the north shore of Lake Huron. The hon. the Minister of Agriculture sends but pamphlets inviting settlers to the prairies of the North-West, why does he not ask a few to come to the less distant and more genial country of Algoma. Let this Sault St. Marie Branch once be opened and such an impetus will be given to development that the local traffic will become a matter of no small importance to it. The trade in lumber would rapidly expend, the fish of Lakes Huron and Superior, packed in ice, would find their way to the cities of the East and the mineral resources of Algoma, among which we can reckon silver and copper and iron, would all help to give traffic to the Railway. It has hitherto been too much the custom to decry this vast region of Algoma. But, covering as it does a very considerable portion of the Dominion, with our great inland seas on its southern border, and navigable rivers to the north and north-west, with a climate throughout quite equal to the average climate of Ontario and Quebec, it is destined to become a region of great importance. But the Sault St. Marie Branch, while it would develop a new region, and thus gain a local traffic, would have a far wider range of usefulness. Its western terminus would be within twenty-four hours run of Thunder Bay, and Lake Superior can be navigated through a great part of the winter, so that it would command the traffic of our own North-West; but in winter it would also have a large foreign traffic, for our neighbours are now busy with projects to connect Duluth and St. Paul by rail with Sault St. Marie. If these great schemes should ever be carried out, and there is every reason to believe that, at least, some of them will be so in the near future, the Sault St. Marie Branch will have a winter traffic fully up to its capacity for carriage. We will then have an easy and quick way of going in winter to Manitoba and the North-West. But it would give us another winter route, or at least a route that would be available for a great part of the winter. I have been for some time past in communication with parties well able to give information at Silver Islet and Sault St. Marie; and the result of such enquiries as I have made goes to show that outside the bays and sheltered sounds, Lake Superior, east of Isle Royal, is a permanently open sea. Captain Trethewey, the Manager of the Mines, and Mr. Livingston, the Custom-house Officer at Silver Islet, have furnished me with statements from which the following is compiled:—

MR. LIVINGSTONE'S REPORT.

Silver Islet—Winter 1870-71, mild. Tug ran all winter, except one month, from 8th February till 8th March, large steamers could have run all winter.

Winter of 1871-72—Tug ran ten months during season, stopped only from 14th January till 18th March. Open water within 600 yards of Islet, Isle Royal, sound open.

Winter of 1872-73, severe. Tug stopped running 28th January, and did not resume, but a powerful steamer could have run to the Islet easily, except for about two months. So severe was the weather in February that the ice took across Isle Royal sound.

Winter of 1873-74, mild. Tug stopped running 30th January and resumed 25th April. Sound, clear all winter.

Winter of 1874-75, very severe. Tug stopped running 10th January. Sound again, frozen over for a short time.

Winter of 1875-76 was moderate. Tug stopped running on 28th January. Sound clear.

Winter of 1876-77. Tug ran all winter, except five weeks, large steamers could have come all winter to Silver Islet dock.

Winter of 1877-78 mild. Tug ran all winter. No ice about the channel, and sound, clear.

Winter of 1878-79, mild. No ice to prevent steamers running

Winter of 1879-80. So far (28th January) mild. Tug running, no ice.

I have also returns from Sault St. Marie, and from the lighthouse keeper of White Fish Point, with which I need not detain the House farther than to say that, in ordinary winters, steamers could come all winter as far down as the Straits, but that, in severe winters, the outer edge of the strong ice forms a curve from Iroquois Point, on the United States side, to Isle Parisieu, on the north, or Canadian side. Outside Batchewana Bay, however, the lake is permanently open, and Batchewana Bay is a good harbour. All accounts agree in this, that the lake can be navigated anywhere by steamers all through December, and that, after the 20th of March, such steamers as were properly prepared for breaking through the ice in the bays, could resume running. So that it is safe to say, that Lake Superior could be navigated for nine months out of the twelve. It will thus be seen that, by constructing a railway to Sault St. Marie, and extending it from thence a few miles westward to some harbour at the lower or eastern end of Lake Superior, we can for nine months of the year keep up communication through our own Territory with Manitoba, and this is a very important matter, pending the construction of a railway to the north of Lake Superior. There has been some discussion during the present debate in reference to the sections extending from Thunder Bay to Manitoba. The late Premier, in explaining what had been his intentions in respect to the opening of the route in the first instance and the discrepancies between the Chief Engineer's estimates and the actual cost which are now dawning upon us, said that "he had not had the slightest reason to doubt the accuracy of the estimates of $25,000 per mile from Thunder Bay to Selkirk, that he was not aware that there was any thing wrong with Mr. Fleming's estimates, that Mr. Fleming had said that he was prepared to abide by his estimates of quantities; and further that he never heard Mr. Fleming say that his estimates were mere guess work. The estimates and quantities were over his (Mr. Fleming's) own signature, etc." He now knows that the figures given by Mr. Fleming, with the weight of his signature were the merest guess-work, and I am glad that the scales have fallen from his eyes at last. It might have saved him from many mistakes had he known sooner that the Chief Engineer's quantities and figures were the merest guess-work. In regard to this section between Thunder Bay and Manitoba, had he adhered to his first scheme of running a railway to Sturgeon Falls, improving the navigation between that place and the narrows of the Lake of the Woods, and running a railway from the latter place to Fort Garry, he would have saved to the country many millions of dollars which must now be expended, and the ultimate all-rail line would have been thirty-five miles shorter than the present roundabout one by Rat Portage, but he was led astray by his Engineer, who, in a pamphlet just issued by him, says:—"There are points between the terminus on Lake Superior and the prairie region which govern the whole location. The geographical position of the Lake of the Woods, on the international boundary, defines Keewatin, at the outlet of the Lake, to be one of these; Selkirk, in the writer's view, is clearly another. The problem was to connect these points, etc." Now, it is wretched crotchets like these in the Engineer's head which seem to have led to all the mischief. Most engineers, on looking at the map and knowing the character of the country, as the Chief Engineer should have known it, would at once say, that in running a line from Lake Superior westward, the governing points were Sturgeon Falls, the Narrows of the Lake of the Woods and Fort Garry, and they would have projected the work so as ultimately to connect these points by rail, even if they had to avail themselves at the outset of the water stretches. This was the intention of the late hon. Premier at the outset and, having this scheme in view, he commenced the lock at Fort Francis, but the Chief Engineer, with his crotchets about governing points and his "guess-work" estimates, completely overpowered the hon. gentleman and led him to adopt a northern route which is considerably longer and vastly more expensive. His first mistake was in yielding his better judgment to the conceits of a gentleman of exceedingly visionary tendencies and and his next in continuing the lock when the scheme, which was to render it useful, was abandoned. The Chief Engineer in his pamphlet just issued appears to have treated his second in command with discourtesy and with great injustice, inasmuch as he throws on him the blame of all his own shortcomings. In reference to the difference between the original quantities and the work returned as executed he says "the fact fell upon him as startling from being unexpected," "as it was alarming and unaccountable," and goes on to say: "Had he been in the country his duty would have led him to take means to keep down the expenditure." etc. This is pretty good, seeing that the estimates and expenditure were all his own, and that he had suppressed the reports of his second in command, Mr. Marcus Smith, whom he thus seeks to make responsible. Take it all in all, the estimates over expenditure and injudicious location, go to show what I have always insisted on, and endeavoured in as far as I could, to bring to light, namely, that the system of management is a system of anarchy. There should be some arrangement by which the views of the able and distinguished Engineers should always be available in reference to this great work—instead of being dependent on a guide so unsafe as the present Engineer-in-Chief. There has been some discussion about a bridge at the Red River, and I observe the Chief Engineer has written a report on the subject, in which he opposes the crossing at Fort Garry because the plains become flooded at long intervals. He is right enough in arguing that, as floods have occurred in the past, we may look for them in the future; but he is quite astray in representing that there would be any particular engineering difficulty in building a bridge which should be above the level of floods, somewhere at or near Winnipeg. His report in this case is a sample of moderately good special pleading against one point and in favour of another, but he ignores certain obvious facts which, in stating the case, should have been taken into account. There have been some references made to Quebec and her system of railways, as also to the financial embarrassment they have occasioned. But in my opinion, the Quebec system has been much in advance of that of Ontario as regards location. In Ontario we have, in some instances, rather too many parallel lines in close proximity. Quebec has at least built one most important line, and the North Shore Railway, now in operation from the city of Quebec to Ottawa, may truly be called a national work, for it gives the country an interior route, sufficiently far from the frontiers to be available under all conceivable circumstances. When connected with the Canada Central, and when the Toronto and Ottawa Railway has come into existence, it will be seen how much the Dominion at large owes to Quebec, for her spirited and well-directed action in constructing this most important national highway. I observe, Mr. Speaker, and I may mention it, although it may be considered a matter of small importance, that a great many very extraordinary names have been set down along the railway line, as shown on this map. Why should not the old names, connected as they are with historical associations, have been retained? Our neighbours retain the old Indian and French names in the North-West, and why should we discard them? In our North-West, there is not a stream, or a lake, a mountain chain, or plain, that has not been traversed by the adventurous French voyageurs of old, and surely the name of Verandrye, and a host of others who followed him to these regions, would look as well on a map as these grotesque and unpronounceable names fresh from the "High Latitudes" of Europe. Why seek to obliterate a country's history by ignoring all that can perpetuate it, in these official documents. A hundred years ago a great many Scotch Highlanders, who had in the first place to leave their own country on account of political troubles, and afterwards left the United States because they would not renounce their allegiance and live under Republican institutions, found homes among the wild Indians of the North-West. They soon became the virtual chiefs. They established good government, and brought peace to warring tribes, and they gave the names familiar on their native mountains to many a stream and glen; but these must all be swept off, while the fantastic maps with which we are favoured are rendered still more grotesque by the use of these outlandish names. Really, Mr. Speaker, I think there should be some amendment in this matter.

MR. GIROUARD (Jacques Cartier): I desire to take this opportunity to contradict a statement which appeared recently in the Liberal organ of Montreal, to the effect that I and some other members of Quebec were opposed to the policy of the Government on the Pacific Railway. The question involved in the motion of the hon. member for West Durham, in my opinion, is whether Canada is bound by a Treaty or other legal agreement to construct the Pacific Railway, from the Pacific to the system of railways in Canada or the United States, within a certain time, or at least as speedily as possible, or only so as not to increase the rate of taxation. I will refer to the Statute which authorises the Union of British Columbia with Canada, and in this respect I beg to lay down a proposition differing somewhat from that maintained by the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Macdougall). Section 146 of the British North America Act says:

“It shall be lawful for the Queen, by and with the advice of Her Majesty's Most Honourable Privy Council, on Addresses from the Houses of the Parliament of Canada, and from the Houses of the respective Legislatures of the Colonies of or Provinces of Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island and British Columbia, to admit those Colonies or Provinces, or any of them, into the Union; and on Address from the Houses of the Parliament of Canada to admit Rupert's Land and the North-Western Territory, or either of them, into the Union, on such terms and conditions in each case as are in the Addresses expressed, and as the Queen thinks fit to approve, subject to the provisions of this Act; and the provisions of any Order and in Council in that behalf shall have effect as if they had been enacted by the Parliament of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland.”

Now, under what terms and conditions did British Columbia enter the Union? These terms are to be found in our Statutes of 1872, and it must be conceded that this Parliament has no jurisdiction whatever upon these terms, because they were made under the authority of an Act of the Imperial Parliament. We find among certain papers, which are annexed to the Canadian Statutes for 1872, an Order in Council of Her Majesty's Privy Council, to the effect that British Columbia shall be admitted into and become part of the Dominion of Canada upon the terms and conditions set forth in the respective addresses of the Parliament of Canada, and of the Legislature of British Columbia. At paragraph eleven it is said:

We find in this clause that there is no reservation whatever, such as was made by the House of Commons in 1871, that is to say, that the said Railway was to be built in such a manner as not to increase the rate of taxation of the people of this country. We do not find this reservation, which was subsequently repeated, not only in a Resolution of the House of Commons, but even in the Acts of this Parliament, and more particularly in the Acts of 1872, providing for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and incorporating two companies for the purpose of building that Railway. It is perfectly plain that these Statutes, as well as these Resolutions of the House of Commons, cannot have any effect upon the terms and conditions which were agreed upon between the two parties, that is to say: British Columbia on the one side and the Dominion of Canada on the other, under the authority of an Act of British Parliament. I am opposed to the Resolution of the hon. member for West Durham, for the simple reason that we have no jurisdiction in this Parliament to change the terms and conditions under which British Columbia was admitted into the Union. These changes could be made only by the consent of both parties, under the authority of a new Act of the Imperial Parliament. For these reasons, I am sorry to say, that I consider it absolutely impossible for this Parliament to accept of the proposition of that hon. gentleman. If it were not for this difficulty I would feel disposed to vote for his motion. A good deal has been said about what has been called the Carnarvon Treaty, and I am inclined to think, with the hon. member for West Durham, that that Treaty has not much force, for the simple reason that it did not receive the sanction of this Parliament. But if this Carnarvon Treaty is to be set aside, in what position are we? We are in a still worse position. Then we have to fall back upon the Terms as laid down in the Addresses from this Parliament and from British Columbia at the time of the Union. The road must be constructed within ten years, that is to say, in 1882. We are in a worse position, because under the Carnarvon Treaty we have until 1890, and we have a still more important clause, to the effect that we are not bound to expend more than $2,000,000 per annum. I do not think it was patriotic on the part of the hon. member for West Durham to repudiate this Carnarvon Treaty, which certainly introduced better terms in favour of Canada. If I voted for the motion of that hon. gentleman, I would consider that I was voting for repudiating an obligation of this country. In a new country like ours, public works must generally be carried on by means of loans in foreign markets; and I ask any hon. member of this House, whether it would be wise for us to establish such a precedent in view of its effect upon our credit? We are carrying on important works in this country. We are enlarging our canals, we are building railways, and if we are going to lay down the principle here that we may repudiate an obligation to do a certain public work, what guarantee can we give to the world that we may not repudiate our other obligations—our public debts. For that reason, and that is the principle reason, in my opinion, I must vote against the Resolution of the hon. member for West Durham. I heard, this afternoon, the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Anglin) state, that this Resolution did not amount to repudiation, but that it purports only to enlarge the time of construction of the Railway. It seems to me that if we endeavour to extend that time we are guilty of repudiation, and, therefore, I must vote against the Resolution.

MR. COCKBURN (Muskoka): I regard the motion of the hon. member for West Durham as a very proper one under the present circumstances. It must be remembered that we have a deficit this year, and, moreover, I have no great faith that we will be able to realise large sums of money from the sales of land which are expected by the hon. the First Minister. I think he has taken a very visionary view of the receipts from sales of land in the North-West. I hope his anticipations may turn out correct, and, if so, then we can go on with the western section of this Railway. I have had some experience about the collection of money for land sold to new settlers. I have known, in some instances, parties who have been on the land for twenty years without taking a patent from the Government. We may rely upon it that, in some instances, we shall not receive anything from the settlers on this land for about twenty years. Many of them will bring a strong pressure to bear upon the Government to have the interest commuted, and also the principal in many cases. I think that these hon. gentlemen, who have directed their shafts against the hon. member for West Durham, have mistaken the feelings of this country. That hon. gentleman has a great mass of friends of both political parties. I have heard many Conservatives entirely subscribe to his view. The hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. McLennan) stated it would only be necessary to extend the line of Railway about two hundred miles to the west of Winnipeg, now to carry on the present development of our prairie country. I am sure that it will require a more comprehensive scheme than that to develop our North-West. I sympathise with the hon. members from British Columbia, and I do not blame them for the language they have used. It is their duty to insist that the terms and conditions of the Treaty should be fulfilled. They would be recreant to their trust if they did not do so. At the same time, we, on the other hand, have got to look at facts as we find them. The motion of the hon. member for West Durham does not propose to abandon the construction of the Pacific Railway, but merely to postpone it. No doubt a large amount of money will be required for the working of that road, with but little traffic returns to compensate for the outlay. With respect to settlement in the North-West, I have heard a great deal about pamphlets treating on that question. The hon. the Minister of Agriculture has been pretty well catechised on that subject, but I am sure he would not intentionally allow any such literature to go out. I think that hon. members on both sides of the House have erred in sending out hundreds of thousands of these pamphlets. I think many Ontario members, on both sides of the House, have committed a grave mistake in sending out vast numbers of these pamphlets to people who had no intention of leaving the Old Countries, and the new country was not sufficiently opened up to receive a very large influx of emigration. The large emigration to the North-West has been alluded to, but it is well-known that a great number of those who have taken passage to Manitoba have returned in disgust from Winnipeg and settled in Dakota or Minnesota. My chief object in asking the indulgence of the House for a few moments, was to refer to the past policy of the late Government in respect to the more easterly section of the road. The hon. member for Lambton inaugurated the Georgian Bay Branch scheme, which was well calculated to serve the interests of at least Quebec and Ontario. My constituency in particular has suffered a gross injustice at the hands of the present Administration, by the cancellation of the contracts which my hon. friend from Lambton had entered into. If the claims preferred against the Government are paid $200,000 will have been expended, or rather wasted, upon that road by the cancellation, and if the contract had been gone on with fifty miles would have been completed by the 1st July. They have, in the course they have taken, abandoned a scheme which would have been most serviceable to the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec, and the people will hold the Government to strict account for the $200,000 which have been wasted upon that branch. It has been contended that the motion of the hon. member for West Durham is a blow at the Union, and that it is a repudiation of the Terms of Union. It is, however, nothing of the kind. It merely asks for a postponement of the undertaking. Although the British Columbia members have a certain right to insist upon the Terms being carried out—but I hope they will exercise some patience, and wait a little longer, in order that we may see how matters are going, until we see how the land scheme will work, until we see how the hon. the Minister of Finance comes out with his Budget next year—I trust that the motion of the hon. member for West Durham will prevail in the House, as I am sure it will in the country.

MR. BARNARD: We can regard the motion of the hon. member for West Durham in no other light than a Repudiation Resolution. We do not take the exact wording of the Resolution, but we go back over the conduct of the party in Opposition in reference to this matter. From the first discussion that arose in reference to the admission of British Columbia into the Dominion, we can see a determination on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite never to admit British Columbia on anything like fair terms: and even if we did succeed in obtaining fair terms, those terms could be broken upon the first opportunity. Hon. gentlemen have asserted that the people of British Columbia have been extremely unreasonable, but they have satisfied themselves with making the assertion. They have not attempted to show that we were unreasonable. The people, I think, under the circumstances, have been extremely reasonable. We regarded the Terms as exceedingly liberal, and when the two or three years elapsed between the confirmation of these Terms and the resignation of the Macdonald Administration, we did not complain that the work had not been commenced. We simply entered a protest to the effect that the surveys had not been completed. The first move of the hon. member for Lambton, after succeeding to power, was to assume that we were going to be hostile to him. He took the ground that some alteration of the Terms was necessary. We contended there was no alteration required, but we were offered additional terms which involved an additional expenditure of $4,000,000. I was utterly dumbfounded that this additional taxation should be necessitated by the party which had persistently declared that the offer already made was so onerous that Canada could not bear it. I regret exceedingly that subsequently no arrangement could be arrived at between our Government and the Dominion Government. The result was that England was appealed to and the Carnarvon Terms were agreed to, which I maintain are not less onerous than those formerly entered into. Let me here call the attention of the House to statements that have been made in reference to the value of British Columbia as a country. It has been asserted, over and over again, that British Columbia was of no value to the Dominion, and, in fact, the hon. member for West Durham went so far as to make the statement that the country was utterly worthless. It was contended that British Columbia was of no value because she was not a grain-growing country. Now, there is a mistake about that. There is more arable land in British Columbia than it is generally credited with possessing. We never put forward a claim that it is a grain-growing country. Our claim is that it is a mineral Province of great value, as will ultimately be proven. Our grain-growing section lies principally east of the Cascade Range. As was shown by the map laid on the Table of this House, a few days ago, which purported to exhibit the tracts of good and bad land in the North-West and in British Columbia; in that map a tract of good land, lying between the Rocky Mountains and the Cascade Range, was shown, which, on measurement, was declared to be 20,000 acres in extent, in which, I take it, sufficient wheat could be grown to make an important item in the traffic of a railway. After my election I obtained information from every district in the Province as to the quantity of grain that had been grown in the Province. I was astonished at the result. I found that our farmers had raised during the year 8,000 tons of grain, and when we come to consider the small number of farmers to be found in a population of 12,000 or 15,000 persons, the House will easily understand the ground must have been very prolific to raise so large a quantity. We must remember also that the crop was put in at a time of serious depression, for this House had just declared that the location of the Burrard Inlet route was premature, and everything indicated that the Railway would be carried away north of all settlement. Consequently, each farmer put in a limited number of acres. It will hardly be assumed that we have now under crop one acre in every hundred of arable land we possess. Should we have an addition to our population of 12,500 farmers, who will cultivate eighty acres each—and surely this is a moderate calculation—the result would be that 800,000 tons of grain would be raised yearly. Taking it for granted that we could spare 400,000 tons, or say one-half, for exportation, would that not yield to the Railway quite a considerable revenue. It would go a long way towards paying the expense of that 127 miles for twelve months, and, in fact, would very likely yield a revenue. Well, now, it might be said: "Is it likely that this 127 miles of road which simply, as it were, enters the country—is it at all likely that there is country enough through which it runs to raise 800,000 tons of grain, and is it concentrated in such a shape that the Railway can take it up?" Extraordinary as it may appear, that is a fact. The road starts at Yale, it goes through the canons where there is no land of any account until it reaches Lytton. At Lytton, by taking the course of the Fraser, and expending a few thousand dollars in the improvement of that river, we secure navigation for 25 miles. I have the report made to the hon. Minister of Public Works, a few years ago, dated 1875. Before reading extracts from this report, I will inform the House that the Columbia River is very similarly situated to the Fraser River, and that previous to the improvement of that river, it was impossible to move grain to the front; and agriculture to the east of the Cascades, in Washington Territory and Oregon, was, as it is with us at the present time, confined to supplying the wants created in the vicinity. I gather the following from the Report:

"I have the honour to transmit herewith a copy of Mr. G. B. Wright's Supplementary Report on the big bar canon of the Fraser River, showing the nature of the obstructions to the navigation of the river at that point. Mr. Wright estimates the cost of removing rock at $100,000, but I think that his estimate is far too high, even for work carried on so far in the interior. It appears that a road or tramway can be built from the reach below to that above, not exceeding two miles in length, at a cost of about $3,000 to $4,000, with a good landing at each end. With a view to show what has been done in Washington Territory and Oregon by the improvements of the Columbia river, in developing the country, I desired Mr. Wright to obtain some statistics bearing upon this subject, the general results which I now lay before you for the consideration of the hon. the Minister of Public Works.

“One cannot fail to observe the general similarity between the Columbia and Fraser rivers, in their course, nature of obstructions, and source, as well as in the fact that both plow through the Cascade Range of mountains in their passage to the sea. The upper waters of both are sluggish and well adapted to steamboat navigation. In the Columbia, the first serious obstacle occurs at the Cascades, where a railway five miles in length has been built, to avoid rapids, considered incapable of improvement. Another portage occurs forty miles above this point, from the Dalles to Cilito, a distance of thirteen miles. A railway has been built here. From this point the river is navigable at all stages of waters to Wallula, a distance of 140 miles. At high water, steamers ascend 160 miles further, to the town of Lewiston. Large sums of money have been, and are still being, expended in blasting and removing rocky obstructions from this river. Prior to the improvement of the navigation of the river and the construction of the two railways before mentioned, freight was carried from Portland up to Wallula at $100 per ton. There was no freight downwards, as the rates were prohibitory, although the country was admirably adapted for raising wheat. The rates now on upward freight is $20 per ton, and on downward freight $5 per ton. The effect of the improvement to navigation is shown by the tonnage, chiefly wheat, shipped during the last three years :

1874	9,600 “

Lately I applied to the Oregon Steam Navigation Company, and they have sent me the following returns, which brings the statement down to date :

1875	10,600 Tons.
1876	18,700 “
1879	44,800 “

It will be noticed that the quantity of freight offering has gradually increased since the improvements referred to have been made. Here we have a country lying to the east of the Cascades fit for the produce of cereals, but the produce of which, up to 1872, could not be utilised on account of the difficulty of forwarding it to the front. That is precisely the position we occupy in British Columbia to day. We have a grain-growing country to the east of the Cascades, and have not, so far, been able to move one bushel to the front, and there they have been compelled to use foreign grain up to the present. The Report goes on to say with reference to the improvement of the Fraser :

principal grain-producing region of the interior, which may be estimated at not less than 200,000 acres, capable of producing 300,000 tons of wheat per annum. Now it is a desert, owing to its inaccessibility, and the exorbitant rate of freight.”

Thus we find that a comparatively small sum expended in improving the Fraser River, above Lytton, would not only enable the farmers of Lilloet district, who are already large producers, to reach a market, but the whole line of the Fraser River up to the Quesnelle would furnish freight and become a feeder to the Railway. Thus, from Lytton, we have a river running 260 miles through a territory, on each side of which there are grain-growing lands. I know, from my own observation, the area of good land is much greater than reports and accounts of travellers estimate it. The report to the hon. the Minister of Public Works, from which I have already quoted, comes much nearer doing justice to the value of that section of British Columbia than those of casual travellers. From Savona's Ferry, the northern terminus of the present contract, we have a water stretch. We have navigation up North Thompson's River, for 100 miles on each side of which we have considerable tracts of land fit for cultivation. Then we go in a south-easterly direction another 100 miles, where we have another very good grain-growing section of country, on each side of the South River. Quite a quantity of grain can also be raised along the valley of the Spallumcheen, which stretches out in a southerly direction towards Lake Okanagan. This valley is very low, scarcely above the water-level of the lakes, between which it lies. A very few thousand dollars will suffice to clear out that stream, and enable steamers of two feet draught of water to reach Lake Okanagan, thus opening up another seventy miles in the direction of the southern boundary. Thus we see that the location of this Railway gives us the advantage of opening up our country 260 miles in one direction, 100 in another, and 100 in a third direction. We are too much in the habit, if I may use the vulgar term, of crying stinking fish. I have heard gentlemen on the other side decry our country in their ignorance, and, notwithstanding what they might read in the various reports, never giving us credit for what good does exist in that country. Taking up the reports of gentlemen travelling through the country, camping out in all weathers, one cannot expect to find in them a very pleasant description of the country. That is no reason, however, why the leading men of the Loyal Opposition should stand on the floor of this House and read by the hour such reports as they think are the most damaging to our Province. But, Sir, why should we complain? We are not alone in this matter. Other countries on the Pacific coast have been equally misunderstood. In the early settlement of California it was declared by farmers, who went in there for gold, that there was no agricultural land in that state—in fact for years they used Chili flour there. To-day California exports $16,000,000 worth of wheat, a great portion of which is sent to the British Empire. The first men who turned their attention to farming there complained that the good land was all taken up by the missions, and that none was left for settlement. To-day, however, the area is increasing, because they find it is not necessary to have land on the levels; even those high lands are being put under cultivation by a new system of irrigation by which a still greater area of land is made fit for cultivation. I mean the system of tunneling the hills to obtain water, a system that can be made applicable to our hills as well as those of California. Oregon ranks high among the grain exporting countries whose exports of wheat, to-day, are 225,000 tons. Well, what was said of Oregon by the first settlers was similar to what is now said of British Columbia. Mr. Keith, who was in charge of the Hudson's Bay Company's business in Oregon, at the time they purchased the right to carry on the fur business there, wrote to London to say that if they wished to carry on business there they would have to send flour out for their employes, 'as the country would not grow anything. Yet, to-day, there is shipped from Oregon 225,000 tons of wheat alone, besides what was raised for her own consumption and what she shipped to California, in which business two lines of steamships running to San Francisco are engaged. It was said of California that there was no agricultural land. The same statement was made with regard to Oregon, and we have heard it made here with regard to British Columbia. I think I am not wrong in saying that the hon. member for Lambton said, on one occasion, that there was not as much land in British Columbia as would make a good farm.

MR. MACKENZIE: I never said anything of the kind.

MR. BARNARD: Well, it was something near it.

MR. MACKENZIE: No, it was not near it.

MR. BARNARD: Perhaps I can recall the incident to the hon. gentleman's recollection. He said he had very good authority for the statement, because his brother was in British Columbia and gave him the information. Perhaps that will bring the matter to the hon. gentleman's recollection.

MR. MACKENZIE: I never said anything of the kind.

MR. BARNARD: Well, perhaps I am wrong. I can understand that a man going through that country, for the first time, would declare, most unhesitatingly, that the land he was walking over would yield nothing, I had the same impression myself until I saw miners, who had come from countries where the value of irrigation was understood, busily tilling the land, and obtaining large results. All that is required is water, and that we find by digging ditches in the land. With water you can raise cereals to good advantage. Talk about the country being of no consequence at all; why, even the Indians there are bidding with the farmers of Ontario, and taking prizes from them for wheat, as they did at the Centennial Exhibition. Here, in this city, at the Dominion Exhibition, a medal was awarded to an Indian who raised grain in British Columbia, for the best sample of wheat shown. He also took a medal for the best sample of oats at the Philadelphia Exhibition. Is it not well to hesitate before denouncing, in a wholesale manner, our country. What part of the play is it that hon. gentlemen opposite are acting here. Over and over again they take up documents, as if our word was not to be depended upon, to declare that there is no land in that Province fit for cultivation. I never before heard of a country so traduced by its own people. Go into the United States and you will not find, anywhere, a set of men in any position of life, that will stand up and systematically denounce the country that gives them their bread, as has been done by gentlemen of the Opposition during this debate. Here is a map of the Railway from Omaha to San Francisco. Some 200 miles out of Omaha you reach the North Platte River, and from there to within a few miles of Sacramento, there is not a solitary farm to be seen in the whole length of the road between those two points—some 1,600 miles. You will find nothing in the way of agriculture in sight of the train beyond a few garden spots. All is a wilderness of wormwood and sand. As we go through the State of Wyoming, there are no farms or farming land in sight, yet people are coming in and settling all the time. In Colorado there is a large portion of the land unfit for cultivation. Yet we never hear Americans denouncing these districts, but, on the contrary, agents are employed to induce emigrants to go there; and so on through Utah and Nevada. Nothing in sight but a cheerless waste; no improvement beyond a few houses at the railway station. Yet, travel as you may, converse with whom you please among the Americans, you meet with no man who denounces his country. They are always ready to point out the advantages each State possesses. Not so with gentlemen of the Opposition. If I were an agent sent out to promote emigration to the United States, I would ask no better argument than to take up the Hansard, as it will appear in a few weeks from this, with the speeches of the hon. gentlemen opposite, and send their statements broadcast throughout the world. Our poor little Province has to come in for her share. Our people went out there to better their condition by gold-hunting, and, therefore, are not deserving of consideration. I beg hon. gentlemen to remember that those of us who first settled there, did much to create the good, wholesome Canadian sentiment that resulted in our joining the Dominion and giving her an outlet on the Pacific, without which her North-West would have been of little value. We knew that Canada would, one day, be a large and influential nation, and we hoped and desired to be a part and parcel of her as such; but the gentleman who claims to be the eminent defender of public morality wills it not. "If she is not reasonable let her go," is the argument used. "We have made a bad bargain and must stand by it if we wish to be honest;" "but we have made a bad bargain, and, therefore, must break it." If it is not repudiation; if this putting off does not mean breaking the Terms entered into with British Columbia, what else is it. We know that, nine years ago, British Columbia entered into this Dominion with the distinct understanding that the Pacific Railway should be built in the course of ten years from that time. Now, Sir, the ten years have nearly rolled by, and not one foot of that road, which was promised to British Columbia, and upon the promise of which she entered into the Confederacy, has been built. And now that an effort is being made; now that a policy has been propounded by the present Administration for carrying out the work for the benefit of the whole Dominion, as well as for British Columbia; now that the hon. gentlemen who occupy the Treasury Benches have hit upon a scheme for carrying the work into execution; now that they have adopted and propose to carry out this grand scheme—a scheme that the hon. gentlemen opposite would have given their eye-teeth to have dreamt of—those hon. gentlemen try to throw discredit on it at once, and endeavour to knock it on the head—they did that in antagonism to a former scheme, which would have saved the country many millions of dollars; now that the hon. gentlemen who now carry on the Government have whipped the whole affair clean out of their hands, they say we are going to be ruined entirely by the policy which is being adopted, and they seek to embarrass it by discrediting the country in the eyes of the world. An hon. gentleman on this side of the House, took a manly position, knowing the advantages of a Pacific Province to the Dominion, defended the Province of British Columbia. His speech was a credit to the House and the country; and I take it that the people of British Columbia will understand that their best thanks are due to that hon. gentleman, the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White), for his very able defence of that Province on the floor of this House, and for the effective manner in which he repelled that tirade of abuse from the other side. In looking over a copy of the Bystander, I find that Mr. Goldwin Smith, in speaking of an act of Mr. Blake's, said: "It is written on a disastrous and somewhat inglorious page of Canadian history." May we not ask whether that hon. gentleman has not, in moving this Resolution of repudiation, added another "inglorious" page to Canadian history. Another page of that book says: "Mr. Blake is our most eminent defender of public morals." I would like to know, after the debate of the last four or five days, what position in history that great defender of public morals will take. It may not be immoral to bring down such a Resolution as he has brought down; it may not be immoral to place it before the members of this House, and ask a vote on it, but every act of his, in connection with the British Columbia difficulty, points to the fact that expediency and not morality governs him. But when the Terms with British Columbia first failed, he thought the Ministry of that time had better offer us something for its non-fulfilment, and an offer was made accordingly. It contained one particular clause. I do not know who drew up the document, but the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) was the Minister of Justice, perhaps he did. There was one clause which it was impossible to understand: the question was, whether the $750,000 offered was for the abandonment of the Railway term or in compensation for delays that had taken place. It is most extraordinary how a highly moral man, a great "defender of our public morals," could endeavour to foist on a "miserable handful of people," with probably not a constitutional lawyer in the land, a document that contained such ambiguous language. The hon. gentleman from West Durham has made it plain in his speech, for he has asserted most positively, that the $750,000 was intended as compensation for all delays past and to come. It suited the hon. gentleman to say that during this debate, for it places his party in a better position; but how did he advise Lord Dufferin to explain the offer to our people. His Lordship's words were these:

"Now, here again I will not touch upon the irritating controversies which have circled round this particular step in these transactions.

I am well aware that you consider this offer to have been made under conditions of which you have reason to complain. If this has been the case it is most unfortunate, but still, whatever may have been the sinister incidents connected with the past, the one solid fact remains that the Canadian Government has offered you $750,000 in lieu of the Railway. * * * * This sum may be inadequate, but still I may mention to you the principle upon which this sum has been arrived at under the Nanaimo and Esquimaux Railway Bill, whose rejection by the Senate we have been discussing, Canada was to contribute a bonus of $10,000 a mile. The total distance is seventy miles, consequently, the $750,000 is nothing more or less than the bonus converted into a lump sum."

The House will readily see that the two statements are wholly irreconcilable. It was complained this evening that British Columbia had no faith in the former Government, that they wanted "millions poured into their own laps." What faith could be placed in a party who could send a document like that, and endeavour to entrap us into accepting a trifling sum in lieu of the non-fulfilment of these Terms. In refusing that $750,000, I think we showed distinctly that it was not for money considerations that we formed the connection with Canada. Our desire to enter the Union was both a proper and patriotic one. We looked on Canada as a progressive country, about to establish herself a nation, that could afford to sustain the dignity of a nation—a country that would, if she undertook an agreement, carry it out faithfully; and we looked, naturally, to the country of our birth as the proper country to ally ourselves with. I am satisfied, whether we get this Railway or not, we should have accepted the invitation to join this country. It is hardly fair, therefore, to charge us with being so anxious to obtain money as to be willing to take it under any circumstances. I would like to draw attention to a document circulated, a copy of which has been sent to each member. Were I asked for an opinion, I should say it was issued by the Opposition. In describing the Railway route, the author says:

"From Yellow Head Pass to the Pacific stretches the enormous barren mass of the Rocky Mountains, rent assunder here and there by fearful chasms and terminating abruptly in the sea. The location having surmounted this formidable barrier at an elevation of 4,000 feet winds its gloomy way to the sea, through and along the sides of these mountains which overhang the water roaring beneath in the canons of the Thompson and Fraser Rivers."

This string of nonsense was written by an American engineer who professes to know a great deal of the country. I have travelled from the Yellow Head Pass to the Pacific Ocean, and this description is not in any way applicable to the country. From the centre of the Mountains, down to the sea, I have travelled over the located line. So far from there being such tremendous difficulties, there is nothing of the kind. There is not one engineering obstacle or impediment to the road; in no place do the roaring waters make more disturbance than the falls at the Chaudiere; there is no serious difficulty or impediment to the Railway. I contend that the figures reported to the hon. the Minister of Railways, and by him announced to the House, respecting the cost of construction of the Railway between the summit of the Rocky Mountains and Savona's Ferry, are far in excess of the correct statement. The country is comparatively open and favourable to railway building. It will prove a much lighter piece of work than the hon. gentleman has any conception of. I felt it my duty to defend British Columbia at present; and to inform the House that there is a larger quantity of arable land in it than supposed; and that, with the assistance of this Railway, it will become a considerable grain-growing region. Instead of being regarded as a worthless country, it will yet be considered as rich a Province as Canada possesses. She has within herself all the elements necessary; her coal and iron, her fish, her lumber, her gold, silver and copper, will one day place her among the richest Provinces of this Canada of ours.

MR. BURPEE (Sunbury): My apology for detaining the House at this time of the morning, is the extraordinary position assumed by the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Barnard), who has just taken his seat, as well as other hon. members from British Columbia, namely: That the motion of the hon. member for West Durham would be repudiation of our engagements, a violation of our contracts, and would break up the Union. Mr. Speaker, there is another view of the subject from an eastern standpoint, which, as only one other hon.

member from the Maritime Provinces has spoken on the subject, I think should be further urged, even at this late hour. I have listened attentively to the discussion of this most important subject during the debate, and I understood the hon. the Minister of Railways to say that he would be justified by the Act of Union with British Columbia, to stop the construction of the Pacific Railway whenever the Government decide that it would add to the burdens of the people, as provided by the rider to said Act. If that is the case, the difficulties of the situation will, in my opinion, be met by the motion of the hon. member for West Durham, which should be adopted in view of the embarrassed state of the finances, and the amount of taxation already imposed, which is so unsatisfactory in the east. This motion, now under consideration, only asked for delay on the British Columbia end of the line. The question at issue is, whether we can go on and finish the whole road, including the British Columbia portion, at once, and at the rate indicated by the hon. the Finance Minister, spending on that work $10,000,000 this year, and the same amount next year, and $5,000,000 each succeeding year, until the road is completed, without adding to the burdens of the people. All parties agree that it is expedient and necessary to build that portion of the Canadian Pacific road from Lake Superior to Winnipeg, and thence into the North-West Territory, as far as is required for the settlement of that country; but I do not think that the finances of the Dominion will justify the immediate construction of any portion in the British Columbia Territory, and I think that the hon. member for West Durham has proved and demonstrated that fact by data that cannot be controverted. I have always held, and frequently expressed this opinion in this House: that the building of the Pacific Railway was a burden which should not have been undertaken by Canada alone; but it was quite as much of an Imperial as a Colonial work, and should have received substantial aid from the British Government. It should have been made a condition by Canada before accepting the burdens and responsibility of uniting with that Colony, and adopting what was notoriously the policy of the Home Government. But the correspondence on this subject informs us that British Columbia only asked for a carriage-road through their Province, uniting them with the North-West Territory as a condition of Union, and why the Government of Canada should have voluntarily proposed and bound themselves and the Dominion, as far as our resources would admit, to build a Railway in ten, or even twenty years, is beyond my comprehension. I not only think that the British Government should have assisted, as an Imperial work, the construction of the Pacific Railway; but I think that they should have paid any claims fairly due to the Hudson's Bay Company upon Rupert's Land and the North-West Territory if they had any. Canada should not have been called upon to pay $1,500,000 to that Company, besides giving said Company 50,000 acres of land, and 5 per cent. of the balance of all the land in the Territory. Was it not enough for the Dominion to assume the burdens of colonising this great country with the costs and risks of purchasing the claims of, and caring for, 60,000 Indians, without further burdens and responsibilities? I repeat that the building of the Pacific Railway, and colonising the vast territories through which it runs, is quite as much an Imperial as a Colonial work, and its costs should have been shared by the British Government. I am fortified in that opinion by the declaration of Sir A. T. Galt, the especial Envoy and High-Commissioner of this Government, in a speech delivered by him at a dinner given at Montreal immediately before leaving this country. He said that:

"The people of New Brunswick, Nova Scotia or even of Ontario had no more interest in acquiring or settling the North-West Territory than had the labourers of England or the tenant-farmers of Tipperary."

We have been called upon to pay out of the Revenues of the Dominion for annuities, gratuities to Indians in the North-West for the past year, nearly $1,000,000, including the expenses of the Mounted Police, which are necessary to be maintained on their account, and these Treaty obligations must annually increase as the settlement of the country progresses and game becomes more scarce. In view of these, with our other heavy obligations of our already very large and increasing debt and heavy taxation, I think that we should pause before committing the Dominion to the building of the Pacific Railway until the North-West Territories are colonised and settled, and our resources are in a better condition for proceeding with the whole line. The contention of the hon. the Minister of Railways is that we are now able to do so, and the hon. Premier has furnished the House with a calculation in which he proposes to show us that the road can be built out of money from the sale of lands in the North-West. His calculation is to sell, during the next ten years, 32,000,000 acres of land, on which he proposes to settle over half a million of people in that time, and for which land he expects to receive $38,000,000 in cash and $32,000,000 in securities. I think that the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) has most clearly demonstrated the utter futility of this calculation. He has shown that, in no case, in the United States, where land is equal in fertility, and there are better facilities for settlement, have they been able, in the same extent of territory, to realise, in ten years, more than six millions in money and a like sum in securities. To enable a person to have some idea of the extent of 32,000,000 acres of territory, it is necessary to compare it with some other territory with which we are acquainted. The Provinces of Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick combined, just about represent the area of the territory which the hon. the First Minister hopes to settle in the North West in the course of ten years. It would take all the land in the Maritime Provinces, good, bad and indifferent, settled and unsettled, to make the extent of territory which he proposes to sell and settle in this brief period. The absurdity of the thing is very apparent. But take another view. Take the land which is purchased for settlement in the whole Dominion. In Ontario there are 19,605,000 acres sold; in Quebec, 17,701,000 acres sold; in New Brunswick, 5,453,000 acres; in Nova Scotia, 6,607,000 acres, making a total of 49,000,000 acres of land purchased from the Government by private individuals. Some 13,000,000 acres of this land are held for lumber purposes, and for mining purposes, which will leave only 36,000,000 acres, or a little over the amount of land which the hon. Premier hopes to settle in ten years in the North-West. We have been settling this Dominion nearly a century, and we have only succeeded in all these Provinces in settling 36,000,000 acres of land. Yet the hon. the First Minister proposes, in ten years, to settle 32,000,000 acres in the North-West. I think these two statements are sufficient to illustrate the impossibility of the hon. the First Minister's anticipations being realised. As to the quality of the land, it can scarcely be contended that this new territory will be any better than the land in Ontario. The hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Girouard) stated, that the motion of the hon. member for West Durham was a kind of repudiation. The hon. the Minister of Railways did not take that ground. He took the ground that if we found at any time the state of our finances did not admit of continuing the work we could then stop. He may find that the finances of the Dominion will not admit of our going on with the road even next year. If we went on with the present contracts, even for one year, large liabilities would be incurred, and contractors would want to be reimbursed for their outlay and for damages, and the difficulty in the way of stopping the work would be very great. Another objection to the Resolution is that it will break up the Union. We have heard much of this from the hon. members from British Columbia, and we can sympathise with them. I believe the Union between British Columbia and the other Provinces was premature. I believe that worse things may happen to this Dominion, and worse things may happen for British Columbia than that the Union should be dissolved. The Union, by Act of Parliament, cannot long subsist when there are no commercial ties to strengthen political Union. I think it can be demonstrated that it will be impossible to have commercial Union with that country for many years to come. The hon. member for Victoria (Mr. DeCosmos) has, on several occasions, asked for a separate Tariff suitable to British Columbia, and differing from that of the rest of the Dominion. I felt that there were many good reasons why British Columbia should have a separate Tariff.

The circumstances of that country are very difficult from those of the rest of the Dominion. Under these circumstances, and in view of the fact that there could be no commercial intercourse between these two countries, I hold it was premature for British Columbia to be annexed to this Dominion, and that the Union was detrimental, not only to Canada but to British Columbia herself. If it is dangerous for the British Columbia end of the road to be delayed until our finances will permit of the work being proceeded with, it is more dangerous to go on and build this road in the present state of our finances. There is more danger of breaking up the Union by proceeding at present than by halting at present. I state that advisedly. I assure you, Mr. Speaker, that, in the Province from which I come—and I think the same remark will apply to other Provinces—there is great dissatisfaction at the amount of debt we are rolling up and the amount of taxation already imposed, and the recklessness with which the Government is being conducted. That dissatisfaction is assuming proportions which cannot ere long be controlled, and will culminate, I fear, in a storm which the hon. gentlemen opposite will not be able to allay, and in worse disaster than the secession of British Columbia. If we go on and build that road at present, it will certainly add one hundred million dollars to the heavy debt with which this country is already burdened, and will absorb the entire Customs Revenue to pay the interest alone. I ask is it fair to absorb the whole of our Customs dues and deprive the other Provinces of necessary public works in order to build the British Columbia end of this road, which can be of no service, commercially, at present, but which must entail a large additional burden to operate it? For the reasons I have given to-night, and in view of the state of our finances, I must enter my protest against proceeding with the construction of this portion of the road.

MR. SCHULTZ: As this discussion has been so long and so exhaustive, I desire only to ask the indulgence of the House long enough to enter my protest against the manner in which the western Provinces have been treated by many of the supporters of the amendment. One would think from the tone of hon. gentlemen that the proposed expenditure was to be utterly unproductive of good results either in the development of this western region or of lasting good to the Dominion at large. They seem to have forgotten that the largest, the most productive, and in the near future, the most populous part of this "Canada of ours" lies beyond the western limit of the Province of Ontario, west even of the Province, a portion of which I have the honour of representing in this House. It would seem that, in the grubbing of Ontario stumps and the ensnaring of east-coast lobsters, it is apt to be forgotten that, west of the narrow field of petty provincial jealousies, we have a vast empire, rich enough in agricultural and mineral resources to support a population of 100,000,000. Had it ceased to be true that the tread of empire was westward, or, if true, was its progress to be barred by the Rocky Mountains? By what right did hon. gentlemen sneer at the small population of British Columbia, and jeer at her representatives in this House for their manly endeavours in her behalf? Had it not been shown that, man for man, the population of the Pacific Province have contributed more to the support of the General Government than any other. Have they not waited for the fulfilment of the conditions of Union, with a patience all the more admirable, for the mutterings which showed the forbearance to be one of loyal patriotism rather than indifference. By what right, then, do we exclude these transmontane Canadians from our sympathy, and affect to look upon them as a semi-foreign element, more intent upon rifling the public purse than of aiding the common weal. I am afraid that we are all apt to forget that while political British Columbia is bounded on the east by the Rocky Mountains, yet that physical and commercial British Columbia has for its eastern boundary the one hundredth degree of longitude, and that between that point and the Pacific Ocean there is more of wealth of arable land, of timber, of iron, coal, and the precious metals, than in the whole of the rest of the Dominion. They who live in the east forget that our magnificent prairie country, west of the one hundredth degree, is all tributary to the west coast, and that through some Rocky Mountain Pass and over the portions of the Canadian Pacific Railway, now so severely criticised, its wheat must find its way to the sea, and by the sea to its natural market. In the ten years I have been in Parliament, I have seen the fulfilment of many predictions regarding the Province of Manitoba; and I now venture the prediction, regarding British Columbia, that, if in the ten years to come we make an honest effort to fulfil what we fairly may of the obligations solemnly entered into on her Union, that Province will contribute more to the material wealth of the Dominion, more to the support of the Government, than any of those Provinces which now occupy a front rank in the Union. She is no dowerless bride, this fair Pacific Province; she brought a wealth of resources specially valuable to the rich but useless region on her east, and even if her rocky ranges, so commented upon here, did not contain vast mines of yet undeveloped wealth, she still was necessary as an outlet for the greatest continuous extent of wheat-growing lands the world has seen, which would be useless to us but that a feasible line of Railway has been found to the sea. I shall vote against the Resolution, because I believe the expenditure to be necessary; because the national honour is involved in the attempt, at some measure at least, of our undertaking with British Columbia; because I feel that this branch of our great public works will be as profitable, from its commencement as other detached portions of the natural line, and because this much-belied, patient, long-suffering Province, is for well or for ill, a part and parcel of this Great Dominion, and notwithstanding that nature, as if wearied with the monotony of the prairie, has there thrown the earth's surface into fantastic forms. She has still, as if forecasting the part this Province was to play in the censuring of this Dominion, provided these low passes and natural conditions, which allow the easy curves and low gradients of our great national railway line to the western sea.

PRAYERS.

PICTOU HARBOUR ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

(Mr. Pope, Queen's, P.E.I.)

FIRST READING.

MR. POPE (Queen's, P.E.I.), in moving the first reading of the Bill (No. 106) To amend an Act respecting the Harbour of Pictou, in Nova Scotia, said: The Bill is intended to give power to the three Harbour Commissioners to manage the business of the harbour. Under the present Act the Government have appointed Commissioners, and this Bill proposes to authorise them to appoint a Harbour Master as is done by the Harbour Commissioners at Montreal, Quebec, Sydney and other ports.

Bill read the first time.

REMOVAL OF OBSTRUCTIONS IN NAVIGABLE WATERS BILL.

(Mr. Pope, Queen's, P.E.I.)

FIRST READING.

MR. POPE (Queen's, P.E.I.), in moving the first reading of the Bill (No. 107) To amend the law respecting the removal of obstructions in navigable waters by wrecks, said: The Department of Marine and Fisheries is continually receiving complaints of wrecked vessels and other obstructions impeding navigation. It is the practice of many parties to put those wrecks on the banks of rivers and on the coasts, and leave them there, so that they are carried away by high tides and sunk in channels and other places where they become an obstruction to navigation. The Department is often called on to remove these obstructions; and we merely ask by this Bill for power to make the parties blameable for those obstructions, responsible to us for the cost of their removal.

Bill read the first time.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY.

QUESTION.

MR. BUNSTER: I would like to ask the Premier, after his great success last night, on the motion respecting the Canadian Pacific Railway, whether he will commence its construction in British Columbia this season?

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I think the hon. gentleman ought to have given notice of his question. However, I may say that the matter is under my serious consideration.

GOVERNMENT RAILWAY STATIONS.

QUESTION.

MR. DUMONT enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to construct railway stations in the parishes of St. André, Ste. Hélène and St. Denis, in order to meet the requirements of traffic in those several localities.

MR. LANGEVIN: In the absence of the hon. the Minister of Railways, I may inform the hon. gentleman that the subject is under the consideration of the Government.

COST OF MARINE DEPARTMENTAL REPORTS.

QUESTION.

MR. HOUDE enquired, What was the expenditure incurred for the publication of the Report of the Department of Marine and Fisheries for the years 1877 and 1878, respectively? What amount of saving, if any, has the Government effected in the publication of the Report for 1879.

MR. POPE (Queen's P.E.I.): The Accountant of the House of Commons reports that the amount of expenditure incurred between the 1st July, 1876, and 30th June, 1877, for publishing the Report of this Department, with the supplements, was $13,597.82. In that year no list of shipping was published, but the Meteorological Report, and the Lists of Lights were published as supplements to the Report, along with other supplements, and they are now published separate from the Report; the Meteorological Report being charged to the vote for Meteorological purposes, and the List of Lights being now charged to the Department. The amount expended by the Accountant of the House of Commons, from the 1st July, 1877, to 30th June, 1878, was $14,639.58. This amount included the Meteorological Report and the List of Ships registered in the Dominion, which was very large, and also the Lists of Lights. None of these are printed in this year's Report as supplements, and the List of Ships is only published every third year. The amount expended from 1st July, 1878, to 30th June, 1879, for our Report, with its supplements, was $11,614.33, and this did not include the Meteorological Report and the List of Ships, but it included the List of Lights. The Accountant states that he cannot say whether these sums were for the particular Reports and the supplements of these years. He can only say that he expended these amounts for the respective fiscal years for our Report and supplements, but cannot distinguish for what portion of our Reports the amounts were expended. The supplements for our Report for 30th June, 1879, are not yet completed, and therefore the Accountant cannot state what the cost of the Report and Supplements will be; and the amount paid by him up to the present time, on account of our Report cannot either be given at present by the Accountant, as it has not yet been charged in his books.

MANITOBA LAND ALLOTMENTS.

QUESTION.

MR. ROYAL enquired, Is the Government aware that, by virtue of a certain allotment of lands in St. Agathe, County of Provencher, Province of Manitoba, to the Hudson's Bay Company, quite a number of lots have been allotted upon which settlers had made large and valuable improvements; and is it the intention of the Government to deal promptly with this grave question so as to prevent any gross injustice being done?

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: This matter has been pressed upon the attention of the Government by my hon. friend, and from other sources. The Government are now making enquiries, and will see that prompt justice is done to any person who may have suffered injustice in the matter.

DISMISSAL OF THE ST. ROMUALD POSTMASTER.

QUESTION.

MR. LARUE enquired, For what reasons did the Government dismiss Germain Cantin, Esquire, Postmaster of the Parish of St. Romuald, County of Lévis.

MR. LANGEVIN: On behalf of the hon. the Postmaster-General, I beg to reply to the hon. gentleman that the Postmaster at St. Romuald was dismissed for dereliction of duty, caused by his incapacity.

COMPENSATION TO MRS. GARRETT.

QUESTION.

MR. WALLACE (West York) enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government, in accordance with petitions and documents presented to them, to grant compensation to Mrs. Garrett, widow of the late Thomas Garrett, whose property at Winnipeg was appropriated or destroyed by the insurgents in the rebellion in the North-West, in 1870.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: The whole question is a large one and has been long under the consideration of the Government. The case is now before the Courts.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND RAILWAY.

QUESTION.

MR. MUTTART enquired, 1st. Is it the intention of the Government to lower the freight and passenger rates on the Prince Edward Island Railway. 2nd. Is it the intention of the Government to increase the salaries of the superintendent and other employes in connection with said Railway.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: At an early day when passing the estimates for the Island Railway, I will take an opportunity to answer fully the question the hon. gentleman has asked.

CROSS POINT FERRY, N. B.

QUESTION.

MR. HADDOW enquired, Whether it is true that Mr. Quinn's tender for the ferry at Cross Point, Restigouche, was accepted and bonds given in 1878; and if so, why was he refused a license.

MR. BABY: To the first part of the question I can answer affirmatively; to the second part, I would say, the license was refused on his declaring that he did not intend to comply with the conditions of his license.

MR. HADDOW enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to require the present ferryman at Cross Point, Restigouche, to use a steam ferry-boat for that service.

MR. BABY: He is not required to do so by his license; but in due time the ferryman of the place in question will be required to do so.

TENTH ROYAL REGIMENT, TORONTO
MOTION FOR RETURN.

MR. CASEY, in moving for an Order of the House for (1) Copy of Commission to Colonels Durie and Denison, to investigate the affairs of the 10th Royal Regiment, Toronto, in reference to difficulties between its officers; (2) Copy of their report and recommendations; (3) Copy of any order or orders made by Lieut-General Sir E. Selby Smyth, in the premises; (4) Copy of correspondence between T. Rolph, lately an officer in said Regiment, and the Department of Militia, in reference to further investigations; (5) Copy of Commission to Colonel Taylor, and other officers, to make a second investigation; (6) Their report and recommendations; (7) Any subsequent order or orders of the Lieut.-General commanding in the premises, said: I suppose hon. members of the House, at least from Ontario, are aware that great difficulty arose in that regiment between the Colonel Commanding and several of the officers, and that two investigations sprang out of the difficulties. I think it would be in the interest of volunteering generally and the public service, that the facts of the case should be brought out here.

MR. MASSON: I hope the hon. gentleman will not press his motion, for if he did and it was carried by this House, it would be establishing, in my humble opinion a very grave and serious precedent in regard to our dealings with the militia force. Questions similar to this have been brought up in this House before, and every time they have been successfully resisted, it being held that these questions should not be brought before the House. This House is not the proper tribunal to revise decisions of Courts-Martial, or courts of enquiry. I could understand this action being taken if the subject was one of great importance, or if a great grievance was complained of; but it is not of that importance which, at times, induced the English Government to grant such a commission. The hon.

gentleman knows that this is only a matter of discipline, and if any grievance has existed it has been remedied by the tribunals which judge military men in this country, and which proved conclusively that Parliamentary interference was not necessary. I hope the hon. gentleman will not push his motion further. I remember when I sat in this House in 1868, questions similar to this relating to Colonels Dennis and Shaw were brought up, and the Government, in both cases, resisted the motion. The subject was fully discussed, and no less a gentleman than the hon. member for Centre Huron opposed the motion. The argument Sir George Cartier put successfully to the House was as follows:

"Anyone conversant with Parliamentary practice in England must be aware that papers connected with the proceedings of a Court of Enquiry should not be laid before Parliament. Again and again motions similar to that made by the hon. member for Lambton had been made in the English House of Commons and rejected by the Ministry of the day. The mover of the motion had argued that the papers should be laid before the House as a matter of right, but it was abundantly evident from English precedent that the House had no right to receive such papers. The proceedings of a Court of Enquiry were in their very nature confidential, and the proposition that, as a matter of course, they should be laid before Parliament, was too absurd to be established. In this case it was not alleged that any injury had been done to anyone connected with the enquiry, and considering English precedents and the former practice of the House, he regretted to state that the Government could not consent to bring down the papers."

On that the hon. member for Lambton withdrew the motion, and I do not think the hon. gentleman on this occasion can take a better guide than the hon. member for Lambton, the more so that every hope was entertained that the 10th Royals would be soon restored to its former state of efficiency.

MR. CASEY: I confess I had not looked up the precedents bearing upon this matter, not supposing that any difficulty would arise in regard to the bringing down of those papers. I am surprised at the doctrine laid down by the hon. the Minister of Militia that these enquiries are strictly confidential, and not to be discussed in Parliament. If there are precedents for this contention they are bad ones and should be changed. These enquiries do not refer to matters of discipline alone. In this particular case the enquiry involved a charge of fraud made by certain officers against the colonel of the regiment, and a charge of insubordination and slander against the officers; it involved the question as to whether the colonel had defended the regiment or whether the officers were telling what was untrue and libellous. That is not a question of discipline, but a question affecting the standing and character of the colonel and the officers respectively, and the enquiry into this should not be concluded in a sort of Star Chamber Court. The hon. Minister went further. He said there was no wrong done; but there have been complaints of wrong, and we cannot see whether there is any wrong or not until we have an opportunity of seeing the evidence. The Toronto press ventilated the matter; and a subsequent enquiry, which was granted, appears to have resulted in the reversal of the decision at the first enquiry, for the officers dismissed under the first enquiry have been reinstated. The House has a right to know what is done by these Courts of Enquiry. This is a matter which concerns the civil standing of the persons, not merely their military position. There was an action entered against the Globe for having reiterated the charges preferred against the colonel and the latter failed to prove his case. There were heavy damages involved; and this shows that there were matters involved altogether outside of a question of discipline. If my withdrawal of this motion would be construed into an acquiescence of the principle laid down by the hon. Minister, I should not feel justified in withdrawing it.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: The hon. gentleman is at liberty to take his own course; but I think he would do well to adopt the suggestion of my hon. friend to my left. These motions are always resisted in England, not only in matters of this kind relating to the regular army, but to the militia and volunteer and yeomanry forces, for this reason: that a military force is to be governed by military precedent and discipline; and questions affecting the force should not be dragged into the political arena. In this case nobody complains. The hon. gentleman takes action on his own motion with a creditable desire to institute an enquiry. In England such motion would not be made. If any person—any soldier or officer—is aggrieved, he has a right to come to the grand inquest of the nation, and lay his petition before Parliament. If any British subject shows that he is entitled to redress, he can get redress; but there is no suggestion of that kind that there is any complaint of a grievance.

MR. CASEY: Yes, there is.

SIR JOHN MACDONALD: There is no petition. We could only know of a grievance by petition. In a matter affecting Col. Shaw, and affecting other persons, the subject was discussed fully. The hon. member for Centre Huron discussed it fully, and by universal consent of the House, it was understood that these matters should not be dragged into Parliament, or into the political arena, unless a person presented a grievance for which he could get no redress except through Parliament. If every soldier, every officer, sergeant, corporal, or private, can rush into the House, through a member, asking for liens by means of a motion, and for whom he has voted, perhaps, why all discipline, all training, all is gone. In this case there is no person complaining. I know something of the circumstances. I have had correspondence about it with gentlemen who felt aggrieved. They, however feel aggrieved no longer. I think the hon. gentleman should take the advice offered him and withdraw the motion.

MR. CASEY: By permission of the House, I rise to say that I consider that the right hon. gentleman has put it too strongly in leading to the supposition that my motion involves a question of politics. It is quite a different sort of matter, and it is not either an interference with discipline. I do not appeal to the House to change anything in the matter. I do not ask a change in the decision of any superior officer, but that publicity may be given to everything done in these Courts of Enquiry; they should not be held in a hole and corner fashion, and it is only on the understanding that I do not acquiesce in the principle laid down that these Courts should be thus privileged from having their proceedings made public, that I will consent to withdraw my motion. If, as the hon. gentleman says, the parties do not wish a publication of the facts, then, of course, I do not want to press the matter. I have had no communication that they do. I cannot endorse the principle that the House has no right to secure publicity of the proceedings of these Courts of Enquiry, but if my withdrawal of the motion be taken as not denying the right of the House to secure such publicity, I would consent to withdraw.

MR. MASSON: Parliament has no right to interfere with these cases.

MR. CASEY: I do not ask it to interfere.

MR. MASSON: If once this motion were admitted there is an end to all discipline.

MR. CASEY: I cannot withdraw the motion on that understanding. Of course I will not press it to a vote; but it may be called lost.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: The hon. gentleman ought to withdraw the motion. He says he cannot endorse that Courts of Enquiry cannot have the evidence taken before them laid before Parliament. It is just a thing that should not be done; such evidence ought not to be laid before the House. The proceedings of Courts-Martial may be laid before us, as may those of the Queen's Bench or other courts. But the Court of Enquiry is different; it is semi-confidential in its nature. I will give one instance: We will suppose that one officer is appointed to a particular command over another who is his senior; the latter pleads that he has a right to the command, he being the senior officer; he appeals to Parliament; the Court of Enquiry may have privately and confidentially decided that the officer, on the ground of want of intellectual capacity or military spirit, is unfit for the command. These things are never sent to Parliament. There is no suggestion of a grievance here in this case now brought up by the motion, and the hon. gentleman should withdraw it.

MR. MACKENZIE: I cannot agree with what the hon. gentleman says, as to what determines the publication of documents. What determines the publication of documents, is not the mere question of whether they are of a military nature, or connected with military matters, but whether the Government consider that they are or are not of such a character that it is advisable not to give publicity to them. I think he cannot lay it down that we have no right to order any papers of this kind to be laid before the House. He cannot, I think, lay down the principle that in England it was invariably the rule not to bring any papers in connection with a Court of Enquiry. I would be disposed, as a general rule, to withdraw a motion upon the strong representation of a Minister that it would injure the public service; but not merely upon the assertion of a principle I did not believe in. Can any of the papers asked for be produced? The right answer to a motion of this kind is, that there are certain papers which, in the public interest, it is not desirable to produce, but that the others would be. It would never do to set a Military Court of Enquiry above Parliament, which is the principle practically laid down by the hon. the Minister of Militia, and, I fear, endorsed, to a great extent, by the hon. the Premier. In this particular case there was a great injustice done. The hon. Minister says, first, there was no injustice done, and, second, that, if any was done, it was remedied. We ought to know something of the proceedings that led to that course.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: What object is there in letting the House know it?

MR. MACKENZIE: There is no doubt in the minds of the people that this 10th Regiment got thoroughly demoralised.

MR. MASSON: It is all right now.

MR. MACKENZIE: Such was the popular belief, and great interest was excited by the dismissal of the officers. True, they may have condoned that ill usage; but I do not think it can be called improper for Parliament to enquire into the circumstances.

MR. MCCALLUM: I moved once for the statement of evidence taken at a Court of Enquiry held at Fort Garry, and the Government refused my request, although they had established a precedent on a former occasion, under like circumstances, for granting my motion. Hon. gentlemen will remember a Court of Enquiry was held at Hamilton in regard to the management of the 13th Battalion, the evidence taken being published to the world. Yet, when I afterwards moved for the evidence taken in the Court at Fort Erie, I was refused, on the ground that it would not be in the interest of the public to publish it. Some years afterwards I was told if I moved for it, I should get it, but I declined that offer then. If the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) insists on his motion, he will have my vote; because I consider that certain people had great injustice done them by the refusal of the Government to grant the publication of such evidence formerly.

MR. MASSON: The Court of Enquiry sat with open doors, and the evidence was published. The motion is therefore unnecessary.

MR. CASEY: If the hon. Minister will say that the case is of such a nature that he cannot bring down the papers, I will follow the ordinary course, and withdraw the motion, which I could not do on the general principle advanced.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: The Government cannot say that, or make this an exceptional case. We say it is not for the interest of the public to send down any papers on a motion of this kind unless at the instance of a party aggrieved, who states he is aggrieved, and requires them to vindicate his case, and for the remedy of his grievance.

MR. BLAKE: I think there can be no doubt of the supreme and preeminent power of this Parliament to enquire into all matters which affect the public welfare. I cannot agree in the limitations that the First Minister has given as the only limitations on general principles, as the only grounds he will concede for bringing down the papers in this class of cases. That is a very good reason for bringing down the papers in a particular case; but I do not believe that the prerogative of Parliament to enquire into affairs of this description, depends wholly or even chiefly upon only private individual making a complaint to Parliament. Because there may be many reasons why an officer who was very ill-used might not choose to bring forward the subject in the form of a complaint. He might think he would put himself, as an individual, in antagonism to the Government, and the Minister of Militia, and the chief officers of the force, by making such a complaint, while Parliament might say—we believe for all that, the public apart, that an injustice has been committed, and in the interest of the service at large we are determined to enquire into it. That is the reason why I cannot accept that limitation which the hon. the First Minister has stated as the only circumstance under which it would be proper for Parliament to make an enquiry. At the same time there are strong reasons, perhaps stronger than exist in England, there being greater difficulties arising from the acrimony of politics in our country, against interference with the force, except for gravest causes; and, while I have stated the theoretical powers to be exercised, and the practice to be followed in a just cause, even if no officer interferes, I am disinclined myself, when a Minister makes the statement made in this case, to press for the papers in relation to it. If, as I am informed in this case, a miscarriage of justice did occur, and if it has been rectified, I do not see there is a pressing necessity for bringing the papers to Parliament, merely for the purpose of ascertaining what went wrong; and on that ground I am not indisposed to favour the withholding of the papers. In opposition to the principle laid down by the hon. the First Minister, I think that the circumstance that Parliament asserts its power in a fitting case of apparent wrong, in overlooking the proceedings of the militia authorities, is the very best thing to keep those gentlemen in a proper state of supervision in which they are most likely to do their duty. I can conceive of nothing more likely to make them despotic, whimsical, arbitrary and tyrannical than the statement that their proceedings are secret and sacred, above our power, beyond our ken and not to be touched by us—within the holy of holies, past criticism and discovery. That very statement would lead to abuses.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I think the hon. member for West Durham has misunderstood me. I did not, in any way, deny the right of Parliament, to enter into any investigation of this kind. As the Grand Inquest of the nation they have the right to enquire about anything and everything; but I pointed out it was exceedingly inexpedient that that right should be exercised except in the case of a grievance stated to the House, and application to Parliament for a remedy. In this case, it would be exceedingly inexpedient, when the grievance has been remedied to the satisfaction of the parties, to keep it alive by sending down the papers to Parliament.

MR. CASEY: As the First Minister considers it would be inexpedient to keep alive the difficulty, I withdraw the motion.

Motion, with leave of the House, withdrawn.

BRITISH COLUMBIA INDIAN LANDS ALLOTMENT.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

MR. BARNARD moved for an Address for all correspondence between the Indian Land Reserve Commissioner, or the Government of British Columbia, and the Government, respecting the allotment of lands to Indians, or relating to any disagreement with settlers in respect of Indian Reserve Lands in the District of Yale, with copies of any map or sketch, showing the lands set aside for Indian Reserve purposes in the same district; also, of any Report showing the quantity of land set aside for each Indian, Indian family, camp or Tribe of Indians in the locality above named, with a statement of any lands given or arranged to be given, by Mr. Commissioner Sproat, in exchange for lands held by settlers, and said by the Commissioner to be required for Indian Reserve purposes, with the names of parties with whom such exchanges are made or proposed to be made, and the quantities of land involved in each such exchange; also, a return of the Census taken by the Indian Reserve Commissioner of the Indians living in the various camps in Yale District, as far as ascertained, giving the number belonging to each family, or camp, of each Tribe, and their location, also the number of horses and horned cattle owned by each Indian or camp of Indians; also, copy of any agreement entered into by the Government with the Government of British Columbia, showing the quantity of land to be given to each family, distinguishing agricultural from pastoral land. He said: My reason for asking for this information is that a great deal of ill-feeling exists in my district in reference to the Indian Reserve Lands, owing in a great measure, to the secrecy observed in dealing with this question. Previous to 1877, the period at which the Indian Reserve Commissioner was appointed, we had little or no trouble with the Indians, the settlers agreeing with them and working with them in harmony, frequently assisting them with advice, by loan of implements, and in other ways encouraging them in the art of cultivating land. Unfortunately, the Commissioners appointed to discharge this important duty were not fully up to the mark, and did not understand the genius of the people they were dealing with, consequently, important mistakes have occurred, calculated to lead to trouble between the whites and Indians. We take it that, in the settlement of the Indian Reserve, it was intended the Indians should be brought to follow agriculture for a living. With this view it was understood certain sections of land should be allotted to them, not only for agricultural but for pastoral purposes. The Commissioner, however, seemed to think that all he had to do was to give the Indians whatever land he fancied, whether it was the property of the Government, or of actual bona fide settlers; and not only was he to receive this land, but certain fishing rights, or streams, should be secured to him, even if these rights could only be obtained by interference with the whites. An instance is on record where a fishing station was located in the centre of a farm, the consequence of which was that the settler could not obtain water for his stock without committing a trespass. In another locality Indians being anxious to secure a piece of land—the property of an actual settler—for root digging purposes, an arrangement was made by the Commissioner whereby the settler was to have 500 acres of public land in exchange for six acres ceded to the Indians, a transaction of a very suspicious nature in the first place, and in the second, one calculated to encourage the Indian in following his old habit of root digging, at the time of year in which he should be seed sowing; the one obtaining food for present purposes only and the other providing for future contingencies. Another instance is given of a settler who had taken up a piece of land, in order to secure fence timber, was deprived of it, so that Indians should have the right to fish in a stream running through it. These fishing stations are scattered through the country. The fish has little value as an article of food. Securing the fishing station only tends to encourage the Indian in habits of idleness, and seriously retards his civilisation. In this connection I do not refer to the salmon fisheries. These are a fixed industry, and necessary to the sustenance of a number of families, who have not, and do not, seek lands for cultivation, relying entirely on trading with other tribes for dried salmon, a favourite and nutritious article of food. We contend that it is wrong to afford Indians an opportunity of following nomadic habits, instead of encouraging them to engage in agriculture, and to settle on the land allotted to them. This Commissioner has gone further than that; for when he had made up his mind to allot certain quantities of land to Indians, he does not seem to have been particular as to whether the land was the property of the Crown or not. He has undertaken, on several occasions, to interfere with the title of settlers, arrogating to himself the position of a judge, to determine whether the settler shall be deprived of the land or not. Settlers naturally resent this kind of thing. In one case it has amounted to a serious difficulty. A settler, residing in the vicinity of an Indian Reserve, took up a tract of land of 160 acres. Having a partner who owned a piece of land at some distance, he lived with him while he cultivated his land. The Indian Commissioner claimed this land for Indian purposes, because he had not fulfilled the conditions of settlement, and gave the land over to the Indians. The settler applied to his lawyer, who advised him not to permit Indian or Government surveyors to go upon that land, but to resist by force if necessary. When such matters as that are in dispute between Indians and whites, they should be immediately settled; but three years have passed and nothing has been done yet. I hope the right hon. the leader of the Government will give his early attention to this matter. I can do no better than conclude by reading the closing portion of a letter I have received, bearing on Indian affairs:

"I request that you, our member, will use your influence with the Government to procure, at least, an investigation into the matter of the settlement with the Indians in Nicola Valley, with a view that the same be modified so that injustice may not be done to either whites or Indians."

Mr. MILLS: I think it is desirable that all the papers relating to this subject should be brought down. I do not think the facts will be found precisely as the hon. gentleman has stated them, although he has doubtless stated them as they were represented to him. The hon. the First Minister will remember that the Terms upon which British Columbia entered the Union overlooked entirely the Indian claims to the territories where the Indian rights had not been surrendered. I think it is the only instance in the whole history of British colonisation in North America, where the Government have undertaken to deal with the land without first securing the extinction of the Indian titles. It is my opinion that the terms and conditions of the Union did not, and in law could not take away the rights of the Indians in the soil. Looking at the provisions of the British North America Act, relating to the Indians, and bearing in mind that all terms and conditions of Union to be valid, must be consistent with these terms and conditions; I do not think it is consistent with those provisions that the Governments of Canada and British Columbia should make an agreement between themselves that would entirely ignore the Indian title. That title is protected by the law, and that protection is not abrogated or taken away by the arrangement that was made between the parties. While I was in the Department, I was not disposed to raise the question of the Indian title, if a reasonable settlement could be otherwise obtained on behalf of the Indians. The hon. gentleman must know that before this Commission got to work, the country was on the brink of an Indian war. In British Columbia a Confederation was organized between the Indians of Washington Territory and British Columbia, and it was only the failure of Chief Joseph in his contest with the United States troops that saved us from that calamity. If the hon. gentleman looks into the papers, he will find that, while it was proposed that the Indians should learn the habits of the white people, the amount of land allotted to them was so limited, that it was impossible for them to subsist. The Commission was appointed, with the consent of the Government of British Columbia, to enquire into the matter, to take into consideration the grievances of the Indians, and to make such allotments as was proper. The papers will show that, in many instances, where the Indians have their burying grounds, and in other instances where they had made improvements for themselves, the whites had rented the land from the Indians in order to get possession, and they were no sooner in occupation than they applied to the Government as occupants of public lands, and obtained preemption rights to those lands, thus practising a fraud on the Indians. In some instances these lands have been taken from these parties and restored to the Indians, who had been unfairly deprived of them. My opinion is, that the Commission, which was appointed with the view of settling these disputes, has gone a long way to allay the fear and ill-will in the minds of the Indians in British Columbia, and that the three Commissioners, in the first instance, and Mr. Sproat, up to the time I left office, performed his duties in a very satisfactory manner. I think it is extremely desirable that the Government, after making the Indians dependents and wards, should exercise the utmost vigilance in protecting their rights and preparing them for emancipation, otherwise more serious complications will grow up there. It is perfectly obvious that many who have gone into that country do not regard the Indians as having any rights to the occupation of the lands; and unless the Government stand by the Indians a very small measure of justice is likely to be meted out them.

Mr. BARNARD.

MR. DECOSMOS: The hon. gentleman has made a charge against the people of British Columbia.

MR. MILLS: I have made no charge. I have simply stated some facts.

MR. DECOSMOS: He said the people who went there had no regard for the rights of the Indian. I will say this: That up to the time of Confederation, we had no trouble with our Indians at all. Occasionally, an Indian depredation was committed, but it was soon suppressed. Our whole cost for the management of Indian affairs was only from $500 to $1,000 per annum; but from the false policy of dealing with the Indians adopted by the late Government, the expenses now amount to $50,000 a year. After Confederation all the Dominion Government was expected to do under the Terms of Union was to deal as liberally with the Indians as before Confederation. So far as the rights of the Indians are concerned, the entire feeling of all classes in British Columbia has been to give the Indian, no matter when or where, all the land he could utilise, and treat him upon an equality with the white man. It was to the interest of the white settler that that should be done, and it has been done invariably. It is a mistaken policy on the part of the Canadian Government to make Indians a privileged class, in regard to the ownership of land. The Indian should have been taught to earn his living the same as a white man. The manner in which Indians have been dealt with, both on the American side of the international boundary as well as on this side, cannot but be regarded practically as fraud perpetrated in the name of right, if I read rightly the manner in which they were dispossessed of their lands. The Indians were told that they were the original and rightful owners of the lands over which they roamed and hunted, and of the rivers and lakes in which they fished. The whites wanted their land; they knew its great and increasing value; they offered them presents and annuities and reserves, bearing no proportion hardly to its real and prospective value. The Indians were induced to surrender their so-called title, and the white man became the possessor of their inheritance. The white man then boasted of his successful and profitable bargain with the Indian tribes, who were ignorant of the real and future value of the lands they had parted with. The Indians were treated similarly to a child who surrendered a valuable jewel for a showy bauble or toy. The proper way—the just way—ought to have been to ignore the so-called Indian title. The Indian should have been told that the white man had as good a right to share with them in the possession of the lands as they had. That his right to hold all he could use would be respected, but his so-called title to land that he had not made and never could use, would be disregarded. Had such a policy obtained there would have been no deception and no heavy annual expenditure for Indian annuities. Such had been the policy of British Columbia and it had worked well.

MR. MACKENZIE: I am quite surprised to hear the hon. gentleman, who has just taken his seat, and who was so very zealous of his own rights and the rights of the people of British Columbia, a few nights ago, propound so inhuman a theory regarding Indians.

MR. DECOSMOS: We know them better than you do.

MR. MACKENZIE: I do not think the hon. gentleman knows them as well as I do. I have lived close to Indians for nearly a third of a century, and I know they respect the rights of other people a great deal better than many whites do. If we had pursued the course the hon. gentleman has propounded as the right one, we would have had Indian wars desolating the whole country. I maintain that we have no right to the soil until we arrange with those who inhabited the country originally, and if we have paid too little for the lands that was the fault of the negotiators. I propose to amend the motion by adding the words:

"Also a copy of the memorandum of the Minister of Justice upon which the Lands Act of the British Columbia Legislature was disallowed, and also any correspondence between the Government of Canada, the Commissioner and the Local Government, in reference to the allotment of lands to the Indians."

MR. DECOSMOS: I am not one of those who have any wish, neither have I ever advocated, that Indians should be treated other than as human beings. On the other hand I have no wish, nor do I propose, that Indians should be treated any better than white men. If an Indian wishes to cultivate land, let him have it on the same terms as a white man. With regard to the fisheries, I am opposed to their having privileges which are not accorded to white men.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Of course it is the duty of Parliament and the duty of the Government to protect the original occupants of the soil against new comers. We are having the same experience in British Columbia as we have always had in old Canada. The whole thing is a question of management.

MR. DECOSMOS.

The Indians should be protected, but at the same time the progress of any large section of the country should not be impeded by the enforcement of any philanthropic idea of protecting the Indian even against the attempt to win him from his semi-savage customs. As far as the Commissioner, Mr. Trutch, is concerned, he resigned his office, and his successor has not been appointed. Mr. Trutch is still, however, acting as agent for the people of British Columbia, and the Government expect shortly to receive a report upon the subject.

MR. MILLS: I do not think, if the hon. gentleman looks at the report that the Commissioner has from time to time submitted, that he will find the quantity of lands set apart for Indians is at all extravagant. If the reservation have not been confined to any particular locality, it is simply because it was not possible to find sufficient arable land in one place. There has been no complaint so far, as I know, from any white man in regard to lands to which he was legally entitled, but cases have arisen where the local Government had issued patents to parties who had gone into the centre of an Indian reservation, or upon other lands to which the Indians had claims by long and continuous occupation.

MR. BARNARD: I think the remarks I made were not properly understood. The settlers of British Columbia do not complain of justice being done to the Indian. What we complain of is that great injustice is being done to white settlers, by awarding much larger tracts of land than the Indians can have any use for. It is estimated that as much as 3,000 acres of land has been given to each adult Indian in Nicola Valley, and in Okanagan the land granted is also excessive, according to an estimate made. There are only 400 Indians, men, women and children, say 100 families at eighteen acres of arable land for each family as agreed, making 1,800 acres. Owning 500 head of cattle, and being allowed twenty-two acres per head, they are entitled to 11,000 acres of pasture land, making a grand total of 12,800 acres to which they would be entitled. The quantity agreed to be given then, however, is in the vicinity of 41,000 acres, not in one or two reserves, but taken in sections and scattered over the entire district. Trouble has been caused by this blundering. We do not desire to do injustice to the Indians. You could not find a single settler that would advocate that. The Indians render valuable assistance, and it is to the interest of the settler to live on the best terms with them, but questions of farming interest to them should be settled; and, therefore, it is that I bring this matter up and urge the Government to attend to it with a view of making a proper settlement of all matters in dispute.

Mr. MILLS suggested the addition of correspondence between this Government and the Commissioners, and between the Government and the Local Government.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

STORMONT, DUNDAS AND GLENGARRY DIVISION COURTS.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

Mr. BERGIN, in moving for a Return showing number of cases tried in each of the Division Courts in the United Counties of Stormont, Dundas and Glengarry, during the years 1877, 1878 and 1879, by the Judge of the said United Counties; also, by the Deputy Judge, and other barristers in the said United Counties, and the amounts, if any, paid by the said Judge to the Deputy Judge and other barristers for the trial of such cases, said: That some of the Division Courts, during the past few years, in these United Counties, presided over in the country districts by young barristers, employed by the Judges, had caused great dissatisfaction, and that it was desirable that there should be some change, so that either the Judge himself should hold these or the Deputy Judge.

Motion agreed to.

NORTH-WEST MOUNTED POLICE FORCE.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

Mr. ROYAL, in moving for a Return of all complaints, reports, documents or papers, relating to the state of discipline, efficiency, conduct and physical condition of the Mounted Police Force in the North-West Territories; the number of posts or forts, the number of men at each post, and the reasons given for the location of the said posts or forts; the number of drill days every week at every post; the nature, the quantity and the condition of arms, saddlery, accoutrements and ammunition in each post, according to the last report; the number of horses at every post; the complaints as to the quantity, the quality and the distribution of supplies and clothing in the various posts; the mode of paying the officers and men, whether in kind or in money, said: The motion was made with a view to place before the House and the country information which would clear up rumours spread against the efficiency of the Mounted Police Force, and their moral standard, and with a view to change the system if these rumours are shown to be well founded. This Force was established seven years ago; it had cost the country an average of about $300,000, or $1,000 for each man a year; a total of over two millions of dollars. If the reports in circulation were to be relied on, the Force in Manitoba and other parts of the country was a discredit to Canada. The Force had been originally established for the protection of Indians as well as white men, and to assist in the maintenance of good order and conduct of these territories. One of the principle objects was to prevent the sale of liquors in the North-West. The Force had a double mission, first, for the civilisation of the Indians, and on the other hand for the protection of emigrants going into these territories to settle. The Force, to be efficient, should be beyond all suspicion. Therefore, in view of the rumours in circulation, it was important to bring the matter up so that the Force might be vindicated; but if the result showed that the rumours were true the sooner the character of that Force was changed and placed on a more strict basis, as to discipline, the better for those territories, both for the Indians and the white settlers. According to these rumours there was very little training in the Force, and there appeared to be a very sad state of affairs, both as regarded the men and officers. The facts are very grave, and must be stated with much diffidence and caution, still the truth must be told, and it was very important, in particular, not to spread amongst the Indians the vices of the white men, for instead of advancing civilisation we should retard it. With regard to the supplies, if the rumours were true, the men were suffering badly for want of good supplies, both food and clothing being delayed, in several cases, as long as six months.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: If all that the hon. gentleman asks by his motion were granted, we should have to bring down a large volume, nay, perhaps, a hundred volumes; for a return is made every morning of the physical condition of the men at each post. I think the hon. gentleman should be satisfied with a much less comprehensive return than that; a general report as to the general efficiency of the Force, I think, will serve his purpose. I may say that, on the whole, I am not quite satisfied with that service; but it is scattered over that immense country, and they cannot attain that degree of discipline as a military or semi-military force collated in larger bodies. This whole subject is receiving the attention of the Government, including the necessity of introducing greater stringency in the training of the Force; and, at this moment, orders are issued for the redistribution of the Force, so as to prevent some of the evils to which the hon. gentleman has alluded. There are no grave complaints against the Force, generally, or any members of it, so far as I know—no specific charges. I have no objection to the motion, in which I understand the hon. gentleman means merely to refer to any general complaint against the Force and not against any individuals of it.

MR. ROYAL: It is not my intention to require more by this motion than is absolutely necessary. There have been no specific charges made against officers or men of the Force. But when French half-breeds come into Manitoba to sell their furs, we hear a great deal about their working and conduct. I believe one great object in connection with it was the establishment of friendship and harmony between the Force and those half-breeds. If a war broke out in the North-West, they could be an important factor in the cause of peace and order. Unfortunately, however, the half-breeds are treated with more than contempt by the Mounted Police, according to reports from most reliable sources, and the two parties are estranged in consequence. The half-breeds are treated by the Force worse than the Indians, and I do not believe that, in case of need, they would rally round our nucleus of an army. All over the North-West the Force is accused of disgraceful immorality; one of the chief traders, who spent the winter at the forts, reporting an open quarrel between an officer and one of the constables for the possession of a squaw. He reported also that he saw another soldier slap his officer in the face on account of a squaw. This is not the way to civilise the Indians, or promote morality and good order in the country. Such misconduct has produced trouble with a section of the population. I am glad the Government is reorganising or reforming the Force. I have no objection to accept the motion amended as suggested. I want those papers either to clear up the character of the Force or lead to its abolition, with a new system for the maintenance of peace and order in the North-West Territories.

Motion agreed to.

CHATHAM, N.B.—CASE OF TIMOTHY SULLIVAN.

MOTION FOR PAPERS.

MR. SNOWBALL, in moving for an Order of the House for copies of all papers and correspondence in reference to amount forwarded by the Board of Trade, London, through the Marine Department here, for Timothy Sullivan or James Sullivan, of Chatham, New Brunswick, said: Timothy Sullivan is a very old man, residing at Chatham. His son Frank went to sea and worked himself up to a good position. He eventually joined the St. John ship Alex. Yeats as first officer, and sailed in her to the East Indies. His father not hearing from him, and being unable to write, got an acquaintance to commence a correspondence of enquiry which extended over considerable time. He was referred to the Board of Trade, London, and by them informed that his son was taken ill and landed at the Mauritius and died in hospital there. That there was £49 9s. 11d. sterling due him as wages at the time of his death, which sum the father was informed would be forwarded to him through the Marine and Fishery Department here. The money not coming as expected, Tim Sullivan now got his friend to write to Ottawa, and was then informed by the Marine Department that the money had been forwarded to James Sullivan, Chatham

It now transpired that the Board of Trade had mistaken "Tim" for "Jim," and had ordered the money to be paid to James Sullivan, of Chatham. There however, was no James Sullivan in Chatham, but a person of that name in Douglastown getting word of the transaction, probably by intercepting some of the previous letters, managed to get the one containing the draft also, and going with it to the Bank of Montreal at Newcastle, got identified as James Sullivan, drew the money and absconded. Timothy Sullivan and his wife, are both old infirm people, without any family able to assist in their support, and are very much in want of this money. I think it extremely hard they should be deprived of it through no fault of theirs, and trust the hon. Minister will present their case strongly to the Board of Trade, London, and endeavour to get their money for them. The Board of Trade, has, I understand, a large amount of unclaimed money in their possession, got under similar circumstances, and I consider this as a just claim on that fund. Failing in this, I would urge the Government to take this extreme and special case into their consideration, and pay this small sum of $241, that appears so large to these poor people. The case is so exceptional it could not be construed into a precedent, and could not open a door to future difficulty.

MR. POPE (Queen's, P. E. I.): The papers asked for can be laid on the Table. The facts of the case are pretty much as the hon. gentleman has represented them. The mistake was made in London, and the Canadian Government is not liable for the amount, which should have gone to Tim Sullivan. We will do our best to procure the amount from the Board of Trade, and pay it to the old man. But, not being liable for it, we have no right to pay it out of the public moneys of the Dominion. The James Sullivan, who got the money, absconded, and has not been heard of since.

TORONTO FIELD BATTERY.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

MR. WALLACE (West York), in moving for an Order of the House for a Return of all correspondence between the Inspector of Artillery, at Kingston, and the Officer commanding the Toronto Field Battery, relative to the issue of nine-pounder M.L.R. Sponges, previous to said corps going into camp last year; also, the proceedings of the Medical Board, and their Report in the case of Gunner Dempster, of the Toronto Field Battery, said: My object in moving for this Return is, in the first place, to call the attention of the Government to the fact which the Returns when brought down will show, that the Officer commanding the Toronto Field Battery has made repeated requisitions and requests to Colonel Irwin, the officer in charge of the stores at Kingston, for these sponges, or he would not be responsible for the lives of the men, and that great risk was incurred by using the old sponges. Colonel Irwin replied that the old ones would do, and refused to furnish the new ones required. The result was, that Gunner Dempster, while in the discharge of his duty, in assisting to reload, had his hand blown off. I think that the Government should enquire into the conduct of Col. Irwin more particularly, and give that personage to understand that he must pay some regard to the lives and safety of the volunteer service. We are bringing men of that class from the old country to control, and in cases, like the present, to injure the Volunteer Force. My next object in bringing the matter up is to call the attention of the Government to the case of Gunner Dempster, and that they will consider it to be their duty to grant him a liberal allowance for the injuries that he has sustained through no error of his own.

MR. MASSON: I do not exactly know the details of this affair, but I do know it is the intention of the Government to indemnify the engineer for the accident that occurred. At present I understand the accident occurred from firing a gun too soon, by a mistake in the word of command.

MAIL SERVICE IN BRUCE.

MOTION FOR CORRESPONDENCE.

MR. GILLIES, in moving for an Order of the House for copies of correspondence relating to the extension of the evening mail service from Walkerton to Paisley, Port Elgin and Southampton, said: During the Sessions of 1876, 1877, and 1878, various applications were made to me, and petitions were forwarded to be presented to the hon. the Postmaster-General of that time, stating the claims of these villages of Port Elgin, Paisley and Southampton, to have an extension of the evening daily mail service from Walkerton, which place had enjoyed the privilege of an evening mail for several years. The petitions referred to were presented by myself to the Postmaster-General, of that day, who promised that the matter would be looked into. While attending the Session of 1878, I endeavoured to press this matter upon the attention of the hon. Postmaster-General, showing him that the people of that section of the country, especially the business men in these villages, were anxious to have the accommodation of a second daily mail, to which it can be shown they are fairly entitled. These places are all of considerable importance. Paisley and Port Elgin have a population of over 2,000 each, and are centres of business importance. A considerable grain trade is carried on in each of those places, especially Paisley and Port Elgin. Therefore, the business community, in particular, naturally desire to have advantages conferred upon them similar to that of those enjoyed by the town of Walkerton. The village of Southampton also presented her claims, desiring similar privileges. After the elections of 1878, and previous to the resignation of the then Ministry, I received a correspondence from the hon. the Postmaster-General stating that instructions had been given to the Post-office Inspector, in that section, to have papers prepared and to have this service extended from Walkerton to Southampton. During last Session, I made enquiries of the hon. the Postmaster-General as to the cause of delay in carrying out the late Ministry's arrangement in this affair, when I was promised that the matter would be looked into. I also put a question on the Notice Paper in relation to the question at that time, but received no satisfactory answer. This Session I have again renewed my enquiry receiving the old stereotyped reply that the matter was under the consideration of the Government. But nothing has yet been done. I do trust that the hon. Minister will no longer delay in giving the promised advantages, and thus cease to hold the question in suspense.

Motion agreed to.

CHINESE IMMIGRATION.

SELECT COMMITTEE APPOINTED.

MR. DECOSMOS moved :

"That a Select Committee be appointed, to whom shall be referred all petitions presented to this House during the present Session, respecting Chinese immigration, who shall report on the same, and generally on Chinese labour and immigration, as affecting the Dominion; with power to send for persons and papers, and to report from time to time; said Committee to consist of Messrs. DeCosmos, Williams, Charlton, Bannerman, Brooks, Trow, Ouimet, Thompson (Carriboo), Connell, McInnes, and Schultz, five of whom to be a quorum."

He said: When I offered this motion appointing a Committee on Chinese immigration last Wednesday the hon. member for Lambton asked that it should stand with a view to its being adopted. There is no time now to adopt it and we can take it up again next Wednesday. If the hon. member will consent to it, I am willing to move it now, and to move the adjournment of the debate, in order that the debate may take place next Wednesday.

MR. MACKENZIE: It was my intention when that motion was made the other day to enter upon the discussion of this question at some length. At this period of the Session it is impossible for the Committee asked for by the hon. gentleman to do any work. If the hon. gentleman chose to call witnesses from China or Japan, it is evident they cannot be here this Session.

MR. ANGLIN: Witnesses coming from British Columbia would be entitled to a considerable amount of travelling expenses and remuneration for loss of time. I would like to understand what the hon. gentleman means to do. He should be restrained within some bounds in this matter.

MR. DECOSMOS: So far as I am concerned, and the other gentlemen named on the Committee, there is no desire to incur any expense, if possible. We have no notion of sending to Japan or China for witnesses, nor even to Texas. I believe there is abundant evidence obtainable even in this House, and already in the possession of this House, upon which a Committee might frame a Report that will be of value, at a future time, when it may be taken up with a view to legislation.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I think there could be no objection to the Committee going on. The hon. gentleman desires simply to have a Committee formed to lay some basis for a future enquiry at another Session.

Motion agreed to.

NORTH-WEST COLONIZATION LAND COMPANY INCORPORATION BILL.—(BILL 74.)

(Mr. Schultz.)

COMMITTEE POSTPONED.

Order for the House to go into Committee of the Whole to consider the said Bill read.

MR. CHARLTON moved:

"That the House do go into Committee of the Whole on the said Bill this day three months."

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: As the amended Bill has not been distributed, I think it desirable that this debate should be adjourned for the purpose of giving hon. gentlemen an opportunity of reconsidering the measure.

MR. ROSS (West Middlesex) moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

PRIVATE BILLS.

THIRD READINGS.

The following Bills were severally considered in Committee of the Whole, reported, read a third time, and passed:—

Bill (No. 60) To incorporate the South Saskatchewan Valley Railway Company.—(Mr. Robertson, Hamilton.)

Bill (No. 49) To incorporate the Red River and Assiniboine Bridge Company.—(Mr. White, Cardwell.)

Bill (No. 36) To authorise the Corporation of Emerson, in the Province of Manitoba, to construct a free traffic bridge across the Red River at Emerson.—(Mr. Royal.)

CANADA CENTRAL RAILWAY COMPANY ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.

[BILL 67.]

(Mr. Fitzsimmons.)

THIRD READING.

Bill considered in Committee of the Whole, amended, and reported.

Question put, to concur in the Bill, as amended.

MR. CAMERON (North Victoria) moved:

That the said Bill, as amended, be not now agreed to, but that it be re-committed to a Committee of the Whole, with instructions that they have power to amend the Bill by adding the following clause:—"As soon as the said Railway shall be constructed and in running order to the navigable water at the eastern end of Lake Superior, and in the event of any bonus or subsidy having been granted by the Dominion of Canada for the construction of such line, all railways intersecting or connecting with the said Railway, shall be entitled to and shall have running powers over so much of the said Railway as any such bonus or subsidy may at any time have been granted by the Dominion of Canada in respect of, on terms to be determined by the Governor in Council, and in accordance with the provisions of the Canadian Pacific Railway Act, 1874."

He said: This addition is substantially the same as I moved in the Railway Committee. The importance of this question to all the western part of Ontario is very great. The Bill as now proposed gives the Kingston and Pembroke, the Ontario and Pacific and the Quebec Government Railways running powers over this Canada Central Extension, but no other roads receive this advantage. Those other roads should have equal rights and powers over the Canada Central. Two years ago, I contended in this House that, by the 14th clause of the Canada Pacific Railway Act of 1874, the roads sought to be excluded had equal rights with the favoured roads, and that the Government had no right to discriminate between the different companies. The present hon. Premier then said that the Government had no right to exclude the Midland and other Railways, as a reference to the Hansard of 1878, will show. Any one may see by the Act that the moment the Canada Central obtains a subsidy, other roads become, ipso facto, entitled to running powers over it, and that all the Government has to do is determine the terms on which those powers shall be exercised. I think it would be premature for the Government to aid the Canada Central in the extension of its line to Sault Ste. Marie, and that the true interests of Quebec and Ontario are rather centred in the construction of the all-rail line of the Canada Pacific Railway, rather than to connect with the American railroads. If the object of extending the line to the Sault be the reception and conveyance eastwards of the grain and other freight reaching Thunder Bay from the North-West, a vessel could, with greater advantage for the carriage of freight, continue its journey to one of the ports on the Georgian Bay, securing more water carriage, and a shorter distance to Montreal than if it went all the way by land to the Sault, and thence by rail; in addition, it would be much cheaper. The sole effect of constructing the Railway to the Sault would be an increase of the cost of freight through an increase of the land carriage, without benefit to Quebec or Ontario, because the business would go away north of us. When the American railroad connection is made with our road at the Sault, the most dangerous competition to the Thunder Bay Section of the Canada Pacific Railway will be established. For these reasons I do not think we ought to favour the bonusing of the Canada Central road; and if they get the charter they now ask, it should be with no promise held out or any foundation for the expectation of receiving a bonus from the Government, and only as a private company. But if this charter is granted, running powers ought not to be limited to particular roads. I contend we are entitled to running powers so far as the portion of the Canada Central already or hereafter to be subsidised is concerned.

MR. DAWSON said that vessels might desire to go as far east as possible before discharging cargoes in summer; but navigation closed early at the Sault Ste. Marie. There were 100 miles east of that place which closed early, and by running the road to the Sault there would be two or three months more navigation on Lake Superior from the end of which freight could come down by rail. The road to the Sault would not only secure communication with the North-West, but open up 200 miles of a good agricultural and mineral country, and would receive a great deal of American freight, too, as the Americans were now extending their lines by the south shore of the lake to St. Paul and Duluth. He quite agreed with the views of the hon. member for North Victoria (Mr. Cameron) generally, but in this instance must suggest that he was somewhat mistaken in reference to the advantages of the proposed Railway.

Motion negatived on a division.

MR. CAMERON (North Victoria) moved to add, at the end of Section 12, the following words:—

“Of which amount five hundred thousand dollars shall be subscribed and ten per centum thereon paid up and deposited to the credit of the Company in one of the Chartered Banks of the Dominion before any of the powers hereby granted to the said Company shall be exercised.”

He said: My object in moving that additional clause is because, as has been explained in Committee, this company has no resources, no capital for the construction of this great work that we are asked to give them powers to build, beyond the equity of redemption, subject to the mortgage, of $2,500,000 on the existing line. They propose to make this extension a separate undertaking from their present line, while they, under the name of the Lake Superior Section, call the existing road the Ottawa Section. They propose to have separate rolling-stock, separate mortgages, separate bonds, and separate tolls and revenues. It is virtually an independent company we are chartering; and I think we ought to exact that the company should have not only power to subscribe shares, but that they should give evidence of their acting bona fide by subscribing half a million, and by paying 10 per cent. upon it.

Amendment negatived on a division.

Bill read the third time and passed.

REAL ESTATE ENCUMBRANCES REGULATION BILL.—[BILL 11.]

(Mr. Orton.)

THIRD READINGS.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the said Bill.

(In the Committee.)

On Section 5.

MR. WELDON: I question whether we have a right to pass that section. This legislature may have a right to deal with usury and interest, but I do not think we have any right to interfere with a contract. If a borrower makes a contract for a number of years I question the right of this Parliament to say that that contract may not be fulfilled, or that its terms may be altered. I think it is an interference with civil rights. I move that that section be struck out.

Motion negatived.

Bill ordered to be reported.

House resumed.

(In the House.)

Bill reported.

Mr. ORTON moved:

That the said Bill be not now agreed to, but that it be re-committed to Committee of the Whole, with instructions that they have power to amend the Bill by adding the following Clause:—“If any person, loan society or other corporation stipulates to receive, either directly or indirectly upon any mortgage or other lien on real estate, a greater rate of interest than 8 per centum per annum, or by any other device whatsoever receives an equivalent for such higher rate of interest; or if any person, loan society or other corporation secures by mortgage, judgment fi fa or other lien on real estate, the payment of any business debt, note of hand, contract, written or verbal, or any promise whatsoever in which a higher rate than eight per centum per annum forms a part or parcel of such lien on real estate, such person, loan society or other corporation shall forfeit ipso facto as a penalty the whole of such interest or equivalent therefor so received, which, if paid, shall be recoverable by suit by the party who has paid the same, and shall further forfeit a sum equal to the principal sum named in such lien, and the said sum so forfeited shall be recoverable by any person suing for the same by suit in any Court of competent jurisdiction, and by distress of the goods and chattels of the defendant.”

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: That is a very complicated motion. I have never heard it before, and the House should certainly have time to consider its provisions.

Amendment, with leave of the House, withdrawn.

MR. ORTON moved the third reading of the Bill.

MR. WELDON moved:

“That the Bill be not now read the third time, but that it be read the third time this day six months.”

MR. WHITE (East Hastings): I do not think there is a Bill which has come before Parliament this Session of a more important character than the one now before the House. If the hon. gentleman knew how the Province of Ontario has suffered by the operation of loan companies, and persons lending money, he would not have moved the six months' hoist to this Bill. I refer to a case in point. The Hamilton Provident and Loan Society loaned to a gentleman in the county of Peterborough, $1,000, and I received a letter from Mr. Roxburgh, enclosing the statements of the Secretary, which are as follows:—

THE HAMILTON PROVIDENT AND LOAN SOCIETY.

Yours truly,

H. D. CAMERON,

Treasurer.

This measure should undoubtedly be allowed to become law, and I am sorry the hon. member for Centre Wellington (Mr. Orton) could not get his amendment in, in order that we should have the rate fixed. The hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) has drawn up the Bill carefully, and I am satisfied it would be a great improvement on the existing law. We have heard a great deal about the large numbers of people that are leaving this country, and if this measure is not amended, the exodus will be greatly increased in the future. I trust the six months' hoist will not pass. The following is a statement furnished by the Provident Loan Society of part of the expenses of this loan. This statement bears the seal of the company, which shows it is correct:—

M. S. PUTNAM, Inspector.

MR. SPROULE: I am very sorry that an hon. gentleman should have taken the trouble to move the six months' hoist to such an important Bill as the one under consideration. Since this Bill was introduced, I have received a letter from one of my constituents in reference to the company my hon. friend has just referred to. It stated that the Hamilton Bank and Loan Company lent a gentleman in his neighbourhood $1,500 two years ago. It was to be paid up in twenty equal annual instalments. The first payment was made, and the second was due last January. Between then and the end of March sometime, without any notice, they issued a distress warrant and seized everything he had in the house, even to a child's cot, and sold on eight days' notice. The man was a comparatively ignorant man and was not aware of the kind of mortgage he had signed, or the amount of interest he was paying. Negotiations were entered into with another company, and this company were asked how much they would take to raise the mortgage. The reply was that they would take $2,000. It seems strange that they should require an advance of $500 on the original loan to raise the mortgage after one year's payment had been made. This is an evidence that the company is not carrying on business in a legitimate way, and that they are obtaining money from the borrower by false pretences, because he did not know, in this instance, the nature of his mortgage. I think a clause ought to be inserted in the Bill compelling these companies to accept their money within a period of three years; and I am of opinion that the evidence we have before us ought to induce us to pass this Bill now. It can, however, only be accepted as a half-measure in the right direction, to be amended, from year to year, as the requirements of the country necessitate.

MR. ROBINSON: A charge was made the other evening, something similar to this, against the Trust and Loan Company, but it was subsequently confessed to be erroneous.

MR. ORTON: The charge never was made, and it was never required to correct it.

MR. ROBINSON: Well, something was said of an extravagant charge made by that company that was afterwards, no doubt, very properly denied. I rose to remark upon what has been said by my hon. friend from Prince Edward, (Mr. McCuaig) in regard to the Western Canadian Loan Society having made a very extravagant charge for interest and other expenses in the purchase of some mortgage. Now, that society, to my own knowledge, is presided over by gentlemen of as high character, ability and standing, as are on the board of any other loan society in this country. I take upon myself to deny the correctness of the statement of my hon. friend. I believe it will be found, on enquiry, that this statement, like some others made regarding these societies, is without any authority except that of someone who borrowed money and was unable to repay it.

MR. MCCUAIG: I am very cautious in making any statement to this House, and the case I refer to is that of David P. Sales, of the county of Prince Edward.

Motion in amendment negatived.

MR. OLIVER moved in amendment:

"That the Bill be not now read a third time, but that it be re-committed to a Committee of the Whole, with instructions that they have power to strike out Clause 5."

Motion in amendment negatived.

PETROLEUM INSPECTION LAW AMENDMENT BILL—[BILL 4.]

(Mr. Colby.)

SECOND READING POSTPONED.

Order for second reading read.

MR. COLBY, in moving the second reading of the Petroleum Inspection Bill, said : The Act passed at the last Session regulating the inspection of petroleum, fixed the standard fire test on Canadian oils at 105° Fahrenheit, and the standard fire test on imported oils at 130° Fahrenheit. The present Bill proposes to substitute a uniform fire test of 115° on all oils, whether Canadian or foreign. I introduced this Bill at a very early stage of the Session, but I purposely allowed it to remain on the Orders until now, because, for one reason, it affected a large interest engaged in the production and manufacture of petroleum ; and I felt it to be due to those so interested to have a full opportunity of considering to what extent the proposed change might affect their interests, and of placing their views on this subject before the House : and I am happy to know that they have availed themselves of the services of a very intelligent and active gentleman, who has resided at the capital during the Session, and who has endeavoured to impress their views on the members privately. I permitted it to stand in order, also, that, as it is a matter affecting life and property, I might make no error in judgment. In the meantime, I have spared no reasonable effort to obtain the opinions of men supposed to have a knowledge of the subject—both those interested on one side and the other of the question, and those entirely disinterested—and I desired the members of the House and the Government to fully consider the matter. But I would say further, that the delay has been allowed to take place with the understanding that an ample opportunity should be afforded me to present and to push this measure. The Bill proposes to deal with the fire test only. There are other matters relating to the inspection of these oils, well worthy the attention of the Government, and which fall more immediately within their Province. The first, indeed the paramount, consideration, in regard to the fire test, is that of safety. The numerous heartrending accidents of which we have had accounts through the newspapers during the past year, and which have resulted from the use of dangerous oils, are something startling. It is of the greatest importance to provide, by law, for the proper inspection of these oils, and to prescribe such tests and regulations as will ensure safety, and prevent the recurrence of those accidents. Nothing is more fraught with danger than dangerous coal-oil. It is an unseen and subtle danger, more to be dreaded than the careless use of gunpowder. We are aware of the presence of gunpowder, but we cannot detect the presence of the inflammable vapours which arise from petroleum, and which are concealed in a lamp in which the oil is partly consumed. The flame of a burning lamp is conveniently near to these explosive vapours, so that, by the carelessness of servants, or children, or by accidents, we are constantly exposed to such conflagrations as unhappily raged across the river here to-day, and too often to the most horrible sufferings and death. We cannot be too careful—to keep in view the question of safety as a paramount consideration—in determining the test to which all petroleum burning oils should be subjected. If by lowering the test I should incur the risk of trenching upon safety, I should most deeply regret it, but I shall endeavour to avoid that ; and my proposition, I think, has avoided it. As every hon. member is probably aware crude petroleum contains gases and volatile liquids giving off, at ordinary temperatures, vapours which are explosive when mixed with air. It also contains heavy oils which injure its burning properties, but are useful as lubricators and paraffine. By proper distillation the volatile constituents, such as gasoline, naphtha and benzine, are eliminated on the one hand, and paraffine, tar, and the heavier ingredients of weak illuminating power, are removed on the other, leaving the intermediate hydro-carbons, freed from their lighter and heavier associations, a good and safe burning oil. By the fire test we ascertain whether the volatile constituents are present in a dangerous degree, and by the gravity test we ascertain whether the heavier ingredients are present in such quantity as to impair the illuminating properties of the oil. A correct fire test and a correct gravity test, properly applied, will give both a safe and good illuminating oil. In order to ascertain whether an oil be safe or unsafe, different countries have adopted different tests. One is known as the flash or vapour test, and determines at what temperature the oil will emit a vapour which, when mixed with atmospheric air, will ignite and cause an explosion. The other test is known as the burning test, and determines the temperature at which the body of the oil itself will ignite. Oil does not ignite when brought in contact with flame at so low a temperature as that at which explosive vapours are evolved. The difference in temperature between the point at which explosive vapour is emitted, as indicated by the flash test, and that at which the body of the oil ignites, as indicated by the burning test, ranges ordinarily from 20° to 30°. An oil which would stand a flash test of 105° would commonly stand a burning test of 125° to 130°. In Canada we use the flash test, while some of the United States use the flash and others use the burning test. As an explosion is not without danger, even if the oil does not ignite, the flash test indicates danger with more certainty than the burning test. In fixing the test it is important to ascertain the temperature at which oil is ordinarily exposed in lamps, and to prevent, if possible, the sale of any oil which would emit an explosive vapour at that temperature, or at a temperature consequently above it. I have consulted authorities and obtained the opinions of experts on this point. In the last edition of "Appleton's Cyclopaedia" (1877) I find the following:—

"As the temperature of this oil in a burning lamp seldom or never exceeds 100° Fahrenheit, it is obvious that such an oil is perfectly safe, as it would never yield any vapour below 110°, which, by mingling with the air above the oil in the lamp, would form with it an explosive mixture."

The point here fixed is a flash test of 110° as the safety point. I am able to lay before the House another authority entitled to weight. It was found at New Orleans, in the State of Louisiana, that oil considered to be safe in New York, when taken to the higher temperature prevailing there, proved unsafe. Exhaustive experiments were made by the Board of Health of New Orleans, under Dr.

White, the President, and the result of the investigation was the enactment of a flash test of 110° Fahrenheit, as the safety point in that latitude. The ordinance prescribed that every vendor of kerosene oil, or other illuminating oil or oils, or any illuminating fluid or fluids, derived wholly or part from coal or petroleum, shall, before actual delivery thereof, attach, or cause to be attached, securely, to the cask or vessel containing the same, a card, label, or tag, upon which shall be printed in plain type, not less than one-eighth of an inch in height, the correct name and brand of such oil or oils, fluid or fluids in such cask or vessel contained; also, the words and figures following: "Inflammable at —° Fahrenheit" (naming the degrees), or "Inflammable at any temperature" (as the case may be); also, the words and figures following: "Explosive, at —°" (naming the degrees), or "Non-Explosive" (as the case may be); also, the words following: "Board of Health Standard Flashing Point, 110°." I find that this ordinance was subsequently approved by a very high authority. I have had placed in my hands by Mr. Young, Chief of the Fire Brigade in this city, a report of the proceedings of a Convention, held in New York, in 1876, of the Chief Engineers of the Fire Department, representing over sixty different cities in the United States and Canada; by which you can see that it was a largely representative body of men specially conversant with such subjects. There were also present a number of underwriters and fire insurance delegates, and others greatly interested in these problems. Among the subjects discussed was that of "Regulating the sale of petroleum." The question was referred to a Sub-Committee which, after giving it the fullest consideration, reported to the Board, and the Board adopted the report, upon which they based the following recommendation:—

"We cordially recommend to the Convention the resolutions adopted by the Board of Health of the City of New Orleans, and would commend to the cities and towns of the country the ordinance regulating the sale of petroleum in said city of New Orleans."

Thus, the conclusions of the New Orleans Board of Health, and the city ordinance establishing a flash test of 110°, were, after a trial of seven years, cordially endorsed and recommended by this highly respectable and intelligent convention of fire engineers, underwriters and fire insurance delegates. I think I have quoted good authorities to prove that a flash test of 110° may be considered safe. Among the many accidents that have startled us in this country, and which have been investigated, I have not been able to find a single instance in which the explosion or accident took place where the oil had stood a test of as high as 100° even. There have been instances where the barrel containing the explosive oil bore the Inspector's mark of 105° and upwards, but the particular sample of oil which exploded, when tested, did not go above 92°. I have yet to learn of an instance of an accident where the oil stood the flash test of 100°; but I am desirous of allowing every reasonable margin for safety. The States of Vermont, Maine, New Hampshire and New York have a burning test of 120°, which is equivalent to a flash test of 100° or less; but my proposition, the House will bear in mind, is a uniform flash test of 115°, which would be equivalent to a burning test of about 140° or 20° above the test adopted by the several States I have mentioned. I find Massachusetts has a burning test of 110°, that is to say 10° lower than the other states which I have named, and 30° lower than the test which my Bill proposes, making allowances for the difference between the flash and burning test. New York city adopted a flash test of 100°, which is 15° lower than my proposition. In the City and State of New York, in Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont and Massachusetts, I think we shall find as much intelligence and good sense, in regard to this subject, as in any part of the United States; and those states have adopted tests far below that which my Bill proposes. Wisconsin, Illinois, Ohio and Michigan have adopted higher tests. I think Michigan has gone to the extremely high burning test of 180°. I have information, from a reliable source, that the price of these oils, required to meet these exaggerated tests, averages 10c. per gallon above the ordinary standard oils. In New York the price is 9c., and in Michigan, 19c.; that is the penalty paid for such a wild and extreme test. With these data and the experience of experts and dealers in oils, confirmed by my own observation and experience, I am thoroughly convinced that the flash test of 110°, which would be equivalent to a burning test of 135° or 140° would provide a perfectly safe oil. But in this Bill I have not contented myself with resting within a narrow margin of safety, but have added what my judgment tells me, and the best information shows, will make a perfectly safe test, five degrees more, placing it at 115°, a point at which the oil must be, in all possible circumstances, excepting gross carelessness, a perfectly safe article. It has been urged, recently only, that there should be a distinction between the test to be applied to American and that to Canadian oils. That there is a difference in the comparative safety of the two oils in favour of the Canadian, nothing seems to me more unreasonable or improbable. If any difference exists, it is precisely the reverse. Experiments were recently made in the Inland Revenue Department, and high scientific authorities tend to show that the American oil is, of the two, the safer, where both stand the same flash test. In confirmation of my statement, I will quote a passage from the "Popular Science Monthly," a high authority:

"Dr. White, President of the New Orleans Board of Health, found that, on adding to oil which 'flashed' at 113° F., one per cent. of naphtha, the mixture flashed at 103°; with two per cent. at 92°; with five per cent. at 83°." (Report on Petroleum to New York Board of Health. Dr. C. F. Chandler, 1871.) Dr. Chandler says: "The addition of one per cent. of naphtha will lower the flashing test 10° in a good oil, when it would not materially affect the burning point. A quantity of naphtha, gasoline or benzine, quite insufficient to affect the burning test or the inflammability of the body of the oil, would make a very appreciable difference in the flash test."

If then there be more naphtha in American oil than in Canadian the flash test instantly detects it, and the difference between the point at which it will so flash, and the point at which the oil will ignite, must therefore be greater in American than in Canadian of the same flash test. A long series of experiments has been made to determine the difference between the relative flashing and burning points of American and Canadian oils. It has been shown to be two degrees in favour of American oil. So, the proposition that there shall be any discrimination against American oil, based on considerations of safety, is to my mind entirely without foundation in science or good sense. Whatever the test may be, it should be uniform.

MR. MACKENZIE: I think the hon. gentleman is mistaken in thinking there is naphtha in the Canadian oil.

MR. COLBY: There is naphtha. I have it on high authority.

MR. MACKENZIE: No.

MR. COLBY: Yes, and benzine; but there is little or no gasoline. Those elements are all inflammable and give out an explosive gas. The question of safety is not the only—although it is the most important—consideration in determining the test of an oil. It is an established fact that, after you pass a certain degree or test, you impair the illuminating qualities of the oil. After you have removed the lighter constituents of the oil, so as to bring it above 115° or 120° you reduce the illuminating power, leaving a larger proportion of paraffine. So the effect of having a test higher than is necessary for safety, is to give an inferior illuminating oil. Dr. Baker Edwards, than whom there is no higher authority on this subject, says: "I consider 120° too high a standard to ensure an equably burning oil, especially in the winter season." He fully approves of the 115° test, and gives the weight of his authority to my proposal, saying if you go above 115° you impair, in a corresponding degree, the illuminating qualities of the oil. It then becomes a heavier oil; it follows up the wick less readily; it chars the wick, heats the burner and smokes the chimney. I called on Mr. Shaw, a large dealer in Canadian and American oils in Sparks street, and he assured me that the present test prevents him from obtaining the ordinary astral oil, of 150° burning test, which is one of the best grades in the market, and compels him to pay 3c. a gallon more for oil that would stand 175° burning test. He also says that this higher priced oil, is inferior to the other as an illuminating oil, and so does Pratt the producer; and yet he is compelled to pay that much more for it by the very remarkable legislation of last year. I have also the opinion of an experienced oil dealer in Montreal, a

"The proper fixed point should be 115° flash test. This would ensure perfect safety and a good illuminating power. After it passes that point its illuminating power becomes affected in ordinary lamps, and when it reaches and passes 120° its power is decidedly impaired. For imported oils, I can see no reason whatever for placing the fire test one degree higher than the test for Canadian oil. Dangerous oil will be effectually barred out at 115° degrees Canadian flash test.

"I have had oils brought from many different refineries in both Canada and the United States, and have always critically watched my oils, testing and examining them personally, and in a free and open market I would prefer an oil at 115°, and would consider doubtfully an oil at 120°, and decidedly object to an oil at 125°, and very much dislike some of the oils imported now at 130° for ordinary lamps. Another point to consider is the fact that the high test oils are costing, to-day, in the United States, three to five cents per wine gallon more than a really safe and good oil, and have done so for years past. This would be an increased tax upon the consumer without any benefit to the revenue of our own country, and with a loss instead of gain in the quality of the oil to the consumer. I consider oils safe enough at 110°, but 115° would place them beyond the effects of any carelessness or differences in testing; and considering the question from all the points I am acquainted with, 115° flash test would hit the happy mean."

This is the uniform testimony of all whom I have consulted on this subject. It is very certain that we are obliged to pay very much more for the high test oil—from 6c. to 10c. a gallon more—than for ordinary standard oils used under tests adopted in the New England States and New York. I received only last evening, from one of the largest dealers in oil in my county, the information that the operation of this act had obliged them to pay fully 9c. a gallon more for oil not worth one cent more than the old oil—he might have said not worth as much. I will give the prices to the House of the different kinds of oils in New York on the 13th April, 1880:

"Oil, for shipment, about 108° test, barrels included, in lots of 5,000 to 10,000 barrels, 7½c. to 7¾c. per wine gallon. Forty-five gravity oil, 135° to 140°, 14¾c. per wine gallon. One hundred and fifty to one hundred and sixty degrees, say Pratt's or Devae's, 16c. to 17c., barrels included."

The standard oils are manufactured in large quantities under most favorable conditions; and are brought, by competition, to the lowest remunerative price; but special oils, manufactured to supply a limited demand, command a special and excessive price not at all commensurate with the actual cost of raising the oil to the higher test. In the section of country in which I live, we have had, in consequence of the legislation of last year, to pay a much higher price for petroleum than ever before, and the consequence is that a great deal has been smuggled. I would call the attention of the House to the history of legislation upon this subject. The first test that we prescribed was in 1868, when we adopted the very test I propose now, that is, 115°. That was afterwards reduced, in 1871, to 105° at the instance of the very gentlemen who are now asking us to change it to 120° or 130°. After having led us to adopt the 105° test for eight years, they have suddenly changed all their views upon the subject, and have been inspired, in some way, with a new illumination. Now I am sure they do not care how high they get it, because, like all persons engaged in trade, they wish to make as much money out of their business as they can. I can quite understand why these gentlemen, after having brought it from 115° to 105°, and kept it there for eight years, now take this sudden tack and endeavour to bring it up beyond 115° to 120°. It is because they would then have to compete with an oil higher in price, and inferior in quality to that which would be brought into competition with them under a lower test. If they must have competition, they prefer it in the form of a high-priced and poor article, rather than a low-priced and good article. I have reason to believe that the legislation of last Session was wholly inspired by them. It came before the Government at a time when it could not receive that consideration which its importance deserved, and their opinions were accepted as those of experts. It was supposed they knew more about this matter than any one else, and their representations were received by the Government and the House without suspicion. The consequence has been that we have had legislation during, the past year, of which I, as a member of this Parliament, am totally ashamed. To declare a difference of twenty-five degrees in the fire test of American and Canadian oil when, as a matter of fact, there is no difference whatever, is a position which I am not very proud to have been one in taking. If the result of this legislation had been to give us a better oil, there might have been some compensation; but I appeal to every member of this House if he has ever known, in Canada, such a great number of accidents from explosions, as have taken place during the past year. With regard to the other qualities of the oil, I have no doubt the experience of my county is like that of the country generally. I have in my mind the case of a merchant who tried in December last to buy in the ordinary market American oil that would stand our fire test, and not being able to find it, he introduced Canadian oil as a substitute. He obtained the best quality he could find in Montreal. He purchased it by the carload, and arranged with several retail dealers to take a barrel each and to assist him in introducing it. Every barrel, every gallon, came back upon him, and he was obliged to gather it in and send it into the back country and exchange it for oats. People would not buy it, it was so offensive in its character. It only stood the test of 96°, although it bore the standard mark of 105° and upwards. It was an ill-burning oil, had an offensive odour, charred the wick and smoked the chimney, and people who had been accustomed to and wanted a better oil would not buy it at any price. You may lead a horse to the water, but you cannot make him drink. The fact is legislation cannot compel the people on the frontier to do what is against their interest and pleasure in this matter. They say this: We are quite prepared to pay a high duty on oil; but if the Government prohibit it by the adoption of an impracticable test, and leave people no alternative but to smuggle American oil, or use such offensive Canadian oil as has been sent to us, they may expect that people will smuggle. And that course has been taken. I do not believe the legislation of last Session—while it has injured the consumer, while it has caused more annoyance than any other measure that was passed—has been of any benefit to those gentlemen who inspired it. The oil has come into the country surreptitiously; it has been found impossible to keep it out. I think—and my Free-trade friends will applaud me here—that if those who are engaged in refining oil in Ontario, instead of seeking a factitious and unreasonable protection, under the guise of a fire test, were to endeavour to compete with the American oil in the quality of their own production under the very high protection which the Tariff gives, they would succeed better. They have to day a protection on their oil of 6c. a gallon, when oil is worth in New York only 7½c. They have a protection of nearly 100 per cent. If that is not enough, and if this House is willing to give them more, let them come to this House and ask it straight. But this disguised protection, which compels us to pay a higher price for an inferior article, is a double injury to us. It is far better that we should pay an additional 4c. a gallon as a direct protection, and have the privilege of buying the best illuminating oil wherever we choose, than to be compelled to pay 4c. a gallon more for an inferior oil as we now do. This is precisely the condition of affairs that I—in the interest of a large body of consumers in the Lower Provinces and along our extended frontier, who prefer to use American oil until our Canadian producers give us something better—an endeavouring to rectify. But it affects all those who consume Canadian oil as well. Do Canadian oil refiners give their customers a better article than they did last year, because there happened to be legislation that suited them? I have yet to learn that they do. Do they give it to them at a lower price? I have that also to learn that they do. I believe that the injustice of the present discriminating test bears just as heavily upon the consumers of Canadian as of American oil. Now, I would not willingly or wantonly add one straw's weight to the difficulties under which those gentlemen in Petrolia are labouring; I believe they are having a hard time of it, and we ought not to disregard the claims they have upon the consideration of the country. They are pumping oil out of wells that yield them but two to four barrels per day, in competition with American wells that yield 40 barrels per day. Our refiners are obliged to use a crude oil that costs $1.12 a barrel, as against the American refiner who buys at 75c. or 80c. a barrel, while the American crude yields a larger percentage of illuminating oil than does the Canadian. I have a firm belief that

MR. COLBY.

Canadian crude oil is susceptible of making just as good an illuminating oil as the American crude, and would do so but for the greed of the refiner who takes 50 per cent. of illuminating oil out of the crude oil when he should take but 40 per cent. The 10 per cent. so improperly taken consists largely of paraffine and other constituents, which impairs the illuminating quality. If the Canadian refiner would take 10 per cent less of refined oil from his crude, and charge 5c. a gallon more for it, he would find hundreds of purchasers among people who will not buy his oil now at any price. Canadian oil is a more lasting oil, and people would buy it in preference to American oil, if it was equal in its illuminating properties and somewhat free from offensive odour. They would have the advantage of nearly 20 per cent. in durability. Considering the difficulties which beset them, I certainly do not wish to state the case unfairly against them or in anyway do them an injustice. But the hon. members of this House, mostly, represent the consumers of oil. The hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie), in whose constituency most of the oil is produced, the hon. member for Middlesex, and the hon. member for London, and one or two other hon. gentlemen, are the only gentleman who represent the producers. We are told the Canadian refiners cannot live under the present protective duty of 6c. per gallon. I am very sorry they cannot live under it. I am sorry the wells are so poor; but if the industry cannot live, if we have to be taxed excessively, in order to keep them alive, the question has to be considered: is it better the industry should be supported and bolstered up by oppressive taxation upon all the people of the country, or that it should rest for a time until the unprecedented flow of American oil wells shall have been exhausted.

MR. ANGLIN: This is treason against the "N.P."

MR. COLBY: It is not treason against the "N.P." I am sorry my hon. friend has made that remark, because it compels me to speak a little longer in explanation of my views. I know many other persons have made the same remark. They have said, Mr. Colby takes an anomalous position in advocating Protection and being a Free-trader in respect to oil. Well, this is not the first time I have bored this House upon the oil question. I have bored here for oil before now, and struck it once or twice. We protectionists believe that competition regulates prices, no matter whether it be foreign or domestic competition. We do not propose to give protection to any article where the element of competition will not come in, sooner or later, and regulate the price and bring it down to a fair point. That is our general belief. That is applicable to most of the industries of this country; to the manufacture of agricultural implements, for instance, where a man can go to the forest and get his timber and buy his own iron and steel in the open market. But this oil industry is about the only industry in the Dominion that is susceptible of being brought under the control of rings and monopolists. We know that such is the case; we know that rings, at one time, controlled the entire source of production in Lambton, controlled all the refineries in London, and dominated the market all over Canada. In that way this competition, which ordinarily reduces prices, cannot be depended upon in respect to oil, because the moment it falls within the scope of a ring there ceases to be the possibility of domestic competition. The only competition then that can be depended upon to regulate the price is foreign competition. What I want to see is that that foreign competition is not placed under too great a disability. I would take the liberty of suggesting to the hon. Minister, that I do not believe any of these accidents and explosions have been the result of the fire test. I believe they have been owing to some defect in the inspection of the oil, which should be more thorough. I wish to call the attention of the hon. Minister to another thing. The act as it is now reads almost relieves vendor and refiner from responsibility. I think the man who refines the oil, and knows its constituents, should be responsible to the public. He should verify the test of the Inspector, so that when it goes out of his refinery it goes out with his endorsement, and he should be responsible for the consequences. I think, in these particulars, this Act requires amendment. I would say, that it is very important that the gravity of the oil should be readily determined, so that the purchaser should not be compelled to buy a lubricating oil, when they require an oil that will burn. The wording of the clause, in relation to the gravity test, should be simplified so that every one could understand it. It should define the gravity by pounds and ounces, so that every man who has scales can weigh it. At present it is defined by the number of degrees of Baumé; and but few persons understand the signification of the terms, or have the proper instrument. I would also suggest the appointment of a special officer to oversee the Inspectors of Oil, and see that they do their work properly, and who should move about from place to place, dropping in upon refiners and vendors unawares, and confiscating such oil, foreign or domestic, as did not stand the legal test.

MR. FLYNN: I was pleased to see the hon. member for Stanstead, early in the Session, introduce the Bill now about being read a second time. He very correctly states that the present law is one that we ought to be ashamed of. I was aware this Act was introduced last Session, but I had no idea that any discrimination was made between the fire test of American oil and that of Canadian oil. In the Maritime Provinces this law is felt as a great injustice. The hon. member for Stanstead has correctly stated that the present Act is a virtual exclusion of American oil from the Maritime Provinces and other parts of the Dominion. Still, I believe that a large quantity of oil was smuggled into the country, because the people will use American oil. We have always found that the American oil is less offensive in its smell, and that it is more free from explosive qualities. It is very desirable that we should have a uniform test for American and Canadian oils. I wish to call the attention of the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue to the fact that there is another discrimination made between American and Canadian oils which should not be made. For instance, the cost of inspection of a 50-gallon cask of Canadian oil is only 10 cents, while the cost of inspecting a similar cask of American oil is 30 cents, or a difference of 20 cents. I do not see why the law in this respect should remain on the Statute-book any more than the legislation in regard to the test referred to, and I hope the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue will see his way clear to making the inspection fee equal upon both oils.

MR. MACMILLAN: I coincide with the desire of the hon. member for Stanstead that the fire test of oil should be placed at a point which would prevent the calamities which have taken place for years past, so as to avoid a repetition of such accidents in the future. One can scarcely pick up a newspaper without finding in it a report of some shocking accident by an explosion of coal oil. Even to-day, I took up a paper and found an account of a disastrous fire which was caused by an explosion of coal oil. It is as follows:--

"A coal oil lamp exploded in the residence of Mrs. Cole, school-teacher, Weedon, P.Q., setting fire to her three children and burning them frightfully. Mrs. Cole was also badly burned in trying to extinguish the flames."

And again, last month, we read of a distressing accident which was published in all the papers:

"Kleinsburg, Ont.—About 8 o'clock last night, as Mrs. Archy McTaggart was returning from putting her children to bed, the lamp which she was carrying exploded, and the burning oil flowing over her clothes set fire to them, burning her in a frightful manner. She lingered in agony until this morning when she died."

Such a state of things should not exist in this country; and when I hear an hon. member ask the House to reduce the fire test on oil, I tremble for the consequences. With reference to the explosive character of the two oils, it is well known that, in regard to Canadian oil, there is much less chance of its exploding at the same fire test than of American oil. My hon. friend has quoted from many American journals, with reference to the fire test used in the respective states. Take, for instance, the States of Michigan and Ohio. There they ought to know much better than we do what the proper test should be, for the simple reason that they have much more experience in regard to it than we have. I find the fire test of these states, and also a number of others to be considerably more than that of Canada on Canadian oil. The Inspector of Petroleum, at Cleveland, Ohio, which is the great oil market of the United States, in his report for the year 1878, says:

"The standard test for all illuminating oils in Ohio is 120° Fahrenheit's thermometer, and all illuminating oils that will not bear a flash test of 120° cannot be legally sold in this state for illuminating purposes."

Now, Sir, with regard to the statement of my hon. friend, when he says that there should be no difference between the flash test of Canadian and American oil, I will read what Professor Keadzie and other members of the Michigan State Board of Health say on the subject. This body gave the subject of petroleum the most minute investigation, and I avail myself of their experience in reference to the difference between high and low test oils, as to the cause and the results of accidents, as contained in the report of the Secretary of the State Board, which says:

"Under all such circumstances, when, by the breaking of a lamp, or otherwise, a quantity of illuminating oil is exposed to a flame, the chances of possible control are very much in proportion, inversely, to the volatility of the oil; for when oil that is volatile at a low temperature is so exposed, the entire surrounding atmosphere becomes almost instantly impregnated with its vapour, which, as soon as a flame comes in contact with any part of it, becomes a continuous sheet of flame, completely enveloping persons or surrounding objects, and, therefore, entirely beyond any control, which can immediately be brought to bear upon it. Under such circumstances, loss of life and property is imminent. With less volatile oil, under an equal accession of heat, there is less pressure of vapour, and if the mass of oil is exposed by the breaking of a lamp, or otherwise, a longer time elapses before the oil is converted into vapour. Under such circumstances, the element of time makes all the difference between certain death and destruction of property, and possible escape with life and property."

Now we claim that Canadian oil is less volatile than American oil, and consequently not so dangerous. American oil has 20 per cent. of gasolene, benzine, benzole, and naphtha in its component parts, while Canadian oil has only 5 per cent. of benzine in the crude oil, just as it comes from the ground, and no gasolene or other explosive substances in it whatsoever. Gasoline is more volatile than benzine, and, therefore, American oil is more volatile than Canadian oil, and will explode with more violence at the same temperature than Canadian oil, and consequently do more damage. The higher the temperature of the oil is, the more violent the explosion. American oil being more volatile than Canadian oil will throw off a greater body of vapour at the same temperature than

Canadian oil, and consequently do more damage, and would be sure to set fire to the oil, whereas Canadian oil, at the same temperature, would not throw off such a large body of combustible vapour, and would either not explode to all, or, if it did, would not have force enough to set fire to the oil. It takes ten degrees more temperature to heat up Canadian oil to a point at which it will throw off an equal amount of explosive vapour as American oil; and, therefore, in fixing the fire test of illuminating oil in this country, to do justice to the Canadian manufacturer, there should be ten degrees of difference fixed between the flash test of Canadian and American oil, if there is any less difference than that made, you legislate in favour of the American refiner and against the Canadian oil interest. Now, the lowest point at which we consider Canadian oil safe, is 115° flash test by Fahrenheit's thermometer, therefore, the test on American oil should be 125° and no less. My hon. and learned friend from Stanstead (Mr. Colby) says that a high fire test impairs the burning qualities of the oil, and the public who prefer to burn American oil, while they are obliged to pay a higher price for it, are compelled to use an inferior article in consequence of this high fire test. In relation to that matter, I will read what the same authority I quoted before, says, on that point:

"The lighting qualities of some of the oils lately sold in this state have not been good. Some people have pretended to believe that it was because of the high fire test required by law. Those who understand the facts know that this is not true."

And then he goes on to point out the reasons why some oils do not give as good light as others, and recommends more care in keeping the lamps clean, and in the selection of burners and wicks, and winds up with paraffine, and I will read you what he says on that head:

"The presence of a superabundance of paraffine has much to do in reducing the illuminating power of the oil in which it is contained by gumming or charring up the wick, and thereby preventing a sufficient supply of oil to the wick to produce combustion."

Now, Sir, it is well known that the longer the oil is distilled the more paraffine will be in the refined oil. The cause of the burning qualities not being good is the presence of paraffine in the refined oil, because the refiner has taken too much refined oil out of the crude, the heavy vapour containing the paraffine being the last to come off the still, and in order to get up the fire test, the refiner blows the lighter and more explosive particles out of the oil, leaving the paraffine or heavy oil, and consequently the percentage of paraffine or heavy oil becomes too great and impairs the illuminating qualities of the oil by gumming the wick. You can have a good burning illuminating oil of any fire test you like, by proper care being taken in the manufacture of it. The Legislatures of a number of states in the American Union, having a population of over 15,000,000 inhabitants, have fixed a flash test, which is much more severe than a fire test, on their own oil of 120°. In the State of New York the test is 110°, and I wish to call the hon. gentleman's attention to what took place there a few days ago. The newspaper of the district, where this accident occurred, says:

"One of the most remarkable tragedies that has occurred in this section of the state for many years took place at Norwich, Chenango County, N. Y., early last Saturday morning. Mrs. Mary E. Griffing, a wealthy widow, and cousin of Senator Conkling, was found upon the floor of the hall in her mansion horribly burned. When picked up she was unconscious, and died in about an hour. On Friday night, Mrs. Griffing, her mother, and Miss Conkling retired at 9 o'clock. The widow slept alone in a spacious chamber on the second floor. It was her custom to leave a lamp burning by her bedside. This morning about 4:30 o'clock Miss Conkling was aroused by a strange noise, and a few moments later the household was awakened by the agonising screams of Mrs. Griffing. The oil from the exploded lamp had saturated the pillow which supported the head of the victim while she was asleep. Grasping the other pillow with rare presence of mind she attempted to smother the flames. Failing in this, she sprang from the bed and rushed into the hall, where she was found as above described. She was burned beyond recognition."

In consequence of such accidents as these, the Americans themselves have raised the fire test on their own oil, and why should not we do likewise. I cannot imagine why the people in the Lower Provinces have such a prejudice against our Canadian oil. We burn it altogether in Ontario, and find it to give great satisfaction, it burns so long, and is so cheap. The best oil is now selling in London for

8c. a gallon without the barrels, and 11c. per gallon, barrels included. I have an instance here of how much longer Canadian oil, of the same strength, will burn than American oil. Messrs. C. S. Shaw and Company, of this city, who keep both American and Canadian oil for sale, tested the burning qualities of both oils in lamps in their store for eight consecutive nights, using one pint of each kind of oil each night, and they found that the gallon of Canadian oil had burned one-fifth longer than the American oil, or, in other words, had given thirty-five hours more light, the American gallon of oil having burned out in 110 hours, and the Canadian oil having lasted for 145 hours; and yet, in the face of all this, my hon. friend from Stanstead is trying to make it easier to import American oil to be used in this country, and to come into competition with our Canadian oil. It is to my mind most desirable that we should give our Canadian oil encouragement as far as possible. My idea was, when the National Policy passed, that we should protect our industries as long as we did not protect them to death, as one hon. gentleman has said. If through misfortune the hon. gentleman's constituents get hold of bad oil, certainly something should be done to have the inspection so fixed that a better oil would be secured, to compel people, in fact, to prepare a better oil, or see that the inferior oil is destroyed. We are desirous to have as good oil as possible, and we can have as good oil as American oil by taking a less quantity out of the crude oil. I would suggest that an Inspector be appointed by the Government, and give him absolute authority to go through the country, and wherever he finds any oil not up to the proper fire-test, that he should destroy it. That would enable us to get a first-class oil, and put us in a position not to have to go across the border to get it from a foreign country. With reference to a coal oil ring, which has been referred to, it was true that a ring did exist in the West among the refiners; but that is past. It is impossible to renew anything of the kind now; because the only way to establish the ring was through the instrumentality of the books they had to open up for the Inland Revenue. These books were sworn to by the refiner and verified by the Inland Revenue officer, and were open to the inspection of the refiners, and they could tell exactly how many gallons were made. No Excise duty is charged now, and any combination of that kind could not exist; they could deceive each other if they chose, and the consequence is no ring has been established since the Excise duty was taken off the oil. It could not be now done with any degree of success. I feel very strongly in favour of having the fire test increased upon Canadian oil, and decreased upon American oil, that is that the test on Canadian oil be increased from 105° to 115°, and that it be decreased on American oil from 130° to 125°. In this way we will succeed in getting a good safe oil, either by importation from the United States or from Canadian manufacture; and if that regulation is established, my hon. friend will have no cause to grumble. Mr. Charles A. Ashburner, Assistant State Geologist for Pennsylvania, in an interesting lecture which he delivered some weeks ago at the Franklyn Institute in Philadelphia, said: that from actual records kept in the Department, over 30,000 human lives and $20,000,000 worth of property have been destroyed during the last ten years by the use of badly refined burning oils. If we can defend ourselves against this, and in the way I suggest, I think we should use every exertion to do so, and appoint an Inspector to go through the country as I have suggested, and see that proper and safe illuminating oil is manufactured or imported and sold throughout the Dominion.

MR. CASEY: I am sure the House will agree that great credit is due to the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Colby), for bringing up this matter this year. He has applied himself, on several occasions, to this coal oil question. I cannot absolve the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue from all blame for letting the existing provision of the law go through. It is not expected that he, himself, should know all about coal oil; but he has experts in the Department, and he should know that there ought not to be any discrimination, or he should have had the subject argued.

MR. BABY: It was argued.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Well, there was a little discussion on it, but not very much.

Mr. CASEY: I think the hon. Minister should have seen that there was just ground for this discrimination before introducing it. In reference to the test, the hon. member for East Middlesex (Mr. Macmillan) has tried to show that American oil is much more explosive than Canadian. I think it is likely that a sample of American oil, taken at random, will explode at a lower temperature than average Canadian oil. It is, however, absurd to say that of two samples which stand the same flash test, one will explode at one point and the other at another, as that test shows the temperature at which explosion takes place. A gentleman who has been for some time in the city, as the representative of the oil producer, has given me a memorandum on the subject for use in this discussion, the pertinent part of which I will lay before the House. He says:

"Mr. Colby says that there should be a uniform fire-test on both Canadian and American oils. This is unjust to the Canadian manufacturers. Canadian oil is a less volatile oil than American oil, and has no gasolene in it, and only a small proportion of benzine, which is not so volatile or explosive as gasolene. American crude oil contains 20 per cent. of gasolene. If you take an American oil and Canadian oil, which will both burn upon the application of flame, at a given temperature of say 130° Fahrenheit, the American oil will throw off a vapour which will explode at 10° lower temperature than the Canadian oil. The vapour from oil explodes before the oil will burn; therefore, there should be 10° difference in the flash-test to put both oils on an equal footing."

The hon. gentleman to whom I have referred argues that a uniform test on both kinds of oil is unjust, because the American oil, even if no more explosive than Canadian, is more liable to burn, and so set fire to the house after it has exploded. I argued with him that those figures upset his case, and I think so still. They show that, of two specimens of oil, American and Canadian, that will both burn at the same temperature, the American will flash at 10° lower than the other, there is then 10° greater difference between the exploding and burning points of American oil than between the exploding and burning points of Canadian oil. Therefore, we can only conclude the lighter—or American—oil will not burn at quite so low a temperature as the heavier, if they both explode at the same point. I am informed that a series of experiments have been made in this city by a Government officer, which establishes the same thing. I think, then, we may conclude that, if we ascertain positively that the American oil, which we allow to be imported, will not explode at any lower point than the Canadian, there is no danger of its taking fire at any lower point. The explosion of a lamp which scatters the oil into fine fragments, may cause it to burn at a lower figure than if the flame were applied to it in an open saucer; and the same results might not flow from explosions as tests made in the usual way, but the relations of the two oils would remain the same, although the figures at which explosions took place might be different. The hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Macmillan) has referred to several accidents which had occurred with American oil under a burning test of 115°, to show that American oil generally was unsafe. Now, it would be a very low grade of oil that would burn at 115°—not such as would be admitted by the Bill of the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Colby), which required a flash test of 115° since there were 20° or 40° between the flashing and burning points. We know that oil that will explode at 105° is reasonably safe; it is not an oil that frequently explodes. We know also that in Canada—though no oil is supposed to go out under that figure—oil frequently explodes. It follows, therefore, that the explosions in Maine, even if their law required a flash test of 115°, may have been due to some such error in testing, or to carelessness on the part of officers or dealers as has occurred in connection with explosions in Canada. As to the matter of trouble and expense, as I am informed, the fire test is raised by blowing air through the oil, which carries away the volatile elements. There is some expense in the process, and loss from the removal or dispersion of those particles to raise the oil to a higher test. There is a difference of 8½c. between the lowest and highest of these oils, whose prices were quoted by the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Macmillan), consequently the higher test involves the production of a more costly oil. I think that an oil bearing a burning test of 130° or 150°, or something between 130 ° and 150 ° would, probably, be the sort of oil that would be admitted by the 115 ° flash test. There would be a difference of 1½c. to 2c. between those two oils—the sort now admitted, and that which the Bill proposed would admit—in the cost price, caused by the difference in the flashing point. This is quite a serious difference, if it can be shown that the lower of these two oils is safe. But the hon. member for Stanstead has shown that the difference is greater, because a special grade has to be manufactured at an extra cost. This was an unnecessary tax on the people of Canada, because they dare not buy ordinary Canadian oil, and had to buy the American, the cost of which is artificially increased by the present law. I think, then, there is no necessity for discrimination as to the flash test between Canadian and American oils. If there was a burning test, there would need to be a discrimination of 10 °, according to the figures of my informant. It will be incumbent on the advocates of the present discrimination to show grounds for it, in public opinion, which they have failed to do. The member for East Middlesex (Mr. Macmillan) says the Canadian oil burns more slowly. That does not show it is safer. It is, however, better value for its cost. That is a considerable protection for the Canadian dealer, as every consumer wishes to economise in the consumption of oil. I think the late Government gave a great boon to the country in abolishing the Excise on this oil, and breaking up the coal oil ring. I shall have great pleasure in supporting the Bill of the member for Stanstead, and I hope the Minister of Inland Revenue will consider the suggestion of both the hon. gentlemen who have spoken on this measure (Mr. Colby and Mr. Macmillan), and of my hon. friend behind me (Mr. Flynn), in regard to the inspection and seizure of bad oils and kindred matters.

MR. LONGLEY: Nothing connected with the Tariff has produced so much dissatisfaction in the Lower Provinces as the raising of the standard of American oil. This was done through the agency of a Bill passed during the last hours of the last Session; which seems not to have attracted the attention of anyone outside of the promoters thereof. In truth it was scarcely open, straightforward legislation, which thus, practically, secured to the Ontario refiners double protection. We do not much object to the duty of 6c. per gallon on American oil, though we may think it a pretty steep protection on an article worth only from eight to ten cents per gallon at the place of production; but when an attempt was made to give a double protection to the Canadian article by making a distinction of twenty-five degrees between the standard of American and Canadian oils, it need be no matter of surprise that the people of the Lower Provinces should protest against such an imposition. The Bill which we are now considering proposes a uniform standard for Canadian and American illuminating oils; and proposes to fix the standard at 115 ° Fahrenheit's thermometer. This standard will be generally accepted as fair and right, and will be attended with satisfaction. It is matter for general regret that, up to the present time the Canadian refiners have not succeeded in producing a really good and pure article of illuminating oil, equal to the American article, and the result has been that a great preference has been shown for the American oil. The Canadian refiners seem confident that they can bring their oil up to a standard equal to that of the American oil, and it is to be hoped that they will do so; for it is not very creditable to Canadian enterprise that their products should not more favourably compare with those of their neighbours across the border. For these and other reasons which might be urged, I have great pleasure in supporting the Bill of the hon. member for Stanstead.

MR. KILLAM: I think I owe an explanation to the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Colby) for asking him what he expected his Bill was going to accomplish. I was afraid the Government, whose avowed policy is to tax certain industries for the benefit of others, and who pushed this oil legislation through the House last year in some mysterious manner, might allow it to slip by this year without taking any action upon it, and that the Bill of the hon. member for Stanstead might be found among the slaughtered innocents. I am sure we are all obliged to the hon. gentleman for the manner in which he has explained this matter to the House. I do not profess to have any technical knowledge of the oil business. I know a great deal of dissatisfaction existed last year in relation to this matter, and I presume the Government intends to allow this Bill to pass, as they have expressed no opinion in opposition. If we are to have, for the next three years, to submit to the infliction of a Protectionist Government, it would be fitting that when the hon. member for Stanstead next has to make explanations on a Government Bill he should be provided with a position, which he is quite qualified to occupy, on the Treasury Benches.

MR. PLUMB: It is always pleasant to hear a speech from the hon. member for Stanstead. Everyone knows he brings to the discussion of any subject which he takes up in this House a remarkable degree of research. I am afraid, however, that my hon. friend who has taken up as a specialty the question of duties on petroleum, in this House, has allowed his enthusiasm and his zeal to outrun that calm judicial spirit with which he usually approaches those subjects. He might have explained that there is a vast and important difference between American and Canadian oil in their crude state, and in the conditions under which they are found in the depths of the earth. Canadian oil is reached at a depth of 500 feet below the surface, and is very much unlike the product of that of Pennsylvania wells, different in colour, quality and component parts. The crude oil of Canada is brown in colour and possesses a very small quantity of gasoline, or naphtha or benzole, and but say five per cent. of benzine. The latter is the only explosive substance it contains. The crude oil of Pennsylvania, which is dark green in colour, is found at a depth of 1,500 or 2,000 feet. Pressure is supposed to alter the character of the crude material, if it is the same in origin, which is not certain. It contains about 20 per cent. of four volatile and explosive products, gasoline, naphtha, benzine, and benzole, which are always present in greater or less relative proportions in American oil. These are not entirely dispelled by distillation. They are the dangerous elements in oil, and I think it would be hazardous to the people at large not to extend to them that protection, in requiring close inspection, and a fire-test which will ensure absolute safety, which experience has proved to be desirable; and in this it is well to try experiments, and far better to err on the side of requiring too much than too little. It is impossible for the ordinary consumer, who buys from the retail shops this article of prime necessity, to ascertain with accuracy whether it is of the proper fire test, and, consequently, whether it is explosive or not. It is well-known, also, that in the poorer houses inferior glass lamps are used, which are constantly carried about, thus enhancing the risk of breakage, and the danger of explosion is increased in proportion to the vicinity of the lamps to the overheated stoves which are found in most houses in winter. There is a constantly increasing heat in the lamp chimney while the oil is burning, the volatile elements are given out in increasing quantities, the surroundings are charged with them, and the least cause may precipitate a fatal explosion. If the fire test is a low one, there is a larger quantity of volatile material constantly escaping. It is the greatest and most culpable possible error for us blindly to deal with a question of the kind proposed; and when we have what we consider a safe standard, it is most hazardous to reduce that standard. On the part of Canadian refiners, it is proposed to raise the fire test of their oil from its present point of 105° to 120° Fahrenheit. That will compel the manufacture of a superior quality, and much of the objection now urged against Canadian oil will be obviated. I am not at all afraid that, by keeping up the standard of American oil and raising that of ours, American oil will be excluded from the Dominion, but it will place the Canadian refiner under the necessity of preparing a purer and more deodorised fluid. His material is, in many respects, superior to the American, and especially its rich illuminating power and lasting qualities. Canadian oil should be protected in the way which is indicated by the refiners themselves. It will thus compel all of them to produce a satisfactory quality, the additional cost of which is too trifling to warrant an increase of price to the consumer. If there is an increase, it will be owing to the retail dealers, and it should be understood that the present price of crude oil is but $1.25 a barrel at the Canadian wells, and that the best refined is selling at wholesale or by the barrel at 11½c. to 12c. a gallon. There has doubtless been a strong prejudice raised against Canadian oil. People have been led to believe that there was a difficulty in preparing Canadian oil for the market and making it equal to Pennsylvania oil. We have reason to know that Canadian oil can be rendered entirely free from odour, perfectly colourless, quite inexplosive and still retain a higher and richer illuminating power than its Pennsylvania rival. I believe my hon. friend from Stanstead has candidly acknowledged that it is much richer in illuminating power than that of Pennsylvania. If that is the case, it is desirable that Canadian oil should find its way into full favour in the Canadian market. There is a well-known process by which the volatile and dangerous properties are expelled at a small expense. It adds but a trifle, as I have stated, to the expense to raise the fire test, and at the standard proposed there can be no possibility of impairing the illuminating power. I think the hon. member for Stanstead was a little mistaken when he said that it would add nine or ten cents a gallon to the American oil to have it just where it is. I think we should be cautious before we proceed in the direction which is likely to cause such serious disaster to our country as the sort of legislation which the hon. member for Stanstead has invoked. I much doubt, if the proposed measure is adopted, that it will produce satisfactory results. I do not think there will be any harm in trying to do for the manufacturers and producers of coal oil in Ontario, what we have done for my hon. friend's (Mr. Longley) Province in placing a tax on American, for the benefit of Nova Scotia, coal which, so far as it may be a burden, falls most largely upon the people of Ontario. I think it would be simply a very small reciprocity. The tax on wheat and flour was claimed to be such a reciprocal concession, but it is urged by our hon. friends opposite that there can be no additional charge imposed upon the hon. gentleman's constituents, and the people of the Maritime Provinces, through the duty upon wheat and flour, and the farmers are assured that they cannot benefit by it to the extent of a penny, because the English market rules the price. The hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) has dealt with the subject in his accustomed manner. He has drawn a fearful picture of the dangers attendant upon the use of American oil, even at the high fire test of 180° required by the laws of some of the Western States. A frightful accident, occasioned by breaking a lamp, somewhere in Wisconsin was his theme, but it turns out that the accident did not occur in that State or any other having a high fire test, but in a New England State where the test is comparatively low. His excellent conclusions, therefore, fail for want of premises. I trust the proposition, which is suggested on behalf of the Canadian refiners, will meet with the consideration of this House, rather than that urged by my hon. friend from Stanstead (Mr. Colby). The Canadian oil at a fire test of 120°, I believe to be safer than the American oil at 130°. The Canadian oil is considered safe at 105°, the refiners are willing to raise that test, and I desire that the test shall be raised, because I wish to compel all the refiners to come up to the proposed standard, and produce an oil which will be acceptable to the public. We possess in the oil producing region of Enniskillen and Dawn, in Lambton County, a mine of riches of untold and practically inexhaustible value. It can be further developed by receiving proper care from the Government, without compelling the public to pay an additional price for its useful and almost indispensable product, which is one of the most important resources of the country. I think the proposition I have advocated will be acceptable to the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue, and will be in the right direction both for the producer and the consumer, whose interests seem to be identical. I beg to say again, Mr. Speaker, that I trust the House will not accept the proposition which has been made by my hon. friend from Stanstead, but will agree with me in thinking the matter should be left largely to the discretion of the Government who are fully acquainted with this subject, and upon whom the responsibility of dealing with a matter in which human life is at stake, and who have full opportunity and means of testing the question at issue, should be permitted to remain.

MR. MACDONALD (Kings, P. E. I.): So far as the Province from which I come is concerned, I may say that merchants never yet succeeded in bringing Canadian oil on the market equal to, or that was to be compared with, oil from the United States. Under these circumstances I for one shall have great pleasure in supporting the Bill brought in by the hon. member for Stanstead. While we are quite willing to afford any reasonable protection to the oil producers of this country, I think they should be prepared to put oil on the market that will compare favourably with the oil from the United States. When we find that we can get as good oil from Canada as from the United States we shall be prepared to give due credit for it. In the meantime the people of the Maritime Provinces are united on the question, and wish to have the test the same on American as on Canadian oil. It is easily seen that the legislation of last year is generally admitted to have been a failure. I believe it would be advisable to put the test on both oils at 115°.

QUEBEC TIDAL DOCK COMPLETION BILL.

(Sir Samuel L. Tilley.)

FIRST READING.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole to consider certain proposed Resolutions respecting the Quebec Harbour Commissioners.

(In the Committee.)

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: This is a proposition to advance to the Harbour Commission of Quebec $250,000 in addition to the sums authorised by the Act 34 Vict., cap. 62. It appears that, in 1875, contracts were entered into by the Commissioners for the completion of the work of improving the harbour and the construction of a tidal dock. It was found that $250,000 would be required more than the amount authorised under this Act, and it was understood at the time that this authority would be asked for by the Government when the sum was required. It is now applied for, for the purpose of completing the contracts entered into and approved at that time by the then Minister of Public Works.

MR. MACKENZIE: Has the hon. gentleman received any communication from the Commissioners to the Government on the subject.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: Yes.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT: What is the position of the Trust at present? I think Quebec has had already, in advance, three-quarters of a million.

MR. LANGEVIN: More than that. There was a vote of $1,200,000, by law, $750,000 of which was to redeem an equal amount of old debentures. Besides, there was a vote of $500,000 for a graving dock under the control of the Commissioners. They pay 5 per cent.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT: So there will be a total charge of nearly $2,000,000. What are the revenues?

MR. LANGEVIN: The revenues have increased, but they expect that when this work, under contract, is finished, and the additional work, the wet basin, is complete, they will have a large revenue from these docks, but till then they cannot load and unload easily, on account of the high tides; but if they make a wet dock they will be able to load and unload at all times.

MR. MACKENZIE: What are the revenues now received?

MR. LANGEVIN: I do not recollect at present the revenues now received. I may read, however, for the information of the hon. the leader of the Opposition a letter written on the 16th April, 1877, signed by the Secretary of the Department, and addressed to the hon. Mr. Chauveau, Senior:

"SIR—I am desired by the hon. the Minister of Public Works to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 14th inst. in which you call the attention of the Government to the tenders recently received for the Harbour Works at Quebec, pointing out that the lowest tender which you propose to accept is over $600,000, while the money at your disposal amounts to $470,000, and also stating that the Harbour Commission will in consequence require an additional loan of $250,000 for the completion of the contract, upon which additional sum you express the belief of the Commission that the revenue will suffice to meet the interest as well as the interest on the previous loans.

"I am directed to inform you that, as it appears that the means available in the Commissioners' hands are more than enough for the works this year, it does not seem necessary, at present, to ask Parliament to assent to the additional guarantee. But, looking at the statement of accounts accompanying your letter, which shows that there is sufficient revenue to meet the interest upon the additional sum required, I am directed to say the Government will, during the next Session, ask the assent of Parliament to guarantee the additional sum necessary.

"You will thus be enabled to proceed at once with the execution of the works, according to the plans, estimates, and tenders which have been submitted.

"I have, etc.,
(Signed) "F. BRAUN,
"Secretary."

In reply to Mr. MACKENZIE,

MR. LANGEVIN said there was a discussion between the two Boards about the dues on ships going to or from Montreal, and not loaded or unloaded at Quebec. It was considered unjust to pay dues there, as if the vessels were loaded or unloaded at Quebec; and now it is only on vessels loaded or unloaded there that the dues are charged, or if they are only loaded or unloaded there in part a proportion only of the dues are charged, but there is not the slightest difficulty between the two Boards.

Resolutions ordered to be reported.

MRS. JOHN YOUNG ANNUITY BILL.

(Sir John A. Macdonald.)

FIRST READING.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole to consider a certain proposed Resolution to make provision for a life annuity to the widow of the late Hon. John Young, in consideration of his services as Chairman and member of the Corporation of the Harbour Commissioners of Montreal during more than nine years.

(In the Committee.)

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: The Resolution is full, so that I need not occupy the time of the House by expatiating upon its subject. All know the services of the late Mr. Young for the improvement of the navigation of the St. Lawrence, and indeed for the promotion of the development of the country, generally. The Montreal Harbour Commissioners adopted a Resolution, setting aside a thirty years' bond, giving the interest on $10,000 at six per cent., for the support of his family. That was beyond their power as mere Trustees for the Harbour. The Government, however, have considered it well, to a certain extent, to carry out the views of the Harbour Commissioners, and therefore, have decided to ask the House to adopt this Resolution.

MR. DESJARDINS: Is there any salary attached to the position of Chairman of the Harbour Commissioners?

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Mr. Young received a salary as Chairman for some time before his death. But, for the nine years mentioned in the Resolution, he considered himself a wealthy man, and preferred to act gratuitously.

MR. MACKENZIE: Under the Act of 1874, they were allowed to give a certain sum to the Chairman, as was the Quebec Trust by the Act of 1875, not more than $2,000.

Resolution ordered to be reported.

[BILL No. 70.]

(Mr. Masson.)

THIRD READING.

Order for third reading read.

MR. MASSON: I would request the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick) not to press the amendment he spoke of when the House was in Committee. The Government are quite alive to the importance of adopting means to secure the easy and prompt discharge of members of the Volunteer Force who, by their general behaviour, have rendered themselves obnoxious to the Force. But we shall have to consider very carefully whether that power should be left to the Commanding Officer. It would be a grave thing to give that power to one single man. Although our officers are generally reliable, and actuated by the best motives, circumstances might occur to cause them to be carried away by feeling and act too severely. The Government will carefully consider the matter, and probably propose an amendment in this direction next Session, and therefore, I hope the hon. gentleman will let the subject rest until that time.

MR. ROSS (West Middlesex): I do not object to this Bill as a whole, but I think the Government is making a mistake in introducing Clause 4, which provides for the opening of canteens in connection with Regimental Camps. By the Army Regulations, canteens are established in connection with the army to provide for the exclusive use and convenience of the troops, to provide for the supply of beer, wine and other articles for the time being. I think we should make a mistake if we placed, within easy reach of our young men on the Force, the facilities for purchasing and using intoxicating liquors which the Bill provides. It is difficult enough to maintain the discipline necessary to keep the Force under proper control when intoxicating liquors are removed as far from the camp as possible; and it is usual to place the camp at some distance from the business and active part of the town, to keep those temptations as far away as possible, as well as for other reasons. Facilities for the purchase of those liquors would likely be attended with demoralising effects to the Force. I must protest against any arrangement whereby, within easy reach and access of the Volunteers, any facilities would be provided for the sale of liquors. I am aware that the sale of liquors within the camps is expected to prevent Volunteers from straying to distant places for liquor, but I think the tendency of furnishing even a moderate supply at the camps would be to dispose the men to go to excess, by which the discipline of the Force would be broken down, and injurious personal habits formed. If we are going to keep our Volunteer Force up to that degree of respectability, influence and moral power desirable, we must not, in any way, diminish the popularity of the Force in the estimation of those who are to maintain it. I am aware that, in many parts of the country, particularly in the Province of Ontario, it is held to be a great strain upon the wholesome restraint on young men to join the Force under present circumstances, but if this additional temptation is placed in their way, I think the strain will be greater, and the dangers which I have already pointed out will be considerably increased. Besides, I would call the attention of my hon. friend the President of the Council to the fact that the sale of intoxicating liquors in Ontario, as well as in the other Provinces, is under Provincial jurisdiction; and I think this House has no power to authorise the sale of liquor of any kind upon any camp ground, inasmuch as such sale is exclusively within the jurisdiction of the Local Legislatures. I feel convinced that any person entering a complaint against the officers of volunteer companies for the sale of liquor on camping grounds, would be entitled to recover against them, and that these officers would be liable to be fined in the same way as anyone else who sells liquor without a license.

MR. MACKENZIE: We might have to fine the hon. the Minister of Militia.

MR. ROSS: If he opened a canteen in a camp ground in the Province of Ontario, I think he would have some difficulty in escaping the law. I call his attention to this matter because no doubt he knows that no liquors can be sold in the Province of Ontario without a license, and I believe the authority of this Bill would not be construed as a license within the jurisdiction of the Local Legislature. I hope the hon. gentleman will consent to the withdrawal of this Clause, and I believe he will be doing himself credit if he does consent, and will be conferring a favour upon the Force. I move that the said Bill be not now read a third time, but be referred back to a Committee of the Whole House, with instructions to amend the same by striking out the 4th Clause.

MR. MASSON: I need not say that I entirely sympathise with the efforts made by the hon. gentleman, and others who agree with him, to promote the cause of temperance in this country. It is exactly because I think it necessary to help the hon. gentleman, and those who act with him, in the course they have adopted, that this Bill has been introduced by the Government. I can tell the hon. gentleman—if I may be allowed to refer to what has occurred in another place—that this Bill has received the unanimous approval of all the temperance gentlemen in the other branch of the Legislature, because they understand that by this Bill you will curtail the use of spirituous liquors by our Volunteer Force. If the hon. gentleman will look at the clause against which he is contending, he will see that in any locality, where the Temperance Act is in force, it will not be allowable for an officer to establish a canteen in camp, but in localities where the Temperance Act is not in force, where spirituous liquors can be sold, the Government thought it conducive to the morality of the Force to have the canteens under the control of the officers, instead of allowing the members of the Force to go to taverns and other places of that kind.

MR. MACKENZIE: Won't they do both?

MR. MASSON: They will not have any inducement to go to taverns if, in the camp itself, they have the means necessary—for after all there must be some liberty allowed on this score to obtain these stimulants. I may state that it is the intention of the Department to make very stringent rules in regard to this matter, and that nothing stronger than beer will be allowed in the camps. I submit to the House whether it would not be conducive to the morals of the whole Force to allow them to have beer in the camps, instead of going into taverns and indulging in brandy, whiskey and gin. I think the hon. gentleman should not press the motion in amendment.

MR. PLUMB: The hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross) never loses an opportunity to improve an occasion of this kind, and I may say that he never in any case, so far as I remember, was—if I may be allowed to use the expression—more blatant than he has been just now. If he had read the Bill he would have seen what was pointed out by the President of the Council, namely, that the liquor laws now in force would not be superseded by the provisions of the Bill, but he was anxious to show his ardent desire to catch a temperance vote, and he therefore endeavoured to help his cause by reckless statements; but it is clear that he never read the Bill through.

MR. ROSS: I read it through long ago.

MR. PLUMB: The hon. gentleman now hears that the Government have placed proper restrictions upon canteens, but one would imagine, to hear the hon. gentleman's objections, that he was in the interest of the booths and liquor shops outside the camp, because he does not desire that there should be any other provision made, and that the men should be allowed to go where they please for that which they cannot be prevented from obtaining, instead of the officers of the camp being authorised to control the sale of liquor which it is impossible to prevent. He knows perfectly well that the young men who join the Volunteer Force are young men of the highest respectability, young men who are to be perfectly trusted, and yet he objects to the salutary measure proposed to be adopted. I was surprised at the hon. member for West Middlesex pressing an amendment to this Bill, merely for the purpose, for it was evident that that was his only idea, of making a temperance harangue to the House.

MR. ROSS: You need it.

MR. PLUMB: The hon. gentleman

will find it better to leave this matter in the form assumed by the Government. He will see, to use a common expression, that he was barking up the wrong tree; and I fancy that this House will not permit any such interference with the measure proposed—an interference which, I think, would be entirely in the wrong direction, and an interference which would show that the gentleman who has for a long time taken the initiative in the general temperance movement—a movement with which no one sympathises more than I do, if it was properly directed, has failed entirely, because his course is narrow and proscriptive, and because he does not understand the feeling and temper of the country.

MR. SCRIVER: It is strange that no member of this House can rise to express his views on any subject without exposing himself to the imputation, by the hon. gentleman who has just sat down, of having acted from some unworthy personal motive. I think the hon. gentleman might, in charity, have supposed that the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross)—known as he is for the active and consistent interest which he has taken for many years past in promoting the cause of total abstinence—might view with suspicion and alarm the movement which is proposed to be made by the Militia Department in this matter. At the risk of subjecting myself to the imputation, from the hon. member for Niagara (Mr. Plumb), of acting from some unworthy motive, I will state that I sympathise with the views of the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross). I regret exceedingly that the Department of Militia has been induced to adopt such a course. I believe, in my heart, that it has not originated from the commanders of the Force throughout the country, but has been suggested at head-quarters by those who know very little of the peculiar temptations to which our young men are subjected. I know that this proposal does not meet with the approval of the commanding officers in that part of the country in which I reside, and that they would much prefer that matters should remain as they are. The hon. member for West Middlesex has very rightly said that the battalions are generally encamped at a distance from any place where these temptations are likely to be found, and I think it would be very unfortunate if the facilities were increased for the volunteers when in camp to obtain—even as the hon. the President of the Council says—beer, which, though comparatively unobjectionable, is still an intoxicating liquor. There is no doubt that the granting of these facilities would be against the views of the parents of many of these young men. I did not understand the hon. the President of the Council to meet the point raised by the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross), as to the legality of establishing these places. It is true, as he says, that the Bill provides that this power should not be given where the Temperance Act prevails; but in places where that Act is not in existence, a license is required to sell even beer, and I cannot see that we have the power in this House to give the military authorities, forming camps in any part of the Dominion, power to sell liquor without infringing on the Local Act. I would like to know how that difficulty is to be met. In any case I protest strongly against the passage of any such law as this. I regard it as not calculated to promote those habits of morality which we desire to see prevail among the young men who constitute the bulk of our Volunteer Force.

MR. MASSON: I would rather give my opinion on a point of discipline connected with the Force than on a matter of Constitutional Law, but it does appear to me that if we could pass the Temperance Act, to which the hon. gentleman has referred, we must also have the power to pass a measure of this kind.

MR. MACDOUGALL: I hope the late Minister of Militia will find it consistent with his duty to act upon the suggestion which has been made, and withdraw this clause from his Bill. I have very great doubts that the Scott Temperance Act will bring about all the good results it is expected to achieve. I am opposed on principle to coercive legislation, in regard to the habits of the people, as to what they shall eat and drink; but it is pretty well known that the moral sentiment of a very large portion of the people of this country is in favour of discouraging by all legal and proper means the too common indulgence in intoxicating liquors. The Scott Temperance Act is now in force in some localities, and may soon be extended to many more. The highest legal tribunal in this country has declared that it is within our competence and that this Parliament has jurisdiction over the subject matter, because it relates to trade and commerce; therefore, I apprehend there can be no question as to the constitutionality of a provision of this kind in the Militia Law, for that subject is also within our jurisdiction. There can be no doubt as to the power of Parliament to deal with this subject, but what is the necessity for this legislation? Colonel—now General—Wolsley, in his report on the expedition to the Red River, points out clearly the great benefit which he believed was experienced by the troops under his control—both the regulars and the volunteers—in being deprived of all intoxicating liquors. He declares that they were more efficient, that they were in better health, and that the morale of the force was much improved by total abstinence from strong drink, and he recommended that a similar rule should be adopted in other parts of the Queen's Dominion. It appears from the accounts we have had of atrocities committed by the troops in South Africa, they must be attributed to over indulgence in intoxicating liquors. What harm, Mr. Speaker, can there be in requiring the Militia Forces, when assembled under the law for the purpose of drill, to abstain from the use of intoxicating liquors? It is true that you cannot prevent them from procuring beer or whiskey when out of camp, and off duty, or from indulging in other vices, but do you prevent this in any way by stimulating their appetites with strong beer while in camp? You only, in fact, keep alive that appetite, and induce them to go elsewhere for stronger drinks. I do not see that any beneficial result can flow from this provision as to canteens, and while we have a Temperance Act on the Statute-book, I do not think it can be justified. Seeing that the Government in the other House are carrying through amending provisions to make that Act more effective—we presume with the concurrence of their colleagues in this House—seeing that they have recognised the utility of that Act, and that the highest legal tribunal in the Dominion has recognised and affirmed its constitutionality, we can only regret the appearance of a section in the Militia Bill which practically repeals pro tanto the general law. Our Militia Force must be maintained; we do not know how soon we may have to use it; but, while we are endeavouring to make it efficient, we ought to look at the testimony of men who have regarded this question from the practical military point of view. I believe that testimony is that the supply of intoxicating liquors of any kind to troops in the field, in hot countries or in cold countries, is an evil and not a benefit. I hope the President of the Council will allow this clause to drop.

MR. LONGLEY: I also, for one, hope the hon. the President of the Council will consent to withdraw this clause. I think it is against the sentiment of the people of this Dominion, and, perhaps, against the sentiment of the best portion of them. Are we to assume that the men upon whom we are chiefly to rely for defence, in case of invasion, cannot get along without intoxicating liquors? All history proves that men are infinitely better soldiers without than with intoxicating drinks, and that nothing so demoralises men, when they are assembled together for drill, or for the defence of the country, as the use of intoxicating drinks of any sort. It is contended that it were better to have these liquors sold under the control of the military authorities, than to have them sold without these restraints. My education, in regard to this question, is exactly the reverse of that assumption. The mischief all comes in consequence of the recognition given by the law to this infamous traffic. If intoxicating drinks must be sold it were better, in the judgment of temperance men, that they should be sold without the sanction of law than with it. I think in connection with the Volunteer Force, all over the Dominion, any excesses which may have taken place are almost entirely attributable to the use of intoxicating liquors on the ground. I do not think it is fair to assume that, because provision is made in this Bill that the liquor shall be sold under the control of the military authorities, the influence will be any better than if the liquor was sold in some other way. In the name of reason let the law be against and not in favour of the recognition of this traffic. Let us try the experiment of drilling our volunteers.

without the use of intoxicating liquors. It destroys their morals and unfits them for the duties of the hour and those which might lie ahead of them. I do hope that, in view of the public sentiment of the country, this clause will not be urged. I might offer an additional reason. From the recent decision of the Supreme Court, it is assumed by some that the License Laws of the different Provinces are abrogated, that the Scott Act, and it alone, will be in force as it is brought into operation in the various Provinces. Under the License Law of Nova Scotia it seems to me the authorities could not be permitted to sell intoxicating liquors in counties where no licenses are granted, and if they did it would be overriding the local law and the sentiment of the people. I hope the sentiment of this House will be expressed in such a way as will lead to no mistake in regard to this matter. I hope the hon. the Minister of Militia will consent, in view of the sentiment of the House, to waive this obnoxious clause.

MR. MASSON: As it seems to be the general wish of the House that this matter should not be pressed, at least at present, I think there will be no harm in withdrawing the clause. I adopted the Bill from the Senate as it came to me, and I assume the responsibility of it. My opinion is not changed; and what I know of the necessities of the service, and the temptations to which young men are generally exposed, induces me to believe that the clause should be maintained, but in deference to the expressions manifested in the House, I consent to its withdrawal.

SECOND READING.

MR. CAMERON (South Huron): I suppose the hon. gentleman proposes that the first part of the clause shall apply to principals, and the second part to those assisting. It seems to me the clause places an extraordinary amount of power in the hands of Justices of the Peace. We know the class of men of whom the Magistracy of the Province is, to a large extent, composed, and that, though there may be some able men, and men who render justice, to a certain extent, according to the laws of the land, yet the great majority are not of that class. The hon. gentleman authorises a Justice of the Peace to impose a fine of $100, to imprison for twelve months, or to inflict both punishments. I am rather inclined to the opinion that that is putting too much power into the hands of a class of men from whom the Justices of the Peace are manufactured. If the power were given to the Court of Quarter Sessions, or the Recorder's Court, or the Superior Court, I would support the proposition.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou): It has been found by gentlemen interested in securing the observance of the law in towns and cities, that the penalties were largely inadequate. It must be remembered that these trials will be almost altogether before Stipendiary Magistrates, or men of a much higher class than the ordinary Justices of the Peace, and I do not think there will be any danger whatever of an undue exercise of authority.

MR. CAMERON (South Huron): I am not aware of any case in which such extraordinary powers are conferred upon Justices of the Peace, except in regard to the Revenue Laws, and that is an exceptional case, and great injustice has been done in connection with it without any chance of revision by the Courts, except at very great expenses. Offences of this kind are committed in country towns as much as in cities.

MR. BLAKE: Of course the general question of how far it is proper to expose the subject to be penalised, at the discretion and judgment of a Justice of the Peace, is what the hon. Minister has to consider. I do not profess to be familiar with the extreme limit to which we have gone in former times, in allowing Justices of the Peace to sentence persons, but I am certain that the general run of extreme sentences allowed to Justices of the Peace are infinitely lower than the maximum given in this case. It is true that in Revenue cases a very high penalty is allowed, but there are obvious reasons why it is not likely that that will be abused when the Government is the prosecuting party; and what I venture to suggest to the hon. Minister is, to consider how far, if it be an innovation on our whole system to give such extensive primitive powers to a Justice of the Peace, it should go. I do not say that the sentences might not be quite right. I quite sympathise with the feeling which induces the hon. gentleman to propose a power to punish, much more severely than by imprisonment for thirty days, those who are guilty of the atrocious and deliberate acts of inhuman cruelty in the name of sport of which we sometimes hear. The question is, if we decide now to trust to the discretion of a Justice of the Peace, as to whether twelve months' imprisonment and $100 fine shall be awarded to one class of crimes, how far we are not remodelling our whole system, and how far it may not be proper to give a general increase of power to the Justices of the Peace concerning many of these crimes which are deserving, sometimes, of a more severe sentence. We have, in Ontario, a tolerably rapid system of trying persons under the Summary Jurisdictions Act, and it seems to me that when the hon. gentleman proposes an increase so serious as this in the maximum quantity of punishment, it will be not improper for him to consider whether we should not alter the jurisdiction and provide for a higher class of magistrates.

MR. CAMERON.

MR. McDONALD: (Pictou) I think there is a good deal in what the hon. gentleman says, and I will consider this matter before the Bill reaches its next stage.

Bill read the second time.

ONTARIO BOYS' REFORMATORY BILL.

[BILL No. 98.]

(Mr. McDonald, Pictou.)

SECOND AND THIRD READINGS.

Order for second reading read.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou): I move the second reading of this Bill. It is confined to Ontario and provides for the confinement of boys under sixteen years of age, under certain circumstances, in the Reformatory provided by that Province. The principle of the Bill is, that although a boy may only be sentenced for one year, if, in the opinion of the Judge, it is for the moral and material welfare of the boy that he should be kept in the Reformatory for any longer period after the expiration of the sentence, the Judge may so extend his detention for as long a period as he deems proper, not exceeding five years. The Bill has been introduced at the suggestion of the Attorney-General for Ontario, who informed me that the circumstances of the country, and particularly of the institutions of that Province, rendered a provision of this kind necessary.

Bill read the second time.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole to consider said Bill.

(In the Committee.)

MR. CAMERON (South Huron): The Bill of the hon. the Minister of Justice is a good one as far as it goes. The difficulty about it is that its scope is not wide enough. The principle of the Bill is a good one, but the hon. gentleman has not carried it far enough to embrace just the class of the criminal population, that, above all others, should engage the earnest attention of the hon. the Minister of Justice, whose great object, when dealing with this kind of legislation, should be the prevention, as well as the punishment, of crime when committed. The Bill proposes to deal with that portion of the male criminal population under sixteen years of age, but, unfortunately, it only undertakes to deal with that small part of it which has passed the initial stages of moral depravity—fairly entered in a career of crime, violated, openly violated, the law of the land, and passed for trial before the authorities. In fact, it only deals with, and its provisions only apply to, that part of the criminal population who are under sixteen years of age, and who are convicted delinquents. The seething mass of depravity and crime in the country, which the strong arm of the law has not been able to reach successfully, is untouched by this Bill. The Bill deals with one class of criminals—at three stages in the lives of these juvenile delinquents: First, It provides that a boy under sixteen convicted of any offence for which an adult could be sentenced for three months and not more than five years, and where the Court is satisfied that a due regard for the material and moral welfare of the boy requires that he should be committed to the Reformatory, the Court may send him there for five years. Second, Where a boy is, on summary trial, convicted of any offence, and where the first sentence is fourteen days imprisonment, the Court as a judge, if satisfied that the boy's material and moral welfare requires it, may send him to the Reformatory for a period of five years. Third, If a boy is sent to the Reformatory for less than five years, the boy may be detained for a further period not in all to exceed five years. So far the provisions of the Bill are in the right direction. My object is to endeavour to induce the Minister of Justice to carry its provisions still further. Now, if the hon. gentleman's object is to restrain the criminal and prevent the commission of crime, if he desires to rescue from degradation and shame the classes who are entering on a life of crime, he must extend the provisions of this Bill. The hon. gentleman knows how much can be done by dealing with juvenile offenders just on their downward career, before they are hardened in crime and become outcasts from society. The hon. gentleman has only to read Peirce on juvenile offenders, to see what can be accomplished by legislation in this direction, and by the work of philanthropists under the protection of the law, and having them in reformatories protected by law. The work that has been accomplished by these reformatories in England, the United States and on the Continent, is perfectly marvellous. The numbers rescued, through the instrumentality of these institutions, from lives of shame, degradation and crime, borders on the fabulous. The first minds in the State, the leading philanthropists, the great orders in the Church, the leading and most intelligent and cultivated of the men and women of these countries, have lent their best energies to the noble work of reclaiming the waifs and abandoned of society from lives of degradation, and making them useful members of the State. The success has been simply wonderful; so wonderful that the sympathy and assistance of the Government of Great Britain and other countries has been secured to these reformatories. The work has not been limited to restoring to society and to useful places in the world, the convicted juvenile delinquents. The best efforts of these institutions has been directed to the prevention of crime; to prevent the fatherless, the motherless, the outcasts, the waifs, the abandoned, the street arabs and gutter population from sinking lower and lower in the social scale; rescuing them from the career in which they have entered, and uplifting them from the filth and degradation in which circumstances have placed them; educating and Christianising them and giving them a fair start in life, and thus saving them from a career of crime, and the State the cost of convicting and punishing them. And it is because this Bill only reaches a limited class, and is intended to punish the criminal rather than prevent his becoming a criminal, that I venture on the suggestions I am about to make, and I hope the hon. the Minister of Justice will consider these suggestions, and incorporate them, or at least some of them, into his Bill. It will be observed that this Bill only reaches juvenile offenders who have been convicted. There is another class of delinquents to which I wish to draw the attention of the hon. the Minister of Justice, and to which I think he ought to extend the provisions of this Bill, namely, the class of offenders who are brought before the Courts charged with crime, who are notoriously degraded, notoriously associating with the criminal classes, notoriously vagrant and notoriously living the lives of vagrants and thieves, but who escape conviction from various causes. These children, freed from the grasp of the law, melt away into the mass from which the criminal convicts are recruited, and in their turn become convicts. The Bill provides no safety for this class, and holds out no hope that the country will be saved the costs of ultimately convicting and punishing them. To cover this class of cases, and to give the Courts before whom these juveniles, charged with crime, are brought, and to enable these Courts to have a restraining power over these offenders, I propose that the first section of this Bill be amended by providing:

"That where a boy is brought before a Court of competent jurisdiction, charged with any criminal offence or when, during the sittings of any such Court the boy is in gaol charged with any such offence, and the Court or Judge is satisfied that the material and moral welfare of the boy requires it, the Court or Judge may commit such boy to the Reformatory for five years."

But my hon. friend may say that such an amendment is carrying the power of the Courts too far; that when a criminal is placed on trial and acquitted, that the Court should still have the power of restraining him. But the hon. gentleman will see that this very principle is recognised by himself in the third and fourth sections, and is quite unobjectionable. The principle acted upon by Parliament, and recognised by the Courts is, that the material and moral welfare of the boy and the peace and good order of society is of the first importance. There is still another stage at which the strong arm of the law should reach these offenders. The hon. gentleman will find in the Code of the State of Maryland, ample provision made for bringing juvenile delinquents within reach of the restraining power of the law. That Code provides:

"That if a minor renders his control beyond the power of his father, by reason of his own incorrigible conduct, and if it is manifestly requisite that, from regard for the moral and future welfare of the minor and the peace and order of society, that the minor should be placed under restraint, the Courts have the power of sending such minor to the State Reformatories."

The Code of that State further provides for the commitment to the House of Refuge of incorrigibly vicious minors, whose parents, by reason of their own moral depravity or otherwise, are incapable or unwilling to exercise any proper care or discipline over them. The hon. gentleman might, with propriety, and in the interest of society as well as the interest of the class he is now dealing with, introduce the provisions I have referred to into this Bill. I find that, in the State of New York, the law provides that children deserting their homes or keeping company with dissolute or vicious persons, are deemed disorderly, and liable on conviction to be sent to the Reformatory. All these laws are intended to reach a class of cases not covered by this Bill. They are restraining provisions, their object is to prevent rather than punish, to save the criminal and to save the State, and are, therefore, of essential importance in dealing with the criminal classes. I trust the hon. gentleman in charge of this Bill will see his way to adopting these suggestions, or at least, some of them, and thus make his Bill as full and perfect as possible.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou): With reference to the subject referred to by my hon. friend, I quite agree with him that it would be very desirable, indeed, that the class of offenders, to which he alludes, should be got at in some way or other; but I think my hon. friend will agree with me that it would not be desirable, for two reasons, without further consideration, to adopt his suggestion, at present. The first reason is, that however desirable the change may be it is a change which ought to be adopted—only after full consideration, and after provision being made for efficiently dealing with the boys, after being thus taken hold of and drawn into a reformatory school. There is another reason why I think it would be unwise to press that just now. There might not be the accommodation in the reformatories and they would be sent there under that provision. I think it desirable that my hon. friend should not press his amendment for the present, but in another Session we will be able to give this very important subject our attention.

MR. MILLS: There is another matter which requires consideration. It is not until a crime is committed that the authority of this Parliament attaches to the liberty of the person. So far as the anticipation of crime is concerned, any legislation in that regard belongs rather to the Government that has control over the education of the community, and over civil rights, than the Government that has the power to punish crime. This is one of the functions of reformatories in dealing with persons who have not committed any crime. This is the view taken by the Local Legislature of Ontario, and those measures which the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. Cameron) has referred to, have been considered by that Legislature during the past Session. I would call the attention of the Minister of Justice to the measure entitled, "An Act respecting the Ontario Reformatory for Boys," which was enacted during the past Session. This provision of the Ontario law is taken from the law relating to Industrial Schools, of the State of Wisconsin; so that the Ontario Legislature and Government have legislated under the powers possessed by them relating to the personal liberty of the various citizens of the Province.

THE HULL FIRE—RELIEF GRANTED.

MESSAGE FROM HIS EXCELLENCY.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD delivered a Message from His Excellency the Governor General.

MR. SPEAKER read the Message, and it is as follows:—

"LORNE.

"The Governor-General transmits to the House of Commons a copy of an approved Report of the Privy Council, recommending that an application be made to Parliament for a vote for the sum of $7,000, for the immediate relief of the sufferers by the destructive fire which yesterday, consumed a large part of the City of Hull, and rendered some 4,000 people houseless.

"GOVERNMENT HOUSE,

"OTTAWA, 22nd April, 1880."

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: By the unanimous consent of the House, and only by unanimous consent could I do so, I ask for a Committee to consider this Message from His Excellency.

Motion agreed to.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the said Message.

(In the Committee.)

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: As we were all spectators of the awful sight yesterday, I need not dilate upon it. I believe that 4,000 people, if not more, are left houseless and homeless by the disastrous conflagration yesterday at Hull. Upwards of 400 houses were destroyed, and these houses were occupied, in most cases, by more than one family, so that, in fact, some 800 residences were destroyed. The people thus rendered homeless are all hands employed about the mills of the Chaudiere, and the works of that kind around. In this city and at Hull, a great amount of sympathy will be felt, and no doubt here, and from various parts of the country, substantial aid by private charity will be forthcoming; but it is a matter which brooks no delay, and it is thought that we could not do better than adopt a Resolution to carry out the suggestion of His Excellency for affording relief to the sufferers by this awful accident. I move:

"Resolved, That there be granted to Her Majesty the sum of $7,000 for the immediate relief of the sufferers by the destructive fire, which on the 21st instant, consumed a large part of the City of Hull."

MR. MACKENZIE: I am sure we shall all concur very heartily in the proposition made by His Excellency in the usual way. The fire was all the worse, because the population are of the poorer class. Of all the fires that have taken place in Canada, of which there have been a great many, this was, indeed, one in which there is a necessity to assist those who have suffered by it. I am glad that the Government have brought down the Resolution they have brought down, and we, on this side of the House, shall all second the proposal made by the Government.

Resolution agreed to, and ordered to be reported.

House resumed.

(In the House.)

Resolution reported, read the second time and agreed to.

MR. WRIGHT: I should like to return thanks to the Government for the kindly, generous and timely way in which they brought down this grant of $7,000 in aid of my poor, suffering constituents in Hull. I am empowered by my constituents to return to the Government and the House their hearty and most grateful acknowledgments; and we have to express our thanks, in addition, to His Excellency and Her Royal Highness for the kindly interest they have taken in our great calamity, and the substantial way in which they have aided us. Likewise, I beg to return my personal acknowledgments to all the members of the House for the great sympathy manifested under the deep affliction which has befallen us; and also thanks to the citizens of Ottawa for the kindly manner in which they came to our assistance last night, when some 4,000 people were without food and shelter. I shall never forget their friendly aid on that occasion. After a most careful examination of all the statistics connected with this great calamity, we find that about 4,000 people have been rendered homeless and deprived of food. We have, through the kindness of our neighbours, been enabled to supply their wants, and afford shelter to the sufferers during the past night; and we have organised an Executive Committee, which, I think, will do its whole duty under the circumstances. With the assistance afforded us, I am in hopes that we shall do much in the way of relieving this great calamity. Much requires to be done. We can hardly realise the extent of the calamity; some 800 or 900 tenement houses destroyed, and 4,000 people rendered homeless, everyone will admit, is a more important matter than many would imagine.

MR. MACKENZIE.

MR. CURRIER: I beg to express my thanks and gratitude, also, to the Government and the House for the manner in which they have generously come to the aid of the suffering people in the neighbouring city of Hull. I have been interested, more or less, in that city for a long time, and my immediate friends are still interested in it, and I feel, as to anything transpiring in Hull, much the same as if it occurred in our own city of Ottawa. I think the amount granted by the Government is very fair and liberal, and it will be of very great assistance to the sufferers, as they get it immediately. It is worth double the amount received a month or six weeks hence. The distress and poverty is very great, indeed. It is now ascertained there are 486 houses, different holdings, destroyed, many having been occupied by two and three families. Between 3,000 and 4,000 people are left homeless and houseless. I thank the House for the generous manner in which they assisted us.

77 Repairs and improvements on the line between Rivière-du-Loup and Hadlow.....	116,000

In reply to Mr. MACKENZIE,

SIR CHARLES TUPPER said that of the $375,000 that would be expended by the 1st of July, the total amount to be voted was $116,000, which would complete the work. The item included extra land for station purposes at the Chaudiere Junction, $1,500; ballasting, $41,000; four first-class stations, $6,000; three second-class, $3,000; repairs to thirteen stations, $5,850; two coal sheds, $6,000, etc. The amount already expended was $102,478. The balance of the vote of last year would be required before 30th June next to pay for the new steel rails now on the way out.

MR. MACKENZIE: That will make a total cost of about $2,000,000?

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: Yes.

MR. MACKENZIE: Has all this work been done by tender?

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: Most of it. The ballasting, the principal item, is now let in the same way.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT: What is the total quantity of steel rails required?

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: Eleven thousand tons. About seventeen miles were laid with steel rails last year; the balance is expected here on the opening of navigation.

MR. MACKENZIE: You will use some of the old rails for sidings?

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: Yes.

In reply to Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT,

SIR CHARLES TUPPER said it had been found necessary to construct a temporary bridge at Winnipeg for the purpose of at once carrying the emigrant and other trains into that city, pending the construction of the bridge which was being constructed by the city of Winnipeg.

In reply to Mr. MACKENZIE,

SIR CHARLES TUPPER said it was not intended to proceed with the bridge at Selkirk at the same time, the question of crossing the river having been postponed.

MR. SMITH (Selkirk) enquired what provision had been made for the passage of steamers through the temporary bridge.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER said he was afraid some little inconvenience would be involved to the steam communication by the construction of this bridge, but he thought the hon. member for Selkirk would see that the great convenience of the bridge would fully compensate for any inconvenience to the steamers. There would be an opening of twenty-nine feet under the bridge for barges, so as to interfere as little as possible with the navigation.

MR. SMITH (Selkirk): Would it not be possible, at a little additional expense, to give a passage to steamers. The hon. Minister is aware that the distance from Point Douglass to the west end of the Sound is very considerable, and that, during wet weather, it is almost impossible to transport heavy loads. It would be a great inconvenience to those living in the body of the town. Now, if for a small additional cost, this change could be made, it would prevent great inconvenience and heavy expense to the merchants and traders. The height of a steamer is thirty feet.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: I suppose that by having a hinge in the chimney it might be arranged so that the steamer could go under it. To put a draw on the bridge would involve a large additional expense.

MR. SMITH: I hope the hon. Minister will endeavour to have that carried out.

MR. ANGLIN: The proposal will cause great loss and inconvenience to all those doing business by those steamers.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: The hon. gentleman will understand that all the steamers from the United States will reach their accustomed landing before they come to the bridge. It is only the Hudson's Bay Company's steamers from the lake that come up to Winnipeg that will be interfered with, as I understand it.

MR. SMITH: There are many steamers besides the Hudson's Bay Company's. All the steamers trading between Winnipeg and Selkirk take that route. There were, last year, four or five steamers.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: Providing railway communication from Selkirk to Winnipeg will fully cover all the difficulty of transport in that section.

MR. SMITH: The Railway from Selkirk does not go to the water's edge; it stops at a considerable distance from the water. If the hon. Minister knew the great difficulty there is in transporting loads in the summer, he would see how desirable it is that that passage should be left open.

MR. MACKENZIE: I do not propose, at the present moment, to enter upon the discussion of a very serious matter connected with the working of this Railway, although I hope to do so at a future time. We have already spent $100,000 upon rolling-stock for the Pembina Branch. There is another vote asked for—$600,000 for rolling-stock upon other portions of that road nearing completion. Vast preparations have been made for the purpose of working the Railway. The hon. gentlemen opposite professed, some years ago, to be strongly in favour of all such roads being worked by a company. The late Administration were of the same view, because they made arrangements for letting the Pembina Branch, hoping that, within a short time, some permanent arrangement might be made for opening any part of the new roads which might be finished. I think it is not desirable that the Government should continue to be the masters of our Railway system. It is difficult for them to do so, and it involves many considerations of public inconvenience. While I, at present, simply enter my protest against preparations for working the whole of the Government Railways in this country, I shall not take up the time of the Committee by discussing the principle now.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: If the hon. gentleman wishes to enter his protest against the Government making preparations to operate the road, I am prepared to say that I would not be inclined to agree with him that it is desirable that this matter should be put upon a strictly commercial footing, and in the hands of commercial men. But, in the meantime, the country being involved in such a heavy expenditure for the construction of the road, it is incumbent upon us to make timely preparation to secure that the road shall be as useful to the country as possible.

MR. McLENNAN: I should like to ask the hon. the Minister of Railways whether any income was derived from the Pembina Branch during the period it was leased to a private company. We had a statement, a few nights ago, of what the road earned under the management of the Department. It would be a matter of interest, before this promised discussion comes up, to be able to compare the results of the experiments that have been already made.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: The road was leased to Messrs. Upper and Company, not from choice but from necessity. It was the only means we had of operating the road at all. We found the company in existence, and gave them until the end of the year just closed to finish the road. They were obliged, under that contract, to have it ready by August 1st, for the passage of slow trains. We found it was practically impossible to have the road constructed by one party and operated by another, and, consequently, we were compelled either to let the road be idle or to enter into an arrangement with them—which I submitted for the approval of Parliament last Session—and under which they were obliged to give us 25 per cent. of the gross earnings of the road. The gross earnings of the road, during the time it was in the hands of Messrs. Upper and Company, were about $4,000 per month, 25 per cent. of which is due to the Government. The road was not pushed to completion. Differences arose among the contractors, and the progress of construction was very unsatisfactory. Under these circumstances, the time having expired for the completion of the road, the Government terminated the contract and took the road into their own hands. We are now engaged in finishing the road ourselves. Under the contract the road is to be finished at the cost of the contractors.

MR. BLAKE: With reference to the suggested comparison asked for by the hon. member for Glengarry, it is, as the hon. Minister said himself, that the returns he brought down to us the other day of the receipts during this last month, furnish a fair index of the gross monthly returns for the twelve months on that road.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: It would be impossible for me to say that that is the case. There is, of course, a large amount of freight business going over that road now, and there are also the spring importations. But the hon. gentleman and I differ so widely as to the business that the rush of emigration into that country will produce, and will continue for some time, that I am afraid we should hardly agree as to our estimate of what the monthly returns will be. I am sanguine that the road certainly will be in charge of the Government, that in fact we shall receive some return over and above all expenditure. I would not like to say that I believe the return we have received from the 1st March would be maintained throughout the year.

MR. ANGLIN: I think it is very improbable it can be maintained throughout the year. The number of passengers, in the aggregate, seems very large. I was much amused at the tone of exultation of the hon. the Minister of Railways when he made the announcement. Yet, if we look more closely into the matter, the number is not so large. This Pembina Branch road is the only inlet, at present, into that country. There are many persons passing in and out, just now, in connection with the contracts that have just been let. The period for which the hon. gentleman made that report extended over forty-three days, and 5,000 passengers were found to have passed over the road. This would make, taking Sundays, 125 passengers a day, which, counting returns on a railway of sixty-five miles in length, is certainly not so very enormous.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: The number of passengers was 7,000. I drew the attention of the House more to the figures with reference to the net earnings, because the House will see at once it was not simply a question of how much business was done in that time, but the cost at which this business was done. Hon. gentlemen familiar with the North-West will bear me out in the statement that, for a great many years no such stormy winter has occurred as the winter through which we have just passed. The difficulties on this line of railway from St. Paul to Winnipeg being enhanced; the cost of maintenance has been more during the past year than during any other year for ten years back. We have no snow-plough. We have been obliged to employ large numbers of extra men to keep the track clear, and yet for all that, from 1st March to 10th April, there was a net revenue of $21,000. I think that was an extremely encouraging condition of things.

MR. MACKENZIE: How much of this represented Government property carried over the road?

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: I have no doubt that a considerable portion of that 12,000 tons of freight was in connection with the Government works that are being carried on—not exactly the property of the Government, but the property of the contractors, the plant and rails.

MR. SMITH (Selkirk): No doubt there been a great traffic over that road apart from that belonging to the Government. But it is also the case that the storms have been much more severe this last winter than for fifty years back, and, consequently, the expense has been greatly increased. In reply to the hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. McLennan), the hon. Minister might have added that, notwithstanding, the completion of that road was very tardy indeed. It would have been infinitely more so had it not been for the great assistance that was rendered by the contractors in working the road.

MR. ANGLIN: I would ask the hon. the Minister of Railways how much of this large amount of $7,791,000 we are now asked to vote, does he think will be expended during the twelve months commencing on 1st July next; and whether he could tell us whether the money to be so expended is now provided?

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: I am happy to say that the hon. the Finance Minister says they can furnish the money required. We are, of course, obliged to allow a little margin in our estimate. I do not think all this money will be expended.

MR. ANGLIN: This is an important question considering the present financial condition of the country, and I think we ought to have some idea as to how much it is expected to expend within that time.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: It is a serious question, and I am disposed to consider it seriously. It is of the utmost importance that every dollar of the vote for the British Columbia section should be expended within the year, for the reason that the country is already committed to this very large expenditure. A great expenditure has already been made for several years past in connection with these works. For that money we are paying interest, and the works must be unproductive until it is completed. Therefore, it is of the greatest possible moment that we should proceed vigorously with the work and endeavour to get it into a position in which some return will be made. We believe it is of the greatest possible importance to the country that the road should be opened from Lake Superior to Red River at the earliest possible moment. We are determined that the road shall be opened by the day stated in the contracts. These contracts require that they shall be completed, with the exception of sixty-seven miles of Section B, by July 1st, 1881, and that the rails shall be laid over the remaining sixty-seven miles by July 1st, 1882.

MR. MACKENZIE: Then I understand the hon. gentleman has no intention of spending $1,000,000 in British Columbia.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: I do not expect $1,000,000 will be expended in British Columbia.

MR. BLAKE: Has the hon. gentleman any idea of expending any more than $500,000 in British Columbia during the next year?

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: It would be impossible for me to say any more in relation to this than what I have already said.

MR. THOMPSON: Does the hon. member for West Durham attribute to the Minister of Railways the spirit of clairvoyance? The first sod of the new line is to be turned on May 24th, and, I understand, that the contractor means to go on from that time and push the work forward. I presume the hon. the Minister of Railways intends paying the contractor and not repudiating the indebtedness when it becomes due.

MR. MACKENZIE: Does the amount to be expended in British Columbia depend entirely on the contractors? If they are able to spend $1,000,000, $1,000,000 will be paid.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: If the contractor does work to that extent within that period, he will, of course, be paid.

Proposed new Submarine Cable route between Vancouver's Island and mainland via Nanaimo and Point Grey..... 26,000
Transfer of the Western Union Telegraph Company's lines and cables to the Government of Canada..... 24,000

In reply to MR. MACKENZIE,

MR. LANGEVIN said, in reference to the cables across the Gulf of Georgia, that these telegraph lines in British Columbia cost a very large sum of money and were not self-sustaining, the expenditure every year being very largely in excess of the revenue. The cables between Victoria and the American Sound were constantly out of order, the bottom of the straits being, in certain places, rocky. The cables had, therefore, been frequently broken, and the cost of repairing them was very great. It was now proposed to purchase the land lines of the Western Union Telegraph Company, which had previously been rented by the Government, and some of the cables would be utilised for the purpose the Government had in view of laying a cable from Nanaimo to Point Gray, and thence to New Westminster. By this means they would save a large annual expenditure for the maintenance of cables. Under the contract that existed previously to Confederation, between the Government of British Columbia and the Western Union Telegraph Company, whenever the Government would desire to adopt a new system they would be bound to put in perfect order the cables as well as the land lines in our Territory. They alone would cost a very large sum to this Government; but by the proposed change they purchased the line, and by purchasing the line, which was to a great extent in good order, they obtained the property which they would have had under the present system to give up to the Western Union Telegraph Company, after putting it in perfect order. If they had not adopted the new system, instead of having a capital of $50,000 invested, the capital would be $35,000. He would, while on this subject, explain to the hon. gentleman about the tariff of rates. That tariff had been changed altogether: they found it not to be defensible. As the tariff existed previous to the late change, the rate for ten words from Victoria to Ottawa was $2.75; under the new tariff, for ten words, it was altogether $1.25; this was a reduction of $1.50, more than half of the old rate being taken off. For ten words, from Victoria to San Francisco, under the old system, they paid $2; under the new system it would be $1 during the day and 50c. at night.

MR. MACKENZIE: How are the rates within the Provinces?

MR. LANGEVIN: They have been modified considerably, but altogether the tendency has been to reduce the rates, and we believe that, under the new system, we will have a greater revenue than under the old system. I do not know whether the collections—the revenues—will be as large as the expenses, but we are trying to make both ends meet.

MR. MACKENZIE: Last year the expenditure was $48,000, and the revenue $5,000.

MR. LANGEVIN: Yes; but the repairs to cables were very heavy; the repairs will be very small indeed, we expect, under the new system.

MR. DAWSON: The cost of sending telegraphic messages to Thunder Bay and in that direction is very large, and it will be until we have a telegraphic system connecting us with British Columbia. I suggested an easy way of overcoming this inconvenience, and it was that we should lay a submarine line through Lake Superior. There are about 100 or 120 miles now open with which we could thus connect. This would give us a good line on our own territory. I merely mention this en passant.

MR. LANGEVIN: That may engage your attention.

MR. ANGLIN said he was surprised to find that the Glendon was one of the vessels included in this vote. Considering what was said of her last Session, it was reasonable to expect that she would be got rid of as soon as possible. As she was employed in the service, he was glad to see that she was not considered quite so worthless as she had been thought to be at one time.

MR. POPE (Queen's, P.E.I.) said he was glad the hon. gentleman opposite was so proud of the vessel he wished they had her at one-third of what she cost. The Government had her on hand, and they had to make the best of her. She was not a vessel that would capsize, but she could go ashore in a gale of wind; she was as broad as she was long. The Government could only wait, and keep the vessel on hand until they could replace her, and, in the meantime, use her for such work as she could perform.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT enquired what was the position in which this scheme stood?

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said

the Brazilian Government had intimated that they would subsidise a line as liberally as Canada. The Bill had not yet passed the Cortez, but, doubtless, would. Contracts had been entered into by the Post Office Department, at Ottawa, provisionally, subject, for completion, to the action of the Brazilian Government. Now, the arrangement was made for a monthly trip between Canada and Brazil.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT asked at what points in the West Indies was it proposed to touch.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: At St. Thomas, Porto Rico, stopping also at Batria and Marinam, and perhaps at another point. The contract is for one round trip for the month.

MR. MACKENZIE: You will miss the West India Islands.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: The vessels will go to St. Thomas.

MR. MACKENZIE: That is a mere station of call. The vessels will miss all the main points of business in the West Indies.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: By subsidising a line that would attempt to do too much, we should lose both our objects. We could not have a line of any value that would run from Canada to the British West Indies and then to Brazil and back again in the month. The voyage would be too long. If we are even to have direct West India Trade, we must have a line for intercolonial trade. We must have the Brazilian line, if it is to be of any value, running direct. It is well worth the trial. I think the enterprise will be highly successful. In Brazil the people have entered into it with great spirit. The Government of Brazil have placed at the disposal of the Government and merchants of Canada, a building for the display of specimens of all we have to sell, and are preparing now a collection of specimens of all the articles Brazil imports from England and the United States. The trade between Brazil and the United States is not very large. They are about to send some iron articles to some point in Canada, and we have suggested Montreal as being most convenient, where specimens of the articles usually imported into Brazil can be shown, so that our manufacturers can enter into competition.

MR. BURPEE (St. John): If this service can be effectually established and carried out, I think this is one of the best items in the Estimates. I would ask the hon. the First Minister if he has decided on any port in Canada, and what ports he will touch at, if any; and also if there has been any communication with the Government from the Provinces, particularly the Maritime Provinces, as to carrying freight and cattle between New Brunswick and Cape Breton; if there has been any subsidy offered.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: No, there is no subsidy offered for that object. Of course this trade is altogether experimental, and it is not quite certain whether Halifax, St. John, or Quebec or the St. Lawrence would be the best port of departure; or whether it should be the St. Lawrence in summer, or Halifax in winter. It is quite experimental so far. It has not arrived at that point at which we can definitely say. The contract is entered into provisionally only.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT: With whom is the contract entered into? With what Government?

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: The contract is entered into with an English Company, represented by Mr. Bentley, who has the confidence of the Brazilian Government.

MR. KING said, as the line of steamships from St. John to Liverpool was of great importance to New Brunswick, he regretted that the return called for by the hon. member for Sunbury (Mr. Burpee) had not been brought down. The trade between Canada and the markets of Great Britain was one which had been rapidly developing, and in which the farmers of New Brunswick had been unable to participate in consequence of the absence of steam communication. Something had been done in the way of exporting cattle to Great Britain from that Province, but the House would be surprised to learn that, in part, it had been carried on by way of Quebec. That steam communication would also be important in reference to other kinds of farm produce. In consequence of the high prices in the United States in 1878 and 1879, the farmers went into the cultivation of farm produce more than they had before, so that in the fall of 1879, they had more than they could dispose of in their own Province.

Some enterprising gentlemen in the city of St. John loaded their vessels with farm produce, but in consequence of the delay in crossing the Atlantic they had some loss, so that the experiment was not likely to be repeated unless by other means than sailing vessels.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY said communications on this subject had been received from the Mayor and Corporation of St. John, and, since the Estimates were brought down, from the Agricultural Societies of New Brunswick, and the matter was now before Council.

MR. JONES said he was very glad to see a vote for a line of steamers to Brazil. Within the last few years a large quantity of lumber had been shipped from Montreal to Brazil, and also a quantity of manufactured goods. The trade in the latter might be small at first, but he was satisfied it would increase every year.

137 For steam communication between Halifax, Cape Breton and Prince Edward Island.....	$4,000
138 For steam communication between Nova Scotia and St. Pierre.....	4,000

MR. ANGLIN said the Government should enquire whether there was any justification for this expenditure. St. Pierre was a French Island, with a very small population, and a very large amount of smuggling was done thence into the Dominion.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said this small boat had existed for some years. He did not suppose this steam communication increased the smuggling, but there must be a good deal of interchange of French goods and Canadian goods by its means.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY said there was a large trade with St. Pierre, and, instead of the smuggling being increased by the steamer, the latter afforded some facilities by which the Department was enabled to check it.

Vote agreed to.

139 To provide for the examination of masters and mates.....	$4,250
140 For purchase of life boats, life preservers, and rewards for saving life.....	3,000

MR. ANGLIN enquired what had been done during the past year, and what the hon. Minister's intentions were for the next year.

MR. POPE (Queen's, P.E.I.) said the hon. gentleman would see what had been done if he looked for the Returns for the past year. The sum of $2,823 was expended last year in this service. The cost of the service included not only what appeared, but the freight and charges on watches brought from England, as rewards, and so on, the amount could not be estimated exactly.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT: Are there any actual stations as there are in England?

MR. POPE: No. In Ontario there are some stations in which life-boats are kept, and, though I do not know whether they are necessary there more than anywhere else, they are still continued.

MR. ANGLIN: Then the grant is for the purpose of maintaining life-boats in the Life-boat Service?

MR. POPE: A large amount is paid for rescuing crews, although there is no organisation.

142 Expenses in connection with Canadian registration of shipping.....	500
143 { Montreal Water Police. } { River Police, Quebec..... }	35,000

In reply to Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT,

MR. POPE (Queen's, P.E.I.): This item was reduced $2,500 last year. This year we thought it better to put the items for both cities together, as we may want a few more water policemen in Montreal. The water police in those cities is a losing service. We lost last year about $15,000 by it.

In reply to Mr. DESJARDINS,

MR. POPE: We found the present officers of the Montreal Police Force in charge when we came into office. As soon as some of these fall out of the force they will not be replaced. Every economy will be practised, but it cannot be done in a day. A great deal has been said about the dismissal of one or two old men of the Force. I think the country will say that if you have a Police Force it ought to be an efficient one. You do not want a man seventy years of age and upwards, who may easily be knocked over by a man he is trying to arrest, or who may not be able to overtake in a run a man he wishes to capture. It would be better to pay these old men a pension and dispense with their services. I did dismiss two old men from the Montreal force, one being seventy years old and the other nearly seventy.

MR. ANGLIN: The proper mode would be to transfer this whole matter to the Local Governments. I see no reason why the Government of this Dominion should be called upon to meddle with this matter in Montreal or Quebec, while there are no such organisations in other cities of the Dominion, where even a larger amount of shipping arrives.

MR. POPE: This service has been in existence for some years, as this Government found it, and as the preceding Government left it. It is a very important service, and these men have proved themselves very useful. The Government is just as well able to support that service as the Local Governments. Last year the Government thought the expenditure too large, and reduced it by $2,500. The cost, last year, was $59,000. We dismissed the agent in Quebec, and after careful consideration decided to diminish the force there from forty-four to thirty men. At one time the main object of the Quebec force was to prevent crimping, but very little of that is done at the present time, as but few ships are now being built there. I was of opinion that the number should be increased and the pay reduced. The proposition this year is to give them $1 a day, and provided they conduct themselves satisfactorily, a further sum of 25c. a day at the close of the season.

MR. CARON: I think the present is not a good time to reduce the Police Force in Quebec. We expect a larger fleet this year than we have had for four or five years. It has been mainly through the services of this force that crimping has been almost completely suppressed. The universal opinion of the shipping trade of Quebec is opposed to any reduction of the force at the present time. It requires a larger number of men to carry on the service in the harbour of Quebec than in that of Montreal. In the latter harbour the ships lie along the wharf proper, while at Quebec the ships lie out in the stream. It is necessary to send the Water Police as far down the river as the Isle of Orleans, and beyond.

MR. POPE.

It is also necessary to send them across the river to Indian coves. Speaking, as I believe, the opinion of our leading commercial men, I hope the Government will not select the present year to reduce the Police Force in the harbour of Quebec.

MR. RYAN (Montreal Centre): As I understand the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, it is not the intention of the Government to reduce the force the present year. The same number of men is going to be kept on at Quebec as last year. There is no doubt that this force, both in Montreal and Quebec, has rendered very valuable service. As the hon. Minister has remarked, crimping in Quebec has been nearly quite suppressed. As regards the statement of the hon. member for Hochelaga, in reference to dismissals, there has been no dismissals that I know of, except two aged men. One of them, Sergeant Wilson, has faithfully served his Queen and country for the past fifty years. I am happy to say that the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries intends to recommend to his colleagues that six months' pay be granted to both of these men, as a recognition of their faithful service.

MR. CASGRAIN: I quite agree with the remarks of the hon. member for the county of Quebec, with regard to this service. The number of river police is not sufficient. Forty-five men is the least possible number that we should have for the port of Quebec, and, although there is not so much crimping as formerly, I think the hon. Minister would make a great mistake if he were to reduce the force.

MR. PLUMB enquired whether any provision had been made for the erection of a fog-whistle at the mouth of the Niagara River. He said the Globe newspaper, about six or eight months ago, had charged him with a dereliction of duty, because he had not obtained from the Government a fog-whistle at the mouth of the Niagara River,

MR. POPE (Queen's P.E.I.): No appropriation has been made for that purpose, but I will take the matter into consideration.

MR. PLUMB: The Globe discovered that there were fog-points on Lake Ontario, and wanted to have one at Niagara en purpose to have a hit at me.

Several HON. MEMBERS: Order.

MR. PLUMB: I am sorry that hon. gentlemen opposite are trying to prevent me speaking. They cannot expect to hurry Estimates or expedite the business of the House by pursuing that course.

MR. CAMERON (North Victoria) asked if there was a fog whistle at the Straits of Belle Isle. He had come through there and had been detained for many hours. He had been informed that a fog whistle would remove the necessity for such delays, as vessels could proceed if the fog whistle was there, but that in the absence of a fog whistle the vessels might be detained sometimes for days.

MR. LANGEVIN said provision was made for another fog whistle at those Straits; there was one but another would be provided.

150 Construction of a new Lighthouse on Sands Head entrance to Fraser River, B. C. $14,000

In reply to MR. ANGLIN,

MR. LANGEVIN said that when British Columbia came into Confederation there was a lightship at this point, and it had been kept since. It was rotten now, and unfit for use, and the Government had to hire a schooner at $500 a month. It was therefore considered expedient to build a lighthouse rather than incur the expense of hiring a schooner, and the cost of building the lighthouse was estimated at $14,000.

MR. GILLMOR said that the distribution of this amount had been the subject of considerable comment in the press of the Lower Provinces lately; and his attention had been more particularly called to this subject from the fact that he had applied for some small salmon, for the River St. Croix, in his county, but he had applied in vain. So far as he could gather from the Reports, some 7,000,000 of fry had been turned out of one hatchery in Ontario. This hatchery alone had cost the country $64,000. Occasionally a few salmon had been caught in Lake Ontario. The result of three years' fishing in this lake, with trap-nets, showed a catch of 600 salmon, costing the country for hatchery alone $106 each. He was satisfied the small salmon, for the most part, only furnished food for the black bass, the rock bass and the pickerel. There were nine hatcheries in operation—two in Ontario, three in Quebec, two in New Brunswick, one in Nova Scotia, and one in Prince Edward Island. After all those years, and the enormous expenditure, hon. members will be astonished to learn that Ontario exports of salmon only $2,143, while New Brunswick exports yearly $203,977; Quebec, $42,298; Nova Scotia, $91,171. The annual cost to the country of these fish-breeding establishments is: For Ontario, $9,947; Quebec, $5,810; Nova Scotia, $2,687; New Brunswick, $1,481. The matter in which he was more particularly interested was the unequal distribution of this fund amongst the fishery officers of the different Provinces. The salary of the Overseer of Ontario was $2,000; New Brunswick, $1,400; Nova Scotia, $1,400. He was acquainted with the laborious duties of the Overseer of New Brunswick. In addition to the salmon, bass, smelt, and fresh water Fisheries, the salt water Fisheries, with which he was more particularly acquainted, he knew to be very onerous and difficult. To settle the disputes and troubles arising out of weirs, involved, in his opinion, more labour than was performed by the Overseer of Ontario. In addition, the Overseer for New Brunswick had the spawning grounds, the gurry grounds, and numerous other duties to attend to, involving a great deal of travel, trouble and labour. The average salaries of Fishery Officers for the different Provinces were: 115 officers in Quebec, averaging yearly, $246; 87 in Ontario, $216; 285 in Nova Scotia, $72; 115 in New Brunswick, $104; 38 in Prince Edward Island, $33. He (Mr. Gillmor) was unacquainted with the duties of these officers in Ontario, and there might exist reasons for this difference, but he was sure no such difference existed in Quebec, and he wanted the hon. Minister to explain the reason why it existed, and if no good reason existed, to have justice done. If the officers in the Maritime Provinces were fairly paid, which he did not believe, then Quebec and Ontario officers were largely over-paid.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY said that the hon. member from Charlotte (Mr. Gillmor) in 1874 had removed an officer in his county and put several others in, thereby increasing the expense.

MR. GILLMOR said the hon. the Finance Minister had made an unfortunate reference for his Government. In 1872 he was a candidate for a seat in this Parliament. At that election a Fishery Officer, B. Cunningham, had supported him. He was defeated, and Cunningham was removed, for political reasons only, as no charge was ever preferred against him. He had at that time a salary not exceeding $50 per annum. Mr. Andrews was appointed to fill his place at a salary of $200 a year, with travelling expenses, which, he thought, amounted to $50 more. In 1874 he (Mr. Gillmor) was the successful candidate and advised that Mr. Andrews should be removed and Cunningham reinstated, which was done, but he did not receive the salary which Mr. Andrews got, but went in at his old salary, since raised somewhat. The removal of Mr. Andrews was not a pleasant duty, but justice to Cunningham demanded it.

MR. MCKAY said he wished before the item for Fish breeding, Fishways and Oyster Beds was carried to refer to the lease of an oyster bed in his county. It was leased in 1867 under certain conditions, and the terms of that lease were never carried out. Ever since this lease had been granted, the farmers had been deprived of the use of the mussle mud which they used to get there, and which was very valuable and much sought after, being carried many miles inland whenever it could be got. The person holding the lease had never expended any money on the cultivation of oysters; and this mud was thought of so much importance by the people of Prince Edward Island, that application was made for reduced railway rates to carry this mud inland. Yet, the people of his county were deprived of the use of it, simply because the holder of the lease, like the dog in the manger, will not use it himself nor allow any person else to use it. The people of his county thought it a great injustice that the lease should be continued.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: For what term is the lease?

MR. MCKAY: It is for eighteen years. There is no reason why it should be continued. The papers were laid on the Table three years ago, but nothing has been done. An examination of these papers will show that the lease should be cancelled.

MR. POPE (Queen's, P. E. I.) said the lease on the property referred to was granted by the Local Government, and therefore he could not see how the Dominion Government or the Department of Marine and Fisheries could deprive the lessee of such a lease.

MR. MCKAY said it was leased before Confederation by the Local Government, but, after Confederation, it was found the lease was valueless, and required the sanction of the Federal Government, and so the necessary form was gone through to make it a lease from this Government.

MR. POPE (Queen's, P.E.I.) said he would make enquiries.

MR. BORDEN said four officers in the Fisheries had been dispensed with in King's County, without a word of explanation as to why they were dismissed.

MR. POPE (Queen's, P.E.I.) said they were discharged because they were reported as thoroughly useless, and would not attend to their duties.

MR. ANGLIN: They voted on the wrong side, perhaps.

MR. BORDEN: On whose report were they discharged?

MR. POPE (Queen's, P.E.I.) said if the hon. gentleman would call for the reports in the usual way they would be brought down.

MR. BORDEN said he thought he was entitled to know why these changes had been made. He had understood that these gentlemen were dismissed on the score of economy, but this could not be so, as new appointments had been made. It was only a convenient way to get rid of gentlemen supposed to be opposed to the present Administration, and of substituting their own supporters. It was only fair that he should see the report.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I do not like to interrupt my hon. friend, but the hon. gentleman ought to have given notice, and he would thus have got the information he desires.

MR. MACKENZIE: It is very common to raise a question of grievance in going through the Estimates. When I was sitting over there I heard similar questions asked.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: And I have no doubt they were objected to.

MR. BORDEN: This is a vote for Salaries of Wardens and Overseers of Fisheries. There are three Wardens and one Overseer dismissed, and I want to know why. I have repeatedly known questions of this kind asked on such a vote. I have given notice of a question—

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Then the hon. gentleman is clearly out of order to bring up a subject on which he has given notice.

MR. BORDEN: I do not see why the right hon. gentleman should take such a course as this towards me, particularly as I have been compelled to be away a large portion of the Session, and could not put motions or give notices. I have given a notice certainly, but since the notice has been given, the right hon. gentleman has notified us that he will take Wednesday, the only private day, and I shall have no other opportunity of asking the question. I would, therefore, request the hon. gentleman, simply as a matter of courtesy, to furnish me now with the information required, that is, to let me know whether the Government has received any report in relation to the subject of my question, and what course is intended to be taken in this matter; also, that he will lay the report on which the officers were dismissed on the Table.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: After the remarks made by the hon. gentleman, I shall not object to his bringing up matters which he could not strictly bring up now; but with reference to his question, if the hon. gentleman will put it to-morrow we will attend to it.

In reply to Mr. SMITH,

MR. POPE (Queen's, P. E. I.) said the increase of the item for Fishery Overseers in Manitoba, from $200 to $1,000 this year, was to secure greater protection to the fish. Last year it was insufficient.

In reply to Mr. BORDEN,

MR. POPE (Queen's, P. E. I.) said his instructions to the Fishery Inspectors were to report every officer, no matter what his politics, who did not discharge his duties, with a view to his dismissal.

MR. PLUMB said the fish-breeding establishment at Newcastle, Ontario, was a great success, as was apparent from the fact that fish bred there had been caught at the mouth of the Niagara. Recent experience showed that shad could be hatched and successfully bred in Lake Ontario. Mr. Seth Green, a famous pisciculturist of the United States, had recently let loose large shoals of shad at Rochester, and Lake Ontario was now being stocked with that fish.

Several HON. MEMBERS: Question, order.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said he must protest against such disrespectful treatment of his hon. friend from Niagara, one of the most distinguished members of the Conservative party. Such disturbance was a disgrace to the Opposition, and if persisted in would evoke retaliation upon that party from the leaders downwards. The Opposition had been well treated by the majority, and it made a bad return.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT said he must object entirely to the language of the right hon. gentleman. The gentlemen interrupting the hon. member for Niagara were not members of the Opposition but of the Government party. The Opposition desired to expedite the Estimates, but not to obstruct business. The hon. Premier's threats were not justified on this occasion.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said

the member for Centre Huron had not eyes in the back of his head, or he would see that the noises did proceed from the hon. gentlemen who usually acted with him, some of whom he could name and felt inclined to name.

MR. ANGLIN denied that the Opposition desired or were responsible for the interruptions to the hon. member for Niagara, though members of this party were often disturbed by unseemly noises from supporters of the Government.

MR. PLUMB said that the vote for fish-breeding had been well spent; the work had been efficiently done, and the results were gratifying so far. This last year large shoals of white fish, bred at Newcastle, had found their way to the Niagara River. He would like to know whether the hon. the Minister of Marine would direct an examination to be made of the Niagara River, with a view to deciding whether some small expenditure should not be made for the purpose of continuing the supply of a very important article of food taken from the Lakes—whitefish? He (Mr. Plumb) thought it would be in the best interest of the public to consider favourably his application, for Niagara furnished a large supply of this fish to Toronto, Hamilton, and St. Catharines. He thought he might claim some little favour for his district in this respect, when it would result to the general advantage of the country.

MR. POPE (Queen's, P.E.I.) said that the wishes of the hon. gentleman would be fully considered; but, out of this vote, it was not possible to give anything for the purpose. It simply provided for the payment of salaries and disbursements in connection with the Fisheries, as at present arranged. The small increase was for opening up additional fisheries. In reply to the hon. member for Centre Huron, he might say the $800 mentioned were to provide for legal expenses in regard to suits taken against the Department during the late Government. Those cases were still before the Courts. Why did not the hon. member make enquiry during the five or six years his friends were in power? Many of the salaries were fixed by the late Government, and the present Government would be charged with extravagance if they increased them. If an officer was efficient and attended to his duties, he should be well paid, but the way in which the work had been done, and the fact that most of these fishery wardens were themselves the greatest poachers, led him to believe they were very well paid.

MR. GILLMOR disclaimed any intention of making any charge against the Government, but said he would like to know why the officers in Quebec were paid so much more than those in the Maritime Provinces, though their duties must be much lighter.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY said a reduction must be expected if an efficient warden, appointed in 1875 to a position in the hon. gentleman's county, at $150 a year, was displaced, and a number of other men appointed to do the work which he had performed.

CANADIAN TELEGRAPH COMPANY INCORPORATION BILL.—[BILL No. 54.]

RECOMMENDED TO STANDING COMMITTEE.

MR. MACDOUGALL: I desire to call the attention of the House to a Report of the Standing Committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines, presented to this House yesterday. It was with reference to a Bill sent to that Committee entitled, "An Act to incorporate the Canadian Telegraph Company." The Bill was referred to a Sub-Committee for consideration and amendment. It was reported upon by that Sub-Committee, and was afterwards ordered by the General Committee to be reprinted as amended, and I hold in my hand a copy of the Bill as reprinted with those amendments. The Report states no reason for negating this Bill. The ordinary mode is, of course, to find that the preamble has not been proven but that finding is not stated in the Report. Now, I think when this House refers a private Bill to any of the Standing Committees for report, it must be taken for granted that the House affirms or approves of the object for which that Bill has been introduced, and it is referred to a Committee for the purpose of examination and amendment, if the Committee think proper. This Bill is simply a Bill to incorporate a number of gentlemen who apply for the authority of Parliament to enable them to construct a telegraph line or telegraph lines in this country. It was the policy of the Government of Canada, as it has been the policy of this Dominion, to give every encouragement to persons who may choose to invest their capital in the improvement or extension of telegraphy. In fact, under the General Act for the incorporation of joint stock companies, persons may associate themselves and obtain a charter without coming to Parliament at all, for the purpose of establishing telegraph lines. No one, I apprehend, will stand up and say that it is not in accordance with public policy, and the public interest, to promote competition in matters of this sort. There can be no public reason given, it seems to me, why a company who may choose to invest their capital, and are ready to afford facilities for communication of this kind, should be refused the privilege without any reason. We hear, every day, of startling improvements in the system of telegraphy, and we do not know what new discoveries may be made, what new patents may be taken out, and what new organisations, therefore, may desire to invest their capital for this purpose. I think it has been the practice of Parliament to afford facility to every enterprise of this kind. There is no good reason why these gentlemen should be denied the privilege which they have asked. They have given notice; they have paid the necessary fees; the Bill was prepared and submitted to this House; it was read and referred to the Committee, and it now comes back to us with a report that the fees be repaid. I believe, when this report was made, there was not a quorum of the Committee present. I happened to be in the Committee at the moment, and was much surprised at the statements made and some of the arguments used by members of the Committee in favour of the rejection of this Bill. I do not think those statements or arguments should prevail in this House, and, therefore, I desire to take the sense of the House upon the question: whether we are about to adopt a new policy and hereafter prevent any persons or companies from engaging in telegraphic enterprises, in competition with those lines which exist to-day. It is well known that one of the companies that received its charter under the law I referred to, has been, to use a common expression, "sold out." It now belongs to that great Wall street operator in New York, Jay Gould. The directors of the company in Canada are simply his servants, whom he simply pays so much a year for carrying out his orders. As long as the public is served by existing companies, and telegraph messages are transmitted at a cheap rate, I suppose it does not greatly concern us where the capital comes from, or where the management resides. But the fact that a company is in foreign hands ought not to be a reason why we should prevent other persons, residing in this country or elsewhere—whether their capital is to be obtained in New York or in England—from establishing telegraph lines in Canada if they choose. It seems to me the public interest requires that this matter should be open and free, that we should have competition, especially in view of the fact that a great struggle is going on between two rival telegraph companies in the United States to obtain a monopoly. We are not much concerned in that; but when we find gentlemen prepared to come forward and engage in competition with them, in case events should show that a profit may be derived from it, I cannot see why we should say: "there shall be no more Telegraph Companies in Canada," and that the people of Canada should submit to whatever treatment the two companies now in existence may give us. I think that is not in accordance with the opinion or sense of Parliament, and therefore, I move:

That Bill No. 54, entitled an Act to incorporate the Canadian Telegraph Company, be committed to the Standing Committee on Railways and Telegraph Lines, with instructions to reconsider the Bill and report the same to this House.

MR. CAMERON (North Victoria): I raise the question of order, as to whether notice of this motion should not be given. My reason in raising the question is, that the gentleman on whose motion the preamble was declared not to be proven, is not in his place at present, and I think it is only right that the reason upon which the Committee thought fit to act should be stated to the House

MR. MACKENZIE: I do not think, in a matter of so much importance, it would be fair at this stage of the Session that the Bill should stand for the convenience of any member whoever he may be. I quite agree with the ground taken by the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Macdougall). The House has not hitherto been in the habit of considering, as a first principle in a Bill, whether it was to promote undue competition or not. I took that objection in the Committee myself. It has been our practice to allow free scope to competition in railways, telegraphs or any other object of this kind. The fact that we had already passed a Bill, this Session, to incorporate a telegraph company seemed to me conclusive that no ground for objection should be taken to another similar Bill. It is not, of course, proper to refer to what took place in the Committee, or I would refer to the reasons given, which could hardly, in my opinion, be called reasons.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: The hon. gentleman might state what he, generally, has heard of objections to the Bill.

MR. MACKENZIE: I heard, for instance, in another place, respecting this Bill, that the names given were not of sufficient weight to justify us in considering any measure upon which they proposed competition. I differed entirely in that opinion; I think some of the best names in the country were there. It was also alleged that this Bill was sought for the purpose of forming a combination, which they could not do without having that Bill in their possession, as a threat to compel others to agree to their terms. That was the chief allegation, and, in fact, the only thing that could be called a reason that I heard against the passage of the Bill. The feeling, however, was so very strong in that quarter that it was found impossible to get more than two or three to express an adverse opinion. If Parliament had been in the habit of considering the question of competition, except incidentally, it would place the matter in a different light. I believe myself that there has been undue competition in railway building, and that, in some instances, it has prevented capital from being invested in more useful enterprises. Still we have not refused to permit the increase of such enterprises. The hon. member for Halton remarked that this company could obtain a charter without coming to this House. It can, but of a limited character, under chapter 66 of the Consolidated Statutes of Canada, but that would practically be of no use, as the power only extends to Ontario and Quebec. In the meantime, I shall support the motion of the hon. member for Halton, on the grounds I have stated, for referring the Bill back to the Committee, but the hon. member should strike out the instructions to the Committee.

MR. BLAKE: I do not want to express any opinion on the merits of this Bill, but it seems to me such a course is not possible under our rules, except that this Bill should be referred back to the Committee. Unless upon the assent of the promoters of the Bill, I apprehend it is not possible for a Committee consistently with the rules and their duties, to make a report of that description.

MR. CAMERON (North Victoria): The hon. gentleman in charge of the Bill made the motion in the usual way, and it was upon his request that it was done.

MR. BLAKE: We do not find any statement that this was done upon consent. In reference to this matter Rule 65 provides:

"When the Committee on any Private Bill report to the House that the preamble of such Bill has not been proved to their satisfaction, they must also state the grounds upon which they have arrived at such decision; and no Bill so reported upon shall be placed upon the Orders of the Day, unless by special order of the House.

"2. Private Bills, otherwise reported to the House by such Committee, shall be placed upon the Orders of the Day following the reception of the Report, for consideration in Committee of the Whole, in their proper order, next after Bills referred to a Committee of the Whole House."

If there was assent it ought to have been reported to us. Unless by assent, there were but two ways of dealing with it, either to report the preamble proved, and the clauses adopted with modification, or without, and to report the preamble not proved, and in that case to give the reasons why the preamble was adjudged to be not proven. Upon these reasons the House would have an opportunity of acting, and to decide whether, notwithstanding the Report of the Committee, the Bill should be again placed upon the Orders of the Day. It seems to me, therefore, that the Report is irregular, and that the Bill should be referred back to the Committee, in order that it may be disposed of in accordance with the General Rules of the House.

MR. MACKENZIE: There was a motion made in Committee that the preamble was not proved, and that was declared correct by the chairman. So the Report, as recorded in our Minutes, is not accurate.

MR. LANGEVIN: The statement made by the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) is correct. The action of the Committee ought to have been reported here. As they have not drawn up the Report as it should have been drawn up, that may be a good reason to refer it back in order that the proper Report may be made. I do not agree with the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Macdougall) in the opinion that the Committee cannot take into consideration the policy of passing a Bill of this kind and throwing it out. We do that every day. The hon. gentleman was present when we had under consideration a Bill about a new charter for a railway through the counties of Huntington, Chateauguay, and another county. What was done in that case? The Committee said it was not a proper thing to have two competing lines there. We must see if the existing company conforms to its charter during the next year or so. The other day we had another charter asking for a railway from Emerson to the west. We found there were reasons why we should not pass that Bill, and after discussing the matter, if the promoter had not withdrawn the Bill we would have declared that the preamble was not proven. That is strictly within the rights and privileges of the Committee. We would not be a Committee if we could not state whether it was expedient to grant the prayer of the petitioner. I do not say that the hon. member for Halton may not be right in his way of construing the matter. He thinks we should have another company. A large majority of the Committee, however, considered that that was not expedient. They urged that we had already two companies in Canada, and that those two companies were working side by side in opposition to each other, that there was perfect safety for the public service ; and I have heard also that there is not business enough in Canada to have another line in competition to the two others. Therefore, we could not grant the new charter. As to the motion itself, I believe the Report should have been fuller than it has been made, and I do not suppose the hon. the First Minister will object to a motion that will refer the Bill back to the Committee.

MR. CASEY : I think, in reference to the contention of the hon. member for Halton, that the practice is pretty clearly laid down in Todd's book on Private Bill Practice. The whole question of expediency has been left to the Committee, and I think it would require, for such a motion as the hon. member has made, that he should adduce very strong reasons why the action of the Committee should be reversed, because his proposition involves a rather startling change in our practice in these matters.

MR. CAMERON (North Victoria) : The motion of my hon. friend from Halton is, that the Report be recommitted to the Standing Committee on Railways, with instructions to reconsider the Bill and report the same to this House. That motion, in the form in which it now stands, coupled with the reasons my hon. friend adduced in support of it, amounts to a direct reproof of the Committee for its action in this matter, and if we have to discuss this question on the reasons adduced by my hon. friend, a great deal can be said why the decision of the Committee should be upheld. With regard to the ground taken by the hon. member for West Durham, I understand his view to be that, under the General Rules when a Committee reports a preamble not proven, they should also report the reason why they think it is not proven. That Report was presented yesterday and received by the House, and I submit that it is too late now to send it back to the Committee, and that, in fact, it is not necessary to send it back for any such purpose ; because the only report they could make, judging from what we are led to believe occurred before the Committee, would be that they find it is not expedient to grant the prayer of the petition. There can be no doubt that the Committee came to the conclusion that it was not expedient to grant the prayer of the petitioners.

MR. LANGEVIN.

MR. BLAKE: That is what we want to know.

MR. CAMERON : I submit that it is not necessary to report any more than that they found the preamble not proven, because it was not expedient to grant the prayer of the petitioners.

MR. BLAKE : They have to state the grounds.

MR. CAMERON : It was never intended by that Rule that a Committee should enter into an elaborate statement of the pros and cons which induced them not to grant the prayer of a petition. All the Committee have to report, for the information of the House, is as to the part of the preamble which they think is not proven. The principle laid down by my hon. friend from Halton is, that there should be Free-trade in charters for telegraph companies. I think it is a very vicious and dangerous principle to lay down that we shall have Free-trade in any kind of charters, because the result will be that charters will be applied for and obtained without any intention of organising a company, but with the sole object of making money out of the sale of the charter. We have seen some legislatures granting charters indiscriminately, and then a regular set of men springing up who are promoters of companies and charter-sellers. They obtain a charter and then offer it for sale in the money markets of the world, or go to other companies established for like purposes and say : " If you do not buy this charter we will establish a company in opposition to you." They levy blackmail by using the powers Parliament has thought fit to give them. I trust that will be a practice we shall ever be reluctant to adopt, and that we will never grant a new charter to a company unless we are satisfied that it is in the public interest that the company should be established, and that the persons asking for the charter have a bonâ fide intention of organising their company under it. In this particular case we may presume, from what has been said here, that the Committee was of opinion that there were already sufficient telegraph companies chartered and in existence, that we have already chartered another company to carry on business in Manitoba and the North-West, and to extend their line to British Columbia, and that the telegraphic wants of the Dominion are amply served by existing organisations, and that it was not in the public interest that another company should be chartered. My hon. friend has thought fit to make some remarks about one of the companies in existence, which he says has already been sold out to Jay Gould. His statement is entirely incorrect. Having some professional connection with the company I am in a position to state that the company has not been sold out to Jay Gould. Jay Gould's connection with the company is simply his subscription for some $230,000 worth of stock, which is less than one-quarter of the whole stock. There were $230,000 odd of stock not subscribed for. Mr. Gould subscribed for that stock at a certain price, paid in the money and is now, unless he has disposed of it, a stockholder for less than one-quarter of the capital stock of the company. He paid that money in cash and it was used, so far as necessary, in paying off its floating debt and in extending its lines throughout the country. Since that transaction the company has negotiated a lease with one of those companies which my hon. friend describes as "one of the gigantic companies in the United States now carrying on a telegraphic war there." The Dominion Company, under that lease, works in connection with the American Union Company, in just the same way and with just the same arrangement that the Montreal Company works in connection with the Western Union Company. No one, I think, can say that the public of Canada have not ample telegraphic facilities provided for them. In fact, many believe that we have too much telegraphic facility, and that our cities and towns are too full of telegraph poles; and there has been a good deal of discussion in the Committee this year, as to the propriety of allowing the telegraph companies that are now in existence, to extend their connections any further through the cities and towns of the Dominion, because it was felt that they were actually becoming a nuisance instead of a public advantage. I do not know what position we would be placed in if we had another company chartered. I suppose the new company would have to put their posts down the middle of the road, as the existing companies have their posts down each side of the roads in every city and town throughout the length and breadth of the Dominion. My hon. friend from Lambton is in error in saying that the financial standing of the gentlemen, whose names appear in the petition, was impugned. What was questioned was the bonâ fide intention of organising a company and of using their own money in the creation of a new telegraph company. The Committee have not had their eyes closed to a series of newspaper articles that have been going the rounds of the Press, from one end of the country to the other, raising the bugbear of the proposed or intended amalgamation between the existing companies, and saying: "Oh, you must grant this charter to the Canadian Telegraph Company, because if you do not, you will find yourselves placed at the mercy of Jay Gould, or some other capitalist who is going to buy up the existing companies." It has been stated by an officer of one of the companies that the rumour of the intended amalgamation had not the slightest foundation whatever, and that there was not the remotest possibility, in view of the existing state of things, of any amalgamation or union, or policy, or anything of the kind between the two companies. My hon. friend has said that two companies are carrying on a bitter and an active warfare in the United States, and that one of these American companies controls and is connected with one of our companies, and the other with the other, and that the said warfare is being carried on here. It is admitted that we have all the telegraphic facilities we want, and that we have no occasion to be alarmed by the idea that we are going to be at the mercy of any capitalist, or any one of those two companies; and unless we are prepared to admit that another company is a public necessity, it seems to me Parliament would be only exercising a wise discrimination in declining to grant this new charter. For these reasons I think the motion in this shape should not be adopted. As to the objection of the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), I think it is a technical objection as to form, and should have been raised at the time the Report was presented.

MR. MACDOUGALL: I have no objection to alter the motion in any way so as to get the matter before the whole Committee. It is important that it should be fully discussed before a full Committee. There was not a quorum.

MR. CAMERON (North Victoria) : It was insisted on, the Committee going on without a quorum.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD : As the House knows that there was no quorum, I think that settles the question. I think the point taken by the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) that the grounds ought to have been stated in the Report, is correct. I do not suppose the Committee should be compelled to enter into full reasons, but there must be some general ground stated, and the ground for the declaration of the Committee that it is expedient, will satisfy the Rules. I think that it must be held that the reference should be, as my hon. friend from Halton says, a general reference back to the Committee, as if it had never been sent there before.

Motion agreed to, and Bill recommitteed.

BILL INTRODUCED.

The following Bill (from the Senate) was introduced, and read the first time :—

Bill (No. 112) To explain and further to amend the Canada Temperance Act, 1878.—

XXIV. GEOLOGICAL SURVEY.

House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

160 Geological Survey.....	$50,000
161 To meet probable expenditure in consequence of the transfer of Museum from Montreal to Ottawa.....	5,000

In reply to Mr. MACKENZIE,

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said that the Government had, subject to the decision of Parliament, arranged to purchase the old Clarendon Hotel for the purpose of using it as the office of the Geological Survey Department here. It was proposed to move the head-quarters of the Survey to Ottawa, in accordance with the power given under the late Government, and the expressed intention of the Government last Session. The premises had been obtained at a reasonable price, and the removal was intended to take place this summer. It was not intended to deprive Montreal of a Geological Museum.

MR. MACDOUGALL.

There would still be a Museum there as well as at Ottawa. It was thought that the Department could afford to have a Museum in each place.

MR. MACKENZIE asked if the right hon. gentleman could say if arrangements had been made for the work of the present season, and where the officials were to be chiefly engaged.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said that perhaps the information could be given in concurrence.

Vote agreed to.

XXV. INDIANS.

Ontario and Quebec.

162	Annual Grants :—
	For Indians of Quebec.....	$3,200
	For purchase of blankets for aged and infirm Indians of Ontario and Quebec.....	1,600
	For Indian schools in Ontario and Quebec.....	5,000
	For Annuities under the Robinson Treaty.....	14,000

MR. SCRIVER asked what was the present position of affairs in reference to the annuities under the Robinson Treaty, an amount of which there had been a large arrear due from the Province of Ontario to the Dominion.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said he thought it stood very much as it did last year. The Government had certain means of paying themselves, but was not desirable to press that course except in case of absolute necessity. He hoped the Boundary question and this would be settled together.

In reply to Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT,

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said a portion of the land included in the Robinson Treaty was within the claim set upon in reference to the Boundary ; but it was only a very small portion of that land—not so much as to make it material.

MR. DAWSON said that the claims of the Indians of Lakes Huron and Superior formed, in fact, a lien on the land, and that as the Government of Ontario received the revenues of the land, that Government should be called upon to meet the arrears due to the Indians. On a fair consideration of the circumstances it would be found that there was a considerable sum still due, in the way of arrears, to the Indians, and it was unfair to keep it from them. Ontario should be brought to a sense of her obligations in this regard. He was confident that if the matter was understood the Indians would be waid.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said the Government would endeavour to do this.

MR. SCRIVER asked if the Government had under consideration the case of the Oka Indians, with a view to the settlement of the difficulties existing for many years past. He had, when the late Government were in power, suggested a mode of settlement which was more feasible and reasonable.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: What was that?

MR. SCRIVER said his suggestion was that a portion of land in the unoccupied territory in the North-West should be set aside for those Indians, and that they should be assisted by a reasonable grant of money to aid them in removing, and to enable them to construct dwellings for occupation. The gentlemen at the Seminary were willing to give them a considerable sum of money if the Indians would remove, but the sum offered was not sufficient to warrant their friends in concluding that they should accept it; it was not sufficient to aid in their removal, to enable them to erect comfortable dwellings and obtain agricultural implements and other things necessary to give them a fair start in life. He trusted the present Government would take the matter into their consideration, and that some good settlement would be made which would be satisfactory to the gentlemen of the Seminary and to the Indians themselves.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: The hon. gentleman is right in stating that this important question, which has caused so much heart-burning, should be settled. One mode of settlement suggested was that a tract of land should be given to these Indians on the Upper Ottawa. The gentlemen of the Seminary agreed to contribute $20,000, as they would have the lands, the money to be used in transferring the Indians from one locality to another. The Indians declined that, as being altogether insufficient. The case is still pending in the Courts, though Mr. McLaren, who has been acting for the last and the present Government, has been continually urged to lose no opportunity of pushing the matter forward and obtaining a final adjudication as fast as possible. The gentlemen of the Seminary, standing on their rights, are defending the action which, hitherto, has not been brought forward in the Courts successfully, or in a way to secure a judgment on the question of the title of the Seminary and the right of the Indians under the grant. It is to be hoped a judgment will be obtained ere long. I can give no assurance that the matter will be settled early. As to sending the Indians to the North-West, it would be expensive, and I am not sure it would be received with favour by the whites or Indians already there. The Oka Indians would be strangers, and, scarcely, improving settlers.

MR. SCRIVER: I am afraid that the suit now pending before the Courts will not settle the question of title. I am so informed by Mr. McLaren himself, and that he is eager to bring such a suit before the Courts as will settle that question. There are some technical difficulties, which I understand, can be removed only by the action of the Government, which action has been solicited so far in vain.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: The Government, through the Department of Justice, have pressed for the settlement of a special case between the Seminary and the Indians, for the purpose of a decision by the Supreme Court. That action has not yet resulted in a settlement of the case. The gentlemen of the Seminary have expressed their willingness to have a case submitted for adjudication on the question of title.

MR. DAWSON said it was at one time intended to send the Oka Indians to Algoma, but he could assure the House that they would be unwelcome guests in that district. There were already numerous bands of Indians there who were their hereditary enemies. If they were sent there the Government would have to support them, for he (Mr. Dawson) knew of no way in which they could earn a living. They knew nothing of fishing in such an open sea as Lake Huron, as their lives had hitherto been spent on sheltered streams and little inland lakes. There was a demand for their labour here as raftsmen and voyageurs. At Lake Huron, or at Lake Superior, there was but little going on in the lumber trade, so that they would have little or no employment in the service with which they were best acquainted. It would be better to keep them in Lower Canada.

164 Indians of New Brunswick generally..... 4,500

MR. ANGLIN said those Indians were making no progress towards civilisation. Nothing had been done, except in one or two places, to induce them to settle down to habits of industry, or engage in agricultural pursuits. Only one or two attempts were made to establish schools, the Indians being, on the whole, illiterate. The present mode of distributing the money was unsatisfactory, and it did little good, being doled out in small sums. The salaries and travelling expenses of the two Indian Commissioners absorbed nearly one-third of the grant. The old system of gratuitous distribution, under the Catholic priests, was far more beneficial to the Indians, who are Catholics. He would ask, in behalf of those poor Indians, for a better management and distribution of their Fund. Much more could be done to civilise them and train them to industry.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT: Has the Report respecting Indians affairs yet made its appearance?

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: It has been ready for some time, with the exception of a Return from the North-West, for which it has been waiting.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT: It is difficult to discuss these items without the Report or sufficient information. There is none in the Estimates.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: The vote is merely a repetition of that of last and the preceding year. The Department was so well managed by my predecessor that I have continued the old practices and votes.

MR. MILLS: The right hon. gentleman made a speech in Ottawa lately, in which he expressed a different opinion, speaking disparagingly of its management under myself, and highly of its management under my successor, the present Minister. I do not know whether he is now forming a less unjust opinion of the late and a lower opinion of the present Minister's management or not.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Perhaps a little of both.

MR. MILLS: It is not creditable to the present Minister that the Report is not yet produced. It used to be submitted at the beginning of the Session. These delays in the furnishing of information should not be tolerated.

166 { Indians of British Columbia-

Surveys and Reserve Commission 24,140

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT: How is it proposed to dispose of this sum? It is the same amount as voted last year.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: It will be applied after the same fashion as the previous votes. There will be a change, however, in the system of management. The Superintendency of the Indians was divided into two branches—the Mainland and the Island Agency. We have thought it better to have the Indians under one Superintendent. The late officer will be retained under him. Mr. Trutch, who was long Commissioner of Public Lands in that Province, and has had a great deal to do with the management of Indian affairs, has been appointed in the place of Mr. Sprout, who has resigned. Mr. Trutch will have the management of the railway lands to be assigned by the Province to the Dominion for the construction of the Pacific Railway. He will be charged by the hon. the Minister of Railways with the supervising of any portion of the Railway built in British Columbia.

MR. MILLS: Will the right hon. gentleman say, whether the amount taken last year to pay for surveys, is likely to be expended before the expiration of the present year.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: It will cover the year to the 1st July next.

MR. MILLS: There was a small appropriation last year. How has it been expended? Is it adequate or more than adequate?

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: It has not all been expended, but I am informed it will probably all be expended by the 1st of July, of this year.

MR. MILLS: We do not know the extent to which the reservations have been surveyed. It was expected that those amounts were required for the purpose of surveying the Indian reservations. If the sum has been absorbed in the expenses of the Commission, and the surveys are not made, it will require a much larger sum to complete the operations, and it would be very desirable to know whether these reservations have already been let out by the surveyors accompanying the Commission, or what remains to be done, and what further expenditure will be required in connection with the surveys of the Reserve.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: The surveys are now going on. The Commissioner has a regular staff of surveyors under his control for that purpose. I believe the reserves have been for the most part blocked out. I must say that I was horrified to see the amount asked for, and this is a case in which there has been a waste of money, not only last year but in previous years, and a stop must, I think, be put to it. This is one of the instances in which the practical knowledge of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) will be of service to the Government and the House, in order to prevent unnecessary expenditure. It is proposed, as the Indians are to be put upon the Reserves, instead of sending expensive resident local agents, to employ practical farmers who will clear the reservations, and to whom a small pecuniary sum will be paid, and who will assist the Indians generally in their new life—which I believe they are adopting to a very considerable extent—that of cultivation of the soil.

MR. MILLS: Our whole system of Indian Administration for the past half century has, I think, been one tending to make the Indians a dependent population, instead of civilising them and making them self-reliant. Mr. Duncan, in British Columbia, has been very successful in leading the Indians under his charge to be self-supporting. I think some effort should be made to diminish our Indian expenditure. It is out of all proportion to what it ought be, and there is no indication of any diminution in the expense for the future. I think the policy of the Government should be to so far throw the Indians upon their own resources as to make them a self-reliant and self-supporting population at an early day. Our policy has been in the past not to secure a survival of the fittest, but a survival of everybody, to put the industrious and enterprising upon an equality with the careless and the idle. I have no doubt but that the Indian Administration in the older Provinces can be very much improved. I do not know a settlement in those Provinces where the Indians do not stand in antagonism to the white population; they are certainly not a favourite class with the people in their immediate neighbourhood. Another matter which should be considered is, whether it is right and proper that they should be released from meeting their obligations, particularly contracts for necessaries with the white population. I think the result of that immunity has been largely to demoralise the Indians, and I am of the opinion that the whole of this matter should be carefully reconsidered by the Government, and that the subject should be dealt with afresh. I have no doubt that if Municipal Government were, to some extent, introduced among them, if the Indians of each reservation were required to elect some sort of Council, and bear some amount of taxation, not as a part of an ordinary municipal Government, but as a separate and distinct municipality, if they were required to provide for their roads and bridges, and for the maintenance of their schools, a great deal would be done in the way of making them self-reliant and industrious. I know many instances where Indians have left their reservations, and gone among the white population, where they have been taxed in the same way as the other citizens; and I have seen that while those Indians were no way superior to the rest of their race, they have become much more prosperous than those who remained on their Reserves. I think our past system has had a tendency to put the Indians in a worse, instead of in a better position. In the North-West, where we have such a large Indian population, if they are led to look to the community for their support, and are, therefore, degraded, it will be a source of a great deal of future mischief. Not only should this question be considered, but the whole should receive the careful consideration of the Government, for I feel certain that, if the Indians were subjected to a larger extent to the responsibilities that devolve upon the white population, they would be benefitted to a proportionate degree. At present the course is a downward one, and the degradation will be sure to go on very rapidly.

MR. BLAKE: I think the subject to which my hon. friend has adverted cannot too early or too seriously engage the attention of the Administration. Whatever we may think as to the policy which has guided the management of the Indians in the older Provinces, there is really a very grave question, both socially and financially, as to the Indians of the North-West. You are expending about $550,000 annually upon the Indians, and $300,000 for the Mounted Police, the principle cause of which was to protect the settlers and overhaul the Indians, peaceable though they generally are. You are thus approximating to the expenditure of $1,000,000 a year for the management of the Indians in the North-West. Their food supplies, as hunters, are diminishing yearly and rapidly. The buffalo does not come to the prairies as he formerly did. The hon. gentleman opposite has had to ask for a special vote of $200,000 to feed the starving people, not only from motives of humanity, but because the Indians will not starve so long as they can divide among themselves the grain of the settlers. We are in a very serious condition in regard to this matter. We may be subjected to this serious charge for an annual fund, and, in that case, we are training the Indians to look to us for aid. They know that to this wealthy Dominion, if the buffalo does not arrive, they are to look, to supply the food which they would obtain if the herds of buffalo were accessible, and that impression will grow. I am, of course, not complaining of what has been done in the past by either Government, but I think it is not too late to endeavour to retrace our steps, and at the earliest moment to implant in the minds of the Indians a spirit of independence and responsibility—to endeavour, as far as we can, to point out to them the opportunities open to them for earning a livelihood in other ways, and substituting that for the spirit of reliance upon the Government. At present they believe that if they fail in their endeavours to get their own living, there is an inexhaustible fund from which the Great Mother will supply them with food. This is not a hopeless task. I had a conversation with Mr. Maurice, the late Lieutenant-Governor, in which he told me of an Indian who imported direct from Great Britain what he required, and not deal with middlemen at all. This may be an exception, but it shows that there are instances of self-reliance among Indians, which may be more numerous than we are aware of. I have read accounts of the degree of independence shown by the Indians in British Columbia, and of the power of trading and acquiring property, which have been developed among them. I think we should turn our attention more than we have in the past towards making the Indians more responsible and self-reliant, instead of teaching them to rely on us for everything, otherwise we shall have an increasing expense and a more degraded, instead of a less degraded, population.

MR. THOMPSON (Cariboo): I agree, to a great extent, with the remarks which have been made by the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), but I do not agree with the observations of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) in reference to giving the Indians municipal government for themselves. Within two years there was a chief of a tribe in British Columbia, who was getting too old, and the Indians wished to elect a younger man in his place. I met the young man, and asked him if the tribe were going to make him chief. He said they would if he desired it, but he did not want to work for nothing; if they paid him, he did not mind being the chief. He told me he had been interpreting for the Indian Commission for some time, but he did not want to be a "tyhee" and not get pay for it. The Indians of British Columbia are, to some extent, a self-sustaining class. They work industriously; they fish in the rivers they work in the mines; they hunt in the forests; they cut cordwood for the steamers; they drive ox teams to Cariboo, and are in fact indefatigable in the summer season. Of course, as soon as they have $200 or $300 in cash coming to them, they will go back home. We have made a mistake in this Indian Commission business, which I believe was inaugurated when the hon. member for Bothwell was Minister of the Interior. We have given them more land than they can cultivate. If an Indian is kept in a moderate space he will cultivate his land very well, but if he is given too great a number of acres he will ask for more, and a great deal of dissatisfaction is now felt in British Columbia about the reserves which have been given to Indians. I do not advocate the American idea of driving the Indians to the reserves and telling them to stay there. That system would not be tolerated in our Province. The Indians are the most independent class that I know of. Forty or fifty of them will go at a time to the mines with their horses during the summer season, they will work very hard, and, as a rule, make more than the white man in packing over the mountains. The trouble is that sometimes they get in with Chinamen who supply them with whiskey. We have had no case but one of an Indian murderer in the upper country since the Chilicoten outbreak of 1864. The Indians are peaceable, and they know that if a white man steals an Indian's horse, or breaks into an Indian's house, the white man is amenable to the law as much as the Indian is; and they also know if they commit a breach of the peace they are also amenable as much as the white man, and that, in fact, they are in the same position, except as to voting, as the white men who rule the country. They are satisfied with their lot, if you do not bring too many Commissioners among them, and tell them they are to rule the whole country. Last winter an unfortunate outbreak occurred in British Columbia, in which some half-breed boys, the youngest of whom was sixteen, and the eldest twenty-four years of age, murdered a constable, then murdered another man who was herding sheep, and wounded two persons who were sent in pursuit of them. The oldest of those half-breeds was married to the daughter of an Indian chief. There are several Indians and half-breeds scattered along the border who are ready to make an outbreak. They steal horses on both sides, and then run across the border. One of these Indians went to the head chief of the Nicola tribe, and said: These half-breeds have gone out on the war path. We have plenty of Indians here now to clean out all the whites. What did the old chief say? "Suppose we kill off all the white men, who can make the flour, the tobacco, the tea, sugar, and the blankets which we need?" This mode of reasoning silenced the warlike Indian. That is the class of Indians we have amongst us.

MR. ORTON: I have received a letter from a friend in British Columbia, making complaints in reference to the management of Indian lands. I will just read an extract:

"Mr. Sproat, the Dominion Land Agent here, has been making great havoc with the settlement of the lands, giving to Indians all the land that was of any good for settlement and that was not previously preempted. His decisions have caused universal dissatisfaction among the whites. To a white friend in this valley he gave 500 acres of pasture land in exchange for about six acres of meadow for some Indians."

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: These complaints are very natural. The whites think the Indians get too much and the Indians think they do not get enough. Government have to hold the balance and see that the Indian is protected. In fact, Government is the guardian of the Indians. It is quite true, as has been said, that the Indians are too apt to throw themselves upon the Government, and the more they receive support the less self-reliant they will be. It is a choice of two evils. We cannot allow them to starve, and we cannot make them white-men. All we can do is to endeavour to induce them to abandon their nomadic habits, and settle down and cultivate the soil. The Crown is continually obliged to resist the pressure to deprive the Indians of their lands. I have no doubt my predecessor has found that civilisation and improvement in the vicinity of an Indian Reserve, have been much retarded by the fact of the Indian Reserve being there, and by reason of the slatternly and slovenly mode of farming by the Indians. It is a great injury to any portion of the country to have an Indian Reserve in its midst. They have no municipal institutions.

They cannot be expected to be weaned away suddenly from the habits of their ancestors. But there has been considerable progress made, and chiefly among the prairie Indians of the North-West. I think that, from the evidence we have, the Indians are impressed with the idea that their former supply of food has disappeared, and they must take up the habits of the white men in order to supply their wants. As to the question of my hon. friend from Centre Wellington (Mr. Orton), as far as I can see Mr. Sproat tried to see that the Indians got the full allowance of land, and perhaps, in some cases, an excessive allowance, for all I know. It is his duty to see that they get the full and fair allowance of land, and that it should be fit for cultivation. It would be wrong to sell these poor people, whom we are trying to induce to become agriculturists, lands unfit for cultivation. However, these matters have come up, and it is proper to discuss them.

169 Grist Mill $3,000

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: This is for the purpose of erecting a grist mill. There is a good deal of grain grown there now, and they have no means of grinding the wheat which is raised. It has been thought well to put up a mill for the purpose of helping the inhabitants who have gone in there to get their ground. It will be used as a grist mill and saw mill. We have secured the services of a man from Ontario, who will, it is expected, purchase the mill as soon as he is able to do so.

MR. BLAKE: I am wholly opposed to the notion that we are to supply facilities to the settlers up there in the way of building grist mills and running them. It will form a bad precedent for similar operations in other parts of the North-West. It would be better to subsidise a private individual.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: There are two very good farms up there which have been cultivated for some years, and which would be almost valueless unless there is some means of grinding wheat. The population is too sparse for us to expect a person to go there and invest his money in building a mill on his own account.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD.

170 Provisions for Indians assembled to receive annuity payments for destitute Indians, etc. $130,686

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT: This is an enormous increase on the vote of last year. I suppose it is partly in connection with the destitution which arose. I would like to know if there is any possibility of getting rid of the wasteful practice of sustaining large bodies of Indians at the public expense.

MR. SCHULTZ: Of course, Mr. Chairman, any discussion upon this item is had with disadvantage, in the absence of the Report of the right hon. gentleman at the head of the Department. That Report, it is to be hoped, will contain some scheme which will save to the country the enormous amount of money which is now being expended for this purpose. I agree with the hon. members for South Huron and Bothwell in their expressions of alarm at this continually increasing expenditure, but, at the same time, I hardly regard it as fair in the hon. member for Bothwell to attempt to throw the responsibility of this heavy expenditure on his right hon. successor in office. That hon. gentleman knows perfectly well that the necessity for this expenditure commenced with the sanction, by the late Administration, of one of the vicious conditions of Treaty No. 6, made when that hon. gentleman held office, and the result of the clause—agreeing that the Government should furnish food in times of scarcity—was followed by a vote for that purpose at the very next Session of Parliament, and we have found the constant occurrence of a similar necessity at every Session since, till the vote has reached its present alarming proportions. Of course the gradual disappearance of the buffalo has acted to some extent in this direction, but I am afraid the main cause has been the belief of the Indians, that they might henceforward depend upon the Government, and they ceased to make those exertions, which, in former occasions of temporary absence of the buffalo, had been found to be sufficient to sustain them. I believe, however, that the question: of what shall be done to provide food for the Indians of the plains, will have to be grappled with at once. The buffalo which, hard pressed as they have been on all sides, have sought refuge on the other side of the line, return so infrequently as to make them no longer a factor in the problem of food supply for our prairie tribes. I have no faith in the present efforts, in an agricultural direction, being likely to save us to any great extent from the necessity of feeding the Indians with imported food; and I believe that I am supported by most of the Roman Catholic clergy, and ministers of other denominations, who labour among them as missionaries, in the view that it is practically impossible to convert the adult Indian from his habits of the chase to the peaceful tillage of the soil at one step, and if this is the case, we have seriously to consider whether, in going on to locate and improve the present reserves, we are not making a serious mistake. I believe that, in view of the possibility of the right hon. Minister not having decided upon any definite scheme, a discussion of this nature, calculated as it is to elicit the opinions of those who have made the subject a study, it is the duty of everyone to express an opinion upon this difficult subject, and in offering my own, I commence with the assumption that the buffalo has ceased to exist as a source of certain supply of food to the Blackfeet and plain Crees. Roughly speaking, the Indian population of the whole of the prairie country, between the boundary line and the location of the Canadian Pacific Railway, is destitute of winter food, who now haunt the Mounted Police Stations and Indian Agencies, with all the consequent demoralisation, of which we have heard so much. While it is a fact that this starving condition exists among our plain Indians, their brethren of the wood are living in comparative plenty, and the difference is especially noticeable in the Crees of the prairie and the wood Crees. These two sections of our North-West population are the same people, speak the same language, and yet, while the horseman starves, he of the snowshoe, the trap, and the paddle, thrives, and is living in peace by some lake or stream, whose waters yield him fish when other food fails. Now, it so happens that north of located line of the Canadian Pacific Railway, on the confines of our fertile belt, and at the commencement of the immense wooded area, which, extending to the Arctic Sea, is the last remaining haunt of fur-bearing animals on this continent, there exists the conditions whereby we may allow the Indian of the plains to indulge his love of the chase with profit to himself and relief to us in the matter of expenditure in the winter, when agricultural operations are impossible, without interference with such efforts as are at present being made to teach him the arts of a farmer. Believing as I do, Sir, that the attempt to suddenly convert the horse-riding, buffalo-hunting, plain-Indian suddenly into a farmer, I am opposed to the plan of making reserves in the region I have mentioned. This region is one which will be soon wanted for a white population, and the attempt to make its Indian population self-sustaining in the next ten years, by their efforts at agriculture, will fail, and the failure will entail a constant recurrence of the present expenditure, with probably a still larger increase. I believe the only available solution of the problem to be the transference of all our plain Indians to the district I have mentioned, located near the great fishing lakes of that region, where there would be absent none of the conditions necessary for successful agriculture, while the advance in the science of pisciculture would enable us to abundantly stock these lakes, which are not already supplied, with whitefish, thus forming for him a basis of supply which is found to be sufficient for all the different tribes of wood Indians. I believe, too, that physically and morally, this change would benefit the Indians, and the removal of all of our Indians from the neighbourhood of the boundary line would be to effectually prevent the possibility of collision with the American tribes, and, in part, the necessity of our very expensive Police Force. It must be remembered that our Blackfeet, peaceful and quiet as they have been as yet, are but another branch of the powerful, warlike and treacherous "Dakotah" nation to which the Sioux belong. With their removal north of the line of Railway we clear ourselves from the danger of their contact with the refugee Sioux, and we place them beyond the power of aid from the American branches of the same nation, and where the Railway gives us the power to strike hard in case the good relations which now exist should ever be disturbed. To civilise the Indians you must begin with the young; and while I am in favour of every effort that will bring him within the pale of Christianity and civilisation, I do not go the length of my hon. friend from Bothwell in his view of municipal institutions for the Indians. Danger commences with the Indian when he gets in council, and I am afraid that we must take a good many preliminary steps first before he is ripe for this luxury of civilisation. I desire to call attention, however, to the pernicious and expensive practice of paying the Indians away from their reserves. This is done generally to suit the convenience of the agent, and is expensive to the Government, without being of any advantage, but, in many cases, a very great disadvantage to the Indians, and the Department should insist on a rigid performance of this duty by its agents. Again, there is no doubt but that the practice of paying to the Indians bank bills of a large denomination has had the effect, in many instances, of exposing him to fraud by unscrupulous traders, and I would urge that, in future, no bill of larger denomination than one dollar be used at any of the payments. I trust that the right hon. Minister will receive these suggestions in the spirit they are offered, and that by a careful consideration of the means by which we can raise him to the condition of a self-sustaining citizen of our common country, Canada may continue to merit the praise justly bestowed upon her for her treatment of this race, whose destinies we hold in our hands.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I agree with very much what my hon. friend has just said, and I am exceedingly obliged to him for his interesting statement. He opens up a large question when he suggests the moving of the whole of the Indians from that portion of the country where their ancestors lived, to another portion. Unless the Indians would consent to that course, a pressure, almost hostile, would have to be employed before they could be induced to leave the regions where they and their forefathers had roamed for a more northerly part of the country. However, if they could be induced to go it would be a great advantage, and it would relieve the whole of that region from the disadvantage of an Indian population. It is a subject that is worthy of all consideration, and I shall endeavour to give it my best thought. I am glad to inform the hon. gentleman that we have anticipated his last proposition, that the Indians should be paid in bills of small denominations. It has been decided by the Government that all payments made either to Indians or the Mounted Police shall be made in bills of $1, so that the Indian, when he gets a piece of paper will know exactly what its value is. I cordially agree with my hon. friend in his statement that the agent should go to the Indians, and not the Indians, in a large body, to the agent. Orders have already gone forth that agents shall pay the Indians on their reserves.

In reply to Mr. MILLS,

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said, as the agents had been instructed to pay the Indians on their reserves, the expenditure for food would be but trifling. They could not abandon the custom of giving the Indians food when they were paid. He supposed they would get some food on the day they were paid, and that would be an end of it, consequently there would be a wonderful saving. The estimated expenditure for feeding Indians was $21,000.

MR. TROW: I fail to understand why such a large expenditure should be incurred in feeding Indians yearly after the Treaty is made. I can readily understand that when a Treaty is pending or negotiations are going on, several days are employed, invariably taken up in discussions, and then food must be allowed to the Indians. It is the custom of all nations to do so. I know at times there is unnecessary waste and lavish expenditure in this respect. During my tour in the North-West, I visited Q'Appelle. Probably from three to four thousand Indians were assembled to receive their pay under Treaty No. 6. They had a regular jollification, and the paymaster had to feed them for five days before they would accept of their pay. Generally speaking, at such gatherings, the Indians have numerous imaginary complaints to make: such as provisions, tobacco, blankets or ammunition, was not as represented. All such complaints are made through an Interpreter, occupying much time. I believe there was an understanding that, from the moment the paymaster arrived at the place appointed for payment, he should feed them a day or two days, but they will not accept their pay so long as they get fed for five or six days; and after receiving their paltry pittance, they immediately purchase useless trinkets, such as brass rings, pipes, beads of little or no value, etc., from traders.

MR. MILLS: I think if the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Schultz), looks at the Returns brought down, he will see that he is not accurate in his assertion as to the cause of this large expenditure. Treaty No. 6 was not negotiated, but it was ratified, while I was Minister of the Interior. It contained a provision declaring that the Indians, during a period of great scarcity or unforeseen misfortune in famine, should have their wants supplied by the Government. I thought it very objectionable, and the Government thought so too; but they were obliged to consider whether more serious difficulties might not arise by refusing to ratify the Treaty. The Indians could not be made to understand that anything further was necessary to confirm the Treaty. They regarded it as being completed when it received the signature of Governor Morris and the signature of their Chief. That was the state of affairs; and very serious complications might have arisen if the Government had refused to ratify the Treaty, because the Indians would certainly have misconstrued such a refusal. There was the possible danger of their construing this provision of the Treaty, as a license to indulge in idleness; although subsequent events have not shown that that danger has yet arisen. The expenditure of the year, however objectionable it might be, arose partly from the actual wants of the Indians, and largely from the supplies not being forwarded soon enough to pay the Indians at the time fixed. Difficulties will occasionally arise in that country, so long as the present state of things exist. The rainy seasons will sometimes prevent the rapid forwarding of supplies, and serious expense will be incurred for feeding the Indians until they are located upon reservations. It seems this was the case during the past year. I do not see how the hon. the First Minister can account for these extraordinary expenses as being occasioned by the Indians having remained in idleness, and made extraordinary demands through a misinterpretation of this Treaty. The Returns show that this is not the case.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I did not.

MR. MILLS: I understood the right hon. gentleman to say that he agreed with the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Schultz) in what he said.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I said I agreed with much of what the hon. gentleman said.

MR. MILLS: I think, then, that the House must understand that the right hon. gentleman did not agree with the hon. member for Lisgar on this point.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I am not able to say whether the conclusions of the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Schultz) were correct or not on that point, because I have not the information to enable me to judge.

MR. SMITH (Selkirk): The provision in Treaty No. 6, referred to by the hon. member for Bothwell and the hon. member for Lisgar, is certainly a most unfortunate one, and ought never to have been agreed to by the Indian Commissioners; but once authorised by them, and the Indians believing it to be final, and equally a part of the agreement as any other portion of it, it became practically impossible for the hon. the Minister of the Interior, or the Government of which he was a member, to disallow it. The dissatisfaction, not only of the Indians included in that Treaty, but of those throughout the Territory generally, would have been so intense as to have caused far greater difficulty than that arising from allowing it to pass, bad as it was. The hon. member for Lisgar recommends, as the best mode of getting rid of the Indian difficulty, and of the necessity for supplying them with food during periods when the buffalo fail them, that they should be removed bodily further north to the district bordering on the wooded country, where, he says, they would get an ample supply of fish from the lakes. Now the hon. gentleman ought to know, that, even were it possible so to change the habits of the Indians, in a moment, as to fit them for removal for the north, the conditions of life would be entirely different from what they are in the plains. He must be aware that the plain or prairie Indians are horsemen, who never dream of walking even a mile when they can ride that distance, and have lived by the chase of the buffalo as far back as we have any knowledge of the country, while the wood Crees and other Indians living in the more northern parts, necessarily use the snowshoe, only during the winter, the country there being entirely unfit for the use of horses, and a change to a fish diet, even were it possible to obtain a sufficient quantity of this latter food, they would not willingly be brought to adopt. But we have the best means of knowing that scarcity of food is felt quite as much, or even more, in the district so highly spoken of by the hon. member, as in that at present occupied by the Indians he proposes to remove; and the only reason that this does not come so markedly before the public is, that the natives in the Athabaska and adjoining districts are, comparatively, few in number, and have the benefit of being very largely assisted by the Hudson's Bay Company. And yet, notwithstanding this, and all the aid the Hudson's Bay Company can give them, we know that many cases of death by starvation occur year after year, and this, unfortunately, has been the case during the past winter to a far greater extent than hon. members have any idea of. Starvation throughout the whole of the Saskatchewan is no new experience, as the Hudson's Bay Company, for many years back, have, from time to time, been obliged to give largely for the support of the Indians; and in that particular district of country, instead of realising a profit from their trade, they have frequently, during one year, sustained an actual loss of from $50,000 to $80,000. It is, therefore, to be hoped that the Government will not attempt to carry out the recommendation of the hon. member, as, even could the change be made, the result would not be otherwise than disastrous in the extreme. It is not desirable that the Indians should be collected in large numbers in any one place, for the purpose of being paid their annuities, as these payments can be made more conveniently and at much less expense on the several reserves, and the agents can have no difficulty in carrying this out. The question of paying these annuities in small bills of one and two dollars may, perhaps, be an improvement, as the smaller notes would be found more convenient for both Indians and traders; but when the hon. member for Lisgar says that the Indians would as readily give a four or five dollar bill as a one or two dollar note for an article of small value, he certainly does not give them due credit for that amount of shrewdness and intelligence which he and all others who have had any dealings with them know them to possess. Still the small bills are good enough in their way, and the trial will do no harm, although it will hardly have the effect of adding greatly to their means of supporting themselves.

In reply to Mr. MILLS,

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said the same policy, in reference to the subject matter of this vote, was in practice, as under the late Administration.

MR. MILLS said he understood that the Inspectorship over the Agencies had been done away with altogether, Mr. McColl being the superintendent.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said Mr. McColl was still the Inspector, besides having assumed the general superintendence. Things were otherwise kept exactly as they were under the late Administration, and would continue so until a better organisation could be put in operation.

MR. MILLS said that, under the system of the late Government, the inspector's duty was not to make any purchases, but simply to inspect or supervise what was done by the superintendents or agents, and make his Report accordingly, showing what supplies were forwarded and the condition in which they were received; and it was considered that, having nothing to do with the purchases himself, he would be in a position to exercise a proper supervision, because he would have no possible motive or interest in mitigating any mistake committed by any of the officers purchasing the supplies. Mr.

MR. SMITH.

McCull, however, who had been put in an office at Winnipeg, being in the double position of superintendent and inspector, could hardly inform the Government that he had made any mistake with reference to the supplies, as to whether they were as good as they ought to be, or according to sample, or whether they were forwarded in proper condition and in good time. Certainly the present practice was not a proper one. It did not appear possible that the superintendent at Winnipeg, who had to attend to the purchasing of supplies, would be in a position to leave the office and spend several months visiting the various agencies to report to the Government upon the condition of the various bands, the efficiency of the agents, the character of the schools and all such matters as effect the general well-being of the Indians.

195 Intercolonial Railway.....$1,400,000

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: It will not be, perhaps, inconvenient to the House and Committee if I give some general explanations with reference to the vote now proposed. I do not anticipate any very serious difficulty with this vote, as it will be seen, taking the amount asked for the Intercolonial and the Prince Edward Island Railways together—$1,586,000—that I am asking for a vote of $647,496 less than the sum expended on this service in 1878-9; and, with that reduced amount, I intend, not only to cover the same service, and on which was expended in 1878-9, $2,233,496, but also to operate 126 miles more Railway than were covered by that expenditure. Now, I may say that the question of the large amount of money that was required to be expended in the operation of the Intercolonial Railway, has attracted the attention of this House for a number of years past. We all feel that it was very unfortunate that, having invested so large a sum of public money in the Intercolonial Railway, the country should be compelled, in addition to that expenditure, to supply practically, something like an average of half a million dollars per annum to operate the road. There was no question that the construction and operation of the road had tended largely to the development of the country, and that it was a great service to trade and business. My attention had been called to that subject very strongly before the change of Administration, as will be seen by reference to the discussions that have taken place in this House; and, when called upon to discharge the duties of administering that Department, I held that it was necessary to make the most exhaustive examination possible, to see if we could maintain the efficiency of the road and rolling-stock, and at the same time largely reduce the expenses. I satisfied myself that it would be quite practicable to do that, and adopted the best means in my power to inform myself as to how far it would be possible to reduce the expenditure in connection with the operation of the Government Railways. I have the satisfaction of knowing that those efforts have been attended with very marked success. I may be asked how it is that the deficit in the operation of the Intercolonial Railway, which had been something like half a million for several years preceding, was increased during the year ending 30th June, 1879, beyond that of any former year. I may remind the House that I am not responsible for that increased expenditure to any large extent. I may remind the House that the management of the Intercolonial Railway remained practically in the same hands from 1st July of that year down to, I think, the latter part of February, 1879, and that the large increase of expenditure was for works that were undertaken previous to the change of Government, to a very large extent. I will now briefly glance at the revenue of the road which, as the House is aware, was considerably decreased during the year, 1878-79, as well as at the large increase in expenditure, which accounts for a deficit which occurred at the end of that fiscal year of about $716,000. In doing so, I will endeavour dispassionately to do justice to my predecessor, who had the management of the Department. My colleague, the then Minister of Public Works, in 1873, came to the conclusion that it was absolutely necessary, for the economical working of the Intercolonial Railway, that there should be a responsible officer, thoroughly acquainted with everything, in connection with the management and operation of the work, whose head-quarters should be in the Public Works Department. Hon. gentlemen are aware that Mr. Collingwood Schreiber was appointed, previous to the change of Government, in 1873, Chief Engineer of Government Railways in operation, for the purpose of having close and accurate surveillance from head-quarters over all expenditures, and everything connected with the management of the Intercolonial. A change of Government ensued, and, although that gentleman was retained nominally in that office, as is well known, his services were devoted mainly to the completion of the Intercolonial Railway. I do not think my hon. predecessor at all carried out the design that the former Government had of having the control and management of the Intercolonial Railway conducted from head-quarters. We satisfied ourselves then, and I am more satisfied now, that it is practically impossible to continue such a vigilant supervision for such enormous expenditures as the management of these Government Railways involve, without having the head of the Department here in immediate communication with the Chief Executive officer, in order that the Minister may be from time to time advised of everything that is taking place, and have an opportunity of giving, or withholding, his sanction to the expenditures. Well, we reverted to that system, and Mr. Schreiber was instructed to assume the management at head-quarters, and the staff was reorganised in such a way as to give us the benefit of the service of the best men we could find in the Department. I am glad to be able to say we found nearly all the men that were necessary for the management of those works in the Department as it was then constituted. Mr. Pottinger, who was appointed Chief Superintendent when the management was changed, was a gentleman who had been some eighteen years in the Intercolonial Railway service, and who had risen step by step, until, I think, he was regarded by his predecessor, Mr. Brydges, as undoubtedly the ablest man there was in the service at that time. The other officers entrusted with leading positions we found in the service of the Intercolonial, in fact I may say all those in charge of the management and direction of the Railway at its headquarters at Moncton. I will now glance at the results, and show the expenditure of that year, which has attracted, naturally, a good deal of attention. I am not at all prepared to question the judiciousness or propriety of a large amount of the increase of expenditure. It was for works which were found absolutely necessary, and they were entered upon previous to the change of Government, and it became my duty to see that they were carried to completion. The revenue for 1877-8 on the 714 miles then in operation, was $1,378,946.78. I am contrasting that with the year following, which closed on 30th June, 1879. The revenue for 1878-9 was $1,294,099.69, over the same length of road, showing a falling off in the traffic of no less than $84,847.09. Now, it would be discouraging to encounter such a decrease in the traffic of the road if we were not able satisfactorily to account for it, and to show that it arose from the natural falling off in the business of the road, and from circumstances that were exceptional at the time. It was largely due to the depression in trade and business which existed all over the country, and which culminated about that period. This depression was shown to be general. Every way station on the road indicated a falling off in the traffic, that is to say, as a general rule, the through business was not materially affected; it was largely due to the reduction in the local business. The extremely low prices to which iron fell in Great Britain caused the competition to be so keen as to close the Londonderry Iron Mines, which furnished a large volume of traffic. The blast furnace was blown out, and this had furnished a large volume of traffic in carrying coal to the Londonderry Iron Mines, and of carrying the product of those mines over the line into the Upper Provinces, but all that now ceased.

MR. MACKENZIE: When did it blow out?

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: It was blown out a year ago; I do not remember the date at this moment.

MR. MACKENZIE: It was after you had your blow out.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: After the change of Government, I suppose the hon. gentleman means. I should say that we were blown in, and the hon. gentleman was blown out. It is also well known that a large source of traffic on the Intercolonial Railway was the carriage of lumber and deals, but the low price to which deals fell in England, entirely stopped the traffic. That which was giving us a large return for the road was lost, owing to the depression in the lumber market in England. The price to which lumber had fallen, made it absolutely impossible to carry on the traffic with any success. Then the competition between the Great Western and the Grand Trunk Railways cut the freights to so low a figure as entirely to stop a large amount of the flour trade that came previously over the Intercolonial Railway, and sent it by water from American ports, cutting off a large source of supply in that direction. This deprived the road of a considerable amount of traffic which we had relied upon. It was the local passenger and freight traffic that was mainly affected. So far as the other traffic was concerned, it was not so seriously influenced, with the exception of the items to which I have referred. I am glad to be able to say that, although this depression in business and falling off in the receipts was so great as to make the monthly returns less for several months after the Rivière du Loup line was obtained, the expenditure was actually less over the 840 miles than it had been in the corresponding months of the previous year over the 714 miles. I am glad to be able to say that a marked change has taken place in the trade and business of the country and in the revenue of the road. I do not suppose that it would be easy to find any better indication of the trade of the country than the Intercolonial Railway affords. You have, at every point along the road, by the traffic returns, the evidence as to what the condition of the trade and business of the day is. During the past eight months, we have the gratifying results of an increase in that period, from the commencement of the current fiscal year, of $49,082.69, as compared with the receipts of the corresponding period of the previous year. It is quite true that there were but 714 miles in operation in 1878-79, and there are 840 miles in operation now. But as I have explained, we were receiving, up to a recent period, a smaller return over the 840 miles than we were receiving in the corresponding months of the previous year for 714 miles. We have now, I think, turned the corner, and we have a steady and gratifying increase in the traffic. The train mileage for this period was, in 1878-79, 1,763,408; and in 1879-80, 1,957,489 miles, or an increase of 194,087. The receipts per train mile, for these eight months, in 1878-79, were 50.04c.; in 1879-80, they were 48.45c. The volume of traffic has largely increased during the current year, and the cause, as I have stated, is the improvement in trade, and the alteration in the Tariff to meet the exigencies of the trade. Now I come to the question of the operating expenses of the road, and there I shall be able to say that the efforts which have been made to practice the most stringent economy in connection with this work, have been eminently successful. The working expenses for 1877-78, for the 714 miles, were $1,811,273.56; the working expenses for 1878-79 were $2,010,183.22, or an increase of $198,909.66 for the year ending 30th June, 1879, over the year ending 30th June, 1878. That would be a startling exhibit if it could not be satisfactorily accounted for. I think it can be. I am throwing no blame upon my hon. predecessor in connection with the large increase during the year 1878-79. I merely drew attention to the fact, and I will show the House that the causes which mainly led to that increase, and for which I was not responsible, were owing to the management of the late Government, who were responsible for them. This increase in the cost of working the Railway was chiefly for work commenced in the early part of the year, namely:—

MR. ANGLIN: What is the object of giving these figures?

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: I am showing what largely contributes to the excess of expenditure of 1878-79 over that of the previous year. The figures are: additional ballasting, $2,841; additional sidings, $9,949; additional buildings, $27,614; renewals, repairs to bridges, culverts, etc., $38,195; renewals on turn-tables, $4,078; improved water supply, $18,808; renewal of sleepers, $18,381; gas and water at Moncton, $11,504;—making in all $131,372. These works were necessary to put the road in a proper and efficient condition, with the exception of the cost of the gas and water service at Moncton, which could have been dispensed with. There was no necessity for that; it was no doubt adopted by the late Government under the impression, and with the belief, that it was in the interest of the service in that connection. I hold the late Government responsible for the increased expenditure over the previous year. There is a very considerable expenditure that I was obliged to incur in consequence of the change of the law during the last Session. It will be remembered that there was an Act introduced which provided for the raising of overhead bridges, so as to prevent persons—brakesmen, conductors, and others—going on the top of cars, from being killed or injured by coming in contact with such bridges in passing under them. The Act originally provided only for the raising of such structures as were in a dilapidated condition, or in a bad state of repair; but it was amended in the Senate so as to absolutely require that all structures, whether requiring repairs or not, should be changed as indicated. We were, therefore, as my hon. predecessor knows, obliged to raise these overhead bridges at a considerable cost. These overhead bridges and the snowsheds also contributed towards this over-expenditure, involved in complying with that Act, for which I am not holding the late Government responsible. The rest of the expenditure incurred as stated—the locomotive and car expenses, $58,180—in excess of the previous year, was mainly due to the wages of a large number of workmen, previously charged to Capital Account, being charged to ordinary working expenses. The investigation, as I have stated, into the whole of this matter, led me to the conclusion that it would be possible, without impairing the efficiency of the road, to introduce reforms and economies that would bring about a more satisfactory state of things in reference to the great excess of expenditure over income; and in pursuance of that conclusion, I endeavoured to obtain the best information I could, as to how far that idea could be carried out, so as, while properly preserving and keeping unimpaired the permanent way and rolling-stock, to accomplish a large reduction in the expenditure. I need not ask the House to imagine a more unpleasant duty than setting about the reduction of expenditure. It is a very easy matter to appoint parties to office, and pay them liberal salaries, and it is extremely popular thus to dispense the public money in a manner agreeable to the recipients, but I know how very different is the duty of dispensing with public officers, many of them deserving men, discharging faithfully the duties of their office, and I know how very different is the duty of reducing the salaries of other such men remaining in the service. Still I felt bound, in the interest of the country, to ascertain whether it was possible to relieve the Treasury from the large amount of expenditure required over and above the receipts of the road; and availing myself of every possible source of information, I satisfied myself that large economies could be effected. I therefore set about effecting these economies, not, as I can sincerely assure the House, in a partisan spirit—for I could produce voluminous correspondence to prove that I have been assailed for showing too little regard to the claims of friends of the Government—but without favour or affection, without reference to the political views or opinions of the parties affected. Many officers, supporters of or holding the political views of hon. gentlemen opposite, were retained, while, on the other hand, the services of gentlemen who supported the Government have been dispensed with, and in a great many instances the salaries of men who were strong supporters of the present Administration, were largely reduced. I am glad to be able to say that in the main, these reductions of salaries have been met in the most cheerful spirit that could possibly be anticipated by the parties affected; and I assure the House that no more agreeable duty will I ever be called upon to perform, than to restore these discharged officers to their positions, and to restore those who have been reduced, to the positions and salaries they occupied and received before, so soon as the result of the operation of the road will enable us to do it, without imposing additional taxation on the country for the purpose. When the result is obtained, with the cooperation and efforts of those officers, who, with reduced salaries, are devoting themselves to the public service, and assisting in effecting these economies, who are faithfully discharging their duties upon reduced salaries, so as to enable the Government to balance revenue with expenditure, it will not only be a pleasure, but a duty incumbent upon me to deal in a most liberal spirit with the parties thus entitling themselves to the consideration of the Government. I may say in connection with this, that although this subject was taken up at a very early period, it was late in the season before any great advance could be made, or before these economies could be brought into operation; but hon. gentlemen will find, by reference to the figures of the current year, that the revenue has already gone very far towards restoring the balance between the revenue and the expenditure of the road. The House is aware that, in addition to the Intercolonial Railway as it stood before, we have, under the authority of Parliament, purchased from the Grand Trunk Railway Company the Rivière du Loup branch, 126 miles of road, extending our road from Rivière du Loup, where it formerly terminated, to Point Levis; and this branch was in a very dilapidated condition. In the winter season it is exceedingly rough, and I may say that, in reference to some charges and complaints which have been made, they have arisen from the difficulties experienced in the operation of this portion of the road. We have laid down seventeen miles of steel rails upon it from the time we purchased it, and on the rest of the track the old iron rails still remain. I need not tell the House that for many years, since 1872, no such difficulty has been encountered in connection with the road in the winter season as during the past winter. Not only have there been storms of a severe character, far exceeding anything encountered for years back, but intense cold succeeding warm weather, and vice versa, has very seriously affected the wheels, and, in fact, the whole of the rolling-stock. Not only have we had stormy weather, and remarkable changes of temperature, but we have had 126 miles more road to run, and we have not been able to obtain the rolling-stock to run it. We have had some half dozen engines from the Grand Trunk Railway, but they were continually breaking down and giving trouble. It was a very noticeable circumstance that while on the rest of the road the rolling-stock remained in good order, that which went over the Rivière du Loup branch was continually coming to grief, and with a great deal of it we have had much difficulty, many broken wheels, and so on.

MR. ANGLIN: Was it all on that section?

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: Not altogether on that section; but there was this noticeable fact, that there was scarcely a wheel that broke which had not been over that section. There was a difficulty in obtaining the rolling-stock at the time we wanted it. The most timely provision was made that we could make; but the parties contracting being behind time, the Grand Trunk having taken their engines, and the necessity of sending four locomotives from the Intercolonial Railway for the traffic of the Pembina branch of the Canadian Pacific Railway, when it became necessary to assume that portion of the road, placed us in very considerable difficulty in operating this increased road with decreased rolling-stock.

MR. ANGLIN: Will the hon. gentleman say when the contracts were let for the additional rolling-stock?

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: The moment the Rivière de Loup Section was obtained, the Department set about preparing the plans, specifications and drawings necessary for the locomotives, in order to obtain them of a uniform character, and a considerable time was spent in that way. We were extremely anxious to have all the locomotives of a uniform construction, so that if any particular part gave way it could be readily replaced.

MR. ANGLIN: And that is how the delay was caused.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: I am now speaking of the delay incidental to making the contracts. We asked for them at the earliest moment after we could obtain the plans and specifications, so as to have various items of rolling-stock that was uniformly constructed, in order that the parts might be interchangeable, and, in case of any giving away, repairs might be more easily effected. Although placed under contract at as early a date as possible, considerable delay has occurred, and is occurring now. It is impossible for me to carry all the dates in my mind, but I can show the hon. gentleman, by figures, that the delay has occurred owing to the failure on the part of the contractor to supply the rolling-stock at the time required by their contracts. It is only fair that I should show the House the difficulty we have encountered, so as not to have this delay appear as a shortcoming on the part of the management of the road. The hon. member for Gloucester asked for a return of the number of locomotives and cars in the shops. Of course, the question was a very pertinent one, but while the number of locomotives under repair will compare very favourably with that of previous years, there was a larger number of cars undergoing repairs in the shops. The hon. gentleman will see at once that it is reasonable, with 126 miles more road and an increased train mileage, that there should be a larger number of locomotives and cars undergoing repairs than when they were performing a smaller amount of train mileage. I am glad to be able to show hon. gentlemen, in relation to this, that the operating expenses for 714 miles of road in 1878-79 were $1,386,999.04. With this I am going to compare eight months of the present year, and I deduct $168,396.03 for renewals from that amount, a charge not required to be made in the corresponding months this year. Deducting that sum, we have $1,218,602.97 as the cost for operating 714 miles of road for eight months, from 1st July, 1878, and the operating expenses of the eight months of 1879-80, since 1st July, 1879, amounted to only $1,026,358.55 or $192,244.42 less, showing a great reduction. The operating expenses per train mile for the above eight months of 1878-79 were 69.10c., and those for 1879-80, 52.43c., showing a very marked and gratifying reduction on the whole expenditure.

MR. MACKENZIE: Is that calculating the whole expenditure?

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: Yes. Everything has been done to maintain the rolling-stock in the greatest possible condition of efficiency, subject, of course, as I have already stated, to the great strain which the hon. gentleman will admit has to be taken into consideration in the calculation of the larger amount of work the rolling-stock is called upon to perform. I have availed myself of every possible source of information to satisfy myself that the economy I have exercised has not affected the efficiency of the road, or the condition of the rolling-stock, or the high standard of efficiency in which I frankly admit I found the roadway when it became my duty to administer the Department. The working expenses of the road in 1877-78, during the eight months corresponding with the period I previously referred to, were $1,189,678.13; the receipts for that period were $920,285.88, showing a deficiency of $269,392.75. In 1878-79 the working expenses for the corresponding period were $1,386,999.01, and the receipts $890,395.21, showing a deficiency in the eight months of $496,603.78; while for the same period in 1879-80, the working expenses were $1,026,358.55, and the receipts, $939,478., or a deficiency of only $86,880.55. I desire now to call the attention of the Committee, although the vote is not before the House, to the adoption of a similar policy in Prince Edward Island. Hon. gentlemen know that, with reference to the Prince Edward Island Railway, we have the same difficulty of an enormous deficit every year. In 1877-78, the revenue from that road was $135,899.60; in 1878-79 the revenue was $125,855.91, showing a falling off in the traffic of $10,043.69. This falling off was due, to a considerable extent, to the same causes which affected the Intercolonial Railway. The operating expenses were slightly increased. The working expenses for 1877-78 were $221,599.49; for 1878-79, $223,313.12, or an increase of $1,713.63, making a total deficit of $97,457.21. Hon. gentlemen, I think, will see that it became essentially necessary to make an effort at all events to reduce that annual deficit, and I am happy to say that the adoption of the principle of cutting down salaries to the lowest amount possible, compatible with proper performance of the services required, and dispensing with every office that could possibly be dispensed with without impairing the efficiency of the road, has had the result of effecting a very marked economy in the operation. I may draw attention to the fact that the renewal of sleepers exceeded by some 31,000 the number of the previous year, which will partially account for the increase in the operating expenses. A comparative statement of the operating expenses for the nine months ending 31st March, 1879-80 with former years, will also give a gratifying evidence of what has been effected by these economies in regard to the Prince Edward Island Railway. The working expenses for the nine months ending March 31, 1879, amounted to $176,393.21, while the working expenses for the same period of this year was only $120,740.58, or a reduction of expenditure of $55,652.63. The working expenses per mile for the nine months of 1877-78 were $85.49; for the same period 1878-79 they were $79.96, and for the corresponding nine months of 1879-80 they were only $53.65. I have the assurance of all the parties who are responsible to me for the maintenance of the road, that everything is being maintained in a thorough state of efficiency, and that the present condition of both the roadway and the rolling-stock will compare favourably with that at any previous period. The receipts for the nine months ending March 31st, 1879, were $96,561.97, while for the same period down to 31st March last, they were $84,252.71, or a decrease of $12,309.26. Hon. gentleman will, therefore, see the indispensable necessity of reducing the expenses of the operation of the road. I believe that for years no such difficulties have been encountered in the operation of the road, as during the present winter, owing to the severity of the storms, and, of course, that could not occur without great interruption to the business of the road. The result of my efforts, in the direction of economy, I think, are gratifying. The figures I have submitted to the House speak for themselves, and all I can say to the Committee now is, that I have exhausted every means in my power to satisfy myself that neither the condition of the road nor of the rolling-stock has suffered. Assuming that to be the case, the Government, I think, may feel greatly gratified at being able to present to the House the state of things exhibited in this vote—asking for the operation of 126 miles more road, with $647,496 less than was expended in 1878-9. I am very sanguine that, with the increased trade and business of the country, of which we have the most gratifying evidence in every direction, and all along the Intercolonial, we shall see the most profitable results from this road. While asking for a considerable amount for this service, I believe that, after the present year, we may fairly hope, with the experience of the past year, that we shall reduce the deficit on the Intercolonial and Prince Edward Island Railways to a comparatively insignificant sum. I believe we may confidently anticipate that in a year the country will be entirely relieved from any charge over and above the amount of money received from the operation of the roads. After the most careful study of the matter, I feel warranted in stating my belief that the period of any material deficits, or of any deficits at all, is at an end. I am quite satisfied that the hon. gentlemen opposite will feel that, instead of deserving any censure, the Government are entitled to the fullest consideration for their efforts in regard to those Railways. If the apprehensions of hon. gentlemen opposite are well founded, and any reductions in expense are made at the cost of maintaining this Railway stock, or the road itself in thorough efficiency, instead of deserving credit, we should deserve only censure. Those economies were entered upon with the full knowledge that no more mistaken policy could be adopted than one that would expose the Government and Department to condemnation on this vital point. I have done all that was possible to assure myself that we were running no such risk, and to satisfy myself that I am safe in saying that in the coming year the receipts from those Railways will nearly, if not actually, balance the expenditure upon them.

MR. ANGLIN: Will the hon. gentleman give us a statement of the car mileage?

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: I shall get that statement in a few minutes.

MR. MACKENZIE: If the hon. the Minister of Railways has succeeded in saving as much money as he claims to have saved, of course we shall give him every credit. Nothing would give me more gratification than to be able to give him abundant credit in that respect. But I must say, that the statement he has presented is exceedingly fallacious. In the first place, I have knowledge of the state of the stock. He assures us that the Railway stock is as good as when he received it at our hands. He admits the road was handed over to him in the most admirable order, including Railway stock and all appointments.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: Hear, hear.

MR. MACKENZIE: During the entire period in which I administered the affairs of the Public Works Department, we never got the road up to proper condition till our last year of office. He claims credit for saving a great deal where there was no saving at all. The stores published in 1878-9 amounted to $415,985. I give him credit, for the whole of that year, as purchasing the stores. We had three and a-half months of it, no doubt, but still the hon. gentleman must be responsible for whatever was purchased outside those three and a-half months. We purchased for $485,859, there being a decrease in the purchase of $69,063. Then we had stock in hand, in 1878-9 $345,452. The hon. gentleman had stock in hand at the end of the year of $243,758, or $110,643 less. This accounts for over $170,000 of the amount he claims to have saved.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: Not a dollar of it. In the operation of the Intercolonial Railway, you charge it with every dollar's worth of stores in use. That is a mere matter of account. It does not touch the question of the operation or expenses of the road.

MR. MACKENZIE: The hon. gentleman will not escape me in that way. He sold a great deal of those stores, and put the proceeds to Revenue Account.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: Not a dollar. Every dollar from the sale of stores goes into the Consolidated Revenue Fund; not a dollar is used for the road.

MR. MACKENZIE: The amount of stores on hand must be accounted for, and there is no way of accounting for that deficiency but this—that the hon. gentleman did not buy as much as we bought, and has left less on hand than we left. Of course it had all to be charged. Then, during that year, no less than $105,000 was charged to Revenue which was really expended, practically, on Capital Account, for buildings and various other objects. Then there is a sum of $210,674 for permanent renewals, which the hon. gentleman gave as $168,309; he has thus to account for the difference of $42,278.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: I gave the hon. gentleman the $168,000 as the total amount for renewals charged against the eight months mentioned. I was comparing the total charges, and gave every dollar.

MR. MACKENZIE: The hon. gentleman will observe in his own report that the sum is stated at $136,000, in addition to which $42,378 was expended in the first half of this year, making the total of $210,674, expended, too, from revenue. The number of workmen we left in the various workshops, employed wholly in building new, or repairing old stock, was 589. The hon. the Minister of Railways has reduced the number by 127. The reduction in wages I am not able to compute. All this was to be deducted from the active, recuperative power of the road. Those men were employed in keeping up the stock. Despite the hon. gentleman's assurances, from the newspaper and other accounts, I am convinced that the stock, and particularly the engines, are reduced very materially in comparison to its condition when the present Government entered office. I see frequent accounts of accidents in consequence of the deficient power of the engines, and this must be so. I saw in a return that while there was a considerable addition to train mileage, there was an actual deficiency in car mileage. This proves that each engine was able to take a less number of cars that year than formerly, meaning decreased power and efficiency of the road. Then there is a remarkable fact about the passenger traffic—that, although there was a larger number carried by 21,144, there was an absolute decrease of over $23,000 in the amount received. The freight traffic also shows a decrease of 11,849 tons. The stock on hand of stores of various kinds, at the close of 1878-9, was $243,758. Now, in order to give the hon. gentleman an idea of what this means, I may tell him that the stores on hand, when I took charge of the Public Works Department, of the Railway, for the 334 miles, was $350,255. Then, Sir, for this last year, the report for which we have now before us, the gross receipts were $1,294,000, about $80,000 less than the previous year, while for a considerable portion of the time there was a larger mileage; but the working expenses are put at $2,110,356, showing an increase of some $209,000 over the previous year in working expenses, and for this year, or at least nine months of it, the hon. gentleman was accountable. He has given us to-night a statement of the various works for which we are responsible. I admit that we are responsible for some of them, but for others I do not admit the responsibility. No doubt we are responsible for taking the gas and water into Moncton, though the works were not completed when we left office. I was very much surprised, when the proposition was made to me in the first instance, to get the water in common with the people of Moncton, from the local waterworks. My reply was, that we had waterworks already arranged of our own; but Mr. Brydges, to my surprise, reported that, as the country was being cleared round, he had no doubt the source of supply would soon fail, and as it was impossible, with the great shops and the charging of engines and that sort of thing at Moncton, to run the risk of a loss of water. I entered reluctantly into the engagement with the waterworks company to bring the water into the yard. I am surprised to hear that this was not necessary. I would like to know from the hon. Minister if he has that upon authority from his engineers? If he has a report from his engineers to say that there is no necessity for a supply of water at Moncton?

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: I did not say that, I think.

MR. MACKENZIE: He said we entered upon that without the slightest necessity.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: No; I said it was the only thing which did not appear to be absolutely necessary, and the report of the engineer went to show that the expenditure for gas and water might have been dispensed with, as we had independent arrangements for the supply of water. It was a new thing for me to hear that there was any danger. The hon. gentleman's own Government went to a great expense to supply water to the shops, and I thought before bringing it two miles they understood what they were doing.

MR. MACKENZIE: We took the best means to get it where we could; but when it was reported to me that the water supply would fail, I made the best arrangements I could, submitting the matter afterwards to Parliament, as the hon. gentleman will remember. As to the gas, I have always held that in great workshops, gas is safer than oil, and it was to ensure greater safety, and at no greater expense, except preliminary expenditure, that this arrangement was entered into. My colleague (Sir Albert J. Smith) reminds me that we are not bound to use the gas unless we choose. My impression is the price is not larger than $3, but we are not to pay any more than the citizens do.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: Yes, there is a contract.

MR. MACKENZIE: That was my impression. As to the saving the hon. gentleman claims to have effected, in regard to the workmen of the line, the employes proper, I can only say that I cannot conceive how it is possible that the former chief manager, Mr. Brydges, would have employed more men than were necessary. With an experienced railway manager like Mr. Brydges, I never supposed it necessary to inculcate the necessity of not employing more men than were necessary, and I cannot conceive how it was possible to do it if it was done. I can understand how it is possible to dispense with men for a year or two while the road is running down; but it is necessary to keep up a proper supply of manual labour. As to reduction of wages, my idea was that our men should have, at least, as good wages as were paid by any corporation in the country; and it was a universal complaint to myself, from men all over the line, that they were not obtaining such wages as were paid by private parties. I think the wages ranged from 80c. to $1 for labourers, and I would ask what they are now getting?

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: I am glad the hon. gentleman has asked that question, because, while I have largely reduced the salaries of office-holders with large salaries, the labourers have never been reduced. The amount paid by the hon. gentleman was $1 or $1.10, and that they are getting now. With the exception of a few parties, who have been reduced from $1.20 to $1.10, the labourers have not been reduced at all.

MR. MACKENZIE: The mechanics have been reduced.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: Yes. In round numbers I have dispensed with the services of 400 men. I am operating the road to-day, and have been for the last eight months, with 400 men less than it was operated by the hon. gentleman, and I am paying over $200,000 less for wages and salaries.

MR. MACKENZIE: How much were the wages reduced?

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: It de-

pended altogether on the position the men occupied.

MR. MACKENZIE: Iron finishers and carpenters.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: No reduction at all in them.

MR. MACKENZIE: Then there was no reduction whatever in the mechanics.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: I said I had saved in salaries and wages over $200,000 a year.

MR. MACKENZIE: The hon. gentleman said he had reduced the mechanics.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: If I said so, I am now informed that it is not the case, but that they receive the same wages as before.

MR. MACKENZIE: Of course there were 125 less in the shops alone, according to this return, at the beginning of the year, and that is accounted for by doing less work, or only work that is absolutely necessary for the maintenance of the road. The sum and substance of the saving then is, that the hon. gentleman has allowed the stores to run down; he has purchased less and left less; then he has employed less men in building up the stock of the road; the ballasting that was going on before has ceased, comparatively little has been done of repairs of that sort, and the road is not in anything like as good a condition as when I left office. This will show itself in good time, and I venture the prophecy that unless the road is taken better care of, when we come next to discuss it there will be a different tale to tell. I am willing, however, to do the hon. gentleman ample justice in his efforts at economy, and I have no doubt he has, in many instances, effected a judicious saving. I am willing to give him credit for all he claims as to intentions and motives, but I am disputing the manner in which he is endeavouring to take credit for what he is not entitled to credit. With regard to the Island Railway, the position of the road is this:

Year.	Income.	Working Expenses.
1877	130,664	210,329
1878	135,899	221,599
1879	125,815	223,313

This last year was much the worst. The hon. gentleman had no special works on hand, that we left him, so that he is entirely responsible for this heavy expenditure, heavier than the year previous.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: I gave the hon. gentleman a statement of the works that were being carried out, and which had involved that increased expenditure.

MR. MACKENZIE: On Prince Edward Island?

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: Yes building the wharves, and a variety of things.

MR. MACKENZIE: My recollection of the filling in of the wharf was that it was nearly done. But I may say that for two years previous to that, we had a large expenditure in connection with the road-bed itself all the way. It was, perhaps, the worst built road ever seen in America. We had the Island Government to blame for that. They made the contract in a very loose way, and when Mr. Swinyard was sent by the late Administration to report upon the condition of the road, he reported upon its actual condition. The Island Government, however, claimed that the modifications made in the contract were made at their own instance, and that the contractors were to be held responsible for that, as it was done after Confederation took place, so that we really had nothing to do in the matter except to see whether the road was equal to the bargain as it existed at the time the Island entered into the Confederation. I presume that legal position could not be disputed. Therefore, we were obliged to send Frank Shanly to decide upon that ground whether the road was finished according to the modifications entered into by the Island Government, prior to their entering the Confederation. He made his report, and the substance of it all will remember. He did not, however, dispute the facts mentioned in Mr. Swinyard's report. We had the famous iron fencing, for instance, which was carried all over the Island by the cows and sheep who ventured to cross the track. We had a great deal of that to replace. We had a great deal of surveying to do in order to reach, if possible, some conclusion as to the character of the curves in different parts of the road. We had to lay rails afresh all the way from Charlottetown, to the junction. We had to do an immense amount of work, which properly belonged to capital, but was included in the working expenses. It was the intention of the Government to straighten the road somewhat in various places, as large curves were made where they seemed wholly unnecessary, and steep gradients were presented where a little work would have obviated them. All these expenses fell upon us in administering the road. We had, then, to bring up the Island road from the state of utter inefficiency in which we found it, to a state of efficiency; and we had to bring up the roads on the mainland from a state of inefficiency and demoralisation into a state that the hon. gentleman admitted to-night was in a state of complete repair when they were delivered over to him. It would be an easy matter, if I were to go over all the figures, to demonstrate that, and it would be an easy matter to demonstrate that the supplies purchased during my Administration, were purchased more advantageously than they were before. It would be an easy matter to contrast the price of iron, steel, paint, wood, and almost everything that was required, and show that they cost less under our Administration. I will not trouble the Committee with a comparative statement, although I have it in under my hand. I will content myself with saying that, during our Administration, we endeavoured to keep the road in the highest state of efficiency. We also paid the men properly for attending to it. If the hon. gentleman found that some of these men were paid too high, and if he had succeeded in effecting a saving, and at the same time administering the affairs of the road as well as with the other officials and the higher salaries, I can only say that I shall be much gratified; and if he can maintain the efficiency of the road at a so much less expenditure than he now thinks was necessary before, I shall be the very first to give him credit.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: I am surprised the hon. gentleman should so soon have forgotten matters with which so recently he was familiar. But it shows how difficult it is for a person to keep in mind a knowledge of things when he has ceased to be directly engaged in their management. The statement of the hon. gentleman that I had failed to take into account the balance between the amount of stores purchased and those on hand is entirely fallacious, for the reason that it is a mere matter of account. It does not enter into the operating expenses of the road at all. Stores account is charged with everything that is purchased, it is credited with everything that is sold. But the road is charged merely with that which is taken from the stores for the operation of the road for the year, so that you can buy $100,000 worth more in a year of stores, or use that much less, without touching the question of account at all. It has no relation whatever to the subject we are now discussing. Then the hon. gentleman stated to the Committee that we had sold a large quantity of stores which we used in fact in maintaining the road. In that again the hon. gentleman was mistaken, for not one dollar of money received for the sale of stores has gone into the service of the road, but has gone into the Consolidated Revenue, just as every dollar of money received for freight or passengers is not used by the Department, but goes into the Consolidated Revenue from which is drawn all the money expended on the road. In those two important particulars in which the hon. gentleman undertook to correct the figures I laid before the House, he is under an entire misapprehension. Then the hon. gentleman said that because I had dispensed with 127 men, formerly employed in the shops, much less work was being done. Why, the hon. gentleman ought to know that he had a large staff of men employed not charged against the operation of the road at all; that he had a large staff employed in constructing cars and rolling-stock, which he did not charge to the expenses of the road, but to Capital Account. The work having been done and the account having been closed, of course these parties should be discharged. I found this great body of men being paid the public money without any necessity, when their services were not required, when there was no work for them to do, when there never had been work in connection with the operation of the road that required their services. As I said before, I have been able to dispense with over 400 men, and have been paying for the last eight months, or at the rate of over $200,000 per annum, less in salaries and wages than the hon. gentleman was, paying when the change of Government took place, for the same service. Then the hon. gentleman is equally unfortunate in his statement that there has been a decrease in the car mileage. I have in my hands a statement for eight months in each year, as follows:—

1877-78	14,713,757

The hon. gentleman said the increased cost was without any necessity, that the road was in splendid condition. The hon. gentleman must remember that this increased cost on the Intercolonial for the year closing on the 30th June last, was an expenditure for which he and his manager were largely responsible, and I gave him credit for the service for which the increase was made. The hon. gentleman can say himself whether it was necessary or not, but in any case he was responsible for it. On the Prince Edward Island Railway there was an increased expenditure during the same year of $2,910.62 for sleepers, and for general wharf repairs and increased accommodation at Summerside, $7,378. The increased cost in the repairs to the bridges, fences, etc., and which were all executed in the season of 1878, amounted to $8,106.54. I have no doubt that expenditure was all required, but it was an expenditure for which the hon. gentleman and not myself was responsible.

MR. MACKENZIE: I do not know where the hon. gentleman got possession of the figures he gave when he said there was an increase in the engine mileage instead of a decrease. I find in his own report that the car mileage in 1877-78 was 2,499,080; in 1878-79, 2,531,791, or an increase of 32,070; while the car mileage in 1877-78 was 22,164,816 against 21,855,441 the succeeding year, or a decrease of car mileage to the extent of 309,375.

MR. BRECKEN: It was not my intention, Mr. Chairman, to have troubled the Committee with any remarks were it not for what has fallen from the hon. member for Lambton. The hon. member has been pleased to characterise the Prince Edward Island as one of the worst and most wretchedly constructed Railways in the Dominion. I happened to be a member of the Government at the time the contract was entered into. Before the Railway was completed it subverted more Governments than did the Great Pacific Railway. I would remind the hon. member that the Prince Edward Island Railway was built at a cost of $14,500 a mile, exclusive of land damages, so that you could not expect a very first-class road for that price. I will also remind the hon. member that, at the instance of his political friends on the Island, he sent down Mr. Swinyard, who was not an engineer, to report upon the character of the road. While I have every respect for Mr. Swinyard, I cannot say that I have much for his report; it was considered so unsatisfactory to the public, although it condemned the road to a certain extent, that Mr. Laird and his friends, although gloating over the report, found themselves compelled to send to New York for two engineers, gentlemen as eminent in their profession as any that could be found in Canada. Mr. Swinyard's report had to be abandoned. The New York engineers were Messrs. Newton and Maher, perfect strangers to the party politics of the Island, and eminently qualified to form an opinion, and after having carefully inspected the road, reported that the work was faithfully performed, and was as good as could be expected for the money. Mr. Frank Shanly was next sent down by the hon. member for Lambton, hoping that some fault might be found with the work. This gentleman also reported favourably of the work. I have neither the reports of Messrs. Newton and Maher or of Mr. Frank Shanly at hand. I did not know that this discussion would come up, but I remember the purport of them, and I tell the hon. member that there is not a word in these two last mentioned reports that warrant him in using the condemnatory language he has concerning that work. The hon. member has alluded, in very sneering language, to the sharp curves and steep grades. I ask the hon. member if, during the five years that he led the Government and filled the position of Minister of Public Works and Railways, he ever attempted to reduce those curves and grades. What he has uttered now he knew then. If he is sincere, and believed that this Railway was all that he has just now represented it, and did not stir to remove those great evils—I repeat it, that if he knew and believed what he has just stated, he was recreant to the trust which the people and the peoples' representatives reposed in him. He did nothing, because I believe he knew well that nothing was required to be done. With regard to the wire fence, which my hon. friend has alluded to, the contract stipulated for a batten fence. A proposition was made to substitute a wire fence instead. Information with respect to wire fences, as used in Australia on their extensive pastures, was found in the Toronto Globe. I was Attorney-General and a member of the Island Government at the time, and I remember well that at the time I was delighted at the change. A batten fence in winter is apt to collect the snow on the track. We had then no experience of wire fences, nor do I think there was much then in the Dominion of Canada. The fence was a mistake; the wire was too light. The hon. member says that the pigs and sheep made short work of the fence; that they broke and tangled it. I have got an announcement to make which will rather astonish this House, but it is as true as it is startling, and it is this: that wherever the wire fence passed through the farms of our Grit opponents there it was much more broken and tangled than those portions of it which passed over the farms of Conservatives. The animals that did the most damage to the wire fence were not quadrupeds such as horses, cows, sheep and pigs, but bitter and mischievous bipeds known as Grits. The members of the Government made nothing out of the alteration, it was taken up in good faith, but the mistake was the wire was too light.

MR. LONGLEY: I desire to call the attention of the Committee to the claim of Mr. Wassall, a civil engineer of good reputation, who claims compensation from the Government for alleged use of his bridge patent. I fear I shall have no other opportunity of presenting Mr. Wassell's claim, and therefore, I will ask the permission of the Committee, to read a few extracts from somewhat voluminous papers which have been placed in my hands bearing upon this claim. I shall then ask to have the whole correspondence referred to some impartial tribunal for adjudication, if I can secure the assent of the hon. the Minister of Railways and Canals to the proposal. Here are a few lines, underneath which I find the initials, "C. S.," which, I presume, represent the name of the Engineer-in-Chief of the Intercolonial Railway:—

"We have built several bridges of old rails, both on the Intercolonial Railway and Prince Edward Island Railway, but whether they are covered by the Wassal patent or not I do not know.

(Signed) "C. S."

"26th March, 1879.

This is what Mr. Wassall himself states:—

"In the first case, the chords, posts and braces are made of rails, in the same manner as described and illustrated by specifications and drawings of Patent No. 4,379; and in the second case, the piers or pile posts, and castings are exactly similar and of the same description as those illustrated and described in Patent No. 7,636.

"It requires but a glance at the structures on the Intercolonial Railway to see that whoever designed them must have copied my patent, as the bridges erected are marked specimens of efficient and strong structures—every part of them indicating a full knowledge of minutiae, which could not have been possessed by any one without actual experiments on the strength of rails for bridge-work, or a full knowledge of my experiments, which were made several years ago, and published for the information of the public, in 1875. Mr. C. J. Bridges is fully aware that these bridges were erected according to my patents; as I called his attention to the matter at the time of their erection."

It would seem that the attention of the Engineer-in-Chief of the Intercolonial Railway was again called to this subject, and reported as follows:—

"None of the designs adopted on the Government Railways for bridges constructed of old rails have any resemblance to the plans attached to the patent specifications; and I do not consider that Government Railway bridges are in any way covered by his patent.

"July 7th, 1879."

In view of the uncertainty connected with this matter, I would enquire of the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals, if he would consent to have the papers submitted to some disinterested tribunal for settlement? and if so, I think that would be, perhaps, the best way of settling the dispute. It seems to me that whoever is appointed to adjudicate upon this matter should have engineering skill. The plans and specifications should be closely examined and compared with the plans upon which the bridges referred to have been constructed. I trust that an early and satisfactory conclusion will be reached in the premises.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: Mr. Wassall's claim for payment for the use of his patent was referred by me to the Department, and the representations which I received from the Department satisfied me that not only had there been no invasion of his patent, but that the invention, so far as we had used it, was the invention of Mr. Archibald, an engineer in the service of the Government. Therefore, I was obliged to refuse to make any payment, but I would have no objection to take the usual course in such cases, namely, to send an official arbitrator to take testimony and report to the Government.

MR. MACKENZIE: If you deny altogether having used the patent I do not see what there is to refer to the arbitrator.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: As I understand the matter, both these gentlemen claim to be the original patentees or inventors, but Mr. Archibald, who was in the employment of the Railway Department, under Mr. McRae, is the one entitled.

MR. KILLAM: That gentleman (Mr. P. S. Archibald) is well-known to me; but what I have to say is, that I think Mr. Wassall has clearly established his claim. He has shown the invention to be of practical value, by putting it into use on the Intercolonial Railway.

MR. LONGLEY: I do not wish to discuss the matter. I think I have the assurance of the Government that the matter will be submitted to an impartial tribunal. If that is so I shall be satisfied.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: Testimony shall be taken and a report obtained, and the Government, if satisfied that there is a valid claim, will take it into consideration.

MR. ANGLIN: To go back to something of more public importance we should discuss two very important questions raised by the hon. the Minister of Railways. I think he has scarcely shown that he has not been guilty of great extravagance except in the amount of salaries paid to some officials, and in the number of men employed in the workshops and on the railway track. He claims that he has effected a considerable saving in the working of the Railway; but I am not prepared to say that he has satisfied all of us as to his assertions in that respect being well founded. In comparing his own expenditure for the last eight months with the expenditure of the previous eight months, he deals entirely with the management under his own control. It is exceedingly difficult to follow a mass of figures read off as the hon. gentleman read them off, and immediately, by some sudden operation of the mind, to test thoroughly the value of figures and calculations of that kind; they require time for consideration and digestion. There are but a few of his statements that struck me as being such as could be replied to immediately. It was strange that the hon. gentleman did not in his first statement compare the car mileage. His own report, as the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie) pointed out, shows that in the year ending 30th June, while the locomotive mileage had increased there was a diminution in car mileage. He asserts that during the eight months there has been a considerable increase of locomotive mileage. This, then, if it does not include the mileage on the Rivière du Loup extension, should indicate a large increase in the revenues of the road; but we do not know that during this eight months there was any increase of the revenue.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: Allow me to correct the hon. gentleman. He complains of the report; the report does not touch the question. There is no comparison of the car mileage of the eight months of this year.

MR. ANGLIN: I point out that for the year ending 30th June there was an increase of locomotive and a decrease of car mileage.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: That does not touch the question.

MR. ANGLIN: It does; for we were naturally led from this to infer that there was some reason why the car mileage did not correspond with the train mileage; and from what was said of the condition of the rolling stock and of the road, we were led to infer that the trains and locomotives were no longer in the condition in which they ought to be, and that, consequently, it has been found necessary to diminish the number of cars, making up each train as has been alleged.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: What possible connection has a comparison between 1877-78 and 1878-79, and 1879-80. They are two different and distinct things. I was comparing the car mileage of the present year with the eight months of the previous year. To go back to two previous years can have nothing to do with the question.

MR. ANGLIN: Until the hon. gentleman made his statement we knew nothing of the facts he then stated; and we had no other Report than that for the year ending 30th June, informing us how the road has been managed. Rather a confused impression has been left on the minds of those who listened to the hon. gentleman's figures. If we had the whole of the figures we could analyse them properly, and compare the increase of locomotive and of car mileage, and of both, with the increase of revenue, and so form a correct conclusion. In comparing this year with last year he (Sir Charles Tupper), compared the operations of this year with those of a year in which for eight and a-half months he had the entire control of the Railway in his hands. During that time a large deficit was incurred; that deficit was made up in great part by a large amount expended in those extraordinary improvements which he described. Amongst those improvements there were a large number of sidings constructed in the Province of Nova Scotia. It may be that the hon. member for Lambton decided that those were necessary.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: He did; and they were in progress before any change took place.

MR. ANGLIN: That shows what a fair man he is, and how ready he has shown himself to do ample justice to the Maritime Provinces. Well, there was that expenditure amounting to $210,000, and there was a large sum on account of steel rails which the late Government determined to charge to Revenue Account—not to charge it to one year, but to extend it over several years, five years, I believe. If we deduct these from the whole amount it reduces the deficit very considerably, but I prefer to take the previous year, when the hon. member for Lambton controlled the road for the whole year, We find that in that year, 1877-78, the whole deficit was $432,326. Now, in that year, $200,000 was charged to Revenue Account, and nothing is to be charged to that account this year or hereafter; deduct that amount and the deficit left is $232,326. But there is another important deduction to be made. The hon. gentleman told us that, under the late Government, a large number of workmen were employed making rolling-stock, the cost of which was charged to Capital Account. He omitted, perhaps forgot, to state that there was also a large number of men employed in readjusting, reconstructing, and repairing the rolling-stock of the roads of the Lower Provinces, this having been rendered necessary by the change of gauge of these roads, and the dilapidated condition of many of the locomotives and cars. The cost of this work was not charged to Capital Account, but to the Revenue Account: $100,000 should be credited to the hon. member for Lambton's Administration on that account; if we deduct that amount we find a net deficit of only $132,326. The hon. gentleman has informed us that his deficit for eight months has been $86,000; at that rate his deficit will be $129,000 on the whole year's operations, as against $132,000. The deficit under the hon. member for Lambton thus would show, on the face of that statement, a saving of $3,000 on the whole year's transactions. With regard to the stores, I do not impugn the hon. gentleman's statement, but I was surprised at it in the way he put it. I was not aware that stores were charged to Consolidated Revenue, and the price of stores sold credited to the Consolidated Revenue. Of course the stores taken for use on the Railroad, are charged to the Railroad; if this is the case, we should have another account to judge of the amount of stores used by the Railroad. We are misled by the accounts as they stand at present; but at all events we know that during the last year the quantity of stores on hand has very materially decreased. However, to return to the main question, let me say, that I was myself surprised on putting these figures together to find that the saving has only been $3,000. I thought it must be very much more than that. We know that Mr. Brydges, whose services were dispensed with by the present Government, received a large salary, so also did Mr. Luttrell receive a handsome salary. Now, another gentleman is supposed to do the duties of both those gentlemen, and receives a much smaller salary than was given to Mr. Brydges. If he does do efficiently all the work of these two, I think his salary is lower than it ought to be. A man in his position should not only have the capacity to direct the running of the trains, and to keep the Railway in proper condition, but sufficient business capacity to enable him to increase the business of the road. A Mr. Black is employed to do some work of that kind, but what service he has ever actually rendered we have not been informed. Mr. Schreiber is also employed here at Ottawa to do part of the work formerly done by Mr. Brydges. If we add Mr. Black's and Mr. Pottinger's and Mr. Schreiber's salaries all together, their travelling expenses and other charges, we may find that a very considerable saving has not been effected in these larger salaries. Mr. Brydges and Mr. Luttrell did the work that Mr. Pottinger and Mr. Schreiber and Mr. Black now do, and did it more efficiently. The hon. the Minister of Railways did cut down the salaries of a large number of officials; and I heard of reductions that did not seem justifiable. Looking at the men employed, and the salaries paid in the Civil Service, I think it could easily be established that gentlemen employed on the Railway are not paid as well as they ought to be. We find, in some instances, the reduction perfectly astounding. A reduction in one case, as shown by the statement submitted to the House by the hon. Minister of Railways, was a reduction from $300 to $240. The hon. Minister, with some justifiable pride, stated that he had never reduced the wages of the labouring men employed on the road, nor of the mechanics. I would like to know why it was he thought it fit or becoming to reduce that poor man's salary to $240, an amount on which no man can live with any degree of comfort in this country. The hon. the Minister of Railways spoke of the falling off in the business of the road, and attributed it to various causes, some of which sounded strangely enough when coming from that hon. gentleman. The revenue declined, he told us, because of the general depression of business, but that was after the hon. gentlemen opposite entered office and put their great National Policy into full operation. In fact he admits that the depression of the country greatly increased during that period, as compared with the corresponding months of the previous year—a very remarkable admission. I wonder if he ever stopped to reflect that he was uttering what, if uttered from this side, would have been stigmatised as most unpatriotic. We want much information not supplied us. I cannot find that the quantity of lumber carried on the road diminished much—not more than 1,000,000ft. In 1877-78 it was 56,000,000ft.; a decline of less than 1,000,000ft. was not very serious. The decline in the quantity of flour was only 7,779 barrels. Altogether the decline was not so great as the hon. gentleman supposes. There was a very considerable falling off in the proceeds of passenger traffic, although the number of passengers increased; the decline in receipts was $23,623, while the number of passengers showed an increase of 21,000. The freight traffic shows, altogether, a decrease of 11,849 tons. It is but natural that a Railway, newly constructed, should obtain an increase of business year by year, and when we find it decreasing we may well conclude that there is an extraordinary depression in business generally. But when we enquire into the character of the trade we ought to compare it, not with a period of depression, but with some former prosperous period. The hon. gentleman ought to compare the transaction of some period since their accession to power, with some period during the regimé of his predecessor. The number of officials was reduced by the present Minister from 119 to 104, including the chief engineers, superintendents and assistant superintendents, etc. That, after all, was not a very large reduction. But the amount saved altogether is stated at $25,130, a great portion of which was saved by the reduction of salaries. Now, while it may be possible to reduce the number of officials employed, without any very serious injury to the road, by requiring some persons to do more work than they did previously, and by dispensing with some work or reducing its character, and thus save some money, in the other branch of the service it may be very difficult, after all, to save anything material without impairing the character of the work and service. The station masters, operators, baggage masters, etc., were reduced from 368 to 313 at a saving as is claimed, of $20,897. I do not know that there was any station on the whole line that could have been closed without injury to the public. I think two or three were closed in Nova Scotia, but that these were opened afterwards, owing to the public clamour which was raised. I am not aware that any more hands were employed at those or any other of the way stations than were necessary, nor, indeed, do I know where any dismissals have taken place; but when you come to freight porters and baggage masters, I may say that I never knew more to be employed than one baggage master on any train. I cannot imagine where a saving in this direction could have been effected without interfering with the efficiency of the road. So with regard to engine drivers and firemen; you must have one engine driver and one fireman for every engine on the road. More were not required, and my impression was that those men were paid according to the amount of work they did. Is that not the case?

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: They were partly paid by the work.

MR. ANGLIN: I do not know that much can be saved by reducing their number. We know that the work of the engine driver is very trying, and that, if overworked, he might be so exhausted as to become careless and liable to accident. There is no employé on the whole road on whom more depends than on the engine driver, or more in whom vigour, intelligence and caution are more valuable, none whom it is so dangerous to overwork. But why the number was reduced, particularly if they are paid according to the amount of work done, the hon. gentleman has not explained. We heard last year of the extraordinary amount he so saved by dispensing with the services of the cleaners of the locomotives. I could never understand why a person, having a large railway experience, should employ more cleaners than is absolutely required. It could hardly be imagined that any great political advantage could be obtained by the retention of twenty, thirty or forty engine-cleaners, more or less. It would be the sheerest extravagance on the part of a man in the position of Mr. Brydges, who must have known how many cleaners ought to be employed, to retain a single man more than was necessary. I have heard it said by those who happened to look at the trains pass on the road, that this work of cleaning does not appear at present to be done efficiently, that everything about the cars seems to be looked after less carefully than in former years. It is very probable that, as those large reductions have been made in the number of cleaners, the statement is too true. Some labour was saved, no doubt, by painting the brass-work upon the locomotives of freight trains, and similar changes throughout. Even to deal with this matter in the spirit in which the hon. gentleman has always spoken of everything done by the late Government, I must say that this is one of the most unpatriotic acts that the Ministerial policy could have been guilty of. It is one of the strongest possible declarations that the Dominion is poverty-stricken and reduced to the direst possible straits, is no longer able to indulge any petty feelings of pride on its railways, such as keeping the brass work of its locomotives clean and bright. As hon. gentlemen opposite would say, that was a saving, but a most unpatriotic saving. With regard to the section labourers and section foremen, all experienced in the management of railways must know the number of men absolutely required to keep the track in proper order; where the work is heavy, the number employed must be larger than where it is light. Unfortunately the traffic of the Intercolonial is not so heavy as we would all like to see it, still, it is considerable, and no one can doubt that Mr. Brydges, when he organised the service, employed for exactly this work the number of men that should be employed and no more. I think it would be impossible to point to a single instance in which he employed superfluous workmen for this service. It is stated that of 624 hands employed in this service when the change of Government occurred, it has been reduced to 449. These men were taken off work which was of the greatest possible importance, it being of the greatest possible necessity that nothing should be neglected or left to chance. Good management does not restrict itself to the smallest number possible for the performance of such work; it makes due provision for emergencies which, when they occur, require extra force. This provision has been neglected in the recent reductions, and this I cannot consider a wise course. The present condition of the track, so much rougher than was noticeable a year ago, must be attributed to the unwise reductions in the number of the trackmen. The hon. the Minister of Railways may accept what statement he pleases from the superintendents and the other officials; they may endeavour to persuade themselves first, and afterwards the hon. Minister, that the reductions were proper and economical, and that the road has not suffered in consequence of the reduction; but let me tell him that the voice of the public interested in the Railway unanimously pronounced to the contrary—that the universal opinion is, that the track of the Intercolonial is not in as good or smooth a condition as it was a year and a-half ago, when he took control of it. We come next to the number of mechanics, carpenters, and others employed in the workshops. The hon. gentleman said his predecessor had a large number of men employed on rolling-stock, charged to Capital Account. The number of men employed on the rolling-stock, chargeable to Capital Account, the late Minister of Railways reduced as the supply of rolling-stock became sufficient. He did not discharge all those men at once. He did not think he would be justified in throwing some three or four hundred men out of employment at a moment's notice, but he discharged them gradually. The number was very considerably reduced, and it would have been further reduced, even if there had been no change of Government, but it would not have been reduced, I believe, to the present low standard. I find by a return furnished upon my own motion, that the whole number of men employed on these workshops, 1st October, shortly after the hon. gentleman took office, was 589. It was increased from 1st October to December to 605. The hon. gentleman may be able to explain why this increase took place in a number already too large, and after the hon. member for Lambton had been reducing it. Since, however, the number has been reduced to 462; the result has been undoubtedly unfavourable to the road and the rolling-stock. The whole number, as given by Mr. Schreiber, was 720, reduced to 593. Although the hon. Minister knew last Session that the 120 miles of railway from Rivière du Loup were to be added to the Intercolonial, and he had ample time to prepare, he now tells us that one of the reasons why so many accidents have occurred on the Intercolonial is, that the rolling-stock has been overstrained in consequence of this additional service having been undertaken, and the impossibility of his obtaining sufficient additional rolling-stock. He leased six locomotives from the Grand Trunk Railway, which he described as not only not in good repair, but incapable of doing the proper amount of work. People do say that these are not the only wheezy, feeble locomotives on the Intercolonial, but that a large proportion of those on the road are in a very bad condition indeed. I moved for a Return showing the number of locomotives and cars requiring repairs on 1st February. I do not know if the Return for 1878-79 was then asked for. But I find the Return embraces three years. Against this nobody can have any objection. On February 1st, 1878, there were twelve locomotives requiring repair; in 1879, when the hon. gentlemen opposite were in power there were, twenty requiring repair; on 1st February last, twenty locomotives, seven passenger cars, fifty box cars, eighty-seven platform cars, and sixty-nine hoppers were awaiting repair. The want of those locomotives, and, perhaps, passenger cars, is of the greatest importance. The whole number of locomotives is 108, and twenty of these were in the workshops waiting or receiving repairs. If rumour speaks correctly, there were no less than thirty or forty locomotives more that ought to have been in the shops receiving repairs. It is said that the number of cars in each train has been reduced on account of the inefficiency of the locomotives, and I believe such is the fact. The hon. gentleman complains of want of sufficient locomotive power. We might ask why those men who were dismissed were not employed in putting in a proper state of repair those locomotives and cars which required repairs when there were workshops and machinery for that purpose? and why, at the same time, a large number of men were standing idle waiting for employment? The hon. the Minister of Railways held a similar position toward the railways in Nova Scotia several years ago. If I remember right, while he was in Opposition, he launched on the Province a project of economy similar to the one he launched upon this Dominion when in Opposition in this Parliament. He appealed to the people of Nova Scotia to put him and his friends into power on the strength of his promise to economise in all branches of the public service. They got into power, and the people expected they would make some attempt to carry out their pledges to economise. It has been charged that the hon. gentleman forgot very much, after he got into power, of what he had promised while in Opposition. During his Administration economy, as he understood it, was carried out on the railways of Nova Scotia, and the older members of this House know what the sum total of that economy amounted to. Year after year—after Confederation—several hundreds of thousands of dollars were voted by the Parliament of Canada in order to put those roads into something like fair working order. I know that while the hon. member for Cumberland managed those roads, the trains crept over them very slowly; and the rattle of the rails was something like the tumbling down of a pile of scrap iron in some old junk shop; everything was loose and shakely, and everything was thoroughly run down. I had hoped that the hon. gentleman had learned wisdom from his attempts at economy in Nova Scotia, and that he would not attempt to impose upon this Dominion a similar scheme. The hon. gentleman blamed the contractors for not furnishing rolling-stock at an earlier period. I ventured to ask the hon. gentleman when the contracts were awarded, and, instead of answering me, he proceeded to dilate at length upon the difficulties he had experienced in preparing for the letting of these contracts. There was no reason in the world why those preparations may not have been made months before; no reason why the hon. Minister should have waited until the Rivière du Loup road was actually transferred to the Government and the deeds were actually signed, because he knew well, last year, when he took the vote, that there would be no difficulty about closing the negotiations with the Grand Trunk Company, who wanted much more to sell that piece of road than we to buy it. The hon. Minister should have provided in time a sufficient quantity of rolling-stock for that road. I think these contracts for locomotives were only given out about the end of January last. I think Mr. Fleming, of St. John, received a contract then for nine or ten locomotives. The hon. Minister knew well when he gave the contract to Mr. Fleming that the latter could not be expected to turn out those locomotives within a few months. There are, in the United States, establishments which turn out a locomotive every day, but the hon. Minister must know that no establishment in Canada could produce locomotives at that rate. I cannot imagine that Mr. Fleming would undertake to deliver nine or ten locomotives within less than nine or ten months. Mr. Chairman, I have dwelt at some length on these matters, because in the earlier part of the Session I drew attention to the fact that the rolling-stock had greatly depreciated; and I drew attention to the fact that many accidents had taken place upon the road. I am sorry to say that many other accidents have since occurred upon that road, and I doubt, if on any other road in North America which has pretensions to be a first-class road, so many accidents have occurred in so short a time.

MR. MACKENZIE: How was Mr. Schreiber paid?

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: Mr. Schreiber was appointed in 1873. His salary was charged to the direction of the Intercolonial Railway on which he was mainly engaged. A year ago we carried his salary into the Civil Government, and it appears in the appropriations.

MR. MACKENZIE: I notice it was not in the statement brought down last Session. All the other salaries were there, but not his.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: He was engaged in the capacity for which he was appointed in the Department in 1873.

MR. MACKENZIE: I neglected saying I was not aware until this evening that Mr. Schreiber was appointed to take charge of the management and working of the Railway. I suppose it was solely an engineering appointment.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: Not at all. Not at all. The appointment distinctly stated that he was Chief Engineer of the Government Railways in operation, in contradistinction to being Chief Engineer for the construction of that Railway.

MR. MACKENZIE: He has been more than Chief Engineer; he has been General Manager, but that did not appear. There was nothing in the Order appointing him, that I can recollect, that indicated anything further than engineering services.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: That was the intention at any rate.

MR. MACKENZIE: I have nothing to say against Mr. Schreiber. I believe him to be all the hon. gentleman stated—a most efficient public servant.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: It will not be necessary for me to detain the Committee long in respect to any remarks made by the hon. gentleman from Gloucester (Mr. Anglin) because he was good enough to reply to them himself. The first and last part of his speech furnished the refutation to each other. He undertook to show that the economy is $3,000 per annum. If that be true, if there is only a saving of $3,000 per annum, it ought to relieve the hon. gentleman's mind as to the great deterioration of the rolling-stock. There cannot be any important deterioration in either the road or the rolling-stock, if there is only a saving effected of $3,000 a year. The hon. gentleman has wasted his time in deploring that there was a depreciation of the road, or that the rolling-stock was becoming insufficient. The fact remains that, at this moment, the economy effected enables us to perform the same work with 400 men less, and a decrease of $200,000 a year in salaries. There is no getting over that. Now, the hon. gentleman says that the number of men was increased between the time of the change of Government and the month of December, 1878. I may state to the hon. gentleman that the management of the Intercolonial Railway remained in the hands of the party in whose hands it had been placed by the late Government, and he was entirely responsible for it. I did not interfere in the least degree with the then manager of the Intercolonial Railway, until I was prepared to release him and reorganise the whole Department. The salaries of those men I charged to the operation of the road, which had formerly been charged to Capital Account, closed before 1st July, 1878, and I found the remarkable fact presenting itself, that there was an increase in the amount paid for salaries between 1st July and 17th September, 1878, of over $8,000. I shall not undertake to show that the then manager of the road was a very able man, as undoubtedly he was. Under these circumstances, I would like the hon. gentleman to account to the House for the increase in the expenditure between 1st July, 1878, and 17th September of the same year, of $8,000, when the whole work of about 100 of these men, who had been engaged in the construction of cars, was completed; the work was over, but they were kept on the pay roll. That fact satisfied me that there was great recklessness in the expenditure.

MR. MACKENZIE: Did the hon. gentleman ever call Mr. Brydges to account for this particular thing?

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: I took the best means to show my estimate of the management by the course I adopted. I did satisfy myself that there was great extravagance in keeping these extra men employed when their services were not required; in making unasked for, increases of salaries, and when the management of the road was such as required a radical change. The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat will, perhaps, be a little surprised to learn that in March, 1879, under Mr. Brydges' management of the road, there were ninety-two wheels broken, or one wheel for every 17,760 miles run.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: He was manager of the road up to February, 1879. In February, 1880, there were ninety wheels broken, or a wheel to every 28,992 miles run. I will now take the month of January, 1877.

MR. MACKENZIE: Take March, 1878. The hon. gentleman is not capable of being fair.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: I will give the hon. gentleman March, 1877, during which month there were ninety-one wheels broken; for March, 1880, there were only ninety wheels broken. The fact is that the number of wheels broken in 1877 was in excess of those broken during the present year.

MR. MACKENZIE: What I desire to obtain is the number of accidents that have occurred, and the causes that have produced them. The hon. gentleman stated, for instance, when there was an incidental discussion on this subject some weeks ago, that there was not a single passenger's life lost upon the Railway during last year. It was true there was not a single passenger's life lost, but there were nineteen lives lost against twelve the previous year. There is no necessity for making statements that are not complete, and the statement of the hon. gentleman with regard to the number of wheels broken cannot be regarded as a complete one.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: I will give the hon. gentleman all the figures I have. The first part of the statement is with regard to the number of wheels broken. In 1875-6 there were 108 car-wheels broken; in 1876-7, 461; 1877-8, 350; 1878-9, 351; and down to the end of February this year, 261. That is all the information it is possible to get in relation to this, and it shows that the impression that there has been an undue number of accidents, or more than the usual number of car-wheels broken during the present fiscal year is a misapprehension. Then, I can give the hon. gentleman the number of wheels broken to miles run in the month of February of each year. In February 1877, there was one broken wheel for every 9,464 miles run; in February, 1878, one wheel for every 19,449 miles; in February, 1879, one wheel for every 23,681; in February, 1880, one wheel for every 23,709 miles. A similar statement for January shows that in 1877 there was a broken wheel for every 12,395 miles run; in 1878, one wheel for every 24,823 miles; in 1879, one wheel for every 33,897 miles; in 1880, one wheel for every 33,161 miles. That is the fullest information I am prepared to give the hon. gentleman in this regard.

MR. HADDOW: I would like to remind the hon. the Minister of Railways, of the petition presented to him last year from the inhabitants of that section of Belledune, lying between the stations of Jacquet River and Belledune, on the Intercolonial, where there is already a flag station, and where the petitioners desire that a siding may be also placed. It is a district where considerable quantities of oats and potatoes are produced, and it is desirable that they should have every facility afforded for shipping their produce. I also desire to call the attention of the hon. Minister to the need there is for a freight house at Eel River Station, a building costing about $200 would answer all purposes at present, and would be a great public convenience. It is a station only about half the distance from Dalhousie town where the Dalhousie Station is, and from it there is a great deal of passenger and freight traffic in connection with the accommodation and freight trains of the Intercolonial, but there is no freight house in which anything may be stored. Another subject to which I would also like to direct the attention of the hon. Minister, is the rates of freight between Montreal and Restigouche. Two weeks ago a through rate of sixty-five cents per 100lb. was asked on dry goods, and about fifty cents on hardware, and though the same might be taken to Quebec for ten cents per hundred pounds by the Occidental line, the Intercolonial would charge sixty cents per hundred from Point Levis. These rates, it must be admitted, are very excessive, and can only tend to cause shippers to look for other means of forwarding. I would like to ask if it is the intention of the Government to restore to the Intercolonial workshops at Campbellton, the machinery and workmen removed from there some time since. I am sure it must have proved a very convenient place for carrying on the work, and I hope the Government will soon see their way clear to have the works kept up there as in times past. The hon. Minister will remember that I had some communication with him some time ago regarding two oxen killed on the line between Dalhousie and Campbellton, for which the owners have not been paid. They got on the line from land not owned by the owners of the animals, and for that reason the superintendent refused payment for the loss.

MR. HADDOW.

There was no fencing on that part of the line at which they got access, and the owners of the oxen are told that, according to law, they cannot recover, because the animals got on the line from a neighbour's land.

MR. MACKENZIE: That is the law.

MR. HADDOW: The hon. ex-Minister says that is the law. Well, if it is so, I think he will agree with me that though it may be law, it does not seem like justice. If the animals had got on the line from the lands of their owners, then I conclude that compensation would have been recoverable. I trust the hon. Minister will see that justice is done in the matter, and that, while seeking to carry out a system of increased economy on the Intercolonial, he will not allow the settlers along the line to be treated unfairly.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: It would be impossible to effect any reduction in the expenditure if the Government were to erect stations and sidings at every request that is made. The Government desire to give every convenience necessary to do the business of the country, but not to increase stations and sidings just for a little increased convenience of parties, without effecting additional traffic, because every additional station established interferes with the operation of the road, you have to stop so many times more, and it lengthens the time of making the through distance. I will again look into the subject. It is very unpleasant to be compelled to refuse applications for increased station accommodation, but it cannot be avoided. The stations are five or six miles apart, and there may be half a dozen persons between them who would like to have increased station accommodation. A station does not mean merely the cost of putting up the building, but it means, in addition, a large annual cost of maintaining it, and in employing station masters, and so forth, in connection with it. Wherever we find increased station accommodation necessary to do the business of the road, and that it will increase the traffic, we provide it. With reference to cattle killed on the line, if the investigation of the officers of the Department shows that there is a just claim, we pay it; but if they are satisfied that there is no legal claim, we refuse; and in cases of doubt, I have the case referred to the hon. the Minister of Justice to decide upon it. There are a great many cases of hardship, undoubtedly, as far as individuals are concerned, especially, for instance, in cases of fire, where property is burnt owing to sparks flying from the locomotives; if the spark-arrester is in a proper condition, and if it is on the locomotive, the Government are not liable, although it may be clearly established that the burning took place through sparks from the train. If cattle are allowed to stray at large and get on the line, the owners must take the responsibility; if they get on the line from the owner's own property, and if it is owing to the neglect of the Railway Department, then the Government are obliged to pay. The practice is—where there is any doubt, or where the parties are not satisfied—to have the matter referred to the Official Arbitrators, who proceed on sworn testimony to report to the Department, and, in any case where the Government are liable, there is no hesitation in rendering satisfaction.

MR. MCKAY said he thought the law was strained too much in favour of the Railway in deciding that they were not liable when the cattle went on the line from a neighbour's land. He knew of one case where payment was refused in which a cow hopped on to the roof of a snowshed adjoining the owner's land, and falling down on to the track was killed.

MR. MACKENZIE said he thought cows should not go on to the roofs of houses.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH called attention to the case of Mr. Lingham, killed on the Railway some six weeks ago, leaving a father, and, he thought, a mother, who had been dependent upon him for their support, and he (Sir Albert J. Smith) wished to know if anything would be done for them by the Government.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: Unfortunately, although every possible effort was made to change the overhead bridges, the work having already commenced, there were two of them not yet raised when the frost set in; and this conductor, nobody knowing why, went on to the top of the car, where he met his death. There has been no claim on the Department, for the reason that these parties are insured by an Insurance Fund.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH: Was he insured?

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: I am just now told that the insurance is against accident, not against death, and in that case I shall give the matter as liberal a construction as possible. He was a very valuable officer; his death was a very unaccountable one. There was no reason why he should go on to the top of the car, and he was perfectly aware of these two bridges not having been raised.

MR. MCKAY thought there was a sum payable under the insurance at death. He also called attention to the fact that the Government Railway made an agreement to pay in a sum of money, and the men had a certain sum taxed off their wages coming to about $8,000, but the Government had not carried out their part of the agreement.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER promised to look into the matter. The fund had, however, proved quite adequate to the demand upon it.

MR. MCKAY thought then the amount subscribed by the men should be reduced.

MR. SNOWBALL: I asked for the returns of rate of freights charged on the Intercolonial Railway early in the Session, but they have not been furnished to the House to the present time. The hon. member for Restigouche (Mr. Haddow) has, however, referred to the high rates charged on the Intercolonial. I also have to complain of the extreme rates that have been charged during the past fall and winter. The rate of freight on flour, from Toronto and Western Ontario, was advanced during this fall from 65c. per barrel to $1.05 per barrel. It must be admitted that this is an extremely high rate, and could not be enforced if it were not for the import duty imposed on flour. When importers complain, they are told the rates are fixed by the Grand Trunk and other roads. Whoever is to blame, the subject is cause of great complaint and dissatisfaction. If it was not for this duty of 50c. per barrel imposed under the National Policy, we would buy in the United States markets. Take, for instance, in November last, when we bought largely for winter stock. Flour was $5.50 per barrel in New York, and only $5.35 for the same quality in Toronto. The duty, if imported from New York, is 50c. per barrel, and the freight and charges 37c., making the total price, if brought from New York, $6.37. Now, if imported from Ontario, the first cost was $5.35, and summer rate of freight 65c., making total cost $6. If this was the freight from Ontario, we would not have nothing to complain of. As soon as this occurred, the railway companies advanced the rate of freight to $1, making the Ontario flour cost $6.35 per barrel. We do complain that this duty enables railway companies to impose on the people of the Lower Provinces. The Maritime Provinces import from 900,000 to 1,000,000 barrels of flour annually, and the duty enables the railway companies to impose from 40c. to 50c. per barrel extra freight, making a tax of from $400,000 to $500,000 on our people each year. The farmers of Ontario get no portion of, or benefit from, this tax. The Treasury of the Dominion gets no benefit from it. The consumers have it to pay, and it is taken from them by railway companies. The subject demands the serious attention of the Minister of Railways. With a thousand miles of railway under his control, he should be able to remedy this by putting pressure on the railways with which he connects. Hon. gentlemen seem to doubt the fact of 900,000 barrels of flour being used annually by the Lower Provinces. The quantity has been carefully ascertained, and I assure them this quantity is correct. The hon. Minister tells us that he discharged over 100 mechanics because there was no employment for them, and that the country saved a large sum by their discharge. When there were twenty locomotives in the workshops awaiting repairs in February, 1879, and also in February, 1880, against only twelve in 1878, and while these twenty locomotives were awaiting repairs, and short of mechanics to repair them, the Government actually had seven locomotives hired from the Grand Trunk to assist in doing our work, and poor, wheezy locomotives they were, if report is correct, and I hope this will receive the attention of the hon. Minister, with regard to the twenty locomotives that the Return brought down states are undergoing repairs. At the workshops at Moncton, which are supplied with the very best machinery, there is every facility to do the work required for the Intercolonial Railway. The hon. the Minister of Railways has told us that the locomotives should be as nearly as possible alike, each piece of one fitting the other, and this causes delay in getting them constructed. Where then is the place to get them done better than in the Government workshops, where they have every tool requisite, and which were procured at a great cost to the country. Now, these twenty idle locomotives represent a cost to this country of about $200,000, and should not be unemployed, when we are paying $100 per day for others to take their place, and our mechanics leaving the country to get work. I would ask the hon. the Minister of Railways how many locomotives have been condemned during the last two years, and if the condemned locomotives are included in the twenty he tells us of, as the country believe, that including those condemned, there are more than that number.

Several Hon. MEMBERS: Question, order.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT protested against the unseemly interruption.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: I hope this interruption will cease at once. It is very important that hon. gentlemen should have an opportunity of stating their views on important subjects of this kind. I am not able to say how many locomotives were condemned within the last two years.

MR. SNOWBALL: I am told there are locomotives on the Intercolonial not put in use of late years, and I would like to know if they could not, with reasonable repairs, be used again? I believe they could. While they need repairs the workshops are idle, and many of our mechanics are leaving the country; and we are using Grand Trunk locomotives that are worse than our own. In reference to the rails, the Minister of Railways has told us he has given us every information, even to the names of the makers, as trackmen get the makers name from each rail that breaks. If he ever examined the matter, he would have found that it is most difficult to ascertain the maker by looking for the names on the rails, the letters, in many cases, being so imperfect that such information is not to be implicitly relied on. To justify the many accidents by breakage of car wheels lately, it is said that as many broke under the late management, but it makes all the difference in the world whether the wheels break when the cars are on the road and in motion, or if flaws are detected by proper inspection in the yards, and broken there, as was the case years past. In the latter case, defects were discovered in time, and we had the breaks, but no accidents, as at present.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: I think the hon. gentleman (Mr. Snowball) a little unfair in endeavouring to represent that there were more locomotives in the shops than I stated. I have shown that when Mr. Brydges was in charge of the road and works, and had 400 men more than I have, the same number of locomotives were in the shop, for repair as on the 1st February this year. What, then, are the hon. gentleman's criticisms worth? With $200,000 more paid for salaries and wages than at present, there was the same number in the workshop on the 1st February, 1879, as at the same date in 1880. What then have hon. gentlemen to complain of? I have stated we are running 840 miles of railroad instead of 714, as last year; that we had not enough rolling-stock, and had to hire six locomotives from the Grand Trunk, very inferior though they were, and constantly breaking. We changed four locomotives from coal-burners to wood-burners, and sent them even to the Pacific; so, by a fair comparison, there were many less in the shops this last winter than in the year before. The evidence is all against the statement that the rolling-stock is running down, and as to the through rates from the west, they are made by the Grand Trunk; we have not the power to make them. All the efforts we are capable of to obtain the most reasonable rates from the Grand Trunk, we put forth. Any reductions that can be made call forth our efforts; any apparently excessive charge we at once bring to the notice of the Grand Trunk, to get the rate made as low as possible, consistently with the interests of the road. In fixing the rates, the Grand Trunk, Great Western, and all the railways are influenced by the water-competition. Where there is no such competition, their rates are higher. It is beyond our power to correct that practice.

BILL INTRODUCED.

The following Bill was introduced and read the first time:—

Bill (No. 113) To authorise making certain investigations under oath.—(Mr. McDonald, Pictou.)

DOMINION NOTES ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.

(Sir Samuel L. Tilley.

FIRST READING.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: I have to ask you, Mr. Speaker, to leave the Chair, that the House may go into Committee of the Whole to consider the following Resolution:

“That it is expedient to provide that the amount of Dominion Notes issued and outstanding, at any one time, may be increased to $20,000,000, provided that the Finance Minister shall always hold for the redemption of such notes an amount, in gold, or in gold and Dominion securities guaranteed by the Government of the United Kingdom, equal to no less than 25 per cent. of the total amount of such notes then outstanding, and that at least 15 per cent. of the total amount of such outstanding notes shall be so held in gold; and the statements to be published by the Finance Minister, under the eighth Section of the Act 31 Vict., chap. 46, shall show distinctly the amount so held by him in gold and guaranteed securities respectively.”

The nature of the existing law is well known to the House. At the same time I desire to call attention to it, and the changes proposed, as well as the effects that will be produced by these changes. Under the law, as it stands at present, all

Dominion Notes, up to \$9,000,000, are required to be secured by 25 per cent. specie, requiring for the first issue of \$9,000,000, \$2,250,000 in specie; for the next \$3,000,000, 50 per cent. in specie, or \$1,500,000; and for \$400,000 issued in excess of the \$12,000,000, dollar for dollar is to be held in gold, making over \$4,000,000 in all. The proposals of the Government, as presented by this Resolution, is to take authority to issue \$20,000,000 of Dominion currency and the issue to be limited to that sum, at present there is no limit to the issue. It is the purpose of the Government to limit the total issue for the first year to \$16,000,000, and reserving the additional \$4,000,000 to be issued later on. The Bill will limit the increased issue of \$4,000,000 per annum; and it is provided that 25 per cent. of the amount of the notes in circulation shall be held in gold or Dominion guarantees, 15 per cent. at least in gold, and the remaining 10 per cent. to be covered by guaranteed Government securities. Should the issue be increased to \$16,000,000, the Government would require to hold \$4,000,000 in gold and guaranteed securities, and the remaining \$12,000,000 in Government debentures. Practically, to cover the whole issue of \$16,000,000 Dominion Notes, there will be \$4,000,000 in gold or Dominion guaranteed debentures, and \$12,000,000 in unguaranteed Government debentures. The object in the issue of Dominion Notes, in the first place, was that the people of the Dominion might have some share in the profit of the circulation of the Dominion. For several years the issue has been from \$10,500,000 up to \$12,000,000; it is now \$12,500,000. The object of the original Act, authorising the issue of Dominion Notes, was to give the people of the country a share of the profits of the circulation. I know that, in regard to the proposition I am about to submit, there is a doubt in the minds of some hon. members as to the propriety of this expansion, and the ability of the Government to meet promptly any demand that may be made on the Treasury for gold. I do not think that there is any foundation for this doubt. When I visited England, in December, 1878, for the purpose of floating a loan, the Government had at their disposal £2,100,000 sterling of guaranteed debentures, but £1,500,000 was placed upon the market, and we still hold the balance £600,000, and these we purpose holding under the provisions of our proposed Bill. Then, in addition, the House will observe by the Bill, it is provided that debentures should be issued for the balance, whatever it may be, of notes put into circulation, those debentures to be made available should they be required. I do not think that will happen, however, because during the Administration of hon. gentlemen opposite, and down to the present date, there has never been a period when the banks have had less than \$3,400,000 of Government deposits, and they now reach \$12,000,000. It is scarcely to be expected that the deposits remaining in the banks will be under \$3,000,000, at any time these deposits will be available for the purpose of meeting any demand that may be made upon the Receiver-General for gold. The average circulation in \$1 and \$2 notes, last year, was from \$2,500,000 to \$3,000,000. The House will observe that, in the proposed renewal of existing bank charters, the banks will not be permitted to issue any note less than the denomination of \$5. Under the present law the banks are bound to hold an average of 50 per cent. reserve in Dominion Notes, and at no time can they hold up less than one-third of their reserves in Dominion Notes. The present proposition of the Government is to increase the minimum of reserves from 33 $\frac{1}{3}$ to 40 per cent. The effect will be that, supposing that under the operations of the law the circulation will be increased next year to \$16,000,000, the Government would be required to hold \$2,400,000 in gold, 10 per cent. in guaranteed securities, or \$1,600,000, or \$4,000,000 in all. The Government would then issue additional unguaranteed securities, \$12,000,000 in all, to be held in case of an unusual demand for the redemption of notes. If the law was in operation to-day with the circulation as at present, instead of holding \$4,150,000 in gold for redemption, the Government would be required to hold but \$1,860,000 in gold, and the balance in guaranteed securities, which would relieve \$2,240,000 in gold from deposit, replacing that amount, to a considerable extent, by the guaranteed securities. When in England, last year, arrangements were made by which there can be no question whatever that those securities can be made available at twenty-four hours' notice, should there be a demand for gold. The Government ask that the issue shall not be increased over \$4,000,000 during the next twelve months, and my impression is that that will be quite as much as we will be able to judiciously circulate. Of course the amended charters of the banks will place us in a position to increase the circulation. As one mode of increasing the circulation at this time, as stated by premium, we purpose sending our \$1 notes into the North-West Territory and to British Columbia for the payment of Indian annuities. We have provided in the Bill that the Dominion Notes are to be redeemable at Charlottetown, Victoria, and Winnipeg, as well as at Halifax, St. John, Montreal and Toronto. I do not think there will be any difficulty in circulating the additional notes, in view of the fact that the circulation, without any effort on the part of the Government, has now reached \$12,500,000. The practical effect will be to give us in the first place, if this Bill becomes law, \$2,290,000 of gold that is now held by the Receiver-General. This is a proposition in accordance with the spirit of the first Act intended to give, as far as possible, the people of the country a fair share of the profits of the circulation, and make it secure beyond any controversy. There is now \$21,000,000 of bank circulation; deposits, outside the Government deposits, \$70,000,000; Government deposits, about \$11,000,000. So that, altogether, with their Notes in circulation, and their deposits, they have \$101,000,000, or \$102,000,000 of liabilities, against which they hold in Dominion Notes and gold at present something like \$16,000,000, or 16 per cent. and this is considered ample for their purposes. The reserves to be held by the banks, for the future, increasing from year to year, must be large; because they have not only to provide for circulation, but for \$70,000,000 or \$80,000,000 of deposits, and a large amount of Dominion Notes, must, therefore, remain deposited with the banks, probably \$10,000,000 or \$11,000,000.

Next year it will be considerably increased. It is but right that the public should have some profit from this increased circulation. But the security is ample to provide against the possibility of surprise or inconveniences under any circumstances whatever.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT: Did I understand the hon. the Minister of Finance to say that we have now $4,250,000 of gold in hand?

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: Yes.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT: The Return in the last Canada Gazette, dated 23rd April, 1880, shows the total as $3,690,520. Surely, in the short interval to the 26th April, there cannot be a large increase of the Supply.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: The statement I have announced was given to me as correct to the end of the month of March.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT: The date of the Gazette is 23rd April, to which date the Return must have been made. The amount of notes in circulation is given by the Gazette almost as by the hon. the Finance Minister—$12,390,000. The discrepancy seems considerable, about $400,000 or $500,000, between the Gazette's and the hon. gentleman's statement. I notice, also, in his statement, he puts down the amount of gold required to be held on account of the first $9,000,000 at 25 per cent.; the Gazette puts it at 20 per cent., or only $1,800,000, which, according to my recollection of the Act fixing 20 per cent., is all that is required to be held, making the Gazette's return apparently correct. I would like to know the exact amount of gold that has to be held; it being a matter of some importance.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: I was in communication with my Deputy on Saturday morning, with reference to this matter. I had not looked at this Return; but he gave me the amount of the circulation from the last bank Return we had. I spoke from that report. This Return referred to is not to the end of April.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT: There is no great difference in the amount of circulation. The difference is in the amount of gold.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: I understood from the Deputy that the amount in circulation at this date is $12,511,000, and he said he had not given the order with reference to the transfer of specie, because he expected this Resolution to pass at an early date.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT: I rather think the error has arisen with the person who furnished the hon. gentleman with the statement he read. Supposing that we had to hold 25 per cent. for the $9,000,000 of Dominion notes, instead of 20 per cent.—that would account for the error of $400,000. With regard to these Resolutions themselves, I think it is to be regretted they could not have been brought down at an earlier period. This was one of the measures specially promised in the Speech from the Throne, and it would have been more convenient and desirable that we should have carefully considered a well-digested measure which we might have discussed in the earlier weeks of the Session. However, I take it that I am not doing either the Government or the hon. the Minister of Finance any great injustice in imagining their views on this subject have undergone rather considerable modifications since the date of the Speech from the Throne. I rather think that if it were possible for us to pry into the sacred mysteries of the Cabinet, we should find that these Resolutions are by no manner of means those originally intended to have been proposed, and that the deputation of bankers which waited on the hon. the Finance Minister succeeded in altering, to a very considerable extent, the proposals which he originally intended to submit to the House. I suppose it will be convenient to take the Resolutions all together. There are three objections which occur to me as having a rather serious bearing on the propositions now submitted. In the first place, it is quite clear that this measure will raise the amount of Government notes to be either put directly into circulation, or held by the banks, to the sum of $20,000,000 from the sum of about $12,000,000, and this is a long step in the direction of the Government taking the entire control of the currency of the country. I am aware that this is a matter on which there always has been, and probably always will be, a great diversity of opinion. Theoretically, I am not prepared to say that the objections to this course are at all so strong as they are in a practical point of view. In my own opinion, it has always appeared to me that, there was great danger in the Government assuming control of the circulation, partly because they would find it very difficult to perform, officially, those functions which banks perform, more particularly in the way of expanding and contracting the circulation; and also because the universal experience of all countries shows that whenever a Government has taken charge of the circulation, it has almost always resulted in the country having an irredeemable currency in a longer or shorter period, as is well known to have been the case, not only with the adjoining Republic, but with a great number of European countries. In the next place, I am inclined to fear that the practical working of this measure may be such that in times of stringency, when a large amount of currency may come back on the Finance Minister's hands, he might find himself compelled to take measures which would have a very considerable tendency to aggravate the commercial crises which are apt to prevail from time to time. And lastly, which is, perhaps, the most important objection, it is quite clear, judging from the working of the last measure, that this step will still further diminish the small amount of gold reserves which is now held in this country. Now, I regard that as a grave objection. At this present moment, although our banks are reasonably well fortified with reserves, the total amount of gold which our banks possess is very little over $6,700,000. In the last Gazette return which I have in my hand, it is given at $6,705,000, but that omits several banks which, I suppose, hold smaller or larger amounts. Now, at the time these measures were first introduced by Sir A. T. Galt, and afterwards by Sir Francis Hincks, this result has been very apparent, that the tendency of the banks has been steadily, from year to year, to hold more Dominion notes and to hold less gold. I regard that as a dangerous thing in a country circumstanced as we are. Our position is somewhat peculiar. We have a circulation of extremely small notes, and we have next to no specie currency of any kind in actual use, with the exception of a small silver currency. In the case of England, with whose system we may advantageously compare our own, it is known to all hon. gentlemen who have paid any attention to this subject, that the smallest note in circulation is a five pound note, although in Scotland and Ireland there is a circulation almost identical with that to which the hon. gentleman proposes to limit the banks. But in England the minimum circulation, consists of notes of $25 each, and, in addition to the reserves held by the Bank of England, there is a very large amount of gold always in circulation. It is difficult to estimate the amount so held, but I believe those who are best qualified to speak on the subject, think that there is as much as sixty or seventy million pounds sterling in circulation in that country, or about an equivalent of three hundred and fifty million dollars of our money, which constitutes a valuable reserve upon which, in case of emergency, the banks or the Government might, if they saw fit, easily draw by the substitution of a smaller denomination of bills than that now in use. Our position at present, I think, has hardly been fairly tested. Almost from the moment that Sir Francis Hicks introduced the measure in its present shape—almost from that moment we have been steadily and continuously borrowing large sums on the other side of the Atlantic. I think, to the best of my recollection, from about the year 1873, we have entirely ceased to remit any sterling exchange to England, except in very small amounts, for the purpose of meeting the annual interest on our indebtedness. Now, I will call the attention of the Minister of Finance to this. We have at present an annual indebtedness to pay in England of between seven and eight million dollars, and it is quite clear that as soon as we stop borrowing in England we shall be under the necessity of remitting in sterling exchange or in gold, this sum from year to year, quarterly, for the purpose of meeting our annual interest. Now, under these circumstances, I fear that there may be considerably more inconvenience than he expects from a measure which will certainly, I think, have the effect of enormously diminishing the very small stock of gold which we now hold in Canada. At the present moment, with the exception of six or seven million dollars held by the banks, there is no gold, that I am aware of, held by our people except this $2,690,000, as credited in the Gazette returns. What I fear will happen in this matter is this: I suspect that we will find that this additional issue of $8,000,000 will have the effect of reducing the six or seven millions of gold to an extremely small figure; that it will become in a great measure a forced loan from the banks, just as the original eight or nine millions which they now hold was practically a forced loan of a certain proportion of their gold. I need not remind the House, that although Dominion legal tender notes are perfectly good as Canadian money, they will not do to pay our foreign remittances with. What I fear is that the Minister of Finance, as this measure develops and expands on his hands, will find himself compelled to give a great deal more attention to the demands of the Mother Country for bullion, and to the commercial stringencies that may arise from time to time, than is either expedient or convenient. The hon. gentleman will soon discover, that under such circumstances the Government of a country will always be held responsible for any serious contraction that takes place. Now, I may say to him that it was largely the conviction of the mischiefs that would arise from this, and largely the experience of the inconvenience that arose from having had at short notice to supply large additional quantities of gold, that induced me three or four years ago to alter the terms of the law as introduced by Sir Francis Hincks. I desired, so far as possible, that this business of supplying gold might be worked with a minimum of inconvenience to the public and to the Finance Department. I believe that at that time, at any rate, the measure I resolved upon of compelling that Department to hold dollar for dollar for all excesses over twelve millions, was as far as it was then safe to go. I can assure the Minister of Finance that during several of the years during which the former system prevailed, very considerable practical inconvenience did arise from the necessity of the Department reinforcing itself with specie from time to time. It is my impression that that inconvenience will not be diminished, but will be largely aggravated if he gets out the additional $8,000,000 he proposes to issue. The hon. gentleman said very little as to the mode in which he proposed to keep out his circulation. Of course we all understand that payments, such as those that he spoke of, to be made to the Indians at a distance, will give him circulation for a short time, but I think he has hardly any conception as to the rapidity with which, even in those distant countries, a circulation of this kind is returned upon the hands of the issuer. I presume that he does not intend to compel the Indians to accept notes redeemable at Halifax, or Toronto, or Montreal. I presume, as a matter of course, that he will deal "on the square" with these wards of ours, and that they will receive notes which will be payable at Winnipeg. Well, I am inclined to think that both there and in other parts of the country, the hon. gentleman will find the circulation returning with amazing rapidity. I can speak with some little experience on this subject, because nothing was more noteworthy in old Canada than the extreme rapidity with which the large amount of circulation withdrawn, for the purpose of moving crops, was in the habit of being returned on the various banks. I think he will find that precisely the same thing will happen with respect to the issues which he intends to get out in that way. What the hon. gentleman said with respect to the amount of actual circulation we now have is quite true. The total amount of such circulation is very small, not more, I think, than about $3,000,000, or thereabouts in small notes. I may remark, in connection with this, that when you come to take into account the fact that for these three millions you must hold some reserve, although but a small reserve, and that you must prepare these notes and maintain this reserve, in various places, for the purpose of circulating them, even to the extent we do, I may remind him that the cost of obtaining circulation is considerable, and will make a very serious inroad, I am afraid, in the profits he may expect to obtain therefrom. I know, of course, he attempts to provide for this by compelling the banks to pay every body that demands sums of $50, in ones and twos, and I am not prepared to say that it will not have some effect, though probably much below the effect the hon. gentleman expects. As for the rest, I fear it will become, to all intents and purposes, a forced loan, which the banks will pay to a very great extent out of the small amount of gold they now have. The result will be that the hon. gentleman will have laid on his shoulders the responsibility of providing practically almost all the gold that the banks want. I am aware that up to the present time far less inconvenience has arisen from that than might have been expected, but what was the cause? The hon. gentleman himself alluded to it in one portion of his remarks. We have had most extensive public works going on. We have been steadily borrowing large sums of money, and we have had during the last six or seven years larger amounts to our credit in the banks than we would naturally have had, or perhaps we ought to have had, and, of course, on that account, we have had the banks, to a considerable extent, in our own hands. But if another state of things arose, as it probably would if we ceased borrowing to any great extent, if we run down our balances, as we will probably have to do, to a tolerably small amount, then a greater inconvenience will arise than we have yet experienced, and that inconvenience is going to be aggravated by this additional issue. Nor is it unworthy of note that in this measure we are going a little further than we have hitherto gone in the way of borrowing money at short notice at all. The credit of the Dominion is pledged to redeem all or any portion of this $20,000,000 when the notes are presented for redemption. We have also a considerable amount in the Savings Bank, a portion of which may, under certain circumstances, return upon our hands. I do not at all deny the right of the people of Canada to a fair share of the profits of the circulation. That I have always contended for myself, but I point out to you that the total circulation is only $21,000,000 or $22,000,000, even deducting the $3,000,000, now out of the remaining $17,000,000 or $18,000,000 will undoubtedly be a very large share of the profits derivable from the circulation. While the banks have a monopoly specially conferred upon them by Parliament, that is no reason why a fair proportion of these profits should not go to the state ; but I think I am justified in saying that it is a very serious error to think that the banks have profited unreasonably or unfairly by their exclusive privileges. I do not believe that from the year 1850, the holders of bank stock have received more than 6 per cent. on an average, considering that a large portion of bank stock has been blotted out since that time. To my mind, the way in which the hon. gentleman proposes to diminish the power of banks in extending this circulation is dangerous. It will extract a large amount of capital from the available Wages Fund of the people of this Dominion, and when we can get capital at such low rates in England, it would be much better to obtain capital as we want it, than for the Government to lay hands, as we are now doing, on the Bank Gold Reserves, or the circulation of banks to any very large extent. I am not, myself, sufficiently familiar with the American system which, at one time, there was some intention of introducing, to be able to say with the accuracy I could wish how far the advantages and disadvantages of that system compare with ours. But I will say this, that on the whole, no great proportion of our people have been serious losers by the failures which have taken place under the old Canadian banking system, which will compare very favourably with those of England, France and Scotland, as far as the last twenty-five or thirty years ago. I do not anticipate from the propositions just made any very great immediate evil, but I foresee that he will find himself compelled to use much greater vigilance in watching the money market than he has done hitherto, and he will find himself severely censured for many difficulties that will arise and which he cannot prevent. In his second system of Resolution, I see he proposes to make the notes a first lien on the assets of the bank. I am aware that in this case also there is a great difference of opinion, but I am rather inclined to think that the hon. gentleman, if he consults the experience of banks, will find two things. First of all, there is far more danger of a run from depositors than from noteholders. Under the system he now proposes, there is a danger that a large number of these depositors may be alarmed by the provision the hon. gentleman is now making, and I am afraid that there will be more danger to the credit of the bank from alarm arising among depositors, who are far less easy to deal with than noteholders, as a general rule. Then it is likely that a great number of the depositors will take the opportunity of changing their deposits into notes, if there be the slightest difficulty in getting gold, and there may be some serious inconveniences against which the hon. gentleman can make no provision. I would have been very glad to have heard from the hon. Minister of Finance his opinion as to the proposals which have been freely circulated throughout the country to make us rich by means of a national currency. I observe the hon. gentleman, perhaps, with commendable prudence, has entirely abstained from any allusion to the advantages to flow from that system. I presume that the hon. gentleman is not going to introduce in his Bill any very important alterations in the Banking Act. If he had, he would have taken the opportunity of alluding to them. In any case, anything further I may have to say, I will reserve until the time of the second reading of the Bill.

Mr. WALLACE (South Norfolk) : The hon. gentleman, who has just taken his seat, has spoken of a proposition in circulation in the country of making people rich by issuing a National Currency. Now I happen to be an advocate of a National Currency, and know pretty well the views of those who advocate it. There is no such absurdity advanced by those advocates as that of making people rich by issuing a National Currency. They know there are no means by which men can become rich except by labour and the accumulation of labour. Although I regret that the Government have not gone farther than they have, I feel like congratulating the hon. the Minister of Finance and his colleagues upon what they have done. I recognise the fact that no Government can go far in advance of its supporters, or of public opinion, without ensuring its own destruction, and by that destruction accomplishing no good ; therefore, it would be folly, on the part of the Government, to attempt to legislate so that neither the House, nor their supporters, nor the country, would sustain them, and in acting cautiously in inaugurating what I believe to be a great reform, they are doing well. We hear much about the waves of depression that are periodically sweeping across the world, making revolutions in commerce, and we are told that they revolve in cycles. Now, I cannot understand anything of this sort. Everything has a cause; and what are the causes of these periodical depressions? Why do they revolve, as it is said, in cycles. I can understand, if a hurricane sweeps across the country and destroys property, that it will bring misery. I can understand if the earth refuses to yield its increase, that it will bring misery; I can understand frost destroying crops; I can understand other natural causes creating misery and commercial disaster, but I cannot understand commercial disasters coming without any of these apparent causes. There must be some other cause, and if there be, I hold it is the duty of Parliament to see if these revolutions in commerce are attributable to any active legislation; and if they be, I hold it is the duty of Parliament to remedy these wrongs by legislation, for I believe that whatever man does, man can prevent. I believe that these depressions are, in a great measure, if not entirely, due to the false monetary system that prevails in many countries in the world, that regulates Great Britain, this country and some other countries, where what is known as a gold basis exists. I may be asked: "How do you account, through the instrumentality of this system, for these commercial crises?" I hold that the monetary systems referred to lacks what the hon. gentleman who has taken his seat fears, that a system, based upon the Resolution introduced by the hon. the Finance Minister, will lack the power of expansiveness. I hold that the expansiveness of the monetary system is not in an equal ratio to the expansiveness of the industry of the world; therefore, credit takes its place, and to broken credit are due, in a great degree, the periodical revulsions in commerce. If any other gentleman can give a better reason for these commercial revulsions it is his duty, if possible, to try to remedy these evils. I hold that the gold basis is a false system. It has in it the elements of weakness. It carries with it that which destroys itself. An industry built upon a gold basis can only expand until it outgrows its gold basis, and the moment it does that it must fail, or something else must take the place of gold. Credit steps in, and when credit breaks down by being overdone failures take place, confidence is destroyed, and down comes the whole fabric, just like a child's house of cards. I hold these break-downs are lamentable. They are caused in this way: The more prosperous a country is, the more quickly it outgrows its basis, and the more quickly comes ruin. The failure of J. Cooke and Company, in 1873, began the great crisis on the other side that spread to this country. It involved the failure of others, and these failures created a want of confidence, which destroyed the whole system of credit. Then universal ruin swept over the whole world, and it was due entirely to the false monetary system on which a very large share of the business of the world is conducted. I intend, as briefly as I possibly can, to go into this matter, to show why I think the system we are adopting is a good system, except in this way: That having a gold basis at all, we have the element of distinction within it. It will be necessary to consider money, its uses, and the effects upon the industry of the world. It is a creator of law. Some hon. gentlemen will say it is gold, others that it is silver. I contend that it is neither. Take a sovereign or a ten-dollar gold eagle. It is the imprint of the Government that distinguishes between money and gold. Gold, as money, is two commodities. It is, first, the commodity gold, and, in addition to that, it is the commodity money. Money is not gold. It is a commodity created by law. As an illustration take the timber in a waggon. It is true that it is still the same timber that it was before the waggon was made; but it is more, and by it you have created a new commodity. So it is with a piece of silver or a piece of gold, when you make it into money you create a new commodity; you make it into a legalised instrument of payment. If you contract with a man to deliver any article to him he cannot compel you to deliver that article; you can compel him to take money instead. Money is only the legal value by which all other values are measured. I may be told that gold is money and that money ought to be gold, because money is valuable and gold is valuable. But what is value? I may say value is usefulness. A thing of no use is of no value. Scarcity creates value it may be said. But it does not. Scarcity is a factor in determining the quantity of value in any article. If there was no want for a particular article, or if it was of no use, its scarcity would not create any value. Divisibility creates value. I say it does not. It is a factor in determining the value. You may take a useless article and divide it, but you do not make it useful. Indestructibility gives value. I say not. If an article is of no use, the fact of its being indestructible would not render it of worth; it would render it more than worthless, its indestructibility would prevent people getting rid of it. Abundance does not make value, the more abundant a useless article is, the greater nuisance it will be, as abundance tends to lessen value. The law of supply and demand comes into operation here. It is said that money must have intrinsic value. I contend it is not intrinsic value, but representative value. For instance, a man works a day and gets a dollar. What is the value of that dollar? It is the man's labour; and that is all he has to represent that labour. Money is not of intrinsic, but representative value. Money of intrinsic value is not fit to be money.

AN HON. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

MR. WALLACE: I hear some hon. gentleman say "hear, hear." I have no doubt some will sneer and laugh. I may be wrong, but if I am I am sincerely wrong in believing I am right. Money is simply the measure of value. Value cannot measure itself. The values of two articles are comparative, but the one cannot measure the other. In contradistinction the one to the other, one may be more valuable than the other, and all values are subject to supply and demand, which is the only regulator. If money is made of an article of value it must be subject to the law of supply and demand, it must therefore be a changing quantity, and a measure that would be a changing quantity would be an absurdity. Take a bushel of wheat. It is 60lb., but if it were a changing quantity, you never would know what a bushel of wheat was; it would be 60lb. at one time and 58lb. or 62lb. at other times. It is true that by law you do not allow the quantity to change in money. You make a dollar 100 cents. It is never 96 cents, 98 cents or 102 cents; but it changes in two ways, by its scarcity or its abundance, or, if it is of value, by the scarcity or abundance of the article of which the money is made. So I contend that money should not be of intrinsic value. Again, money does not determine value. The value of any article is a matter of agreement between parties to a bargain, between buyer and seller, money measures the quantity after it has been agreed upon, just as a yard measure determines the quantity of a piece of cloth, and as a pound weight determines a quantity of sugar or of any article sold by weight. It is by money that a man expresses the quantity of value he is willing to give for what he wants to buy, or that he will take for what he has to sell, and determines the quantity of one value that is to be given for another value for which it is to be exchanged. Money earns nothing. It produces nothing; it is only an evidence—if it has been legitimately obtained—that its possessor has earned it or bought it with the products of labour. There are various ways of getting money; one by means of loaning money at interest, another by swindling, or stealing, or robbery. Money is only a convenience. It is simply useful for exchanging products, just as railways and other conveyances assist in exchanging the products of different sections of a country and different countries. There is no reason why the convenience money should be gold any more than that railways and steamboats, which are conveniences for like purposes, should be gold. Money is not valuable for the gold in it, if it is gold, but for the power it gives a man to purchase commodities. A man does not want money to hoard it, but to use it, because only in using does he get any value in it. He has got to part with it before it is of any value to him. It is not because it is money that he wants it, but because the law has conferred a power upon it; because it will enable him to pay any debt or make any purchase. Now, as to borrowing money. The hon. the Minister of Finance thinks it best to borrow money. I think it better to make it. What do English capitalists lend money to Canada on? Simply because they trust in the credit of the country, because they have faith in its resources. Surely, if Canadian credit is good enough for foreign money-lenders, it should be good enough to employ Canadian labourers; and surely Canada can be trusted for the payment of their labour. Or is it that the people of Canada have less faith in the future of their country than Englishmen, who are willing to lend their money on Canada's credit. We are entering upon the construction of great public works in Canada. Canada has got the labour to perform the work. We are going on with the Pacific Railway, and it requires labour and material. Have we not hundreds of men standing idle to-day, and can we not set them to work. It is not money but labour and material that makes a railway; and if we have the labour and the material, have we not the food and the clothing to pay the labourer for his labour. We can do it, Sir, without borrowing money from England or any other country. I may be told that this money will depreciate. This I dispute. I hold that the money of a country, where gold, or paper, or silver, is used for money, must all be equal; because in either case it represents the credit and confidence in the country, and nothing more. Therefore, gold and paper money, as far as money is concerned, must be of equal value; that is, if the country stands. If this Government issued a paper dollar and a gold dollar, the people will take the paper dollar at the same rate as the gold dollar in payment of commodities, or in payment of any indebtedness of any kind. To say that there would be any difference between the paper dollar and the gold dollar would be to say that, of two things that are equal, one is greater than the other. Each one has the fiat of Canada, and carries with it the confidence and worth of the people of Canada, and, therefore, one cannot predominate over the other. Outside of the country the paper dollar and the gold dollar must stand or fall by the relative values of the commodities of what they are made, or by the confidence the outside world has in the country of their creation. The gold dollar in that case must be worth much more than the paper dollar, because the former, as a commodity, may be worth 90 or 95 per cent. of its money value, whereas the latter may be worth less than 1 per cent. of its nominal value. You can, therefore, readily understand that, when the money of a country passes beyond the limit of the power of its creation, one may be worth more than the other. If gold and paper money, equal in Canada, are offered an Englishman or a foreigner, of these two the gold coin will be the material of the money of nearly all the countries in the world, and will have a commodity value everywhere, whereas, the paper money will only be valuable for buying or paying in Canada; and if the holder of the two kinds of money can buy produce in Russia, or elsewhere, cheaper than in Canada, the gold would be worth more than the Canadian paper money. In that way the gold dollar would be more than the paper dollar; but if the goods of Canada were much cheaper than those of other countries where gold is the money, then the paper dollar would be equal to the gold dollar, for as much could be purchased with one as with the other. In fact, I think the one—the paper—would be worth more than the other, because the paper could be more easily and safely transmitted than gold. Then again, we are told that paper money is fiat money. I would like to see a piece of money that is not fiat money; that is, not created by the law. All money is fiat money; without the fiat of the law it would not have existence. Take away the imprint of the law from a gold or silver piece, and it is no longer money. The existence of money depends upon its creation by the law. It may be asked, how can we carry on trade with outsiders? It might carry on the trade of the country internally. I say we have no possible way of trading with other countries except by products. Again, I contend it does not interfere, in the slightest degree, with our trading with foreign countries, for the simple reason that we trade with our productions. Our wheat, grain of all kinds, or butter and cheese, our fish and all kinds of products, form the basis of our trade with other nations. It is not our gold, because we have none, except what we buy, except what little we dig out of the mines of British Columbia and Nova Scotia, or what is brought into the country by immigrants. By issuing paper money we would create a greater demand for labour; there would be more employment for immigrants, and, by the increased production, would have more to export. We may get more gold in that way, and in no other, unless we are going to follow out the ruinous practice we have been following of late, of borrowing money. I believe the country has been running fast to ruin owing to the borrowing proclivities of all classes, and our true interests demand that this ruinous practice should stop. Then, gold is spoken of as a standard of value. I contend there can be no such thing as a standard of value, that the value of anything is just what people will give for it—the value of the article to them. To say that gold is a standard of value, is a perfect absurdity, which any one can demonstrate. When a man wants to get food, clothing, or a house to live in, he gives gold for them. Then, how is gold a standard of value? If a man were perishing with hunger and thirst, he would give all the gold in the world if he had it, for a loaf of bread or a drink of water. There can be no regulator of value, except one, and that is the law of supply and demand. If an article is abundant, the tendency of abundance is to make it cheap; if it is scarce, the tendency of scarcity is to make it dear. I want the House to take this into consideration. We are all the advocates of a National Policy. We believe that this country ought to produce to the greatest extent that which the population require. I contend, therefore, that money which is not exportable, which cannot be sent out to buy foreign goods, is the truest and best system of Protection, because it would protect the people without taxation. If we import more goods than we send out exports to pay, we must have gold wherewith to make the purchases. Then, if gold is scarce, it will be high in price, and if it is high in price, imported goods will advance in a ratio equal to the increased price of the gold required for their purchases. Importers will take this into consideration, and will say: The exports are going to be light this season, because crops are small and timber is scarce, and therefore, if we have to import goods, we will have to pay a high premium in order to meet our payments. What is the result of this high price of gold? The importer puts on an additional percentage on his goods to cover the cost of the gold. The additional price of imported goods would stimulate manufactures, because people would say: "We can afford to manufacture such and such an article at a less price than we can buy it at." Again, I contend that non-exportable money tends to the stability of the governmental institutions of the country. For instance, if a man can put his money into his pocket and can go and live in any other country, what object has he to stay here if any difficulty arises. He would say: I will take my gold and escape the dangers. But if he had non-exportable money, he would be obliged to stay and fight for the country, because he would know that if its governmental institutions should be overthrown, his money would be worthless to him. Thus, this class of money would give stability to the Government, because, not being an article of value outside of the country, every man would be more bound to fight for it than if he had no such incentive to his patriotism. I do not intend to occupy the House at any great length, but I simply want to present my views on this money question. When the Resolution comes up in Committee, I intend to move an amendment to, because I believe that the Government are tying up public opinion by allowing the banks the privilege, for the next ten years, of issuing the currency. I have simply dealt with the Resolution now before the House in a way which commends itself to my judgment as being in the interests of the country, and it is for hon. gentlemen to take the matter into their earnest consideration. I ask them to forget that they are partisans; I ask them to be patriots, and ask themselves what they should do for the best interests of the Dominion, and, after having decided, to act in accordance with the decision of their judgments. I believe that to the present system of money, which is lauded up as the perfection of wisdom, is due the fact that there are so many men out of employment. It is said that over-production is the cause; but what are the facts? Are not nearly half the people of the world almost naked? There is an over-production of clothing, and yet there are so many persons naked. There is an over-production of food, and yet there are hundreds of thousands of starving men. There are thousands of empty houses, and yet there are hundreds of thousands without habitations wherein to shelter themselves from the cold. I believe this system has brought ruin to every country which has adopted it, and burdened with misery the people. If hon. gentlemen agree with me they can support my amendment, but if they believe that what I have put forward is not true, it will be their duty to do all they can to controvert the propositions I have put before the House.

MR. CHARLTON: With reference to the matter more immediately before the House, the proposition of the Government to increase the legal tender currency of the country, I shall have very little to say, further than to express my conviction that the step taken by the hon. the Minister of Finance is in a dangerous direction. A danger always surrounds a Government that engages in the issue of legal tender paper. The Government has no law above itself. There is nothing to restrain the Government, which may first enter upon this policy with proper restrictions, from exceeding those restrictions. There is nothing to restrain it from entering upon a course with reference to paper money that may prove ruinous. I will cite one or two authorities on this subject which, I am sure, will commend themselves to the House. I will first quote from Alexander Hamilton, Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, who placed the finances of that country on a firm basis, and restored them to good order after the Revolutionary War. He says:

“Paper emissions by the Government are of a nature so liable to abuse, I may say so certain to be abused, that the wisdom of the Government will be shown by never trusting itself with so seducing and dangerous a power.”

The only authority in addition which I will cite is that of another Finance Minister of the United States, who has led to a victorious conclusion the attempts to resume specie payments in that country. I refer to John Sherman, who said in a speech upon the currency question in the Senate, Jan. 24, 1870:

MR. WALLACE.

“So there are a multitude of other questions that might be drawn into this discussion. The question of a choice between greenbacks and bank-notes might be drawn into it, but we have avoided any reference to it, because I believe the judgment of the country is gradually settling down to the conviction that a note issued by a Government cannot be a proper agency of circulation. Other nations as well as our own have often tried the experiment of maintaining a circulating note issued by the Government, and they have uniformly found it to fail. It is impossible to give a currency issued by a Government the flexibility necessary to meet the movement of the exchanges; and, therefore, experience has shown that a note issued by a Government and maintained upon the guarantee of the Government alone, does not form a good circulating medium, except during a suspension of specie payments. It must have a flexibility which will enable it to be increased in certain periods of the year, and to flow back again into the vaults of the banks at others. I am convinced, although it is unnecessary to dwell upon that point here, that in time it will be wise to retire our United States notes and all forms of Government circulation, and depend upon notes issued by private corporations, amply secured beyond peradventure, so that in no case can the noteholder lose, and to subject the banks to regulations applicable to all parts of the country, making them free, so that the business of banking will be like the business of manufacturing, blacksmithing, or any other ordinary occupation or business of life, governed only by general law.”

It is a well-known fact that the ablest financiers of the United States are in favour of retiring the greenback circulation entirely, and confining the bank note circulation to the issues by the National Banks. I must hold, if the Government insist upon this policy, that the specie reserve is too small. A reserve of 15 per cent. on the issues is not sufficiently large to give that confidence as to character and redemption of those issues that the public should have. I shall now proceed to consider some of the points raised by the hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Wallace). Although the danger arising from the agitation in favour of irredeemable currency may not be great, yet it would be folly to underestimate the gravity of the changes that the gentlemen engaged in the agitation seek to bring about. It is a peculiarity of mankind that we always find a considerable portion of the population ready to embrace any creed or theory, to believe any delusive promise that any political quack may make, if he offers relief from hardship, hard times, or any of the ills that pertain to humanity. And it is this peculiarity of the human mind that render such agitations dangerous. I have been struck, not only to-day, but upon all occasions when I have heard this policy advocated, by the poverty of invention which characterises it advocates. I have been struck with the fact that their arguments are old arguments revamped. They are the very arguments that were used in France in the time of George Law; they are the very arguments used in the French Assembly in 1876; they are the very arguments used in the American Colonies; they are the very arguments used in the American Confederacy when continental money was issued; they are the arguments of all the men who have sought to resort to a worthless issue of irredeemable paper money in all ages, and which have been refuted over and over again by reason and by the logic of facts. It is only to be wondered that any gentleman, with the ability which the hon. member for South Norfolk unquestionably possesses, should have the courage to stand up in the House of Commons and advocate an old heresy, which has brought ruin and distress upon the countries that have tried it. I propose to fortify my position to-day by citing the testimony of men of great eminence. I will also cite the testimony of events, and I think I shall succeed in proving to this House and the country that the reasoning of the hon. member is fallacious and utterly without foundation. I will first quote the testimony of Mr. Francis Horner, chairman of the Bullion Committee of the English House Commons, in 1811, than whom there is no higher authority on this question. He uses the following language :

“The several successive steps which have been observed in every country that allowed its currency to fall into a state of depreciation, are coming upon us faster than was to have been expected in this country, and, as there will be no recovery after bank notes are made a legal tender, the discussions which precede such a measure are evidently of the last importance.”

And the report of the Bullion Committee, of which Mr. Horner was Chairman, was in substance as follows :

“The substance of the Resolutions may be stated as follows : The Act which suspended specie payment ought to be repealed, and the bank forced to redeem its notes as soon as due caution would permit. To facilitate resumption the smallest notes were first to be withdrawn. It was thought that after two years no notes of less than £5 should be allowed to circulate.”

It may be comfortable to my hon. friend for South Norfolk, to be able to point to that precedent of folly set by the British House of Commons, which at once gravely proceeded to declare that a paper issue was equal to specie, when at that moment it stood at 15 per cent discount. But the views of Mr. Horner prevailed after the country had experienced the hardships and ills resulting from an irredeemable currency, and ten years from that time the Bank of England resumed specie payments. I will next quote the eminent legal jurist Judge Story, and I think no legal gentleman here will be disposed to dispute the weight of his opinion. With reference to the continental currency issues, that gentleman said :

“They entailed the most enormoust evils on the country, and introduced a system of fraud, chicanery and profligacy which destroyed all private confidence and all industry, and all enterprise.”

Chief Justice Marshall, speaking for the Supreme Court of the United States, on the subject of irredeemable paper money, says :

“Such a medium has always been liable to fluctuation. Its value is continually changing, and those changes, often great and sudden, expose individuals to immense loss, are the source of numerous speculations, and destroy all confidence between man and man.”

In a letter from Richard Henry Lee, President of Congress, to George Washington, 19th November, 1785, occurs the following paragraph :

“Is it possible that a plan can be formed for issuing a large sum of paper money by the next Assembly? I do verily believe that the greatest foes we have in the world could not devise a more effectual plan for ruining Virginia. I should suppose that every friend to his country, every honest and sober man, would join heartily to reprobate so nefarious a plan of speculation.”

To it Washington replied :

“I have never heard, and I hope never shall hear, any serious mention of a paper emission in this State; yet such a thing may be in agitation. Ignorance and design are productive of much mischief. The former is the tool of the latter, and is often set to work suddenly and unexpectedly. Those with whom I have conversed on the subject in this part of the State, reprobate the idea exceedingly."

Benjamin Franklin, in reference to this matter, bears the following testimony :

"I lament with you the many mischiefs, the injustice, the corruption of manners, etc., that attended a depreciated currency. It is some consolation to me that I washed my hands of that evil by predicting it in Congress, and proposing means that would have been effectual to prevent it if they had been adopted. Subsequent operations that I have executed demonstrate that my plan was practicable ; but it was unfortunately rejected."

The name of no public man of this century will command greater respect than that of Daniel Webster. In commenting on the objects in view in framing the American Constitution, he said :

"The establishment of a sound and uniform currency was one of the greatest ends contemplated in the adoption of the Constitution. If we could explore all the motives of those who framed and those who supported the Constitution, we should hardly find a more powerful one than this."

In point of fact that Constitution prohibited the emission of bills of credit by States, and undoubtedly the prohibition was intended to apply to the United States Government itself, and it was so held by the United States Supreme Court on one occasion when the matter was brought up on appeal ; and it was only set aside, I may say, by packing that Court, by appointing three new Justices. James Madeson, the father of the American constitution, in arguing for its adoption and referring to the evils of irredeemable paper money, said :

"The loss which America has sustained from the pestilent effects of paper money, on the necessary confidence between man, and the necessary confidence in the public councils, on the industry and morals of the people, and on the character of Republican Government, constitutes an enormous debt against the States chargeable with this unadvised measure which must long remain unsatisfied ; or rather it is an accumulation of guilt which can be expiated no otherwise than by a voluntary sacrifice on the altar of justice of the power which has been the instrument of it."

It was believed that power was sacrificed when the constitution provided that letters of credit should not be issued by the States. In relation to the same subject, Daniel Webster in his speech upon Legal Currency, April 25th, 1816, says :

"Wars and invasions are not always the most certain destroyers of National prosperity. They announce their own approach, and the alarm. Not so with the evils of a debased coin, a depreciated paper currency, or a depressed and falling public credit. Not so with the plausible and insidious mischiefs of a paper-money system. These insinuate themselves in the shape of facilities, accommodation and relief. They hold out the most fallacious hope of an easy payment of debts and a light burden of taxes. * * * I know the great use of such paper as is convertible into hard money on demand, which may be called specie paper, and which is equivalent to specie in value, and much more convenient and useful for common purposes. On the other hand, I abhor all irredeemable paper—everything in the shape of paper issued for circulation, whether by Government or individuals, which cannot be turned into gold or silver at the will of the holder."

Upon another occasion, in referring to the same subject, Webster uses the following language :

"A disordered currency is one of the greatest of political evils. It undermines the virtues necessary for the support of the social system and encourages propensities destructive of its happiness. It wars against industry, frugality and economy, and it fosters the evil spirit of extravagance and speculation. Of all contrivances for cheating the labouring classes of mankind none has been more effectual than that which deluded them with paper money. Ordinary tyranny, oppression, excessive taxation, these bear lightly on the happiness of the community, compared with the fraudulent currencies and the robberies committed by depreciated paper. Our own history has recorded for our instruction enough, and more than enough, of the demoralizing tendency, the injustice, and the intolerable oppression of the virtuous and well disposed, of a degraded paper currency authorised by law or in any way countenanced by Government."

Henry Clay, in reference to this subject, says :

"If there be, in regard to currency, one truth which the united experience of the whole commercial world has established, I had supposed it to be that emissions of paper money constitute the very worst of all conceivable species of currency."

Andrew Jackson makes use of the following language on the subject :

"There never was, nor ever could be, use for any other kind (than redeemable currency), except for speculators and gamblers in stocks ; and this to the utter ruin of the labour and morals of the country. A specie currency gives life and action to the producing classes, on which the prosperity of all is founded."

Solmon P. Chase, the father of the green-back and legal tender system of the United States and, no doubt, a great authority with the hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Wallace) in 1862 used the following language :

"The Secretary recommends no mere paper money scheme; but on the contrary, a series of measures looking to a safe and gradual return to gold and silver as the only permanent basis, standard and measure of value recognised by the Constitution.—[Annual Report of the Secretary of the Treasury, 1862.]"

This gentleman was no believer in fiat money. He recommended the temporary suspension of specie payments under a great national exigency, but with the distinct pledge that the people should be ultimately paid in gold, provision for which, and for the payment of the interest on the bonds in gold, was made by the enforcement of the payment of duties on coin. Thaddeus Stevens, the Republican Leader in Congress, and Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, gives utterance to the following sentiments:

"No one would willingly issue paper currency not redeemable on demand, and make it a legal tender. It is never desirable to depart from the circulating medium which, by the common consent of civilised nations, forms the standard of value.—[Chairman of Ways and Means Com., on debate on Legal Tender Act.]"

The gifted Charles Sumner gave expression to the following sentiments in speaking of the currency question:

"I am not content with the long postponement of specie payment, I believe the time has come for this blessing, and I begin to be impatient when I see how easily people find excuses for not accepting it."

Perhaps the name of Abraham Lincoln may carry as great weight even here, as the utterances of my hon. friend from South Norfolk. Mr. Lincoln observed on this question:

"A return to specie payments at the earliest period compatible with due regard to all interests concerned, should ever be kept in view. Fluctuations in the value of currency are always injurious, and to reduce these fluctuations to the lowest possible point will always be a leading purpose in wise legislation. Convertibility, prompt and certain convertibility into coin, is acknowledged to be the best and surest safeguard against them.—[Annual Message, Dec., 1862.]"

My quotations from eminent men may appropriately be concluded with an extract from Macaulay's "History of England," as follows:

"The evils produced by a bad state of the currency are not such as have generally been thought worthy to occupy a prominent place in history; yet it may well be doubted whether all the misery inflicted on the English nation in a quarter of a century by bad Kings, bad Ministers, bad Parliaments, and bad Judges was equal to the misery caused in a single year by a bad currency.

Those men are all dead and gone; their record is made up and their opinions are worthy of our consideration. I have quoted authorities than which no higher can be quoted on questions of finance; and the opinions of those who have made financial questions their study almost unanimously agree with those I have quoted. You will scarcely find a work on Political Economy that does not hold the views that I have enunciated here; and amongst all the experiments, and the experiments have been numerous, and tried in various ages of the world, with irredeemable money, there are but two instances in history where such emissions have been redeemed—where they have not brought either utter ruin or great disaster on the countries that have permitted them; these two instances are, first, England; and, second, the United States. In only one of those instances, that of the United States, was the paper currency made a legal tender. The issues of the Bank of England were never largely increased, but were kept within proper limits and bounds, and yet, notwithstanding the confidence of the public that those issues would be ultimately redeemed, and the fact that the Bank of England professed to be able to redeem in gold at any time, the notes were depreciated 30 per cent.; and in the United States, where there was a distinct promise on the part of the Government that its issues should be redeemed in gold, and where the volume of paper issues was carefully restricted, the discount on those notes became enormous, the premium on gold being at one time above 180, \$100 in gold being worth \$280 in this currency, notwithstanding that the people had undoubting faith that they would be redeemed as promised. This is one evidence of the small effect that the promise of a Government will have in maintaining the value of the currency when not immediately redeemable in gold. I have one instance further in illustration of this principle—it is that of the National Banks of the United States. Every bank was compelled to deposit with the Government \$100 in gold-bearing bonds, the interest payable annually in specie, to secure an issue of \$90 in currency, and yet, notwithstanding that these notes were thus secured, they were as low as the United States greenbacks. This shows the effect produced when a currency is not instantly convertible into gold. I defy the hon. member for South Norfolk, or any advocate of fiat money, irredeemable or rag money of any kind, to show any instance in history where this experiment has been tried that it has not proved disastrous. I think we may come to the consideration of the practical operation of this system and dismiss all those fine-spun theories and volumes of words about money, capital and labour, values, etc., and take the broad, naked, plain facts as they stare us in the face, which show that in every instance where the theory has been tried, disaster has resulted. I may repeat some things I said last year in reference to this matter. It is not improper to repeat the lessons then brought before the House. It would not be improper to reiterate them a thousand times till every Canadian knows that actual trials and ample experience constitute the most powerful and convincing arguments against this scheme. The American colonies made the most ample trial of an irredeemable paper currency. Almost all of them issued money endorsed by the State, the result being the same in all cases. In Connecticut, in 1749, \$8 in currency was only worth \$1 in silver. In Rhode Island, in 1769, \$1 in silver would purchase \$26 in legal tender of that Colony. In North Carolina, in 1840, \$1 in silver purchased \$14 of legal tender; in 1740, in South Carolina, \$1 in silver would purchase \$8 in legal tender. In 1749, \$1 in silver would purchase \$11 of legal tender in Massachusetts. During the period of those paper money experiments, great disaster and great derangement in business existed in those Colonies, and industry was prostrated. We have further back in history many cases proving very conclusively what the operation of legal tender paper money always was. In China, in the ninth century, its Government issued fiat money, a currency stamped upon mulberry bark; the value of the money depending upon the size of the pieces. It was to be received and pass current on pain of death, but it was found, notwithstanding, impossible to keep it afloat, and it ultimately became utterly worthless. One of the most useful lessons supplied with regard to this question is the experience of the United States in the first years of her history. Notwithstanding the lessons those Colonies had furnished, of the evils of our irredeemable currency, under the pressure of the necessities created by the Revolutionary War, Congress emitted a large quantity of paper money. The notes were to be paid in Spanish milled dollars. The credit of the country was pledged for their payment, in silver. The first issue was made in 1775 of \$2,000,000, and eighteen months after the notes stood at 50 per cent. discount. In October, 1779, \$1 in silver would purchase \$30 in continental money. At this juncture certificates redeemable at the end of six years, and bearing interest at the rate of 5 per cent. were issued, and the privilege was given to fund continental money in those certificates at the rate of \$40 in continental currency to \$1 in certificates. This was practically going into bankruptcy and paying 2½ cents on the dollar in a new promise to pay. Before the end of 1780 these certificates sank to ⅓ of their nominal value, at which rate \$320 in continental currency was equal to \$8 in certificates or to \$1 in silver. Shortly after this \$1,000 in currency equalled \$1 in silver and almost immediately afterwards it became utterly worthless. The issues of the Continental States were \$241,000,000. It was a currency abundantly cheap and fulfilled all the conditions that the hon. member for South Norfolk requires, being without value and easily obtained, though the promise to pay in silver would, in his opinion, be an objection. The consequences of the issue of this mass of currency were most disastrous to the country when it had run its course and an attempt was made to come back to a solid basis. Property was swept away under execution for debt without satisfying the claims, and in some States stay laws were enacted which prolonged the difficulty. In Massachusetts it was wisely determined to get rid of the evil as soon as possible. This occasioned the breaking out of the Shay Rebellion, which threatened the stability of the institutions of that State. All these were evils of a class which invariably manifest themselves under similar circumstances. With reference to England, the Bank of England suspended in 1797. As I stated a few minutes ago, there was no over issue of notes. The Bank of England never increased its circulation beyond the limit that was deemed safe at the suspension, when its issues were fixed upon a specie basis. There was no lack of faith in the ultimate redemption of the notes of the bank, and the bank professed to be ready to resume specie payment at various times when the Government did not deem it prudent to permit it to do so. But in 1814, even under these circumstances, the difference between the Bank of England notes and gold was 30 per cent. £3 17s. 10½d. in gold being worth £5 4s. in notes of the Bank of England. Even under these circumstances, serious derangements to business resulted in England, legitimate trade in that country became uncertain and spasmodic, there were violent fluctuations in prices, laborers and artisans were in great distress, prices of the necessaries of life rose much more rapidly than the price of labour; there were labour riots in various parts of England, and when specie payment was resumed, this same labouring class was again subjected to great hardships by the fact that the price of their labour fell more rapidly than the price of the necessaries of life, so that they were first injured by the rapid rise of the necessaries of life and the slower rise in the price of labour; and secondly, after the return to specie payment, by the slow decline in the necessaries of life and the rapid fall of the price of labour. It was especially disastrous to widows and orphans, to recipients of salaries, and to persons possessing fixed incomes. Such has always been found to be the case in countries where the abandonment of the specie standard or debasing coin led to the depreciation of the currency, and the nominal enhancement of the prices of the necessaries of life. The extract, I read, graphically depicts the misery that existed in England from this cause. Macaulay declared that the misery from one year of bad money exceeded that caused by bad harvests, bad laws, bad Kings, and bad Judges, for twenty-five years. I come next to the consideration of two great and significant lessons afforded us by the experience of France with this class of money. In 1716, George Law, an enterprising Scotchman succeeded in inducing the French Government to embark in a scheme of which he was the author, called the "George Law scheme." A bank was established. The issues of that bank were founded on the credits of the State, and upon lands. The issues of that bank amounted to three milliards of francs. An enormous inflation and fictitious prosperity intoxicated the people of France. This state of things lasted for four years, and then came the collapse. George Law fled for his life, and France was subjected to twenty-five years of derangement, distress and misery in consequence of this experiment. This was not sufficient. In 1787 the French Assembly again embarked in a similar scheme for the relief of the public necessities. Although that subject has often been referred to, I ask the indulgence of the House while I refer to it again, because no lesson is more conclusive in its teachings as to the folly of resorting to an issue of irredeemable paper money than the experience of France under the issues of the Assignats in the period of the French Revolution. The first issue was made in 1789, it was made against the protests of cool-headed men of the French Assembly who cited their fellow-countrymen to the experience of France under George Law, and predicted that the same evils would visit France again in an aggravated form. Despite their protests and warnings the French Assembly proceeded to issue assignats based upon the value of the Church estates. The first issue was 400,000,000 francs; the next issue in 1789 was 800,000,000 francs; the next issue in January, 1790 was 600,000,000 francs. When this point was reached, capital began to shrink from investments, and business in France became gambling. In 1792 the assignats stood at 30 per cent. discount. Then the debtor class—and it is from the debtor class that the pressure generally comes for cheap money—invasion the Assembly and demanded an increase of the issue of assignats, in order that they might the more easily pay their debts. Further issues were made. It was by this time found almost impossible to carry on the French Government. Salaried clerks could not live upon their salaries, and resigned in shoals. Then the Assembly stepped in and attempted to control the prices of the necessaries of life by passing maximum laws that provided that the price of wheat, oil, wine and other articles should not exceed certain sums—laws fixing the prices of all the commodities that entered into daily consumption. As a matter of course these laws were inoperative, and were set aside by the inexorable laws of supply and demand. In 1793, the purchase of specie was prohibited, and the penalty of engaging in a transaction of this kind was six years in irons. In that year the sale of assignats below their nominal value was prohibited, and the penalty for this crime was twenty years in chains. Frenchmen began investing their means in foreign countries and this was prohibited by the Assembly under the penalty of death. In 1796, 5,337 francs in assignats were worth 34 francs in silver, and soon after 100 francs in assignats were worth five sous. In the same year the French Assembly resorted to the scheme which is generally resorted to under like circumstances—it went into bankruptcy. It agreed to pay 3½c. on the dollar in new promises to pay. It funded the assignats in mandats in the proportion of 30 francs in assignats to one in the mandats. These mandats soon declined, so that 1,000 of them would only purchase one franc in silver. At that rate the original issue was worth in the proportion of 30,000 to 1 in silver. Speedily the whole mass was repudiated; the whole issue became a total loss; the entire issue was 45 milliards of francs; and the testimony of history is, that the horrors of the bastille, the guillotine, and the wars that France engaged in during that period, all combined, did not inflict the evil upon France that was inflicted by the issue of the assignats. The Assembly now passed an edict permitting the circulation of any kind of money. Frenchmen were anxious to see real money once more, and goods were sold at an enormous sacrifice in order to obtain money that had an actual value. Hoards of gold and silver were now brought out of their hiding places, goods were cheap, exchange turned in favour of the country, prosperity returned, and, during all the wars of Napoleon, France carried on her vast military operations upon a specie basis. It may be wearisome to dwell on these instances of the experience of other countries with paper money, but this is an important question. I wish to show from the experience of various nations the utter fallacy of the theories propounded by visionary dreamers. The next instance that I shall cite is that of Russia. Russia is a great empire of enormous resources, developed and undeveloped. In 1768, Russia made her first issue of paper money of forty million roubles. In 1787, she made an additional issue of sixty million roubles. In 1816, the aggregate amount of paper money in circulation was 577 million roubles. At that time 400 roubles in currency purchased 100 roubles in silver. Russia then resorted to the same scheme resorted to in most continental states, she went into bankruptcy. She offered to pay in the proportion of three and one-half to one, by a new issue of roubles or in silver. This new issue soon swelled to enormous proportions, and since that time the premium upon the paper currency has been extremely high. Russia has been in a state little better than chronic bankruptcy. The revenue has seldom equalled the expenditure, and to-day, if we look at the internal condition of that country, torn by Nihilism and Communism, we see the most unhappy country on the globe, and it would be very difficult indeed to say how large a proportion of these disasters were attributable to that false system of issuing irredeemable currency in that country. The next instance will be that of Austria: In 1796, the first issue of paper money was made. In 1806 silver stood at a premium of 75 per cent. In 1809, 315 florins were required to purchase 100 florins in silver. In 1811, when the amount in circulation was 1,061,000,000, 1,200 florins in paper purchased 100 florins in silver. In 1820, the Government resorted to the same time-honoured expedient of going into bankruptcy. It funded its issue by issuing a new batch of florins, and redeemed the old by giving one of the new for five of the old. By that means, all but 20 per cent. were wiped out. It then proceeded to issue a larger volume, in 1815 the value of this second issue was merely nominal, and it was funded again through the establishment of the Bank of Vienna, in the proportion of one florin of the new for eleven of the old. The finances of Austria are still in hopeless confusion, and its currency is still at a heavy discount. I might cite the case of the Confederate States of America, where in three short years the currency went down until it required \$300 in currency to purchase one dollar in silver, and then it became utterly valueless. In Italy, the forced circulation of paper money is but of recent date, but it is already heavily depreciated and the country is in a state of financial confusion. The same state of things exists in Spain, in consequence of a depreciated and irredeemable paper currency. The same state of things exists in Turkey, where the currency is in a perfect medley of debased coins and worthless paper. Turkey is now attempting to return to a specie basis; having tried an irredeemable currency and found it disastrous. The South American States are almost all labouring under the same difficulties today. The rate of discount has reached, in those States, as high as \$400 in currency for one dollar in silver. The little negro state of Hayti, even, has found the hon. gentleman's panacea, and it requires \$500 there to buy your breakfast. So much for the testimony of history. These instances might be multiplied but the number I have cited is sufficient to cause us to pause before adopting a principle which has been so uniformly disastrous in its results in all countries where it has been tried, and that during many centuries. There have been only two instances in all human history where the result of an irredeemable money issue has not been ruinous, and in each of these cases the Government solemnly declared that its paper money emissions were to be paid in gold, and that ruin did not result was due to the fact that the people had faith that the promise of the Government would be redeemed. The hon. gentleman has at some length given us his definition of money. Money, he told us, was a creation of the Government. Well, Sir, is it true that governments can create money? If it is true that governments can give value to that which is worthless then the hon. gentleman can, perhaps, make out his case. But I deny that Government can create money, or that they can create anything that man will accept as value. What is money? It must have one requisite to commence with and that must be value. Money is an invention some 4,000 years old. Man has tried various expedients. Before arriving at that stage of advancement where he could make use of money he resorted to barter. After trying barter he advanced a stage and used as money various articles possessing value. Cattle were used for this purpose and other valuable articles. Among barbarous tribes an analagous state of things still exists. The Africans use cowrie shells, copper, wire, etc.; the Indians wampum belts. Man finally reached that point where a wise and judicious selection of the article that was to pass as money was made, and for wise reasons the precious metals were selected as that article. Now, we need to bear in mind that there is a vast difference between specific purchasing power and general purchasing power. Any article that has value has a specific purchasing power. If its owner can find a person who wants it and has some other article that he wants, an exchange can be made, and each of the articles in that case possesses a specific purchasing power. Neither of them, however, can be used as a purchasing agent except upon the principle of barter, neither of them have a general purchasing power. Money possesses a general purchasing power. Everything that possesses value is convertible into money, and money in turn can be converted into anything that possesses value. The precious metals were selected for this purpose, and I wish to call the attention of the House to some reasons that had weight in leading to this selection. One of the main reasons undoubtedly was as to their quantity. The quantity could neither be increased nor diminished by an act of Government. It was entirely beyond the interference of Government. The quantity was sufficient for all purposes of commerce and could only be slightly and gradually increased. There have been only two considerable changes in the value of precious metals during the period of which we know anything about their production. The one was in the sixteenth century, when the value of silver was affected by the production of the mines of Mexico and Peru. The second was in the nineteenth century when the value of gold was affected by the discoveries of that precious metal in California and Australia. It was next chosen because it is universally valued. It is an article that is current in all lands. It requires no edict of a Government to give to gold and silver a value. It was chosen because it has the power of equalising values all over the world. It also possesses a uniformity of quality. Gold mined to day is of exactly the same quality as gold mined long ago. Silver mined in Nevada possesses exactly the same quality as silver mined in Siberia. Of whatever age and wherever produced the quality of gold and silver is identically the same. Another quality it possesses is that it is convenient and portable. Another quality which it possesses is that it can be divided and subdivided. No matter how small the piece its value is exactly in proportion to its weight. Another quality is that it is practically indestructible, a coin in constant use will last, it is said, 2,400 years. The hon. gentleman stated that it was the Government stamp that gave value to this money. That is a preposterous assertion. It is the Government stamp that gives evidence as to the value. A thousand sovereigns in a mass, or a thousand eagles in a mass, are worth just as much as they were worth when in coins. The Government of Great Britain charge $\frac{32}{1000}$ of 1 per cent. for coinage while the United States coins free. The bullion of the United States is worth exactly as much when not coined as when in coin. The statement of the hon. gentleman, that the coin depends for its value on the stamp of the Government, is on a par with the other absurdities to which the hon. gentleman has given utterance in this House. The stamp of the Government is merely an evidence of its value. It is simply for the sake of convenience that Government have been deputed to fulfil this duty of stamping on coins their weight and value. How long have these metals been used as money? Is it an invention of to-day, or does it date back to the period of the French Revolution, or to the days of the Continental States of America, or to the days when the Chinese had fiat money consisting of mulberry bark? No; from the very earliest records of history the precious metals have fulfilled the functions they fulfil to-day. The experience of forty centuries is certainly worthy of consideration. It cannot be lightly set aside. If mankind have adhered regularly to one system, it certainly is a pretty conclusive argument that there must be some good reason for adherence to that system. A good deal has been said by the hon. gentleman about standards of value, measures of value, mediums of exchange, and so forth, and I wish to draw the attention of the House to the distinction that should be drawn between a standard of value and medium of exchange. A check drawn by any hon. member of this House for \$1,000, provided there is confidence that the man has that amount of money in the bank, and confidence that the bank is able to pay that amount, is a good acceptable medium of exchange for \$1,000. Not that that is its intrinsic value, but it represents that value somewhere. A measure of value or a standard of value is something different. A cheque is not a standard of value, neither is a bank note nor a Government bond a standard of value, but all of these represent value which the public faith believes is lodged somewhere. A standard of value is something that possesses value. Gold and silver have been chosen by civilised nations, and barbarous nations as well, to serve for 4,000 years the functions of a standard of value, and a bank note or bill of exchange merely represents that the maker of that bank note or bill of exchange owns so much of that standard of value, which is payable on his demand.

After Recess.

MR. CHARLTON: When you left the Chair, Sir, I had just finished some remarks as to the character of money and the reasons which led to the adoption of the precious metals to serve for that purpose. In the course of this discussion much has been said about irredeemable money, about fiat money, measures of value, etc., and I wish, at this point, to define briefly what irredeemable is. Irredeemable money is a currency which promises to pay something in the future. The promise usually made is to pay in gold. The degree of discredit that attaches to irredeemable money is governed by its volume, and the degree of faith entertained as to its ultimate redemption and the point of other worthlessness, is reached when faith in the ability to pay is finally lost. The scheme we are dealing with to-night, as propounded by the hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Wallace), is not a scheme of irredeemable money, I am sorry to say, it is a scheme even worse than this. The currency advocated by the hon. member is a currency that commences when an irredeemable ends at utter worthlessness, and that is the point where fiat money begins. The hon. gentleman in his speech says that money that has an intrinsic value is not fit to be money. Well, he certainly advocates the adoption of a currency that has no intrinsic value. He advocates the adoption of a currency that promises to pay nothing. It is a currency that never will be discredited, because no promise is given. The money the hon. gentleman proposes should be issued will promise to pay absolutely nothing. It will not read "The Dominion of Canada promises to pay one dollar." It will read "This is a dollar." We will suppose that the manager of the Grand Trunk road or the manager of the Great Western Railway should issue what might be termed locomotive paper affirming that "This is a locomotive," it would be absurd. If it announced that they would furnish a locomotive on demand we might consider it. Some follower of my hon. friend might go into the live-stock business and he might issue a piece of paper affirming "This is a jack-ass." It would more clearly express the character of the issuer than the character of the paper. My hon. friend tells us that one advantage this money will possess will be that it will be non-exportable—that you cannot take it out of the country, and that the country cannot be made poorer by the exportation of this money. There are various other articles that are non-exportable, bad bacon, musty wheat, rotten eggs, and almost everything you can mention that is worthless, is non-exportable, and it is for that reason the currency that the hon. gentleman proposes to issue will be non-exportable. He also says it will help to maintain the institutions of the country, and check immigration, the reason probably being because the people will be so poor that they cannot get out of it. I do not deny that a Government can give to a currency a debt cancelling power, but I defy any Government to give to currency a buying power, and whatever device man may adopt, gold will, in all cases, measure the value of his device. The advocacy of this scheme is either stupid or it is immoral. There may be debtors in the community who desire in this way to defraud their creditors. Should this system ever obtain in this country we would see the old system of barter introduced again. Such was the case in the Confederate States of America. It was no unusual thing for persons to stipulate that their services should be paid for in produce. The same would undoubtedly be the case here in the event of the adoption of this system of currency. The hon. gentleman did not raise the claim to-day, but he did on a former occasion, that this scheme would make the rates of interest low. Exactly the reverse however, would be the case. Invariably, under the operation of a scheme of irredeemable money interest becomes exorbitant. The reason of this is not far to seek. With a fluctuating currency not only the usual rate of interest is charged, but a further rate is added, sufficient to cover the probably depreciation in the currency during that period that it will pass from the possession of the lender. This was the case in the United States during the greenback era. To my own personal knowledge, the best names could seldom obtain bank discounts in the interior at less than 13 per cent per annum. Since resumption, however, money, is easily obtained from 6 to 8 per cent. per annum. During the days of wild cat banking in the Western States, 40 per cent was no unusual rate of interest, and cases are known where 10 per cent per month was paid. Such a currency constantly depreciates, and when the lender parts with it he naturally demands a rate of interest that will give a reasonable return for its use, and leave an ample margin to cover its depreciation when he shall receive it again. There is an opinion that in this country, and in various other countries, the amount of circulating medium is insufficient for the wants of the people. It is undoubtedly true that in France and some of the Continental States of Europe the amount of currency in circulation is larger per capita than in England or the United States or in Canada. The mode of business is different in some countries from others. In the United States, in Canada, in Great Britain, people deposit money in Savings' Banks and other institutions; their payments are usually made by cheque, which is an evidence of the possession of money. In New York, in London, in Chicago, not 5 per cent. of the daily transactions are performed with currency. A man draws his cheque, passes it over to another who endorses it, and passes it over to the bank; that cheque performs a dozen payments, perhaps, and finally goes to the bank. In France, business is done in another way; they use currency in transactions to a great extent; they do not deposit in Savings' Banks to the same extent. Almost every peasant or farmer has a small hoard of money laid away, and business is done largely by actual payment of specie or currency. For this reason a larger amount of currency is required than in England or the United States, where they depend more upon the operations of those great facilities of exchange, banks and the bank clearing house. The hon. gentleman need not borrow any trouble about not having a sufficient amount of currency in the banks. The banks of Canada are, in fact, unable to obtain circulation for their money. A man who wishes to have it must have security to place in the hands of the Bank of personal character and credit and then he can have it without any difficulty. I have dealt with the testimony of great men as to this question. I have dealt with the experience of the past, and with the general principles appertaining to this question; and now I propose to refer to one practical lesson worked out before our eyes in our own generation—the green-back period in the United States, commencing in 1862, and ending so recently as the 1st of January, 1879. The experience of that country will afford us many useful lessons, although there is a very great difference between the principles adopted by them, and the principles my hon. friend intends to adopt. That country issued a currency repayable in gold, which it was believed would be payable in gold, a currency which has been paid in gold. But here we are to have a currency which will never be paid in gold, a currency which will be worthless from the commencement. The effect under even these mitigating circumstances, the effect even where the currency was one not immediately payable in gold, though ultimately so payable, was expansion, resulting—as will always be the case on the adoption of such a currency system—most disastrously to the creditor class. Who were they? They are all to whom debts are due; all who have more debts due to them than they owe. It includes nine-tenths of the working men of the country. It includes in the United States 8,000,000 of labourers, earning annually $2,500,000,000. It would include in this Dominion some 600,000 labourers, earning annually some $200,000,000. To this army of creditors in the United States, an average of $100,000,000 is at all times due. It includes 700,000 policy holders in Life Insurance Companies. It includes an army of 2,400,000 depositors in the banks of the United States, against about 200,000 debtors who borrow money from the banks. Thus it will be seen that the benefits of inflation were reaped by a few at the expense of the vast majority of the people of the country. What was the effect in that country upon all those having fixed incomes: money was lowered in value; persons with fixed incomes, persons with salaries, were sorely pinched, and had great difficulty in obtaining the necessaries of life under the expansion and depreciation of money, and the advance of prices that resulted. Another marked influence was exercised in the United States, on the labouring class, in addition to that exercised upon them as creditors. While their wages advanced slowly, the prices of the necessaries of life advanced rapidly. By reliable tables it has been shown that the necessaries of life advanced in price 100 per cent. while wages only increased 50 to 62 per cent. The consequence was that as the system proceeded the difficulties of the working class relatively became worse and worse, and when the tide turned, when the United States had determined to return to a specie currency, the price of gold fell, then the wages of the labourer quickly descended to the level they had originally held, while the necessaries of life, on the other hand, followed the decline by slow degrees, so the labouring people were, therefore, again the great sufferers; they were ground between the upper and nether millstones, first by the rapid advance in the price of food and necessaries, compared with the advance in the price of wages; and second, by the rapid decline in the price of wages, compared with the decline in the price of food and necessaries. While depreciation was increasing, business confidence was, in a great measure, destroyed; foresight as to the future became impossible; business became literally gambling; no man, no matter how astute could foresee the fluctuations of gold which actually governed all values. The goods of the importer were to be paid for in gold, his sales were in currency, no human foresight could tell him what margin should be charged to cover advance in premium between date of purchase and date of realisation, upon sales and business, from the force of circumstances became gambling. Another feature, and a most remarkable feature in connection with this state of things, was that the exact amount of money in circulation was known, there was no law of fluency in operation, gold could not be used as money, and would not flow in from other lands, it was an article of commerce. The result was that great operators were enabled to get possession of great sums in currency and create artificial stringency; it was repeatedly done by these means, these men temporarily locked up large sums of money to create stringency and panic. The market for stocks and produce was completely controlled by them. Black Fridays and spasmodic fluctuations were the result, and these large operators swallowed up the small operators by scores. Such fortunes as those amassed by Vanderbilt, Scott, Stewart and Gould were built up by means of this character. These gamblers made the nations necessities, its hopes, its very despair, counters in their game. Another result was wild speculation, extensive production of things for which there was no demand, wasteful extravagance, a shoddy aristocracy, a morbid desire to become rich without labour. The creation of great fortunes by this system, the robbery of the public and the nation by bold stock gamblers led to the raising of a popular cry against privileged classes and the bondholder. The people instinctively felt that they had been robbed, and the greenback or fiat money heresy would never have received the support it did but that a portion of the people thought to pay a debt which had cost the holders so little by resorting to a fraud infinitely greater than the frauds of the war period, and cancelling the bonds with worthless currency. I desire, Sir, to examine for a moment the effect of this system upon debt and taxation, and to direct first, attention to the manner in which loans were made in the United States. They required means to carry on their war operations; the country was a borrower. Secretary Chase unwisely determined to maintain the price of American bonds at par nominally by depreciating the currency that was received for them. Had he borrowed no gold, placing his bonds upon the market at such discount as was necessary to float them, he would in the end have been infinitely better off. A bond of $100 at one time cost but $40 in gold, and the great bulk of the debt was contracted when $100 in currency was worth less than $60 in gold. The Government is paying these bonds at par in gold; The investors receive, in many instances, in gold 150 per cent. more than they invested in gold. This borrowing at par, in a currency which was to be repaid, principal and interest in gold, added enormously to the debt of the United States. Had the Secretary borrowed only in the equivalent of gold, and placed his bonds in the American markets at such price as they would command, the debt would have been $900,000,000 or $1,000,000,000 less than it was, and to-day the United States, with the taxation they have paid, would have been entirely out of debt. The United States have had an ample experience in irredeemable money. The moment Richmond fell, the agitation commenced for a resumption of specie payment, and on the first of January, last year, they returned to a specie currency. And what has been the result? Men who held the views of my hon. friend from South Norfolk, believed that resumption would prove disastrous to the United States. Were these prophecies fulfilled? Were the United States injuriously affected? No; they were not. On the contrary the great majority of the people of the United States had been waiting for many years for that juncture to arrive, and from the moment it was known that the wishes of the country would not be disappointed, business revived; capital had been waiting for the time when there would be some assurance that the gambling era had ceased; and when that assurance came, when resumption was made certain, business revived, as I have already said. And was that revival spasmodic or temporary? No; on the contrary after a lapse of nearly eighteen months since the resumption of specie payment in the United States, this revival may be considered a permanent thing; that country has entered upon a career of prosperity which will eclipse any previous period of her history; and I have no hesitation in saying, and it cannot be doubted by any reasonable man that this revival of business and this great prosperity is due wholly and exclusively to the resumption of specie payment, in that country. Are the United States likely to go back to the greenback system after having so many years experience of it and having abandoned it? Are they likely to back to irredeemable currency? What is the status of the greenback party of the United States? There is at this moment enough lunatic asylum capacity in that country to hold the whole of them. Our industries and our commerce need rest and certainty. Capital to my certain knowledge has already abandoned Canada, and sought investments elsewhere, owing to the uncertainty surrounding the money question. It is high time the Government ceased to coquet with this question; it is high time the hon. the Minister of Finance should give an authoritative expression of opinion on the views advanced by those who favour a fiat currency. A prudent farmer will not hire a man who has burned the barns of all those who have ever employed him; and a prudent nation will not adopt a system fraught with such ruinous consequences as is this irredeemable currency system. The experience of history, the dictates of reason, the declarations of the wise and the great, forbid us to believe that a fiat money is better than a currency based upon specie. I am firmly impressed with the belief arrived at, after a careful study of paper currency experiments, after careful consideration of the laws governing money questions, after a practical knowledge of the business experience of the United States during the period of suspension in the country since 1862, that a credit currency is a device which never fails to be calamitous in its consequences, and rarely fails to entail ruin. I cannot condemn too strongly the insane recklessness or the inexcusable ignorance of the Utopian dreamers and designing knaves who advocate a measure which would bring upon us calamity and distress. By its operation values would be unsettled, rapid and sharp fluctuations in prices would be introduced, uncertainty as to the future would baffle the most astute. The poor man's wages would advance slowly, while the necessaries of life advanced rapidly and daily became more difficult to obtain, and the circulating medium of the country would rapidly gravitate to utter worthlessness. I would my words could reach every farmer, every artisan, every labourer, every man who earns his living by toil in shop or field, for their interests are dependent on an established credit, a stable currency, and steady means of payment. Honest labour has nothing to gain from shifting values, fluctuating prices, or impending collapse. Specie has a uniform and intrinsic value the world over. It is the bed rock as a standard, sure and steadfast. Rag money is a delusion, and bitter will be our experience, terrible the lessons by which adversity will teach us of our folly, if we insist upon learning in the school of fools, and refuse to be taught by the experience of others. I hope that the crude theories advanced by this class of financiers and political economists, so often exploded in practice, and so often shown in theory to be utterly without foundation, may never be adopted or tried in this country.

MR. McCALLUM: Although I do not agree exactly with the hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Wallace) yet I believe the object of the Government in introducing this measure is to utilise, as far as possible, the currency of the people, and by that means to save as much interest as possible. So far as that goes, I entirely approve of the measure. The hon. member for Centre Huron (Sir Richard J. Cartwright) said it was a long and dangerous step from $12,000,000 to $20,000,000. I do not regard it as very dangerous. I cannot see what injury can accrue from the Government taking so much circulation. I am only sorry they did not consider it their duty to take the whole circulation, so that when a man had a dollar bill he would know it was good and backed up by the whole Dominion. The money today is not all alike in the country. There is a discount on Ontario bills in the Lower Provinces, and a discount on the Lower Province bills here. I think it is the duty of the Government to take this whole matter into their hands, and that they are neglecting their proper functions when they delegate to banks the power to issue bills to pass as money. The Government ought to retain this power for the benefit of the people. The hon. member for Centre Huron also said that the banking systems of Scotland and Canada are alike and that they have served good ends. Well, we have recently seen what disastrous results flowed from the banking system of Scotland, and we have not to look far back to see how the people of Canada suffered from our banking system. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) stated that the Government might misuse this power. Now, the hon. gentleman is going back upon himself when he makes such a statement. The Government is responsible to the people who entrust hon. members with the power to pass all laws regulating property and everything else. The hon. gentleman also wished his language would go to every farmer in the country. If his remarks regarding the issue of the greenback currency in the United States, when he stated they were redeemable in gold when issued, went to the farmers, what would they think? If the balance of the hon. member's speech is on a par with that, I can assure him there are many farmers in his own county who have a better knowledge of the subject. This very much abused system of greenbacks saved the United States. What was the result at the beginning of the war when they tried to borrow money from their own capitalists to carry on the war? They could only get about $12,000,000, at a rate of interest ranging from 10 to 12 per cent. They issued those greenbacks, and borrowed $450,000,000 from their own people and saved the country. I do believe in a legal tender currency myself, but do not believe we should issue money to be redeemable in gold unless we keep the gold to redeem it with. Of what value to the people is gold, if it is piled up in the vaults of the Government? It is like manure piled up in a barnyard—it is of no use. But spread that manure around and it enriches the soil and brings forth good crops. It is the same with this gold in the vault. Spread it around and it will increase industry and by that means increase the productions of the country. If the Government were to issue legal tender notes and bonds drawing 4 per cent. interest, never payable except at its own option, allowing the notes to be converted into bonds, or vice versa, at the option of the holder, I think it would be the means of giving us cheap money and lowering the rate of interest. I am sorry the Government have not seen their way clear to taking the whole circulation in charge. The people look for such a step, and I am satisfied that it will be made a test at the next General Elections whenever they take place.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the said Resolution.

(In the Committee.)

MR. ANGLIN: I presume the Resolutions will pass, but it is my duty to say that I regard this proceeding as one of very questionable propriety. It is very well to assume that, in absorbing a portion of the circulation, we are merely transferring to the Dominion the amount of interest which the banks are supposed to obtain from that portion of their circulation, but in point of fact this measure will absorb and take from the business of the country the total amount of this increased issue. It is practically borrowing another \$8,000,000, and it will circumscribe the lending power of our banks to that extent. It would be absurd to suppose that we could put \$8,000,000 additional paper money into circulation without, at the same time, displacing nearly as much of the bank paper which is now in circulation. There is just as much paper in circulation now as the business of the country requires or justifies. Every bank is eager to put its paper in circulation. It is not the fault of the banks that more paper is not in circulation according to population, but owing to the character of the business of the country. Of all the paper that goes out the greater part returns in a very short time and must be redeemed. We find from the market prices of stocks that the market price of very few bank stocks is, to-day, above par. Although the banks have the advantages of the issue of paper and a large amount of capital placed on deposit at a low rate of interest, yet take one bank with another their dividends are by no means large. In some years the profits of well-managed institutions are large, but, on the whole, bank stocks do not yield more than other investments of a substantial character. The Government's only reason for taking this \$8,000,000 is because they want money. But the hon. the Finance Minister gave another reason. He said the time had come when the country should have a larger share of the profits of the circulation than previously. If that is a justification for this step, the hon. Minister should go further, and take the whole circulation into the hands of the Government. I have no doubt it will come to that in a short time. The hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Wallace), who is such an earnest advocate of what some call fiat money, is not satisfied with this measure, and would have the Government go further, and issue irredeemable currency. I am glad to see that very few hon. members sympathise with the hon. gentleman, who, I have no doubt, is perfectly sincere in his views. But he need not be discouraged. This measure, from his point of view, is but the tadpole, but in good time it will grow into a full-sized frog. The \$8,000,000 will be spent in good time, and the Government having this precedent before them, another \$8,000,000 will undoubtedly be asked for, and if hon. gentlemen opposite are as strong as they are to-day, their next demand will be supported and sustained as this is by their followers. The whole circulation of the country, exclusive of Dominion Notes, is stated to be \$21,000,000. This \$8,000,000 is a very large proportion of that amount. The hon. gentleman does not tell us how he proposes to put that amount in circulation, or how he will keep it in circulation. Hitherto the Government has had very little trouble with the circulation. Their whole issue was \$12,500,000, but of that \$9,000,000 was absorbed by the banks, and held by them as part of their reserves. That was but one way of getting a forced loan from the banks. The remaining \$3,500,000 was about enough to furnish change, small notes, for the business of the whole country; and, therefore, these small notes seldom or never came back for redemption. A few thousand dollars went into the banks and were held by them for their own convenience, or that of their customers. So, individuals, everywhere, who choose to hold some money for use, left those Dominion \$1 and \$2 notes, as a rule, with some notes of larger denominations, and in that way this money was continually kept in circulation, never returning for redemption. So the provision that it should be redeemed, did not trouble the Government. But the case will be different when you add \$8,000,000 or even \$4,000,000 to the issue. That amount will not be required as change. A very large portion, no doubt, will come back continually for redemption. The hon. the Finance Minister ought to have told the Committee how he proposes to provide for that redemption when the notes are presented, and to put and keep them in circulation to the amount of nearly \$4,000,000 this year, and \$8,000,000 the year after, so as to obtain all the profits he calculates upon. I think he will find that the interest saved will not be so large as he anticipates. If I am correct in saying that he is in reality about to abstract \$8,000,000 from the available capital of the country—out of its business—and expend it in public works—he is taking money which, in this country, is worth 7 or 8 per cent., and, in some places 9 or 10. That money he could borrow in London at $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. at the outside, and it is a question of very serious economic importance whether it would not be more prudent and better for the country that the hon. the Finance Minister should borrow that money in London at $4\frac{1}{2}$, than from the business people of this country, whose capital is already small enough, and who are now compelled to pay 7 or 8 per cent. for loans. Another matter of some importance is the gold reserve. I would like to be told whether there is an amount of specie stored away in any part of the Dominion equal to what is called the gold or specie reserve? Or is it merely a credit at the Bank of Montreal and other institutions that stands in the room of this gold deposit?

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: It is an actual gold deposit with the Receiver-General.

MR. ANGLIN: They do not, surely, hold altogether the proportion understood against all those millions of currency?

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: Yes; there is nearly $4,000,000 in gold at present actually held by the Treasury, irrespective of what we have in the Bank of Montreal.

MR. ANGLIN: I question whether it is or not. If it is desirable to have a specie reserve, it is desirable to have something else than a credit at the bank. Sir Francis Hincks calculated that the amount which he provided the Government should hold was the minimum that ought to be held against the notes in circulation; it was not necessary to hold that amount as against the amount in the various banks, which was never likely to be presented for redemption; and this, perhaps, induced the hon. the Finance Minister to think it might not be necessary to have against any part of the proposed circulation such a gold reserve as is provided for in the existing Act. A gold reserve always seems to be superfluous while times are good, and no special run or demand for gold is made on any institution issuing paper, but is really a provision against extraordinary emergencies and should always be sufficient to meet them. Just at the time the banks may find it test their powers to the utmost to meet the run of themselves, a run on the Treasury on this new bank of issue about to be established by the Government would occur. Then the gold reserve would probably be found insufficient. Doubtless the hon. the Finance Minister could at any time draw against the guaranteed bonds of the Dominion to very nearly their full market value, and, therefore, they may be regarded equal to a gold reserve. But that cannot be said of the unguaranteed bonds. The mere authority to issue bonds would be quite as much security as the actual deposit of such bonds in any vault in the Dominion. Bonds which we may put on the market hereafter, are no security for any liabilities we may contract in the issue of paper money; they are themselves but the evidence of debt which the Government has incurred or which it is authorised to incur. They are not the slightest security, and I would very much prefer to see that provision struck out altogether, as it is calculated to throw discredit on the whole operation. I regard this policy as essentially dangerous. Could there be any absolute security that this issue of Dominion paper money would never proceed further than these $8,000,000, it might not be so objectionable; but precisely the causes which led us to issue the old $9,000,000, and which are prompting us now to this proposed course, may by-and-by prompt Parliament to consent to further issues of paper money.

MR. MILLS: Disguise this scheme as we may, it is really a forced loan—an attempt of the Government to obtain from the banks $8,000,000 on the terms of the Resolutions. Some hon. gentlemen have advocated a Government issue, and the deprival of the banks of the right to issue altogether. This scheme looks in that direction. It will not produce all the mischiefs of a purely Government issue, because the banks will largely continue the issue required by the country; but it will prepare the way for that result. The necessities of the Government will not permit them to stop here; they must continue to extend their emissions, until the right of issue is withdrawn from the banks altogether. I do not see that the Government have a right to share more largely in the profits of the circulation, as the Finance Minister says. If they have a right at all they should get all the profits. We have no right to enter into a partnership with them, and share the profits.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Why have we not?

MR. MILLS: The Government might as well say they have a right to share in the profits any capitalist made in his investment. The wear and tear of the bank circulation is simply an incident of the business of banking in which the Government have no money invested. The profits should go to the owners of the capital invested in the business. That is my answer to the First Minister. Apart from this view of the matter, the Government cannot share in those profits except at the expense of the public.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: The Government are the public.

MR. MILLS: The Government are the mere agents of the public for certain limited purposes, and the people are a much larger body, and have much wider interests than those entrusted to Parliament, which deals with certain incidents that belong to the interest and the general well-being of the people; and it is because the Government might injure those wider, and it may be more important, interests that I object to the hon. the Finance Minister's propositions. Now, every bank declares a certain dividend in its capital, and one of the elements of the profits is the circulation. If the Government takes charge of it, what must be the consequence to the banks? They must increase the rate of interest to their customers, and make up the difference in some other way; and the money the Government takes from the banks, by sharing in the profits of the circulation, the banks will take from the public, in charging a higher rate of interest. The depositor will find his rate of interest cut down, as the banks will not be able, from their diminished profits, to pay as much as hitherto. The depositor, in return, will say to his banker: I cannot allow my money to be with you on your terms; and the effect will be its investment elsewhere, and the diminution of the banking capital required for the accommodation of business. This scheme will reduce the profits of banking and the available banking capital of the country. The statement of the hon. the Finance Minister is plausible, but fallacious. If there is any impression abroad that greater security would be enjoyed if the Government had charge of the circulation, the impression does not extend merely to the circulation but to the deposits, and even to the stock itself. Parties who know what the popular opinion was—I speak not simply of those in business—are aware that it was thought when the Confederate Bank failed, that if we had had a Government issue, the stock-holders would not have suffered to the extent witnessed. We know right well that the Government could not give any security to the stock-holders or depositors, but to a very limited extent, only, security to the business men of the country. What is true in England is true here. The statement was made a short time ago, by an eminent English banker, to the effect that but one-half per cent. of the business of the country was carried on by means of gold and silver, $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. by bank bills, and 97 per cent. by warehouse receipts, cheques and bank balances. That is precisely the way business is done here; and if the Government issued every dollar of the circulation, there would be still, at least, $97\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. of all the mercantile transactions carried on independently of it, while, so far as the 97 per cent. is concerned, the Government issues could not affect the question of security at all. But the Government issue, to the extent of its volume, will certainly affect the value of bank stocks. In fact it is an act of bad faith towards the banks. A man purchasing bank stocks to-day in Montreal or Toronto, finds, to-morrow, their value injuriously affected by the assumption of a part of the circulation by the Government, and the acquisition of a share of the profit therefrom. I do not say that, in the end, the banks will lose largely, because they will make out of the public what the Government filches from them. But, doubtless, serious mischief will be done by extending, what I regard as already a mischievous provision in our banking system; because, if the circulation is taken from the banks and monopolised by Government, the feature of expansibility, which adopts in an eminent degree our banking system to the wants of the country, will be entirely removed. In July, last year, one of our banks had an average circulation of \$700,000; in October following, it had doubled, to meet the temporary wants of the community while grain and other produce was being purchased and exported. Take away from the banks the right to issue bills and place it in the Government, and the banks will be wholly unable to meet the local requirements of the country. This change would produce serious mischief to our whole banking system, and would deprive it of one of those qualities which eminently fit it for carrying on the business of the country. I think it is perfectly clear that the statement made by the hon. gentleman is not a candid statement, when he says he believes it is a right principle that the Government should share in the profits of the circulation, and that it is not with a view to enable the Government so to share that he proposes the changes in the banking system that are now before the Committee. The real object is to enable the Government to obtain a forced loan from the banks to meet the necessities of the Government. I say that is the sole object, and not the one the hon. gentleman has stated. I am certain that it will be found the most objectionable way in which the Government can obtain money to meet the necessities of the hour.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I do not think I ever heard so much heresy from a political economist in twenty minutes as I have heard from the hon. gentleman in his speech just now. In the first place he attempts to draw a distinction between the Government and the public; he says it may be for the benefit of the Government, but against the interests of the public. I really thought the Government and the public were one. The Government are merely trustees for the benefit of the public; whatever the Government gains, the public must gain; whatever the Government loses the public loses. I take it that they are synonymous. But the hon. gentleman says in the first place that the Government have no right, or in other words that the public have no right to go into partnership with the banks in the circulation, as if there was any right, vested or otherwise, in the banks or in individuals in making promises to pay, as if there was any right inherent and sacred to them, and as if the Government was committing a breach of faith in interfering at all. Now, Mr. Chairman, if I remember aright it is a principle in constitutional Government which obtains both in monarchies and in republics, and in every form of Government, that the right of making money for common circulation belongs to the Crown, to the sovereignty, to the nation. Gold, silver, copper, nickel, no matter what may be said to represent a circulating medium, is vested in the Crown, is vested in the sovereignty, is vested in the nation, no matter what may be its form of Government. It is a matter of fact as attested by history, that paper or a promise to pay are accepted on the credit of the nation to be an equivalent to gold or silver, and it is clearly admitted by all writers on money that the same power, the same sovereignty, the same nation, that has an exclusive right to issue gold, silver, or other circulating mediums, must of necessity have the right if it chooses to claim it, to issue its equivalent to gold or silver. It is a matter of expediency, a matter of legislation, which may be modified from time to time for the Crown to give up any portion of the exclusive right to issue what is called money to the banks whether they may be private or public, and to say that it is a breach of faith it is absurd. I am quite astonished to hear my hon. friend use that argument for a moment. It is a breach of faith forsooth. If it is a breach of faith to issue $20,000,000, it must be a breach of faith to issue $12,000,000; and have not the banks for the last ten years been suffering under that breach of faith, and were they not willing sufferers, and did they not accept it. Why, there can be no injury or injustice done to the party who accepts it. They willingly accepted it ten years ago, and they willingly accept it now. I am very much surprised that the hon. gentleman, if this was a breach of faith, did not exercise his powers as a member of the Government, during five long years, in trying to relieve the country from this great stigma which rests upon it as a country, in allowing the breach of faith to exist. If it is a breach of faith to issue twenty millions, it is a breach of faith to issue twelve, five, or one million. If the hon. gentleman's argument is good for anything at all, it amounts to this: that no nation or sovereignty can issue paper money, although they can issue gold or silver money without breach of faith to people who desire to invest their money in the business of banking. Experience has shown that the law, which the hon. gentleman has been administering for five years, allowing the Government to issue $12,000,000 without having gold to cover it, well, experience has similarly shown that there is no necessity in having so much gold. It is merely granting to the extent of 20,000,000 what by the universal consent of the last Parliament, and the Parliament before it, was granted to the extent of 12,000,000. If at any time—it is merely permissive—the Government is to have power to issue 20,000,000 instead of 12,000,000, without covering 8,000,000 with gold—without covering the 8,000,000 with gold in their vaults, and losing the interest on it—if at any time it is found that any practical inconvenience exists, there is no risk of the credit of the country being asserted, or of the Government not being able to meet any demand for gold, then the Government can always check its issue, Parliament can force it every Session to diminish its issue, so the whole argument, it seems to me, is baseless. I really cannot understand, though I have tried to do so. I generally do appreciate the arguments of my hon. friend, but I cannot understand the basis of one single proposition he made in his speech to-day.

Resolution reported, read the first and second times, and agreed to, on a division.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY introduced a Bill (No. 114) Further to amend the Acts respecting Dominion Notes.

Bill read the first time.

BANKING ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

(Sir Samuel L. Tilley.)

FIRST READING.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the following Resolutions:—

“Resolved,—That the charters of the several banks to which the Act respecting banks and banking (34 Vic., chap. 5) applies shall be extended to the first day of July, 1891, subject to the following provisions:—

“1. That after the first day of July, 1881, (on which day the charters, if not extended, would expire) the payment of the notes of any such bank intended for general circulation, shall be the first charge upon its assets,—and that the bank shall not, after the said day, issue or re-issue any such note for a less sum than $5, or for any other sum not being a multiple of $5.

“2. That from and after the same day, any such bank, when making any payment, shall, on the request of the person to whom the payment is to be made, pay the same, or such part thereof, not exceeding $50, as such person may request in Dominion Notes for $1 or for $2 each, at the option of the receiver.

“3. And that from and after passing of the Act to be passed in pursuance of these Resolutions, the proportion of the cash reserves to be held by any such bank in Dominion Notes shall never be less than 40 per cent.

“4. That the form of the Monthly Returns to Government be so amended as to show more clearly the financial position of the bank.

“5. That Section 3, 4, 5 and 6 of the Act of the now last Session (42 Vic., chap. 45) respecting the numbering of bank shares be repealed.”

(In the House.)

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: The hon. gentleman opposite asked how it was that we proposed increasing the circulation. It is well known that for the last two or three years, or since the banks have been deprived of the privilege of issuing $1 or $2 notes, or any note less than for $4, there have been complaints from all parts of the country, that people could not obtain small bills. The Government do not propose the establishment of expensive machinery for putting these notes into circulation. Persons now asking for the payment of cheques upon a bank frequently ask for $1 or $2 notes, but cannot obtain them. It is not the business of the bank to circulate them, they have no interest in circulating them or in keeping them out; they are only anxious to put their own notes in circulation. We propose requiring the banks to pay $50 in small notes. This is one of the means by which the Government proposes to obtain an increased circulation for the $1 and $2 notes, and at the same time to give accommodation to people who require those notes. We will, in that way, in part supply the demand for $1 and $2 notes that are required for the payment of labour. I quite agree with the hon. gentleman opposite that you cannot force $8,000,000 or $4,000,000, or even $2,000,000 suddenly upon the country. If we do we must expect to have to provide for it at short notice, because if you put it in the hands of contractors you may have to take it up next day. After July, 1881, we shall take from the banks the right to issue $4 notes, and it is by these means that the Government expect to obtain a much larger circulation for their notes. It is true, as was just stated by an hon. gentleman, that the circulation must necessarily be limited, because large transactions are generally done by cheque and not by bank or Dominion notes. But the circulation is used in the payment of labour by our manufacturers and other employers of labour. The great difficulty has been to obtain these small notes. The Government would have to use expensive machinery if they undertook to establish a bank of issue, and so they only propose to use the old machinery, with some additional provisions in the new Banking Act, with which they will obtain an increased circulation, and these small notes do not return to the banks or the Government for redemption as the larger notes do.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD.

On paragraph 3,

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: At present the law provides that the reserve shall be 50 per cent., but at no time shall it be less than 33 $\frac{1}{3}$ per cent. This is changed. There is at present a margin of 16 $\frac{2}{3}$ per cent. between the minimum amount that may be held, and the average amount that they are expected to hold. I quite agree with the late hon. Finance Minister that in matters of this kind in increasing our circulation, we require to exercise increased care and caution and increased provision for the redemption of this circulation; though there are other causes besides those to which he refers, namely, to the interest on the debt, payable in England. It is true we have to provide six or seven millions in exchange. The demand for gold is not affected so much by the interest on the debt, as it is by the balance of trade between the countries. Of course what we pay on our debt, and that which the Local Government and municipalities have to pay, is provided for by bills of exchange or gold. But the balance of trade between the countries affects it to a greater extent than these do. This may be met by exceptional circumstances. There may be loans effected, either by loan societies, municipalities or Local Governments, in England, though the Dominion Government was obtaining no loan whatever. But, as I said the other night, the indications are that the balance of trade will not be as much against us in the future as in the past, and the result will be a reduced demand for exchange, or a smaller demand for gold. Of course, if the balance of trade be against us and the demand for exchange in drafts is greater than our people are prepared to provide, the difference will have to be made up by exchange purchased in the United States. Under these circumstances the balance of trade should be largely against us; of course we would require to provide a larger amount of gold. But under any circumstances, I think the reserves are ample. For a number of years the banks have held over the 50 per cent. that is required, but they may reduce the amount, under certain circumstances, to 33 $\frac{1}{3}$ per cent., which would leave them still a margin of a much larger amount than will be the case under this proposition. They never can hold less than 40 per cent., therefore, whatever they require to hold leaves the chances less that they will call upon the Government at any time for a larger amount of gold. This provision is necessary to prevent the possibility of a larger amount being called for at any particular time.

On paragraph 4,

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: Under these provisions it will not be possible for such an occurrence as that in connection with the Consolidated Bank to take place again.

MR. MACKENZIE: How?

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: By stating in the returns it will show the amount of money obtained from other banks on securities.

MR. MACKENZIE: That was only one of the instances where the public were deceived. They were deceived by the returns of the bank being deliberately falsified. No law can prevent that.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: The reason given as justification by the officials of the bank was that there was no specific head under which that transaction could be made; therefore, the parties justified themselves by saying that they could make no specific return of this kind because there was no head provided for it.

On paragraph 5,

MR. MACKENZIE: Why do you repeal that?

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: It is found to be inoperative. I do not know but there may have been some litigation arising out of it. Brokers have evaded it in such a way that I have some doubts whether you can really reach them in this matter. No benefit has resulted from it, but a great inconvenience; and after giving that matter a good deal of consideration it was decided to repeal those sections. Then, there have been some decisions in the Courts, with reference to the conditions upon which banks may make advances upon certain properties. There are two other sections that have been introduced for the purpose of setting that matter at rest, and making it so clear that the question of the authority of the banks cannot arise in the future. Apart from these provisions there is little or no change made in the old Act, as amended, and made applicable to the bank whose charters are now to be renewed. I move, Mr. Speaker, you leave the Chair.

MR. PLUMB: The Resolutions brought up by my friend the hon. the Finance Minister, enable me to make some observations in respect to Banking and Currency. The two subjects are so closely identified in the public mind, under an economic system, although not necessarily connected with each other, that it is difficult to deal with one without referring to the other. The hon. member for South Norfolk, has taken the opportunity of the introduction of the Resolutions in question, by means of an amendment to one of them, to propound and argue very important and deeply interesting propositions concerning the issue of paper money. Any gentleman in this House who carefully studies a special subject of public importance, and industriously prepares himself by research and reflection to present it here, is fully entitled to the grave and courteous attention of his fellow members. The hon. member for South Norfolk has made the subject, upon which he has just now addressed you, Mr. Speaker, a diligent study, I may venture to say, an absorbing one, and he brings to its discussion, with great earnestness and energy, the strongest arguments, doubtless, that can be adduced in its favour. I think it proper at the outset to say that I do not sympathise with those here who have seemed disposed to treat his propositions with levity or ridicule, as was, I fear, too much the case with the hon. member for North Norfolk. The hon. gentleman is fully entitled to credit and consideration, both for the sincerity of his opinions and the ability and clearness with which he has stated his theories; and although I am compelled to say at the outset that I differ with him toto cælo, I acknowledge that he is supported by the authority of many advanced thinkers, who imagine that an expanded currency, which has no fixed value according to the generally secured standard, may perform functions in the development of national undertakings so useful and important as to compensate fully for the disturbances in unsettling prices and in vitiating contracts which it may cause. The test of experience, however, which has been frequently applied to issues of paper currency which were temporarily irredeemable, has demonstrated that they have led to extravagant inflations inevitably followed by disastrous depression, and great distress and loss, and it has been often the case that the currency has depreciated so largely in value as to make its ultimate redemption practically impossible. The issue of a practically irredeemable legal tender currency which is enthusiastically urged by my hon. friend (Mr. Wallace), can only be justified by the extremest public necessity, a necessity which, I trust, may never arise in this Dominion. The experience of the world is agreed upon the expediency of adopting a common standard for the measurement of value, and it is generally conceded that a safe paper currency must be convertible into or redeemable by that standard. I do not assert that gold, which has been so adopted, is the most perfect measure of value, theoretically, possible; but there are sound reasons why it has been universally accepted, and no substitute is likely, through the success of propositions such as we have just now heard from the hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Wallace) should be accepted in its stead. Should this Dominion adopt any other, it would be isolated, and would not be able to force it upon the country, with whom it must have commercial intercourse. Gold has been selected by the common consent of the world for obvious reasons. It is of all the ductile metals the most ductile, and the most difficult to obtain. It is imperishable and easily divisible. No other metal so truly and constantly represents labour at its maximum reward, and is, therefore, so little liable to fluctuation in purchasing power. It has been stated authoritatively that the enormous additions to the stock of precious metals, through the discoveries in California and Australia, have not amounted in the average to more than a $1 a day for each person engaged in the diggings. No other metal has been found to be so well adapted for use in coin or so convenient for transportation, by reason of its small bulk, in proportion to its value; but both gold and silver have been found less convenient than paper, redeemable in gold, for ordinary purposes of currency, and the chief commercial countries have accepted the latter as a substitute for metal. The business transactions of such countries, requiring to be discharged by cash payments, will absorb and keep afloat just so much paper currency as they held and no more. In its legitimate uses it forms a very small part of the medium by which business transactions are liquidated. The larger transactions are settled or adjusted by means of cheques or bills of exchange. Paper currency is only made use of, as a general rule, in minor dealings. It would be practically impossible to carry about and to count large sums either of gold or paper. There can be no doubt, however, that considerable amounts of paper currency, beyond the legitimate requirements of trade, may be forced upon the public; but if it is so forced, its purchasing power will be reduced in proportion to its excess, and while, if the issue is made a legal tender, contracts will be impaired and great injustice will thereby result, the heaviest loss will fall upon the labouring man, who is compelled to sell his labour at the current market price, and will be at the mercy of others if he is forced to receive for his wages currency which has no fixed standard of value such as that would certainly be which my hon. friend from South Norfolk advocates. No more ingenious method was ever devised of robbing the poor, than that of an issue of irredeemable currency; and no Government that has resorted to it has been powerful enough to prevent its depreciation. Such an issue would take the form of a forced loan, and should it be exchangeable for a Government stock bearing 3 per cent. interest, as has been proposed in our case, it would be worth just as much as such a stock, less the delay and expense of conversion. For such reasons, if for no others, I shall never cease to raise my voice against all paper money schemes whatsoever, that do not provide for the redemption of such money in coin at its face value, dollar for dollar, on demand; and no man could have fallen into a more serious error than my hon. friend from South Norfolk when he imagined that by any sort of device the Government of Canada, or any other Government, can pay for public works by issuing irredeemable currency, and prevent that currency from depreciating. If it is redeemable, it will remain in circulation just as long as it is fulfilling a legitimate purpose, and no longer. Considerable amounts will neither be hoarded nor kept on hand, because of the risks involved, and when it has passed from the hands of the Government to the contractor, and from him to those whom he has employed, and from them to those to whom they are indebted for food and clothing, its work is done, and it will find its way back to the Treasury for redemption. If it is irredeemable, it will be the prey of every shark who deals in money, and who will profit by the uncertainty of its value; and if the plan advocated by my hon. friend should unfortunately be adopted, it will inevitably bring ruin and dishonour to this country as it has brought ruin and dishonour to every country that has tried it. Many hon. gentlemen who have taken up the advocacy of a National Currency, which is a synonym with them for irredeemable, or as they call it more euphoniously, fiat money, have chosen to speak in very harsh terms of those who, like myself, feel constrained to differ with them, and to adhere to financial principles that are accepted by sound bankers, traders and political economists everywhere. They have been good enough to call us "gold-bugs," "bloated bullionists" and other pleasant names, but that does not affect us, or aid their argument.

Mr. WALLACE (South Norfolk): What about calling us "rag baby" people.

Mr. PLUMB: Nor should it affect the temper of those who hold opinions different from ours if they are not always treated with the serious respect which they deserve. Nor will abuse or ridicule supply the place of argument on either side. We differ from the fiat money men radically and entirely, and one of our strongest points of difference is in that they assert that a Government stamp alone can make of a bit of paper as good a dollar as if it were a bit of gold weighing the tenth of an eagle of mintage standard. They say that the stamp gives the value to the gold coin, we believe that the gold has a universal value which the stamp cannot increase but of which it is merely an assurance, and we believe that paper has no such value. Gold in dust, bars, or bullion, is not only coinable into money, by means of which the business of buying and selling is measured and facilitated, but it is in itself an article of merchandise, the value of which is not enhanced by a mint stamp, which is merely a certificate of weight and fineness. In fact, gold coin going from one country to another is often melted down, reminted and restamped, which obviously would not be done if the value consisted in the stamp. But we need not look far for an exemplification of the unsoundness and danger of the views which the advocates of an irredeemable currency have propounded. Our opinions scarcely need any other strengthening than they receive from the experience of the United States in the issue of legal tender notes during the struggle between the North and South, which began in 1861. That issue amounted to over $700,000,000, and although it was not professedly irredeemable, and was made a legal tender for payment of all debts except Customs dues, and notwithstanding that it was backed by the whole credit of the Government, it lost its purchasing power to such a frightful extent that it would not bring more than from 35 to 40 per cent. of its face value in gold. The creditor who was compelled to receive it for a debt contracted upon a gold basis virtually lost a large part of his debt. The price of daily labour remained nearly unchanged while that of most of the necessaries of life was enormously increased. The farmer paid double or treble prices for everything he bought, but the price of wheat did not rise in proportion. It is true that, after several years of inflation and depreciation, the legal tender greenbacks were brought up to a gold value by the resumption of specie payments, and it is equally true that the public, as a whole, lost by the transaction, while heavy profits were reaped by foreign bankers and stock-jobbers at the expense of the nation. A man would pay in that currency three-fold more than if he paid in gold. I know an instance of a friend of mine who, with $100 of Canadian money, went to New York, paid all his expenses, stayed there a fortnight, and came back with $120 in greenbacks, having sold his Canadian money for $240 in greenbacks. That would be the state of things here in a far greater degree if we were to make an inconvertible paper currency. There is but one common measure of value, and we cannot depart from it without incurring the disasters that have attended all such departures. It is impossible to compute the enormous losses that have followed the issue of irredeemable paper, or the suspension of specie payments by Governments or banks, and I fail to see any argument that can be urged in favour of voluntarily experimenting upon such dangerous theories as my hon. friend has seen fit to adopt. He has only to read the financial history of France, Austria, the United States, Russia, and war of England during the first twenty years of this century, to find ample refutation of his theories. My objections, however, do not extend to an experiment such as has been proposed by my hon. friend the Finance Minister, by which he hopes to extend the Government issues, convertible into coin on demand, by the amount of $8,000,000, under the Resolutions now before the House. There can be no doubt that such a sum can be added to the $12,000,000 now authorised, without hazard, and, inasmuch as it must be redeemed on demand, the hon. the Finance Minister must find means to redeem it, whether the basis now proposed is sufficient or not. My hon. friend knows, and the House knows, that there is no such thing as actual circulation of the $12,000,000 now issued. At most, there are not more than $2,500,000 or $3,000,000 afloat. The remainder is held in the coffers of the banks as a reserve, and it is probable that a large part of the increased issue will also remain there. It is nothing more or less than a loan, and the profit may be calculated at 4 per cent. per annum, less the cost of printing the notes, the loss of interest in the gold reserve, and the risk and inconvenience of owing a loan payable on demand instead of a distant fixed day. That it is in the bank vaults is practically of little consequence to the Government as long as it is outstanding; wherever it may be it represents its face value to the Government, and saves the interest thereon, according to the terms I have just stated. It is immaterial whether it is in the hands of the bank or the public, except in this way: that the banks may require the redemption of the large sums they hold on some sudden crisis, at which time I have no doubt the Government will have the power to meet the demand. But if the same sum was in the hands of the public, it could not be sent in for redemption so rapidly, for it is well-known that although notes are issued payable on demand, but a small part can practically be demanded at once, and a reserve of 30 or 35 per cent. of ready money for circulation and deposits is found, by long experience, to be ample for the wants of any sound banking institution. Loss may ensure sufficient means to meet any probable demand upon the Government. It must be remembered that the gold basis shown in the bank statements, however, forms but a small part of the actual available means; there is behind it the whole amount due from borrowers, which must be paid in gold or its recognised equivalent, and there is also the balances due from other banks and agents, often representing a far larger sum than the actual cash reserves.

AN HON. MEMBER: They cannot get it.

MR. PLUMB: They can get it with perfect ease as long as sound banking exists. The hon. gentleman is mistaken in saying they cannot. I do not pretend to say that any bank doing business in the ordinary way could pay all its liabilities on the instant, but I say that it is the calculation of every sound banker, based upon experience, that he must have cash in hand sufficient to meet any possible demand, and that its business shall be so managed as to provide funds from day to day to replenish his vaults if need be; and to this end he can stop trading and husband his receipts. The whole business of banking is based upon credit on both sides of the account. The stockholders lend the capital, the depositors lend their deposits, and the circulation outstanding is a loan from the public. It is an expansion of the credit system; but it is a voluntary arrangement. You cannot force the banks to continue business; you cannot hamper or tax them beyond a certain point without causing them to wind-up and give back their capital to the shareholders who will not lend it, and take all the risks without adequate prospect of remuneration. The hon. member for South Norfolk and his friends demand that the Government shall take away from the banks the privilege of issuing circulation, and some of them have suggested that the banks shall issue and circulate the fiat money of the Government. Suppose the banks should refuse to have anything to do with irredeemable currency, and they ought to, and doubtless would, refuse—what then? The banking system is so entwined with our commercial affairs that it cannot be dispensed with. It would be impolitic and unwise to injure or destroy it. In connection with the question of the issue of notes arises the question of the renewal of the bank charters, which also forms part of the subject under present discussion. My hon. friend must see that the whole community is interested in the Resolutions and Bill which are before us, by which the charters of the existing banks are to be extended for ten years from the 1st of July, 1881, in a very much larger degree than at first might be supposed. For the convenience of all commercial transactions, it is desirable for the dealer to be able to go for his accommodations to places where there is an aggregation of capital. My hon. friend understands that; he knows that such aggregations of individual capital in banking institutions greatly facilitates the borrower, and enables him to carry on business transactions which would be difficult, if not impossible, without it. The profits of the banks have been by no means excessive, even with all the advantages gained by the privilege of issuing notes; and however much it may be desired to take from them that privilege, it would not be sound policy to do so. Credit, we believe, to be necessary for the successful development of trade and commerce. Some of the currency theorists argue that credit should be abolished, although they themselves are advocates for its extension in its most objectionable form. With regard to the terms upon which the Government have proposed, under the hon. the Finance Minister's proposition, to renew the charters of the banks, I beg to say that I believe that the public are entitled to the most ample security for the note circulation which the banks are permitted to issue, and which the public, as involuntary creditors, are forced to receive in the daily transaction of business. While I object strongly to the proposition to take from the banks the power of issuing notes, I think the proposal, which came, I understand, from the banks, to make the issues the first lien upon their assets, and which is embodied in the Bill before us, is impolitic as regards the banks, although its effect may work satisfactorily as regards the public. I believe that it is the bounden duty of the Government to compel the banks to make those issues secure beyond peradventure. In order to do this, it was my idea, if possible, to assimilate our system—slowly and gradually, in order to avoid disturbance, but ultimately—entirely to that of the United States, under which the banks deposit with the Government at Washington a certain amount of public securities, which are transferred to the Controller of the banks, who holds their engraved plates in custody, and prints their circulation notes as ordered; he holds the security in trust for the redemption of the circulation; he gives the banks their notes countersigned in his department, and those notes represent not more than the current value of the securities thus held, the banks issuing no more notes than they receive from the Controller. They are entitled to receive notes to the amount of the market value of the stock so deposited by them, but such amount must not be above the par value. They are entitled to receive the interest on these stocks during the time the bank remains solvent. The banks are compelled to make Returns to the Controller, and are subject to rigid inspection; they are also obliged to hold a certain reserve as security for circulation and deposits: these reserves consist of legal tender notes of the United States. There are 2,045 banks in operation under this system, having an aggregate circulation of $350,000,000. The public are so entirely satisfied with the security, that notes are rarely presented for redemption. The system is an absolutely secure one. In case of failure of any bank, the Government at once advertises that it will redeem the notes of that bank on demand at par in gold, and after a bank failure, its notes after continue in circulation, for nobody loses confidence in them or has any fear that they will not be redeemed.

MR. ANGLIN: But under that system the Government gets no share of the profits of circulation.

MR. PLUMB: Well, no; it does not directly. But there is this to be said:

the Government has an immense amount of currency in legal tender notes which the banks hold as their reserves, and the Government puts a large tax on the banks yielding about $15,000,000 a year; that is the little profit the Government makes; and it would be a considerable one here. I thought the hon. the Finance Minister might be disposed to adopt some such system. As to the proposition of the hon. gentleman, the Bill before us to allow the circulation of the banks to become the first lien on their assets, I have very grave doubts as to whether it is judicious or desirable. It would be better for the banks to secure their notes upon some gradual scale similar to the system I have just now pointed out. It will be found, in the end, that the security of the notes, by making them a first lien upon the assets, will work to the disadvantage of the banks, when in case of a failure depositors find their claims postponed during the time the securities are being realised for the redemption of the notes, and I was in hopes that my hon. friend would see his way to put in a permission to the bank to take as the alternative of securing their notes by a first lien on their assets, the right to secure their notes at a rate of 10 or 15 per cent. a year by pledge of Dominion Stocks, retiring their old issues in that proportion. I thought that many of the larger banks would see it to their advantage to take this course, and still think it would be desirable to prevent the banks to have this option. To make their assets liable for their notes as a first lien would be excessively embarrassing wherever there was a bank failure; it would injure all other banks in regard to their depositors. It would be much better to permit them to come under the American system of securing their notes. It is claimed that, by securing their notes, they take out so much of their capital and make their circulation a sort of rigid iron rule that they need a more expansive system. Something of this sort was urged in the State of New York when the old banks were about to be compelled to go under the system now prevailing in the United States. I was then an earnest opponent of the new system. I felt there was the difficulty which has been suggested here, but the practical working has shown that any objection was not sound. The banks have made more money under the present than they did under the old system. They have found no practical difficulty in furnishing facilities for moving the enormous crops of the west to the seaboard, and they have done the business far more safely than before. The produce business in the western United States is now transacted mainly by means of short date bills of exchange. It is a mistake to suppose it is absolutely necessary that there should be an expansive provision of currency here for that purpose. But not only so, for currency is so bulky that it could never form any very large item in the business transactions of the country. A package of $10,000 in small notes would be two feet in length, and no one would take the risk of carrying it, or of counting it, if he could make or receive large payments in any other way. I am heartily in accord with the Banking Bill which my hon. friend has brought forward. I feel that the banks are entitled to a renewal of their charters, and also that the Government, if it chooses, is entitled to take the circulation of the four dollar notes or any others into its own hands. Whether it will do so or not is, however, a mere question of policy. It has been argued that, because the Government possesses that right, it should assume it; but that does not follow. The banks should not be unduly hampered in the prosecution of their business. Nothing can be more suicidal than for any political party to attempt to make a crusade against the business of the country—nothing can be more suicidal than the performance of any act which would form the slightest excuse for making a stringency in the money market. I do not think the operations of trade could go on, except with the aid of the great money institutions of the country, which are, upon the whole, ably managed and a credit to Canada. I trust the Resolutions and the Bill will meet with the acceptance of the House. Although I will say I would like to see them modified, so far as to permit any bank to secure its circulation in the way I have suggested if it elects to do so rather than by making it a first lien upon its assets; but if the hon. gentleman feels that he has the entire concurrence of the banking interest in his proposition, there need be no objection to them. It will not be long, however, I venture to say, before many of the larger banks will see it is to their interest to avail themselves of the proposition I have suggested. I hope when the hon. gentleman deals with the general subject of chartering new banks, he will be prepared to recommend a scheme like that which obtains in the United States. I can readily understand why the hon. the Minister proposes to repeal the Act of last year in reference to the registration of bank shares. I did not think it was a practicable measure at the time, but I was willing to give in largely to public sentiment, which desired to prevent dealing in such shares by brokers, by making fictitious sales, in which no stock was transferred or, in fact, possessed by the seller. The banks, in whose interest the Act was passed, seem now to desire to have it annulled, having found it, as I understand, quite useless.

MR. CASEY: The hon. gentleman who has just sat down has given us a great deal of information on a subject on which I believe he has reason to be specially acquainted; and when he speaks on subjects on which he has special knowledge, he is always instructive to the House. I do not intend to go into a general discussion of the currency question, as the hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Wallace) has promised us another opportunity for that. I suppose we are all agreed on the data of the problem which the Government wish to solve by these Resolutions. In the first place, they probably wish to give the holder of notes of all kinds throughout the country that perfect security, which I believe it is the duty of the Government to afford them. Government should neither issue notes of doubtful goodness, nor allow others to issue notes under charters which are not properly secured. The other object of the Government must have been to secure a certain share of the profit to be derived from the circulation of those notes, and they have chosen to get that profit by becoming issuers themselves to a larger extent than before. With regard to their first object, that of security, they have tried the experiment of making all notes a first lien on the assets of the banks; the second object, that of profit, is also in the nature of an experiment. In both cases nothing has been definitely settled. They have agreed upon no definite line of policy to guide us in the future, but have proceeded only in an experimental way. Perhaps they may be right in this; but it is open to hon. members to point out in what respect their experiment is wanting in the conditions which ensure success. It is true that by this means a Government can obtain a forced loan without interest for some period, but, as has already been pointed out, that loan is for a very uncertain period and for a very uncertain amount. The Government have no means of keeping notes in circulation other than those possessed by banks, consequently they cannot secure a larger circulation than the banks could have secured if there were no Government currency. They undertake to stop a certain part of the bank issue by monopolising the right to issue notes of certain denominations. I think the chances are that this plan will not succeed to any great extent. There is one piece of information which the House should possess before passing on this subject, namely, the amount of bank notes of the denominations proposed to be monopolised now in circulation. Perhaps the hon. Minister can give us light on that point.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: I do not know the exact proportion. I do not know how many fours are in circulation—some banks do not issue any.

MR. CASEY: Then in framing this scheme the hon. gentleman has not had before him the information necessary to form a rational idea as to its probable success. The banks come in immediate contact with borrowers, and it will be their interest to induce borrowers to accept the denominations of notes which they issue in preference to Government notes. It remains to be seen who will come out best in this rivalry—the banks, who have all the circumstances in their favour, or the Government, who are dependent upon the banks to keep their notes in circulation. It has been found in England that about £15,000,000 of currency remains out permanently, and I have the highest authority for saying that this amount is never trenced upon during any crisis. If the Government could say positively just how many millions of currency would remain out here, we might, probably, effect a permanent loan to that extent, but I cannot see how it can otherwise be done. The total circulation of the banks has often been below $20,000,000, and that fact points to the great danger there is that this $20,000,000 might not be kept permanently in circulation. When the Government have to pay out large sums on contracts, it might be embarrassing if those notes were returned suddenly to be cashed.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: We do not propose to pay it out on large contracts. I said it would be returned at once if such were the case.

MR. CASEY: Then we have no clear idea of how this money is to be disposed of, except so far as it will be used in payments to the Indians. It has been suggested to me that it would be a good plan to increase the Indian annuities and so get rid of the notes. The hon. Minister told us that a very large quantity of gold, now held as reserves would be liberated by this issue. I think there is a stronger idea generally prevalent about the benefits from the liberation of gold than the facts justify. If it should be so liberated, something else will take its place. Notes which are as good as gold for common use, will take its place in the bank reserves, and be equally locked up. This gold will go out of the country, as it will not be required for banking reserves. There would be only a temporary benefit. There are several general dangers arising from the issue of notes by the Government. The fact is, that they would not be regulated by the requirements of the public for circulation, as is the case with the bank issues. A bank has no temptation to issue faster than the circulation of the country absorbs its notes. The Government has many temptations to issue notes faster, including political inducements. They may suddenly require a moderate sum to tide them over a temporary difficulty for which they would not care to ask the authority of Parliament. If the circulation is already full when those notes are issued they would only stay out a brief period, and the country would have to cash them very shortly after, and perhaps to effect a loan for that purpose. It is very possible that embarrassment would be caused to an incoming Government, by some irregular and careless issue of notes by the outgoing Government. We have known incoming Governments to be embarrassed in more than one way by the acts of their predecessors. I scarcely think that any party Government in this country is to be trusted with the power of disarranging the prices of everything, and involving the country in debt, and exposing to embarrassment new Governments by the issue of large quantities of paper money. But there is another view of the matter: that this issue would shorten the accommodation which the banks can afford to their customers. They have been in the habit of lending their own credit in the shape of bank notes, having thus been able, when a demand arose for currency, for the purpose of moving the produce of the country, to increase the circulation temporarily for the benefit of their customers as well as themselves. If a large proportion of the currency is composed of Government issues, the banks cannot do this to the same extent. The currency required by this particular class of borrowers consist largely of notes the Government reserves to itself, and the borrowers cannot take their loans either in cheques or large notes. The banks will then have to lend, instead of their own issues, the Government notes, for which they must give value. Their lending powers will be restricted, for the time being, exactly to the extent of the increased circulation of Government notes. It is argued that the Government would get some profit from the circulation. To be sure they will, but somebody else will loose to that extent, and the country will be nothing the richer. The plan the Government has devised for securing the note-holders at first sight struck me very favourably. No doubt it was just to make the note-holders preferential creditors, but it has been urged by a gentleman whose opinion I much respect, that such a provision will alarm depositors, who, as soon as banks become shaky would change their claims into preferential ones to withdraw their deposits in the form of notes of the bank. So the note-holders and depositors would stand on the same footing, instead of the note-holder having the advantage, as was intended, I think it quite possible, however, that the possibility of depositors converting their claims into preferential claims would prevent, to a great extent, that timidity which is largely the cause of the runs on banks, and that after a few of them had converted their claims the rest might gain confidence and the runs might stop. But this is altogether an experiment. Again, supposing what is dreaded with regard to the depositors did not occur, but that the note-holder remained the only preferential creditor, I do not think the first lien would secure the value of the notes after the failure of the bank. The poor man would have to cash them at once, and they would be at a discount pending the liquidation of the bank's affairs. The hon. member for Niagara has suggested that we should adopt the National Banking system of the United States. The wants of elasticity in that system is almost a sufficient objection to it. On the other hand there are some points of it which might have been adopted by the Government, in preference to the means they have adopted, of securing a portion of the profits on circulation. They might have imposed some tax on the banks for the privilege of issuing notes, so as to obtain a portion of the profits instead of issuing Government notes. That would have been perfectly legitimate. Still further, a plan for combining the undoubted security which the Government guarantee gives with the facilities for issuing, which only the banks possess, might have been contrived. I will take the liberty of suggesting that, on certain securities being given to the Government, the Government might guarantee the notes of the banks on receiving a certain portion of the profit. That would secure the note-holders, and the banks might so arrange as to secure the Government. I have suggested the plan of giving the Government a first lien, and this form of lien might be free from some of the objections to it in the present form. If the Government held the first lien, and nobody else could become a preferential creditor, the Government would be perfectly secure, and also the note-holder. The arrangement would work advantageously to the banks, except in so far as they would have to pay something to the Government for the use of its name. I think the chief of all the objections that can be brought against this plan of the Government is that pointed out by the hon. member for Centre Huron (Sir Richard J. Cartwright), that it appears to favour the idea of a National Currency as understood by the hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Wallace). I did not feel that point so strongly until that hon. gentleman congratulated the hon. the Finance Minister on cautiously inaugurating what he considered to be a great reform. It is clear the hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace) considers this measure a step in the direction in which he wishes to proceed. This is the chief danger. The people would be very apt to assume that something of this kind is intended in the distant future, from what is now taking place. I think it would be the duty of the Government, sometime in the course of this discussion, to make it clear: whether they intend to proceed with the reorganisation of the currency on the basis proposed by that hon. gentleman, or to make merely some modification of that gold-based currency system always hitherto prevailing in this country.

MR. ROSS (Dundas): I would like some information in regard to one feature of this scheme. At certain periods of the year, I think there would be considerable difficulty with business men if the Government assumes the circulation up to notes of $4, and the banks can only issue fives, tens and higher notes. At the active business season when men go into the markets to buy and handle large quantities of produce and have to get accommodation from the banks, by what means can we oblige them to pay out to people in need small notes for change—bills of $4, $2 and $1. It would be utterly impossible with only bills of $5 and $10 to make change. Dealers will want to make payments with notes of $4 and smaller amounts. The banks will not give us $4, $2 and $1 notes hereafter. Is there no means by which we can compel the banks to give us smaller notes? If we had enough of $4 notes, we need care very little about $2 and $1. If those customers cannot get smaller bills than $5 from banks, the scheme will not work well. I have no objection to the other features of the measure.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: I think I can answer very satisfactorily the question put. Under the provisions of the Bill the banks will be deprived of the circulation of $4 notes. Any man having an account with the bank, and wishing money to buy produce, can draw a cheque for $500 or $250, and the bank must give him, if demanded, a certain amount, whatever sum he may want, not exceeding $50 in $1 and $2 bills, and the Act requires them to furnish those bills. That would give him ample change for the purpose.

MR. ROSS: It will go a certain distance; but the active buyer, with two or three thousand dollars to pay out during the day can only demand $50 or so in small notes, and will feel very often inconvenienced. I would rather see the Government surrender their $1 and $2 notes altogether and assume the $4 and $5, which would be far better because any commercial man can meet the difficulty by having $4 and $5 notes; but there would be great difficulties if operators can only demand $50 or so in small notes.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: The increased circulation of say two and a-half millions would be largely in $1 and $2 bills, which, in addition to the three millions now out would be sufficient, I think, for the purpose referred to. When any man is paying money into the banks he can keep the $1 bills for change, and deposit the $5 and $10 bills, but he will have more small notes from this increased circulation. If there is any difficulty, instead of drawing a cheque for $1,000, he can draw for $200 or $250 if necessary.

MR. MACKENZIE: That would be a mere trick.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: No.

MR. ROSS (Dundas): We know very well that the banks will not pay out Dominion Notes unless required to do so; it is not their intention to do it.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: Hear, hear.

MR. ROSS: I hope there will be no difficulty, but I do not see how it will be possible to handle great quantities of produce, say from September to December, particularly with convenience, under this scheme. I fear we shall be completely at the mercy of the banks.

In reply to Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT,

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY said he did not think there would be any such means attempted as compelling bank agencies to cash money—$50 cheques for one per cent in small notes. They would only require the $1 and other small notes for ordinary transactions of business, and if there was any difficulty in obtaining them, the Deputy Receiver-General could be applied to, the interest of the Government being to put as many as possible into circulation. It is natural, of course, that the banks should wish to circulate their own notes as largely as possible, but with the assistance of the Deputy Receiver-General, the Government notes could be furnished for the public requirements. There would be no inducement to annoy the banks by drawing out considerable sums in small notes unnecessarily.

MR. MCLENNAN: There is a very important question involved in this Resolution for the issue of a larger amount of Government currency, and although we passed the Resolution, I think the most convenient time to discuss it is in connection with the question with which it is so closely related—the renewal of the charters of banks. These two matters of currency and banking are so closely related that it is impossible to discuss them separately; they are both expedients for the facility to use and to increase wealth. Everybody knows that the first method of trade and the simplest form is that of barter. A man who raises a bushel of wheat exchanges it, in the natural state of things, for a pair of boots, or a heifer, or whatever he wants to exchange it for. To obviate the inconvenience of that method of doing business currency is invented. What form that currency should take is a thing I do not propose to discuss. I am willing to assume just now, that the Government does not propose to make any change in the form or in the character of what passes current for money. The fact that a gold basis has served the purposes of the most advanced nations of the world is a sufficient reason for us to follow that example and to stand by it until we know a great deal more about new theories than we do to-day. I say this with all deference to the hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Wallace) whose earnestness in his view of the case, and whose great desire to increase the wealth of every man in this country, I sympathise with in the fullest measure. The question of increasing the issue of the currency, however, is not a question of the right of the Government, because it has a perfect right to take the issue of the currency into its own hands; but I think there is a serious question of policy involved in it—a question of doing it. I am not without hope that the hon. the Minister of Finance will find that the true wisdom will be to refrain from increasing the volume of Government currency. It is well-known that the use of currency is to facilitate commerce; the establishment of banks in the form in which they exist now has been found to be not only a great convenience, but to have multiplied the uses of wealth by the various means that are adopted in the practice of banking. Bankers, in the first place, were men who accumulated wealth and used their own money altogether. After that they served the purpose of custodians of money, from which I fancy the name is derived. But that form of banking has almost passed away. It is true, bankers are still the custodians of money, but they are so, chiefly, in the sense of custodians for use. The moneys deposited in banks are used in the first place for the purpose of trade to the extent that is safe, beyond keeping a certain reserve, and in the next place the use of bank notes increases the amount of money that can be put into circulation. This does not mean uses that are special to bankers. Bankers have no patent for making money out of the money of others. But it is used to increase the vitality of every existing form of trade, to increase and multiply every industry of the country. The difference between nations in the progress they make in wealth can be readily traced to the principle adopted in banking. It is the practice in some highly civilised countries to hoard money; it is the practice in others to deposit it in banks. The deposits in the London banks at the end of December, 1872, amounted to £120,000,000 sterling; the deposits in the banks of Paris amounted, at the same date, to about £13,000,000. Now, the contrast between the deposit of money in the banks in these two countries forms the key to the relative development of these countries in trade. The population of France, in 1876, was nearly 37,000,000 of people; the population of Great Britain and Ireland was something over 31,000,000. The revenue and expenditure of France were very considerably greater than those of Great Britain, yet the imports of France were only equivalent to $892,000,000, while the imports of Great Britain and Ireland were within a fraction of $2,000,000,000. That is nearly two and a-half times as much. The export trade of France was $961,000,000, while that of Great Britain and Ireland was $1,268,000,000. The imports of France were at the rate of $24 per head, and the exports $26 per head; the imports of Great Britain were $59, and the exports $45 per head, the difference facilitated in a great degree by the different principle in these countries of using money. The country nearest to us, the United States, is most assimilated to ourselves in all that pertains to trade, and the uses and increase of money. We find that in all these respects it comes nearer to the practice of Great Britain. Now, everybody knows that the difference between these countries does not result from a difference in wealth. It is well known that France is probably the richest country in the world for its size in production of soil, industry of the people, and everything that makes a country wealthy. The best proof of that is the readiness with which within a few years it paid the enormous war indemnity, as the result of its war with Germany. But its development in trade, and the commerce of the world is very small compared with that of Great Britain, and chiefly in the expenditures that go on all over the world, as developed in the case of Great Britain in her Colonies and elsewhere. Now it seems to me that this question with respect to the issue of Government notes, is a serious question in respect to the measure in which it may interfere with the business of banking, and it is a serious question in the measure in which it may prevent the banks from assisting in that development and wealth of the country in all the varied forms in which the industries of the country are carried on, in the productions of the soil, in manufactures, in shipping, and in everything that goes to increase the wealth of the country. All these are developed by the assistance of banking capital, and that capital is useful in the measure in which it can be relied upon to serve the necessary purposes of banking; that is, by discounting and loaning money to people who carry on these operations. It is clear that if the Government takes out of the hands of the banks a certain proportion of money that forms a credit for them, to that extent it runs the risk of limiting the power of the banks to accommodate the business of the country. It is true, it may be said, that if the Government supplies that money the purpose is served. Well, there are several things that may be said in respect to that. It may make money dearer, and in this connection it is well to consider what the profits of banking are in this country. We hear a good deal about the difference of interest between these large financial institutions, as they are called, and the people. Well, it happens that the people of this country are the bankers of this country. Every man who makes a little money invests it in something as far as he can, and a very large proportion of it is invested in bank stocks that are considered to be tolerably safe. But, like everything else, it is comparatively safe. Investments in the capital of banks to the extent that is safe, returns but a very moderate profit. Now, there was a short period in the history of this country, during the time of the American war, when some banks took their capital to New York, and entered upon the risks that were incident to the disturbed state of the currency in that country at the time. Taking very large risks in that disturbed currency it happened that large profits were made, and I believe that two or three banks in this country added a very considerable amount to their rest, and paid unusually large dividends for a few years; but what is the effect for the last five years. The effect is that banking capital in this country does not yield over 6 per cent. interest, and is not paying over that amount, to-day, upon the average. If we look, for a moment, at the result of banking in Great Britain, in comparison with this, we shall see the very great difference that exists in the country where the Government imposes no restriction in banking. I may say, in passing, that I think it is a very good model for us to follow. There is a certain relation between the Government and the bank of England, but it is almost a nominal relation. There is scarcely any legal obligation upon the bank beyond the obligation of holding a certain amount of Government securities and I believe now, and I think my hon. friend will find after trying this expedient, that it will be wiser for him to adopt the same plan by which if he must have money from the banks he will allow them to take his securities bearing interest as a deposit to secure their circulation or for any other purpose to secure safety to the public and by that means create the security to the public, and get the loans for the Government which are required without impairing the efficiency of the banks or the facility with which they can use their money for the public good. Of 110 joint stock companies in England, in 1870, there were fifteen that paid dividends of over 20 per cent. per annum; twenty paid from 15 to 20 per cent.; thirty-six paid from 10 to 15 per cent.; thirty-six more paid from 5 to 10 per cent.; and only three out of 110 paid under 5 per cent. Now, it is true that in that country there is a very large amount of capital deposited in the banks for which no capital is paid, and that, of course, helps the dividends of the banks very much. But in Scotland, where daily interest is paid on all accounts, banks have paid as high as 13 per cent. During the same period the result of the peculiar position of the Bank of England has been that it does not pay quite so large an average of dividend as some of the others, although I am not at the moment able to say what that dividend is. The banks, as a general thing, have not a larger rest than the banks have in this country, but they have a very large amount of money upon which no interest is paid. But I merely mention these facts, with reference to the dividends of banks, to show that in this country the money used in banks is not so profitable that this House or the Government can afford to deal with it in a manner to reduce its value to the owners or its efficiency in serving the public. It has been suggested that the American system might be a useful system to introduce. I think that system would have the advantage that the banks would have the interest on the Government bonds as a nucleus of earnings, and I believe that interest is very much more than any advantage derived from the circulation. But there would be inconvenience attending it, because the banking system in this country is not adapted to that system, by reason of the large number of branches at distant points, where notes must be held to meet the fluctuations of trade, and a change of that kind would interfere with the ability of the existing branches to perform the functions that are so necessary. The Resolutions, I see, provide for an amended form of return. That would, perhaps, assist to keep the country better informed as to the securities of the bank. I do not, however, attach much importance to the Resolution giving preference to the note holder. I think it should be the desire of this House, in passing an Act for the regulation of the banks, to make every liability of the bank so safe that the question of preference would be one of very small importance. This question of placing the money of the country on a good foundation, is one of very great importance. It is so to everyone who has a dollar, and to everyone who expects to have one. It is the first thing we look after in new communities, and a great deal of the growth and prosperity of a country will depend, from time to time, on its money being established on a basis safe and permanent, and world-wide in its character.

MR. WALLACE (South Norfolk): The hon. gentleman who has just spoken says there is an intimate connection between currency and banking. I disagree with him in that respect. There is no more connection between currency and banking than there is between growing wheat and speculating in it. I hold that the Government of the country is wanting in its duty, and that this Parliament is recreant in its duty when allows any set of men to furnish the currency of the country. The hon. member for Niagara, and the hon. member for North Norfolk, says that we are the advocates of an irredeemable paper money. That, however, is not a fact. Who ever heard of a National Currency man advocating an irredeemable currency. They talk of unconvertible money, which is simply idiotic. If it was not convertible it never could be used, and if it could not be used it would be folly to issue it. The hon. member for Niagara says there is a common measure. I maintain there is no such thing as a common measure, for every country has its own measure. He also says that gold is suitable as a measure of value, because it is difficult to get, which is a little illogical. I do not think that which is advantageous as a convenience should be difficult to obtain. The hon. member for North Norfolk referred to the American greenback, but he did not state the case accurately or fairly. He stated that the American greenback was payable in gold, which is not the fact. The Resumption Act was only passed in 1875. The doubts entertained in the stability of the Government affected the price of greenbacks. Greenbacks also fluctuated in accordance with the balance of trade. If the imports were large, the price of gold went up, if they were small the price of gold went down. Again, the American greenback, when the National Debt was $1,709,000,000 and when they had $833,000,000 of paper money in circulation, stood at 38¢. The next year when the Americans had increased their paper money in circulation by $150,000,000, and their debt by $1,000,000,000, the greenback stood at 70 cents. So with this increase of the debt, and of the amount of paper money in circulation, the price of gold fell and the price of the greenback increased. Then if you trace the history of the war you will find that the greenbacks as compared with gold fluctuated just as the chances of war seemed for or against the country, and now, notwithstanding that the debt of the country is over $200,000,000 more than it was in 1864, the American greenback is worth dollar for dollar; while in 1864 it was only worth 38 cents, now it is better than gold. The Government employés would not take the gold. There had to be an order passed to compel the employés to take the gold. Now, Sir, let us look at the history of that country during the time that it is said they had this depreciated money—during that greenback period—and let us see how the country prospered. I hold a statement showing the miles of railway put in operation when they had that greenback money, that worthless paper money. In 1864 they built and put in operation, 738 miles of additional railway; in 1865, they put in operation 1,177 miles of additional railway; in 1866, they put in operation 1,716 additional miles of railway; in 1867, they put in operation 2,449 miles of additional railway; in 1868, they put in operation 2,908 miles of additional railway; in 1869, they put in operation 4,615 miles of additional railway; in 1870, they put in operation 6,070 miles of additional railway; in 1871, they put in operation 7,608 miles of additional railway; and in 1872, 5,720 miles of additional railway. Next year they put in operation 4,000 odd miles of additional railway, thus showing that when the greenback paper was used they had the largest prosperity, they had the largest cost expended on their public works, and the largest amount invested in their railways. When the greenback was beginning to be withdrawn from circulation what was the effect? As the paper money was withdrawn from circulation bank discounts began to take their place. In 1866 bank discounts amounted to only $766,000,000; in 1873 bank discounts had risen to about $1,300,000,000 or nearly double, thus showing that as the currency was decreased, the bank discounts—the inferior credit—had increased in an enormous ratio. I was astounded by my hon. friend quoting from Sherman to show that the notes of private corporations was the best circulation for the country. Why, it is an absurdity to say that the credit of a small part of the country is better than the credit of the whole, or to say that the credit of a few bankers would be better than the credit of the whole of the Dominion. It is illogical to say that the credit of the United States is no better, or is worse, than the credit of a few bankers in the United States. It is illogical to say that the credit of a part is better than the credit of the whole. Here is another thing I want to consider in this matter. When that country was pestered, as it is said, with this irredeemable money what was the effect on traders? Were there failures, or were they in a prosperous condition? In 1862, at the beginning of this greenback system, they had 16,252 failures, representing $23,000,000; in 1863, they had 495 failures, representing $7,000,000, and these were the years in which the great increase in circulation in greenbacks took place; in 1864, there were 520 failures, representing about $8,000,000; in 1865, they had 535 failures, representing

$17,500,000: in 1866, as the currency began to be contracted, as the wise men began to draw it in from circulation, the failures were 632, representing $47,000,000—I apprehend that in this $47,000,000 was the large failure of Jay Cooke and Company, which firm was instrumental in bringing about the crises of affairs in that country. In 1867, the failures were 2,386, representing $86,000,000, and so it went on until the failures came to represent, in one year, $228,000,000. And this is the beautiful state of things brought about by the abandonment of the greenback system and the resumption of specie currency. This is the system to be continued, and thus hon. gentlemen say we must have a gold currency. But the hon. gentlemen are not true to themselves, they are not true and consistent advocates of a gold currency. If they will have a gold currency, why not stick to it? What do they say? They say it is not necessary, it does not require 100 cents in the dollar of gold; it does not require 50 cents in the dollar of gold; it does not require 25 cents in the dollar of gold to make a gold currency, and now they are trying to do it at 15 cents on the dollar. Yes, Sir, and I believe they are wise. Gold is not wanted to carry on the internal trade of this country, if the people and the Government have confidence in their own country; it is only necessary to keep up a few banking institutions, to keep a few thousand or so of men rolling in wealth to the ruin of the masses. It must be allowed that we are drawing nothing but interest to pay on the debt in England. Let us show the world that the Canadian people have confidence in their own country and in their own country's resources.

An Hon. MEMBER: Carried.

Mr. WALLACE: "Carried," Yes. Well, we will carry it. I will not, at this late hour, trouble the House much more. I will move my amendment to the Resolution. I have no antipathy to the banks. It would be unwise to withdraw the right of circulation from the banks at once, because we have too little currency; and if we compel them to pay dollar for dollar for gold, we would still more restrict the circulation and work irreparable ruin to the country. But I wish to have inaugurated a system that I believe will be beneficial to the interests of the country. I believe there is no doubt that every man in Canada is deeply interested in the doing away with the pernicious system. It is said that it works well. But what results have we? We have an infinitude of misery, not produced by vice or crime, which I hold should be the only cause of misery. But we have an infinitude of misery caused by the false monetary system which is crippling the power of this country, which is injuring the industries of this country, and causing many of our population to starve. I am not an advocate of taking away the whole circulation of these banks at once, because that would be injurious to the business of this country; but I am in favour of its being done away with as fast as it can be without unduly injuring the business of the country. I make this proposition, that the following words be added to the Resolution—:

"That no bank which under the authority of any Act of this Parliament shall get a renewal of its charter, shall be empowered to put in circulation a larger amount in value of its own notes than the amount of said notes in circulation at the date of the expiry of its present charter."

I do not desire to do anything to embarrass the trade of the country. On the contrary, I desire to do what I believe will tend to promote the industry and prosperity of the whole Canadian people.

Mr. BOULTBEE: I think this is a subject of sufficient importance to warrant me in giving expression to my very crude ideas for a few moments. It seems to me that this matter is not only worth discussing, but well worth discussing by men better able than I am to discuss it; because we cannot shut our eyes to the fact that we have a good deal of trouble in conducting our affairs, and have had for some years past. We have been seriously embarrassed. We have been going from one stage to the other, the latter worse than the first, and it is necessary to take some means by which we may hope to extricate ourselves from the slough of trouble we have got into. In inaugurating the National Policy we had in view the effort to get our affairs into such a shape that we could do business amongst ourselves and create our own wealth; but in doing this, and so as to give that policy a fair scope and a full trial, I think we require better and larger business means, I think we require more capital. I agree fully with the hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Wallace), that it would not be advisable to increase our present means by borrowing abroad. I take it that it is a great evil to have a large foreign indebtedness which is becoming augmented from year to year, causing an increased difficulty in carrying on the business of the country. I am aware that a certain measure of ridicule attaches to any man who attacks the gold currency or says anything in its disparagement, and the reason is to be found in two causes. In the first place, those who discuss it are generally men connected with financial institutions, generally the wealthy men of the world, and the result is that where there is any suggestion of interference with the established currency, which is controlled by these men, it is only natural for them to oppose any such interference. A small ring of financial men stand with their hands on the throat of the world. They tax every enterprise, and burden every genius. Nothing can be projected, no scheme can be set afloat; no man can spend years of his lifetime devising anything for the good of mankind, but seven-eighths of its profit will be gobbled up by these financiers. They have control of the financial interests of the world, and accumulate money out of money. It is, therefore, only natural that they do not like to have the settled financial basis disturbed in any manner; but there is another reason more solid than this, that is, the one stated by the hon. member for North Norfolk, viz., that gold and silver have been fixed by nations for a long period as the measure of value in international exchange. Now it does seem to me—and it is a question for dealing with seriously—that it is quite possible for the affairs of nations to be conducted internally upon a National Currency founded upon the natural resources, and yet to leave the gold value as the basis of International Exchange. Perhaps as we are now endeavouring to open up our North-West by means of a railway, we may facilitate that work by the use of a currency of this sort. If the Government, for instance, were to issue a Dominion currency in payment for 100 miles of the road, giving the land as security for a limited period, say for ten or fifteen years, I do not see that it would suffer any depreciation, and even if it did I do not know of any objection to it. If we go to England instead, what do we borrow it on? Not on gold, because we have no gold. We borrow it on our national resources, on the railways, on the land to be hypothecated by the Government; and it seems to me on looking at the question inaugurated by these Resolutions, it is no more than doing what statesmen have been trying to do, to a great extent, all along. It is attempting to preserve the theory of the gold basis of value, while practically assigning it. They do not want to shake or disturb the currency, but they want more money in circulation. The hon. gentleman did not want to disturb the old established gold basis, but simply to have a larger proportion of currency to a smaller proportion of gold. I maintain that it is nothing more than a practical recognition of the fact that a fixed gold value is only a theoretical value, and that the natural basis of value are the practical resources of the country. The arguments of the hon. members for both Norfolks have been used for scores of years, there is nothing new in them. There were certainly some novel ideas in the remarks of the hon. member for South Norfolk, but there was nothing novel in the arguments of the hon. gentleman from North Norfolk. That hon. gentleman simply read the old opinions on financial matters, which have been issued for years. It was unnecessary to read them, but every opinion quoted was based not on such a scheme as I have suggested, a reasonable amount of National Currency, but on what is called fiat money in improper quantities without resources to redeem it. What I suggest is very different from this: it is the issue of a small and reasonable amount in payment for a public work with that work as a security, as also the land allocated in aid of the work, and redeemable at a fixed period in fiat stocks.

MR. CASEY: I notice that the hon. member for South Norfolk has not only put less in his Resolution than he is in the habit of doing, but he has moderated his claims, to a great extent, on the currency question. In his first speech he claimed that anything could be made money by the fiat of law—that it required no value beyond that given to it by law; but now the hon. gentleman says that anyone would be insane who advocated the introduction of currency that was not redeemable in something of value, and that the currency he now proposes would be redeemable in something of value. We have him on the horns of a dilemma. Either he was not clear in his ideas when he advocated the issue of a currency of no value, except that given by the fiat of law, or else he is coming down, to a tremendous extent, from his former position, when he says that the currency he favours would be redeemable in something of value. The Resolution before the House does not touch the question the hon. gentleman has discussed. He tells us this currency would be redeemable by payment on dues to the Government, and for lands and by conversion into bonds. When the hon. member for North York said it would be redeemable in railroads and locomotives, he struck the idea exactly. Now, a currency which the Government is willing to receive in payment of dues, or for lands and bonds, has a certain intrinsic value as a security; but it does not follow that that currency would be a suitable one—indeed, that it would be useful as a currency at all. The notes issued by the Government would have value as securities, but no such value as would fit them for use as currency, for they could not be redeemable except by going out of circulation. In being paid for dues or bonds they would go out of circulation, and nothing would take their place. It may be said they could be paid out again. But nothing is to be gained by that, since the Government could make new notes in an unlimited quantity. The value of the notes would depend on certain circumstances, and would not be a fixed value by any means. Suppose $20,000,000 come due to the Government in the course of the year; then $20,000,000 worth of the currency in circulation would be as good as gold as a security, or as an investment, because it could be used in place of gold for paying those debts to the Government. Of course, you cannot imagine the whole currency of the country being paid into the Government, since it would occasion a periodical destruction of currency which could not be endured. There would, therefore, have to be more currency than is to be paid in for dues each year, and the surplus would have no value in itself. As nobody would know exactly what part would be redeemable, the whole body of the currency would be depreciated, and would bear a value proportionate to the relation between the amount receivable for dues and the amount in circulation. Let us take the case of convertibility into lands, to which the same argument applies to a great extent. The value conferred by convertibility into land would depend upon the amount of currency available for such conversion during the year, and the value of the lands available for sale, because Government lands are put at a fixed price per acre. A dollar bill, based on land, means an acre, or one-fifth, or one-half an acre, according to the price of the land. The value to be attached to that dollar bill would depend upon the value of the acre or fraction thereof which could be obtained for it, and the currency would be just as much a subject of speculation as wild lands are now. I need say very little in regard to currency redeemable in railways or based on the railway to be constructed. Nobody will desire to get together $20,000 in bills and cash them in a locomotive, or in a mile of road-bed. We come now to consider convertibility into bonds. If a bond were only payable in similar paper it would add nothing to its value. In the United States the experiment of converting greenbacks into bonds was continuously tried. When the greenback was at its lowest point, it could be converted into Government bonds, but neither one added to the value of the other. The surplus over the needs of circulation available for convertibility would not increase with the increasing volume of currency. Inflation raises prices, and higher prices require the use of more currency in each transaction. Currency is, therefore, relatively as scarce in times of inflation as at other times. The whole proceeding goes in a vicious circle, the one factor continually aggravating the other, and I think we may conclude which that it is clear that no currency which is redeemable in anything else than some other valuable article equally available as a means of exchange would suffice. No stronger illustration of this can be had than the history of the paper money adopted in France in 1791, when assignats were first issued. There were troublous times in France then. The credit of the country was very good, but there was a demand for more currency, the people being under the impression that more currency meant more capital. They issued those assignats, which were a currency redeemable in land, not by the process of payment by land, but as mortgages upon the land, bearing interest at 3 per cent. per annum until cashed in land. The lands were not wild lands, situated thousands of miles from the civilised portions of the country, but the choice lands of France. They were at first the confiscated Church lands, and afterwards the lands of exiled nobles were included with them. The orators of the day asserted that this currency was not only as good as gold, but better. One said: "I would rather have a mortgage upon a garden than upon a kingdom, because the one I can enforce by law, and the other I cannot." This currency was reinforced by laws which compelled its acceptance at certain maximum prices. A man was not allowed to charge more than so much for any particular article, and he was compelled to take the assignats at par. That was the most logical attempt to give value to a paper currency that I ever heard of. But that currency fell to such a point that 288 francs in paper were worth only 1 franc in gold after five years trial. It was followed by another kind of currency, which, instead of consisting of mortgages was a currency of deeds giving an absolute title to lands. That was found to be as bad as the other, and the whole attempt had to be given up, and the currency repudiated. I think this should be a sufficient answer to any argument that a currency based on the North-West lands, or on an unproductive Pacific Railway in British Columbia, or an unproductive Intercolonial Railway, if you choose, would have any permanent value or be safe from depreciation. The hon. member for South Norfolk accounts for the weakness of business in the country by the fact that interest is so high that nobody can afford to borrow money to carry on business with. I do not think a fairer example of putting the cart before the horse can be conceived than to say that business is slack because interest is so high that nobody will borrow money. Who fixed the rate of interest? It was fixed like all other payments for the use of money or any other article—by the law of supply and demand. Therefore, it is ridiculous to say that business is slow because the rate of interest is high. The rate of interest is generally raised by the briskness of business, and depressed by its slackness.

Several HON. MEMBERS: Question, carried, lost, order.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD appealed to hon. members to observe order and allow Mr. Casey opportunity of finishing his remarks.

MR. CASEY: Interest is always lowered when business is slack. In England it was so low lately owing to the depression, that some of the banks charged one per cent for taking care of the customers money. The rate of interest in the United States was much higher before the depression, and while inflation was rife than it has been of late. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace) went on to say that greenbacks were not payable in gold. I dispute the soundness of the assertion as an argument. True, they were not in terms made payable in gold, but it was the hope that they would be payable some time in gold which give them all the value they had. Greenbacks were a currency whose redemption was deferred indefinitely. Everybody knows that as the time for their payment in gold drew near the greenbacks rose in value. The hon. gentleman stated that the Government of the United States had to pass a law to force their employés to take gold instead of greenbacks. That was at a time when greenbacks were redeemable in gold, and as good as gold. The value that greenbacks had acquired at that time was not due to the fiat of the law. The hon. member for South Norfolk argued that it was not the excess of greenbacks that produced their depreciation—that it was the involvement of the country in war. The excess was one factor in the problem, and the war was another.

Several HON. MEMBERS: Question.

MR. MACKENZIE appealed to the Chairman to try to preserve order saying the noises and interruptions were quite intolerable.

The CHAIRMAN requested hon. members to allow Mr. Casey to proceed quietly.

MR. CASEY: An excess of any currency will cause depression in its value. If we have more of any article than is required a fall in value ensues, and it is the same with money; if the issuer is in bad credit, the depreciation will be the greater. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace) stated that in 1864 greenbacks were worth thirty-eight cents on the dollar, and that the following year after a large issue they reached seventy cents, and he attributed this fact correctly to the cessation of the Civil War. That fact was one cause of the improvement, but the depreciation to even seventy cents was caused by the excess of greenbacks over the wants of exchange. He (Mr. Wallace) had gone on to ridicule the idea that we have still a gold currency when we only held a percentage of gold against it. Nobody ever claimed we had a gold currency but only a gold-based currency. So long as it is known our notes can be redeemed in gold, the currency possesses a gold basis. It is absurd to argue that credit is better than gold as the hon. gentleman had done; the statement has no meaning unless its author means that the credit of the issuer will enable him to procure something more valuable than gold. Credit is as good as gold, and it is on credit that the value of all issues depends, when the belief is that the issuer is able to procure the gold for the notes if required. But to use that for an argument in favour of paper currency, as the hon. gentleman wishes to do, is illogical and inappropriate, because his currency would not consist of a promise to pay anything. It would not bind the Government to exchange it for anything, but only to receive it on debts and dues, or for the purchase of land. The hon. gentleman from North York (Mr. Boulton), says that business men think we should have more currency to facilitate business operations. I think it is meant that we have too little capital in the country, which is probably true. That is different from saying that we have too little currency, as currency is not capital. If you issued $100,000,000 of Government currency to-morrow, there would not be a single dollar more capital in the country of the kind advocated by the hon. member for South Norfolk. Unless based on gold it would not add anything to our facilities for productive industry. Even then it could only be procured in the same way as money is now, in exchange for value or labour. We have a free and open currency market in this country. Banks are allowed to issue as much currency as they choose within certain limits, namely, up to the amount of their paid-up capital. What do the Bank Returns show as to the demands for currency? This: that although they have authority to issue $60,000,000 of currency, they only have in circulation about $18,000,000, which proves we have not too little currency. If the country required more there was no difficulty in obtaining it. The fiat currency would not any more than the present one give people currency of a purchasing power without giving value for it. In no other way could it increase the wealth of the people, in reference to the argument that the currency should expand in proportion to our industries. The fact that the country now does not need as much currency as some years ago, is apparent from the fact that the bank circulation of Ontario and Quebec, at the end of 1872, was $22,500,000; at the commencement of the financial year of 1877, $16,440,000; at the commencement of 1878, $16,528,000; at the commencement of the present financial year, $15,971,000. Let us take the busiest time of the year, October, when most produce is being moved. At the end of October, 1872, the bank circulation was $25,906,000; in October, 1877, $22,018,000; in October, 1878, $20,419,000; and in October, 1879, $20,800,000. So that the needs of the country have not been increasing during the past eight years. But one of the strongest arguments that the hon. gentleman brought forward, in his estimation, was that the United States had prospered tremendously under the greenback system. He said that thousands of miles of railway were opened during that time, and but few failures occurred. He might have described the establishment of enormous manufactories, with other indications of what he calls prosperity. Where did the money come from that built those railways and manufactories? Was it greenbacks? Did the people get it for nothing? Was it a present made to the country by the Legislature? Not at all. Most of it was borrowed abroad, with interest payable in gold. Were the construction of these works and the institution of these manufactures a true test of prosperity? They were signs of recklessness and extravagance. A country like a spendthrift can make business look lively. But a reckoning has come to the United States. These railways and other works were unproductive, and in the last few years the crash has come, and those very transactions were the direct cause of the misfortunes that have overtaken the United States. If those reckless expenditures and undertakings were the fruits of the greenback policy, as claimed by the hon. gentleman, they are the most decided condemnation of that currency. I hold the greenback heresy entirely responsible for those misfortunes. We know that the inflation of the currency produces a general inflation of ideas. People who find governments living exclusively on credit think they may live exclusively on credit themselves. It was the reckless condition of public opinion, caused by the greenback issues, that was chiefly responsible for that tremendous extravagance, and the ruin and depression that have followed it. It was the cause of the industrial depression which has since taken place. In 1876, in the early part of the period of depression, there were universal strikes of labours throughout the United States. Shortly afterwards the current of emigration began to turn and began to flow from the United States to England, instead of from England to the United States. It was the cause of the penury and want that overtook settlers in the western country. All these evils were, to a great extent, due to the general inflation of ideas and extravagance brought about by the greenback heresy in the United States. I think I have now gone over all the points that have been brought up in the speeches of the two hon. gentlemen to whom I have replied, although I have by no means touched upon all the arguments put forth by the advocates of fiat money. I think the House has become pretty thoroughly seized before this of all the facts in relation to that subject, and I think we are now in a better situation for giving an intelligent vote on the subject than in any previous Session. I am sorry the hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Wallace) did not this year, as on previous occasions, formulate his views in favour of fiat money, in a straightforward Resolution, challenging the Government to take the sense of the House upon it.

GOVERNMENT BUSINESS.

Resolved, That on every Wednesday for the remainder of the Session, Government Measures shall take precedence after Questions put by Members.—(Sir John A. Macdonald.)

CIVIL SERVICE REFORM.

QUESTION.

MR. CASEY: There is one measure which will have to be left out, but which, I think, the Government should take up in another form. In the Speech from the Throne, we were promised a Bill for the reform of the Civil Service. The hon. Premier promised us a measure on this subject "ere long." Perhaps he will tell us when "ere long" will be, and whether it will be brought down this Session.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I think my hon. friend must give notice of that question.

PRAYERS.

PILOTAGE ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

(Mr. Pope, Queen's, P.E.I.)

FIRST READING.

MR. POPE (Queen's, P. E. I.), in introducing a Bill (No. 116) To amend the Pilotage Act, 1873, said: It has been found that, in many places, pilots do not properly discharge their duties ; and it is a difficult matter for the pilotage authorities to deal with them, or to get rid of them when they do not perform their duties. Under this Act their licenses will be renewed yearly by endorsement by the pilotage authorities. It is better to give them authority, when pilots will not do their duty, to refuse licenses for the following year. The Act is not intended to apply to the Province of Quebec, but only to the rest of the Dominion where there are pilotage authorities and pilots. The Corporations of Quebec and Montreal do not care to be interfered with. There is a clause also which declares that harbour masters shall not act as pilots, nor pilots as harbour masters. Complaint is made that, in many parts, it gives the harbour master a considerable advantage over other pilots, because he can give his own ships the preference.

In reply to Mr. BLAKE,

MR. POPE said the ports of Montreal and Quebec were differently situated ; they managed their own affairs, and it was not desirable to interfere with them.

MR. BLAKE : They are under the same infirmities there as elsewhere.

MR. GILLMOR said that in some parts in the Lower Provinces harbour masters take the vessels down the river three or four miles ; there should be some provision to allow these, because there may be no pilot to do the work.

MR. POPE : For the reason I have stated, pilots complain that one who is harbour master can give advantages to the owners of ships, and thus get the preference himself in piloting ships.

MR. ANGLIN : At very small ports there may be a difficulty in this way : that the position of harbour masters is not sufficient to pay a man so much that he could live by that alone. There is certainly a strong objection to appointing a pilot as a harbour master, when that can be avoided ; but it may be difficult to find a man knowing sufficient about the duties of the position to be satisfied with the income at a small port. I would suggest that discretionary powers should be given to the hon. the Minister of Marine, and these, no doubt, would be exercised so as not to prejudice the general interests of the trade of the country.

MR. MACKENZIE : I observe, as the result of a recent interview between some people connected with the navigation of the St. Lawrence and the hon. the Minister of Public Works, that the latter promised a revision of everything connected with the navigation of the St. Lawrence River and lakes. With regard to that, I presume he will do something as to the pilotage of the river to the Gulf. There have been repeated and serious complaints in the newspapers about the manner in which the pilotage has been conducted between Montreal and what is called the lower part of the St. Lawrence, where the pilots leave the vessels, and I would like to know whether the hon. gentleman has considered any plan with reference to the pilotage system existing there at present.

MR. LANGEVIN : The hon. gentleman is right and wrong in what he says. He is right as to the deputations. Two large and influential deputations from Ontario and Quebec came to see members of the Government about the free navigation of the St. Lawrence—to give us their views in regard to making the canals of the St. Lawrence and the harbours of Quebec and Montreal as free as possible. The second deputation looked more to the harbour and tonnage dues of Montreal. The answer the Government gave was this : That this was a very large question, that the Government could not consider it just at this moment, and that we could not take up a separate subject such as the canal tolls or the harbour dues of Montreal, but that the whole subject would receive the consideration of the Government during the Recess. We did not promise we would do this or do that. The matter is to be considered by the Government, and the result of that consideration will be submitted to Parliament at its next Session.

MR. MACKENZIE : Then it is not proposed to take any action this Session ?

MR. LANGEVIN : No.

MR. ANGLIN : I hope that the Government will not confine their consideration to the harbours of the St. Lawrence, but will embrace the ports of the Maritime Provinces, where the people would like to be relieved of the harbour dues.

MR. LANGEVIN : I have no doubt the consideration of all those subjects will be taken up by the Government during the Recess. We have made no promise and cannot make any promise now, because the matter has not been considered.

Bill read the first time.

DISMISSAL OF THE LATE LIEUT.-GOVERNOR OF QUEBEC.

MOTION OF WANT OF CONFIDENCE.

MR. MACKENZIE: I take this opportunity of bringing under the notice of the House a question which we were not able to deal with last Session, but which, in our opinion, requires an expression from this House as to the subject, the manner in which it was dealt with, and the manner in which the House was treated. It will be remembered that during last Session a motion was made by the hon. member for Bagot (Mr. Mousseau), condemning the action of the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec in the dismissal of his Ministers; that upon that motion a vote was obtained, that upon that vote, and upon the vote of the Senate, in the previous year, the Ministry based their action regarding Lieutenant Governor Letellier, advising that he should be dismissed on account of his action in dismissing his Ministers. We waited up to the last day of the Session hoping to obtain some definite intelligence respecting the remission of the matter to England. I do not propose to take up much of the time of the House, but simply to recapitulate some facts connected with the case, and then submit a motion which I will place in your hands, Sir, at the close of my remarks. It will be remembered that in the season of 1878, the hon. gentleman opposite (Sir. John A. Macdonald) who was then leading the Opposition, moved a vote which might be called a vote of censure, although it was not so in terms, upon the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec for the dismissal of his Ministers. That vote was negatived by a large majority. The Senate, however, being composed of the friends of the hon. gentleman, passed a motion somewhat similar in terms. The Government of the day, of which I had the honour to be a member, declined to take any action in regard to Lieutenant-Governor Letellier's dismissal of his Ministers, for the simple reason that we conceived we had no standing ground on which to take such action. Whether his action was wise or unwise—politic from a party point of view—taking that low ground, and assuming, as was done in the memorandum, that Lieutenant-Governor Letellier acted from partisan motives, we expressed no opinion. Not but that we had an opinion to express; but because I conceived it would have been improper in any Minister to express an opinion that he was not prepared to give full effect to by a vote in this House. Our opinion was, that the Lieutenant-Governor acted strictly within his technical rights in the discharge of his duty; that there should be no interference from the General Government with any of the Local Administrations, and that such interference should be upon such clearly defined grounds that there could be no mistake about the propriety of it. I am glad to know that that opinion was also entertained in the highest quarters in this country as well as in the Mother Country. But while the Government thus declined to take action, and so, as I contend, closed the case, the hon. gentleman at the head of the Government brought it up afresh, or rather it was forced upon him, I believe, afresh by his supporters, in the first Session of another Parliament. I think we have fair reason to conclude from the inaction of the Premier and his Government, for several months after their accession to office, that they did not believe it was a case in which the Executive should interere with the discharge of the duties of his office by a Local Governor. But the hon. member for Bagot was not to be restrained by constitutional usages, and he moved a motion identical in form with that moved by his leader in the previous Parliament. This motion was carried by a large majority, and shortly afterwards the Government acted upon this motion, and a motion passed in the previous Parliament, in the Senate, recommending His Excellency to dismiss Lieutenant-Governor Letellier. For what? Why, there was no reason assigned, that could be called a reason, under the language of the 59th Section of the Constitutional Act. It was simply recommended on the ground that his usefulness had ceased. And why had his usefulness ceased? Of all reasons it was because two other bodies had passed a vote of censure upon him, the House of Commons and Senate, after the question had been settled, and if a mere vote of censure of this House is sufficient, on all occasions, or an implied vote of censure, to secure the dismissal of a Lieutenant-Governor, then his tenure of office is held by the merest thread, because it is always within the competence of a large and partisan majority to pass an opinion upon the conduct of a Lieut.-Governor, if it is known the office will be vacated by that expression of opinion. In this case the expression of opinion was simply that his conduct was unwise and subversive of the provision of his adversaries—a pure truism and nothing else. The Act of dismissal was subversive of their position, because it removed them from office, but that does not say it was constitutionally adverse to the position of constitutional Ministers. The proper remedy, as we conceived, lay with the Local Legislature, and not with the House of Commons or Senate, or the Executive of the Dominion. The pressure of the right hon. gentleman's followers seems to have been the ruling motive of the Government in the dismissal of Lieut.-Governor Letellier. It would be interesting to know the opinion of the higher authorities of the Empire on this case. We have, after the reference to the Imperial Government, an opinion upon two matters. In the first place, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach gave the opinion of the Imperial Government upon the question of the reference at all. The hon. member for Bagot (Mr. Mousseau) last year gave notice of a motion which we would have been delighted to support. But he avoided getting his motion put before the House till too late. It was ruled out, and it would be a pity the hon. gentleman should be without an opportunity of recording his vote on so interesting a subject. Perhaps we may be able to support his negligence with an opportunity which he did not, perhaps, expect this Session. In reference to this matter, Sir M. H.-Beach says, in his despatch of July 3, 1879:

“I have not had occasion to call for any arguments on either side on the merits of Mr. Letellier's case. The law does not empower Her Majesty's Government to decide it, and they do not therefore propose to express any opinion with regard to it. You are aware that the powers given by the British North America Act, 1867, with respect to the removal of a Lieut.-Governor from office, are vested not in Her Majesty's Government, but in the Governor General.”

With reference to the other point, the question of Lieut.-Governor Letellier's removal, he said:

“There can be no doubt that he has an unquestionable constitutional right to dismiss his Ministers, if from any cause he feels it incumbent upon him to do so. * * * It was the spirit and intention of the British North America Act that the terms of the high office of Lieut.-Governor should, as a rule, endure for the term of years specially mentioned, and that the power of removal should never be exercised, except for grave cause.”

Showing very clearly that the Imperial Government disapproved of the action taken by the Canadian Government, and asked a reconsideration. Sir M. H.-Beach then urges the Canadian Government “again to consider the action to be taken in the case of Mr. Letellier.” He hoped no doubt that the Ministers here would regard the exposition of law and the advice of the Imperial Ministers. The Colonial Secretary did not know the parties he had to deal with, if he thought it was possible such a thing could take place as a reconsideration. Such, however, was his generous conclusion, and he suggests the propriety of it taking place at any rate. Now, we find the opinion of His Excellency the Governor-General, expressed in a very decided manner. He says, in his despatch, after reciting the appearance of the Premier and his interview with him:

“I said that Sir John must know, from what I had already said to him on this subject, that I could not agree in the policy he recommended, but requested him to give his reasons in writing, and told him that I should put my reasons against a policy in writing. He intimated he would do as I requested. I said further, that I considered that the dismissal of the Lieutenant-Governor would set a bad precedent.”

Lord Lorne, therefore, upon constitutional grounds, disapproved of the advice of his Ministers, and refused to accept it; and besides that he intimated that he considered, if done, it would be a very dangerous precedent. His Excellency requested that his First Minister should put his opinions in writing, and he, himself, engaged to put his opinions in writing. Whether such opinions were ever put in writing I have no means of ascertaining, further than is to be inferred from the memorandum of the hon. the First Minister, with which I will deal shortly. The Governor-General in this case was led to believe, at the close of this first interview, when he rejected the advice of his Minister, that the reasons would be put in writing by the First Minister as well as himself, and that further discussion might take place upon such correspondence; or it may have been that he intended the correspondence to terminate there, he being resolved not to yield in the matter. But this interview, which was held on the 29th March, was succeeded by another interview on Wednesday, the 2nd of April, when the Premier produced a note of a statement he proposed to make to the House, and which he submitted for His Excellency's approval. It was in these terms:

"Sir John A. Macdonald waited on His Excellency the Governor-General and informed him that after the Resolution of the Senate in the last Session of Parliament, and the Resolution of the House of Commons during the present Session, it was the opinion of His Excellency's advisers that the usefulness of the Hon. Mr. Letellier as Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec was gone, and they advised that, in the public interest, it was expedient he should be removed from his office. His Excellency was thereupon pleased to state that as the Federal system introduced by the British North America Act of 1867 was, until then unknown in Great Britain or her colonies, there were no precedents to guide us; that the decision would settle, for the future, the relations between the Dominion and Provincial Governments, so far as the office of Lieutenant Governor is concerned, and that he, therefore, deemed it expedient to submit the advice tendered to him, and the whole case, with all the attendant circumstances, to Her Majesty's Government for their consideration and instructions."

This Message was brought down, if I recollect right, on the following day, the 3rd of April. The immediate effect of that message in this House was of a very serious character. It led hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House, beyond all question, to come to the conclusion that His Excellency had not only refused the advice of his Ministers but, contrary to their advice, had determined to remit the matter to England "for consideration and instructions," these being the words used in the minute, and we all remember the fervour with which the hon. member for Laval (Mr. Ouimet) and the hon. member for Bagot (Mr. Mousseau), and some other hon. gentlemen, denounced His Excellency the Governor-General in very strong terms as trampling upon the liberties of the people, as trampling upon responsible government, as setting at defiance the principles under which we are governed. All this denunciation of His Excellency was listened to by the hon. gentleman at the head of the Government and his colleagues, but not one word was uttered to show that it was not at His Excellency's suggestion that the reference to England was made at all, but upon the suggestion of the Government themselves. We do not know, and it is not right we should know, what passed before the next step in this matter between His Excellency's advisers and His Excellency, but we do know that four days after the statement came down the hon. member for Hochelaga (Mr. Desjardins) asked a question in the House, and the hon. Premier said:

"I am glad the hon. member has asked the question. I beg leave to state to the House that the Postmaster-General, my colleague, will sail by the next Canadian steamer for England for the purpose of supporting, with the consent of the Governor-General, the advice given by the Government for the removal of Governor Letellier. He may perhaps be accompanied by another gentleman: at all events he goes next Saturday. I need scarcely say that the fact of our holding the position we do at this moment shows that the Governor-General did not make that reference against our advice, and the fact of our remaining in office shows we hold ourselves responsible for the action of the Governor-General."

This still showed conclusively to the House that it was the Governor-General's action that referred the matter to England, but his Ministers generously held themselves responsible for his action, when, in reality, the Governor-General, no doubt, stretched a point, in order to conform to the suggestion and advice of his Ministers to send this matter to England "for consideration and instructions." So far the House was entirely deceived by the Government, in reference to the true position of His Excellency the Governor-General and his Ministers, and the odium, a heavy odium, a just odium, if true, was left upon the Governor-General of being himself the instigator of a violation of responsible government, according to the very strong language of the hon. members for Bagot and Laval. The true facts of the affair became known to the hon. gentlemen, although it did not become known to us on this side of the House, because every excuse was resorted to for not proceeding with their motion as soon as they found that it could not be levelled at the Governor-General, but would be levelled at his Ministers. Every device was resorted to to stave off the motion of the hon. member for Bagot, although he knew all the time, apparently, that there was something else to be said which never was openly said in this House, and of which they did not become cognisant until the papers were published in the Imperial Parliament. I have felt that it was absolutely necessary to place this matter right upon our Journals and upon the Debates of the House, in order that, for the future, the position of a Governor-General and his advisers may be perfectly understood, and that if hon. gentlemen on the opposite side of the House choose to vote against the motion I intend to place in your hands, they will have to vote against the light and knowledge which has been shed upon this subject since we discussed it last Session. I do not propose to discuss at any length the memorandum of the hon. gentleman enclosed in the despatches to England, but there are some points in them which seem to me to call for special notice. We are told with reference to Lieut.-Governor Letellier, and other Governors :

“A stranger to Quebec might naturally enquire what object Mr. Letellier had in dismissing his Ministers. He had, it is believed, a distinct and specific object. The general elections for the Dominion Parliament were, of necessity, to take place in 1878 when the Ministry of which, as has been already stated, Mr. Letellier had been a prominent member, would be obliged to go to the country and give an account of their stewardship. In consequence of the traditional influence of Government which has been alluded to, it was obviously of political importance to that Administration to have such influence exercised in its favour. Hence arose the anxiety of Governor Letellier to forget his position as Governor, to dismiss his advisers, who were known to be politically opposed to the Dominion Ministry, and to substitute for them a Cabinet which would act in sympathy with them and exercise the Provincial patronage to carry the Dominion Elections.”

Now, those words were written unadvisedly. The hon. gentleman could not have been cognisant of anything which would justify him in imputing such motives, and using such offensive language towards Lieutenant-Governor Letellier. It is stated here that he was a member of the Administration at the time of his appointment, and the hon. gentleman evidently mentioned that with a view to create an impression that the very fact of his having been a member of my Administration, was an argument against his appointment, and an argument in favour of the belief that he had acted improperly, that he had acted unconstitutionally, that he had acted in the interests of his political party. Who were the Governors whom the hon. gentleman has appointed from time to time? Mr. Governor Morris was appointed; he was a member of the hon. gentleman's Administration since Confederation. Mr. Adams Archibald was appointed; he was also a member of his Administration. Mr. Howe was appointed; he was also a member of his Administration. Mr. Howland was a member of his Administration. Mr. Robitaille was a member of his Administration. The last appointment made was Mr. Wilmot; he was also a member of the hon. gentleman's Administration. So far as I can recollect at the present moment, every Governor who has been appointed were members of the hon. gentleman's Government, except Mr. John Crawford, late Lieut.-Governor of Ontario, and Mr. Haviland. My hon. friend from Bothwell reminds me that Governor Caron was not a member of the hon. gentleman's Administration since Confederation, although he was, no doubt, a colleague formerly.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: No, never.

MR. MACKENZIE: My recollection in the case then is imperfect. At all events, here are a number of names, eight in all, about whom there is no question. Everyone of these men are subject to the reproach contained in this innuendo. The office of Lieutenant-Governor in all our Provinces is one of high dignity. It is one, I think, to be filled by the leading political characters who may be willing at the time to accept such a position. It is one, not merely of dignity, it is one of rank. It gives social as well as political position in the country, which has made it an object of great value in that respect; and I do not think it is a generous conclusion to come to that any member so accepting it has accepted it as Lieutenant Governor Letellier is here stated to have accepted it for the distinct purpose of exerting his official influence on behalf of his political friends in such a way. I am sure, so far as I was concerned, as a member of the late Administration, occupying the first position in the Administration, that during the term of that hon. gentleman's incumbency and my own, that not one discussion about any political objects to be delivered in either that Province or the Dominion ever took place between us; that no suggestion as to a political course was ever made by him or asked by him. I am bound to say this much in the vindication of a man whom I conceive to have been grossly ill-used, and whom I greatly esteem as a personal friend. There are other passages here suggesting that Mr. Turcotte was sent for, and that his acceptance of the Speakership was arranged in the presence of Mr. Letellier and Mr. Joly. I do not know anything about that, but I am informed it is not true. Another passage in the hon. gentleman's memorandum says this :

"Except in this case no complaint has been made that any Lieutenant-Governor has allowed his conduct as such to be influenced by his party predilections. He (Mr. Letellier) was a prominent member of Mr. Mackenzie's Ministry and the leader of his Government in the Senate. It was, therefore, especially necessary that he should have avoided even a semblance of being actuated by party feeling in his new position. Instead of this, there is too much reason to believe that he assumed his office with the distinct purpose of exerting his official influence on behalf of his political friends."

This, if possible, is still more unworthy of the hon. gentleman to place such a statement on paper. The hon. gentleman shows his inconsistency in the following statement. He says: In order to escape from the difficulty although Mr. Joly secured a majority—

AN HON. MEMBER: No.

MR. MACKENZIE: My hon. friend says, no. Very well, he carried on his Government. At all events he could hardly have done that without a majority. The hon. gentleman says that the Local Elections, which occurred immediately after the dismissal of Mr. Letellier's Ministers, did not turn upon the question of the dismissal of the Ministry, but upon the merits of the Joly Administration and the DeBoucherville Administration, but that the Dominion Elections, occurring many months afterwards, did turn upon this question, and the result was a large majority in favour of the Dominion Government, while the Local Government, who committed the wrong, if it was a wrong, was sustained by the Local Elections. I have never read any State document that seems so unworthy of a great Minister as this document. The hon. gentleman says, in respect to the Local House at that time :

"Notwithstanding the purchase of a Speaker, a vote of Want of Confidence was passed in the Legislative Assembly, and a similar Resolution was adopted in the Upper House. Mr. Joly, however, did not resign, as he ought to have done. He held to office and proceeded with the business of the country."

What a shame he did not resign. He insisted very improperly, as the hon. gentleman thinks, on carrying his measures through the House. He refused to resign, because he had got his measures and his money vote through the House. A lacking impropriety indeed. I am afraid the hon. gentleman opposite would not be very apt to resign if he could get his measures through Parliament, and his Supplies voted.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Carry a vote of Want of Confidence and I will resign.

MR. MACKENZIE: We will see whether the hon. gentleman will resign after the vote is taken upon the motion I am about to submit. I cannot conceive it possible that any hon. friend from Bagot and his friends will vote against this Resolution, and we will see whether the resignation will take place. The document goes on to say :

"Mr. Joly did not resign as he ought to have done. He succeeded in carrying the Supplies, and the fact of his having done so is cited as a proof of the substantial confidence of the House in him. But the refusal of Supplies is an antiquated procedure, and has long since been succeeded in England by votes of Want of Confidence, and for the same reason which induced the Opposition at Quebec to vote the Supplies."

We can imagine Mr. Chapleau, who is distinguished as a remarkably moderate politician, as a man who never says any severe things of any person, as a man who never takes any strong views of public matters, resigning under such circumstances. Not he. He is as genial as a sucking doe. My hon. friend also who sits behind (Mr. Angers) is another very genial person. These hon. gentlemen, rather than resort to any antiquated procedure, though quite parliamentary, determined generously to vote supplies to a Government they wished to get out of office. Such a sacrifice cannot be too greatly commended. One cannot help pausing in order to revere the men who had such a just regard for modern parliamentary practice that they would not, on any account, resort to the antiquated procedure of refusing the Supplies. But, Sir, the hon. gentleman forget a little circumstance in connection with this antiquated procedure. He forgot to say that but for resorting to this same antiquated procedure in the Upper House, Mr. Joly would have still been in the Government. It was an antiquated proceeding, and one that was most unjustifiable in the DeBoucherville party to refuse the Supplies in the Lower House, but not antiquated for the Supplies to be refused in the Upper House. I was under the impression that our constitutional usage required the Upper House to pass the Supplies voted by the Lower House. Only on one or two occasions have the House of Lords attempted to dispute that as a principle, and they had to yield, and have never resorted to it since. But here is a House, whose duty it was to give Mr. Joly his Supplies, refusing them. They had a constitutional right to refuse them. Such are the main points of this extraordinary Memorandum. Now there is one thing evident, that if the dismissal of Lieutenant-Governor Letellier was justifiable for the reasons given in the hon. gentleman's Memorandum to His Excellency, then any Lieutenant-Governor may be dismissed upon any pretext of political bias for the time being; if it be true that any man who accepts the position of Lieutenant-Governor can have his views or his motives impugned, and be dismissed by this Parliament on account of his happening to have been an opponent of the Government in his previous political views, then there is an end of all respectability in connection with our highest political circles, and an end to that independent relation between the Government and the Governments of the Provinces contemplated in the Confederation Act. But I believe that the public opinion of the Province of Quebec were hostile to the course pursued by the hon. gentleman opposite, as shown by their supporting Mr. Joly's Administration. Were we to allow the dismissal of the Governor for such reasons as are given in that Memorandum without a formal protest, we should acquiesce in an action on the part of the Government which would tend to the destruction of the principles upon which our constitution is founded—principles by virtue of which we should not interfere with the internal administration of the Provinces, but leave everything that can be left to the discretion of the Legislatures and people of the Provinces. We should not interfere with the dismissal of the Lieut.-Governor's Ministers, be the act wise or unwise. He called a gentleman to form a new Administration, that was duly formed; they carried their individual elections; they carried the elections of the Province; they discharged the duties of the Government of that Province for nearly a year and a half after they assumed the responsibility of Government; and I hold there was far more injury done to Constitutional Government, assuming the hon. gentleman opposite to be correct in his appreciation of the question, in the dismissal of Mr. DeBoucherville than would have been done had the hon. gentleman permitted the matter to rest. I propose to put our views on record by moving the following motion which contains the main points as I desire to lay them before the House. I would like to speak on other points connected with the case, but I am sincerely anxious not to hinder the business of the House which has yet to be done. I, therefore, place this motion in your hands:

That all the words after "that" be left out, and the following inserted instead thereof:—
 "It be Resolved, That the Hon. Luc Letellier de St. Just was removed from the office of Lieutenant-Governor of the Province of Quebec on the ground that his 'usefulness was gone;' this conclusion being reached because the Senate in 1878, and the House of Commons in 1879 passed Resolutions condemning the action of Governor Letellier in the dismissal of his Ministers, though the reason so assigned (in the memorandum of Sir John A. Macdonald 2d April, 1879) was not such a cause as was contemplated by the British North America Act, 1867.

"That immediately after the dismissal by Lieutenant-Governor Letellier of his Ministers on the 2nd March, 1878, he called upon the Hon. H. G. Joly to form a new Administration, who succeeded in doing so, and constitutionally and specifically assumed the responsibility of the Lieutenant-Governor's action, and who retained office for sixteen months, after passing through a General Election.

"That during the Session of the Dominion Parliament of 1878, Sir John A. Macdonald moved the following Resolution:—

"That this House do resolve, that the dismissal by the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec of his Ministers on the 2nd day of March, 1878, was, under the circumstances, unwise and subversive of the position accorded to the advisers of the Crown since the concession of Responsible Government to the British North American Colonies."

"That this motion was defeated by a large majority, the vote being 112 to 70.

"That the same motion was repeated at the next Session in a new Parliament, when it was moved by Mr. Mousseau, member for Bagot, supported by Sir John A. Macdonald and his Ministers, and carried by a strictly party vote.

"That it does not appear that Sir John A. Macdonald and his colleagues, as Ministers, took any step hostile to Lieutenant-Governor Letellier, until after Mr. Mousseau's motion was made, although they were more than five months in office.

"That on the 29th March, 1879, Sir John A. Macdonald, as Prime Minister, waited on His Excellency the Governor-General, and communicated to him the decision of the Cabinet. The decision was to the effect, that the usefulness of Mr. Letellier was gone, and that he must be relieved of his office.

"That the reply of His Excellency was, that he (Sir John A. Macdonald) must know from what he had already said to him on the subject, that he could not agree in the policy he recommended. * * * His Excellency said further that he considered the dismissal of the Lieutenant-Governor would set a dangerous precedent.

"That on the 2nd of April, four days after His Excellency had refused to act on the Ministerial advice, Sir John A. Macdonald again went to His Excellency and as an alternative * * * suggested that the question involved in the dismissal of the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec should be referred to Her Majesty's Government, to which advice or suggestion the Governor-General assented."

"That thereupon Sir John A. Macdonald produced a note of the Statement he proposed to make to the House on the subject; it was in these terms:

"Sir John A. Macdonald waited on His Excellency the Governor-General, and informed him, that after the Resolution of the Senate in the last Session of Parliament, and the Resolution of the House of Commons during the present Session, the was opinion of His Excellency's advisers, that the usefulness of the Hon. Mr. Letellier, as Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec was gone, and they advised that in the public interest it was expedient that he should be removed from his office. His Excellency was then pleased to state, that as the Federal system introduced by the British North America Act, 1867, was until then unknown in Great Britain or her Colonies; there were no precedents to guide us, that the decision in the present case would settle for the future the relations between the Dominion and the Provincial Governments, so far as the office of Lieutenant-Governor is concerned, and that he therefore deemed it expedient to submit the advice tendered to him, and the whole case with all the attendant circumstances to Her Majesty's Government for their consideration and instructions.

"That on the 3rd April, 1879, the above statement was read in the House of Commons, without further explanation by Sir John A. Macdonald that it gave rise to the impression and belief, in the House generally, that His Excellency had, without the advice of His Ministers, determined to remit the question to the Imperial Government for consideration and instructions."

"That, as the result of such belief, Mr. Mousseau, on the 4th April, gave notice of the following motion:—

"That in the opinion of this House the fact of submitting the advice of the Privy Council of Canada to the review of Her Majesty's advisers in England upon questions which are purely of an administrative character, like that involved in the dismissal of Lieutenant Governor Letellier, under the British North America Act, 1867, is subversive of the principles of Responsible Government granted to Canada.

"That Mr. Ouimet, a Ministerial member, on the same occasion, used the following language in his place in the House of Commons:—

"I rise as a representative of the people whose rights, I think, have been trampled on by the Governor-General, who, I believe, has acted unconstitutionally. * * * The illustrious gentleman, who is now Governor-General, believes (at least so we must understand from his act) he has authority to refuse the advice of his Ministers in a question purely and simply of internal administration. * * * I had been accustomed to believe, during the last twenty-eight or thirty years that we enjoyed Responsible Government, but I have been taught this afternoon that I was wrong, and that Responsible Government no longer existed in this Dominion, since the advice of a Ministry, backed by a majority of 85 in a House of 180 members, has been refused, and has to be sent home to England to be reviewed. * * *

Now, the question is not merely as to the propriety of the verdict rendered by this House, or as to the conduct of Mr. Letellier, which is a dead question: but the question now is, should the House allow the Governor-General to refuse the advice of his Ministers?"

"That Sir John A. Macdonald, on the same question, further confirmed the belief that His Excellency had determined to refer the matter to England against the advice of his Ministers, by his omission, after these expressions of opinion, to state the facts as they really occurred, or to correct the impressions to which the course taken had given rise, and also by the use of the following words in reply to Mr. Ouimet:—

“With regard to the remarks of the Hon. gentleman and his statement, that the constitution had been infringed upon by the illustrious individual at the head of the Government, in taking the course he proposes, I must say I cannot agree with my hon. friend that there has been any infringement of the constitution. * * * * He, the representative of the Sovereign, says that he will ask for specific instructions from his and our Sovereign. There is nothing unconstitutional in it; I would have been pleased gratified, and I think it would have been well, had our advice been accepted.”

“That on the 7th April, four days afterwards, he had, for the first time, assumed in the House any measure of responsibility for the matter by the use of the following language:—‘I need scarcely say that the fact of our holding the position we do at this moment, shows that the Governor-General did not make the reference against our advice, and the fact of our remaining in office also shows that we hold ourselves responsible for the action of the Governor-General,’ but the House was still left under the impression that the reference to England was upon the initiative of His Excellency the Governor-General, instead of being suggested and advised by his Ministers.”

“That His Excellency the Governor-General, in his despatch of April 9th, to the Colonial Secretary, after quoting Sir John A. Macdonald’s statement, made on the 7th April, says:

“It will be seen that in referring the question of the dismissal of the Lieutenant Governor of Quebec to Her Majesty’s Government, I have not acted against the advice of my Ministers. * * * * This despatch has been read by Sir John A. Macdonald, who has pronounced the narrative of the conversations which have taken place between us to be accurate.”

“That in the opinion of this House the fact of submitting the advice of the Privy Council to the review of Her Majesty’s advisers in England upon questions which are purely of an administrative character, like that involved in the dismissal of Lieutenant-Governor Letellier, under the British North America Act, 1867, is subversive of the principles of Responsible Government granted to Canada.”

MR. OUIMET: My hon. friends and myself asked for the dismissal of the Hon. Mr. Letellier last year on two grounds. We first complained that he had acted as a partisan, and the documents that were laid before the House showed that he not only acted unfairly towards his legal advisers, but that, he even acted as a spy upon them, disclosing the secrets of State that existed between them. Our second ground of complaint was, and this is also revealed by the documents referred to, that the Hon. Mr. Letellier had made false representations in the documents containing his defence which he sent to His Excellency the Governor-General. Without enlarging on these grounds of complaint, I will say that the result of our action, the result of the most serious consideration of the question before the House, was the affirmation of the principle laid down in the motion of the hon. member for Bagot, that the conduct of Lieutenant-Governor Letellier in dismissing his Ministry was unconstitutional and subversive of Responsible Government, and this was affirmed by a majority of eighty-five. What did this vote call for? I contended at the time, and I still contend, that the clear duty of the advisers of the Governor-General of this Dominion was to give their advice to the effect that the usefulness of Lieutenant-Governor Letellier was gone. This advice was given. It was not acted upon at once, and we did not at the time know the reason of the delay. But the correspondence that has been laid before the House, shows the reasons why His Excellency did not choose to act immediately upon that advice. His correspondence discloses the fact that the advice was given by the hon. Premier with a great deal of courage, because it imperilled his position as Prime Minister of this Dominion. Not knowing the circumstances, not knowing the difficulties under which the Government laboured at that time, I, for one, rose in this House and even uttered words of distrust of the Government, because I considered they were not going fast enough and were not complying with the wishes of the House by not pressing their advice and having the matter settled at once. We were informed of the reference to England, and had to comply with that reference. As I said at the time, we could not say anything about it. The hon. leader of the Opposition will remember that he himself and his friends, when the motion of the hon. member for Bagot was before the House, expressed their unwillingness to vote for the principle that is now affirmed in the Resolutions which he has brought before the House. We said at the time: We are alone; we cannot do anything; let us wait until an answer comes from the Imperial Government; if that answer affirms the principle that the Government was right in giving the advice they did, then we shall rest content, because then the very principle in the Resolution of the hon. member for Bagot will be affirmed by the Imperial Government. This very principle, the most important principle in our Constitution will be affirmed by the highest authority in the British Empire, and the question will be settled for all time. Very fortunately, very happily—and I think we must congratulate ourselves on the result—the answer came and it was an affirmation of that very principle, namely, that in all local matters the decisions of the legal advisers of the Crown here are final, and must not be sent back to England to be revised by any one. But we have obtained another result—the affirmation of the first principle, we and the majority upheld in this House, that the Lieutenant-Governor acting in the same partisan spirit as Mr. Letellier acted, any Lieutenant-Governor that will prostitute his position to favour a political party, will not be maintained in his position. After having obtained those two results, what are we asked to do now by the hon. member for Lambton? We are asked to censure the very Government that obtained for us the two great objects we had in view last year. I do not think that the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie) is acting fairly towards the Government and himself, when he asks us to take a backward step, and by a vote of Want of Confidence against the Government, to affirm a principle which I recognise as right, but which last year, for political purposes he would not recognise as such.

MR. LAURIER: I have always felt that the action of Lieut.-Governor Letellier in the dismissal of his Ministers ought not to have been pronounced or decided upon by this Parliament. The Liberal Party have always held that on that action, whether right or wrong, the people of Quebec alone were competent to pronounce. I still adhere to that opinion. The late Lieut.-Governor for his action, whether right or wrong, has paid the dearest penalty that could be inflicted upon him, and has a right to expect that at least his motives should not be impugned, and that no improper intention should be attributed to him if none can be proved. The hon. gentleman who has just spoken (Mr. Ouimet) has stated that Lieut.-Governor Letellier rendered himself liable to dismissal in various ways, and that he had divulged State secrets. I do not see evidence of those charges in any of the papers before the House. The only instance in which State secrets were revealed was furnished by the Premier last year, when the negotiations between His Excellency and his advisers, at Ottawa, were made known. His statement to the House was as follows:—

I protest, most energetically, against this statement, and say that the whole correspondence laid before the House, most carefully scanned, does not reveal one word in support of the Premier's assertion. To say the least, it would be a very inadequate motive, indeed, for such an act, involving such great risks, as the dismissal of his Ministers by the Lieutenant-Governor—the mere chance of the gaining a few seats in the Dominion Elections by the distribution of local patronage. However strong his political bias, that motive would scarcely prove a sufficient consideration for such an act, involving such serious consequences. This assertion is so much the more to be regretted that it was altogether uncalled for, according to the line of argument taken by the hon. Premier in his Memorandum. The doctrine that the Lieutenant-Governor can be removed not only for malfeasance or any offence, but simply for unpopularity, did not require the imputation of such a motive. If this doctrine be correct, the alleged wrong committed by the Lieutenant-Governor was enough to warrant his dismissal. But since it is asserted that his motives were improper and partisan, I may be allowed to consider them. The facts ascertained before and since enforce the conviction that his motives were none other than set forth in his Memorandum, namely, to save the Province from a great impending calamity. I think his motives should be fairly recorded and not misrepresented. What was the state of the Province when he dismissed his Ministers? It had been brought to the verge of bankruptcy by the extravagance of successive Administrations. For the first time the Province had to face a deficit, which had to be met by the Lieutenant-Governor's advisers. Instead of trying to meet it by economy and retrenchment, they proposed additional taxation, to the extent of something like $275,000. Another measure, graver, was introduced, a parallel for which it would be impossible to find unless in the time of King John. Certain municipalities had subscribed money to assist the construction of the Government Railways, having emitted debentures on certain conditions, the payment of which they declared had been demanded without the fulfilment of those conditions, accordingly they refused payment until ordered by the Courts. Then the Government proposed a measure dispensing with the tribunals, and constituting itself the sole judge of the fulfilment of those conditions of the subscriptions, by which the Lieutenant-Governor in Council was authorised to issue his warrant authorising a levy by distress in the case of non-payment. The Lieutenant-Governor had never been consulted in the matter, and had reason to fear the Bill would become law by connivance of the Legislature, at that time manipulated and domineered over by a railway ring. What was he to do? He could have followed two courses, either letting his advisers go on and the Province be plunged into difficulties, or stopping them and saving it. He chose the latter course, and dismissed his advisers, who had been clearly recreant in their duty to the people and the Crown. His motives have since been pronounced really partisan. But the conduct of the present Quebec Administration is the best justification and vindication of the motives of the Lieutenant-Governor.

When the Conservative Administration was dismissed in 1878, the party at once became very clamorous, pretending that the rights of the people had been trampled upon by the Crown, a cry much used during the ensuing Elections, during which the people were called upon to vindicate their rights. But they did not see the matter in that light, and notwithstanding the charges made against him, his Ministers obtained the largest number of supporters that a Liberal Government ever obtained in Quebec. At the following Elections the Conservative party were victorious, and consequently, a Conservative Government was installed in power once more. They had scarcely taken their seats when they called clamorously for the dismissal of Lieutenant-Governor Letellier. Their triumph should have been complete, but they became more and more exacting till the Lieutenant-Governor was dismissed. Their vengeance was not satisfied, however, till their opponents were ousted from office, with the guilty connivance of the Legislative Council, which refused the Supplies, and the assistance of a traitor to his party, who has since got his reward. In this way was the Conservative party restored to power. It would seem then, that even the last desirable triumph had been secured; but yet there is something missing, something to restore them to the position they originally held. They have not yet resumed that policy of taxation for which they were dismissed. True, Mr. Letellier is dismissed and prostrate; his health is shattered by his anxieties; but he has the satisfaction of looking at his triumph, knowing that, even in the hour of Conservative vengeance, his opponents dare not restore the policy for which he dismissed them. Who, in the face of such results, will dare to say he was impelled to act as he did by the desire to serve his party and not his country. Had his object been to serve his party and not his country, he would have acted differently. Instead of nipping in the bud that nefarious, tyrannical legislation, he would have allowed his advisers full scope in their mad career, till an enraged people had risen and expelled them from office. However, Quebec is now delivered from the incubus with which it was threatened. Whatever may be the opinion of lawyers as to the constitutionality of his course, he has the satisfaction of knowing that the grateful people of Quebec will remember that whatever he did was out of tenderness for them. Whether he acted constitutionally or not, I deny he was responsible to this Parliament for what he did. The question is—to whom was he responsible? It is asserted he was a Federal officer and responsible to this House. But though he was a Federal officer, and responsible, on some occasions, to this Parliament, it must be admitted he was responsible, on some occasions, to the people over whom he ruled. He could not have been responsible to two different tribunals for the same acts. If not, the question may be—where is the line to be drawn between his responsibility to the Dominion and the Quebec Legislature. In my judgment the only safe line is this: in all cases where the Lieutenant-Governor can be held responsible, he is amenable to this Parliament; but for all acts for which his advisers are responsible, he is responsible to the people of the Province. If this view be correct, it is the strongest possible condemnation of the course pursued by the Dominion Government, because the Government that punished Mr. Letellier have done the very thing for which they punished him. They say he trespassed beyond the limits of his prerogative, and, if so, they have exceeded their proper authority to reach him. He was not tried before the tribunal to which he was amenable, but a Star Chamber tribunal was authorised to try, condemn and punish him. I desire specially to call the attention of my Conservative friends from Quebec to the precedent they have been instrumental in creating—to the doctrine that the Lieutenant-Governor can be dismissed, not only for malfeasance, but simply at the will and pleasure of the Dominion Parliament, if it is of opinion that he is not popular or not up to his work. The doctrine laid down in the Memorandum of the Premier seems rather a hard doctrine for the Conservatives of Quebec, who, I am sure, would be scandalised by it were it propounded by any Liberal authority. If this doctrine is admitted, what becomes of the independence of Lieutenant-Governors, and, I may ask, what becomes of their usefulness? Why, if this doctrine is admitted, their usefulness is gone for ever. There is no reason why we should have any more Lieutenant-Governors, because if this doctrine is admitted, the Lieutenant-Governor is reduced to a mere machine, to a mere automaton. He can give dinners and balls but he cannot go beyond that. If he is satisfied that that is his mission, if he is satisfied with doing nothing, if he is satisfied with never thinking of the business of the Province over which he is appointed to rule, if he is satisfied with simply showing his person to the greedy gaze of the loyal population, if he is content to make a speech put into his mouth at the opening and the close of each Session, if he is patient in receiving addresses and careful never to answer questions except in a meaningless way, then he has a chance to complete his term. But if he attempts to go beyond that he is liable to be immediately taken up, because his conduct may be objectionable to a part of the community, to a political minority it may be, and perhaps the minority of the province may belong to the majority of the Dominion, and thus the Lieutenant-Governor may be compelled to step down and out as Mr. Letellier was compelled to do. According to this doctrine the Lieutenant-Governor is placed on board the ship of State, not as a captain, not even as a common sailor, but simply as an ornament. For all the good he can now do he might just as well not be there. I am afraid my hon. friends from the Province of Quebec never expected this result when they first demanded the dismissal of Lieutenant-Governor Letellier; but they set their heart upon it, and were prepared to go the full length in defence of a false principle. Now, with regard to this reference to England, I am afraid this must be a bitter pill to my hon. friends from Quebec on the other side of the House. We all remember, and my hon. friend from Laval (Mr. Ouimet) has attempted to explain it, that when the announcement of this reference was made to England, last year, they were very clamorous and loud in their complaints that the Government of this country was afraid to deal with this question. When the announcement was made it was made in such terms as to convey the impression that the reference had been made, not by the advisers of His Excellency, but by the Governor-General himself, against the advice of his Ministers. Then the indignation of my hon. friends opposite was very great; but when it became known, at a later period, that the reference had been made not by the Governor-General himself, but that it had been assented to by him on the advice of his Ministers, then by some magic process their indignation, instead of turning itself on the culprit, melted like snow under the warm rays of the sun. I have no doubt my hon. friends opposite, notwithstanding their conduct, are still of the same opinion that they were then. I have no doubt they still believe that if we are to enjoy in this country, to its full extent, the benefits of Responsible Government, we must be prepared to deal with these difficulties ourselves. But, as I just stated, they had set their heart upon the dismissal of Mr. Letellier, to obtain a party triumph, and to gain their object they were prepared to sacrifice all their dearest principles. They have obtained that triumph, Mr. Letellier has been dismissed, their revenge has been gratified, but they have established a precedent which I am afraid will some day be used against us. I can only hope that this precedent may never be followed, but if ever the Province of Quebec has to suffer from it we shall know whom to hold responsible for it.

Mr. HUNTINGTON: This subject is a very important one, and it has been discussed at great length in this House and by the people of this country, particularly by the people of Quebec, who, I suppose, have taken it much more to heart than any other portion of the Dominion. But we have discussed this subject—the Prime Minister has set me the example in saying so—we have, perhaps, discussed the subject as partisans. The Prime Minister has stated that Mr. Letellier left his place and went to Quebec as a partisan. He has no evidence of it. There is less evidence of it than that the hon. the Prime Minister himself acted entirely as a partisan throughout this matter. We have dealt with this question as partisans. We have exhausted the learning of this House, in order to show what were the merits of this question upon the one side or the other, and we have had an exhibition, on both sides of the House, of that state of mind which is very properly termed in Lower Canada trop de gèle. But it is well that when we write and, perhaps, speak dubiously upon this subject, those who are to profit by their writings hereafter should be benefited by commentators, and it is well that when great parties are engaged in struggles of the kind which we witnessed in regard to this particular question, that there should be men outside of party men who take a constitutional view, a historical view, of this question, altogether outside the great seething cauldron of politics by which, perhaps, we are all more or less influenced. I desire to call attention to a view which has been taken of this matter by the most eminent authority upon parliamentary and constitutional subjects in this country, a man who stands high in the estimation of the constitutional writers of the world. I refer to Mr. Todd. I do not propose to read more than a few extracts from Mr. Todd's work.

Several Hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. HUNTINGTON: Hon. gentlemen say "hear, hear," but I dare say they do not want to cast any discredit upon that distinguished gentleman, and I introduce him only, because I have heard him so often represented, and as I believe he desires to be represented, as a man of high attainments and always thoroughly conscientious. He may be right or wrong, he may be a more prudent, a more careful and a more judicious judge of this question than the hon. member for Laval (Mr. Ouimet) whose opinions, were his partisan feelings not concerned, would have great weight with me. But as an offset to that hon. gentleman's opinions, in the absence of the opinions of the hon. the Prime Minister, I will read a few paragraphs from Mr. Todd's work on the subject.

Mr. CASEY said he was astonished to hear this matter discussed as if it were Mr. Letellier who was on his trial. It was the Government who were now being tried for their action in referring the case to England for decision. It was remarkable that no Minister, or none of their supporters, had risen to defend that action. The hon. member for Laval (Mr. Ouimet) had indeed risen, but only to excuse himself and friends for voting contrary to their expressed convictions of last year. His first excuse was, that he had new information since then. The only new information was that the reference was the acts of the hon. Premier and not the personal acts of the Governor-General. It seemed then that the hon. member was not willing to censure hon. Ministers for the same action for which he had been willing to censure the Governor-General. His second excuse was that the Government had secured by this reference the assertion of two great principles, namely, the impartiality of Lieutenant-Governors, and the non-interference of the Home Government with our Administration. As to the first there was great question whether it had been violated. If it had, it was sufficiently vindicated by the action of this House. As to the second, there had been no hint of its violation until it was violated by the Government by this very reference. And it was not only by the reference but by the remarks of the Premier during the debate last year, that this principle had been endangered. He quoted from the Debates to show that the hon. Premier had then argued that the Queen ruled as directly here as she did in London, and that our interests in this and other similar cases were as safe in her hands, that is in the hands of English Ministers, as they were in the hands of the Governor-General and his advisers. This was a direct denial of our autonomy in matters purely Canadian, and an attempt to reverse all precedents, and all theory now received on the subject. He quoted further from the Debates to show what strong ground had been taken against this action by several members opposite, while it had been supposed that the Governor-General alone was responsible for it, and argued that they could not now defend it, merely because it was proven to have been advised by Ministers. He challenged the Premier to defend himself. It was not only his policy which was called in question, but his personal action as an intermediary between the Governor-General and Parliament. He had been guilty, if not of misstatement, at least of that suggestie falsé, which was often worse, as being harder, to disprove. He had allowed the worse construction to be put on the conduct of the Governor-General, and the most personal attacks on him to go unreprieved. In short, he was charged, and with primâ facie proof too, with conduct which, in the absence of explanation, seemed lacking in the ordinary courtesy and straightforwardness due to the head of our Executive, as well as contrary to all constitutional practice. The country would consider it scandalous if the hon. Premier allowed the vote to be taken without such explanations as he alone could give. If he did, it would be necessarily assumed that no expense or defence of that conduct was possible.

MR. CASGRAIN: The hon. member for Laval has attempted to justify the vote which he is about to give on the motion now before the House. He has a presentiment of the false position in which he will find himself, when brought face to face with his solemn declaration made at the time of the discussion on this subject last Session. In spite of all his efforts, the new declaration he has just made, while approving of the principles set forth in the motion, condemns him out of his own mouth. The success obtained by his party over Mr. Letellier, cannot excuse his change of opinion. The end does not justify the means. The reference to the Secretary of State for the Colonies, which he found fault with, is and was a renunciation of our right to govern ourselves according to our Constitution. The two reasons of complaint that he has brought forward against the ex-Lieutenant-Governor, are not admitted in the statement of the alleged cause for removal, inasmuch as the only cause given is, that the usefulness of this personage had gone. Consequently, along with this vague reason disappear the various grievances gratuitously brought forward by the complainant. There is nothing easier than to assign a true and well-founded cause for the removal. The treatise, ex professo, upon the subject, by our esteemed author, Mr. Todd, contains an irrefutable summary of the various constitutional points which have been violated by the present Ministry. This work, together with the subject of it, will remain an historical monument which will place our descendants on their guard against following a precedent which had its origin simply in a blind adherence to party principles.

Several HON. MEMBERS: Question.
 MR. CASGRAIN: Mr. Speaker, I call your attention, and that of the hon. the leader of the Government, to the noisy and disorderly conduct of those members of the House who are obstructing the proceedings and trying to stifle the debate. It is utterly impossible to proceed with the business of the House. I particularly desire to call the attention of the hon. the leader of the Government to the review of the whole of this Letellier matter—which has just been read in part by the hon. member for Shefford—contained in Mr. Todd's late book. The arguments urged by this eminent author have not been answered. The fact of their not being answered by the other side of the House show that these arguments are unanswerable. Sir, the hon. the Premier has committed a political error in conniving at this dismissal of Mr. Letellier, and he well knows it now. I regret that the debate on this most important question cannot be re-opened, affecting, as it does, so immediately the interests of the several Provinces of this Dominion. I therefore, resume my seat.

SUPPLY.

XIII. RAILWAYS AND CANALS CHARGEABLE TO CAPITAL.

Order for House to again resolve itself into Committee of Supply, read.

MR. MACKENZIE: Before you leave the Chair, Sir, I would like to ask the hon. the Finance Minister if he has made any arrangement with the Lords of the Treasury for the use of the unexpended guaranteed bonds of the Dominion for the purpose of security in his Banking Act.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: No; it is not necessary. We had Imperial authority for the issue. We have authority to use the money for any purpose we please, or to hold it if we think proper.

MR. MACKENZIE: When was that authority given?

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: When I was in England, twelve months ago last December.

MR. MACKENZIE: To use the entire unexpended amount for any purpose?

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: Before we were authorised to issue the £2,290,000 of debentures, a statement was made of the expenditure, and it was stated that a subsequent memorandum would be given. The authority was given, and the debentures issued at that time.

MR. MACKENZIE: Then, in that case, you are not to state that the amount expended was expended for the purpose for which it was originally given.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: It was shown that the expenditure was made for the public works for which it was issued. That was required before the debentures could be issued.

House resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

Canals.

90 Lachine..... $800,000

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT: What is the exact date at which the Government expect to complete this work, and what is the total amount remaining to be expended?

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: We expect that the vote here taken will complete this canal, of course with the exception of some $840,000 that the additional basins are expected to cost if they are constructed. But the Government do not intend to proceed with that work at present. The vote will complete the works now under contract. The lower entrance will be from 18ft. to 19ft., there will be 14ft. of water up to Wellington bridge, and a depth of 12ft. through the canal up to Lachine. We expect to complete those contracts and to finish that expenditure up to July 1, 1880.

MR. BERGIN: The interest taken in the constituency which I represent, in the canal estimates, and the general anxiety throughout the country, as to the policy of the Government with regard to the canals, induce me to offer a few remarks on this subject. There has been a large expenditure during the past few years in pursuance of the policy of canal enlargement adopted in 1872, and which was carried out to a great extent by the late Government. The report of Mr. Page shows that $10,233,320 has been expended on the Welland Canal, $4,699,248 on the Lachine Canal, and $412,916 on the Cornwall Canal. I understand that a large sum will be necessary to complete the works now in progress. Among the forwarders and commercial men of the country, the feeling is strong that it is necessary, at an early day, if we would successfully compete with our American neighbours for the carrying trade of the country, to enlarge the canals, at all events as far as Kingston. The Cornwall Canal works, I am sorry to say, have been a blunder from the beginning to the end. I wish I were satisfied it was merely a blunder. The work, it seems, was commenced at the wrong end. The chief complaint was, and is now, that there is not a sufficient supply of water. In 1872, the water at one time was as low as eight feet three inches, upon the sill at the guard lock, and in November last it was eight feet one inch. At no time ought it to be less than nine feet to admit of traffic, and to supply the necessary water for the mills on the canal. It looked at the close of the season, when forwarders were in the greatest hurry, as if navigation would close on the Cornwall Canal to vessels drawing nine feet. When they reached the head of the canal they would be obliged to unload part of the cargo at a heavy expense. In consequence of this leading forwarders and manufacturers interested in the supply of water, addressed a memorial to the hon. the Minister of Canals who, I think, gave it all the attention in his power. It is, perhaps, not in the power of the Government to do immediately what the country requires towards increasing the power of those canals, but we think this matter ought to be brought before the public in order that the necessity for enlarging those water ways should be made clear to all. Large sums of money are being expended upon the railways of the country—and that is a policy in which I cheerfully acquiesce—but I think if it be possible the Government should do something within the next year towards increasing the capacity of our canals. The objection may again be made that this enlargement will not divert traffic from the American routes. This, I do not believe. The Americans are a sharp, business people, and when the opportunity offers to carry a large amount of grain from Chicago to tide water they will always choose the cheapest route. If the needed improvements were made in our canals, within five or six years we would secure the great bulk of the traffic from the western country to Montreal. That port is the key of our trade, and it will be the great rival port to New York. It is, therefore, in the interest of this country that great sacrifices should be made to build up that port. I understand from the estimates of the engineers that a little over $1,500,000 is all that is needed to remove the obstructions now between Kingston and Cornwall. The estimate is for :

That Rock Shoal, Galops Rapids....	$512,000
Willard's Shoal.....	13,000
Lake St. Francis, including lights, beacons and buoys.....	45,000
Deepening and enlarging channel at head of Beauharnois Canal.....	430,000
Deepening and improving channel through Lake St. Francis.	520,000

If this be the case there is no substantial reason why we should not have a 12ft. channel from Kingston to Montreal. If hon. members look upon the map, they will see that the St. Lawrence is the natural roadway to the seaboard. The distance in favour of Montreal against

New York by the Straits of Belle Isle is 223 miles. But we have another advantage in that route. Propellers leaving Chicago, laden with grain, can reach Montreal in eight or ten days, while grain-laden vessels, leaving on the same day for New York, would not reach their destination within twenty or twenty-two days. There is so great an advantage in point of time over the American route that a vessel leaving Chicago for Liverpool, namely, the St. Lawrence, could unload her cargo at Liverpool, and be well on her homeward trip, before a vessel which left on the same day for Liverpool, by way of New York, could leave the latter port. The question for us to consider is—how we are thus to secure this trade? I believe it is agreed that the proper course is to enlarge our canals, so as to admit of vessels carrying much larger cargoes than heretofore. The experience of forwarders has been that larger vessels, carrying larger cargoes, can be worked almost as cheaply as much smaller vessels, carrying much smaller cargoes. Steam vessels leaving Chicago with 60,000 bushels each, and each towing two consorts carrying 60,000 bushels each, can take grain to Buffalo for 2c. a bushel, the great expense of transporting grain to New York city, accruing for the distance between Buffalo and that capital. Here comes in the consideration of the question, whether it is possible to carry grain as cheaply by rail as by water. It is argued that because the New York Central Railway carried grain so cheaply last year and the year before, from Buffalo to New York—more cheaply than the Erie Canal—that it has been demonstrated that railways can compete successfully with the canals. I think this is entirely a misapprehension. The reason why the railways have carried grain more cheaply between those points is, the want of capacity of the canals, and consequently, the want of capacity of the vessels. The highest capacity of any vessel on the Welland Canal is 220 tons; the average is 208 to 210. One of the difficulties we have to contend with in fighting for this traffic with our United States neighbours is the cheapness with which grain is carried by the Erie Canal from Buffalo to New York, the chief reason for this being that, in nearly every instance, the owners of the barges on those canals are the men who navigate them; they make them their homes, summer and winter, and have reduced the expense of working them to a minimum. Whereas, with us, the trade not being a legitimate one, as I shall show presently, our carrying trade is in the hands of companies, who are obliged to employ hands, many at high wages, and, consequently, they are not able to transport grain from Kingston to Montreal as cheaply as the men who, having a direct interest in the vessels and trade, are able to do so at a very much lower rate than men obliged to employ hired labour. To show that large vessels can carry grain much more cheaply than small, I may state that the New York Central Railway has placed on Lake Erie vessels of from 1,500 to 2,000 tons, that carry from 70,000 to 80,000 bushels, which have delivered freight at a cost to the railway of less than two-thirds of 1c. a bushel at Buffalo, for which they charge 2c.; and this has enabled them to lower the rates upon the New York Central from Buffalo to New York. The cost of carrying grain from Chicago to Kingston, by our vessels, is 10½c. a bushel; and the reason is, that we are not able to use vessels larger than from 16,000 to 19,000 bushels. The majority of the propellers carry from 16,500 to 17,000 bushels. With a very little addition to the labour, vessels might be worked, carrying from 70,000 to 80,000 bushels; and they are building, at this moment, at Milan, near Toledo, two vessels of a capacity of 100,000 or 120,000 bushels each, and consorts that will carry from 80,000 to 100,000 bushels each, and so alive are our American neighbours to the necessity of cultivating this trade, and of increasing the facilities of lake navigation, that they are now deepening every shallow point on the Lakes from 16 to 20 feet. They expect that within two years that Lake Erie will be navigable at that depth through its entire length, and that from Chicago to Buffalo vessels drawing 20 feet will be able to proceed. This improvement would give them an immense advantage. Our vessels have been built to the capacity of the old Welland Canal, with only 26 feet beam and about 138 to 140 feet keel, and very few exceed 400 tons measurement. But if all our canals be enlarged to the capacity of the Welland, we shall be enabled to build vessels of 270 feet keel with 42 feet beam, carrying 60,000 bushels. Each propeller would tow two consorts each carrying 60,000 bushels, which would reduce freight so much that our forwarders would be able to deliver grain at Kingston for 5c. a bushel. Our large forwarders at Montreal would be able to take the grain to Kingston and deliver it there at such a rate as would enable us to compete tolerably successfully with the Erie Canal. But if our canals were enlarged to twelve feet, as they will be, we should be able to defy the competition of the Americans, and to deliver grain in Montreal at six cents a bushel, or, as cheap as it is possible for Americans to carry grain from Buffalo to the City of New York. Another important point, speed would be gained in the construction of those large vessels, which would have sufficient power in all ordinary weather to make ten miles an hour. Vessels of such power and speed can tow a couple of consorts, laden almost as heavily as themselves, at seven miles an hour. It has been objected to the enlargement of the canals from Kingston to Montreal, that it would be impossible, owing to the difficulties of navigation, for any of those propellers to tow two consorts of a capacity of 60,000 bushels each. But I am informed by navigators of our lakes and rivers, that it can be done when the improvements in the channel, foreshadowed in the report of the Chief Engineer of Canals, have been executed. I am told we cannot construct and use canals with twelve feet of water, because we can not remove the shoals, except at an expense of millions of dollars, between Cornwall and the mouth of the Beauharnois, and that within two or three miles of that canal there are shoals that could not be removed at an expense of much less than $15,000,000 or $20,000,000. I oppose to that the statement of the Chief Engineer of Canals, who thinks that $1,500,000 would be sufficient to move all the obstructions between Kingston and the head of the Lachine Canal. The Americans are quite awake to the necessity of doing something further towards meeting our efforts towards enlarging our water-ways and obtaining possession, as I think we can and ought, of the great grain trade of the west. It is of more importance to us now than ever, because we have Manitoba and the whole North-West, over 600,000 square miles of territory, of the wheat-producing region, which we hope will, within a very few years, pour into the lap of Europe the food it requires. Now is the time to obtain possession of this valuable trade, and not allow it to be diverted to American channels; for it is hard to turn trade out of well-worn grooves. The Americans are now acting on this principle and endeavouring to bring about a change in the feeling of the New York State Legislature, which, only a few years ago, forbade any further expenditure on the Erie Canal than was derived from its revenue. I believe the effort will be successful, and that within a year, we shall find the Americans endeavouring to increase the capacity of the Erie Canal and to deepen it one foot. We should take time by the forelock, use all the means at our disposal for the enlargement of our canals. The number and tonnage of Canadian sailing vessels and steamers reaching Montreal, from the lakes in 1878, was not much in excess of that of the American vessels. But the capacity of the American vessels was greater than that of our own. I have not been able to obtain a return of the tonnage for 1879, but I have it for 1878. I find that in that year there came in:

	No.	Tons.	Average Tons.
Canadian Steamers to Montreal.....	1971	28,440	140
Canadian Sailing Vessels to Montreal	665	102,945	154
American Steamers	47	9,385	199
American Sailing Vessels.....	404	67,978	168

This is not the only difficulty with which our trade has to contend; not only insufficient depth of the canals and obstructions in our rivers, but the Montreal harbour dues, necessitated by the debt incurred in deepening Lake St. Peter. I believe it has been admitted by the late Minister of Public Works, and the Premier of the late Government, that this is a Dominion work, and ought to be so regarded, and that the Dominion ought to assume the debt. I would earnestly urge on the Government the assumption of this debt as early as possible; it is something over $80,000 a year. This is an immense tax on vessels arriving at Montreal, and one that diverts from that port large numbers, not only of foreign, but of Canadian vessels. The case of the Clifton, a Canadian vessel of 300 tons, engaged in the Australian trade, recently brought before the hon. the Minister of Railways, illustrates the discouraging effect of those dues. The difference between the charges paid by the Clifton at New York, and paid at Montreal, would be $328 on that small vessel. This difference is made up of harbour dues, tonnage dues, pilotage, towage, and other charges, which, practically, forbid foreign vessels coming to the port of Montreal. We must make Montreal, like New York, practically a free port, particularly as Buffalo is on the lakes a free port. We could then compete with them in foreign ports for cargoes to Canada and to the Western States, and we could carry inwards cheaper than they, and deliver our cargoes ten days sooner than by New York, Baltimore or Boston. When European vessel owners are asked to bring a cargo to Montreal, they demand a much larger freight on account of those great port charges which, being much higher than those at New York, induce vessel-owners to give it the preference, just as the owner of the Clifton goes to New York, in preference to Montreal, although the cargo he takes in that port is a Canadian cargo, including wooden houses and other Canadian products, which he sells in Australia, where he gets a cargo of wool, hides and other products, which he brings to New York, because it is the cheaper port. We not only lose the carrying of the products from Toronto to Montreal, but, in addition, the supply of those ships, the wages of the sailors, which are spent in New York, and all the other disbursements made in the carrying of those cargoes from New York to Toronto, and from Toronto to New York. In consequence of the present state of our canals, we are not encouraging our ship-owners to build and our ship-yards are closed. Why? In anticipation of the enlargement of our canals, it would not be wise or prudent for our ship-owners to build vessels of only the present capacity of the St. Lawrence canals, and they live in hopes that, within two or three years, the Government will enlarge the canals so that they can build vessels of the capacity of 60,000, 70,000 or 80,000 bushels. As a consequence of our shipyards being closed, our ship carpenters and others are obliged to go to the United States to find employment, where the shipyards are in full blast. Large numbers of vessels that should be built in this country and employed here, are now built in the United States and employed on the other side of the line. While I am on this subject, I may call attention to the vote of $50,000 for the purpose of encouraging trade with Brazil. With the member for St. John's, I regard this one of the best votes in the Estimates. If the port of Montreal continues to be practically closed, if the charges continue to be as excessive in the future as in the past, if no effort be made by us to remove those charges, it will be impossible for us to cultivate successfully this trade with Brazil. I think it is in the power of the Government, notwithstanding the state of the Revenue, to pay the interest on the debt incurred in deepening Lake St. Peter, or at all events to assume a large part of it, and thus assist Montreal towards doing away with her harbour dues. I think the Government might also direct their attention to the pilotage, which requires close looking after. I am told that on a vessel of 1,000 tons capacity, at least $400 are charged as pilotage. The hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries would do well to consider this matter, with a view of reducing these excessive charges. I believe something could be done in the matter of towage. I understand a tariff is about to be established in the port of Montreal for towage. I think it would be better to trust to competition which, in time, will enable vessels to be towed from Quebec to Montreal much more cheaply than at present. I believe the management of the pilotage might be so modified that cheaper pilots could be taken on. I do not see why a small vessel, properly manned, and going as a tug, should be compelled to take on a pilot from Quebec to Montreal. To give an idea of the vast trade we may expect from Brazil, I may refer to the article of coffee alone. Twelve million pounds of coffee were imported into the United States last year. A few years ago it cost $12 a ton to import coffee to New York when they had harbour dues, but now that New York has been made practically a free port, the cost is only $3 a ton. I said, a little while ago, that our carrying trade in the main was not a legitimate trade. By means of the large vessels which the Americans own upon the upper lakes, and by reason of the cheapness with which they can bring grain to the port of Buffalo and transport it to New York, they have a very great advantage over us in competing for foreign markets. When a man wants to transport one or two million bushels of grain from Chicago to Liverpool, he naturally seeks the cheapest route. Our vessels are not able to bring freight from Chicago to Kingston for less than 10½c. a bushel, and in consequence our forwarders at Montreal are obliged, if they would get employment for their vessels, to send agents to foreign markets for freightage in competition with the American vessel owners. They are met at once with the cheapness of the American route, and in order to secure freight for their propellers and barges, they are obliged to purchase large quantities of grain themselves in the American market, trusting to the profit they may make upon the grain, and the profit they will make upon their cheaper barge transportation between Kingston and Montreal, to realise at all events, the interest on the money they have invested in these vessels. This, I contend, is not a legitimate carrying trade, but one which they have to pursue, despite all the advantages of our water route, arising principally from the exorbitant charges at the port of Montreal. I contend that even now, with our canals at 9ft., if we had a free port at Montreal, with the towage and pilotage reduced, as they might be, we would be able to compete more successfully with our American neighbours. I wish now to read the opinions of the foreign consuls at Montreal. Those gentlemen have particular facilities for acquiring knowledge of the difficulties of trade at that port. I find in the Star of last Friday, the result of interviews between the reporter of that journal and the different foreign consuls, and they are so interesting that, with the permission of the House, I will read them :

“ The prospects of our foreign trade, if the Government accedes to the wishes of the country, are unusually bright. The total number of ships (we are not now speaking of local traffic) which visited our port in 1879, was 612, with a tonnage of 506,929. Of these only 36 sailed under a foreign flag, as follows:—Norwegian, 13; Austrian, 9; German, 6; American, 4; Swedish, 1; Italian, 1; Dutch, 1; Belgian 1. Total, 36. Their total tonnage was but 18,245.

“Mr. John F. Wulff, Consul for Demark, Sweden and Norway, was seen in his office in St. Sulpice street, when the following questions were propounded: Reporter—What do you think, Mr. Wulff, of the plan of reducing canal and wharfage dues, etc., and making of Montreal a free port? A. I can have but one thought on the subject. I state clearly and explicitly that Montreal would have the preference over New York with our vessel owners as soon as the reduced rates were telegraphed over to the other side. Previously, unless they had paying freight to bring out which they cannot always get, they could not make a voyage over here without loss, owing to the high charges exacted at this port. While you are here, Mr. Reporter, let me congratulate you most heartily on the stand the Star has taken in dealing with this question.

“Mr. W. C. Alunderloh, German Consul, was next visited. In answer to the usual question this gentleman said: ‘Most decidedly many vessels would come to Montreal, if charges were lower, not only from Germany, but also from Belgium, Italy, France and Austria. Probably you scarcely know how things are managed by our people. I will tell you. They have a record or guide of the expenses connected with ports all over the world, and before they decide to go anywhere they turn up this guide. If they find, on looking at the total result, that a greater proportion of their freight money is to be absorbed in expenses, they seek other ports. This a reason why many of them who like Montreal are driven to New York, Baltimore and Boston, where they are encouraged in every way possible. If the Government decides to reduce the charges it should act at once. All the foreign consuls here will then, without delay, despatch cablegrams to their respective Governments, who will in turn immediately publish the reduced list of charges on the other side at all the principal ports. You, of course, have published the exports of breadstuffs from America for the past year, but I may state that Germany alone imported in 1879, 65,000,000 cwts of wheat, barley, oats and maize, the greater portion of which might just as well have gone from the Canadian as the American seaboard. Further comment is unnecessary.’

“A. M. F. Gianelli, Consul of His Majesty the King of Italy, for Canada, said: ‘My views are that the charges of wharfage here are not out of the way for vessels. The great drawback, and what keeps away our vessels is the towage expenses, which have made it almost prohibitory to come here. The Beaver line of two boats has published a new tariff, which they call a 50 per cent. reduction over the tariff in existence in 1874, but even the amount charged by this tariff I consider 50 per cent. higher than it should be, for a sailing vessel to sustain expenditure. I calculate that a vessel of 600 tons register, drawing eighteen feet of water, according to this new tariff will have to pay from Quebec to Montreal and back to Quebec, $483, and from the foot of the traverse to Quebec and back, $180, a total of $663, which is a little over $1 per registered ton, or 8d per quarter on her carrying capacity. By this it is evident that no merchants can expect to get a vessel the same price as at New York, Philadelphia or Baltimore. Pilotage in some instances has been considered too high, but I think the difference between us and the neighbouring ports of the United States is very little, hence it is not an item of much consideration for a ship owner. For instance. From a reliable memorandum I have kept of a 559 ton register sailing vessel, the rates compare as follows;—Montreal, $186.81; New York, $146.06; Philadelphia, $157.50.’

“Merchants consider that more attention should be paid to smaller sailing vessels which do the greater part of the outport trade on the Continent. It is suggested that the Government subsidise a line of tow boats and fix a uniform towage tariff. To each tow-boat should be attached a branch pilot, and in this way it may be found possible to do away with the necessity for a pilot in cases where a vessel is under tow.”

I will say no more except to remark upon the necessity of enlarging the Cornwall canal at the head for the purpose of supplying our mills with water. We ran great risk last year in having over 1,000 hands thrown out of employment at Cornwall in consequence of the low water. We know, of course, that water for navigation was the principle object in building the canals, but Mr. Page has furnished a report which shows that at a cost of $250,000 or $300,000 the blunder made by the late hon. Minister of Public Works in building the locks at the lower end of the canal before he had made the entry at the head of the canal larger so as to admit a sufficient supply of water, can be remedied. There can be no doubt it was the greatest piece of absurdity in the world to build locks of the capacity of 12 or 14 feet at the foot of the canal when the supply would not average 9 feet at the head. I must, therefore, urge upon the hon. the Minister the desirability of enlarging the head of the Cornwall Canal so as to give us a further supply of water for all purposes.

MR. KEELER: In looking over the Estimates for the present year, I am disappointed in not seeing a sum allotted for the construction of the Murray Canal. I think that during the present Session, I have presented no less than twenty-five petitions to this House in favour of that long neglected, but very necessary, work—those petitions are from every city, county, township, town and village in the vicinity of the canal, and I earnestly call the attention of the Government to their prayers. In addition to our old arguments and reasons for the Murray Canal, we have another in the recently developed and rapidly increasing iron ore trade of Hastings. I find by a Return brought down yesterday by the Minister of Customs (Mr. Bowell), that no less than 6,294 tons of iron ore were exported during the three months of January, February and March last, from Belleville to Cleveland, Ohio. Now this iron ore trade, if we take these three months as an average—and they are much below it, I am sure—shows a yearly shipment of 25,000 tons, valued at $58,000, a business of itself sufficient to pay a fair rate of interest on the cost of the canal, and a business, too, which would be immensely extended, if facilities were afforded to it by reducing the distance by 150 miles to Cleveland, by opening the “short cut” I propose. I have a telegram from Belleville in my hand, which says:

“250 tons per day of iron ore and 150 tons of golden ore are now being shipped, and expect to double this amount next month. With Murray Canal we could largely increase these figures, and yet have plenty iron ore for smelting works—vessels bringing back coal from Cleveland.”

I claim the right of the people whom I have the honor to speak for, to this work being done—not as a favour, but as the payment of a sacred debt of the Dominion to the locality. It was in the year 1796, when Governor Simcoe was the ruler of Upper Canada, that this Murray Canal was first surveyed and sixty-four acres of land reserved, and still reserved, for its site, with an appropriation also of some 6,000 acres in concessions B and C of the Township of Murray, from which the canal takes its name, was made for the purpose of dredging across the short neck of soft earth—only a mile and a-half wide—which divides the waters of Presque Isle Bay from those of the Bay of Quinté. These 6,000 acres of land were sold, by the Government in 1815, for $12 per acre, amounting to $72,000, which, with simple interest at 6 per cent. for sixty-five years now sums up to the nice little lump of $352,000, an ample amount to do the work. Another very strong argument, in favour of the construction of this canal, I find in a recent article in one of the

That is only one of the many similar articles which I could read to show the necessity of proceeding with this canal. I desire, before I sit down, to say a word or two in regard to the Trent Valley Canal, in which I have taken great interest for many years, and upon which subject this House has frequently heard from me—over forty petitions for its construction having been presented during this Session to this Parliament, from nearly every municipal corporation between Lake Huron and Kingston. I do not intend pressing the Government to commence its construction this year, but as I am certain that within a very few years the outpouring of grain from our new country, to which so many thousands are now turning, will be so great that every outlet will be needed, and particularly the cheapest ones, for I feel convinced that our Government will be only performing its duty by completing the Trent navigation, which, in comparison to its cost, will furnish the shortest, cheapest, safest, and best channel between the wheat fields of the West and the ocean-going ships at Montreal. The result of the movement originated by myself last year to prevent the Trent navigation being destroyed, as intended in its transfer to the Province of Ontario by the late Government, has been, I am happy to say, the rescinding of the Order in Council of October 8th, 1878, and the survey or examination by D. Stark, Civil Engineer, of the whole line of water highway between Lake Huron and the Bay of Quinté at Trenton, with a view to deciding whether it is capable of being made one of the outlets for the Great North-Western country. Mr. Stark's report is in the highest degree favourable, and has impressed the Government with a proper sense of its very great importance as a link in the chain of communication across the continent; and from the assurances we have received I feel satisfied that, at no very distant day, this grand project will have the best attention of the Government. I might also state that this canal, or navigation as it should be called, only requires 59½ miles to complete it, and that instead of requiring an expenditure, as the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie) said a few days ago, of $15,000,000 or $20,000,000 it will only require as shown by the last engineer's estimate $2,400,000, and I would like to see a sum put down for the Trent Valley Canal in the Supplementary Estimates for this year, but if not, that it will be done next year. I do not see any item in the Estimates for surveys of the Murray Canal, which I think should be made, so that, as soon as the hon. the Minister of Railways considers that the Government can expend the money for the construction of that work, there should be no delay. There is an item, however, under the head "Surveys;" if that means for the instrumental survey of the Trent Valley Canal—I refer to vote 103—I shall be very glad. In view of the impatience of the House at this late hour, I will not trespass further at present.

MR. McCUAIG: There can be no doubt large sums of money has been expended in the improvement of our canal system, with the view of securing cheap transport from the west to the ocean via the River St. Lawrence, in competition with the American route via the Erie Canal and New York. The race of competition led to the reduction of canal tolls on the Erie Canal from 6½c. per bushel on wheat to 1c., and it is now contended that the canal tolls on our own canals should be abolished and Montreal declared a free port, it we hope to secure the transportation of western produce, and to accomplish this many hon. members of this House are urging the Government to assume, in addition, the indebtedness of the Montreal Harbour Trust, alleged to have been contracted in deepening the Lake St. Peter, between Montreal and Quebec. Sir, I protest against such a policy at the present moment. We are unable to throw away revenues or to assume new liabilities, and it is ungenerous in hon. members of this House to urge this on the hon. the Minister of Railways and Canals, in view of the large expenditure to which the faith of the Dominion was pledged for the construction of the Pacific Railway. I respect the merchants of Montreal, their energy, enterprise and public spirit. It was a wise thing, in its way, to have a transshipping port at Montreal, as near the canal as possible, but, after all, nature had formed Quebec for our transshipping port, and the obstacles of nature would eventually overcome any attempt to fix this point at Montreal. Cheapness of transport from Kingston to Montreal or Quebec could only be secured by transshipment from large upper lake craft, carrying from 60,000 to 80,000 bushels of wheat through the enlarged Welland Canal from the far west, at Kingston, into river barges of from 20,000 to 30,000 bushels capacity, and the establishment of a Government steam-tug service, between Kingston and Montreal and Quebec, the same as was originally given to the eminent and wealthy firm of Calvin and Son, of Garden Island, by the Government of Sir John A. Macdonald, many years ago, and which contributed so largely to the popularity of the St. Lawrence route, by the prompt and faithful performance of the conditions of the contract for their service by that firm, creating thereby confidence that all property arriving at Kingston, would reach Montreal within twenty-four hours after its departure from that port. As an illustration of cost, a barge capable of carrying 20,000 bushels of wheat costs $10,000, or fifty cents per bushel burthen; a schooner capable of carrying the same quantity of grain on the lakes costs $20,000, or $1 per bushel burthen, but she can only carry 15,000 bushels on the River St. Lawrence, thus increasing the cost to $1.33½ a bushel burthen; a propellor capable of carrying 14,000 bushels, will cost $30,000, or $4 per bushel burthen. The cost of running a barge one month, making two trips between Kingston and Montreal, carrying 40,000 bushels, is $100; the cost of running a schooner, one month, making two trips, carrying 30,000 bushels, is $432; the cost of running a propellor, making four trips, carrying 30,000 bushels, instead of 40,000 bushels, is $1,500. A seaworthy craft for the lakes must necessarily have twice as much weight of timber, iron, fastenings, etc., in her construction, as a barge that is calculated for the River St. Lawrence, and as you increase the weight to make a craft suitable for lake navigation, you consequently increase the cost of building, and the cost of carrying per bushel. This strength not being necessary on the river, a cheaper craft is built, carrying more, and doing the work more economically and satisfactorily than a lake craft can. Now, in regard to the Murray Canal, which I know will be of great benefit to that peninsula. There is 90 per cent of iron in the ore in that neighbourhood, and what we want is cheap transport. If we have not the coal to smelt this ore, we should have some means of getting the ore to a place where it can be smelted, and I think the canal will be a great help in that direction. Reference has been made to the Trent Valley Canal. Now we are spending $10,000,000 to $12,000,000 to complete the Welland Canal, and we no sooner get half through with it than this other scheme is brought up in opposition. The whole argument is so absurd that it can have no effect upon the Government or the country.

MR. McCALLUM: I would like to say a few words in reply to the hon. gentleman from Prince Edward county in regard to the deepening of Lake St. Peter. The people of Montreal have spent a large amount of money to make Montreal an Atlantic port, and my hon. friend says it is unreasonable to ask the Government to assume this debt. We must deal with this question as we find it now. We have competitors for the trade of the West, and if the assumption of that debt would give us the trade of that territory the Government should do it. The policy of the country, so far as the enlargement of the canal is concerned, was decided previous to Confederation, and I would like now to impress upon the Government the necessity of reducing the tolls and harbour dues at Montreal, in order to give us the trade of the West. So far as the tolls of the canals are concerned there has been no reduction since 1863. They take a different view of such matters in New York State where a present of $1,500,000 was made to get the western trade, and they would give as much more to keep that trade. In 1860 it cost 27 cents per bushel to take wheat from Chicago to New York, and the canal tolls were 5c. 2 mills a bushel. Last year it cost only 9c. 2 mills per bushel from Chicago to New York, and the canal tolls was 1c. per bushel. There have been great blunders in regard to the enlargement of the canals, and I do not blame any one in particular for them. I think it was a mistake to spend any of the money of the people in deepening the Detroit River before our canals were enlarged. To show the importance of this question, I will read a statement of the Comptroller of New York State, which will give an idea of its importance better than any words of mine. The report reads:

“It is said that the increased tonnage on the canals in 1877, caused the loading of one thousand vessels at the port of New York, and as the average amount expended by a sea-going vessel while in port, is $2,000 the increased canal traffic caused $2,000,000 to be expended by sea-going vessels alone. It is also estimated that the total gain to the State was $12,000,000, due wholly to the increased business of 1877.”

Here is the opinion of a New York merchant on the same subject:

“Two hundred thousand bushels of corn in Chicago was seeking a market at the seaboard. An application came to a firm in New York in these words: ‘Will you advance on 200,000 bushels of corn to be shipped to Baltimore?’ They answered: ‘Yes, but why to Baltimore in preference to New York?’ The reply came; ‘Transportation to Baltimore is half-cent per bushel less than to New York,’ and so the corn went to Baltimore, because the sum of $1,000 could be saved in transportation charges, and New York capital followed it there because it was idle, and Baltimore offered it employment. The merchant referred to, summed up this transaction in this wise: Six vessels bound in Baltimore six cargoes of corn and Baltimore received the inward cargoes of these six vessels, because she could supply them with return freight. If the corn in question had come to New York, at the same rate of transportation as was charged to Baltimore, $13,000 would have been the actual amount contributed for transportation within the borders of our State. In consequence of the toll imposed, the corn in question was turned from New York to Baltimore, and not only did the State fail to receive any toll whatsoever, but the industrial classes of the State failed to receive the sum of $13,000, which otherwise would have come into their possession. This sum of $13,000 only represents the measure of the positive known loss. The loss arising from the non-arrival of the six vessels at the port of New York, with their incoming cargoes, the handling and storing of these cargoes, and their final sale and transportation, can only be a matter of conjecture, but must also be taken into the estimate of the total loss sustained. Nor is this all. Baltimore, by giving return cargoes to these six vessels, will induce a return on their part to her port with six additional companions, to the continued detriment of the foreign commerce of New York."

The report of the Canal Commission, some years ago, was to the effect that we should have 12ft. of water on the Welland Canal, but it has been urged from time to time that it should be deepened to 14ft. I have repeatedly urged the Government to let the rock-cutting, and complete the aqueduct first, and it is unfortunate for the carrying trade of this country that such a course was not taken. But I do not anticipate any trouble in using the canal with the old aqueduct, and twelve feet of water. I think the hon. Minister made a mistake last year when, in reply to a question by the hon. member for Lambton, whether he was going to open the canal with twelve feet of water, he stated it would not be opened until there was a depth of fourteen feet.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: That was quite a mistake.

MR. McCALLUM: I thought it was, and I refer to it now in order that it may be rectified. I hope the hon. Minister will take into consideration the absolute necessity of raising the locks from Thorold to Port Dalhousie, so as to be able to give 14ft. water. It would not cost a great deal of money. A feeder was deepened, all except five or six culverts, at the cost $150,000 to $200,000. The intention was to sink the culverts level with the balance of the canal, and I suppose it would cost $20,000 to do this work. If that were done this spring we could open the canal and send our vessels by the feeder. I hope and trust the Government will not allow another winter to go over without putting down the culverts to the level of the canal, which will give us three feet more water. I do not see an amount in the Estimates for Port Maitland Harbour, which is in a very bad condition. It would be money saved to the country if an appropriation was made to improve that harbour this year. A break in the pier took place last fall, and the harbour is filling in with sand. It may cost $100,000 next year; and it is a very important harbour, the most important on Lake Erie, at the head of the feeder of the Welland Canal, at the mouth of the Grand River into which vessels can run five miles. Where it enters the lake one of the piers was carried away by a storm a year ago last fall, and I called the attention of the Government to the fact in the interest of economy. They should bring down, in the Supplementary Estimates, money enough to secure that improvement, and The engineer can explain its necessity. I hope this will be done in the interest of the country.

MR. ROSS (Dundas): We are all agreed as to the propriety of enlarging and improving our canals as fast as possible, that policy having been agreed upon by both parties years ago. This was thought necessary in the true interest of the country. Much money has already been spent for the purpose. I suppose the work of improvement of the Welland Canal will be completed in a year or two. I have never heard anyone deny it should be deepened to the extent originally contemplated, twelve feet, and subsequently to fourteen feet on the mitre sills. The same policy was obtained with reference to the Lachine Canal. Having proceeded so far, in a progressive spirit, would it be wise to halt now? I do not consider the Government have that intention; but on account of the financial stringency they may not proceed with the work as rapidly as they might otherwise desire. There is a feeling abroad that railway will supersede water transit. That is the point to be considered. When we get the canals completed, we may consider the means of working them to the best advantage. There is no use of mystifying this subject with extraneous matters. Suppose we did not complete the enlargement of the St. Lawrence Canals, we should have the Welland in use for larger vessels than could pass through them—the St. Lawrence Canals—and the advantage would be directly to the Americans. Not only would the opposite ports of the United States benefit, but we should have, at Ogdensburg, a competition for the trade now going to Montreal, and I fear a successful one. There is now, I understand, under contract at Ogdensburg, a large elevator with that object. Vessels of the enlarged kind would stop at that point, and Montreal would be left in the distance. We should have the Williamsburgh Canal improved, to give us 12ft. or 13ft. of water on the mitre sills. I would also suggest, in the interest of the forwarding and carrying trade, that this House give an indication that these works will be proceeded with. We should first enlarge every lock, and obtain the dimensions of the locks as contemplated, if we do not go on with excavation work. We should have at the Williamsburgh section 10ft. or 12ft. of water, which would enable the larger class of vessels, carrying 40,000 bushels, and of 270ft. keel, for carrying grain from Kingston to Montreal or Quebec, to be prepared for the trade. The forwarders could thus get their craft ready. This would entail a very much smaller expenditure compared with the total outlay on the canals. Many of the locks would not require to be otherwise altered than lengthened. If vessels, after loading and coming to Kingston, could pass down the St. Lawrence, with 10ft. or 12ft. of water, they could deliver at Montreal cargoes of 40,000 bushels. An hon. member has spoken of vessels carrying 70,000 bushels of grain. I have the best authority for saying that they would be unwieldy, and their working, with such cargoes, impracticable. Vessels suited to the lakes would not be so suited to rivers filled with rapids. Captains and pilots would not undertake the risk of running vessels of 70,000 bushels through narrow river channels. A large amount of money would be imperilled by the crippling of such vessels, and high rates of insurance involved. This would be an impediment to the St. Lawrence trade. No forwarder would construct such large vessels. Vessels of 40,000 bushels capacity are all that can be considered safe in the St. Lawrence navigation. At present vessels of 25,000 bushels capacity even now are not considered so safe as those carrying 15,000 to 20,000 bushels. The canal improvements should proceed as fast as possible. If the eastward trip could be easily made, and without delays, there would be no check to investing in a larger class of vessels. We have water enough in our canals now for the present, except the Williamsburgh Canal, but it is absolutely necessary that some money should be spent at the Morrisburgh and Williamsburgh sections for the removal of the impediments existing. We have not over 6ft. 9in. on the mitre sills at certain periods. Those impediments should not be left a day longer than possible. The Report of the Local Engineer shows that, with an expenditure of $30,000 or $40,000, an additional foot of depth could be obtained, which would be a great improvement. We should pay great attention to the reports of our professional men on such subjects. The able Report of the Chief Engineer, Mr. Page, is condensed in a very short article in the Globe, which I will read :

“The Report of Mr. John Page, Chief Engineer of Canals, is a very elaborate and able document, showing exactly the condition of the Welland and St. Lawrence Canals in February last, and setting forth the results which may be expected to ensue on their completion. The locks on the Canadian route will be 270 feet long and 45 feet wide, with 14 feet of water on mitre sills. Vessels of ordinary build, carrying fully 1,000 tons burthen, will be able to pass through such locks; but as the tendency is to increase the breadth and sectional area of freight vessels, Mr. Page believes that the Canals will be navigated by craft of 1,500 tons burthen. As the Erie Canal, with only 6 feet of water on the sills, carried more freight in 1878 and 1879 than during any previous two years, it is plain that water routes can compete successfully with railways. The improved Canadian canals will have immense advantages over the Erie Canal, and as the railways require renewal of plant, the time is not distant, Mr. Page thinks, when they will be compelled to give up the system of carrying freight at rates so low that no dividend is paid to ordinary stock-holders. Then we may expect that the St. Lawrence route will gain an enormous traffic. The real competition between rail and water lines now begins at the lower end of Lake Erie. The railways run in connection with the large vessels engaged between western and eastern ports. This shows that the railways are unable to compete, on routes where large vessels can be used, and as the completion of the Canadian canals 'will practically extend ocean navigation to the head of Lake Superior' the St. Lawrence route will stand at an advantage over any known freight line, will carry the produce of the western grain fields, and 'open up accessible markets for the coal fields of Nova Scotia.' Such are the anticipations of Mr. Page, a cautious man, of very long experience and great information. Much more reliance may be placed on his judgment than on that of the gloomy prophets who can never foresee a good result for any Canadian enterprise."

It will be observed this condensed review of the able Report of the Chief Officer shows conclusively that the enlargement is a most desirable enterprise, and concludes with a very sound admonition to beware of gloomy prospects. We have two great enterprises on hand: the Pacific Railway and the improvement of our Canals. There is no use of faintheartedness in regard to them; they must go on. The work on the Railway, if economically and judiciously conducted on sound commercial principles or basis, will, before many years, come to a satisfactory completion. As to the Canals, I think it is the duty of the Government to exhaust every means to proceed with their improvement. We have now 10ft. of water all through to Montreal, except only one section. With enlarged locks of 270ft. in length, we should have all required for a long time. With regard to expenditures, I look upon the Government as an individual; neither should make unprofitable investments. We should remember that good water ways and water power are not only useful for navigation and trade, but for manufacturing purposes as well. The feeling in my county is that our magnificent opportunity should be to call forth the energies of our people. Why is it not utilised? It is objected that those canals were constructed only for the transport trade. Is it possible that reasonable men—men in their senses—would confine themselves to only a partial and limited use of their finest resources and opportunities. The Government, moreover, should not allow private parties to appropriate or monopolise this water power, to the exclusion of general enterprise. Sufficient land, at points of water power, should be appropriated, that it may be used to the general advantage, on reasonable terms. At two points in my county there is water enough running to waste to drive three times the present machinery employed, which is constructed on our old worn out plan. I believe it is sound policy for the Government to acquire these water powers, and by letting them to parties who are able to erect manufactures upon them and pay a reasonable rent; they will get three times more interest on the investment than they can get from the canals. I feel very keenly in this matter. I feel that we ought to go on with that work, and I believe if the plan is adopted, as I suggest, we can get a larger class of vessels afloat at an early day at a very much smaller expense than by any other plan, in the meantime, and we can enlarge the canals from time to time as necessity may require. If we leave the St. Lawrence Canals in their present condition with their short locks, a large amount of our trade will be diverted to Ogdensburg and other American ports. If we make this improvement on the canals it will enable us to compete with the American carrying trade. It is not to be expected that either the water channel or the railway can secure a monopoly of the carrying trade. This route will certainly command a very large share of the trade of this country. No unnecessary time should be lost, as trade once diverted is difficult to regain.

MR. BURNHAM: I am in favour of the scheme known as the Trent Valley Canal, advocated by the hon. member for East Northumberland (Mr. Keeler). From the large deputation that waited on the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals, and the number of petitions presented to the House in favour of this scheme, I think it should receive the serious consideration of the Government. The hon. member for Prince Edward county (Mr. McCuaig) objects to the enlargement of the St. Lawrence Canals, and states that small vessels are required in carrying grain that could go below Kingston. By opening up the water communication from Georgian Bay to Lake Ontario, by the proposed route, barges can be brought from Lake Huron to Montreal direct, and as the hon. member for Prince Edward county has stated, the cost of running barges is very much less than that of sailing vessels. The large vessels that are used in the upper lakes can tranship their cargo for Montreal, at the terminus of the canal at Lake Huron, saving a distance of nearly four hundred miles from Chicago to Montreal, over the route from Chicago to Buffalo, and thence to New York by the Erie Canal. It has been said that railroads are going to do all the work of transshipment on this continent. I think that experience shows that canals will always command a large share of the carrying trade. The Erie Canal, at the present time, carries about one-half of the grain that is shipped from Buffalo. The benefit of canals in the United States is shown by the fact that when the Erie Canal is closed in winter, railway freights from Chicago to New York immediately go up from $1.20 to $7 a ton. There is no pooling with canals as there is with railways, and, therefore, they will have the effect of keeping down the cost of transportation. I desire to impress on the hon. Minister the necessity of taking this matter into consideration. A competent engineer has reported that this scheme can be accomplished at a cost of $2,500,000, and it will surely be worth that much to this country. I do not believe, as has been stated by the hon. member for Prince Edward county, that this country is in such a deplorable state that it cannot engage in public works for the benefit of the whole country. I think our finances are in such a condition as will warrant the Government in undertaking this great public work, and thus secure the carrying trade from the Western States to our own sea-port of Montreal.

MR. WRIGHT: It is refreshing to find the attention of the House and country called to the development of our magnificent water stretches. We have had so much discussion with regard to railroads that it is pleasant to find our attention drawn to another and hardly less important subject—that of our canals. The Senate have been devoting their attention, in a most excellent manner, to the consideration of the great scheme of the Panama Canal. Nearly every hon. gentleman who has spoken to-night appears to have his special canal scheme. One hon. gentleman rises to advocate the advantages of the St. Lawrence route, and other hon. gentlemen, in a most laudable way have been devoting themselves to the advocacy of canals through their own section. I should like to have a word to say with regard to our Ottawa system. Many hon. members of the House will remember that not many years ago a great deal of attention was called to that line, which really is the shortest to the Great West by about 400 miles. The Government has taken steps to improve that line of communication, and they have commenced work at Carillon, and have enlarged the canal at Ste. Anne's, and have commenced the construction of the Culbute Canal, all pointing in the direction of that great scheme. I think the hon. the Minister of Railways and Canals will give some of his attention to the construction of this great work, and that before next Session he will have decided upon some definite plan for pushing this great work to completion.

MR. RYAN (Montreal, Centre): The hon. member for Prince Edward was one of a deputation which came from Montreal and from the West to represent the necessity of securing a large portion of the trade of the Great West by the St. Lawrence route during the ensuing season. In order to accomplish that there has been great pressure brought to bear upon the Government, not only from Montreal but from people engaged in the shipping trade in Ontario, who are very deeply interested in this matter. What we desire is that the Government should take off the toll of the canals of the country and, at the same time, assume the debt which has been incurred for deepening Lake St. Peter, and by that means we would be able to attract a much larger number of sea-going vessels to Montreal than in the past. I did not come here to ask for Montreal any particular advantage from this Government. I hold, and I believe it was held by the late hon. Premier in 1877, that the deepening of the channel through Lake St. Peter was as much a public work as the construction of any of the canals in this Dominion, and that it ought to be charged to the Consolidated Revenue instead of to the port of Montreal. The advantage will not be confined to Montreal but will benefit largely Ontario through the cheapening of freight, and when the cost of transport is lessened the value of produce is increased in the same proportion. Ontario will benefit much more than Quebec by this plan. It will enable those engaged in the shipping trade to secure a much larger portion of the carrying trade of the Great West, and of the Great North-West of the United States. The total charge will not probably amount to more than $80,000 or $100,000 a year. That being done the people of Montreal will find their way to assume the debt which has been incurred in giving the necessary accommodation at that port. They have incurred a large sum of money in deepening the channel at Montreal, and in building the most complete system of docks which exist in America. I have no hesitation in saying there are better facilities for loading and discharging vessels at Montreal than exists in any other part of this continent. If the Government will assume the debt of deepening the great highway of the St. Lawrence and charge it to the Consolidated Revenue, then I believe the citizens of Montreal will be willing to assume the debt incurred in deepening the harbour at that city. They desire to make Montreal a free port, which, if done, will largely increase the volume of trade of this country. The hon. member for Prince Edward County (Mr. McCuaig), in everything that he dealt with, found nothing but absurdities. He said it was absurd to suppose that trade could be attracted to Montreal, and that the natural port of Canada was Quebec; but no one knows better than the hon. gentleman himself that Montreal has already secured the chief part of the carrying trade of this country, and that is due principally to the enterprise of the merchants of Montreal, who do not stand with their arms folded until business comes to them; but they go up to the Great West, and employ vessels to bring grain to Montreal. They do this at their own risk. Sometimes it is attended with loss, and at other times with profit, but the result is that it has done much to build up the carrying trade of the country, and give employment to a large number of people. The hon. gentleman told us it was absurd to think of bringing vessels containing a certain number of bushels of grain below Kingston, and that at that point the grain should be transhipped to barges, which might come to Montreal and Quebec. I do not profess to be acquainted with the management of vessels, but I prefer to believe the statements of those who are largely engaged in the carrying trade to the statement of the hon. gentleman. I have heard it said by men who have a great deal of capital invested in that trade, that they would prefer to make the entire trip from Chicago to Montreal in six days, than to be detained three or four days at Kingston in making a transshipment of their cargoes. The hon. gentleman stated that it is perfectly impossible for any vessel containing a certain quantity of grain to navigate the St. Lawrence below Kingston with any safety. As soon as the Welland Canal is completed, then a class of vessels carrying at least 50,000 bushels of grain can proceed direct from Chicago to Montreal, and at the same time tow two convoys carrying 60,000 bushels each. That is the statement of a practical man, and for my part, I prefer to believe it rather than that of the hon. gentleman, who has stated here that everything was absurd which did not happen to chime in with his views and notions of things. I am not aware that Montreal has ever done anything to offend my hon. friend, but I am not at all surprised he should take that line of argument, and find it very absurd to think of carrying grain direct to Montreal, because he has a scheme of his own which he thinks would be much better.

Mr. BOULTBEE: It has been made to treat the proposition of constructing the Ontario and Huron Ship Canal with some degree of ridicule, but it has been by gentlemen who have not understood the magnitude or importance of the subject. The gentleman to whose genius that plan owes its being, Mr. Capreal, is one of the cleverest men in this country. When he designed the Ontario and Simcoe Railway, the project was looked upon as much more wild and chimerical than this one is at present. No financial aid is required from the Government for this scheme. All that has been desired from the beginning, and all that is desired now, is that the Government should give in aid of the undertaking a certain amount of land in the North-West. It seems peculiarly appropriate that such an enterprise should be aided in such a way. That canal would shorten the distance from the Far West by something like 500 miles. From its importance, as a means of transporting the breadstuffs and other produce from the West to the seaboard, it is easily seen how important it is that that link of communication should be established, if it can be. It was first estimated that it would cost $40,000,000, but recent inventions, in the shape of a hydraulic lift-lock, have demonstrated that that canal can now be built for less than $20,000,000. I wish to urge upon the Government that they should take some means of ascertaining whether the scheme put forward of this canal is possible, and to state whether they can give a reasonable amount of land to enable the promoters to carry out the undertaking. If this land is furnished by the Government the necessary capital will be forthcoming within three months, and the work commenced within twelve months.

MR. GIROUARD (Jacques Cartier): I do not rise for the purpose of adding anything to what has been so well said on the importance of making the St. Lawrence route as cheap as possible. I desire to say a word or two in reference to an unfair advantage which I believe exists in the carrying out of the provisions of the Washington Treaty. It is very well known that American vessels use the St. Lawrence canals, and the other canals of the Dominion, on a footing of equality with Canadian vessels. It is also well known that Canadian vessels are not allowed to use the States' canals, especially the canals of the State of New York, on an equal footing with American vessels. It is said that this course is authorised by the Treaty of Washington, but the Treaty does not appear to me to sustain that construction. Article 27 says:

"The Government or Her Britannic Majesty engages to urge upon the Government of the Dominion of Canada to secure to the citizens of the United States the use of the Welland, St. Lawrence, and other Canals in the Dominion, on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the Dominion; and the Government of the United States engages that the subjects of Her Britannic Majesty shall enjoy the use of the St. Clair Flats Canal on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the United States; and further engages to urge upon the State Governments to secure to the subjects of Her Britannic Majesty the use of several State Canals connected with the navigation of the lakes or rivers traversed by or contiguous to the boundary line between the possessions of the high contracting parties on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the United States."

There is not the slightest doubt that we are denied the privilege of Canadian vessels reaching Lake Champlain without paying a license, the which is not exacted from American vessels. The use of the Whitehall Canal by Canadian vessels is entirely prohibited, owing to some Customs regulations. This course, I contend, is not justified under the Washington Treaty, and steps ought to be taken by the Government to put down this American monopoly.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: I regret that at this late hour in the evening it will be impossible for me to notice as fully as I ought to do the remarks that have fallen from hon. gentlemen, but I will briefly refer to some of them. The hon. member for Cornwall (Mr. Bergin) has urged very strongly some measures being taken to carry out the works at Cornwall, especially with a view to give increased water power. There is no doubt that is a very important object, but of course there is a limit to the expenditure by which that object could be attained. The exertions of the late Government have been mainly expended in the effort to enlarge the Welland and the Lachine Canals, and they seem to have arrived at the conclusion that so far as the intervening St. Lawrence Canals were concerned, it would not be desirable to incur a larger expenditure than would be involved in carrying out the original scheme, until the result of enlarging these two canals is known. The present Government have adopted that policy, and proposed to complete the contract made in reference to the enlargement of the Welland Canal, complete the works at Lachine, and also carry out another undertaking to which the late Government committed themselves—the removing of the obstructions at Galops Rapids by chain steam tug. These are now all the contracts in operation, and it is proposed to confine the expenditure to these works. The same remarks I have made in reference to the hon. member for Cornwall, apply also to the hon. member for Dundas (Mr. Ross.) A very strong case has been made out for the increase of water power there. I have not had an opportunity of submitting a report made by the Local Engineer to the Chief Engineer, but I expect to be able to do so at an early day. I am afraid, however, it will hardly be in our power, during the present Session, to meet the views of the hon. members for Dundas or Cornwall, in relation to that matter, important as it is. With reference to the remarks of the hon. member for East Northumberland (Mr. Keeler) I am not at all surprised that attention should have been directed to both the Trent and Murray Canals. So far as I am able to judge, I think a comparatively small sum of money will greatly shorten the distance between the Georgian Bay and the Bay of Quinté. If the trade of the North-West becomes as important as it is expected, no doubt the construction of these works will attract public attention. One of the most influential deputations I have ever seen in the city of Ottawa, waited upon the Government, with the view of pressing upon them the necessity of dealing with the Trent navigation. An engineer, who had examined the work, reported that it would not involve great expenditure, and I have no doubt it would soon become a question as to how far it will be desirable to survey with a view to shortening the line of communication from the Georgian Bay and grain barge navigation from the Georgian Bay to Montreal. The Murray Canal is a work that could be completed at the smallest cost of almost any public work required to attain so large a result; and I only regret that the great obligations resting upon the Government—that there are so many other matters that cannot possibly admit of any postponement—which render it impossible to seriously look at the question, as to whether it would or would not be desirable to spend the small sum required to obtain this large result. The development of the adjacent mineral districts, the great advantage of facilitating transport, by obtaining 100 miles of barge navigation in exchange for a circuitous and dangerous navigation over a route where very many shipwrecks have occurred, would render it desirable, if in the power of the Government, to consider and ascertain at how small a cost that work could be done. I am afraid it will not be in the power of the Government to put in the Estimates the cost of these works. With reference to the opening of the Welland Canal, and the hope expressed by the hon. member for Monk (Mr. McCallum), I am assured that a great many persons who profess to understand the subject thoroughly, seem to entertain no doubt that the Welland Canal may be opened through the old aqueduct. There is some doubt upon that matter, but, at all events, we intend to try the experiment. The gates and appliances will be placed under contract and proceeded with as rapidly as possible, and so soon as the works to be finished by the next season are completed, and the gates are in position, the experiment will be tried as to whether we can operate the Welland Canal through the old aqueduct. The new aqueduct being delayed by serious obstacles, we cannot hope to have that work completed by the next season; therefore, it will be advisable to operate, if possible, through the old aqueduct until the new aqueduct is constructed. The Government will be obliged to consider what expenditure is necessary to prevent the pier at Maitland sustaining serious damage, connected as it is with the maintenance of supply from the Grand River.

MR. MACKENZIE: What is it used for now?

SIR CHARLES TUPPER; That is one of the questions under consideration. The feeder is very useful until the canal is ready to be opened. We have been depending upon the feeder for the old Welland Canal; it runs through a great circuit of country, and it may be desirable to keep it open. I think I have replied to the principle remarks necessary to be answered. I may say, with reference to the whole question—and a very important question it is—discussed so ably by hon. gentlemen on both sides, that it has necessarily been engaging the attention of the Government; but it was our duty to complete those works first and ascertain the result, so far as we could, as to the extension of our trade by the facilities thus given. But at the same time every one will recognise the importance of seriously considering how we may best promote the interests of and facilitate the trade and traffic of the country, and so cheapen transit over these great arteries of communication or trade as to render them as attractive as possible, and enable us to compete successfully with rival routes. We have not come to decided conclusions, great and important as these considerations are, but they are engaging, and will engage, the serious attention of the Government.

MR. MACKENZIE: I do not think it necessary to offer any criticisms, because the hon. gentleman has come to the same conclusion that I had with regard to the item respecting Canals; but the hon. gentleman took some credit to himself for the production of this enormous document.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: I did not. All that I said was, that it would be unnecessary to detain the Committee, as I had placed the volume before the House. The credit is entirely due to the engineer, not to myself.

MR. MACKENZIE: I find that the book contains 100 pages of report, and that the remaining 600 pages are devoted to rubbish, in the shape of specifications of works all finished, and of no interest to us at the present time. It is mere waste of time and money to publish these 600 pages. The 100 pages are all very well. With regard to the complaint made by the hon. member for Cornwall and the hon. member for Dundas, that there was not sufficient water let into the canal, the hon. the Minister of Railways and Canals must be aware of the difficulties encountered with some canals in consequence of this water power being let. I think it a great mistake, and during my own term of office, I steadily avoided letting this power. It involves not only a difficulty in collecting the rent in case of stoppage, but also the risk of having to pay damages. I would strongly recommend any Government not to encourage the furnishing of water power. I recollect a great difficulty in connection with the Welland Canal; the lessees complained of the water being cut off without proper notice; an arbitration, and consequent large expenses, were the result. I think it a great mistake to countenance any more of it than can be possibly helped. I thought the hon. Minister of Canals was going to give us a statement of the amounts required to finish the respective canals; he was good enough to send me a statement of the amounts that had been spent. It should have been in his report. Mr. Page evidently thought it was there, for he makes a reference to it. The total expenditure on the Welland Canal up to the 1st January, was $10,500,000 as near as may be seen. The estimate of Mr. Page was $12,000,000. Can the hon. Minister tell if it is likely to keep within that amount? Mr. Page is generally accurate. His estimate for the Lachine Canal was under $6,000,000, and I see according to the expenditure that his estimate was about correct. Can the hon. gentleman tell how much will be required for the Lachine and Welland Canals?

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: I am afraid that Mr. Page's estimate will be found below the actual expenditure to the extent of some $500,000 or $600,000 to complete the Welland Canal for the twelve feet navigation. With reference to the Lachine Canal, the present estimate now asked for will complete that work. I regret the criticisms of the hon. gentleman in reference to the volume published by the Chief Engineer of Canals, which volume he has characterised as rubbish, with the exception of a small portion. I think the Chief Engineer of Canals is known to be a remarkably able man, who has been able so far to carry to completion one of the most gigantic and most creditable works not only in Canada, but in any country in the world, and that a description of that work is entitled to some other appellation than that applied to it by the hon. gentleman. I think everything connected with that work, the specifications and everything attract the attention of foreign countries. Gentlemen of the highest attainments from England and France and the United States, all the most distinguished and scientific engineers in the world who have inspected this work, have expressed their unqualified admiration of it. No one could expect that such a remark would be made, of a description of a work which has cost him so much labour, to a volume which is calculated to hand down to posterity the details of a work of so much importance and which reflects so much credit upon the Chief Engineer.

MR. MACKENZIE: I do not apply my remarks to Mr. Page's work or to his report, but to these other 600 pages which are not a description of the work; and I do not suppose that Mr. Page got these specifications and documents printed in the volume. I have too high an opinion of him. He may have been asked to do it. It is a huge volume ; there are a few pages devoted to Mr. Page's Report proper, but the rest of the volume is of no use to any person here, or any person abroad.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER : I can quite understand now why the hon. gentleman should have applied such a term to this volume. He supposed that I had suggested it. All I suggested is contained in my letter as it appears in this volume. In this letter I asked Mr. Page to furnish for the information of Parliament, a detailed and careful statement of the progress of the works upon the Welland, St. Lawrence, Lachine and Ottawa Canals. In view of the great expenditure of public money, it was thought it would be interesting to have the fullest and most thorough information on this subject. I never made a suggestion as to what should or should not be put into the Report. I knew that Mr. Page was infinitely more capable than I was of knowing what was required, in order to give the House the information that was wanted. Although I have looked over the volume with great care, I have arrived at a different conclusion to that formed by the hon. gentleman, and I think the time will come when everything in the volume will be at all events regarded as matter of great historic interest.

MR. MCCALLUM : The hon. member for Lambton wants to know what use the feeder is. It is of the utmost importance to keep up the feeder, until it is a known fact that Lake Erie's level will be a success. I trust the hon. Minister will put an amount in the Supplementary Estimates to secure this work. The hon. member also claimed that it was a waste of money to publish the Government Engineer's Report. I think the people will look upon it as money well expended, and will not regard the hon. gentleman's attempt to discredit Mr. Page, an officer of whom he thought highly, when in office, and under whose wing the hon. gentleman often sheltered himself.

MR. MACKENZIE : I did not say a word in disparagement of Mr. Page. I always considered him one of the best engineers on the continent, and one of the most efficient public servants, but I am not to be deterred from criticising a lot of worthless papers on that account. There is nothing interesting in these papers, and a good deal of the matter is not printed for the first time. The hon. gentleman from Monk is always harping about this everlasting feeder. I think he is more concerned about feeding Maitland than feeding the canal.

MR. ROSS (Dundas) : I must express my extreme regret at some of the remarks of the hon. member for Lambton. Every statement that hon. gentleman makes goes to the country, and he should not be too sweeping in his remarks. While the excessive letting of water power on the Lachine Canal may have been a mistake, we should not conclude that like mistakes are about to be made in regard to other canals. The Williamsburgh Canals not used for vessels going eastward, and the hon. gentleman should recollect that a very small quantity of water is now used on these canals. He should also remember that a slight current is not a disadvantage, because it gives steerage way to and assists steamers and vessels. On these canals there is no reason why a moderate and reasonable amount of water power should not be used. It would do no damage to the works, and would encourage industries and give employment to labourers and machinists. While the people in my county have the highest opinion of the Government, we will have a less exalted opinion of their fairness and justice if they refuse to give us the privilege and encouragement asked for. I should not ask, nor do my constituents expect or demand, ought from the Government, that may not be deemed in the interest of the whole country. One hundred or more persons actively engaged in the industrial pursuits of our Dominion, is quite of as much consideration at this point as any other in Canada ; our demand is simple justice, and not undue advantage or preference.

MR. MACDONELL (North Lanark) : I thoroughly agree with the object sought by the hon. member for Dundas, but I am afraid he is trying to make a little political capital out of the utterances of the hon. member for Lambton. That hon. gentleman simply said that an increase of the water power on the Williamsburgh Canal might interfere with its navigation. I for one would not like to see that result, owing to an increase of the water power. The object of the canals was navigation, and that object should not be interfered with for the purpose of building up manufacturing establishments. But I know the canal in question, and the increased water asked for would, on the contrary, improve its navigation. I am of the opinion that Eastern Ontario will be the manufacturing centre of this Dominion, and it should be the object of the Government to do everything in its power to encourage the building of manufacturing establishments in this section. If large manufactures were established in Morinsburgh, they would also be of material assistance to the large factories in the county of Lanark, in so far as procuring skilled operatives is concerned, and would also prevent a large number of operatives from going to the United States. With reference to the general subject of Canals, I may say that the principle object of building the Ottawa Canals was to shorten the water route between Montreal and Chicago by 520 miles. The Culbute was to be one of the canals connecting Georgian Bay with Montreal. At the time that work was projected there was no intention of building the Pacific Railway, but now we have railway communication from Lake Nipissing to Montreal, which is about 100 miles shorter than the river route, the whole usefulness of the Ottawa canals, so far as communication between Chicago and Montreal is concerned, has disappeared. The building of certain dams on the Flat Rapids should be discontinued, owing to the large amount of damage those dams will cause in the future. Instead, therefore, of expending money on this system of canals, I would suggest that it be transferred to the canal of my hon. friend for Dundas, which is a work of vast importance to that part of the country.

MR. WHITE (North Renfrew): The Culbute Canal will give uninterrupted communication for a distance of 120 miles, and I cannot agree with the opinion of the last speaker that it will be of no benefit to the country. The Ottawa River system has already been referred to in the course of the debate, but the hon. Minister did not deem it worth his while to notice the allusions thereto. It is a scheme which ought to receive the careful attention of the Government, but I do not propose to urge that now because I find hon. gentlemen on one side advocating the enlargement of the St. Lawrence and Welland Canals, and others opposed to them urging the total abolition of tolls upon those canals. The expenditure on those works has been \$30,000,000, while the net revenue has been \$3,800,000, or about one-eighth of the total outlay; and it seems to me that when so small a result is attained from so vast an expenditure, it would not be proper to urge the Government to undertake works of the same character. I think the time has arrived when the Government ought to consider whether it may not be well to stay their hands in expenditures on those works on the Welland and the St. Lawrence Canals. I do not urge the stoppage of expenditure absolutely necessary to carry out work already begun, but it would be well for the Government, completing those works, to consider whether it would not be right to defer expenditure for some considerable time further, until we ascertain whether greater results have been obtained from such expenditure than is shown up to the present time. It has been urged that expenditure on these works, although not producing a direct revenue, produced indirect benefits. If that were true, I think the additional expenditure would be justifiable, but when we find that the proportion of grain shipped from Montreal, as compared with the shipments from other North American ports, has declined from 10 per cent. of the whole quantity in 1873 to $5\frac{3}{10}$ per cent. in 1878. During the time that an expenditure of \$15,000,000 was being made on those works, I repeat, in my opinion, it is time the Government should consider well whether it ought not to put a stop to such expenditures altogether.

Mr. MACKENZIE asked for explanations as to the manner under which the contract was let to Mr. McNamee, and with respect to the giving of contracts to parties from whom tenders were not received.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: The original contractors were Messrs. Cooke and Company, from whom the contract was taken. After some time tenders were invited by the late Government for the construction of the work. Tenders were in the office when I became Minister, and the contract was awarded by me to Messrs. McNamee and Company, who were the lowest tenderers. Before signing the contract the Government considered the whole question of expenditure, and decided that, for the present, they would defer entering into these contracts. Consequently, McNamee and Company were notified of that decision, and their deposit was returned. Subsequently, during last Session, it was decided that the works were suffering so much damage that they should be gone on with. A very strong recommendation was made by the Chief Engineer, that very considerable loss would result from their not being proceeded with; that not only would actual expenditure be lost, but damage experienced in connection with the works in their unfinished state. It was decided then that we should proceed with the work, and I took a vote from Parliament for the purpose. McNamee and Company notified the Government that they would not take the work again on the terms of their former tender. Of course we were not in a position to hold them to the tender having returned their deposit. They stated, also, that the work had, in the meantime sustained considerable damage, and we were not in a position to hold them to their contract. In the meantime, Cooke and Company made a strong representation to the Government that their contract had been unfairly taken out of their hands by the late Government, and that they had a very strong and large claim against the Government; and on that ground they also offered to take this work at their former tender and complete it. The Government, in view therefore of the fact that McNamee and Company had withdrawn, and that these parties, whether rightly or wrongly, were urging a claim against us, and the fact that the terms of their contract would be as favourable as we could expect to get the work performed for, informed them that if they were to associate themselves with parties possessed of skill and resources sufficient to warrant the Government in considering the proposition favourably, it should be done. They then submitted the proposition to divide the work into two sections: the canal and the dam and slide. The dam and slide was the part supposed to involve much the greater difficulty. They proposed to transfer it to Messrs. McNamee and Company. The Government sanctioned that proposal, and allowed the work to be divided, but in such a way as to bring the whole contract under the terms of the original contract to Messrs. Cooke and Company; and we found that the prices contained in the original contract or tender with Cooke and Company were lower than those of the next tender to McNamee and Company. We referred the question to the Chief Engineer, who reported strongly against our having anything to do with Cooke and Company. His previous experience with them led to a strong opinion against them as contractors, but his principle objection to our entertaining the proposal to re-let the work to them, and which was a less sum than the next lowest tender was, that their price was altogether inadequate, and that the work could not be performed for that amount. The Government then felt that if they gave sufficient security for the proper performance of the work, they would not be warranted in refusing to grant them the contract on the ground stated by the Chief Engineer, that the contractors were taking it altogether too low. I am glad to be able to state that, having let the work, not by private contract, but under the original contract, and under the lowest we had before us, and when labour was at its very lowest, and, having divided the work in that way, the work has not only progressed most satisfactorily, but the Government have every reason to believe it will be completed within the terms of the contract, and at lower prices than could have been accomplished in any other way. I feel that the course taken by the Government will admit of the most thorough scrutiny at the hands of the hon. gentlemen opposite, and the House.

MR. MACKENZIE: Is this work carried on under the old contract—by the yard?

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: The extension of the work has not been let. The vote taken last year for this service has been expended, so far as any expenditure has been made under the contract made by the hon. gentleman himself.

MR. MACKENZIE No ?

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: Yes; and in precisely the manner in which he made it. Every dollar expended on this work has been spent under the contract made by the late Government. No change has been made, and whatever work has been performed has been strictly in accord with that contract. Mr. Goodwin, the contractor claimed that he was entitled to an extension of his contract on two grounds: First, that this proposed work was an extension and that he had certain claims under the arbitration granted him, Mr. Page being selected as the sole arbitrator, both parties having to abide by the decision.

MR. MACKENZIE: That was not our arrangement.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: The arrangement to have Mr. Page as sole arbitrator was made between the hon. member for Lamiton, as Minister, and the contractor, and sanctioned by the Government of which the hon. gentleman was leader, and the matter stands in this position. Mr. Goodwin says that the work was an extension, being part of unfinished work which he then had, and he offered my predecessor to waive his claims under the arbitration if the extension was given to him. Mr. Goodwin made the same proposal to myself, and I have looked thoroughly into the question—and the legal officers of the Department prepared a general summarised statement of the whole question—and have satisfied myself that the work could not be regarded as an extension of his contract; and that, in the second place, it would be impossible to take it up as a question complicated with any other claims. In the meantime, Mr. Page not being able to prepare the plans and specifications of this work, and settle exactly the alignments of the new work, and the work that was required to be done, until late in the season, and as the work required to be done could be in summer, there was no object in letting the contract until Parliament had again voted the money. I propose, therefore, if this money is voted to advertise the work to public competition, and to obtain its construction precisely the same way as other work.

MR. MACKENZIE: I will ask the hon. gentleman to bring down a memorandum relating to these contracts he refers to, before concurrence is taken, and also the Order in Council of September, 1873, referred to.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: I will place in the hands of the hon. gentleman all the papers relating to the subject.

MR. KILLAM asked was any of this sum to be expended on the Baie Verte Canal scheme.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER said the hon. gentleman and his political friends in Opposition not only withdrew the vote for the Baie Verte Canal, but expended a considerable sum to render the reconsideration of the work impossible so far as they could.

MR. KILLAM said he hoped the hon. the Minister of Railways would laugh at such impossibilities. He had assured his electors that this is one of the works that would be taken up.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER said that if the late Government had proceeded with this work, it might now have been discharging important services to this country.

MR. ANGLIN asked why the Government did not go on with it now.

MR. WHITE (East Hastings): The late Government spent all the money.

MR. PLUMB: Are there not too many deficits.

MR. ANGLIN said that repeated promises and assurances were given by the hon. the Minister of Railways and Canals that this work, which he described as a very important one, would be undertaken; and he did not believe that the people who relied on that hon. Minister would be satisfied with his present assertions or excuses for the postponement of this work. The late Government would have gone on and completed the surveys, but their predecessors rendered that impossible. The matter can be taken up again now, for nothing that was then available has ceased to be available, and everything remains pretty much as it was when the survey was made.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER.

MR. WHITE (East Hastings): The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat was five years the First Commoner of the land, yet during all that time I never heard him utter a syllable about the Baie Verte Canal. Why did not the late hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries get this canal built? Does it not go through part of his county. Surely the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Anglin) ought not to find fault when he knows in his heart that his Government left no money in the Treasury with which the work could be done.

MR. SCHULTZ: I take advantage of the first opportunity I have had this Session, of bringing some of the matters connected with the Department of the Interior before the Committee and the Government. Of these, there is first the very vexatious question of the St. Peter's Reserve, the non settlement of which is damaging to the Indians and others who are upon it, as well as to the settlement of the neighbourhood on all sides. It was understood and believed that the late Minister of the Interior had solved the question by the recognition of all rights claimed in the settlement belt portion of the reserve, and the preserving of the part outside intact for the Indians of the band. I believe that, after a thorough personal investigation, he came to conclusions which it was unfortunate he did not put upon record, but no doubt the evidences which decided him are still on file, and the matter after ten years of vexatious delay should now be finally settled. If the evidence on record is not sufficient, I think it is incumbent on the Department to at once send an agent to take evidence on the spot. Again, Sir, closely bordering on this reserve is another vexed question. Certain lands in the neighbouring parish of St. Clements were, when the Railroad crossing was fixed at Selkirk, expropriated, in so far as notifying the owners of the intention of the Government to take the lands. This, of course, stopped all improvement and forbade all sales; and I am sorry to have to say, because it applies as much to the present as to the late Administration, that not one single penny has been paid to the parties who owned these lands. One of the sufferers in this respect, Mr. James Taylor, has for years been prevented from using his lands. He might have sold at a large price, but could not; he might have built upon and improved the land himself, but dared not; and it is an act of injustice, pure and simple, to allow cases like these to remain unsettled. Something should be done, and at once, especially as the hon. the Minister of Railways has distinctly announced that the crossing might be delayed but was not changed. I am sorry that I have also to call attention to the distribution of the 1,400,000 acres of land given to our half-breed population just ten years ago. What excuse can there possibly be for the delay in the giving to some of them what was guaranteed by Act of Parliament at that time. I said during the last Administration that the delay was unjustifiable; I say now that it is shameful. Give these people what belongs to them. Patent the river lots at once, and without the circumlocution and expense attendant upon the patenting of the outer two miles, and settle all these long delayed matters. I have only one word more to say in connection with the Province, which is to ask the Government and the Committee to remember our large contributions to the Revenue, to remember that we are weak in numbers in this House, and that the necessities of a country new as ours is, is great, and not to grudge these increases in the postal and other services which do so much to develop a new country. Although it is unusual, I have always held that this House should aid our Provincial highways, for reasons I have often before urged, and the present system of municipalities would ensure the certainty of any aid we gave them being expended by them for this purpose in the way most likely to be of service to our people. It should always be remembered, when the expenditure in connection with this Province comes up, that its people have been under a great disadvantage from their want of rail communication till last year. The new settlements have been hemmed in by reserves of all kinds and their development checked, and, although a step has been taken in the direction of the relief of those who have made homesteads on Railway lands, yet the utmost liberality should be shown to them as to all others who are honestly trying to make homes for their own and not for speculative purposes. Lastly, Sir, the question of the Hudson's Bay lands should receive immediate consideration. Settlers who go in in advance of surveys have no guide as to the lands they take, and the present regulations leave them at the mercy of this Corporation if the survey shows them to be on the Hudson's Bay lands. Our Great North-West is now felt to be the hope of the Dominion, and, if we want to allow free play for its destiny, we must avoid all things which will hamper, and do everything which will aid, those who in this new country are helping us to build up our common country.

Mr. PATERSON (South Brant) said, in reference to the contracts for supplies, that formerly the custom had been to ask for contracts for supplies to be delivered at Winnipeg, but this year tenders had been asked requiring the articles to be delivered at the places specified in the advertisement. There were thirty-one different places, separated by hundreds, not a thousand or more miles, and eighty-one different articles to be tendered for. This, he thought, would tend to limit competition in tendering for these supplies, a result which he regarded as very undesirable. Parties desiring to tender in his own city, found it impossible to put in a tender unless they could deliver the supplies at Winnipeg, as heretofore. He desired to hear the reasons of the hon. First Minister for making this change.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said the system had been altered as the hon. gentleman had stated. It was inconvenient to appoint any one place convenient for distributing the articles on account of the vast distances the different points were apart from each other. The working of the system during this year had shown that, by getting satisfactory security for the performance of the contracts, certainty, safety and speed were obtained, and that the articles were delivered on quite as reasonable terms as they were provided last year. He was satisfied it was going to be successful; but if it failed he could revert to the old system.

MR. KIRKPATRICK agreed with the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson). Contractors for the supplies could ascertain the rates of freight from places in the Lower Provinces, or Ontario, or Quebec, to Winnipeg, but beyond Winnipeg they could not. He thought it was better to collect at Winnipeg, or some other point, all the articles for distribution. Every man who tendered to send out each article must add a large percentage to cover the cost of making a separate contract.

MR. PATERSON (South Brant) pointed out that one man tendering for the whole of the articles of one particular class, to be delivered at Winnipeg, would put them in at the lowest figures; there would be one train load to Winnipeg and then at Winnipeg they could be distributed to the different points. He would like to know how many tenders were received in accordance with the terms of tender, and how many offered to tender at Winnipeg. He was told, too, that in one or two cases the contracts had stipulated for articles of American manufacture.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said he could not supply all the information asked for just now, but would do so on concurrence. There was no such stipulation or limitation in regard to American manufactures. With regard to the giving of the contracts for large supplies to one person, so as to enable that person to have an order for a number of articles of the same sort, the Government had to consider only the interest of the public, and the means of securing speed, economy, and the smallest possible risk. As to having one point from which to distribute the articles, it was out of the question, on account of the different points being so widely separated. The hon. gentleman does not understand the geography of the country. He has lost all sense of distance in making that suggestion. The harness contract for Edmonton and St. Albans, at the very extremity, you may say, of that region, is furnished by Ontario men from Hamilton.

MR. ANGLIN: It is desirable that we should have more information in regard to the farm teachers. I think a great many hon. members would like to know how this experiment is being carried out.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: The farm instructors were only sent out this year, and are just at the commencement of their labours. The farm building is put on an unsurveyed lot on the outside of the reserve, so that the farm will not belong to the Indians, but to the Government. The Farm Instructor will, of course, help to support himself, by cultivating the lot assigned to him. He will see the Indians at their work; point out the best way of breaking up the soil, ploughing, reaping, etc. I hope next year substantial proof will appear of the worth of this experiment. Mr. Dewdney, who has charge as Commissioner, will be able to transmit for Parliament next Session a full account from each reserve of the progress of the Indians, and of the success or ill-success of the scheme.

MR. ANGLIN: Is any attempt being made to assign to each Indian family special portion of land, or is the reserve to be held in common?

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: The reserves are held by the Indians in common, but by arrangement among themselves the different families have their own houses. By degrees, probably they will own the houses and the ground, but the title is in the Crown as trustee. The general principle of all the Indian laws has been to give the Indians the feelings of proprietorship, by letting each have his own house and a piece of ground to cultivate as his own. Although the experiment to get them to enfranchise themselves has not fructified very greatly, yet that operation, I believe, is still going slowly on. As a rule, the Indian prefers to remain a member of his band—to be under the tutelage of the Government, rather than to walk alone as white men do. How to get the Indian to become a freeholder, and enjoy the privileges of civilised life, seems a question almost impossible of solution. But that object will be constantly kept in view by the Government.

173 Surveys of Indian Reserves $15,000

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said the surveys are still going on. As the Indians come in and agree to settle, the lands will be surveyed or them. There are a great many lands scattered over that vast country who have not yet come in.

174 Wages of Farmers and their Assistants $36,430

In reply to Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT,

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: There are two Government farmers at $730; ten assistants at $420, seventeen farmers at $730; fifty-one assistants at $360—in all making $36,430.

MR. ROYAL: I believe those farm instructors, appointed as they are, and having no immediate nor consistent supervision of any of the officers of the Department in the North-West Territories, are pretty much left to themselves, or to the instructions from Ottawa. They are like an imperium in imperio, and rather left to follow their own ideas in dealing with the Indians. The agents of the Department follow their instructions, and know to what extent, dealing with the Indians, they may go beyond them. The farm instructors may be very good, but there may be danger of their authority or efforts to civilise the Indians clashing with those of the agents. I do not believe, in the appointment of those instructors, that every consideration was given to the nature, or, perhaps, to the religion of the Indians. The instructors, to some extent, feed the Indians with whom they are in daily contact, and have much influence over them, and I believe that branch of the Department ought to be connected in such a manner with head-quarters as to have those instructors placed under more immediate and strict supervision of some officers, Indian agents or others. I understand new appointments will be made, and hope we shall not see the same similarity in the names or place of origin of the appointees, that we notice in the present list. Complaints have been made on this score which will doubtless receive the attention of the Government. These officers ought to be married men, and well known by their moderation of ideas.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Those farm instructors are not altogether independent of the Indian agents, who are the chief officers in their own divisions. They will have a general supervision over the farm instructors. Besides there is an inspector of those instructors appointed, Mr. Wadsworth, a most valuable and able man, I believe. He is to visit every farm and see how the instructors attend to their duties, and report them if inefficient. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Royal) speaks about the origin of those instructors. There are few French names on the list. We should have been glad last year to get some instructors from Lower Canada, but applications were not made till late in the season. I shall see to the selection of instructors willing to go from Quebec. Experience will show we ought to get, in future, farm instructors who have some experience in the North-West, if possible. The persons already selected were believed to understand their business, that being the first requisite. After a while some of them got dissatisfied and desired to resign; so we have all the trouble and expense of sending men to the North-West who soon go into other business. As much as possible hereafter, we shall select instructors who understand the country and the ways of the Indians.

MR. ROYAL: I regret that in the appointments made, for the benefit of the North-West Indians, of officers placed in connection with the Indians, not enough regard has been paid to the half-breed population. Now, with respect to these farm instructors I see there is only one half-breed appointed, Mr. Setter, of St. Andrew's. I am sure that if the Government had taken time to enquire, they could have selected from various parts of Manitoba a good number of farm instructors whose language and whose relations with the Indians, render them peculiarly efficient in that occupation. As far as farming qualities or teaching qualities are concerned, I believe the Government could have selected many half-breeds, just as good persons for farm instructors, as any of those they have appointed. More than one advantage would have been derived from such appointments. There is a feeling in the community of half-breeds, who were the first settlers of the country that they are completely excluded from the offices of the Government. There is as much intelligence, proportionately speaking, among the half-breeds as amongst any other class of the population, and they are peculiarly adapted for dealing with the Indians, being related to them in language, and in many cases by ties of consanguinity. If this were done, we would have less trouble with the Indians, and our expenses in that direction would be reduced.

In reply to Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT,

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said there would be nineteen farms opposite the two Government farms.

175 Sioux in Manitoba and North-West.....	$7,000
176 Buildings for Commissioner, house, office and storehouse.....	12,000

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: This vote is taken for the purpose of providing a residence and office for the Indian Superintendent, and also for the land office. It is supposed that by another year land in that quarter will be all taken up, and Winnipeg will not be the best place for the head-quarters of the chief land agency. The Government have not selected any place as yet, but this is a vote simply to build at such place as may be fixed upon. It is important that this place should be somewhere on the line of Railway or near it. At the same place it is proposed to have the head-quarters of the Mounted Police. They are scattered all over the Territory, and although their distribution might have been well enough at one time, it is found to be not altogether satisfactory, and there is a great want of discipline from their being so much scattered. They are stationed all along from Fort McLeod and Fort Walsh to the foot of the Rocky Mountains. In case of trouble, the great mass of the Indians are between the posts as now stationed, and these police are designed to protect the population that is going in there. We do not expect any outbreak among the Indians, but the force is there for the purpose of putting it down should any occur. It has been suggested that near the Touchwood Hills would be the best place for the Chief of the Force to be stationed. It is in contemplation to repair and refit the buildings at Fort Pelly for that purpose. The Superintendent has been there ever since he was appointed. He went there in May last, passing by Fort Benton, and examining all the posts in the vicinity. He went over a great portion of that country, and returned here during the present winter to confer with the Department. By the terms of his appointment, he must be a resident in the Territory.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Hon. gentlemen will see that here we have effected a very considerable saving. The pay of the men has been diminished without in any way affecting the efficiency of the Force. The pay was too good, and too many young gentlemen got into the Force who were above their business. We found it infinitely better to get farmers' sons able and willing to work. The farms around the stations, I am afraid, have not been very successful. One of the most disheartening circumstances connected with this subject is the high price of forage, but it is hoped that the removal of the headquarters from the frontier will remove, to a certain extent, this difficulty and enable the men to obtain supplies from the settlers going into the country.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said, there was no danger of the men being blockaded in their posts and the posts, were made depots for provisions for the relief of famine-stricken Indians. The average cost for each man and horse was $1,000 per annum. The present estimate was based on the calculation of $860 for man and horse, the pay of the men being 40c. per day.

MR. ROYAL: The other day, upon a motion that I made with respect to papers to be supplied to this House, in connection with this, I stated some facts with great reluctance. It is my duty, however painful, to impart to this House the information that came into my possession in regard to the various services of these Territories, and more especially concerning the North-West Mounted Police. I know very well that the Force being scattered over large distances is a reason why there should be some lack of discipline or want of proper authority. Of course our administration of the North-West Territories is rather experimental, and we have to pay for our own experience; but I believe that whenever there is a fault, a remedy should be brought to it. We ought to know all about our Police Force in the North-West, and what reliance can be placed in that Force in case of an emergency. I will read the notes of a person who has visited the various forts occupied by the North-West Mounted Police Force during the last fall. We will see whether that force can sustain the first efforts of the enemy, and how long they could stand being attacked, and what efficiency there is in the Force. [Letter read giving a very good account of the position of the forts, accoutrements, ammunition, arms, horses, saddlery, discipline and behaviour of the Force towards the Indians and half-breeds.] I will now read an extract from a newspaper published in Winnipeg on the 10th March. [Extract read.] A great part of this is unfortunately owing to the conduct of the men in our pay. A few days later the Winnipeg Times published an article from which I will read extracts. [Extracts read.] Painful as such utterances are on my part, because they are against a force whose object was to protect the Indian and keep the "fire water" away from him, it becomes my duty to make them. I have stated those facts from my place in the House. I have read notes taken by a perfectly disinterested gentleman, who saw things from a truly Canadian point of view. This is no charge against the Government, because those abuses were in existence before they came into power. I do not blame any Government for their existence, but I have simply placed before the House the facts which have come into my possession in regard to this subject, and which may well induce the Government to make a change into the system of that Force, and have a small military force under strict discipline instead of what we have now, cost so much and do so little good.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: That is rather a formidable indictment against the Mounted Police. I do not know who the person is, but if he is truly a Canadian he ought to sign his name to the document, and give the information on his responsibility to the Government, in order that the faults of which he has complained should be remedied. I may say that I do not believe one-half of the statement; I do not believe it is true. I am quite satisfied it is not true. At the same time I may say that I do not think the Force is in so satisfactory a state as it ought to be. It is too much scattered. The points were chosen years and years ago, when the Force was first sent out to meet the supposed exigencies of that time. Everybody knows that troops degenerate in discipline when they are not under sufficient check. The great fault has been that the officers have not been removed. Both officers and men have lived at the same points year after year, and some of the officers, especially those of a commercial or speculative turn of mind, have been employing themselves looking after herds of cattle, etc., and have thrown off the soldier too much to indulge in such pursuits. It is proposed to keep the men together in the future by means of larger head-quarters, and different posts at which small bodies of men may be kept. They should, however, be removed every year, except, perhaps, some of the leading men, such as the Commissioner and Assistant-Commissioner, who, one or both may, perhaps, be at head-quarters permanently. In regard to the supplies, it is true that the arms of the men are not uniform. Different descriptions of arms were sent out, but they are all efficient weapons. When there are changes we can secure uniformity in that respect; but so long as the arms they have got are sufficient for any purpose, there is no use in going to the expense of setting aside the present arms for new. They have got several descriptions of carbines, including the Snider, and 100 Spencer rifles. It was found the Indians were armed with repeating rifles, which I suppose is the reason for their being supplied to the Force. I think the Force has not been kept up to the mark, but every attempt will be made to improve its discipline and efficiency. Some examples may be made for any gross dereliction of duty, as to the general charge of immorality as regards the dealings of members of the Force with Indian women. I hope the stories are grossly exaggerated. With any force of 300 young men, there would be cases of immorality, but every effort should be made to restrict the evil. I believe great success has attended the efforts of the Force to keep out ardent spirits, in the absence of which some people have been taking themselves to Painkiller and Eau de Cologne, but of course that cannot be prevented. Such beverages will not likely tempt a body of troops, who are scattered over a territory in small bodies, and can in no way obstruct the settlement, there being no settlers at many of their stations.

MR. DAWSON: I may say of the Indians generally, all over the continent, in their native state, and before the whites came among them, that they have been a very moral people. Their irregularities described are probably due to the presence of immoral whites. The Indians are generally moral, orderly and well behaved.

Vote agreed to.

Resolutions ordered to be reported.

THE OPPOSITION LEADERSHIP.

MR. MACKENZIE: I desire to say a word or two with regard to my personal relations to the House. I, yesterday, determined to withdraw from the position as leader of the Opposition, and for this time forth I will speak and act for no person but myself.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Of course we, on this side of the House, have nothing to say to such a decision. But all I can say is that I hope the hon. gentleman who takes the place of the hon. member for Lambton and his party, will display the same ability, earnestness and zeal for what he thinks and believes to be for the good of the country as have been displayed by my hon. friend who has just taken his seat.

ESQUIMALT GRAVING DOCK. COMMUNICATION.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY communicated to the House—

That on a Report dated the 11th February, 1880, from the hon. the Minister of Finance, stating that he has had under consideration Despatches received from the Lieutenant-Governor of British Columbia on the subject of the advances proposed to be made by the Dominion Government for the construction of the Graving Dock at Esquimalt, and that in order to arrive at a settlement of the question, he has had several interviews with the hon. the Attorney-General of the Province, who has been deputed to confer with the Dominion Government in connection with the same subject.

The Minister states, that he has given the subject his most careful consideration, and that in his opinion it is desirable to modify the Order in Council of the 13th November last, and to submit one in accordance with certain provisions and conditions set forth in his Report, hereto attached.

The Committee recommend that the said Report be approved and acted upon, and that copies of this Minute be transmitted to the Right Hon. the Secretary of State for the Colonies, and to the Lieutenant-Governor of British Columbia.

Approved, February 12th, 1880.

REPORTING OF THE DEBATES.

COMMITTEE'S REPORT CONCURRED IN.

MR. STEPHENSON moved that the Third Report of the Select Committee, appointed to supervise the Official Report of the Debates of this House during this present Session, be concurred in.

MR. BLAKE: Is that the Report about the new system?

MR. STEPHENSON: Yes. I may state that the Committee, after a great deal of consideration, arrived at this conclusion. The reports do not give satisfaction, as they are made at present, to the members, and we concluded this was a better plan to adopt. It involves about the same expenditure as that incurred at present, and the reporters, being under the direct control of the House, would do their work more efficiently and the reports would be more satisfactory. So far as the printing is concerned, we propose to adhere to the present plan and have that done by tender and public competition. After mature consideration we propose to adopt this plan also as an experiment.

MR. BLAKE: How is it proposed to appoint the reporters?

MR. STEPHENSON: They will be appointed by the Committee, of course to be approved by the House.

MR. BLAKE: Does the hon. gentleman think there is now time enough to obtain tenders for the other things?

MR. STEPHENSON: Yes; that was our object in presenting the Report as early as we have done, thinking we could make arrangements before the close of the Session to secure an efficient staff of reporters, and also securing the printing by contract.

MR. JONES: I think the way in which the reporting is done at present is a great mistake, for it undoubtedly causes long speeches to be made in the House. The system of sending back speeches to members to eliminate or change what they may not like, is a wrong one. If the speeches are to be reported they should be reported verbatim et literatim. If that were done, we would not have those long speeches to which we have to listen, and which are sometimes quite unnecessary. I think there should be a change. I do not think it is right that a member on the floor, when he has given his sentiments in the heat of the debate, should be allowed some four or five days afterwards to eliminate what he has said from his speech, and what he believes to be the truth. I think some change should be made, because I know perfectly well that very important remarks made in this House and reported in the newspapers have been eliminated from the Hansard. The system is wrong. The Official Report should be done away with, or the speeches reported verbatim et literatim. In that case we should not have so many speeches, of so little value, at great expense to the country. I shall gladly support any motion that will tend to that result.

MR. STEPHENSON: The object of the Committee in making this recommendation was that the very next day members should have the report of their speeches laid on their desks in broadsheet form. They should then be allowed three days for revision. The objection mentioned by the hon. member for South Leeds (Mr. Jones) was considered in the Committee, and the impression that prevailed was, that the fault does not so much lie with the reporters as with hon. members themselves; they are the chief offenders. If the reporters were allowed to take down the reports verbatim, and have them printed in that form, we could have the edition issued much earlier than at present. But when members feel that they have the privilege of making extensive alterations, as at present, delays may naturally be expected. Members ought not to interfere with the reporters, and it is necessary that the reporters should be made responsible to somebody, and that somebody should be made responsible for what they do. Holding these views, the Committee desire the existing system changed, and the reporters made servants of the House. We propose this arrangement with the view to meeting the objection mentioned. It is an experiment and we have either to adopt it and give it a fair trial, or resolve on the other plan of doing away with official reporting altogether. A great many members do not feel disposed to do away with it; and I think we might adopt a system that has proved successful elsewhere. We think this system could be worked out successfully, at all events it is worth a trial; and we present it to the House for consideration with a view to having it worked out in the best possible way.

MR. VALLÉE said the Hansard was not a faithful report of the Debates in this House. If that was so to what end was it published? He believed that it was perfectly useless to devote so large a sum to the publication of the Debates when they were not faithfully reported. Either the Debates must be reported as they were delivered in the House, or the Hansard must be published in some other manner, and members must rely on the press of the country. He, for one, was in favour of the abolition of the Hansard. He considered that the sum paid each year for the publication of the Debates of this House was uselessly expended, because it did not serve to procure them a correct account of what passed in the House. He thought they ought rather to give a certain sum to the journals of each party, in order to engage them to reproduce what each member of each party said in the House.

MR. BLAKE: I was one of those who supported the proposition for a Hansard when it was first mooted, and warmly opposed the theoretical objection that was then made that it would prolong the debates of the House. I did not believe that would be the result, because my opinion was that, if any hon. gentleman desired to attain and retain a place of consideration in this House, he would soon learn that it was not by making long speeches. I was of the opinion, as I expressed it then, that the inducement to make long speeches, which was afforded by the publication of the Hansard, would not be strong enough to overhear that consideration to which I have referred. I must confess that experience has not wholly justified my views, and I do believe that a good many protracted speeches are made now which would not have been made or, at any rate, protracted to such an extent, if it had not been for the fact of a system of official reporting. I have, therefore, for some time wavered in the opinion that, on the whole, it was conducive to the discharge of the business of this House that we should have this system. I feel the very great difficulties under which we labour, which are unseparable from holding the seat of Government in this place. The principle newspapers of the country are published far from the scene of our debates, and it is perfectly impossible for them to report our speeches even at reasonable length, as a rule, and more particularly when the Session gets to the heat of its business, with discussions taking place at a late hour. That state of things would continue if the Hansard were abolished. But I believe that the evil to which I have referred, is a growing evil, and that we may expect, from year to year, speeches to be made which would not have been made if not for the publishing of the Official Report. It is confessed the present system has not been successful, the complaints made every Session are that the contract system has not been working very satisfactorily. An experiment is now proposed to be tried, and for my part, I am not indisposed to assent to the Report, if no adverse motion with reference to it is made. We shall see what the result of the new plan will be. But I say, frankly, that unless there is a very great improvement under that new scheme in the result as to the reports of the debates, and unless I find that the evil to which I have referred diminishes instead of increasing, as at present, I shall not be, the Session after next, an advocate for the continuance of the Hansard.

MR. CASEY: The hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) has pointed out a real evil in connection with Hansard, that it leads, occasionally, to undue verbosity. It is quite possible, on the other hand, that the Hansard, which secures the reporting and publishing of the speeches in this House may, at times, secure a due discussion of questions that otherwise might not be duly discussed. Of course we all know that what is said in the House is intended to influence public opinion outside of it as well as hon. members. As to this reporting scheme, as a whole, there may be differences of opinion, but I think there can be none as to the desirability of having proof-sheets of our speeches the day after they are made. But, as to making the reporters servants of the House and country, I feel considerable doubt. In the first place, I fear they would simply be an addition to the Sessional staff, and it is possible that political influence might have as much to do with their appointment as efficiency, which might produce serious inconvenience. In the second place, I am informed by practical men, that it would be scarcely possible to have what is proposed done, with only the staff proposed. The Government or House of Commons rarely gets as much work from its employés as a private contractor would; so it is not likely that they will get this reporting done as economically as a private contractor could. On the whole, the chances are that it would be cheaper to contract with some person for the reporting en bloc, than have it done by our own officials. If it is determined to have more work done than now—and this scheme involves it—the cost will be greater. I think it would be much wiser to ask tenders on the basis of such extra work. These tenders should be asked for now, leaving the rest of the scheme over for some time. I am informed that the Committee requested the present contractor to draw up a detailed scheme for their information, which he did. I am not aware whether they have fully considered it. I see they have made no allusion to it. I think this information would be of use to the House as well as to the Committee in considering the question, and that it ought to be laid before us. I think it would be well to postpone that part of the Report recommending that the reporters be employed and paid by the House till next Session.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell): I think that the experience in regard to the Hansard has been, on the whole, satisfactory, although some difficulties have been experienced in the working of the system, and one of the chief has been referred to by the hon. member for South Leeds. The object of this Report, as I understand, is to do away with those difficulties. Every member who speaks in the House, under the new system, will not have an opportunity of revising his speech until it appears in the papers, and every member has had a copy laid on his desk. Therefore, any changes made afterwards anything that was said being struck out by the hon. member, who would have desired not to have said it, could be contrasted with the printed evidence or report on the Table. This seems to be a matter of very great consequence. No doubt a very great evil has arisen from the tendency on the part of some members, in revising their speeches, to forget that the privilege of revision does not include the privilege of excluding anything, which, having said, they may desire not to have said. In my own case, I was led into an error which I would have been glad to exclude from the Hansard. I did exclude it from the journal with which I have been connected, but did not exclude it from the Hansard, for the reason that its having been commented objectionably upon, I had no right to exclude it from this record. What we want is a record of what is actually said in Parliament, not a record of the afterthought of members who may not have spoken as they desired to speak. Then there is another feature with regard to the Hansard itself. We cannot hope to have full reports of Parliament in the newspapers. That is simply impossible. We may have the speeches of leading members; those who occupy prominent positions on either side of the House will always have their speeches reported in the newspapers with tolerable accuracy and fullness. But a newspaper cannot hold a full report, and it means simply this; that speeches quite as valuable as those of the leading members on the Ministerial or Opposition benches, but delivered by hon. gentlemen who are not in the habit of addressing the House, are not reported at all. They are lost to their constituents, and they are lost to the country. Therefore, it seems to me important that an Official Record of this kind should be kept up for that purpose. As to the tendency of Hansard to induce long debates, anyone who looks back to the Parliamentary history of Canada will remember a great deal longer speeches some years ago than we have now. I can remember very well when a prominent gentleman in this country, who was a member of this House, used to speak from five to seven hours, and many other members addressed the House at great length. Those speeches were always reported in full. It seems to me that this change is worth trying, at any rate. It is worth an effort to see whether we cannot get an Official Report, which will really be a Report of what is said in Parliament; and if we can do that under this system for one Session, then I think we will have accomplished something worth the money which is expended on the Hansard.

Mr. PLUMB: Every hon. gentleman who is in the habit of addressing the House, will feel that it will a great relief to him to have a plan adopted which will lead to the improvement of the Reports of the Official Debates. No doubt these Reports are necessary, and the idea that they tend to increase the length of speeches, I think, is an entire mistake. What we desire is, as far as possible, such a Report as will relieve us from the difficulty of endeavouring to grope our way through the reporters' manuscript to make out what we have said, and to try to find out what our meaning was from the notes which are sent to us, which are often obscure, and seem to have been taken hurriedly. These Reports have been, I regret to say, this year, very imperfect. I have found, and I presume every hon. gentleman has found, who has revised those notes, that he was obliged to exercise his utmost skill in endeavoring to discover how it happens that the reporter put into his mouth exactly the opposite of what he intended to say; and this may lead to an enormous abuse, that of permitting extensive alterations, an abuse which I presume everybody desires to prevent. I trust that if the system is continued, it will be the decision of the House to secure the very best talent, to have the Reports promptly made, and to have them published in the way the Chairman of the Printing Committee suggested, which, I think, is the true way, and then the members will be permitted to make such revisions as are necessary to convey their true meaning. For one, I believe the mode which has been suggested is in the right direction, and that the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) is quite mistaken when he supposes that we will achieve that which we desire to achieve by making a contract at all. I think the staff should be under the control of the House. I trust that next year we shall have a thorough reform in the reporting of the Debates. My remarks have been made not with any feeling of unkindness towards the reporters. On the contrary, I think they have been over-tasked, and I think many of the complaints have arisen from the fact that the arrangements, and not the reporters, were at fault; but I feel bound, in all candour, to state that I would rather see the system of official reporting abolished altogether, than see it carried on hereafter as it has been this Session.

MR. ROSS (West Middlesex) : One of the greatest faults of the old contract system was that the contractor having a lump sum for the reporting, a special inducement was held out to him to secure cheap men, or pay a low rate for the reporting. Consequently, it sometimes happened that the staff was not composed of the best men to be found in that profession. Under the new system we have fixed the minimum salary at $1,000, and a salary of $1,500 for the chief, believing that at these figures, we can get the best talent and the most experienced stencographers in the country. Their being officers of the House will give dignity as well as permanency to their employment, which will dispose these gentlemen to make it their ambition to qualify themselves as thoroughly as possible for their work, to remain a number of years in the service, and by their experience, if by no other means, secure that efficiency which will qualify them for the discharge of their duty well. It is the system which was adopted many years ago in the United States. The reporters there are permanent officers, and I think the chief reporter at Washington was once a reporter in the gallery of our own House, and he receives a very liberal salary. Under their system, of course, it is much easier to report their debates than ours. Still, I believe a staff of six will be able to give us a full enough report of our Debates, will secure us more accurate reports than we have already yet secured, and make the Official Report of the debates more satisfactory and more reliable than they have been under the old system. It is useless to prolong the debate, but I am glad to see that the sense of the House, as far as yet expressed, concurs in the Report of the Committee. I hope that before the House rises the whole system will be put on a satisfactory basis.

Motion agreed to and Report concurred in.

BILL WITHDRAWN.

The following Bill was, with leave of the House, withdrawn :—

Bill (No. 66) To incorporate the Quebec and Ontario Railway Company.—(Mr. Domville).

Ordered, that the fees paid on the said Bill, less the cost of printing and translation, be refunded, in accordance with the recommendation of the Select Standing Committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraph lines.—(Mr. Domville).

BILL INTRODUCED.

The following Bill was introduced and read the first time:—

Bill (No. 117) To repeal the Act 42 Vic., cap. 5, for granting an annual subsidy towards certain telegraphic communication.—(Mr. Langevin).

KING'S COUNTY, N.S.—GASPEREAUX RIVER FISHERIES.

QUESTION.

MR. BORDEN enquired, Whether the Government has received any communication from the Municipal Council of King's County, N.S., alleging the injurious effect upon the Fisheries of the Gasperaux River of a certain mill dam situated thereon, and asking the interference of the Government to protect said Fisheries; and what action, if any, the Government has taken or intends to take in the matter?

MR. POPE (P. E. I.): In reply to the hon. gentleman I desire to say that a petition, complaining of the injurious effects of this dam and asking for its removal, has been received, and that such steps as may be deemed necessary to the protection of the Fisheries will be taken in the matter.

MANITOBA TICKET AGENCIES.

QUESTION.

MR. BOURBEAU enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to come to an arrangement with the Railway and Navigation Companies, for the establishment, in the country parts of Canada, of agencies for the sale of tickets to Manitoba; which would be of great advantage to those intending to emigrate to the North-West, and would assist in preventing the emigration now directed towards the United States?

SIR CHARLES TUPPER said it was not thought necessary to take any special measures for establishing such agencies.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY STOCK ON THE LEVIS AND KENNEBEC RAILWAY.

QUESTION.

MR. LAURIER enquired, Is it with the consent of the Government that a certain quantity of the rolling-stock of the Intercolonial Railway is now used by a certain company styling itself the

"Lévis and Kennebec Railway Company," on the line of the Lévis and Kennebec Railway; if so, what quantity and description of stock is the said company so using, for what time, and on what conditions?

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: None of the Intercolonial Railway rolling-stock is used by the Lévis and Kennebec Railway in any other way than rolling-stock is used by other railways, that is, in the way of the usual interchange of cars under the ordinary mileage terms.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND—SUPREME COURT JUDGES' SALARIES.

REMARKS.

Order for the House to again Resolve itself into Committee of Supply, read.

MR. BRECKEN: Mr. Speaker, before you leave the Chair, I wish to call the attention of the House to the position occupied by the Judges of the Supreme Court of Prince Edward Island. The salaries of the Judges on Prince Edward Island entering the Union were as follows: Chief Justice, $3,000; Assistant Judge and Master of the Rolls, $2,500; Assistant Judge and Vice-Chancellor, $2,500, and the usual allowances for travelling expenses, namely, $200 a year. I consider that this arrangement is nothing more or less than an unmerited slight cast on our Judges. On the the score of legal attainments and ability, I think our Judges will compare very favourably with the Judges in many parts of the Dominion. The nature and character of the causes that come before our Supreme Court are very frequently as difficult and intricate as those which engage the attention of the Courts in other parts of the Dominion. Our Judges require to be learned and upright men; and although our Province is small in area, it is the most densely populated Province in the Dominion. I do not contend that our Judges should receive salaries equal to those paid to the Supreme Court Judges of the larger Provinces of Ontario and Quebec, but I would like to be informed by those who fixed the salaries of the Prince Edward Island Judges, upon what basis they acted. It certainly could not have been that our Bench is inferior to that of the other Maritime Provinces, or to that of British Columbia or Manitoba.

The business which engages the time of our Supreme Court, I venture to say, is much more difficult, and requires as much, if not a greater, amount of legal talent to dispose of them properly than is required to dispose of suits in those far distant Provinces. If population was the basis, then we have been most unjustly treated. At the last Census, in 1871, Prince Edward Island had a population of 90,021. Our Chief Justice receives $3,000; Puisne Judges, $2,500. At the last Census we had a population of 94,021. The decade has nearly passed, and when the Census is taken next year, it will be found that we have a population of over 100,000, and allow me to assure this House that our people are as intelligent and well educated. We are not like our British Columbian friends, we have very few Indians. When I look at British Columbia with its 50,000 white population, and Manitoba with its 11,853 white people, and when I reflect that the Chief Justice of British Columbia receives $5,000, and two Puisne or Assistant Judges, $4,000 each, and that in Manitoba the Bench are paid at the same rate, I think, Mr. Speaker, that I have just cause to complain of the gross injustice that is being done to Prince Edward Island. I claim that our Judges should be paid at the same rate as the Judges of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, they are as hard worked. The Judges of the two last named are paid as follows: Chief Justice, $5,000; each Puisne Judge, $4,000; Equity Judge, $5,000. The cost of living has, of late years, much increased on the Island, and I assure you it is hard work for our Judges to live and maintain their dignity in a manner becoming their position in the community. I know that the present Government are not responsible for placing these salaries at such a small amount. I appeal with confidence to the right hon. the leader of Government and his colleagues to put this matter right. All I ask for is justice.

MR. DOMVILLE: I think I have as much reason to complain as the hon. gentleman. I have about one-third as many people in my county as he has got in his whole Province, and yet we have no Lieutenant-Governor, Upper or Lower House, and no member of the House of Commons besides myself. I have not, so far, obtained any large concessions for my county, but I trust that when the hon. gentleman brings his many complaints before the Government, in regard to the Island, he will remember King's County.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I think King's County should be satisfied with having my hon. friend instead of all the officials mentioned. I will not enter into a discussion of this subject at this period of the Session. It was before the House last Session and during the previous Parliament; but I think the time has come, or is approaching, when the whole question of legal salaries will be reconsidered. It is the intention of the Government during the Recess to consider the whole question of judicial salaries, not only those of the Supreme Court Judges, but of all the tribunals whose Judges are appointed by the Dominion Government, with a view to laying down some general principles and submitting it to the consideration of Parliament, next Session. In such case the claims of the Judges of the Superior Courts of Prince Edward Island will, of course, be fully considered. I can say no more at present. Although the Province is small, the dignity, responsibility and rank of its Judges are the same as those of other parts of the Dominion. But the question of salary, and the question of rank and position are two separate and distinct propositions, and have to be considered from altogether a different point of view. I shall be glad if the result of our consideration will be to meet the views of my hon. friend, and to increase the salaries of the Superior Court Judges of Prince Edward Island.

MR. BLAKE: I was not personally responsible for the action of the late Government in fixing the salaries of the Judges, but it was my duty to defend that proposition in subsequent Sessions, and I do not think the hon. member put the question entirely and fairly before the House, when he stated a slight had been offered to Prince Edward Island. It is necessary, in the present state of the case, that this question should be restated. As I have had occasion before to state, you must, in the public interest, pay such salaries as will enable us to acquire the best material to make judges of. The question is: What salary is requisite to bring to the Bench the material best adapted to fill those situations. In all countries it is found that the dignity, the relief, the ease and the security of the position, coupled with the very serious advantage of a retiring allowance after a reasonable term of service, suffice to enable Governments to obtain from the Bar men whose professional incomes average larger than the salary they receive on going on the Bench. The scale of professional emoluments varies in different Provinces in accordance with the character of the transactions which enter into litigation, the general habits of the people, and the general expenses of living. Consequently we have always more or less to consider these matters, when we are fixing what shall be the fair salary of a Judge. I disagree altogether with the view—and I understand the hon. the First Minister to disagree with it—that any slight was offered to any Province or to the judicial official of any Province because his salary was placed at a lower grade than the salary of an analogous official in another Province. His dignity may be the same, his rank may be the same, and the duties he has to perform may be relatively the same, but the price to be paid for his services is to be governed by those considerations to which I have alluded. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Brecken) alleges that a slight has been offered to Prince Edward Island because the salary since Confederation has been fixed at $3,000. Just before Confederation, the Legislature of Prince Edward Island had relieved its Supreme Court Judges of a very considerable portion of their duties, and imposed upon the Dominion a considerable additional annual charge, by creating no less than three County Court Judges—creating them in anticipation of the Union, and because the salaries would afterwards be paid here and not by the Island. Therefore, the Supreme Court Judges had less duties to discharge than formerly. The Legislature of the Province, when there was that happy combination of responsibility involved in the right to appoint, and the payment being invested in the same persons, had fixed the salaries of those high judicial officers at what they thought was necessary. I think the salary of the Chief Justice was $1,900 a year. His duties were very much diminished, as I have pointed out, and yet he is positively insulted because the Parliament of Canada raised his salary from $1,900 to $3,000. I do not mean to say that it would not be proper to raise those salaries consistently with the principles which I have just sketched, because the expenses of living may have increased very much on the Island. If that is the case, however, the hon. gentleman has lent his powerful assistance in bringing about that result, and it may be necessary that the salaries of the Judges and their officers should be considered in regard to the changed circumstances of the Province. But it may be rather hard for us to be told by my hon. friend, when he has helped to impose upon the country and his own people additional cost of living, that the country is, therefore, to increase the salaries in order that the increased cost of living may be borne. Before Confederation, the salaries in Prince Edward Island were fixed with a due regard to frugality. The Attorney-General received $2,000, and the Premier, I think, got $650 a year. I merely state that to show that formerly in that Province the officials did not require such large salaries to enable them to live comfortably and happily. It is since that time circumstances have occurred to alter the scale of living or professional emoluments, to change those circumstances to which I have referred as governing judicial salaries. I do not see any reason why those salaries should be increased. I object to the view that, because British Columbia or Manitoba are extremely expensive Provinces to live in and larger salaries are needed, we should apply the same scale of salaries to other Provinces. In Ontario and Quebec where professional emoluments are much larger, a larger salary is required to get fit men from the Bar to become Judges, but no country should fix the salaries of Judges at a less price, having regard to the circumstances of the country, than will secure fit and able men for judicial positions.

MR. BRECKEN: Perhaps the House will allow me one or two words in explanation of the remarks which have fallen from the hon. member for West Durham. The hon. gentleman is in error in thinking that the duties performed by the County Court Judges were taken from the shoulders of the Supreme Court Judges. Before the County Courts were established, we had Courts of Commissioners for the collection of small debts. The Island was divided into small districts, and four or five laymen constituted the Bench in each case. Naturally, the jurisdiction of the County Courts was much larger than the jurisdiction of those lay Commissioners, but ninety-nine cases out of 100 brought before the County Courts are cases which would have been brought before the Commissioners. It is a delusion to think that the duties of the Supreme Court have been lightened since the constitution of those Courts. But why should we not have County Courts as well as the rest of the Dominion? One of the main arguments used when we were asked to come into the Union was that we would become a part of this great Dominion, and enjoy all the benefits and privileges of its great institutions, and now we are taunted with not having remained in the state of primitive simplicity in which we were before. Allusion has been made to the salary of the Chief Justice. Previous to our enjoying Responsible Government our Chief Justice was paid from England, and was in receipt of £1,100 a year. In 1851, Responsible Government was introduced to the Island, and popular rights were advocated for the first time, and one of the planks of the platform was, that public men should serve their country for a shilling a day and find themselves. That was one of the main reasons why the salaries were fixed so small. I believe in the principle that has always been advocated in England that, if any class of public servants should be independent and placed above suspicion and temptation, it is the Judges of the Supreme Court. They have to decide upon the dearest and most highly-prized rights of our fellow beings. The lives and property of men are at their disposal, and hang upon their breath. It is not the amount of labour, or the length of the docket, but the amount of legal lore they ought to possess, that should be taken into account in fixing the salaries; and to give those Judges $3,000 a year is to cast an insult and slight upon the intelligence of the Province I come from. The hon. member for West Durham has mysteriously hinted that I have had something to do with the increase in the cost of living in Prince Edward Island. Our complaint is that the National Policy, to which the hon. gentleman undoubtedly alluded, has not done us much harm, but it has not done us much good. We have not derived the benefits from it that our friends from Upper Canada have derived. The National Policy is not injuring us very much, but it is a little inconvenient for those who have been in the habit of trading with the Old Country. The extra duty almost amounts to prohibition of trade with England, but we can get the articles we need from the Dominion, and perhaps the greatest inconvenience that can arise will be that merchants will have to break their old trade and commercial relations, and trade more extensively with the Dominion. Surely, the hon. member for West Durham, who must have at heart the welfare and prosperity of the country, cannot complain if that is one of the results of the National Policy. We do not expect that the great National Policy is to be moulded to suit our little Province, but we do expect that owing to our exceptional position, if we stand by and see the larger Provinces prospering, we should not be sneered and laughed at when we come forward with our little demands, but substantial justice should be meted out to us.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: It is quite understood that if any hon. member has a grievance, by a little courtesy, a short conversation may be allowed to take place, strictly on the grievance. We were rather getting off the track, dealing with other subjects, and I hope, now that attention has been called to it, we shall get back to the question before the Chair.

MR. HUNTINGTON: The remarks from my hon. friend from Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Brecken), might be easily summarised; his conclusion seems to be this: That while the fiscal policy of the Dominion Government has done no good to his Province—while he does not want to be a partisan against his friends in office, and condemn them—while he is willing to take the position that the Island should be disposed, even to suffer, if necessary, for the general good—yet he thinks when its representatives ask for increased salaries for the Island officials, the fact of the Island's disposition to suffer for the general good, shall secure an increase of the salaries without any noise being made. If those remarks of the hon. gentleman had been applied all round, I do not think it would be necessary to notice it. But, if there is any hon. gentleman on the other side of the House whom I should be indisposed severely to criticise it would be himself. He comes and speaks for Prince Edward Island where the Judges at one time were well enough paid. He looks at Ontario and sees a higher scale of remuneration in that Province, and says—lift us up to that level. He does not feel that he is a member of this Parliament for the Dominion.

MR. BRECKEN: I do feel that.

MR. HUNTINGTON: He does not forget that he is a Prince Edward Islander. There are those who tell us that the Dominion cow is running dry, and if he is to milk her in the sense of Prince Edward Island advantage, altogether—if he is not to discuss this expenditure from a Dominion point of view—he will set an example which, if followed by members less distinguished but equally devoted to their Provinces, must prove mischievous. His example would favour this course: that we should all come here as Prince Edward Islanders, British Columbians, Quebecers, Nova Scotians or Ontario men, as representatives of the different Provinces, simply, having no special regard for the Dominion except in the sense a state with a treasury to be kept filled for the purpose of those Provinces. This idea is so clearly visible in the remarks of the hon. gentleman, that I must hold him up—and I am sorry to have to do it—as a fearful example of the evil we must avoid in this respect: and while we implore the Provinces to remember that the Dominion Treasury, notwithstanding the benefits of the National Policy, is not altogether so full that it cannot be depleted, we beg the representatives of the different Provinces to remember that they are not Provincial representatives solely and exclusively, but are responsible for such legislation as may be economical, and may commend itself to the men who desire a just, fair and safe administration of the affairs of the country. Nobody desires to deal unfairly with Prince Edward Island, or any other Province; but what I have felt hurt at and am disinclined to press too much on the hon. gentleman, is that he has expressed himself as an Islander, whose duty it was to get all he could get out of the Dominion—an example likely to be followed by others, to the endangering of the prosperity of the country.

CIVIL SERVICE EXPENDITURE.

MOTION OF WANT OF CONFIDENCE.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT:

I am not quite certain as to the strict correction of the constitutional principle laid down by the hon. the First Minister, but waiving that point I propose to submit a motion, following the precedent set by himself in a previous Session. He may not consider it a vote of Want of Confidence—I hope he will not and that the motion will be adopted. It will be recollected that, in former days, we used to hear a great deal from the hon. gentlemen opposite, when the Liberal party was in office, about the necessity of diminishing our expenditure. Some of their motions are on record protesting against the expenditure of the late Government and calling for its diminution. Since their accession to office, I do not find that that expenditure has diminished or is likely to diminish. The Returns for the last year, and the Estimates for the present and next year, show no reasonable ground for expecting any diminution. Now, among the votes demanded are three or four items specially objected to by hon. gentlemen opposite when we were in office. On many occasions they objected to the amount asked for the Civil Service, Superannuation, Indians, Post Office and Civil Government. In the year 1878, the last during which we held office, the total expenditure for Superannuation amounted to $106,000, the estimate for it at present is $142,000 or nearly 35 per cent. in addition; for Indians, in 1878, the expenditure was $428,000, while last night, we passed through simply a vote for $650,000 for the same purpose; for Post Offices, in 1878, the expenditure was $1,724,000, in the Estimates for 1881, the vote demanded is $1,852,000, being an increase of $128,000; for Civil Government, in 1878, we expended $823,000, and for 1881, we are asked to expend $917,000. Now, I am not going to analyse this sum in detail, or assert that in all these cases there has necessarily been extravagance, but I do assert that we have been very unfairly censured for the expenses that were incurred in the light of those identical Estimates now brought down. I intend to devote my remarks almost exclusively to the contemplated increase for Civil Government. This is one of the most difficult departmental charges to reduce, when you have once sanctioned a considerable increase in it. If the House will look through the detailed accounts for the last half dozen years, they will see that, whereas, the late Government in entering office, found the expenditure for this service very nearly $900,000, they succeeded in three or four years in reducing it by about $75,000, to the sum of $823,000. All our good work is being undone, however, that item being now increased by about $90,000 as contrasted with the actual expenditure for 1878. I call attention to this, more particularly, for these two reasons: First, as I have stated above, because this is an item which hon. Ministers find it extremely difficult to reduce, if once they sanction additional expenditure; and secondly, because when they make an increase in the Civil Service Staff, they likewise provide for an increase in the Superannuation Estimate, to which many members used to object very strongly during the late Government, and also incur a steady annual increase of $50 a year for each new officer. This increase of $90,000 is not in the sums authorised by the Statute, but in a vote of something very little over $600,000—an increase of something like 16 per cent. on the former expenditure. I am sorry to say that another illusion, which hon. gentlemen opposite, in former days, indulged in, has been thus ruthlessly dissipated. We were told by them often that the moment they took our places they would in some mode contrive to make a great saving in the General Expenditure. The present hon. Finance Minister was of opinion that $22,500,000, or thereabouts, ought to be amply sufficient for all the purposes of Government. I am not disposed to condemn him too severely for having discovered that estimate to be wholly inadequate. Many causes will contribute to keep up our expenditure for some years at a very high average; but it is on that ground that I deprecate the present attempt to increase those services in the way now proposed. Under the head of Civil Government the amount as put for the several services, with, I think, but one exception, shows a considerable increase in each case, the exception being in the office of the Queen's Privy Council, in which, owing to a death, some reduction has been made. The total increase, as compared with the Estimates for 1880, amounts to no less than $57,277. There is a nominal decrease of about $13,000 in one estimate, but this was in connection with the extension of the staff, for which votes were taken, rather as a matter of precaution than with any special view necessarily to expand the service. I am very much afraid that the increase, which is most marked in almost every single item, is going to continue, and that unless the House choose to apply some decided check, they will find themselves involved in very much greater expenditures than they have any idea of. I desire to call attention to the position in which we stand, as compared with the position in 1874-75, and the comparisons I propose to take are entirely independent of what are called miscellaneous receipts, and also of the corresponding charges on the other side. I shall deal with what may be considered our actual income and deduct our fixed charges, and compare the result for those several years. I think those results are sufficiently startling to make it worth while for the House to pause before they sanction any increase, which can possibly be avoided, to our annual expenditure. In 1874 our total receipts from the three great items of income—Customs, Excise, and Stamps, amounted in round numbers to $20,121,000. Our fixed charges: Interest on Sinking Fund, Management of Debt, Subsidies, and Cost of Collections, amounted to $11,121,000. In other words after deducting fixed charges from our true income, we had available for all purposes in 1874, the sum of $9,000,000. In 1875, our total income from these sources was $20,664,000. The charges against it in like manner amounted to $12,007,000, and our practical income available to all purposes, to $8,658,000; but in 1878 our income was but $17,841,000, while our fixed charges ran up to $12,589,000, leaving us for all purposes but $5,252,000. In 1879 our income was $18,476,000, and fixed charges were $12,883,000; income for all purposes, $5,593,000. I fear there is but small chance that we shall receive any greater net income the present year, while our charges will be quite as great, if not higher; and even if all the Finance Minister's Estimates are realised it is quite clear, when you come to deduct the fixed charges, our total income for all purposes will still be less by a couple of millions than the income we possessed in 1874-75. I need not say that is an extremely unsatisfactory position, and although it is no part of my present purpose to enter into the question of how far the present Ministers are to blame, or their predecessors, for this state of things, I think it is well worth the attention of the House to consider whether, in such circumstances, when our available income has fallen, in four or five years, from $9,000,000 to $5,593,000, this is precisely the time we should choose to add to the expenditure for Civil Government an annual charge of $90,000 as compared with 1878, and of $50,000 or $60,000 as compared with last year. If any reforms were to be made, it could only be by our cutting down the total vote, and leaving the hon. gentlemen opposite to so adjust the expenditure for Civil Government, as to save the sum which the House may deem expedient. I am aware that a large portion of this expenditure has been caused by the creation of two distinct Departments, one for Railways and the other for Public Works, in place of the old single Department. I do not think it can be contended that those two Departments will have, in future, more work to do or as much as when the hon. member for Lambton was Premier. We are not in a position to say positively how far the calculations of the hon. the Finance Minister are likely to be realised, but if any indication is to be obtained from the Returns recently made, I fear the total for the present year will very slightly, if at all, exceed the income for the past year, and the consequence will be we shall have $5,500,000 or $6,000,000 only available, out of which no less than $900,000 are claimed for Civil Government, and $600,000 for Legislation, leaving us very little more than $4,500,000 for all other purposes. I admit that, relatively to the enormous sums we have been dealing with, a proposal to save $50, $60 or $70 a year may not appear to hon. gentlemen opposite or their supporters much worth considering. After all is said and done, the little saving I propose to effect will be only about one-tenth of the annual interest of the sum that will probably be sunk in contracts recently entered into in British Columbia. It will only be about one-twenty-fifth part of the sum which we throw away for the purpose of establishing one or two sugar refineries in the Dominion, and about one-hundredth part of the sum which we voluntarily fine ourselves each year for the purpose of encouraging a few manufactures. But we are content with the day of small things. We have tried to effect large economies, and we could not do it. With a view of meeting the views of the hon. gentlemen who were not able to vote for the motion of the hon. member for West Durham, but who may still object to swelling unnecessarily the expenses of Civil Government, I propose, bearing in mind their own previous declarations, their own oft-repeated assaults upon myself and my hon. friends around me, I propose, in direct accordance with their own protestations, now to give them an opportunity for reducing what I must consider the excessive vote demanded for the purposes of Civil Government. One of two results, at any rate, must happen: either we shall be able to put a timely check on the extravagances we deplore, or else those hon. gentlemen will be able to give the public some tolerably clear proof of the value of their professions, and their desires for economy in the matter of Civil Government. I, therefore, propose to move in amendment:

That all the words after "that" be left out, and the following inserted instead thereof:—"It be Resolved, That the total expenditure made under the Supply Act for the purposes of Civil Government for the year ending 30th June, 1878, was $609,969; that it is now proposed to expend for the same purposes the sum of $700,185, for the year ending 30th June, 1881; that it is inexpedient in the present position of finances that the scale of expenditure should be increased by the large sum of over $90,000; and that the sum proposed to be voted, be reduced to a total amount not exceeding $630,000."

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: I wish to call the attention of the hon. gentleman, who has made this motion, to some statements I have made in this House which have not been and cannot be controverted. On the occasion of my second exposition of the Finances of the Dominion, I made some statements on the subject. There were exceptional expenditures made in the years from 1873 to 1879. It we take this from the Estimates for the next year, the practical result is, that the expenditure next year will be between $1,000,000 and $300,000 less than the year referred to. The hon. gentleman has called attention to a statement I made on one occasion, and which I repeat now, that in my judgment there was no reason why the average expenditure for 1873-74 and 1874-75 should have exceeded $22,500,000. It has been held that the expenditure properly belonging to the year 1873-74 should not have exceeded that sum, and I am satisfied for the two years previous, by the reduction in the expenditure on Public Works, it might have been kept within that figure. But I have never said that now, when we are engaged in enlarging the Canals and constructing the Pacific Railway, the expenditure can be confined to that figure. I would like to know, when the hon. gentleman refers to $609,000 as the expenditure for Civil Service in 1878, if he includes Contingencies.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT: It includes the exact sum authorised by the Supply Bill, and the exact sum that was spent. I am speaking of the annual expenditure, not that which was simply authorised.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: I asked the question because the hon. gentlemen opposite expended a larger sum under the head of Contingencies than was expended last year or is proposed to be expended this year, because a larger number of salaries were transferred from Contingencies to the Permanent List. But the hon. gentleman took credit for making a large reduction in the year 1874-75 of $75,000; that was by dropping the bonus that had been given to employes in the previous year. In 1873, the sum of $75,000 was voted for the purpose of increasing the salaries of the officials generally, for the reason that the cost of living had increased since the salaries were fixed in 1867. That additional sum was continued for two years in 1873-74 and 1874-75. We find in 1875-76 an expenditure of $909,000, against an estimated expenditure at the present time of $917,415. The hon. gentleman says they reduced the expenditure in one year. They did that, I presume, by striking off that $75,000 of bounts. I believe, however, the Session previous a Bill was introduced which increased the salaries of the Civil Service, but it was abandoned for some reason or other. The hon. gentleman takes exception to the increase since 1878-79, but he must know perfectly well that under the Civil Service Act there is an increase of $50 a year for certain officers, which very largely increased the expenditure from year to year, and that must continue, unless Parliament deems it well to amend that Act so as to make the salaries stationary. The other increases, under the head of Civil Government, are caused in various ways. In the first place, they assisted, by the statutory addition of $50 per annum to the salaries of the clerks, until they reach a certain sum. Another cause of the increase is the opening up of the North-West, which involves an increase in the work of the Government. Then increases have been incurred by reason of the division of the Department of Public Works into the Department of Railways and the Department of Public Works. In the same Departments several salaries which have been charged to capital now come under Civil Government. That makes an apparent increase in the expenses of the Civil Government; but the fact is that the salaries were paid before, although they did not appear under the head of Civil Government, to which the motion under consideration applies. Another increase is caused by the necessity of having an additional clerk in the Audit Department, and another is made necessary by the increase in the circulation of Dominion notes. But these increases will be more than compensated for by the increase in the Revenue which, will be derived from the increased circulation. The circulation itself will give the Government $100,000 a year, and the release of the two millions of reserve in gold will give another $100,000. From this has to be deducted $25,000 for printing the notes and the other things, which leaves a revenue of $175,000, a sum large enough to pay the interest on the much abused expenditure in British Columbia. I quite agree that it is desirable to retrench, but while members opposite are loudly in favour of a reduction, they themselves proposed increases. For instance, they, through the Library Committee, increased the salaries of the clerks, and increased the salary of the messenger. They proposed to give the messenger connected with the Library $850 per annum for instance, or $50 more than he is now getting, while the highest salary for a messenger was $500. When in office, too, hon. gentlemen opposite paid certain messengers their $500 per annum, and $100 additional from Contingencies. Besides all this the introducer of the motion, when in office, and when Canada was, as he called it, a cheap country to live in, had the power to reduce salaries if he had desired to do so. But he did not offer to do so. He proposed rather to make increases under all these circumstances. I do not think the proposition of the hon. gentleman should be sustained.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT: The hon. the Finance Minister asked for an explanation of the clause of the increase in 1874-75 and 1875-76. The answer is simply this: That when that hon. gentleman was in office in 1873, he originated an immense number of minor public works, causing an increased expenditure of $1,116,000 in 1874-75; $1,106,000 in 1875-76; and $587,000 in 1876-77. That was the reason why there was such a comparison in his favour.

MR. WHITE (East Hastings): This is a very important motion—

Several HON. MEMBERS: Question; carried.

MR. WHITE: I will stand here till 12 o'clock to-night, but I will have my say. There is no member, that has been a member of this House for five years past, but knows how the present Administration, when in Opposition, advocated a reduction in expenditure, how they brought up motion after motion that it was the duty of the Government of the day not to increase the expenditure in the Civil Service, and I think now that it is the duty of this Government to make some reduction in the Civil Service salaries instead of the increases that are made. I do not think the Government are so much to blame in this matter. Members of rural constituencies should not assist the city members in getting on extra clerks in the Civil Service, and increasing salaries to those who are already in the Service; but they say: "we want an increase of salary for this officer or the other officer," and so far as Ministers are concerned, they are pressed by hon. members of this House. I believe that the Judges, the members of the Civil Service, the Speaker of the House, and the Speaker of the Senate, the members of the Government, and all the members of the Senate and of this House of Commons, could very well do with a reduction of 10 per cent. all round, and save a large amount of money to the taxpayers of this country. I believe this could be done, and it is the duty of this Government, with their majority of 80, to do it. This is a motion which involves a Want of Confidence.

Several HON. MEMBERS: Oh, oh; question; carried.

MR. WHITE: You can go on, gentlemen, with your interruptions. You cannot put me down. I am too many years here to be scared. When you are ready to stop your interruptions, I am ready to go on. This is a motion of Want of Confidence, and I am sorry that it is, for I should have liked to have voted for it. But the hon. the Minister of Finance has promised to permit no increases to take place. I will vote for the Government on the promise that he will not only not make any increase, but that he will make a decrease. On that understanding I will vote against the motion. I do not think that the mechanics, and farmers, and merchants are getting any better off, and I hope and trust that the Government, if they want my support, will make the decrease that I have just mentioned.

Several HON. MEMBERS: Question; carried.

MR. WHITE: Oh, hon. gentlemen over there can go on with their noises. I will be bound to say it hurts their boots more than my conscience. It does not hurt me a bit. I know, and I repeat, that the rural members and the city members are to blame; they are too willing to ask for increases of different officers; and they go to the Ministers and they beg, and scold, and plead in order to get these increases. I hope the members of the rural districts, and all of us, will not allow the Civil Service to rule the country. This motion comes with a bad grace from the late Minister of Finance, for when the present party now in power pressed his Government not to increase the number of Civil servants, he paid no attention to their advice, but increased the number of employes in every Department, and largely increased their salaries. But the electors punished him and other members of his party and drove them from power, because they did not carry out the promises made previous to their getting the reins of Government. I hope that my hon. friend will take warning and administer the affairs of the country in a manner that will be satisfactory to the taxpayers.

MR. BOULTBEE: I would like to see economy carried out. I would like to see it begun with the members. It is certainly my impression that the money expended in the Civil Service is over large. If we increase in wealth, and extend our borders, we may get a population sufficient to bear it; but if the country is going to prosper, attention must be given to economy. But the present motion is ill-moved by the Opposition, for there has been no period in the history of this country when its finances have been so disastrously or so recklessly managed as under the hon. mover himself, notwithstanding the professions of economy made by the hon. gentleman on the hustings before getting into power; when they did come into office there was a larger increase than ever before or since. I have full confidence in the present Finance Minister. I believe him to be honest, and that he will act judiciously and right in reference to the Civil Service expenses. I have no objection, at any time, to vote for a reduction of our indemnity, but I shall certainly vote against this motion.

MR. CASEY: The Government promised by the Speech from the Throne, and afterwards through the mover of the Address in reply to it, that some measure of reform for our Civil Service should be introduced. Has the Government abandoned the measure so promised, and if so, why? But for that promise I would have introduced a Bill on the subject myself.

MR. ANGLIN: It is very easy to understand why hon. gentlemen want to shut down discussion on this subject; it is unpleasant for many hon. gentlemen on the other side and for some on this side. The hon. the Finance Minister very skillfully contrasted the total expenditure of the late Government with that of the previous Administration, in order to lead to the conclusion that the late Government had been extravagant; but that is not relevant to the question before the House. The hon. member for Centre Huron asks this House to declare that the extraordinary increase in the expenses of the Civil Service for last year and this year and the coming year is such an increase as the means and necessities of the country do not justify.

Several HON. MEMBERS: Question; carried.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I shall have to ask you, Mr. Speaker, to exercise your authority to stop this noise, if we are to finish the business of the House before the first of June. We cannot get on with these careless and exceedingly improper interruptions.

MR. SPEAKER: I hope the hon. members will give order. If I am not supported by the members, I shall be powerless.

MR. ANGLIN: I do not care much, personally, about these interruptions, but I hope for the dignity of this House, Mr. Speaker, that your request will prove effectual, and no resort to any special measure will be necessary. The hon. the Finance Minister skillfully, but not successfully tried to divert attention from this Resolution. He spoke of the abolition of some officers in the Lower Provinces, and the removal of the officers to Ottawa, and of the transfer of several officers whose pay was charged to Contingencies to the permanent staff; but as the total amount of Contingencies and Salaries of every sort are included in the total figures given in the amendment, there can be no force at all in the hon. gentleman's argument. He complained that the late Government did not reduce the pay of the Civil servants when money was low, and went further than it does now. The late Government did economise. There was a bonus of $75,000.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: The bonus was only intended for one year.

MR. BLAKE: Not at all.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD : It was a bonus, and not an annuity.

MR. ANGLIN : The late Government did not see fit to give the bonus, but they did not go to work to reduce salaries large or small ; they treated the Civil servants with courtesy and kindness, and they were very badly repaid. They did economise, nevertheless. The hon. the Minister of Finance spoke further of the cost of taking care of the Indians in the North-West, and of the great grant which he regarded as an offset to be realised out of his new issue of paper money, all which was quite irrelevant to the question under consideration. Sir, what he said of the Dominion paper issue is no answer to the charge made by the motion in your hands. If we are able to save a larger amount by the issue of this paper money, that is not a reason why we should waste an amount equal to it. It was really unworthy of the hon. gentleman's position to argue vehemently and earnestly that as we are to save so much by the issue of more paper money the House must consider this an unreasonable motion. The question is simply this : Is it, or is it not, desirable or justiable that the expenditure on account of the Civil Service should be increased so largely as it has been this year and last. The expenditures during the last few years, from 1873, was as follows :—

1875-76.....	841,995
1876-77.....	812,193
1877-78.....	823,359

This House ought to declare, under the present circumstances of the country, when great deficits are staring us in the face, that such an increase in the Civil Service expenditure is not to be justified.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD : With respect to the Civil Service Act, I would simply say that it was put into the Speech from the Throne, and the Government had full intention of pressing the Bill this Session. The Bill was carefully prepared. Most exhaustive evidence was collected on the subject with respect to the Civil servants, not only of England, but of France and Germany. The Bill was in the hands of my hon. colleague before Parliament met, but we found, as the Session went on, that we could not well press the measure and get through in any reasonable time. It is a subject of importance, but not one of pressing importance, and, therefore, we have given preference to the other measures which have been before the House, and which have been discussed at such length, giving a due portion of the time, as it was our bounden duty to do, to the measures and questions in the hands of private members. Still the subject has received, and will continue to receive, the attention of the Government, and, if the hon. gentleman will allow me, after the Session, I will give him confidentially a copy of the Bill it was the intention of the Government to bring down. With respect to the discussion as to the increased expenditure, I think my hon. friend, the Finance Minister has answered that. I am not at all surprised at the late hon. Minister of Finance making this motion, because it comes with peculiar grace from him. It is an old saying : "There is no one so zealous as a convert—no man is so virtuous as a reformed rake;" and I think the hon. gentleman has shown his new-born zeal in the cause of economy. It is very new-born—the baby is not very old, because, if I remember aright, when he was Finance Minister, in 1873, he introduced a measure which the whole force of the Government was to be employed in carrying, and yet that measure was not carried. Strange to say, it was a measure affecting the expenditure on the Civil Service. In his speech to-day, the hon. gentleman said his remarks were to be especially directed to that subject. Now, I hold in my hand the Bill the hon. gentleman introduced on March 8, 1875, and when I call attention to its provisions the House will scarcely believe that it was introduced by a Finance Minister who was bound to restrain the undue liberality of his colleagues who were not so directly responsible for the public expenditure as himself. In the Act introduced in my time, 1868, a third class clerk was to receive a salary of $400 a year. That is a reasonable amount. We discussed the matter at the time, and some thought $350 quite enough, but as a matter of liberality—and I dare say the Opposition of that day were just as economical as the present Opposition—we fixed the salary at the rate mentioned. The Bill of the hon.

gentleman opposite provided that a third class clerk should receive $500 per annum, $100 more than we provided. In three years, by the hon. gentleman's measure, the appointment of junior clerks alone would have made up more than the $90,000 there has been so much talk about to-day. In our Act we provided that there should be an annual increase of $50 until the salary reached $650 and then it should stop; but starting with $500 the hon. gentleman proposed to give an annual increase of $50 until the salary reached $750, and to shorten the pains of the poor man starving on this salary he was to step into the next grade after four years service instead of after five, as under our Act. With regard to second class clerks our extravagant provision was that the junior second class clerk should receive $700 from the time he started, but the hon. gentleman provided that he should begin with $800 a year and receive an annual increase of $50, until his salary reached $1,100. Our limit was $1,000. Under our Act a first class clerk was to receive $1,200, and that is the law now, but in his generosity the hon. gentleman wished to raise this amount to $1,600. Let any arithmetician sit down and take the clerks appointed since this Bill was introduced until now, and he will find that the additional cost which would have been entailed upon the country by it, would amount to hundreds of thousands of dollars. It may be said that the Bill did not become law. That is no fault of the hon. gentleman. It was introduced as a Government measure, and pressed as a Government measure. It suddenly disappeared, because it was found that not only were the Opposition against it, but that there was a mutiny in his own camp. Yet five years after the introduction of this Bill, which largely, enormously, absurdly increased the Civil Service expenditure, he complains of the expenditure under the old economical Act which has increased owing to the gradual progress of the country. This is a specimen of a new-born economy, and, as I said before, is an illustration of the fact that nobody can be so virtuous as a reformed political rake.

After Recess.

Mr. SPROULE: When you left the Chair, Mr. Speaker, at Six o'clock, I was about stating the reasons for the vote I intend to give on the amendment before the Chair. I have said that, at the last General Elections when we were before the people, one of our delarations was that the expenditure of the past five years was out of proportion to the necessities of the country, and that if the Conservative party returned to power we should endeavour to reduce the expenditure to the measure of the circumstances of the country, and if possible keep it within the Revenue. I believe this question was successfully discussed, and had its influence with the people, and it led to an expression of Want of Confidence in the late Government on the part of the people. Now that we are in power, we believe it our duty to carry out our principles, and we are convinced that the Ministry have shown a considerable desire to fulfil their pledges in this respect. Let us look at some of the Departments? Take Public Works. We find that the Minister of Railways has reduced the expenditure on the Intercolonial Railway for salaries over $200,000. The staff was so large that the Government dispensed with 460 hands, and yet had enough left to do the work with equal advantage afterwards. In some of the other Departments we find there has been a commendable decrease in the expenditure, and while we believe that as time passes there will be a necessary increase in the expenditure, the object of every Government should be to not let it overstep the means and growth of the country, and the necessities of the case. Had this motion been brought forward in a proper spirit, and not exhibiting what those gentlemen pretend to experience—a burning zeal for economy, while in reality it is a motion of Want of Confidence in the Government—I believe the hon. members of this House would have supported it. But when we find that it is not honestly brought forward, and that the only excuse of the mover is that, when hon. gentlemen on this side of the House occupied the Opposition benches, they were in the habit of putting such motions, consequently, it is the duty of the Opposition now to mete out to their opponents the treatment they received from them years before. That ought to be sufficient to induce hon. gentlemen to oppose it, for if it was wrong then it must be now. Two wrongs do not make a right. Again, if we had evidence that the expenditure was out of proportion to the necessities of the case, we should be in duty bound to support the proposition for its reduction. But the question now is, not whether this expenditure is in the interest of the country or not, but whether or not we are prepared to vote non-confidence in the Government, for this vote would be virtually a vote of Want of Confidence in the Government. They depend on the interest of the lesser questions to swallow up the interest of the greater, and thereby so blindfold the House as to induce it to support the motion. We should not then support such a buncombe amendment for the purpose of condemning the Government. The question is not whether the expenditure should be reduced by the small amount of $21,000, as proposed by this amendment, or whether the interests of the country require this reduction, but whether we are prepared to vote a Want of Confidence in a Government which we believe able and desirous of conducting the affairs of the country to its best advantage. Are we prepared to reinstate a set of men whose Administration never was characterised by anything but extravagance? Are we prepared to condone the offences of the past, and overthrow a Government which is lifting the country out of the Slough of Despond in which for five years it was plunged? Are we prepared to sacrifice the interests of the country to lesser interests, for a change of Ministers in the interest of hon. gentlemen opposite? I believe there is, in some Departments, room for economy, but I think the evidence given us of the economy of the present hon. Ministers, is sufficient to satisfy us that we are safe in their hands, and that their Administration is for the good of the country. Another reason why the amendment should be voted down is: I have before me a petition, signed by 119 members, to induce the Government to increase the salaries of the Messengers and Sessional clerks of this House, which petition is signed by the very gentlemen who are pressing this motion and who are prepared to vote for it. What must be thought of men who are making this buncombe motion for the reduction of expenditure, and yet signing a petition to the Government asking it to increase this expenditure. I do not think it right to adopt the prayer of this petition at present. What could hon. gentlemen opposite give to the country in the place of this Government. It is a pitiable proposition to restore to power a party who are nominally and virtually without a leader, and whose numerical strength is so small that they scarcely command any influence, while they are torn by conflicting elements in their own ranks to an extent which still further reduces their power. It would be entirely inexpedient to vote Want of Confidence in the Government by supporting the present amendment. When any Resolution comes forward in a legitimate way, with the honest intention of promoting fair and judicious economy, it will be calmly and properly considered.

MR. MILLS: The hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat has characterised the late Government as extravagant. Well, all that the amendment asks is that we do not expend a larger sum for Civil Government than was expended by that extravagant Administration—that we may not spend $20,000 more. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Sproule) will find that the expenditure for Civil Government in 1873, as compared with that in 1878, did not show such an increase under the late Administration as has been proposed during the first two years of the present Government. I have risen, not for the purpose of answering the observations of the hon. gentleman, which I think sufficiently answer themselves, when he characterises the late Government as financially extravagant and at the same time supports a large increase. The amendment simply asks the present Administration not to exceed in expenditure the amount required by that Government. It will be obvious that the hon. gentleman's argument is not unanswerable. But I have chiefly risen for the purpose of pointing out the fallacy of the argument of the hon. leader of the House. He criticised a measure introduced by the hon. member for Centre Huron when that gentleman was Finance Minister, and read a certain portion of a Bill to show that he proposed to place the salaries of the clerks of the Civil Service at a higher rate than they were fixed by the Administration. That is not the fact. The right hon. gentleman compares the salaries proposed by the hon. member for Centre Huron, not with the amount at which the late Government left those salaries, but with the amount under the Statute of 1868. He carefully concealed the fact that the hon. the Minister of Finance took the appropriation, which was intended to be a permanent appropriation, of $75,000 to be distributed among these clerks with a view to supplementing those salaries. If the hon. the Premier will look at the expenditure that would have taken place under the Bill of the hon. member for Centre Huron, and compare it with the salaries fixed by the Statute of 1868, and with the supplementary amount asked for by the hon. gentlemen opposite when in power before, and which was voted by Parliament, he will see that these $70,000 or $75,000, for the salaries of clerks in the Civil Service, even supposing those appointed by the hon. gentlemen opposite had been allowed to remain, would have been greater than the expenditure under the Bill of the late Finance Minister. He did not propose to increase the salaries of the clerks, but left it for the Government to decide, according to its discretion, what the salaries of each officer should be. The hon. gentlemen opposite came down to the House, after fixing the salaries of the clerks at a particular sum, and said: "We want you to place $70,000 at our disposal, so that we may reward those whom we think favourable to us more generously than those whom we think may not be in sympathy with us. We did not think, however, that that was a proper act; but the discretionary power, which the Administration possessed under this supplementary appropriation, was open to abuse, and would have been taken away by the Bill of my hon. friend from Centre Huron, had that measure become law. When he introduced his Bill, it was his intention to diminish the number of clerks in the Public Service. It was easy to increase the bonus and diminish the number of the officials, and to increase the amount of payments without adding a dollar to the burdens of the people in this particular. This fact the hon. leader of the Government carefully concealed, with a view of making an erroneous impression on the minds of hon. gentlemen not in Parliament at the time. It is perfectly obvious that the salaries fixed by the hon. gentlemen opposite, with those supplementary sums added, were larger than they would have been under the Bill of the hon. member for Centre Huron. This Bill, however, was not passed, because the conclusion arrived at was, that those in the Civil Service were sufficiently paid. The salaries were, for this reason, left at the old figures, and the supplementary vote of $70,000 was withdrawn, and now hon. Ministers proposed to ask a larger sum for the Public Service than was asked at any former period. The hon. the Finance Minister has referred to the increase in the cost of the Department of the Interior under the late Government. I do not know that there was any material increase. There has been no statement to show that any increase at present was necessary. A number of gentlemen were employed as extra clerks, and it was found, after some time, that the increase in the work of the Department would justify their being placed on the permanent list. The hon. the Finance Minister came down, last year, with an increased estimate and said there had been no material increase in the actual cost of the Department of the Interior, as they had simply transferred from the Sessional List to the Permanent Service those who had been some time employed as extra Departmental clerks. This, too, was the explanation of the hon. the First Minister. The sums formerly paid as Contingencies was no longer necessary for that purpose and there would have been, if the statement made by the leader of the Government last year was correct, a corresponding diminution in the Contingencies of his Department. If that be the case then there should be no increase in the annual cost of the Administration. I say such are the facts, and the hon. the Minister of Finance has not accounted for the increase in the cost of Civil Government by the explanations he has given. I rose mainly for the purpose of pointing out that the comparison between the Bill of 1868 and the one introduced by the late

Finance Minister in 1875, but which he did not press through Parliament, was not a fair comparison unless the House took into consideration the supplementary vote the hon. gentlemen opposite took in 1873, and which was distributed amongst the clerks in the Civil Service.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: I am glad the ex-Finance Minister has made this motion, as I believe it will serve a valuable purpose. I believe the effect of that motion will not be lost upon the country. As we are all aware, men are differently constituted. One man is adapted for one vocation in life, and another man for another. One man may be an admirable servant, good tempered, industrious, and faithful in the discharge of his duties, but if his position is suddenly changed, and he becomes heir to a large fortune, he very often proves to be a most tyrannical, indolent, and extravagant master. So nature may have intended a man for a great author, he may write a book of great value to the world, yet he may be utterly incapable of criticising a book. Other persons who are incapable of writing a book may be able to make most valuable critiques of the works of others. Now, the motion that has just been made by the ex-Finance Minister will, I think, convince the people of this country that he is once more in his true position. While he was a most extravagant Finance Minister, with whom it was dangerous to entrust the finances of the country, as a critic of the works of others his true vocation appears, and his views having undergone a radical change, he becomes extremely valuable to the country in the position he at present occupies. This motion will deepen the impression on the public mind that it is in the interest of Canada that the hon. gentleman, instead of being Finance Minister, should remain ex-Finance Minister. I should suppose the hon. gentleman would be the last man in Parliament to lose himself in the attitude of an economist; I should suppose he would be the last man to have returned to the rôle he has adopted to-night. He used to occupy the same rôle before he was Finance Minister. He was an admirable critic. There was not a Budget brought down at a time when the Finance Minister of the day was able to meet Parliament, year after year, with an overwhelming surplus, that the hon. gentleman did not hold forth in the most doleful tones about the great danger of expenditure, and the certainty of deficits. He was not successful as a prophet. None of those deficits appeared until the hon. gentleman himself obtained a position that enabled him to create them. Now, the hon. gentleman is drawing a contrast between the expenditure of the past Government, and the proposed expenditure of this one. Let me, for a moment, invite his attention to the fact that, when this increased expenditure took place before the régime of the late Administration, the financial condition of this country was such as to warrant the Government of the day dealing with the public expenditure in a very liberal manner. Year after year they met Parliament with a handsome surplus. The hon. gentleman at last obtained power, the great economist, who had been for years criticising the financial statements of his predecessor, finally himself obtained that high office. What was the result? Why, at a time when he declared himself, at the very outset, that the financial position of the country was a most deplorable one, he said to Parliament: It is necessary for me to impose $3,000,000 additional taxes in order to carry on the Government of this country. Did he retrench? Did he adopt such a proposal as he has offered to the House to-night to limit the expenditure? Why, as I said on a former occasion, the Estimates submitted by the late Finance Minister, for the year ending 30th June, 1875, were between $26,000,000 and $27,000,000.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT: No; you do not know the difference between a Supply Bill and an Estimate.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: The hon. member may make the member for South Huron (Mr. Cameron) believe that statement, but he will never make me accept it. The hon. member for South Huron wanted to know where I got my figures. I tell him I got them in the Public Accounts, brought down by the late Finance Minister. With a most disingenuous attempt to prevent this House from knowing what he was doing, the hon. gentleman brought down an Estimate such as no Minister of Finance, either before or since, ever ventured to place before the House. I ask hon. members to turn up the Public Accounts for themselves, to the Estimate laid before this House for the year 1874-75, and they will find a total change in the manner of submitting that statement, such as completely bewildered the former Finance Minister (Sir Francis Hincks), who wrote me that it was impossible to understand the hon. gentleman's Estimates, and asked me if I could explain what they meant. I repeat the statement, and I am willing to go before the Public Accounts Committee and substantiate it, that the Estimates submitted to this House for the year 1874-75, as contained in the Estimates and embodied in the Supply Bill, were between 26,000,000 and 27,000,000. If the hon. gentleman from South Huron, who wanted the figures, will turn to the Public Accounts for 1875, he will find that the late Finance Minister departed from the system that had prevailed, before and since, in order to mystify the House, and prevent any member from discovering what the character of his Estimates was. His Estimates, as there given, show a statement there authorised for 1874-75, of $24,803,285. If the hon. gentleman undertakes to question those figures, you have only to turn over a few pages further in the Sessional Papers for 1875, and you will find a Supplementary Estimate brought down by him, in the same volume, for the financial year ending 30th June, 1875, a Supplementary Estimate of $1,783,787. Deduct $94,150 as unprovided items for the year 1873-74, and you have a Supplementary Estimate left for that first year of $1,689,636 or $26,487,921.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT: How much Capital?

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: Not a dollar of Capital.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT: Nonsense.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: That may do for the hon. member for South Huron, but it will not do for me. I will establish before any Committee of this House the accuracy of the statement I am making, that the hon. gentleman submitted Estimates to Parliament for the year 1874-75 of between $26,000,000 and $27,000,000 and embodied them in the Statutes. This is the great economist who was going to save this country; who, when not Minister of Finance, was loud-mouthed in his demand for the most stringent economy, at a time when we were flush with revenue and were rolling up $2,000,000 of a surplus annually. The hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) did make a mistake and so did I, in supposing the sum; the late hon. Finance Minister had voted for his first year was nearer $26,000,000 than $27,000,000; on the contrary, it was nearer $27,000,000 than $26,000,000, because you have to add to this $26,487,921, $111,690 of unprovided items for that year, making $26,599,611. I would be doing an injustice to the hon. gentleman himself, if I did not place in bold relief the claim he has to the position he now occupies, and the necessity there is in the interests of this country that he should long be retained there, to criticise the acts of others rather than be placed in a position to trample under his feet all his professions of economy. At the very time this hon. gentleman brought down this enormous Estimate he was a party to putting a Bill upon the Statute-book to provide for the construction of the whole Canadian Pacific Railway by the Government, and no wonder he wanted $3,000,000 of additional taxation. But the hon. gentleman managed to get rid of it all without constructing the Pacific Railway. Talk of economy! The hon. gentleman himself has made a statement that convicts him of extravagance such as no other Finance Minister ever was guilty of. He has himself given evidence of the fact that, notwithstanding all his professions of economy, no sooner did he obtain power than, in the second year after he had levied $3,000,000 additional taxes, and discovered that it was not enough to enable him to make both ends meet and was leaving him with deficits, we find him making an expenditure in 1875-76 of $24,448,372, or $1,132,056, according to his own statement, over and above that expenditure on the part of his predecessor, which he had denounced as the greatest extravagance. Let him make up the account, as I have shown him it should really stand; let him deduct the sums he improperly placed in a comparative statement to the charge of the year 1873-74, and it will be found that this economical Finance Minister made an expenditure for that year of $2,140,000 over and above the largest expenditure with which he could fairly charge the previous Administration. The hon. gentleman has made three prominent points to-night. He will not go into the general question, for the reason that the further he gets into it the worse is the position in which he finds himself. He wants the Civil Government Estimate reduced. Well, what do the figures show in reference to that? They show that the largest expenditure made by the Administration preceding the last one was in 1873-74, $883,685, which amount included the bonus of $75,000 specially voted for that year. About $25,000 of that was distributed in the Outside Service, which would leave $50,000 for distribution among the officers of the Civil Service, at a time when the Government of the day were steadily presenting a surplus. Yet, we find this hon. gentleman, at a time when he said he must have $3,000,000 of additional taxes to carry on the Government, introducing a Bill to provide for a still greater increase in the expenditure for the Civil Service; and his actual expenditure for the Civil Service, for 1874-75, was $909,265, or $25,580 more than that of his predecessors. The hon. gentleman makes a great point about Superannuation, but what do you suppose the hon. gentleman did? Our largest expenditure for Superannuation was in the year 1873-74, when it amounted to $64,482; but the great economists on the Opposition benches increased that in 1877-78 to $106,588. The largest Post Office expenditure for which we were responsible, amounted to $1,387,270; while in 1877-78 it was increased to $1,724,938, an increase of $337,668. The hon. member for Centre Huron has thus given evidence that he is now sustaining his true rôle in criticising the acts of others, and that he should not be again trusted with the power he so abused during the Administration of the late Government.

MR. HUNTINGTON: I do not propose to follow the hon. gentleman in his remarks. I leave that for my hon. friend behind me. But we can extract honey, I will not say what from. There has been on the opposite side of the House, led by the hon. the leader of this House, a system of attacks upon my hon. friend from

SIR CHARLES TUPPER.

Centre Huron, because he was a renegade because in 1873, when my hon. friend from Lambton formed his Government, the hon. member for Lennox joined him. I think the right hon. gentleman never waxed more eloquent than he did when he used the adjectives descriptive of the rascalities of my hon. friend from Huron. Now, the hon. gentleman who has just spoken has made some extraordinary statements. He upbraids my hon. friend from Centre Huron because he found fault with the Government of which the hon. gentleman was a member, because he criticised their extravagance, and pursued the rôle of a man in Opposition to that Government in 1870, in 1871, in 1872; and later on he also pursued the rôle of an honest critic. The hon. gentleman must believe he was an honest critic, because he desires to keep him in Opposition in that position. If my hon. friend was opposed to the Government of which the hon. gentleman was a member, if he was a member of the Opposition which my hon. friend from Lambton led, the right hon. the leader of the Government has been traducing my hon. friend amid the wild and exultant cheers of hon. gentlemen opposite. The hon. the Minister of Railways, with the simplicity of a child and the eloquence of an orator, has shown how unjust, how unfounded, and how unfair have been these accusations against my hon. friend.

MR. PLUMB: When we remember what the hon. ex-Finance Minister did from 1873 to the unfortunate day when he fell with his party, in 1878, we can have no difficulty in deciding upon the manner in which we will vote on the Resolution before the House. Why did not the hon. gentleman, when he brought forward that Resolution, cover the whole question of expenditure between 1874 and 1878? Why did not the hon. gentleman justify the enormous increases which have been made by hon. gentlemen opposite in every item of the public expenditure? If the hon. gentleman thinks that within a week of Prorogation, when the House is impatient of financial discussion, he will be able to snatch a verdict from the House, he is mistaken. I am quite prepared to vote down the hon. gentleman's proposition, being, as I am assured, that I can satisfactorily explain my vote to my constituents.

3 The Office of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada.....$14,392 50
4 The Department of Justice..... 13,900 00
5 The Department of Justice, Penitentiaries Branch..... 5,300 00

In reply to Sir RICHARD J. CART WRIGHT,

MR McDONALD (Pictou) said $500 had been added to the salary of the Inspector—an addition which the hon. gentleman would not think extravagant. An Accountant for the Penitentiaries, an office authorised by an Act of the Legislature, was to be appointed at a salary of $1,200.

MR BLAKE said the duties of the Inspector were lightened by the proposal to appoint an Accountant, and as the Statutory salary was only $2,000, and it had already been increased to $2,500, he did not see any justification for the proposed increase to $2,750.

6 The Department of Militia.....	$37,010
7 The Department of the Secretary of State.....	33,155

In reply to SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT,

MR. BOWELL said the apparent increase in the salaries of the officers in this Department was accounted for by the fact that five extra clerks had been put upon the Permanent List. Those persons were on the Temporary List and paid out of Contingencies when the present Government came into power. The number of messengers connected with the Department seemed excessive, but they had been connected with the Department either temporarily or permanently for a number of years.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT said that item showed a handsome percentage of increase of late.

MR. BOWELL said the Contingencies Account for this branch, in 1873, was $567, and the item gradually increased from the time hon. gentlemen opposite took office, from $567 to about $4,000 in 1878. It had, consequently, been reduced by the present Government. The hon. the Secretary of State intended keeping his Contingencies Account as low as possible.

8 The Department of Interior.....	$60,850

In reply to MR. MILLS,

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said that the item should stand $57,850, to which it had been reduced.

9 The Office of the Auditor-General	$18,275
10 The Department of Finance.....	53,715

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT asked for explanations as to the increase of $3,785 in this item.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY replied that there had been a slight increase in salaries, and that with the increased issue of Dominion notes, additional officers might be required.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT enquired how much represented the $50 per annum increase of officials' salaries?

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY said a large portion of the difference represented that $50 increase, which was statutory. Besides, some of the officers might be entitled to promotion. He might furnish more particular information later.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT said that more information was desirable.

11 The Office of the Treasury Board	$2,700 00
12 The Department of Inland Revenue	30,342 50

MR. BABY: The increase arises from the fact that two gentlemen in the Department, who have been extra clerks for a number of years, have been put upon the Permanent List this year. Then there is the ordinary Statutory allowance and the promotion of another clerk. When I came to the Department there were five extra clerks, and out of these two have been put upon the Permanent List. They were then, as now, at the head of their respective branches. The greatest economy prevails in the Department. The Auditor was astonished that economy was practiced to such an extent, and he actually wrote a letter calling the attention of my Deputy to that fact. Under the supervision of the Auditor no extra expenses will be incurred.

MR. MILLS: The hon. gentleman, in this increase, has adopted a principle that was not acted upon in our day, which is, that the moment a clerk in any class reaches the head of his class, he is, as a matter of course, promoted into the next order without reference to the character of the duties he has to discharge. If that principle was acted upon, every clerk in a Department would, in the course of time, become a first-class clerk.

MR. BABY: Does the hon. gentleman think it would be proper to put at $400 the salaries of two clerks at the head of their branches, and surely as efficient as any first class clerks, when they had men under them earning $700? That is a Department in which we must have experienced officers.

MR. BLAKE: I think it would be an unfortunate thing if the Administration should act upon the principle that promotions should take place simply because men have been a certain number of years in the service. I think, however, that both Administrations have been too lax with respect to promotions, and even about the $50 increase. I think it would be to the advantage of the Service if, in the future, each Department was to intimate that employes would not be considered as of right entitled even to the $50 increase. The law only contemplated that that increase should take place when the conduct of the employé merited it. But when you come to this grading, it is of the highest consequence that we should lay down as a principle that a clerk is not entitled to run from one grade to another. There are many occupations in the Service in which the value of the services rendered can be no greater after ten years employment than in the beginning.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD : I agree with every word that has just fallen from my hon. friend. In the first place it is quite clear that, under the terms of the Act, it does not follow that when a person arrives at the head of his grade by length of service, he is to be promoted as a matter of course. I am afraid we shall have to share the blame between us on both sides of the House, as to that rule not being observed. It ought to be observed. I quite agree with the hon. gentleman about the Statutory increase. It has not worked well. Although it was intended that this increase should be given as a reward of merit, it has been felt throughout the Service that if any officer does not receive it it is because he does not deserve it. His pride is wounded, and he becomes a less valuable officer. I think the true plan would be to wipe away that provision altogether, and leave the matter of increase of salaries in the hands of the heads of the Departments. This subject has been pressed upon our attention during the past year. Immediately on Prorogation, it is the intention of the Government to apply themselves to the reorganisation of the Service, and to try to work out some scheme for Parliament next Session. I think great economy could be secured by a more scientific reorganisation.

MR. MACKENZIE : Does the hon. gentlemen contemplate adopting any of the suggestions contained in Dr. Playfair's Report. Copying should be done by clerks employed at $5 a day. The cost of keeping second class clerks at copying is enormous. This is the point where real reform must come in. I had fully intended myself to have paid some attention to that particular part of Dr. Playfair's recommendation. I trust the hon. gentleman will give this matter his consideration, as it will simplify the same very much.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD : I have read the Playfair Report and considered it with care, but there is a difference of opinion in England on that subject. There is a difficulty which exists in this country that does not exist in England. The gradation in position and the subdivision of labour is so great that there is no difficulty in getting any number of respectable men as copyists. Here, where we are all on the same plane, socially and otherwise, it is impossible to say : here is a class of men who cannot rise beyond a certain status. Still, it is quite true that it is absurd to keep a few clerks of high grade in the different Departments doing scribblers' work.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT : I think that kind of work might be done, to a considerable extent, and very well, by lady copyists.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD : I think the hon. gentleman has gone a very great way in solving that difficulty. You can always get a number of young ladies who could do that scribblers' work.

MR. CASEY : I hardly think the difficulty will be relieved by getting temporary copyists of this kind. It is not to be supposed that they would make it a life business. The young ladies would merely undertake it for a few years. I am very glad, however, to hear that the hon. gentleman intends to have a matured measure brought down next Session, and I hope that his prediction in this respect will prove more fruitful than the prediction he made this year.

13 The Department of Customs.....	$31,705
14 The Department of the Postmaster-General	104,220

In reply to Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT,

MR. O'CONNOR said the increase was made up as follows:—Secretary's Branch: Assistant Chief Clerk, $2,000; Junior Clerk, $300; Statutory increases, $1,850. Increase in Accountant's salary, $400; three Clerks, $1,900; Statutory increase, $3,250. In the Money-Order Office: additional Clerk, $300; Statutory increases $2,750. In the Saving's Bank: two additional Clerks, $700; Promotion and Statutory increase, $1,050. The Statutory increases amounted altogether to $8,900. Of the eight Clerks appointed, six had been temporary and were made permanent, of the other two one was brought from St. John and the other from Halifax. On the Money-Order branches being abolished at those places, they were placed in the Department here at an increase, one being given $900 and the other $600.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT said he thought that increase amounting to about $15,000 was a very serious matter. We could hardly imagine that the business of the Post Office had increased so much as to require or warrant all this additional staff, especially having regard to the deficit between revenue and expenditure.

MR. HUNTINGTON called attention to the fact that for some years hon. gentlemen opposite were constantly attacking the Post Office Department under the late Administration, for its terrible extravagance. But there had been an improvement in this respect since the Department passed under its present management; there had been no reduction to show that they were justified in making those attacks. Those attacks were unjustifiable, as the hon. gentlemen found since they assumed the responsibilities of office. As the hon. the Postmaster-General had a facility of speech in defending himself and his colleagues, he (Mr. Huntington) hoped and expected to have heard him state that his party was mistaken in the attacks they had made when occupying the Opposition benches during the late Administration, and to have heard him acknowledge practically and candidly, that the Post Office Department had its difficulties in a financial way, and that it had been administered under the late Government as well as it could be, and not so as to justify the wholesale abuse heaped upon it by hon. gentlemen opposite at that time.

15 The Department of Agriculture . .	$32,450
16 The Department of Marine and Fisheries	28,310

In reply to Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT,

MR. POPE (Queen's, F.E.I.) said the hon. gentleman was right in stating that there appeared to be an increase of four clerks, but some had been in the Department for years. Instead of the amount being in the Estimates, however, they had been paid out of Contingencies: the number of clerks had really been increased. This service was conducted more economically and better than any other Department of the Public Service. It had also been thought better to put two chief clerks instead of one, and place them on the same footing as in other Departments, such as the Post Office. The General Superintendent of Light-houses had been transferred to the Department of Railways and Canals, because, although valuable in the Fisheries Department, he would be still more useful in another Department.

17 The Department of Public Works . .	$30,200
18 The Department of Railways and Canals	$39,760

In reply to Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT,

MR. LANGÉVIN said that he himself, as Minister of Public Works, and the hon. the Minister of Railways, had each less work than their predecessors had, because the latter had in his time the whole Department to administer; but it was impossible for one man to do that thoroughly, for it was such an increasing Department. The division of the Department necessarily required the staff to be increased. It stood to reason that a complete staff was required for each of the two new Departments; a sub-chief for each, a secretary for each, and engineers, and so on, for each; and, therefore, the expense had been increased instead of being decreased. The work had been increasing steadily, year after year; the work of the Railway Department, especially, had increased; the works on the Pacific Railway had increased. As to the amount of money voted in 1878-79 and the amount required this year, namely: for 1878-79, a sum of $53,833, and for this year a little less than $70,000 or $16,130 of a difference, he had this to say: In the Department of Public Works there was the Statutory increase of $650; there was the allowance of $600 for Private Secretary, not granted the previous year; there was an officer, Mr. Stekle, in the Engineering Branch, a very good officer, and one of the best mathematicians we have, formerly paid out of the different works that were under the control of the Department, and whose salary was not therefore in the list of expenses for salaries last year. Mr. Perley, another good officer, was employed as an engineer in the Lower Provinces, but he has been brought here to be the Engineer of the Department. His salary was not included in the list last year, but was paid out of the works constructed in the Lower Provinces. Then there were the shorthand reporters, who were transferred from the Post Office Department, and another officer in the Architect's office, who received $650 a year, who were not on the list of officers last year. These sums aggregate $8,900. In the Department of Railways, Mr. Page's salary has been increased $500, making it now $4,500, I think. Mr. Cross, whose salary is $1,850, has been transferred to the Department of Railways. Mr. Jones, who receives $1,250, and Mr. Greenfield, who receives $750, were paid out of the Intercolonial grant, and those salaries were, therefore, not included in the amount of $53,000 for the previous year. While giving these explanations, I may say that Mr. Schreiber's salary was, up to last year, paid out of the Intercolonial Railway. When I came back from England I turned my attention to the outside staff of the Department. There was a large staff in the Lower Provinces and a small one in the Province of Quebec. These were excrescences on the Department. Under the different Administrations one clerk after another had been added until this service was swollen to large proportions. The expenditure in those establishments, in the Lower Provinces, amounted to $10,635 per annum, and $7,959 a year in the case of Ontario and Quebec. Those establishments have been abolished. I do not say that the whole of that expenditure will be saved, but we will certainly save from $14,000 to $15,000 a year out of that. During the next season we will require a few engineers and clerks to go round and examine certain harbours, but they will only be paid for the time they are employed.

MR. ANGLIN : This is rather an interesting statement. We are learning now something of the nature of the extraordinary economy effected in reconstructing the staff on the Intercolonial Railway. The gentlemen whose names have been given are employed in doing a portion of the work which was formerly done by

Mr. Brydges and the officers employed under him at Moncton and elsewhere on the Intercolonial. If we were to enquire carefully into the matter, very little saving has been effected by the Government. With regard to the Public Works staff in the Lower Provinces, I think that service was organised when the hon. gentleman himself was formerly Minister of Public Works. If the Government pursue the policy they followed the last year or two, with regard to the improvement of harbours and the creation of places of refuge in the Lower Provinces, there is very good reason for the reduction of the staff, for there will no longer be the amount of work to be done that there was formerly.

MR. LANGEVIN : Because three of those officers have been brought from the Intercolonial to the Department here, the hon. gentleman does not acknowledge the reductions made in the Railway Department. But the salaries of those officers cannot make much difference. There are 250 more miles of Railway in operation now than before, and that requires a larger staff. With regard to the Lower Province staff, I thought we would not be justified in keeping it partly employed when a large portion of the work could be done at head-quarters. The remainder of the work can be performed by special hands employed temporarily.

MR. ANGLIN : Having a large portion of the work done at Ottawa does not make it cost less. There is a strong feeling against the centralisation going on in such matters. If it would not cost more to have it done in St. John than in Ottawa, there is no reason for the change. With regard to the reduction of expenses on the Intercolonial, the hon. the Minister of Public Works has misunderstood me. The Report of the hon. the Minister of Railways shows that the saving on account of all those salaries of the officials is not $250,000, but less than $26,000. I have already remarked that, even if that saving had been effected, by the dismissal of some of the officers and the reduction of the salaries of others, after all it was not as great as appeared at first, because the amounts now paid by the Department of Railways ought to be added to the amounts paid the gentlemen employed here. A portion of their services is required for the work of the Pembina Branch Railway. A few nights ago I proved the hon. the Minister of Railways was astray in his statements as to the saving from the workmen's wages.

19 Departmental Contingencies . . . $137,750

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT asked if the hon. the Finance Minister knew what the expenditure for the present year would be; was he going to ask for Supplementary Estimates?

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY said he thought the Supplementary Estimates would contain an item of only $500 for the Audit Department and no other. He thought this total vote would cover all the contingent accounts for 1879-80.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT asked for an explanation of the increase of $5,000 for the Detective Service.

MR. BOWELL said the services had cost more than was anticipated when the $10,000 were taken. He found it necessary, from the constant reports of smuggling going on in different parts of the country and along the frontier, to appoint an additional officer to look after the Revenue, and prevent smuggling if possible. He (Mr. Bowell) was strongly of opinion that the tendency to smuggling was increased by the statements in the Opposition press, that it would be easy and profitable to smuggle, under the present Tariff, which made the duties higher. He was quite satisfied that the seizures and savings effected by the Detective Force, and the additional amounts received by the constant supervision of the different invoices presented, and the compelling of importers to pay the duties according to the law, upon the fair market value of the articles purchased in the different countries of production, would double the charge for their salaries.

MR. ANGLIN said the expenditure they could lay their fingers upon, but the saving seemed of a rather impalpable character.

MR. BOWELL said he did not know that he would be justified in laying the invoices of the different importers before the House, but he would show the member for Gloucester (Mr. Anglin), in the Appraiser's Office, if he took the trouble to go there, invoices proving the truth of his statement—of course no improper use would be made of their examination. He could see the large profit accruing to the public from the present strict surveillance over this branch of the service. Where the invoices of goods have been under the market price of the country wherein produced, they have been raised in accordance with the strict provisions of the law. He (Mr. Bowell) knew this sort of administration was unpopular with importers, but the public interest had to be protected. The old law was, in some respects, more restrictive than the present. The value for duty is fixed at the time of the exportation of the goods at the then prevailing price.

MR. DESJARDINS: At the port of Montreal I observe that while the regular salaries for the year 1879-80 amounted to $78,000, and the wages and extra services to $17,000, this year the salaries are $69,000, and the extra services 25,000. Is the advance in the amount for extra services caused by a reduction of the staff in regular service?

MR. BOWELL: The decrease in the port of Montreal arises from the fact that a number of officers died last year, and have not been replaced. Some of the older ones have been superannuated, and others who were doing outside service have been charged to the ports in which they are stationed. But in no case, has there been any officer put upon the Permanent List in the city of Montreal since I have had the honour of presiding over the Department. It was found necessary, in one of the Appraisers' Departments, to have an assistant, to which position Mr. Lamarche was appointed, and that is the only addition which has been made to the staff since I have been in office. About $12,250 per year have been saved at that port by not filling vacancies that have occurred from various causes. Unfortunately, at that port, the Department has an elephant on its hands in the shape of a warehouse, and that has cost us this year, in local taxes, no less than $3,320 over and above the contingencies necessary for that Department. However, there is an actual saving in salaries and in the entire management, of $11,950 for the year.

MR. JONES: There seems to be complaint on the other side of the House whenever there appears to be an increase in the Estimates, and also complaint whenever there appears to be a decrease. I said the other night that, with regard to the Customs Department, there was a penny wise and pound foolish system carried out. I think it unwise to decrease the expenditure on Customs at a time when we have increased our Customs duties to so considerable an extent. Reports come to us that the regulations of the Department are being evaded, invoices are being entered at 30 per cent. to 40 per cent. under the actual selling price in the United States, and yet the Customs Department do not compel these parties to amend their entries. We have a law increasing our duties 25 or 30 per cent., and we have not got sufficient authority to carry out the law. If an invoice passes our Customs Appraisers, no matter how much he has undervalued his goods, I understand the law is such that the authorities cannot seize the goods. But in the United States, where they have much higher protective duties, if a man passes an entry undervaluing his goods, no matter how long afterwards the officers can go into his premises and seize both the goods and the books, and compel him to make restitution. But here in Canada if a man is detected in passing a false entry, an influential friend or a member of Parliament goes to the authorities and says: This is a friend of mine, an honest fellow, I want his goods released, and the goods are released. Another man is found making an entry with an undervaluation and the goods are detained. He goes to the Administrator of the Department, and what is said? My friend, you have made a little mistake, no doubt, but just amend your entry and pay the duties and it will be all right. If the Department would take the matter in hand and make a few seizures they would not be troubled so much with smuggling. Appraisers should be appointed over certain districts, to see that goods are entered at their proper valuation.

MR. RYAN (Montreal Centre): Notwithstanding the reduction in the staff and in the salaries at the port of Montreal, I am not aware that the Service has suffered any detriment thereby. The business seems to be just as well performed by those who remain. But I wish to call the attention of the hon. Minister to the fact that the appraisers ought to be better paid. The salary of an appraiser ought to be at least $2,000 a year so as to place him beyond temptation to wink at undervaluations of goods.

MR. BURPEE (St. John): Speaking of this Appraisers' Department at Ottawa, it may accomplish what the hon. Minister expects of it. But I am of opinion he would secure his object more effectually in stationing appraisers at some of the larger ports, where they will accomplish more than they can here at head-quarters. I quite understand the difficulty the hon. Minister is under in exacting the fair market value for goods where they are purchased. There will always be found importers who will try to evade the law if they can. On the other hand the great majority of merchants are honest in their entries. I believe there are just as many honest merchants in the country as there are honest manufacturers. Some of them have suffered great hardship in the interpretation of the law. My interpretation of the law is to make a fair valuation upon the market price in the country in which they are purchased. I submit that it was never contemplated by the law to charge duty on any increase which may take place on the goods imported between the time of shipment and the time of arrival in Canada. It is a rule, however, if persevered in, that should work both ways. If the price falls on the shipment the duty should be levied on the reduced price. I desire to refer to the matter of the defalcation of the Toronto Custom House, which has been alluded to at a previous time on motions for papers, etc. The hon. the Minister of Customs then stated that that defalcation existed in 1875; it was so reported by Inspector Kavanagh that no action was taken. This, however, was not the fact. The reports of the Inspectors only showed that an irregularity existed. The returns brought down do not show any defalcation in 1875, nor is there such charge made by the Inspector either against the Collector or cashier. The Inspector reports an amount of $841 in the cashier's hands in 1875, which he said he retained to pay refunds, etc., and sent in an account of the distribution of the same every three months. The Inspector says this is irregular, and should be accounted for every three months. He further says that he left instructions to have the deposits made every day, and the cashier's accounts balanced every month, and that Mr. Douglas was ordered to see these instructions carried out. In the Commissioner's investigation, November, 1879, Mr. Douglas declares that he does not remember any such orders from Mr. Kavanagh the Inspector, nor did he hear of anything irregular as to the keeping of the cashier's or Collector's accounts. The Commissioner's reports of November 14, 1879, November 25, and November 27, 1879, do not furnish any evidence that such was the case. The cashier acknowledged he was short, both to the Commissioner and Inspector Newburn, later on, but no time can be fixed when it was. He said to the Commissioner, as per his (the Commissioner's) report, that it was $3,500, but to Mr. Newburn he said at one time $2,000, and at another $1,000. On these, however, the cashier and Collector gave contradictory statements, but nothing definite could be ascertained. They, however, both say that this was kept strictly secret from the Inspector and the Department. Inspector Newburn says that he visited Toronto port in 1879, and remained there a long time. During that time he had no hint or the slightest suspicion that there was then, or had been any deficiency or irregularity in the accounts of either the Collector or cashier. The first intimation I had was in November, 1878, when for the first time the cashier's book was closed at 2:30, then at two o'clock, and so on, till at last it was closed at twelve o'clock in the day, whereas, the office closed at four o'clock. This closing the cash book so early in the day, gave an opportunity to use the funds after that hour for the day. Inspector Newburn also says in his Report that the great bulk of the defalcation took place between December, 1878, and April, 1879. He also says that Collector Smith told him, that he (the Collector) and McClose disagreed about November, 1878. The funds were then shut off from Mr. McClose, and then the larger borrowing began from Customs, etc. These reports show that the late Government was only cognisant of the existence of an irregularity on which I was not prepared to dismiss an officer, I should have to be satisfied that he had taken money before I would have removed him.

MR. BOWELL: I think the hon. gentleman has gone a little farther than he intended to go in his statement in regard to that defalcation. The remark I made was that, if the irregularities, not the defalcation, to which Mr. Kavanagh had called the attention of the Department in 1875, had been checked at that time, this defalcation would not have taken place. In relation to the practice of levying duty on goods which increased in value subsequently to the period of their entry, the hon. gentleman is mistaken. The rule is that if they have increased in value between the period of purchase and the time of exportation from Liverpool or other foreign market, the duty would be levied under the law on the increased value, but not as stated by the hon. member, upon the increase in value of articles after shipment; that was the old law, but to avoid any difficulty on that point, my hon. friend the Minister of Finance amended the Act by repealing that clause, and enacting one under which it would be impossible, unless the law were grossly violated, to charge increased duty on the value of goods after they had been exported. Undervaluations are constantly taking place; the value for duty is the fair market value at the time of exportation. I do not accuse merchants of dishonesty, or that the undervaluations are made for the purpose of defrauding the Revenue. A merchant goes to the United States, and the seller there, in order to keep the Canadian market, sells at a less price than they do to their own dealers; and when the merchant in this country presents his invoice, the prices are less than the fair market price in the market in which they are purchased, or at the time they are exported to Canada. It is the appraiser's duty, under the circumstances, to see that these invoices are raised to the fair market value at which the exporters sell to their own dealers in their own country. That is the law.

MR. BURPEE: All goods do not come that way.

MR. BOWELL: I am speaking of these particular invoices. When a deputation of hardware merchants waited upon me I showed them the law. They certainly did not find fault, except that they thought it unfair that the value should be added to their invoices in this way, while in case of prices falling the difference could not be deducted.

MR. ANGLIN: Hear, hear.

MR. BOWELL: The hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Anglin) says "hear, hear;" it is quite evident he does not know the law. My hon. friend thinks it an unfair law that does not work both ways. But it is strange that for three years there should be left in the Act a clause making a special provision that under no circumstances shall an invoice be lessened in value for duty. Let my hon. friend refer to the 46th Section. That clause being on the Statute-book how can the hon. the Minister of Customs or the appraisers, even if satisfied that the price of goods have gone down, deduct anything from the invoice on that account. If the law is wrong then it should have been repealed; but having been passed by the late Minister of Customs he could see no wrong in it until he became an Opposist.

MR. BURPEE: I can explain that.

MR. BOWELL: There is no Collector of Customs with whom I have had correspondence whose attention has been called to this that has not placed the same construction on it. It is our duty to see the law, as it stands, carried out. As to increasing salaries, I agree with the hon. member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Ryan) that there are officers whose salaries ought to be increased, considering the duties they have to perform, and I have provided for an increase of some of them. There is one who acts as Clerk and Secretary to the Collector, and does an amount of correspondence most marvellous, and I intend to increase his salary, as well as those of some of the Assistant Appraisers.

MR. BURPEE: I agree that it would be impossible to take off the difference from an invoice in case of the goods going down in price, but I connected that with the remark about raising the value above the invoice when the goods go up. The amount of value when exported is the value to be entered in the Customs house, and if the goods go up in value between the time of shipment and their arrival in this country, the invoice should not be increased.

MR. BOWELL: It has never been done; if it has the Department does not know about it, though such was the law as passed by the hon. member himself when Minister of Customs.

MR. BURPEE: The clause which refers to importation of goods is the thirty-second section of the Customs Act. This clause refers to the entering of goods. What determines the value is the market value.

MR. BOWELL: But the 133rd clause fixes the date when the market value should be considered to rule.

In reply to Mr. GILLMOR,

MR. BOWELL said that West Isles was formerly a port of entry: the amount of duties collected, and the duties to be performed fell off, hence the port was made an outport of St. Andrews, and the salary of the Collector at West Isles reduced, so that though the pay roll at St. Andrew's was increased by $300, the actual saving to the Revenue was $400, by abolishing the port of West Isles.

MR. BROOKS: I notice in looking over the details at the port of Sherbrooke a $1,400 increase. I would like an explanation of this, as to whether any new officers have been appointed or any increases made in the salaries of officers.

MR. BOWELL: Neither the one nor the other. To relieve Montreal of a certain officer, Mr. Barry was sent to Richmond by my hon. friend opposite, as a general detective. The fact of his being there, induced the Government to erect Richmond into an outport of Sherbrooke, Barry receiving his former salary; but being made an outport of Sherbrooke, it gave it the appearance of increasing the expenses of that port, when, in fact, it was only a transfer from Montreal, where he had been for thirty or forty years, and being a very active officer, was sent to Richmond, where he has been made a sub-Collector.

MR. BROOKS: Then Sherbrooke has suffered for the benefit of Montreal. It seems an anomaly that the salary of such an officer should be equal to the salary of both Collector and Assistant at Sherbrooke. Sherbrooke is the fourth port in the Province of Quebec, and the expenses are less in proportion to receipts than in any other port in that Province except two others, being only 8 per cent. of the receipts. I have no fault to find with this officer at Richmond, or with his appointment, or with the making of that place into an outport of Sherbrooke; but he receives within $100 as much as the Collector and Assistant at Sherbrooke, both of whom are efficient men and able officers. They have given satisfaction to the public there and to the Department, and I would urge upon the hon. Minister that, when it can be found possible to do it, there should be a gradual increase in their salaries.

MR. SPROULE was glad the hon. the Minister of Customs saw the necessity of guarding against goods entering below value. It was a custom very prevalent for United States travellers coming through the country to offer goods to merchants and arrange to send two invoices. He had heard these offers made very often, and he thought that with the view of providing against this practice, it would be desirable to have more appraisers; it would be to the interest of the country. It was not so much to the advantage of the importer as to the seller on the other side to carry on this practice, when they could accomplish it by making out two invoices, and sending one by mail and the other lower one along with the goods. By a little species of book-keeping it could be made impossible to find it out. More attention and more appraisers would protect the interests of the country.

MR. BROOKS: I notice, Mr. Chairman, by the schedule in the Estimates that the expenses of the port of Sherbrooke have been increased by the sum of $1,400. I would like to know from the hon. the Minister of Customs for what purpose this sum is required, whether additional officers have been appointed at that port, or whether the salaries of the officers at that port have been increased.

MR. BOWELL: Neither the one nor the other. As I stated before, this increase is caused by the establishment of an outport at Richmond, and the payment of the salary of Mr. Barry, who had been sent there by the late Government from Montreal, and whose salary was fixed at the sum of $1,400.

MR. ANGLIN said this story of cheating the Revenue was a very old one; and there was no proof whatever that, to-day, with the existence of this Board of experts and all the additional cost, a more effectual check is placed on frauds of this kind than before. Under former Administrations all possible care was taken at the various ports of entry to prevent these frauds; under the Administration of the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie) care was taken to ascertain the market value of articles for which fraudulent entries might be made, and parties making them were compelled to rectify them. We had this Board established at very considerable expense, and even amongst very honest and honourable merchants the decisions of that Board had caused very serious discontent. No one could fairly object to the hon. Minister indulging in a joke. He rarely does so, and although this was second-hand, he should be permitted to indulge in it without objection. But the whole country must feel that when the duties were increased, the work of the smuggler and the illicit distiller was promoted.

MR. BOWELL: How is illicit distillation increased?

MR. ANGLIN: By the higher rate of duties on liquors. A larger force is now required to check such operations than was required some years ago. The hon. gentleman seems to think that smuggling has either been put an end to or virtually checked by means of the larger detective force, but the general impression is that there is a large amount of smuggling going on all along the frontier. With regard to the port of Montreal, there has, for years, been a great deal of talk about the expenditure there. The late Minister of Customs made some changes in the regulations of the port for which he was violently attacked, because they seemed to increase the expense of collecting the revenues of that port. I do not see there has been any improvement under the present régime. But, taking everything into consideration, distribute the expenditure how you may, the expenditure for this year is larger than that for last year, even excluding the superannuation allowances.

MR. BOWELL: The hon. gentleman has used one expression which I do not want to go to the country without contradiction. He stated that the decisions arrived at by the appraisers were "arbitrary."

MR. ANGLIN: I said they were so regarded by importers.

MR. BOWELL: The hon. gentleman repeated the statement, and put it in such language as to leave the impression that the appraisers acted arbitrarily, and without sufficient data. I can tell him that no matter what the impression is in the country, such is not the fact. Importers have not been interfered with at all, except upon the best possible evidence that goods were marked at less than the price for which they were bought, or at prices under the fair market value in the country in which they were bought. If the hon. member desires to assist in the proper administration of the Customs law, I think he should rather justify the conduct of the appraisers in the conscientious performance of their duties in endeavouring to establish uniformity in prices for duty in different sections of the country. The hon. gentleman says that if this matter were properly investigated it would be found that the appropriation was as large as the previous year. If, however, the hon. gentleman would look into the matter he would see that the Estimate was not as large as the previous year. The difficulty I had to encounter was that our ports were overstocked with officers. There were more men than were necessary, and I have invariably, when a vacancy occurred, promoted the next man to the position, if qualified, giving him a little increase of salary, thereby saving the balance.

MR. ANGLIN: The hon. gentleman has misinterpreted what I said. What I did say was that complaints were made by importers of the decisions of the appraisers. In regard to the port of Montreal I did not deny that there was a reduction in the amount of the salaries. On the contrary, I said there was a large reduction and I stated the manner in which the hon. member accounted for the reduction. What I said was, that taking the figures as they stand, the amount to be expended in that port next year is quite as large as the amount asked for last year—a few dollars larger, I think. The Estimates for the port of St. John show an increase of $600, while it is notorious that of all ports in the Dominion the falling off in revenue for that port was the greatest. Therefore, there could have been no reason for an increase of wages.

MR. SMITH (Selkirk) asked what provision had been made for the prevention of smuggling, and the collection of duties in the North-West.

MR. BOWELL: There has been no change made in regard to the collection of Customs in the North-West.

MR. SMITH: At what points on the boundary line does the collection of duties take place?

MR. BOWELL: Wherever the North-West Police are stationed there the duties are collected, and if it be necessary for the officers to go to a frontier port on Customs business, they go there and attend to it.

MR. SMITH: Then the duties will continue to be collected by the officers of the North-West Mounted Police?

MR. BOWELL: Yes.

MR. SMITH: I understood the system was to be changed, and the duties collected under the auspices of the Minister of Customs.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT: Here again is a tolerably ample justification of the votes taken by the late Government. We find the present Minister wants $13,510 more than in 1880. In the case of Customs, I could understand more money might be wanted, and my impression is that it will be; and I was not disposed to find fault with the demand of a few thousands more. But I hardly think the same rule applies in the case of Inland Revenue. The increase here is considerably larger than in the Customs; it amounts to 16 on 17 per cent. on the previous expenditure. The present hon. Minister used to find fault with us for the small amount we expended. In 1877, the total expenditure under this head was only $211,000; in 1878, $215,000, and in 1879, $211,000. As between $211,000 and $235,000, now asked, there is a difference of nearly $24,000, making a very large expenditure. I cannot see what ground there is for adding nearly 12 per cent. to the total expenditure in this item.

MR. BABY: The addition is only $12,000.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT: I speak of the actual expenditure in the last Public Accounts before us. Has the hon. gentleman found that there is such an increase of illicit distillation that this expenditure is required, or are there any other causes? The revenue has not increased to any appreciable extent.

MR. BABY: The number of distilleries and malt-houses has increased considerably, although it gives no revenue; and there is increase in every branch of the Service. There are ten distilleries under surveillance.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT: There used to be quite that number.

MR. BABY: For some years previous to a recent period the number was diminished considerably.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT:

In 1878, there were only four distilleries.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT: There were more in 1876, and the expenditure then was not any greater.

MR. BABY: In every branch the business has increased, Excise officers being required now where they were not before, to protect the Revenue.

XXXVIII. DOMINION LANDS—CHARGEABLE TO CAPITAL.

XXXIX. DOMINION LANDS.

207	Outside Service, Land Agencies in Manitoba and North-West Territories, and Timber Agencies, nine offices in all; their salaries, contingent expenses and inspection.....	$32,009
	Extra Clerks at Head office, Ottawa, maps and other printing and advertising expenses and other similar charges.....	14,600
208	Outside Service, British Columbia, Staff, contingent expenses inspection, etc.....	10,645

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT: This is very much objected to in the present shape as chargeable to capital. The amount is very large, but independently of that, the charge to capital appears to be objectionable. We have charged in former years very large sums steadily to Dominion lands. The practice of charging anything to capital is to be guarded against.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: In the first place, this $300,000 is for surveying some 7,000,000 or 8,000,000 acres of land, which it is proposed to survey this year. The influx of immigration is so large that in the township surveys and block surveys, the system about to be adopted is to have competition between the surveyors as to the charge. We cannot exactly say what the lowest tenders may be, but it will be under four cents an acre. As to the charge to capital, it is simply owing to this that we hope to realise capital out of the land and this charge is to be taken out of capital.

MR. MACKENZIE: It is not fair having regard to other years.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: It only requires an explanation. It is satisfactory to know that up to yesterday at Emerson, 7,000 emigrants came in, 3,500 of whom went into Winnipeg. There is a great claim for land both by settlers and purchasers.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT: I do not want to press discussion. The sums recived heretofore for Dominion lands have been credited as an ordinary income. This is manifestly correct, and I do not think it is right to have this survey charged to Capital. It should be charged to Income and any proceeds also should be charged to Income; therefore, in the Public Accounts for the future, if this is persisted in, you must charge the other side.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Certainly, a special land account can be kept for this for which credit will be given for all moneys received and in which all charges for surveys, etc., will be charged.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT Without pledging myself as to taking a vote I may say that that will to a considerable extent obviate the objection which lies to charging to Capital. Some distinct assurance had better be given on that head.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: By the terms of the Resolutions of last Session, there would have been a general arrangement made between Her Majesty and Canada. There would have been Commissioners to hold these lands in trust. As there are no Commissioners, the Government must act as Commissioners, and keep the accounts which the Commissioners, if appointed under the Resolutions, would have kept.

MR. BUNSTER: I would like to know about having the twenty-mile belt of Vancouver Island surveyed. By an Order in Council there is a reservation made.

MR. MACKENZIE: That is all over.

MR. BUNSTER: It is not all over; it is in Vancouver Island. The hon. the First Minister has staked his reputation on it. He has a large interest in it. It is my duty, and it is his duty, to see it surveyed and thrown open for settlement. There have been many going away through the delay. I want to know whether he intends to have it open for settlers.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: There was an Act passed setting aside certain lands on the Island, and Mr. Kertch, acting on behalf of the Canadian Government, is pressing on the British Columbian Government the necessity of immediately setting out the railway lands under the agreement of Union. Negotiations are going on to have them at once set out.

MR. MACKENZIE: That Act was passed, as to the land on the Island, as a condition of building the Nanaimo and Esquimalt Railway. That enterprise fell through, therefore the Government have nothing to do with it.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: The land is reserved by an Act of Parliament, and can only be restored by a repeal of that Act. There is an Act of the British Columbia Legislature actually reserving those lands for the purposes of the Pacific Railway.

MR. MACKENZIE: Not for the Pacific Railway; for the Esquimalt and Nanaimo Railway.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I may be wrong.

MR. BUNSTER: According to the Carnarvon Terms, $2,000,000 a year were to be expended on Vancouver Island.

MR. MACKENZIE: No, no.

MR. BUNSTER: The hon. gentleman, who was a party to the transaction, says "No, no." If it were not too late in the Session, I would convince him by means of documentary proof, that he is wrong. The hon. the First Minister made a request to British Columbia to reserve twenty miles of land on Vancouver Island, and that land was reserved, much to the detriment of intending settlers. It is my bounden duty to call attention to the injustice done to the Province. The hon. member for Lambton, in all earnestness, landed 500 tons of rails on the Island, with the intention of building the Railway, in accordance with the Terms, but they were carted away again. We do not mean to let go of the Award for one moment, and we expect that the hon. the First Minister will do justice to himself and the country, and carry out the Carnarvon Terms.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: We must try and get the best land we can out of British Columbia.

MR. SMITH (Selkirk): Is it the intention to survey the land round Edmonton, St. Albert, and other stations on the North Saskatchewan?

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: There is a party surveying Edmonton at present, and another is about to be sent out to make further exploratory surveys.

In reply to Mr. BUNSTER,

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said: I cannot give any other answer to my hon. friend, in regard to our position with respect to British Columbia, until we receive an answer from the Government of the Province.

MR. MACKENZIE.

MR. BUNSTER: That answer is important to our people, and they will see that Mr. Walkem does his duty. If he does not, we will soon turn him out.

MR. SMITH (Selkirk): Have any timber licenses been given out in the North-West this year, or if not, is it the intention to give out any.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Yes, we hope to be able to give out timber licenses. There are several applications from people of enterprise and capital, who desire to build grist and saw mills. Licenses will only be given to persons who show that they have means to put up mills and utilise them at once.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Licenses have been granted under the terms of the Dominion License Act. They are for twenty-one years. The holders pay a good rent and royalty. The original licenses were granted to Mr. Macaulay and others before 1873. Some were granted in our time. Last year they were put up to public competition, and some twenty berths were sold and $24,000 received on account. That system will be adopted as a general rule.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT: Unless you adopt one definite system for all concerned there is very great danger of jobbery, particularly in a country where the privilege is of much more value than in any other part of this Dominion.

MR. BUNSTER: What is intended to be done with the timber licenses of British Columbia?

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Until we have the negotiations concluded with British Columbia, it would be impossible to offer any policy on the subject. I will give my hon. friend (Mr. Bunster) the earliest information when the negotiations are terminated. Since the present Government was formed all the twenty-one years licenses for timber have been given to public competition. We only give our permit or annual licenses from year to year.

MR. SMITH (Selkirk): Is it the intention of the Government to give any licenses for coal mining in the unsurveyed Territories?

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Respecting the coal district of Souris, under the Dominion Act, certain provisions were made to encourage exploration, and people had een exploring and marking off limits for themselves. The Government have stopped anything of this kind, especially at Souris, where a coal-field is believed to exist, close to the boundary. There is to be a thorough, exhaustive examination of that coal-field, and till its extent and value are ascertained it will not be put into the market. It would be bad policy to allow it to go into the hands of people who might raise the price; so that whole district is withdrawn from settlement, until the geological and mineralogical survey is completed.

MR. SMITH (Selkirk): I hope something will be done in the upper part of the Saskatchewan, where there are valuable coal-fields.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I hope so.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT: I should be glad of the Government's decision as to whether they will reserve a certain royalty on the coal-fields or not. We have made no attempt to increase our Revenue from the great mines and coal fields. Those coal-fields are exceptional deposits. The question is worth considering. I would be glad to hear the hon. the First Minister's views on the subject.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: We have a Bill before the other House to give more power to the Government in regard to this matter.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT: A very considerable revenue might be obtained in this way.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I think so.

DUTIES OF CUSTOMS AND EXCISE BILL.

[BILL 102.]

(Sir Samuel L. Tilley.)

SECOND AND THIRD READINGS.

Bill read the second time.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the said Bill.

(In the Committee.)

MR. BÉCHARD: Allow me to call the attention of the hon. the Finance Minister to one Customs duty which works injuriously to some people. I refer to the duty imposed on imported apples. There are some people situated on the Richelieu River, engaged in dealing in apples. They were in the habit of going to the States of Vermont and New York, where they could buy apples at cheaper prices, and they brought them by the Richelieu River to the Province of Quebec where they sold them. That trade was very profitable to some people in the Province. The duty of 40 cents per barrel has entirely annihilated their trade. They could get their apples for 15c. per bushel last fall, but the duty amounting to 16c. per bushel makes the cost of those apples 31c. a bushel, which is more than they could sell them at. They could not sell at more than 25c. or 30c. a bushel. I thought, therefore, that I would submit this matter to the hon. the Finance Minister. If the hon. gentleman cannot see his way to remove the duty altogether, perhaps he might be able to make it an ad valorem duty instead of a specific one, as it is, for surely common apples should not pay the same duty as apples of the finest kinds.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: I am afraid I shall not be able to meet the wishes of my hon. friend. I think, as a rule, that, with anything like a favourable season, we have an abundant supply of apples, and at pretty low prices. I recollect being in the County of Kent, some years since, and observing that there was there, and on the whole of the Peninsula, an abundance of apples of every kind and description; some of the best were sold at $1.20 a barrel delivered at Prescott Junction. With the increase of fruit trees transplanted since that time, I think we must produce apples sufficient for our own use. I am afraid I cannot comply with the request of my hon. friend.

MR. BÉCHARD: It is true that apples, like everything else, were cheap in Canada last fall; but I wanted to point out to the hon. Minister one branch of trade which had been entirely destroyed by his Tariff.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: I can quite understand that just in that locality it may have had that effect.

Bill ordered to be reported.

House resumed.

(In the House.)

Bill reported.

Motion made and question proposed :

MR. BÉCHARD.

That the said Bill be now read the third time.—(Sir Samuel L. Tilley.)

MR. ROSS (West Middlesex) : Before the Bill is read a third time, I would like to call attention to a discrimination, or rather a want of discrimination, injuriously affecting an important branch of Canadian industry, in relation to the duty on imported cement. Have we native production suitable for building purposes? There is a very large industry engaged in the manufacture of artificial stone. The ingredients used are common stone and Portland cement. Portland stone is imported from England, and those engaged in the manufacture of this artificial material are placed at a disadvantage in having a part of their raw material heavily taxed. The tax is the same on both Portland cement and hydraulic cement; they are both placed on the same footing. Hydraulic cement is produced in this country; and as the object of the Tariff is, or should be, to give the Canadian manufacturers their raw material as cheaply as possible, I can see an incongruity between taxing both these articles alike. I now, therefore, draw the attention of the hon. the Minister of Finance to it, in order that he may avail himself of an opportunity which he now has of relieving an important industry of a heavy duty, and of thus supplying us with a material so much needed.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY : I very much fear that, if Parliament were to take the duty off this cement, it would not compete with the stone of a superior character to be found so abundantly in different parts of the Dominion. Supposing it were admitted free, cement is a very expensive article. I do not think there would be a cubic yard in a barrel; and it appears to me it would be cheaper to use stone, even if it had to be brought a considerable distance. The suggestion of my hon. friend would of course involve the removal of the duty for all purposes. My attention has not been called to the matter before, and I very much regret that we cannot open up the question at the present stage. I will take a note of it and take the matter into consideration, though I confess it does not present itself favourably to my mind at the present moment.

MR. BLAKE : My hon. friend asked for bread, and the hon. the Finance Minister gives him a stone. I will give the hon. gentleman an answer, in regard to his suggestion, about cheap stone; it is that the artificial stone is being largely manufactured at certain points.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY : If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Ross) was asking for bread, I am afraid it is bread that he cannot live very long on. In view of the evidence taken last Session, in regard to the quality of stone in certain localities, it strikes me that it would be exceedingly difficult to compete with the stone to be found in certain parts of Ontario.

MR. ROSS : We have no stone in Western Ontario, such as serves the same purpose as the artificial stone—in fact, we have none in any part of the Dominion. The artificial stone made in my town and other parts of the Province serves almost the same purpose as the beautiful Ohio stone, which was used for dressing in the Parliament Buildings. It is extensively used for lintels and ornamental purposes of all kinds. I hope that between now and next year the Government will give this matter a little attention.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY : I have taken a note of the matter.

MR. MILLS : In the section of the country in which I reside—in fact, on the Western Peninsula, we have no free-stone at all. We were largely supplied with free-stone from Cleveland, Ohio, but the hon. gentleman's Tariff has excluded the free-stone of that neighbourhood, and this artificial stone is taking its place. It is used largely for ornamental purposes in buildings of a superior character, but the hon. Minister's regulations practically prohibit its use in the erection of buildings of a public and private character. It is very desirable that either the duty should be taken off free-stone, or the duty reduced on Portland cement, or both.

MR. ANGLIN : I have no doubt the hon. Minister will be surprised to learn that even in the city of St. John, where we have large quarries of free-stone within a few miles, a large quantity of this artificial stone has been used since the fire. All the window frames and ornamental work of the new Methodist Church, on Queen square, are built of artificial stone made in the city. One advantage in using this stone is that it can be pressed to the necessary shape in the process of manufacture, thus saving the expense of cutting which adds much to the cost of free-stone.

MR. CURRIER : Cement is manufactured in various parts of this country, and my hon. friend from Middlesex can buy just as good cement, manufactured in Hull, as the Portland cement. Enough can be manufactured there to supply the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec. It is cheaper than the Portland cement, and will compare favourably with that article for every purpose.

PICTOU HARBOUR ACT AMENDMENT BILL.—[BILL 106.]

(Mr. Pope, Queen's, P.E.I.)

SECOND AND THIRD READINGS.

Bill read the second time, considered in Committee of the Whole, and reported.

Motion made and question proposed :

That the said Bill be now read the third time.—(Mr. Pope, Queen's, P.E.I.)

MR. BLAKE : It does not appear that this Bill is based on a proper principle. The hon. mover says it may be quite right, that, in all cases, the Harbour Commissioners should have the appointment of the harbour master. But I think that where a harbour master has been appointed, it would be proper to leave him undisturbed, and not legislate him out of office simply with a view to his temporary appointment by the Commissioners. I presume the harbour masters now hold office during the pleasure of the Government.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD : No doubt.

MR. BLAKE : I should not object to a provision that, for the future, the Commissioners should be the persons under whom the harbour masters should hold office ; but that change should be effected by legislation. I think that on general principles no officer should be legislated out of existence in this way. You should give the Commissioners, for the time to come, the same power of dismissal as the Government has.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou) : I think the hon. member for West Durham misunderstands the Bill which, as I understand it, does not legislate the harbour master out of existence, but leaves to the Harbour Commissioners the right to deal with him as they think proper—to dismiss him if they see fit.

MR. BLAKE : What is the proviso for ?

MR. McDONALD (Pictou) : Though I doubt if the proviso gives the power the hon. gentleman supposes, I have no objection, if it is desired, to strike it out. I agree with him that it is undesirable to legislate such an officer out of existence. The object of the Bill is to put the harbour master under the control of the Commissioners—there is no other purpose.

MR. BLAKE : Then strike out the proviso.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou) : I have no objection.

MR. ANGLIN : Is Pictou the only harbour where the Commissioners have not the right to appoint the harbour master ? Is this an exceptional measure ?

MR. McDONALD (Pictou) : I think the same jurisdiction was given to the Commissioners in other parts. I am not certain whether the power is general or not.

MR. BLAKE : I presume the Bill is intended to bring Pictou within the general rule. There can be no exceptional reason why its Commissioners should have the appointment of the harbour masters and the Commissioners of other ports not have a similar power.

Bill again considered in Committee of the Whole, amended, and reported.

MR. BLAKE : I hope the Government will consider the suggestion of the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Anglin) and deal with all harbours on the same general principle. No special circumstances for an exceptional policy in this case have been assigned. Therefore, on motives of general policy, I think it is not proper to apply an exceptional Bill.

MR. POPE (Queen's, P.E.I.) : The Harbour Commissioners do not appoint the master at any of the harbours. During the Recess, a general Bill on the subject will be considered by the Government, with a view to having all the harbour masters appointed in this way.

Bill read the third time and passed.

MR. ANGLIN.

REMOVAL OF OBSTRUCTIONS IN NAVIGABLE WATERS BILL.—

[BILL 107.]

(Mr. Pope, Queen's, P.E.I.)

SECOND READING.

Order for second reading read.

MR. BLAKE: Some of the provisions of this Bill appear, at first blush, rather beyond our jurisdiction. They appear to create, in reference to a civil wrong, a liability on the part of individuals for expenses incurred in removing obstructions, or recovering damages therefor from a private owner. It seems to be rather doubtful whether we have power to give the Crown the right to remove such obstructions, and levy in a civil action against a person for the cost and expense of such removal.

MR. LANE: I would like a clause added giving to municipalities the power of removing all obstructions from rivers. We have had a great deal of difficulty in our part of the country from those obstructions, and during last year the citizens of the town I live in were put to the expense of getting a decree from the Court of Chancery to remove an old hulk from the harbour, which cost us a considerable sum. I propose the addition of the following clause:—

“And be it further enacted, that any municipality in or through which any navigable river runs or harbour is situated, or is in whole or partly situated, shall have the right to notify in writing the owner or owners of the vessel or obstruction or such wreck as referred to, or part thereof, lying or being in the said harbour or river, situate within the limits of the said municipality, within to remove the same from such river or harbour. Or, in case the said notice is not complied with within days, the said municipality shall have the right to remove the same and charge the expense of such removal to such owner or owners, which expense may be charged to such owner or owners and collected in any Court of competent jurisdiction.”

I do not think there can be any objection to this clause. The law, as it stands, is not well defined and should be made clear. Such a law as I propose would be beneficial. We have a number of hulks in our harbours and rivers that should be removed in the interest of navigation and trade.

MR. MILLS: I think that very serious wrong may be done under this Bill.

Take the case of a collision, where the party not at fault has his vessel sunk. He would be liable to still further damage for the cost of the removal of his vessel from the harbour or water-way. Apart from the question of jurisdiction, that is a serious defect. Unless you take proper steps to protect innocent parties against wrong in that way, the Bill should not pass.

MR. POPE (Queen's, P.E.I.): I believe the parties interested in the collision should remove the wreck. Have the people of the country any right to do so? Somebody must pay for the work, and why not the private parties interested in the vessels or obstructions? There is much reason why the Bill should pass. Our law ordering the owners of wrecks to remove them is evaded. Some years ago a vessel, laden with lumber, was wrecked at Prince Edward Island, and run on the flats where every vessel, approaching at night, incurred the risk of a collision. Though applications were made, time after time, to have this vessel removed, and tenders were received for the work, it remained unmoved up to last year; the cost of removing her being $900. With a law like this proposed, the navigation could have been cleared long before. In this case the parties responsible for the wreck left the country, entailing upon it the loss of $900. There are many demands upon the authorities at present for the removal of such obstructions. If the Government is compelled to remove them it should be compensated, and the expense not thrown on the public. In some cases, where the channels are narrow, they are entirely blocked up with wrecks.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: The Bill is intended to cure a serious evil. The hon. member for West Durham has raised the point of jurisdiction, which is worthy of all consideration. But I think that, under our powers in connection with the subject of navigation, we can pass the present Bill. The evil dealt with is of very considerable importance, and I hope the House will allow the second reading.

MR. BLAKE: The cases which the hon. the Minister of Marine has mentioned, no doubt ought to be provided for, where a party is wilfully negligent, runs his vessel on the flats or sinks her in a harbour, and does not remove her, running the risk of obstructing the channel.

He is guilty of a wrongful act, and provision ought to be made for making him pay the damages, or cost of removal, as well as a proper penalty for his offence. But there are cases in which this might prove a very harsh measure, including that suggested by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills). Are you going to charge the owner of a vessel which has been sunk by the fault of another, and who has thus suffered heavy loss, with the cost of removing the wreck in addition? Ought you not rather make amenable the persons whose wrongful act occasioned the obstruction?

MR. McDONALD (Pictou): The difficulty in carrying out the suggestion of the hon. member for West Durham would be, that you would be throwing the onus on the Government of establishing which of the two crews or ships was at fault, a point that should be more properly determined in a Court. It does not appear to me to be a great hardship to hold the party whose vessel obstructs the navigation responsible for its removal, as he can establish that as an additional item of damages against the party blameable for the collision or loss, when proving his other claim. When dealing with the public interest, the Government can hardly look at the immediate loss of a private party.

MR. FLYNN: I remember a case of a vessel of twenty or thirty tons burthen being run into, in a harbour in Nova Scotia, by a steamer, and sunk. They could not have taken up that craft. In cases of that kind the Bill would inflict great hardship.

MR. POPE (Queen's, P.E.I.): There would have been no great hardship in the case mentioned. If the fault lay with the schooner, she should have abided by the consequences. The parties in the wrong could be taxed and compelled to pay damages.

MR. KILLAM: Some of the provisions of this Bill appear unfair and likely to inflict serious injustice upon private parties who might not be able to pay the cost of removing wrecks. This Bill has been introduced at so late a period of the Session that I presume the Government do not intend to press it. We should have an opportunity of consulting our vessel-owning friends before being asked to pass a Bill of this kind.

Bill read the second time.

PROMISSORY NOTES DUTIES ACT EXTENSION BILL.—[BILL 108.]

(Mr. Baby.)

SECOND AND THIRD READINGS.

Order for second reading read.

MR. BLAKE: The hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue promised at this stage to bring down a statement of the amount of the duties collected.

MR. THOMPSON (Cariboo): I would like to ask the hon. gentleman what provision he intends extending to British Columbia, to enable persons in the interior to get conveniently the necessary stamps. A resolution has been passed by the Chamber of Commerce, Victoria, setting forth the inconvenience that would accrue to persons in the mining districts if with the Bill passed, if facilities were not extended to them of obtaining those stamps. I am perfectly in accord with the statement of that body, as I know that, in the isolated mining districts, especially during the winter, it would be almost impossible to obtain stamps every time they were required. The Memorial says:

"The imposition of such duties in our widely scattered mining camps, where the greater part of the business is done on a credit basis, will entail on the traders and miners a very heavy burden, without any corresponding advantage to the Revenue. For instance: At Cassiar, where from November to May no communication takes place with the other parts of the Province, the proper observance of such an Act will be almost impossible, and the non-observance may result in serious loss. At Kootenay, where there is only mail communication five times a year, and at Omineca, where there is none at all, it will be a matter of impossibility to comply with the requirements of the Act."

I merely wished to enquire of whom the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue intends we should apply for these stamps. If we cannot get them, we should not be subject to the penalties the law imposes upon those who fail to obtain them.

MR. BABY: The Department will give the same facilities in British Columbia as exist in the other Provinces. Any responsible party will be furnished, on application, with a license to sell bill stamps. If the hon. gentleman wishes to recommend any respectable man for a license to sell bill stamps, the Department will grant him one. With respect to the question put by the hon. member, if he will refer to page 210 of the Report of the Department, he will find that in Prince Edward Island, in 1878, the revenue derived from bill stamps amounted to $295, and in 1879, to $1,045. No revenue whatever has been collected from British Columbia up to this year. During the present year it appears from the books of the Department that $3 have been collected in that Province up to date.

CANADIAN RESIDENT AGENT IN THE UNITED KINGDOM BILL.—[BILL 88.]

(Sir John A. Macdonald.)

SECOND AND THIRD READINGS.

Order for second reading read.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: It has been found, in the opinion of the Government, necessary to have an agent residing in the vicinity of Her Majesty's Government. With the growth of Canada, its increasing power and population, and its increasing interests as they are developed, it is found that the correspondence across the seas which the Government have to conduct, is altogether unsatisfactory, and that it will be well to have a Minister residing there. We have now a financial agent in England with subordinates throughout the United Kingdom, but it is proposed that this Commissioner be charged specially with this service. Without saying anything either in disparagement or praise of the present agent, or of the past agents who were charged with the matter of emigration from the United Kingdom to this country, I may say it has been found that an agent living in London, without a commission, has not been able to claim anything like public attention to that important subject. It can be well understood that the statements of a mere agent, with a limited and local jurisdiction, to a certain extent not known or recognised as holding an office for the purpose of expediting and assisting in giving information to intending emigrants—it is found that he is placed at a disadvantage when he is confronted by the active, ceaseless and energetic exertions of the various agents of the railway companies in the United States, whose prosperity and future depend altogether in the seduction of the emigrants from Europe—and especially from the United Kingdom—to the United States and diverting them from Canada. It is believed that by having an officer holding a quasi diplomatic position, in fact holding a diplomatic position so far as is consistent with our position of a dependency of the Empire, his statements, and actions, and prestige will be generally accepted by the public, and will greatly assist in giving a direction to emigration from the United Kingdom, and from Europe generally, especially from Germany. At present, the local emigration agent living in London can have no influence whatever. He is not accredited in any way to Her Majesty's Government, and can have no influence on the continent in the way of giving assurances or holding out hopes to the emigrants from the north of Europe. That is a matter of primary importance, especially just now when, happily, there is a growing tendency in Germany to an emigration towards British North America. It is believed that an officer of high rank and position, to whom reference can be made, and to whom the Colonial Secretary can send any communications from continental powers on this subject, will be of the greatest importance to Canada, and will assist us in the attraction of emigration. That is only one small branch of the duties that it is proposed to impose upon this representative agent. Besides looking after the whole question of emigration, we thought it desirable to have a representative agent on the spot to attend to the commercial interests of the Dominion. It is known that within two years, most of the commercial treaties which previously governed the commerce of the continent, have been abrogated, and that all the European nations are at this moment taking counsel together for the purpose of renewing old treaties, and amending them, or at all events establishing the commerce of the world, so far as Europe is concerned, on a new basis. Therefore the Dominion, like the other Colonies of the Empire, have been, to a great degree, unrepresented; and it is of great importance, at the present juncture, to have in Europe a resident agent, or Minister, who will be on the spot for the purpose of being consulted upon any negotiations that are going on between Her Majesty's Government and the various European powers in commercial matters. Her Majesty's Government have, as will be seen by the papers laid before the House, assented to the proposition of Canada. They are willing to receive and to give proper position and prominence to such an officer. They will give him such a diplomatic position as is consistent, of course, with the subordinate position of Canada as a dependency of the Empire. Although it is not well to mix up personal questions with the general principles of the Bill, it is known that Sir Alexander T. Galt has been selected to fill the office. His success as the agent of the hon. gentlemen opposite in the Fishery question has given him a prestige which will, I think, inure very much to the future advantage of the Dominion. He has been employed under the wing of Her Majesty's Government, with the assent of that Government, in attempting to interest France, for instance, in special commerce with Canada; he has been also employed by the Government in attempting to interest Spain in the trade between Canada and Cuba, Porto Rico and the Spanish possessions generally in America, and with Spain herself. I may say that when Sir A. T. Galt, in the first place, went to Spain, at the instance of the present Government, his instructions were to attempt to open up trade with Cuba and Porto Rico. But at the suggestion of the Spanish Government itself, the sphere of his instructions were enlarged, so that the whole question of trade with Spain herself, as well as her Colonies, was opened up. In Spain, as well as in other older countries, matters move slowly; but the manner in which we have been treated, and the way in which the suggestion made for the enlargement of trade, especially between Cuba and Porto Rico and Canada, have been received, give us great hope that there will be in the early future a largely increased trade with Cuba and Porto Rico. In France we were just on the verge of success, in respect to the reduction of duty on Canadian shipping built in Canada and sold in France. It is known that the shipping built in England can be sold in France on paying a duty of two francs per ton, while the shipping built in Canada must pay a duty of forty francs a ton. The obvious injustice, if it be an injustice, the obvious disadvantage to Canada in such a discrimination against her ships, was pressed upon the French Government, and it was almost agreed—I may say it was agreed—that Canadian ships might be introduced to France at a duty of two francs per ton, when Austria gave notice to all the nations with which she had commercial relations that its treaties were at an end. That of course at once put an end to the negotiations. However, both England and France, it is believed, are about to enter into new negotiations for extended commercial relations. In such a case it is obviously of great importance that Canada should have an officer, such as this Bill provides for, who should be always on the spot, ready to take advantage of every matter without any communication with Canada. The office will include diplomatic and emigration duties. It is proposed that the Canadian Agent shall have charge generally of our financial operations, under the instruction of the hon. the Minister of Finance in Canada. On that point the hon. the Minister of Finance will speak with authority, and I have no doubt he will receive the support of the late hon. Minister of Finance in the statements on the desirability of diminishing the cost of our loans, the payment of our obligations at maturity, interest or principal. I believe the credit of Canada is sufficiently well assured to obviate the necessity of paying heavy commissions for the purpose of putting her loans on the market and meeting her obligations under the auspices of bankers or capitalists. Then I have stated that the papers show that Her Majesty's Government has agreed to accept a High Commissioner at our hands. I am sure that this is a very important step towards asserting the importance of the Dominion of Canada as a portion of Her Majesty's Empire. Although it is not quite germane to the Bill, I shall speak about the salary which we will ask the House to provide in the Resolution on the paper. We will ask that the High Commissioner shall receive a salary of $10,000 per annum; that is the salary which is given to our Lieutenant-Governors of first rank, and we hold that the Minister in England should not receive a less sum. The general belief, with those who have spoken to me on the subject, is, that the sum is inadequate for him to keep up the position in England. However, we modestly commence with that sum, and perhaps our successors may find it expedient to increase the amount. I would say, Sir, that I believe, in all sincerity, that it is not only a very important step, but that it is a very wise step that Canada should, at once, as a Dominion, as an auxiliary kingdom, if I may use the expression, should have a resident Minister in England representing our wishes, to receive instructions from us, and keep at once a position among the Corps Diplomatique which has not latterly been accorded to any portion of Her Majesty's Empire. It is a wise step. I think it will fructify for good. I believe, as a matter of economy, that we shall save a large sum of money. It is well that every subject which it is desirable to present to Her Majesty's Government, should be pressed upon that Government by a man of ability, position and prestige. Of course he is merely an agent of the Government of Canada, and everything done by him must be as the agent of Canada, subordinate in every possible way to the instructions of the Governor-General with the advice of his Council.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT: Will the hon. the Minister of Finance explain the nature of the financial duties proposed to be conferred upon this gentleman?

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: The remarks I have to make will be exclusively with reference to the financial portion of the arrangement. My hon. predecessor will, perhaps, recollect that when I retired from office in 1873, and he assumed the duties, he was good enough to ask me whether I had any suggestion to offer relative to matters connected with the Department. I then said that there was one subject to which I attached no very slight importance, and that was an arrangement relative to the negotiations of our loans and the payment of the interest upon our debt in England; that it appeared to me that the sum that we were paying for that service at that time—under the arrangement that had been made by the old Government of Canada previously to the Union, and by the representatives of the different Provinces now constituting the Union—were excessive, and that some arrangement might be made, by the appointment of an agent or some other person in London by which the expenditure might be largely reduced. When negotiating the loan of 1873, an arrangement was made by which it was floated at one-half of one per cent., instead of one per cent. as had been previously paid. When my predecessor floated his subsequent loans he made an arrangement by which all guaranteed loans should be floated without any charge, and unguaranteed loans at one per cent. I think he made an arrangement for the reduction of the percentage on the interest paid from one to half of one per cent. That arrangement has stood to the present time. Subsequent loans, negotiated by my predecessor, and loans negotiated by myself, were under the same terms. But even under that improved arrangement, the amount that has been paid since 1873, by the Dominion of Canada, for the negotiation of loans and for the payment of interest, has been a very large sum indeed. I have in my hand the sums paid in commissions to agents during the last year, simply for the payment of coupons as they fall due, and it amounted to $45,298.53. In addition to that there was something like $5,000 paid for debentures that were purchased in connection with the Sinking Fund. This does not include the commission paid to agents for negotiating loans. Under the arrangement by which these loans were negotiated, one per cent. is paid, together with any cost incurred for brokerage in addition to that. During the next year, from July, 1880, to July, 1881, it is not expected we will avoid going into the English market for a loan with the estimated expenditure upon our Railway the following year of $10,000,000, and subsequent years of $5,000,000 a year. It is very likely that the Dominion Government will find itself under the necessity of going into that market somewhat under, perhaps, the $10,000,000 or $5,000,000. If we were to transfer the payment of interest on coupons on the existing debt as it stands at the present moment, the commission saved would amount to $45,298, not taking into consideration the question of the Sinking Fund and the loans that are to be negotiated in the future. It must not be supposed that these loans can be negotiated without paying some commission, though we may have a resident agent there, but it is very probable that we can save one half of one per cent. at least. It will be quite competent for our representative there to enter into arrangements for the negotiation of our loan, either through our old agent or through the Bank of England, or any other parties he may think proper to arrange with. I can only say, for myself, that I would feel very anxious indeed that the services of our old agents should be secured by our representative for the negotiation of these loans. I have received very great assistance from them, especially when floating the last loan. They were the agents of Canada for many years before the Union. Messrs. Baring Bros., were also the agents of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick before the Union, and the natural feeling will be, if they will undertake any duty of that kind on as favourable terms as any other party similarly situated, that it would be highly desirable that they should have it. In the negotiation of the loan of $10,000,000 our representative there will, I trust, be able to save something like $50,000. I am satisfied that, by the appointment of this official, as now proposed, that the sum that will be expended in the maintenance of that official, and the assistance it may be necessary to give him in order to perform the work, will be a small expenditure compared with the large saving that may result from it in a financial point of view, apart from the commercial, political and other considerations, to which the hon. leader of the Government has referred. I think my hon. predecessor—who has, I know, given the matter some consideration, because I have seen communications from him on the subject—will agree with us, that the time has probably now arrived when the step may be taken for the purpose of reducing the expenditure in connection with the transaction of our business there. I give these figures to the House for the purpose of showing that by transferring the payment of interest on coupons alone the saving would have amounted last year to a very large sum. Then there is another point of some importance. I think it is in 1885, that there will be $35,000,000 of 5 per cent. debentures, that may be redeemed by the Government at that time.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT: That is optional.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: But I take it for granted that if the 4 per cent. securities of the Dominion of Canada sell as readily as at present, that whoever may be in power at the time will take steps gradually, or at one time, to put that portion of our debt on a more advantageous basis than at present. I think a very considerable sum of money can be saved, when that time comes, by substituting 4 per cent. securities for 5 per cents. I think it will be seen that by the appointment of this official, a very great saving can be effected in a financial point of view alone. I think the House must consider that this is a move in the right direction.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT: Can the hon. gentleman give any idea of what the cost will be of the clerical assistance Sir Alexander Galt will require to transact the business he has alluded to.

He knows as well as I do that the cost of maintaining an office in any of the streets in London, frequented by these great commercial houses, is very considerable, and I should like to know, roughly, what he supposes the cost might be.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: That is a rather difficult thing to state now. Our object is to connect this Department with the Department of Emigration. Our High Commissioner is to have control of the Emigration Branch of the Service as well. As the hon. gentleman is aware that the interest on our securities falls due in January, May, July and November, principally, it is intended to make available for that service as well the employés in the Emigration Department. Therefore, it is that the additional number of persons that will be required for the purpose of paying interest on the coupons will not be very great. Probably it may be necessary to have one thoroughly efficient accountant, a person thoroughly up in his work, to take charge of that particular branch. With the employés in connection with the Emigration Department, and with, perhaps, one or two added with small salaries, the work can be performed. An efficient accountant, thoroughly acquainted with the business, connected with the coupons, and, perhaps, one or two persons to assist, will be able to take charge of that work. It may be that the office will be changed to Parliament street. It is proposed to have our representative's department and emigration offices in one building, in order to save expense. In addition to the proposed salary, to which my hon. friend has referred, there will be certain contingent expenses, and the Supplementary Estimates will show the amount considered necessary.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT: I have no doubt that attention was early called to the large sums paid for commissions and brokerage, in having two firms instead of one to transact our business. I am quite aware, of course, that that only strengthens the necessity for taking it into our own hands, and no doubt the present time is a good time to do all. We have succeeded in paying off a heavy indebtedness, and I think it very likely our new Commissioner will be able to extend our loans on very fair terms in times of serious commercial stringency. The connection with the two great houses who have done our business might be of great value again, and that was my reason during my term of office for deferring bringing this arrangement to a point until the matured indebtedness of Canada was disposed of.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: I quite understand.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT: That being done I am bound to say that, so far as the financial aspect of the arrangement is concerned, I see no ground for opposing it. I presume, however, that it will be found necessary to alter the present location of the offices or else to enlarge the building, and I would like to have known if a decision had been arrived at. The cost of lodgings and buildings in that city is very considerable.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: It is believed that our offices are misplaced. However, they are new offices and can be disposed of without any loss. Every endeavour will be made to get near Parliament street, where all the other agencies are—more in the vicinity of other public offices. The hon. gentleman must know that, altogether, we have to be governed by the experience of other Colonies whose offices are all grouped together in a very narrow space. Sir Alexander Galt is charged to obtain offices as suitable and inexpensive as possible, but such as would be worthy of Canada.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT: The hon. gentleman proposes to go out very far from where Mr. Jenkins was established at first, and then he was shifted, or, rather, after his resignation, the offices were shifted to Queen Victoria street, but I presume the intention of the hon. Minister is to have them somewhere near Downing street. The hon. gentleman, I think, or the hon. the First Minister, said something about making arrangements with the Bank of England. I can see very great advantages in that if it can be done. That will give a sort of introduction to our securities, and I think it would be worth while taking a good deal of trouble to make an arrangement with that bank. Every reasonable consideration should be shown to the two great houses we have been dealing with, and whose existence, as I have said, may be of use to us again. They have a large and numerous clientelle who are in the habit of investing in Canadian securities. There are a certain class who deal in securities of the Colonies, and I think that by keeping in with these firms they will secure a good class of investors. I think the pains taken during the last four or five years have had the result of bringing to us a larger number of investors than we formerly possessed.

MR. ANGLIN: The combination of duties which are to be discharged by the High Commissioner is remarkable, and there are some objections to the proposal, as a whole, which ought to be considered. It may be that the time has come when we can, with advantage, establish a financial agency of the sort described. Perhaps we may be able to save a large amount annually by that means. I think it must be obvious that if the duties of such an agency are to be discharged, properly and satisfactorily, the establishment must be organised upon such a basis as to ensure the satisfactory working of it, altogether independent of the supervision of the High Commissioner, and therefore, in considering the propriety of his appointment, we ought to put out of view altogether the advantages likely to be gained by any change in the mode of managing our Public Debt and paying the interest on it. We must have some gentleman at the head of that agency thoroughly qualified to discharge the duties of the position, to superintend and conduct the whole business, just as if we had no High Commissioner resident in London. That High Commissioner will not be in London always. He may be one month in Paris, and another in Madrid. Some one qualified to do the work, and responsible, must be there independent of any control on the part of the High Commissioner—some one of ability known to be possessed of all the necessary qualifications. We may establish such an agency, and it may prove efficient, although we sent no High Commissioner to London; and it is scarcely proper, therefore, in fixing an opinion as to the opportunities of a High Commissioner to take into consideration any saving that may be effected by such an arrangement as that. What the High Commissioner can do to promote immigration, the hon. the First Minister has scarcely explained. He may, we are told, hold communication direct with the Colonial Office. He may receive communications sent to Her Majesty's Government by foreign countries. He may be guided, and he may guide others in accordance with such communications, but all this is exceedingly vague and it would seem not to afford a sufficient reason for the creation of this office. We have already a very efficient immigration staff in London. I admit I have never been able to learn the precise value of the duties performed or performable by these officers in London. It may be that by their services emigration to this country is materially promoted, but I have not seen any evidence to satisfy me that it is. The officials who reside in the out districts, if they are active and energetic in encouraging emigration, perhaps do render valuable services. They, I suppose, make their reports to the Central Office, and in that way the Central Office may be necessary or useful. How far the utility of the Department can be increased by the appointment of a High Commissioner is more than the right hon. gentleman has explained. Mr. Speaker, this appointment is, as it appears to me, of very much more importance and significance than has generally been supposed. It seems a very extraordinary departure from any direction we have previously taken, and it places Canada on an entirely different footing towards the Mother Country from that we occupied before. It seems to be made with a view to the creation of relations between Canada and the Empire of an entirely new character. In a Memorandum submitted to Sir Michael Hicks-Beach by Sir John A. Macdonald and two of his colleagues, some extraordinary statements were made respecting the future relations of Canada and the Empire. These are of a very extraordinary and startling character. Well, we are in a position more than other Colonies, if we choose to do so, to promote concord or discord between the Empire and the United States. We are more in a position than those more remote from that country to promote good feeling or to create difficulties between the United States and the Mother Country; and should quarrels arise, we would have to bear the brunt of the battle, the burden and the trouble of any struggle that may occur between them. The whole question is certainly of very grave importance. In taking this new departure, we are treading on rather delicate ground. In some sense the statement made is correct and unobjectionable, but it may be looked at in another light, namely, the assumption by us of duties and responsibilities which we ought not to undertake lightly. We pledge ourselves to do all in our power to develop the resources of that country, to provide for its good government and the safety and well-being of all who go to dwell there. We do that primarily with a view to the interests of Canada, in order that we may build up a country which will hereafter be a source of wealth and prosperity, not only to the people who live there, but also to the people of the older Provinces, who are called upon to make such heavy sacrifices for its development. In a speech delivered at Montreal, not long ago, by Sir Alexander T. Galt, who, no doubt, received his appointment in advance of the passage of this Bill, took a very different ground from that taken by the hon. the First Minister on this question. He spoke of the utter impossibility of our discharging all the Imperial duties in that vast territory, and declared distinctly that the people of Ontario, Quebec, and New Brunswick have no more interest in that far country than the farmers of Lancashire or the peasants of Tipperary; and he argued that it was incumbent on the British Government to take a great share of the trouble and expense of opening up that country and so extending the boundaries of the Empire. I think we might all concur in that view. It may be said that this sentiment is not incompatible with what has been said in this Memorandum, but I think it will be found that the views of the High Commissioner on this point are scarcely reconcilable with the views expressed in the Memorandum, and he goes to London to present, and, as far as he can, enforce views that are not the views of those who commissioned him. In the next paragraph there is a declaration which seems to have been framed with a view to bringing about some arrangement between the Imperial Government and this Government, with regard to the development of the North-West. If any conclusion of that kind can be arrived at, I think we will all be disposed to join in sincere thanks to the hon. gentleman for having done much to relieve Canada from a burden under which the people are unquestionably tottering. We are told that it is necessary to have constant personal communication between the Governments of Canada and Great Britain, with regard to every important subject that may arise. It is remarkable that our Government should come to this conclusion just at the time when the United States are beginning to think that it is unnecessary to appoint Ambassadors or Ministers to foreign countries, and that it is better to depend upon special missions to do anything which may be necessary to maintain friendly relations with other countries or bring about better or more satisfactory commercial relations. My own impression is that Canada, having from time to time, for many years past, obtained such alterations in her relations with the British Empire as give to her Local Government and Parliament more unrestricted liberty to deal with all local matters should not seek, in any way, to render the connection in matters of Government more intimate than it now is. The policy of Great Britain of late has been entirely in that direction, and that policy has converted a number of discontented Colonies into a number of friendly States, devotedly attached to the Mother Country. The more unrestricted and unrestrained is the freedom of action Great Britain is willing to permit us to possess, and we are determined to exercise, the better will we get along. We complained, a short time ago, of having a particular question affecting the Government of this country sent to England for settlement. We know the views that were entertained on that question. Many hon. gentlemen opposite spoke in terms of the warmest indignation of the conduct of the highest official in Canada, because, as they believed, he had referred a matter of a purely domestic kind to England. But now we are about to appoint a High Commissioner, to reside in London, to be in constant communication with the Colonial Office, to be constantly engaged in making terms and arrangements with that office, which may, to a great extent, afterwards bind us, no matter how we may dislike them. We cannot have so many matters to discuss with the British Government as to need such an official. We had a great deal more need of a High Commissioner twenty years ago than we have at present. Year after year we have received copies of the papers that have passed between the Imperial authorities and our Government in relation to Colonial affairs, and we know that the business is by no means so large now as it once was. A few important questions have arisen from time to time, and I am satisfied that it was very much better that a member of the Government—who had been living in Canada, breathing this Canadian atmosphere, hearing those important questions discussed, understanding what public opinion in Canada is in relation thereto—that a Minister so circumstanced went to the Old Country to deal with those subjects than it would have been to leave them in the hands of a gentleman, no matter how able he may be, who left the country some four or five years before, and had to depend upon despatches or newspaper articles for his knowledge of our public opinion, and of the precise state of our public affairs. There is no doubt of the financial skill and ability of Sir Alexander T. Galt. Probably no man is more competent to put a loan on the British market than he. But he may not always be willing to act in cases of difficulty and doubt, without having the advice and assistance of a Minister to enable him to form his opinion as to what is best to be done. I do not see any necessity for the appointment of a High Commissioner, because we desire to take part in the making of Treaties. Treaties are not made between European Powers every day—not even once a year. When they are about to expire, it becomes a matter of notoriety, and we would be invited to send some person to assist the British plenipotentiary in endeavouring that the new Treaties should be so framed as to protect the interests of Canada. That was done in regard to the United States when the Treaty of Washington was negotiated, and it may as well be done elsewhere. We all know that certain Treaties are to be renewed, and at such time it may be very well that some person should be sent home who is fully cognisant of the opinions and views of the Government to assist in obtaining, if possible, more favourable terms for Canada but the appointment of a High Commissioner for such a special purpose as that is something entirely different from the appointment of a permanent Commissioner to reside in London, and to be employed abroad for the purpose of negotiating Treaties for Canada. There is another reason why I consider this appointment is attended with serious difficulties. Occasionally, a Colonial Secretary entertains extraordinary views as to the duty of Canada towards the Empire. At various times efforts have been made to impose extraordinary obligations upon Canada's military; and, I confess, I regard with some apprehension the fact that a gentleman is to be placed in London as a representative of this country, who will be constantly under the influence of the Colonial Office. I am afraid that acting there, no doubt in the best possible faith and entirely within his instructions, he may commit us to something which we may afterwards find onerous. Amongst the matters which we are told will engage the Commissioner's attention is the Pacific Railway. During last season, when some of the hon. gentlemen on the other side were in England, I observed in the Reports of speeches made at the places where they appeared, observations which indicated that somebody had proposed, and somebody had almost agreed in, some new system of defence, some military reorganisation of some kind or other, which, to be of any value, must necessarily impose serious additional obligations on this people. It may be that nothing more was asked or assented to than what Canada ought to do; but I think negotiations on a subject of that kind would be very much more wisely conducted between the Government of Canada and the authorities in Downing street, than through any gentleman of the temperament of Sir Alexander T. Galt. He is a man of high and exalted abilities, in some respects brilliant, but he is easily swayed by some passing, temporary influence; and he may, in his eagerness to bring about a thorough understanding between the Governments, or for some special object of his own, commit us to something we might not like to carry out. Instead of having this permanent High Commissioner, I think it would be better proceeding as in the past, to send one or more members of the Government to England when any serious question arose between the Governments of Canada and Great Britain. For those reasons I must express my grave doubts as to the propriety of the appointment of this High Commissioner. The suggestion did not come from the Imperial Government; the application was made, in the first instance, by Ministers, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach only intimating that the gentleman to be appointed should not hold, or imagine he held, any position other than befitted a mere colonist. He was quite willing that a Canadian Commissioner should be appointed, that, perhaps, the clerks of the Colonial Office should be spared the trouble of writing so many letters or despatches. The proposal was based on the considerations expressed in this Memorandum; and we are now asked to commit ourselves to what I believe to be a new departure of a most serious character, which may seriously alter our relations towards the Empire, and from which I do not think we can derive any considerable profit.

MR. MACKENZIE: I regret that the hon. the First Minister did not introduce this Bill at the very beginning of the Session, and that the departure of the Commissioner should not have been delayed till Parliament had time to express an opinion upon it. It is the merest farce for a Government, with a powerful majority at its back, to go through the appearance of consulting Parliament after they have accomplished their designs on the subject. I would be able to express myself with much more freedom concerning the mission of Sir Alexander Galt, and his capacity to undertake it, if he were not now discharging the duties of the office, at least he has informed the public in a very formal manner, at the public entertainment given him in Montreal, that he was leaving upon that mission, speaking, also, of his instructions respecting the discharge of his duties. I have looked at the correspondence published, and find it exceedingly difficult to comprehend what are to be his precise duties. Ministers, in their Memorandum and Order in Council, devote much space to proving the necessity for the presence in London of what they call a Diplomatic Agent, and endeavour to obtain an acknowledgment from the Imperial Government of the necessity of a diplomatic appointment, and the investiture of Sir Alexander Galt with some diplomatic character in England. We are even told in the Order in Council that the Ministry hope that he will obtain social precedence at entertainments in England, next after the diplomatic representatives of foreign states. It is a small thing to deal with no doubt in a formal state document.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: There is nothing said about entertainments.

MR. MACKENZIE: It does not, certainly, say that, but it can mean nothing else.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Yes, it can mean a great deal more.

MR. MACKENZIE: I will read an extract from the Order in Council:

"In making their suggestion on this point, the Committee have had in mind the position assigned to the delegates from Canada in 1865 and 1866, which was that of belonging to the Diplomatic Corps, taking precedence after the foreign ministers. They leave the subject in the hands of Her Majesty's Government resting on the assurances conveyed in the despatch under consideration that Her Majesty's Government will accord to their representative a status in every way worthy of his important functions."

Well, if I recollect right, the Ministers sent to England in 1865 and 1866 had no diplomatic mission. They went on a specific kind of business, but were well received and handsomely entertained by the chief authorities of the Mother Country, including Her Majesty and her Ministers, and they obtained proper social precedence; and now this Government asks that the same thing be accorded to this plenipotentiary. The first instructions that should be given Sir Alexander Galt might require some prudence in the use of language, which might be construed in a different sense from that which is suitable to a representative. In the famous speech he made for the hon. the Finance Minister at Belfast, he showed his opinion to be that Great Britain should impose a tax on the breadstuffs coming from all countries but the Dominion, for the benefit of our farmers, promising, in return, that we would do a good turn to the people of the Mother Country by admitting their goods at a lower duty. The hon. gentleman at Montreal, with reference to this matter, used very extraordinary language. Speaking of opinions in England with respect to matters of trade, he said :

“ That I am not altogether wrong in the appreciation that I had of the effect of that policy, may I think be judged by those who will be kind enough to recollect the expressions and statements of the press in England fifteen years after Free-trade was adopted, and when Great Britain was in the full hey-day of prosperity, from what was supposed to be the inevitable result of that policy. At that time we know perfectly well that it was popular to speak in England of letting the Colonies go adrift ; we know perfectly well that at the time the Confederation Act was passed, very many in England considered that it was a good policy, because it would enable us to leave earlier the Mother Country. Now, that opinion changed, and no such opinion is held by either Tory or Liberal in England. It is a most significant change. One might have supposed that, after five or six years of very hard times, indeed, there would have been a greater disposition to throw off burdens to lighten the load, than there was before this Act. But if there be one thing more than another which has raised Lord Beaconsfield's Government in the minds of the independent people of England, it is that he has asserted that the Empire is not to be allowed to diminish, but that it is to be maintained in its integrity. Now, gentlemen, how is it that such a change has come over public opinion in England, for I do not think that any one can deny the change? I affirm it is because the Free-trade policy of England has, quoad foreign countries, proved a failure, and that the people of England are now awakening to the fact that they have within their own dominions a market larger than that which the foreign countries can ever give them ; that it only requires a wise policy on their part, and combined action on ours, to make the Empire independent of foreign countries for everything it requires ; and that in order to foster a trade which has proved during these past years to be an improving one, while others have been falling off, they should adopt such a policy as will bind the resources of the Empire more closely together.”

Whatever that may mean. How the resources of the country are to be “bound together” is something I cannot understand. I could understand their being developed together, but what the binding tie is to be is not explained. Mr. Galt however, proceeds as follows :—

“ The great admitted difficulty which has always met us when we have spoken in England on the subject, and many of us have spoken on it, has been :—You will never get the people of England to submit to a tax upon food. That was true until it was shown that the North-West Territory of this continent was the great food-producing district of the world. It is only for us to open it up, and we shall have solved the only question which made England seriously dependent upon foreigners. We shall have done more by the development of that country in protecting her from the pressure of foreign nations, than could be done in any possible way.”

So Sir Alexander Galt has gone to England to express the opinion of Canada that she ought to impose a tax upon food coming from every place but our North-West Territories. He eulogises the Beaconsfield Government, and shows what has been accomplished under it. But when he would land in Liverpool the first thing he would see would be that Lord Beaconsfield's Government was in a minority of 150 votes in the new House of Commons, and of what use the eulogy of the politically defunct statesman could be to us, of what use to us is an Ambassador to England, is more than anyone can imagine. Could anybody imagine a more indiscreet thing than an Ambassador to England entering upon a laboured argument to show its Free-trade policy is wrong, and that it becomes her, at his instance, to charge duties upon food coming from other lands than Manitoba and the North-West? I cannot conceive of anything more foolish, and can only express the hopeless hope that he may be more discreet in England than he was in leaving Canada. We find in this remarkable speech also matters that have not been communicated to the Canadian people or Parliament. It was made when Parliament was sitting, as we are told in this Memorandum, in the first instance, signed by Sir John A. Macdonald, Sir Charles Tupper, Sir Samuel L. Tilley, that there are at present the following important subjects under consideration. The Pacific Railway was under consideration. Sir Michael Hicks-Beach stated lately that there was no correspondence on the subject. “ Important collateral subjects” are mentioned. What are they? Then come the efforts to secure commercial Treaties or relations with France and Spain. If the hon. gentlemen opposite take my advice they will never mention those efforts. A more reckless, sinful waste of $11,000 was never perpetrated than on this holiday mission to Spain and France. It shows that two or three Canadian gentlemen were able, within two or three months, to spend all that money in travelling and holding needless, senseless interviews with officials and other people in those countries. Not one particle of good was accomplished by the mission. British statesmen will only laugh at this miserable attempt to create a diplomatic corps, of which Sir Alexander Galt is to be the first and shining ornament and apostle. He tells us the question of the military defence of Canada is at present under consideration. Is it? The House has never been informed on the subject. What about this military defence? We find the resident Ambassador, as he is called, using the following language:—

“Therefore, the Imperial Government have, like ourselves, a direct interest in the proper organisation of our militia. They show that interest by furnishing us with skilled officers. It is our business to show that we on our part are furnishing the necessary organisation, and that we keep up the requisite staff. We are trying to do so, and the cooperation between the Imperial and Canadian Governments is going on in the most satisfactory manner. We saw evidence of this the other day when our military school at Kingston was recognised to the extent that certain commissions are henceforward to be given in the British Army to the cadets in that school. I hope the day is not remote when the course that has been taken with regard to the organisation of land forces in this country, may also be extended to our very large body of the most skilled seamen in the world; we have no organisation for them, and I think it is quite proper that we should look forward to the establishment of training ships for the organisation of a Naval Reserve, the result of which would be to permit our sea captains to have the honour of being registered as officers of the naval reserve.”

If there is a proposition to have a Naval Reserve in Canada; if the military defence of the country is to be attended to immediately; if Sir Alexander Galt, as the resident Minister, is instructed to negotiate with the Imperial Government on this subject, is it right that this Parliament should be asked to prorogue without a word of information on this subject? Is it right that this Bill, which might have been introduced on the first day of the Session, should have been postponed till the very last. That it is important to get a full expression of opinion, no one will deny. When it is too late to secure the subject its proper weight in Parliament, it is brought forward. We complain because the Minister has departed already with his instructions, and he took care before he went to England to make an indiscreet speech at this Montreal banquet, in the presence of two Ministers, and to state his own views, as if those were the views which he was instructed to place before the Ministers and people of England. Now, while I am quite ready to discuss with hon. gentlemen, in the most enlarged sense, any of the duties and responsibilities which ought to be cast upon us as a British Colony; while I am prepared to accord them as the responsible Ministers every support which a loyal citizen can give a Government, I must protest against being identified as a Canadian citizen with the policy shadowed forth in these despatches and this object, to which I believe the people of this country will not at present commit themselves. I do not believe in a standing army, or in what Sir Alexander Galt is pleased to say here respecting our neighbours—that they are a hostile, or certainly, if they are not a hostile, at least an unfriendly people. If they were either hostile or unfriendly, it would be a very easy matter, indeed, for them to show it. I am not aware that they have done so, or that they have shown any disposition to manifest a hostile or unfriendly spirit, and it is clearly our duty, while maintaining a dignified position, to cultivate friendly relations with that people, and not to send an Ambassador abroad to Great Britain, whose last act on leaving Canada was to administer a feeble kick to them, and characterise them in terms we have no right to use to any friendly people. This seems the very height of diplomatic folly, if such a phrase can be used. The hon. gentleman says also:

“Referring to the diplomatic duties, if I may venture to use the term, in connection with the duties that are about to be imposed upon me, a new departure would appear to be absolutely necessary in consequence of the growing importance of this country. We have now relations of a diplomatic character, both with the Home Government and with foreign Governments. They arise from the large powers that were conferred upon the Parliament of Canada by the Confederation Act. By that Act the Imperial Parliament surrendered to us the complete control of our Customs, Excise, and every mode and description of taxation. By that Act Great Britain voluntarily deprived herself of the power of negotiating for this country with foreign countries. She deprived herself of the right to say to Canada: ‘You shall or you shall not impose any particular class of duties.’ I think, therefore, I am justified in saying that the passage of that Act has placed us quoad commercial questions, although British subjects, in the same position."

And on the same subject, the Order-in-Council of December 22nd, says :

"In considering many questions of the highest importance, such as the commercial and fiscal policy of the Dominion as affecting the United Kingdom, the promotion of Imperial interests in the administration and settlement of the interior of the continent, and on many other subjects, indeed on all matters of internal concern, the Imperial Government and Parliament have so far transferred to Canada an independent control that their discussion and settlement have become subjects for mutual assent and concert, and thereby have, it is thought, assumed a quasi-diplomatic character as between Her Majesty's Government representing the United Kingdom per se and the Dominion, without in any manner derogating from their general authority as rulers of the entire Empire."

What on earth does all this mean ; this general deliverance of the hon. gentlemen opposite seem to me to indicate that when this despatch was written, it was extremely difficult for them to anticipate what could be or should be said to give something like a character to the dogmas and policy they were about to propound. I can quite understand the policy of the Finance Minister in having a gentleman in London to attend to certain financial operations, that the late Government attended to by means of an agent in the person of Sir John Rose. I am not aware that there was any lack of proper caution or ability on the part of Sir John Rose in the discharge of the duties entrusted to him. It was not necessary to appoint a resident Minister to attend to these matters. It will be observed by those who have read the Order in Council, the wording of which is very peculiar, that while they demand for this new Minister the status of a diplomatic nation, coming next after the representatives of the great and small countries of the world, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach dismissed the whole thing in a most summary manner. He says :

"Her Majesty's Government are very sensible of the advantage which might result from the appointment by the Dominion Government of a gentleman who, residing in this country, would be fully empowered to explain their views on the various important questions connected with Canada, which, from time to time, demand consideration, and which might often be more satisfactorily, as well as more expeditiously, dealt with if such means of oral communication were provided. Looking, however, to the position of Canada as an integral portion of the Empire, the relations of such a person with Her Majesty's Government would not be correctly defined as being of a diplomatic character, and while Her Majesty's Government would readily accord to him a status in every way worthy of his important functions, his position would necessarily be more analogous to that of an officer in the home service than to that of a Minister at a foreign Court.

"He would, therefore, primarily communicate with this Department on the various subjects which might be entrusted to him, and while Her Majesty's Government would readily avail themselves of any information he might afford, and give the fullest consideration to any representations he might make on behalf of the Canadian Government, it would, of course, rest with the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs to determine in each case in what precise capacity his services might best be rendered."

That means that the foreign Minister is to deal with this resident Canadian Minister of ours in any way he pleases. He may invite him to attend with his secretary and sit in the lobby while he is attending to matters with representatives of some foreign Government, or that he may send for him, get his opinion, and then dismiss him and tell him he will send for him when he wants him again. The attempt to obtain this desired official status is so deplorably ill-managed, and the snubbing by the Colonial Secretary so marked, that I am only surprised, after this first despatch, that the hon. gentlemen opposite were in such a hurry to commission their Minister without the slightest knowledge of what the policy of the Imperial Government was as to the manner or terms of his recognition, or as to the duties he was to discharge by them for us. I look upon the whole thing as a huge blunder, an attempt to give Sir Alexander Galt diplomatic status powers, and exalt a colony by its humiliation. I will not refer to the policy of the right hon. gentleman opposite some years ago, when he voted down, with a great deal of indignation, a proposition supported by Sir Alexander Galt that the House required a voice in any negotiations with foreign countries concerning Canadian commerce, and that the views of the Canadian Government should be asserted and respect paid to them. We were then told in the hon. gentleman's most vigorous style, that this was nothing else but an attempt at independence, and that anything of that kind was practically a revolt against the authority of the Old Country, which always acted in our interest; that it was the proper party to carry on negotiations. I sympathise with the views of the hon. gentleman, now that we ought to have something to say with regard to negotiations respecting our own affairs, and the late Administration took the best possible means of carrying that view into effect, when we refused to receive the English Commissioner who was proposed by the Colonial Secretary to settle our Fishery affairs. We declined to receive anyone but a man who should be chosen by the Canadian Government. We declined pæremptorily to have anything to do with it if Canada did not appoint her own representatives. Anything that Ministers might propose, to secure recognition of Canadian interests in commercial matters in a proper way, I would be prepared to support. This wretched, miserable attempt to make and send a Canadian Ambassador and establish him in London, when the Colonial Secretary plainly tells us that if there is a back room or office not occupied when he calls, he may sit in it until the Colonial or Foreign Secretary's business is finished with whoever may happen to be in attendance upon him, when he will give our representative an audience, amounts to saying that it would always simply rest with the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs to determine in what precise capacity his services could best be rendered. So his capacity as Canadian Ambassador is not to be recognised at all. He may be somewhat superior, perhaps, to the clerk of the Minister for Foreign Affairs, or the secretary or whoever there is attending upon him, but that is all the recognition he will receive. I have only to say further that, I hope this wonderful Minister's speech has not gone to England, and has not been read by the British Ministers, and I hope Sir Alexander Galt will be able to condone with Lord Beaconsfield, after the flattery he administered to him in that speech at Montreal, and that it will not militate against him and against this country with the greater, more liberal, statesmanlike, and better man who now controls the destinies of Great Britain.

After Recess.

MR. BLAKE: The House may remember that, when this measure was first indicated to us in the Speech from the Throne, I ventured to suggest some doubts as to the propriety of the step suggested. I must confess that nothing that has since occurred, either the expository speech of the new agent who is charged with these duties nor the discussion that has taken place to day, has removed those doubts. It may well be that the time has arrived, for a reorganisation of our financial arrangements in England either by a re-adjustment with our present agents, altering altogether the scale and system of remuneration, or by continued and extended employment of the person to whom, for some time, we have confidentially entrusted the management of these matters, Sir John Rose; or, perhaps, by a slight enlargement of the existing agency in London, an arrangement might be made more satisfactory than the continuance of the present too expensive system of commissions. The possible amount to be saved is a question which it is extremely difficult for anyone to decide, certainly for any independent member of the House who is not acquainted with the details of the present and the proposed plan of working the London financial matters. But the other and larger objects which are proposed to be accomplished by the Government, have not been shown to require this appointment. I do not apprehend precisely what it is the hon. gentleman proposes to accomplish by what he calls modifications and alterations in the relations between this country and England. He talked to us this afternoon of our assuming more the position of an auxiliary kingdom, and he suggests that the present Bill is calculated to forward our assumption of such a position, by giving a diplomatic character to this officer who is to represent Canada in England. I was not a little amused, remembering the old and well-worn character which has been ascribed to diplomatists who are said to be generally sent abroad to perform an office not very honourable for the good of their country.

MR. PLUMB: To lie.

MR. BLAKE: The hon. member for Niagara, with his usual bluntness, has used an expression which I did not wish to use. I was much amused, I say, to hear the hon. gentleman suggesting that any commissioner of a diplomatic or ambassadorial character, would induce the public at large to give much greater credence to the statements of our representative than they would receive if he was a simple agent. But with reference to the more important charge, my apprehension is this: I do not desire to see, under the appearance of a greater measure of control given to the Canadian people, a practical diminution of their present measure of control over their own affairs. I do not agree that we, as a people, will gain a greater measure of control over our own affairs by giving an increased power and facility to our Executive of confidential communication with the Colonial Office, to be carried on by an agent permanently resident in England, and under the shadow and influence of the Colonial Office. I do not agree that more power is obtained by the Canadian people, whom we represent, because our Executive obtains greater power and facilities of negotiation through a resident Minister in England. And having regard to the doctrines, somewhat alarming, as I conceive them, which we have recently heard broached as to the power of the Executive authority to bind the people and Parliament of this country by negotiations with the English Government, I think it is more important than ever that we should have upon this occasion a definitive expression from the hon. the Prime Minister, which, I apprehend, he will not shrink from giving us, and which may prevent suggestions hereafter as to the binding character of negotiations conducted through Sir Alexander Galt. We know there have been discussions over the analogous point: the Treaty-making power. We know the extent to which, within three or four years, the doctrine of the prerogative of the Crown, with reference to the conclusion of Treaties and their binding nature, has been pushed. We know the ground upon which leading Liberal statesmen, who desired to see the prerogative continue, have justified its continuance as consistent in any shape with popular control. That ground is that, under no circumstances, and at no time, for many years, at least, had Government concluded a Treaty unless it had been made perfectly palpable, by preceding public discussion, that that Treaty was but the crystallization of the public will. Now we are dealing in this case with a matter to which these considerations cannot possibly apply. We are dealing with negotiations which are, in their nature, of a confidential and secret character. I need do no more than point to our Minutes for the proof, because we find in the Minute brought down to us during this Session of Parliament, that since last summer negotiations have been in progress with reference to many important matters, among others with reference to the defence of this country, and particularly of British Columbia. But the public does not know anything about these negotiations, Parliament does not know anything about them; we know in no shape or sense what the form of these negotiations was, what the substance of them was, who advanced the questions for discussion, what proposals were made, and what may be the present shape and issue of these negotiations. Considering what has been said, with reference to former negotiations, notably that with Lord Carnarvon, considering the language of this Bill, which makes the person who is to be appointed the representative of Canada, and considering the language of the Minute, I deem it of high importance that there should be a distinct Parliamentary understanding that nothing done by this agent, so called, of the people of Canada, shall be deemed to be more binding upon the Parliament and people of Canada than if it had been done in the ordinary way by the Executive Government; that the Executive Government cannot confer upon this agent, by means of this Act of Parliament, any greater implied or express power to bind us than they themselves have, and, therefore, except in cases in which they have been given specific authority by Parliament to conduct to a conclusion negotiations binding upon us, that we are not to be held in any shape or sense bound by what may be concluded through the medium of this agent. I desire that no more should be accomplished by his action than if, without special instructions from Parliament, without the special authority and sanction of Parliament, a Minister had gone to England and agreed to certain conclusions which, according to our wholesome practice heretofore, we do not hold to be binding upon the people of this country unless the people in Parliament assembled agree. I think it is highly important to us that that principle should be preserved intact and unimpaired, and that the occasion demands a reassertion and a fresh recognition of that principle. If that view be assented to then we shall no longer hear any such suggestion as that terms and conditions materially affecting the future of this country, and adding considerable burdens to it, are binding on us as a people, simply because the Administration of the day is supposed to have made those terms with a Colonial Secretary. We shall no longer hear of this being a treaty binding upon us and to which we are bound to give effect. There is no doubt that an Administration making such an arrangement is bound to do its best to give it effect, but there is equally no doubt, as I hope and believe, that we shall hold that this House is as free to dissent from as to sanction the arrangement. I think allusion should also be made to a significant circumstance in connection with the policy which, in no obscure terms, was foreshadowed in a speech made by the distinguished person appointed to this mission. This speech, made on the occasion of his departure, was made in the presence of the hon. the Minister of Railways and the hon. the Minister of Agriculture. It is, therefore, under the authority, by the assent and consent of these representative Ministers of the Crown, that this declaration of policy was made by Sir Alexander Galt. Now, when we find it stated in the Minute that the question of defence is an important one, on which negotiations have been going on for many months: when we see rumours in the newspapers, that in the event of a war—much less likely to happen, I fancy, now, than it was a few weeks ago, but still a not impossible event—Canada is to be called on to raise a contingent: and, again, when we hear the distinct statement made by this diplomatist, that his policy is to persuade the British people to close their ports against the grain of the world, in order that their own farmers and ours may obtain a higher price from the millions of British consumers, with compensation, of course, to the English manufacturer, in his easier admission to our markets: when we find that all these important questions are to be brought upon the carpet, it is of very great consequence to us that our vital interests are not to be more complicated, fettered or entangled by the result of these mysterious and confidential negotiations, protracted for many months, and which we only learned by the accident of the publication of these papers, than if they had been made under the old arrangements. For my own part, I am extremely anxious, as you know, that the position of this country should be fully considered: I am extremely anxious that it should be seen whether we cannot take our place as a part of the Empire to which we belong, but I am not at all anxious, and I say it frankly, to forward any policy which may produce merely a closer Executive connection with England—I am not at all anxious for any change which will practically give a greater power to the Executive, and less power to the people of Canada, to mould their share of the foreign policy of the Empire. So long as the people of Canada have no voice in the foreign policy of the Empire, I shall be wholly opposed to raising forces in this country to engage in wars incurred in carrying out that policy—to shed our blood and expend our treasure in the promotion of a policy which we have no share in moulding. The first Minister has said that it is necessary that Ministers should visit England occasionally, because free personal communication with the Imperial authorities is requisite in discussing the details of matters under controversy or discussion; but it is obvious that if this agent is resident in England, explanation of these details must still be made by some one from this side. Of course the agent will have the advantage of his long experience of Canadian affairs, but he will not have that intimate knowledge of the changes in current public opinion, and of the policy of the Government, which is necessary in explaining these questions to the British authorities. Last summer it was stated that the public business required that three Ministers should visit England upon various questions. It will not be said, I presume, that this agent can combine within himself the knowledge and experience of the whole Cabinet. It is said again that at this period there is to be a general revision of commercial treaties, and I agree that it is quite possible that the interests of Canada, at such a time, may be served by an agent on the spot, but these Treaties once made are intended to last for a long time, and this, therefore, is no reason for making a permanent appointment, so that on none of these grounds can I see that the proposal is judicious, nor am I prepared to say that it will be economical. The salary of the Commissioner, large as it is, will be a small part of the expense. The contingencies and extras, personal and official, will be found to amount to more than double or treble the proposed expenditure for salary, and on the whole grounds, I cannot favour this new departure.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: The hon. gentleman must know that no arrangement exists by which Canada is to furnish her contingent in case of a foreign war. Such a thing has never been suggested by the Imperial authorities, or considered by the Canadian Government. Whenever that unfortunate exigency should arise, England, I am sure, may calculate upon the people of Canada rendering the assistance which it is their duty, as part of the Empire, to render. In the meantime, I can only say that the rumour upon which the hon. gentleman has based his remarks is utterly without foundation. We have undertaken merely to appoint an Agent-General, as the Australian Colonies have done, to represent the interests, financial or otherwise, of the Colony. We have preferred, instead of sending Sir Alexander T. Galt home as a mere agent, telling him to follow such instructions as might, from time to time, be sent to him, to give him such a position that he can speak with greater authority than as a mere agent for a Crown Colony, or any other colony, whether it has representative institutions or not. I am proud to believe that the Dominion is assuming the position of an auxiliary kingdom of the Empire, and from our population and wealth and probable future, we have a right to say that we ought to be taken out of the category of mere dependencies, like the West India Islands, having Crown agents, and looking after their little interests at the beck of a Colonial Minister. I have no doubt that the hon. gentleman is aware, by experience, that the prestige that attaches to a Canadian Minister is no inconsiderable matter, and we desired to give our agent the full prestige of such a Minister. The hon. gentleman has tried to set aside the financial question, but the Government will not let it be set aside, as it is one of the utmost importance. The hon. member for Centre Huron has admitted in his speech that his experience as Finance Minister has convinced him that a change was necessary in the management of our financial operations in London, and in that view alone there will be a saving of many thousand dollars. The expenses of the Department will not be so large as the hon. gentleman seems to think. In the first place, we have already an emigration staff. I have no hesitation in saying that the emigration policy under which we have been working is a failure. By having a gentleman of ability and prestige to have general supervision of these emigration agencies, not only in the United Kingdom but on the Continent, if they should be established there, these agents can be stirred up to greater activity. Further, this Commissioner will, from the position he occupies, be able to direct to Canada the attention of a class of people who could not be reached by a mere emigration agent. It is proposed to utilise the emigration staff; and a book-keeper and a clerk or two will be all the additional officers necessary. The hon. gentleman has expressed a fear that the country will be committed by arrangements made by the Commissioner. This is impossible. Our agent cannot and will not have any greater authority than those who send him. If he makes any arrangements, they will merely be provisional, having no authority whatever, no value whatever, unless they have been previously or are subsequently sanctioned by Parliament. It will be impossible for him to have more authority than a Minister visiting England. The hon. gentleman has said that a resident Minister will be under the shadow of the Colonial Office, but it will be readily seen that this will be no more the case under the new system than under the present system when a Minister visits England; besides that, the future, as well as the present, of the Commissioner, depends on the satisfaction he gives to the people of Canada, not to the Colonial Minister or to the Imperial Government.

Another objection is, that being a resident of England, he will be absent from Canada, and could not be expected to be so well acquainted with the feeling of the people here. I fancy that an absence of two or three years will not take away from him his knowledge of the people of Canada or their way of thinking, and he will be to blame if he does not keep up a knowledge of, and acquaintance with, the people and their affairs. Besides he is not bound to stay in England. He could do as every resident Minister does—leave England and be here within ten days, receive his instructions from his Government upon any particular question, and return to his post to be on the spot when anything occurred in England which might be taken advantage of for the benefit of Canada. It would be out of the question for the Minister to be continually crossing the Atlantic. The hon. gentleman speaks as if we are going to have the nations of Europe sitting down, and within a short time making and completing negotiations and treaties. These negotiations may go on for years. We do not know what interruptions may take place; when negotiations, broken off for the moment, may be re-opened; we cannot have the Minister of the Crown attending to such exigencies. There is a case going on with France. As I said, when Sir Alexander Galt was in Paris, just as he was about to succeed, and just as the Convention would have been signed, by which there would have been a reduction of the duty on Canadian shipping, an accident caused it to fall through, but it can be renewed at any time. We have ever since been continually in the expectation of having those negotiations renewed; but there have been frequent changes of Administration. The Minister charged with such negotiations has been changed again and again. When the Government has been in immediate expectation of being able to do something satisfactory, some political change or accident interrupted, for the moment, such expectation, Her Majesty's Government are unable to say within what particular week, or on what day these negotiations may be re-opened, and, therefore, it is of great importance that we should have an officer, who understands the subject, and who has received the general views of the Dominion, always there. We will suppose, for a moment, that an agent comes from France to England, to reopen the negotiations in reference to their commercial relations. The hon. gentleman and everybody else must see the great inconvenience—it would be impossible—but the great inconvenience, if it were possible, of stopping negotiations until Canada's representative should arrive on the spot. We must either have some officer in England able to act at once as an ad legis, sitting by the side of, and being continually consulted by, the negotiator; or, as we cannot know, without having a representative on the spot, where the place chosen may be, and as England could not be expected to wait until Canada sends her Minister or representative over—for it could not be expected that they would stop for our convenience—the negotiations will go on without us. We must be always ready. Arrangements are likely to go on with France, Spain, Germany, Austria, Belgium and Switzerland, spreading over many years; and if we desire to be represented from the earliest moment of negotiations to the conclusion, we must always have our Minister there, or we must allow the very unsatisfactory mode to continue, of former days, of the Imperial Government acting of her own accord without consulting us, or we will have to trust to written communications. The advantages of our having a permanent representative there are so obvious, and the disadvantages of the contrary course are so great, that I am surprised at the opposition offered. I can assure the hon. gentleman—if any assurance at all is required—that by no possibility will Sir Alexander Galt, or any other Minister appointed by Canada, be able to bind or pledge, by implication or otherwise, directly or indirectly, the Dominion of Canada, without previous or subsequent sanction of Parliament. If it be important that we should have a person always representing us in the Mother Country, if it be important to have an officer of the kind I describe to supervise, arrange and carry out in a just spirit our emigration system, and if we can save the enormous sums stated by the hon. the Finance Minister, what abler or better man could be appointed than Sir Alexander Galt? He stands well with the Foreign Office, through which office all negotiations with foreign nations must be conducted. He has become almost an outside officer of that Department, from his successful negotiations in the Fishery Award. To the credit of the late Administration and hon. gentlemen opposite, they selected him in consequence of their opinion of his abilities. As to his speech at Montreal, and his views with regard to an Imperial Zollverein, there must, of course, be a difference of opinion on such a subject. Canada would certainly not suffer anything if such an arrangement could be made after the settlement of the North-West. It would be no bad thing for Canada to have control of the English market if England would give it to her; it would be a grand thing for Canada if we had the exclusive supply of that market, and if we were able to supply it.

MR. MILLS: I thought the Government's policy was to find a home market.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Our policy is to so increase our industries as to fully supply our home market and send the surplus home. That is the policy of the United States; that is the policy under which they rival England and undersell her in her own market, and that is the policy which, by-and-bye, Mr. Speaker, I hope to see followed in a vigorous prosecution of the National Policy. Manufactories are springing up in all parts of Canada, and I believe that, if the people at large enter with heart and zeal into the National Policy, we will, ere long, be able to send the products and manufactures of Canadian industries into foreign markets. Hon. gentlemen seem always to despair of their country, they seem to have no faith in it; they have no hope; hope and faith go together. I believe, and I have a well-founded faith, in the development and increase of our industries and manufactures, and the consequent increase of the wealth of our country, increased employment for our people, and our continued advancement, progress and prosperity.

MR. HUNTINGTON: I think the hon. gentleman is mistaken when he states that we have no hope, and no faith, and no confidence in our country. It is in the right hon. gentleman that we have no faith and no confidence; and since he is supported by so large a majority it makes no difference to him, because the country have no opportunity of expressing their opinion. The right hon. gentleman was as hopeful formerly as a Free-trader as he is to-day as a Protectionist. I do not wish to say anything that will be distasteful, but I remember an occasion, not very long ago, when I had to leave the House for a moment, the right hon. gentleman cried out: "Coward." If he had remained in his place I would like to have had an explanation of that expression, which I took a note of at the time, in which he described Canada as an "auxiliary kingdom" of the Empire.

MR. PLUMB: He said exactly those words, and meant them.

MR. HUNTINGTON: I should like to hear from the hon. member for Niagara (Mr. Plumb). The term "auxiliary kingdom" must be explained, and when the consequence of its expression must be in some way exemplified. If the right hon. gentleman had done me the honour to wait, or if the hon. member for Niagara takes his place—as he will, no doubt, be delighted to do—I should like to know what occupation or position Canada is to have as an "auxiliary kingdom" of the British Empire. Is the High Commissioner, whom the hon. gentleman has sent to England, going to speak for an "auxiliary kingdom?" Does the term "auxiliary kingdom" imply inferiority? Are we a part and parcel of the Empire? These are important questions. The term referred to should not be used carelessly or loosely, for while it might have no significance if used in a newspaper paragraph, it ought to be explained if used in this House by the leader of the Government. I watched the right hon. gentleman to the end of his speech, and I wondered how he would explain that speech of the High Commissioner in Montreal. As the House well knows, I have the highest appreciation of the High Commissioner, as a personal friend for years, and as one of the foremost public men of the country. Does the right hon. gentleman's explanations satisfy this House as to the speech made by Sir Alexander Galt, at his dinner, pronounced by him with a Minister on his right and another Minister on his left, and which we have thus a right to suppose was the utterance of the Government of this country? I remember a time when the right hon. gentleman denounced the appointment of any agent in London. His argument then was: that our system, to be successful, must be elastic, and not so particularly defined. I was disposed to believe in the truth of that argument, that we did not require an agent in London, and our ordinary machinery for emigration purposes was sufficient and safer than any more stringent policy that could be adopted. But now he has changed his views, but he has not apologised for having changed his mind; he did not even declare that he had changed his mind on this question. But above and beyond all, he did not repudiate the speech of the London agent. He told us a few jokes, and said a few serious words in regard to that speech, but he did not tell us, for instance, whether the London agent was right or wrong when he made that speech in Montreal, and told the people he was charged with certain duties—in which he practically said that, first of all, he was to take charge of the fiscal affairs of this country in London—that the financing of this country in London is to be taken out of the hands of the gentlemen who, for a long time, have managed it well. The hon. gentleman told us that by the Confederation Act the British Government had ceded to us all the powers of taxation, and by the deduction, which he ingeniously carried out, he wished us to infer that the British Government was not equal to the negotiation of a Treaty of Commerce for Canada, except with the consent of this country. I would like to know whether the people have to be perturbed and perplexed by declarations of this kind on the part of the High Commissioner who goes to London, and whether the right hon. gentleman, in explaining that speech, is still to leave the people in darkness as to whether that is his position. I remember that, when the hon. member for Sherbrooke, now the High Commissioner in London, moved a Resolution to the effect that it was necessary for the people of this country to have Treaty-making power wherever their commercial interests were concerned. The hon. the First Minister denounced that doctrine, stated that it was fraught with disloyalty, and generally pronounced it dangerous. I would like to hear from the right hon. gentleman tonight as to the reaffirmation of that declaration by the London agent, who declared that his point was achieved, and he went to London to carry it out. I would like to know whether that doctrine was as distasteful to the right hon. gentleman as it was in the old days, when he denounced his old colleagues, and when the hon. the Minister of Railways turned livid with distress at the dangers to the Empire which this doctrine indicated. In those days, the High Commissioner, then the member for Sherbrook, pointed out to the member for Kingston (Sir John A. Macdonald), that the policy which he was adopting towards the United States, was a dangerous one. He said it was impossible for us to succeed in any policy of retaliation, and I think, if I remember well, he chided the right hon. gentleman for having stated that our neighbours to the south were a hostile people. I would like to know on what ground, then, the High Commissioner, going in a representative capacity to England, alluded to our neighbours to the south of us, with whom we are so intimately connected in trade relations, with whom, at all events, we are compelled constantly to deal, declared that he was dealing with a hostile or at least unfriendly people. Was it an inspiration of the right hon. gentleman that induced him to say so? In England, the other day, the whole press rose up in arms against Mr. Gladstone, because it was thought he had said something distasteful to the Emperor of Austria, who had called him a "pestilent fellow," and he retorted by stating that he had not full confidence in that Emperor. We know what the consequences were, and how many leading Liberals regretted that, in a moment of excitement, this expression was used. Is it always to be our policy to speak of our neighbours as hostile and as to be distrusted? But, notwithstanding those views expressed by the right hon. gentleman years ago, and which were repudiated the other night by his hon. High Commissioner, we have the evidence of the High Commissioner that a retaliatory policy was not a good thing, and for my own part, speaking for myself, I know not exactly how the people will feel, I venture to express the opinion that it will not be generally regarded as wise that, on every occasion, the public men of this country should seize the opportunity to flaunt defiance in the faces of our neighbours to the south. I should like to know whether the right hon. gentleman thought this declaration was wise in his Commissioner, or conducive to that diplomatic character which, he explained he was to exercise. Then there is another point the right hon. gentleman neglected to speak about. I am sure it was quite like him to remain silent thereon. We all admit that he is very shrewd and takes everything in at a glance—even if some of us do not always admit he is right. The High Commissioner pointed out in the same speech that we should never have undertaken to build the Pacific Railway or settle the North-West without the aid of England. Ministers of the Crown were on either side of him and were silent when he made this declaration. Did the High Commissioner express the opinions of the right hon. gentleman? I think we are entitled to know whether he dissents from this view or not. The right hon. gentleman said a few words about the Zollverein, but nothing about those important points. The Zollverein may be a delightful thing. It may take us back to the old times, before Responsible Government was given to this country, but it is a trifle compared to this burning question which presses upon the people to-day. I am sure it must be forgetfulness on the part of the hon. right gentleman, and I will gladly sit down and hear his explanation, and then continue my remarks. If we are to understand that the High Commissioner made a speech which the Government deny or endorse, where are we? Nearly as blind as when the right hon. gentleman told us we are an "auxiliary kingdom." We do not know what "auxiliary kingdom" means, and we do not know what "High Commissioner" means, and we stand quivering, so to speak, to find out what the Great Powers have in store for us. If it be true that the Commissioner is to urge that the building of the Pacific Railway or the populating of the North-West must not be done without the assistance of England, I do not see any reason for the vote we gave the other day, in which we declared that the road must be driven on regardless of consequences. I speak for myself and no one else, and I believe the people are taking account of these things, and the day will come when it will be necessary to explain, not only the speech of the High Commissioner, but the policy of the Government which appears to be entirely inconsistent with that speech, and about which we literally know nothing. The High Commissioner, having stated those and many other things, clearly made it understood that his mission was to fulfil those functions which he pointed out as being essential—that he went to England to assert that position which Canada had a right to assert, namely, that England has no right to regulate a commercial Treaty except with the consent of this country, and that England was bound to assist in the settlement of the North-West, or it could not be settled at all. He went to impress those facts upon the British Government, and the occupants of the Treasury benches are not prepared to tell us whether those functions are to be fulfilled, or whether we are to drive on in this hopeless contest, or call a halt. I was disappointed in the speech of the right hon. gentleman, and the country will be disappointed. If he were to make a supplementary speech I am sure the country would be delighted, especially if that speech were satisfactory, and it was shown that, as they say out West, he took a good deal of stock in the views of his High Commissioner, especially upon the Pacific Railway question.

MR. BOULTBEE: We are bound to believe the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Huntington) when he says the Opposition generally have a great hope in the future of Canada, but we must also come to the conclusion that they have a very peculiar way of showing it. They may have great hopes for our future, but the hon. leader of the Opposition spent six hours a few days ago in drawing the most melancholy picture of Canada. He pictured her in decadence, plunged in debt, obliged to break faith for lack of means and unable to meet her obligations. Then the late leader of the Opposition spent hours in reading a voluminous selection of garbled extracts from the reports of the North-West, to prove that the fertile plains of that great country are nothing but a sterile wilderness. The hon. member for Shefford spoke with a great deal of feeling about certain remarks about our neighbours. Well, if there is any feeling of distrust on this side, if there is any jealousy on our part as to what may be the action of the United States towards the Dominion, we have some warrant for those feelings. In commercial relations, at least, the Americans are not always friendly towards us. But if there is a lack of warm fraternal feeling towards the Americans on this side of the House, it is amply made up by hon. gentlemen opposite, who seem to recognise the people of the United States as something more than brothers, something more to be regarded than the people of Canada. While they never have a kindly word to say for Canada, they never mention the United States except in terms of eulogy and esteem. Can any country flourish when its chief men have not a word to say in its favour? I protest against this attitude of hon. gentlemen opposite. It is neither fair nor patriotic, and it will not find an echo in the hearts of the people. The hon. member for Shefford could not help sneering at the right hon. leader of the Government for calling Canada an "auxiliary kingdom." I do not suppose that when the right hon. gentleman made use of that word he had Webster or Worcester before him, and he did not look for its exact meaning. But what the House understood, and what the hon. member for Shefford understood, and what the people of Canada and England will understand, is that, in using that expression the right hon. gentleman meant to express the hope that Canada would grow up stronger than she is now, bound by trade and commercial relations and patriotic feelings to Great Britain, that we shall always remain auxiliary, always remain a part of the Empire, and giving added strength to the British Empire, always proud to be a colony of England, always proud to be descended from Englishmen, always proud of being part of one of the greatest nations of the earth. But that nation did not achieve her stability, and will not keep it in the future, from such expressions as fall from hon. gentlemen opposite, who are forever decrying our own institutions and lauding those of our neighbours.

Motion made and question proposed:

That the said Bill be now read a second time.—(Sir John A. Macdonald.)

Motion resolved in the affirmative.

Bill read the second time.

House resolved itself into Committee to consider the following Resolution:—

That it is expedient to provide that the salary for the High Commissioner for Canada in the United Kingdom be fixed at ten thousand dollars per annum.

(In the Committee.)

Resolution ordered to be reported.

House resumed.

(In the House.)

Resolution reported and referred to the Committee of the Whole on Bill 88.

Bill considered in Committee, reported, read the third time and passed.

PILOTAGE ACT AMENDMENT BILL.—
[BILL 116.]

(Mr. Pope, Queen's, P.E.I.)

SECOND READING.

Bill read the second time.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the said Bill.

(In the Committee.)

MR. WELDON: The present system is working very well as far as our harbour is concerned. Whenever a pilot commits a breach of regulations he is brought up and the matter is investigated. The way this Bill now stands, a pilot will be at the mercy of the Board, who may without reason or cause assigned, after the pilot has spent all the labour and trouble in getting his commission, decide that his license shall not be renewed.

MR. WELDON:

The result will be that we shall get an inferior class of men incapable of taking charge of ships. When a pilot goes on board a vessel, he takes charge, not only of the ship and the property in it, but of men's lives, and it is of great importance to have men who are capable, and it is necessary that the men shall find it to their interest to conduct themselves properly by being assured that they will be likely to hold their situations permanently. We cannot expect to get competent men if their tenure is uncertain and fluctuating, and at the mercy of the Board.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou): I am not going to discuss the capability of pilots. I cannot see the force of the objections raised by the hon. gentleman unless he assumes corruption or incompetency on the part of the Board that manages that branch of the public service. The only difference now proposed is this: that that Board, which controls a body of men who ought to be under immediate and prompt control, shall have the power, when occasion presents itself to them as a just one, to refuse at the end of the year to renew their commission as a pilot. Under the present law a pilot can have his license taken away for cause and not otherwise, and it is only proper. By this Bill he can be removed for cause or at the end of the year, or the Commissioners, at the end of the year, may renew his commission. I cannot see that justice may not be done, for if a pilot is improperly removed, or refused his license, he may have an investigation. We must presume that if a pilot has any complaint made against him, during the currency of the year, they will summon him and try the complaint, and determine the character and nature of it, and ascertain whether it is well founded or not, and if well founded, either remove him or, at the end of the year, cancel his commission. There are many things which a pilot may be guilty of, such as drunkenness, which might warrant the cancellation of the commission at the end of the year. The Board can, under this Bill, in the discharge of their public duty, dismiss a pilot who is guilty of carelessness or dissipated habits, or for other reasons which may present themselves as showing that any particular pilot is not the proper man to perform the important functions which are imposed upon him. The pilots are left in the hands of the Commissioners, as before, only this gives the Commissioners a more immediate power to deal with a person whom they may think incompetent to perform such an important trust. I ought to say, that it was my duty, at the instance of the Board of Commissioners, to bring before the Ministry the difficulty which these Commissioners have in dealing with the matter as the law stands, and has stood for years, and it was on that ground that I determined to submit this Bill in accordance with the strong desire of the Commissioners, that this particular alteration should be made.

MR. ANGLIN: There is a marked distinction between giving the Commissioners ample and judicial power to deal with a person, and the power conferred upon them by this Bill, which would enable them, without cause, but simply on suspicion, to withhold from a pilot his commission which it has taken him years of apprenticeship and toil to obtain, and after it has taken him many long years of trouble to fit himself for his duties. It is very important that pilots should be competent, and it is very desirable that the Commissioners should have ample power to deprive those of their licenses who are not competent, careful and sober men. The pilots are a large and respectable class of men, one of the most respectable in the Lower Provinces. These men, however, are, to a certain extent, in antagonism with the owners of vessels and the consignees of cargoes of vessels coming to the ports, and these owners and consignees are continually endeavouring to cut down the charges of these pilots. They are continually making bargains with them, and often arrange with some particular pilot to take the vessel at lower rates, and this Bill would certainly place them in the power of those owners and consignees, inasmuch as the Board of Commissioners is largely composed of such men. The men with whom these pilots are in antagonism, would thus have the power to make arbitrary appointments, and the power to grant or take away their licenses. I hope that the House will not pass any such Bill.

MR. BLAKE: What is the reason for excepting the Province of Quebec from the provisions of this Bill.

MR. POPE (Queen's, P.E.I.): Because they have Boards altogether different from the lower ports. In reference to the remarks of the hon. gentleman from St. John, N.B., as to the importance of having competent pilots, so as not to endanger life and property; and as to the merchants and shipowners being Commissioners, I think that must show that it must have a very opposite effect to that suggested by the hon. gentleman. If shipowners and merchants are generally the Commissioners, they would take care, having the power, to have sober, competent men. Their own interests would require them to do so, and I think there is very much to say in favour of the Bill, taking that view of the question. The Commissioners are generally the leading men of the town, and, as the law stands now, a man may be charged with drunkenness, and without an expensive investigation the Board has no power over him. I think the effect of the Act will be to save a good deal of expense and trouble.

MR. KILLAM: I want to call the attention of my hon. friends from Quebec to the fact that, a few minutes ago, when they thought this Bill referred to that Province as well as the Lower Provinces, they said, "dropped, dropped," but now, when they find it does not apply to their Province, they do not say a word. Before, it was going to be pernicious to their Province, and they commenced to raise an objection at once to the Bill. I appeal to the hon. gentlemen—knowing, as we do that the Bill would apply to the port of Halifax and other ports—why, after they have been told that this Bill would be objectionable, if it were applicable to the Province of Quebec, do they not object to its application against the Lower Provinces?

MR. ANGERS: I was glad to hear the hon. member, who has just taken his seat, apply for assistance. I hope that if ever we require assistance he will give us the same assistance that I am about to give him. I am quite sure that the hon. the Minister of Justice has not changed his mind as to the application of the Bill. I am quite sure it was never intended to be applied to the Province of Quebec, the words making it so applicable were a misprint, and I am told that the hon. the Minister of Justice, when he introduced the Bill, stated that it was to apply to all the other Provinces but Quebec. If I rise to speak upon this Bill, I have no personal interest in this matter, as representing mariners or others from the Province of Quebec; and the opinion I wish to give is that of a disinterested party. I think the Bill is a bad one. I object to the principle of it, because, although it does not apply to the Province of Quebec, we are not sure whether next year we shall not be inflicted with it in that Province. What does this Bill state? It wishes to deprive pilots of acquired rights. It wishes to take away, or to give the power to take away, licenses from them. It says that "no license granted before the passing of this Act shall remain in force for more than one year." Is it right for a man to go through a long period of apprenticeship, to make voyages, and incur expenses and risks in going to sea watching for vessels, and after all this time, trouble, and labour, that every year he is to be submitted to the risk of losing his license? I think the principle of the Bill is bad. We have been told that one excuse for the Bill is to avoid expense in investigations. Is it ever too expensive to do justice to a man, and is there any fault which a pilot may be guilty of that he cannot be tried for like another citizen? Can any other citizen be deprived of his license? Can I be deprived of my license as a barrister without getting a proper investigation before the Bar? Is it right to subject a pilot to the powers of Commissioners by whom he may be dismissed because his authority is opposed to the ship-owners, because the pilot may insist upon pilotage against the ship-owners? This Bill gives arbitrary powers to the Commissioners, who may refuse to renew any license without any ground given for it. Reference has been made to investigation in relation to a pilot infringing his duty. We have these in Quebec nearly every week. We have numerous complaints because the river is exceedingly difficult to navigate, and these investigations cost from five to ten dollars, and they last from an hour to two hours. Surely that is not expensive. Now, in future, a man may be deprived of his license for no cause whatever. We have a law in the Statute-book of 1873 that provides the ground on which pilots may be removed, and for what reasons he may be deprived of his license. This law of 1873 was made after full consideration, not as the result of one man's thought, but the Board of Trade of Quebec and the Harbour Board of Montreal, fully considered the matter and came to an agreement about it, and that law applies to the Lower Provinces. It states what the grounds of complaint must be and how the complaint is to be tried; but now the present Bill provides that, in future, they should be obliged to take out their licenses every year. Under that system a man will never be made competent. They cannot take their boats out to sea, and make themselves efficient when they know their licenses may be taken from them upon the mere caprice of the Board, and when those boats will thus be rendered useless to them. I find another clause to the effect that no pilot can hereafter become a harbour master. I do not see any just grounds for that, because if any man is competent to perform the duties of that position it is a pilot. I hope the hon. Minister will consider this Bill for a day or two longer, and that he may come to the conclusion that it is not right to deprive the pilots of his own, and the other Maritime Provinces of acquired rights.

MR. BLAKE: I would suggest that it would be better this Bill should not be proceeded with this Session. It certainly is infringing most seriously upon the present status of the whole body of pilots of the Dominion, excepting those of Quebec. The law of 1873 gives them a right to that office, which they have purchased at a considerable expense of time, trading, the purchase of a vessel, etc. The law gives the pilot a license which is to last until he is sixty-five years of age, when it is to be delivered up, but may be renewed from year to year. To change the position of those persons, in the serious manner which is proposed, is certainly a strong step. This Bill was only introduced yesterday, and hon. members have not had an opportunity to enquire into the matter. There has only been complaint from one port about the working of the present system, and that may merely be some local difficulty. Under the circumstances I think it would be well to postpone the Bill until next Session.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: After the strong remonstrances made against the Bill, and the remarks made by the hon. member for West Durham, I think it would be well for the Committee to rise and report progress.

Mr. McDONALD (Pictou): There is great force in the observations of the hon. member for West Durham as to the want of opportunity for members to consider the Bill, and there is no desire to press an important measure of this character on the House inadvisedly. But no observation that has been made has changed my mind with reference to the expediency of the measure. The Bill does not propose to disturb matters in Quebec; its object is to restore Nova Scotia to the position, in relation to the pilotage authorities, that she occupied before the present law was passed. I am quite willing that the Province of New Brunswick should also be exempt, and they should enjoy the privileges they prize so highly. The Committee can either rise and report progress, or the Bill can go through, confining its operation to Nova Scotia.

In reply to Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT,

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: In 1872 an arrangement was made between the several Provinces and the Dominion that $70,000 should be appropriated for the encouragement of emigration. New Brunswick did a great deal and spent large sums of money subsequently in bringing out emigrants. They had not the advantages afforded by the Allan steamers. The grant was, however, withdrawn; but the New Brunswick Government, having spent from $65,000 to $70,000 in the promotion of emigration, their claim has been fully and carefully considered by this Government, and we decided to ask Parliament to appropriate $10,000, to which sum they would have been entitled had the arrangement been carried out and had the grant not been withdrawn. They expended the large sum of money to which I have referred on the faith of the arrangement for appropriating the sum of $70,000 to the Provinces for emigration purposes.

Mr. MACKENZIE: It was not a yearly vote. There was an obligation. It was simply a vote for the one year, and might not be given another year. It was not given to the other Provinces, and why should it be given to that Province? If there was any obligation to one there was an obligation to all. There is no equitable or legal right whatever entitling them to this money.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: The other Provinces occupy a different position. The hon. gentleman says it was not a Statutory engagement. I recollect that the hon. gentleman opposite objected to the vote; and, therefore, when a change of Government took place they did not bring down the vote again; but the Government of New Brunswick having no notice of the fact that this Government did not intend to renew the vote made their engagements as if it would be passed. It was not so with Nova Scotia.

MR. MACKENZIE: What evidence have we of that.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: We have enquired into it. I doubt if Nova Scotia expended much of the amount she received from the Dominion Government. If New Brunswick had been in the position of the other Province, and had not expended any more than she received, she would not have had any just claim; but having spent such a large amount beyond, she is in an exceptional position, and so the Government considered.

MR. ANGLIN: New Brunswick did spend a very large sum that year; very large in proportion to the population of the Province, and very large in proportion to the emigrants brought in. They indulged in great extravagance in their expenditure in bringing emigrants, chiefly from Scotland; there were also some Danes and some English, but care was taken not to bring out any Irishmen. There was feasting on board the steamboats, the emigrants were received by enthusiastic crowds, and a grand demonstration was made all along the route from St. John to their settlement. Houses were built and finished for them, and land cleared. Within a year these industrious Scotch settlers—the very cream of Europe, as Scotch settlers must be—were a great stress, and had to be again assisted. They are, no doubt, a very good class of settlers, and are now doing well, but the expenditure was very much larger than it should have been. There is no doubt that the Government of New Brunswick relied upon what it regarded as the implied, if not the express, promise of the Dominion Government, whose policy it was for some years to aid the various Provinces in the promotion of emigration. It was, no doubt, because they believed that the aid of the Dominion would be continued, that the Provincial Government expended such a large sum, and they have some show of right to claim one year's allowance additional. I always thought this a claim of some merit.

222 Amount required to provide for the expenditure in converting smooth-bore ordnance into 64-pounder Palliser guns, and the manufacture of two 7-inch 8½-ton guns and carriages..... $16,500

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT said if the Government were undertaking to manufacture eight and a-half ton guns here, they were undertaking something for which the ordinary resources of the foundries of the country were hardly likely to be adequate. Was there not some little error in the statement?

MR. BOWELL said the expense of converting the smooth-bore ordnance into sixty-four pounder "Pallisers" was $650 a gun. The charge in England for doing the same work is $850. Mr. Gilbert, who had undertaken the work, had also contracted for the two eight and a-half ton guns, which were to cost $6,000 each.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT: What would the cost be to get the same class of guns from the Royal Arsenal?

MR. BOWELL: I cannot tell at this moment.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT said he would like to have that information on Concurrence. It was a somewhat doubtful expedient to attempt to cast large pieces of ordnance in this haphazard way. The casting of guns of this size and weight was a special thing in itself. If there were any imperfections in the guns serious injury might result to the parties using them.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: They will be fully tested by Colonel Strange.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT: I doubt very much whether it is possible to manufacture one or two pieces of ordnance of that kind as reasonably as we could purchase them.

MR. BOWELL: This is guaranteed as good an article as we could purchase.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT: At the same price?

MR. BOWELL: I do not say that. The guns are to be thoroughly tested before accepted.

MR. CASEY: Is there any idea of making two or three guns every year?

MR. BOWELL: No.

MR. ANGLIN: Where are these guns to be placed? I dare say they are Garrison Artillery. Are any more required to carry out the intentions of the Government?

MR. MACKENZIE: For what reason was Mr. Gilmour, the engineer of these buildings, dismissed?

MR. LANGEVIN: I cannot answer that question. He was dismissed before I came back from England.

MR. MACKENZIE: I think this dismissal was one of the most wanton scandals that ever took place. I am quite certain there can be no possible cause alleged for it except a political one. One of the immediate results of the dismissal of this careful, competent officer was the fire in these buildings, through the negligence of others. He was recommended from the Grand Trunk Workshops as an exceedingly careful man, of steady habits. Dismissed without the slightest cause, he was idle for months; and the carelessness of those in charge of these buildings, causing the fire has occasioned the expenditure of these $12,000.

MR. LANGEVIN: I have no doubt there was a cause for his dismissal. I will procure the information on the subject.

MR. BLAKE: I have been told that the amount of the damage by the fire was by no means so large as $12,000, but that opportunity was taken of the circumstance to decorate the Chamber, which accounts for a large portion of this item.

MR. LANGEVIN: The damage did not amount to $12,000, but when a portion of the Chamber is damaged by fire, you have to renew the decorations in other portions, in order to have the whole uniform in appearance and character. In this case the water from the roof destroyed a portion of the decorations. We thought it best to do the whole work properly and avoid patch-work, that would entail a large expense afterwards. I took that opportunity to improve the ventilation of this House, which cost a great deal of expenditure. We had also to renew a large portion of the glass in the roof. Painting and decoration cost $4,000; carpets, upholstering, etc., $4,000; for wire-guards to protect the glass, etc., $2,400.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT: The hon. gentleman has succeeded so far that the air in this Chamber is purer than formerly; but I am sorry to tell him that there has been, all through the Session, an extremely disagreeable draught in the quarter where we of the Opposition sit. It would be better to have less draught in cold weather.

MR. LANGEVIN said that during the coming Recess efforts would be made to remedy the defects in the ventilation of the House.

In reply to MR. MACKENZIE, SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said that when the Government made up their minds to carry out the Act passed two years ago, they looked for a proper place for the Geological Museum. Two places were offered them: the Clarendon Hotel and the Victoria Hotel. Mr. Selwyn came up and examined both places. He reported against the Victoria Hotel as being neither strong enough nor large enough; the price asked for this building was $30,000. The Clarendon Hotel was offered for $20,000, and that was the price the Government paid for it. He understood it cost the proprietor $50,000, and it had been valued to a loan society at a much higher price than the Government paid for it. The report of the Director was that the building was sufficiently adapted for the purpose. The Government felt that, if they desired hereafter to build a handsome Museum, they could easily dispose of this building at a very considerable gain.

MR. MACKENZIE said he thought the Clarendon Hotel was not as valuable as the hon. gentleman had represented. A far better building had been sold in this city, last year, under mortgage for $12,500. He considered the Clarendon Hotel was, in some respects, a miserable building, and totally unadapted for the purpose of a museum. The ceilings were too low and the building was badly lighted. He also considered the situation of the building was a very unfavourable one.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said the building was a substantially built structure, and the fact that Mr. Selwyn had reported favourably upon it was a sufficient answer to the objections that had been made to it.

In reply to Sir RICHARD J. CABT-WRIGHT,

MR. BABY said that Mr. Miall was in attendance during the whole time the Fishery Commission sat. He (Mr. Baby) had seen the papers in relation to the claim; and although Mr. Miall received his salary and his expenses, it was stated by Sir Alexander Galt that Mr. Miall was a most efficient officer in connection with this Fishery Award, and that he prepared all the necessary papers, tables, etc.

MR. MACKENZIE: I object entirely to this vote. Mr. Miall had a salary, and got his expenses paid down besides a thousand dollars. There is no reason for this. Why should the Government take up this claim after the late Government had dealt with it? Why should our decision be over-ridden in this way? We did not believe he should be paid any more. Every salaried officer is bound to go wherever he is required.

MR. BURPEE: The statements were prepared under the direction of the Customs Department. The officers were working there a long time. The only money paid was about $140. All the tables and the valuable information and statistics were given in that Department; and I think to pay this claim is entirely out of place.

MR. MACKENZIE: I move that this vote be struck out.

MR. MACKENZIE said he thought this a very large sum to be paid for a verbal opinion. This gentleman was promoted to the Bench before the actual work was done.

MR. BABY said Mr. Justice Armour was retained, and, although he was promoted to the Bench before the final hearing before the Arbitrators, he was engaged on the case and spent some time in getting it ready. He had put in a claim for $5,000. It must be presumed that he had applied his time and talents from the time he got his brief, so as to be ready for the investigation. He sent in a claim of $5,000, and the hon. the Minister of Justice thought $2,000 would be sufficient.

MR. BLAKE said that Mr. Justice Armour did devote considerable time to the preparation of his case. He had written him (Mr. Blake) from time to time for books, which were forwarded to his residence at Cobcurg; and was often consulting him on the Canadian and English archives in reference to the investigation.

MR. ANGLIN: Does the hon. the First Minister know how that money has been expended. There was a rumour that it had been applied to the purchase of fishing nets, etc., in certain districts, whereas we thought the money was intended for the purpose of providing food for the famishing people.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said the money was transmitted to the Colonial Minister, who would have a better opportunity of knowing, than we possibly could, the best mode of applying it. He was told that the money was for the immediate relief of the sufferers, and he was also told, in consequence of a remark made by the hon. gentleman, that it should be applied in such a way as not to affect the prejudices of any of the persons relieved. We were asked whether we desired money to go to the Mansion House or the Duchess of Marlborough's fund. We answered that we desired to leave the matter very much to the discretion of the Minister, and that we would be quite satisfied if it was divided between those two funds. The answer we got from the Colonial Secretary was that a sub-Committee had been appointed by the managers of those two funds for the purpose of applying this money to the purpose for which it was voted. That seemed to be the best way of appropriating it when the two rival funds, if I may use the term, combined to distribute the money. We have not got a return yet, and we do not know how it has been applied, but that was the mode of distribution.

EDWARD HOLTON, Esquire, Member to represent the Electoral District of Chateauguay, having previously taken the Oath, according to law, and subscribed the roll containing the same, took his seat in the House.

BILL WITHDRAWN.

The following Bill was, with leave of the House, withdrawn :—

Bill (No. 55) To amend the Act 42 Vic., cap. 72, intituled, An Act respecting the Beaver and Toronto Mutual Fire Insurance Company.—(Mr. McCarthy.)

Ordered, That the fees paid on the said Bill be refunded, less the cost of printing and translation.—(Mr. McCarthy.)

CANADIAN WATERS NAVIGATION BILL.

(Mr. Pope, Queen's, P.E.I.)

FIRST READING.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole to consider a certain proposed Resolution respecting the navigation of Canadian waters, and reported the said Resolution.

MR. POPE (Queen's, P.E.I.), in introducing a Bill (No. 121) To make better provision respecting the navigation of Canadian waters, said: This Bill is simply a copy of the rules in force in England. It is necessary that the rules should be uniform, in order to avoid the possibility of any difficulty arising.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH: The rules and regulations having been changed in England, it becomes necessary to adopt the same rules and regulations in this country. It is necessary, therefore, to repeal the rules and regulations upon the Statute-book. Therefore, I quite approve of this measure. I would suggest to the hon. Minister the desirability of inserting a clause giving the Governor in Council power to adopt the rules and regulations under the Act of 1874, whenever any change takes place, as it would simplify matters very much.

MR. BLAKE said that after the explanations given, the Bill was entirely unobjectionable. But he thought that legislation of this sort should not be introduced at this stage of the Session, because it did not give proper time for consideration. Several Bills had been thus brought down by the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and this certainly ought to be the last.

Bill read the first time.

CANADA CENTRAL RAILWAY AGREEMENT RATIFICATION BILL.

(Sir Samuel L. Tilley).

FIRST READING.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY, in moving for a Committee of the Whole to consider certain Resolutions on the subject of the agreement entered into with Her Majesty by the Canada Central Railway Company, on 3rd October, A.D. 1879, said: It is scarcely necessary to enter at length into any statement of this matter, as it is fully set forth in the Resolutions; but I may briefly state or read the following:—

“That by an Order of His Excellency the Governor-General in Council, dated the 18th day of April, 1878, passed under the authority of the Act 37 Vic., 1874, cap. 14, intitled an Act to provide for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and ratified by a Resolution of the House of Commons of Canada on the 7th day of May, 1878, it is in effect provided, that the Canada Central Railway Company are to be entitled to receive from the Government of Canada a subsidy or bonus of $12,000 per mile, upon the extension of their line westwards to such point as may be selected by the Government as the terminus of the Canadian Pacific Railway, near Lake Nipissing, such subsidy to be payable upon the terms and in the manner set out in such Order in Council; and by such Order it is further provided that the Company are to have the option of substituting the payment by the Government of the interest, or part of the interest, on bonds of the Company running over such terms of years as might be approved by the Governor in Council in lieu of the mileage subsidy referred to.

“That the Company elected to avail themselves of such option, and the Government assumed the payment of the interest (but only until the maturity of the principal), or an issue of bonds made by the Company, amounting in all to £500,000 sterling, payable in twenty years from the 1st day of September, A.D. 1879, with interest half-yearly, at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum.

“That the Company, upon the Government so assuming the payment of such interest,

And then follows the agreement. I intend to move the following Resolution:—

“That it is expedient to ratify and confirm the assumption by the Government of the payment of the said interest, and to approve of and confirm the said Agreement.

“That the total interest on the said issue of bonds so assumed by the Government, slightly exceeds the amount of interest which can be provided for out of the said cash subsidy of $12,000 per mile.

“That so soon as the Government shall have returned to the Company, out of the sum of $1,527,085.50 so deposited, as above mentioned, a sum equal to the said bonus of $12,000 per mile, if paid as provided for in the said Order in Council of 18th April, A.D. 1878, the balance of such deposit shall be appropriated and used for the purpose of meeting the interest on the said bonds.”

The object is to make legal this arrangement, the amount guaranteed being in excess of that authorised by previous legislation. That is the object of these Resolutions and the Bill to be based on them.

In reply to Mr. BLAKE,

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: Instead of $12,000 a mile, it was suggested that that guarantee should be given in some form as the work progressed, because difficulties arose and loans would be put on the market at different times which might affect Canadian securities. Then the question of giving a guarantee for the whole work, and what it should be, came up. By the arrangement made they have deposited with the Government the whole amount, which was sufficient to pay the interest on the sum for twenty years, as a security. We have the money in our hands now, and if the work was not completed during next year, or if it was never completed, we still have the money sufficient to pay the interest for that period. As the work progresses, the company will be entitled to have this money released from time to time.

MR. BLAKE: Has the Canada Central Railway Company paid any money to the Government in this regard?

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: Yes; ample to pay the interest for twenty years.

MR. BLAKE: If the company has paid this money in, they should be entitled to receive from the Government the residue of the subsidy as the work progresses, because receiving that subsidy there still remains, of its own funds, the price of the guarantee. But they will not be entitled to receive the sum which they have deposited, because that is only the price of the payment given of the interest on the bonds. If that be the state of the case, there remains nothing but the general question of policy in connection with this matter.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: That is exactly the state of the case.

Motion agreed to.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the said Resolutions.

(In the Committee.)

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY introduced a Bill (No. 122) To ratify and confirm a certain agreement therein mentioned between the Government of Canada and the Canada Central Railway Company.

CANADA GUARANTEE COMPANY.

EXPLANATION.

MR. ROCHESTER: In March last, in moving a Resolution for copies of papers connected with the Canada Guarantee Company, I made the remark that it would appear from the course pursued by the manager of that company that "they made it a point to contest almost all claims made against them." I considered myself, at that time, perfectly justified in making that remark from reports and information received from different quarters. Since that time I have received the annual report, sworn to, of the company, which shows altogether a different state of things, namely, that the proportion of claims paid to claims made from the commencement to date is 92 per cent. I, therefore, think it but just to make this explanation in regard to that company.

SUPPLY—CONCURRENCE.

Resolutions reported from Committee of Supply considered.

Resolutions 22 to 26 and 31 to 52 (April 2) read the second time and agreed to.

MR. BLAKE.

On Resolution 53 (April 12), To meet expenses in connection with the care, collection and collation of public archives, $5,000,

MR. MILLS enquired, Why the valuable manuscripts obtained at the British Museum were kept in the Department of Agriculture. It would be much more convenient if they were kept in the Library, where they would be accessible.

MR. POPE (Compton) said they were kept in the Department of Agriculture because there was no room for them in the Library. In the Department they were kept quite safe in a fire-proof vault.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT: Will you take it into consideration?

MR. POPE: Yes.

Resolution read the second time and agreed to.

Resolutions 54 and 55 read the second time and agreed to.

On Resolution 56, To meet expenses in connection with the Census, $200,000,

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT: The hon. the Minister of Agriculture will recollect that when this item was under discussion in Committee, I suggested that, in taking the next Census, care should be taken to ascertain the classes of houses inhabited by the people, and also the number of rooms in each. That information can be obtained with very little trouble, when the number of inmates of each house is being ascertained. The hon. gentleman promised to consider the matter and give me an answer on Concurrence.

MR. POPE (Compton): I have thought of the matter, and believe it would be difficult to report all the rooms, and it would materially extend our Census Returns which, in 1870, were larger, in proportion, than those of any other country. But I will consider the subject further, and, if I can see my way clear to it, will adopt the suggestion.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT: Well, I will limit the suggestion and ask that we may have stated simply whether the houses are brick, stone or wood, and of how many stories; that would give a good deal of interesting information.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: There might be objections to certain kinds of enquiries, and difficulty in getting answers.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT: I will explain my reason for the suggestion. We have had no opportunity for many years of gaining the progress of the people in the important item of the quality of their houses, and man have none but this. The information I seek could be obtained with little trouble to the enumerators who have to visit every house. All he need do is ask the quality of the house, and if that cannot be given the number of the rooms—to ascertain simply to what class the building belongs.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: Yes.

Resolution read the second time and agreed to.

On Resolution 57, Immigration and Quarantine, $193,016,

MR. MACKENZIE: The hon. the Minister of Agriculture promised to state who those agents in Europe are, to whom these $5,200 are to be paid.

MR. POPE (Compton): Mr. Dyke is one, and there are Mr. Foy and Mr. Graham, and there is to be one at Dublin.

In reply to Mr. MACKENZIE,

MR. POPE: The salary of the German Agent, $500, is not included in this, but is in another item.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT: It would be convenient if we had given us, in the next Estimates, details showing the establishment of the Clerks and Messengers in London, as is the case with all the comparatively small establishments—to show how the $7,000 is distributed.

MR. POPE: Mr. Annand gets a salary of $4,000.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT: Does that salary come out of the item?

MR. POPE: Perhaps not; I am not certain. Mr. Dore gets $2,500; Mr. Dickson $800; and another employé $1,000—the staff is small.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT asked of the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries if he was prepared to submit the List of Lighthouses included in this vote.

MR. POPE (Queen's, P.E.I.) said the following were the Lighthouses referred to in the vote:—

Resolutions 150 to 152 read the second time and agreed to.

On Resolution 153, grant for Meteorological Observatories, including instruments and cost of telegraphing weather warnings, $37,000,

MR. MILLS asked whether or not steps had been taken to have Meteorological Observatories in the North-West Territories, in order to furnish such information as, in conjunction with the American Observatories, would enable us to have the course of storms with more accuracy. He would like to know if there were any alterations.

MR. BABY said there were no alterations. The matter was under consideration.

Resolutions 154 to 159 read the second time and agreed to.

Resolutions 160 and 161 read the second time and agreed to.

On Resolution 162, Indians, Ontario and Quebec, $24,800,

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT called attention to the fact that these items were allowed under protest; because the Report of the Department of Interior had not been furnished. He understood that Report was to be furnished to-day, so that an opportunity might be had of discussing the Indian items.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY said there were large votes in the Supplementary Estimates in addition to the Indian items passed last night.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT thought these items had better be postponed.

Resolution read the second time and agreed to.

Resolutions 163 to 165, and 195 to 197 read the second time and agreed to.

Resolutions 90 to 93 (April 27) read the second time and agreed to.

On Resolution 94, St. Anne's Lock and Canal, $150,000,

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER said $180,345 was required to complete this work, over and above this vote.

MR. MACKENZIE: Does that embrace deepening the channel above the lock?

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: Yes.

Resolution read the second time and agreed to.

Resolutions 95 to 103, 198 and 199 read the second time and agreed to.

On Resolution 200, Collection of Slide and Boom dues, $20,745,

MR. WHITE: I observe that a large amount of slide and boom dues, about $109,000, remains uncollected. I would like to know if there is any security for their payment, or if any steps are being taken to collect them.

MR. BABY: These arrears have been running on from year to year—indeed they have been accumulating for the last fifteen years. Every effort is being made to collect those dues, and we think that about one-fourth of the total amount will be secured.

Resolution read the second time and agreed to.

Resolutions 201 to 204, 179 to 185, and 178, read the second time and agreed to.

Resolutions 1 and 3 to 21 (April 28) read the second time and agreed to.

On Resolution 186, Collection of Revenues—Customs, $724,565,

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT: Did the hon. the Minister of Customs give us the names of the members of the Board of Experts, and their salaries? If not, I should like that information.

MR. BOWELL: The Board consists of Messrs. Fraser and Sinclair, who receive $1,800 a year each, and Mr. Belford, as Secretary, in the place of Mr. Young, whose salary is $1,600.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT: Are there not several departments?

MR. BOWELL: Yes; Mr. Fraser has dry goods in charge and acts also for the hardware department, and Mr. Sinclair has groceries generally.

Resolution read the second time and agreed to.

Resolutions 187 and 188, read the second time and agreed to.

On Resolution 189, Salaries of Inspectors and Assistant Inspectors of Weights and Measures, $40,800, SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT: When this item was before the House recently, I called attention to the fact that certain of those officers against whom no complaint had been made, but whose offices had been abolished, had petitioned for some remuneration. The hon. the First Minister stated that, besides returning them the money actually paid into the Superannuation Fund, the Government would consider whether a certain number of months' gratuity could not be given those men who had been free from blame in the discharge of their duties. Has that question been considered and any decision arrived at?

MR. BABY: The question has not been considered yet, but the reimbursement of the parties for the payments to the Superannuation Fund has, and an item was put in the Supplementary Estimates for the purpose, which passed last night.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT: Will the hon. Minister be kind enough to have this matter considered, and tell us by Monday or Tuesday the decision of the Government.

MR. BABY: I will do the best possible to bring the matter forward for examination.

Resolution read the second time and agreed to.

Resolutions 190 to 194 and 205 read the second time and agreed to.

On Resolution 206, Surveys of Dominion Lands, chargeable to Capital, $300,000,

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT: I desire to call the attention of the hon. the First Minister to this item chargeable to Capital, in order that he may state, formally, the decision of the Government as to the mode of crediting the sums to be received for those lands in future. Up to the present time the sums received for lands have gone to the ordinary Income, and it is obviously improper and inexpedient that that practice should be continued if the cost of the Surveys be charged to Capital Account.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: The hon. gentleman is quite correct. I think it is quite clear that under the terms of the Resolutions adopted last Session, on the 13th May, by which 100,000,000 acres were appropriated to defray the cost of the Pacific Railway, there must be a separate account of the sale of those lands kept, and the proceeds exclusively appropriated to the payment of its construction. In the Resolutions it was proposed that those lands should be invested in two Commissioners to be appointed one by England and the other by Canada. That was done in the hope of our obtaining the cooperation of the British Government in the construction of the Pacific Railway. The lands were to be sold at not less than $2 an acre, the proceeds to be invested in securities for the exclusive purpose of defraying the cost of the Railway. The cooperation of England has not yet been secured; but, under the new régime, we may be more successful in England. Until Her Majesty's Government choose to cooperate with us in the construction of this Railway, we shall have no right, nor can we ask it, to appoint a Commissioner. There would be no reason for one. The Canadian Government meantime will appoint a Trustee. I consider that every sale of those lands in the North-West, from the time of the adoption of the Resolutions, should be credited to that account, and every expenditure, in the way of surveys and for land management, charged against those sales, so that the net product should be exclusively devoted to the payment of the cost of the construction of the Railway. I have given notice, to-day, of a Resolution for the purpose of amending the Resolutions of last Session in that regard, and in another particular. Last year's Resolutions fixed the minimum price at $2 an acre. But the Government has thought proper to propose an amendment—to make a graduated scale of prices according to the proximity or remoteness of the land from the Railway, the prices ranging from $5 to $1 an acre. In one sense, the land sold at $1 an acre does not come within the spirit of the Resolutions of May last; because it was then contemplated that twenty miles on each side of the Railway should be exclusively withdrawn from homesteading and free settlement, to be sold for the construction of the Railway. The Government thought this change desirable, and I believe the sentiment of hon. gentlemen opposite, also, was against the principle of locking up the whole of the land within twenty miles on each side of the Railway. I shall move, on Monday, a Resolution, providing among other things that the minimum price shall be $1 instead of $2.

MR. ANGLIN: Perhaps, by Monday, the hon. the First Minister will produce a Return I moved for six weeks ago, with regard to the receipts from the sale of the lands in the North-West.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I thought it was already produced.

MR. ANGLIN: No. A Return asking for the amount of money received for those lands, and another asking for the amount of land sold last year, and the quantity taken up by individuals, have been brought down, though moved for long after the Return I desire.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I think I gave the House a statement of the quantity of land sold, and the amount received, and amount of scrip redeemed, in my remarks in answer to Mr. Charlton's motion.

MR. BLAKE: Of course it is obviously necessary that, as those lands are to form a fund for the construction of the Railway, and as we are now adopting the principle of not charging the expenditure to Income, we should cause the expenditure to be made out of the proceeds of the lands. There may be some difficulty in adjusting the account in the way it is voted—for Dominion Lands, Capital Account; the fund will be a trust fund in connection with the Pacific Railway. But it would be well to adopt such an arrangement as may be made very clear in the future; first of all, that an item which formerly appeared in an expenditure on Revenue account, is now transferred to Capital; and, second, that it is paid from time to time out of the proceeds of the lands. I do not know whether the First Minister intends to do it, but he gave notice of a Resolution to be substituted for those of last year.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Not for them all, but for the 7th, one of the series.

MR. BLAKE: I am very glad to hear that statement, but shall be very sorry to see those glowing periods with regard to the lands obliterated from our Journals. I presume those parts of the Resolutions which refer to the constitution of the Commission are to be obliterated for the purpose?

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Yes.

MR. BLAKE: Then the proposals as to the precise mode of dealing with the lands, and the other Resolutions, shall stand as they are?

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Yes.

MR. MACKENZIE: I understood the Premier's policy was to provide in the Act that the lands should be charged with the expenditure on the surveys and other outlays, and the balance applied to Railway purposes. In that case, I presume he intends to apply the expenditure already incurred on surveys. In order to have the account correct it must cover all the lands which have been devoted to Railway purposes. That is not mentioned in the Resolution, nor does the hon gentleman say it in his remarks.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: After the vote took place on the 13th of May last, I said that all these lands, called Railway lands, were set aside for a special purpose, and would be carried to Capital Account, and from that time that all the expenditure of management would be strictly limited to Manitoba and the North-West.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT: What has been sold in belts A, B, C, D and E in Manitoba since the 1st of July last goes to Capital Account.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Certainly.

MR. MILLS: In what way does the hon. gentleman propose to carry on these surveys?

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: It is a matter of very considerable importance to get good men to do that work, and it is not a thing you can well offer to competition among all the parties who happen to hold licenses. Many men who hold licenses as surveyors might be very good men to do chores at home but cannot undertake work of that kind. We are asking for tenders from good surveyors, so as to get an idea of what the work can be done for. I believe it can be done for considerably under four cents an acre. Besides that, in the Bill I have before the House, I propose to introduce a clause by which we can introduce the use of the solar compass instead of the more scientific, but more expensive mode of survey now in use. Our present system of survey is perfect, from a scientific point of view, but it is an enormously expensive one, compared with the one adopted in the United States. There is no doubt that the scientific mode prevents future disputes and trouble in rectifying defective surveys. But it is of so much consequence that the country should be surveyed at once, and inexpensively, it will be well, to a limited extent, that the survey should be carried out as before.

MR. MILLS: No doubt our surveys are somewhat more difficult than those of the United States, on account of our higher latitude and the more rapidly converging meridian lines. But I do not think the hon. gentleman will find, however rapidly the country may be settled, that it is desirable to push the surveys much in advance of settlement. Where that is done the lines become obliterated, the stakes disappear, and the survey has to be done over again. In 1873 the surveys were pushed forward too rapidly, and the result was that it is now wholly impossible to determine where the boundary line between the different sections is; and I have no doubt that if the surveys be pushed in advance of settlement for a few years, the same difficulty will again occur. The hon. gentleman has said that it is desirable to obtain the best men. I would like to see the list of those who have been in the service of the hon. gentleman for the past year. During the whole period of the late Administration a number of the hon. gentleman's political friends were employed on the staff of surveyors, in fact, I think they were in a majority. The hon. gentleman had, under his former Government, men employed in the survey of that country who were recommended to him on account of their political inclinations rather than their scientific attainments. The hon. gentleman shakes his head, but I say it is an extraordinary thing that in the list of surveyors employed when he was in office, there was not a single individual opposed to him politically. Does he mean to say that those who have passed creditable examinations, because they hold opposite political opinions, are unfit for the public service? I would like to know how many of those who are not in political accord with the hon. gentleman have been retained on the staff. Is Mr. Sinclair retained? Is Mr. Stewart retained? I am inclined to think there is not one of them retained.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I do not know; I never heard of them.

MR. MILLS: I think the hon. gentleman should bring down a list of those persons whom he has employed. I believe the rule is a sound one that if a surveyor is found to be incompetent, and has put the Department to unnecessary expense, he should not be employed again, no matter what his politics; but I also think a surveyor, who is found to be incompetent, ought not to be refused employment in the public service, simply because he may not belong to the political party of the Administration. Mr. Reed, who was employed during the greater portion of our Administration, and Messrs. Paton and Newton, who were employed four years out of five, all these we knew to be politically opposed to us, but when there was anything to do they were employed. I have received some communications from surveyors who have not been employed, and their impression is that it is because they are not of the political party of the hon. gentleman.

Resolution read the second time and agreed to.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

PRIVATE BILLS.

THIRD READINGS.

The following Bills were severally considered in Committee of the Whole, reported, read the third time and passed.

Bill (No. 71) To incorporate the Pontiac Pacific Junction Railway Company.—(Mr. White, North Benfrew.)

Bill (No. 32) Respecting the Montreal Assurance Company.—(Mr. Girouard, Jacques Cartier.)

Bill (No. 111) To provide for the winding-up of La Banque Ville Marie.—(Mr. Desjardins.)

MONTREAL TELEGRAPH COMPANY ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.—[BILL 65.]

SENATE AMENDMENT DISAGREED TO.

Order for consideration of Senate amendments read.

MR. BLAKE: These amendments are of an important nature, and alter the character of the Bill very seriously. The Senate have reinserted the provisions deliberately struck out by the Standing Committee, to which the Bill was referred.

MR. GIROUARD (Jacques Cartier): If this Bill is referred back to the Railway Committee, it will undoubtedly be killed.

The amendment is a very simple one, and can properly be considered in Committee of the Whole.

MR. MACKENZIE: The hon. gentleman must move to disagree with the amendment of the Senate, or the Bill must be recommitted.

MR. GAULT moved that the House disagree to the amendment inserting Clause A, giving power to the company to lease their line or any part thereof.

Motion agreed to.

SUPPLY—CONCURRENCE.

Resolutions reported from Committee of Supply further considered.

On Resolution 207, Dominion Lands, Outside Service, Land Agencies in Manitoba, and North-West Territories, $32,000; extra Clerks at Head Office, Ottawa, maps, printing, advertising, etc., $14,600,

MR. MILLS asked why Mr. Jaffrey was transferred from the Land Agency on the Saskatchewan to the office at Winnipeg.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY promised to take a note of that, and obtain the information from the hon. the leader of the Government, who was not at present in his seat.

Resolution read the second time and agreed to.

Resolution 208 read the second time and agreed to.

Resolutions 209 to 221 (April 29), read the second time and agreed to.

On Resolution 222, Converting Smooth-bore Ordnance into 64-Pounder Palliser Guns, and the manufacture of two 7-inch 8½-ton guns and carriages, $16,500,

In reply to Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT,

MR. MASSON: The 7-inch 8½-ton guns are not very large pieces of ordnance, and can be manufactured very easily in Canada, at a less cost and better than those manufactured at Woolwich. I have enquired as to the place where these two guns are to be placed, and I am advised that they should be placed at St. John, on the Island, or Partridge Island, I think; and, probably, two or three will be placed at Pictou, but it will be necessary really to have heavier ordnance there. It is a very important port. We can get as good a gun made here for $650 as in England for $860. As to risk to life the test has been successfully tried in Montreal. The greatest precautions are being taken with the Gilbert gun. I was particular that it should succeed. After going through a thorough test, to the satisfaction of the Artillery officers and men, I think the hon. gentleman can rest assured that the thing will be a complete success.

In reply to Mr. CASEY,

MR. MASSON said the 7½-in. guns cost $4,800, including 100 rounds of ammunition, shot and shell; and he thought we could get them here for $3,750, including the 100 rounds of ammunition. Mr. Gilbert had not been contracted with for the ammunition; but shot and shell could be manufactured in Canada at the same price as in England.

MR. ANGLIN thought larger ordnance was required for St. John; they ought to be of the heaviest. If occasion arose to provide for the defence of our coasts St. John would be absolutely exposed.

MR. MASSON was happy to see that the hon. gentleman approved of the vote.

MR. ANGLIN said heavier ordnance would be necessary if occasion arose for defence.

MR. MASSON said the Minister of Militia was obliged to be guided by the opinions of officers supposed to know more than the hon. gentleman did. The Inspector of Artillery thought these guns would be sufficient, not against an iron-clad, but against any ship or privateer that might escape Her Majesty's cruisers. We should trust upon the Imperial Navy in every emergency; but in case of the escape from ships of Her Majesty's Navy, of any privateers which are not so heavily armed, the shot and shell of these guns would be very efficient. It was important not to go into the fabrication of very heavy ordnance before being satisfied of the success of these. Perhaps next year the harbour of St. John might be put in a better state of defence.

MR. BLAKE: To what particular advantages we owe it I know not: whether it is that we have at our command more raw material and cheap labour we are not told; but we are told that we are able to get out a better gun at $650 than can be turned out at Woolwich for $860. I am delighted to note that. I hope it will be very widely spread, and that at no great distance of time, we may find Montreal rivaling other places in manufacturing artillery for the world.

MR. MASSON: I know the hon. gentleman has not much faith in the National Policy, but we will make this attempt. If we succeed, I am sure the hon. gentleman will have patriotism enough to admit the fact.

Resolution read the second time and agreed to.

Resolutions 223 and 224 read the second time and agreed to.

MR. MASSON moved to strike out Resolution 225, Gratuity to Gunner Dempster for injury sustained at drill, $400. He said the vote was not required, as there is a Contingent Fund in the Militia Department to provide for such accidents.

Motion agreed to.

On Resolution 226, Intercolonial Railway, $193,600,

MR. ANGLIN: I have to day received a copy of the Report in regard to the nut-locks in which there are some peculiarities of an interesting character. There appears to be a great variety of opinions among the officials of the road in regard to the value of the nut-locks. Some declare that they are of the greatest value—that they work to a charm, and save an immense amount of labour—and render the whole care of the road less troublesome and expensive than before. Others qualify this statement by saying the nut-locks are valuable when they fit particularly well. Others go even further and state that they answer very well except when the flanges happen to break, and admit that, in many cases, the flanges have broken. One gentleman said they would be useful if they were applied when the rails were new, and when they fit properly. A great many brakeemen say that it is unnecessary to look so closely after the joints as formerly, but they admit there have been breakages, and, in some instances, the locks have failed in the effect anticipated. I have not heard that any private companies have adopted those locks, and I think the Report has proved quite conclusively that the nut-lock has not had the great result the hon. Minister anticipated.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: I account for the dissimilarity of the reports as to the general bearing value of the nut-locks to the fact that the Government have not paid for twenty-five miles of the road on which they have been placed, because they were not satisfied with the manner in which the work was performed. The reports would probably be dissimilar in relation to those portions of the road, and the other portions where the work was well performed. There is no doubt the nut-locks are more applicable to a new track, because many of the nuts have rusted in such a way as to make their removal difficult. I think that, on the whole, however, the Report is very satisfactory. It is true that not so much personal attention is likely to be given to the road where the nut-lock is in use. There is where its value lies. With all the vigilance and attention that can be given, nuts often wear out, and trains go off the track, and if we can prevent two or three accidents of that kind by the use of nut-locks, we would more than cover the cost of their application to the whole road. I think the result of their use has been satisfactory on the whole, and that a great saving will ultimately be effected thereby.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT: Has this nut-lock gone into use on the Grand Trunk, the Great Western, or any other Canadian road?

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: I do not know. It has been applied to several miles on the North Shore road, and has been found to work well.

MR. ANGLIN: I think the hon. gentleman is mistaken in regarding it of the utmost importance that the nut-lock affords partial security against accidents, since the men employed on the brakes may be led to be less careful than before. Those locks give way occasionally, and I think the line should be as carefully examined as if they were not in use. They do not afford absolute immunity from such accidents as the hon. gentleman has referred to.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: Yes, they do. The nut is of steel, and of course breaks occasionally; but no accident results from that. The track is just as safe as before the nut broke, but it is to be replaced in order to keep the track safe.

MR. ANGLIN: The hon. gentleman does not quite understand the circumstances of the case. The nut-lock breaks because a strain is brought upon it, chiefly, I presume, from pressure on the nut itself, and the moment you break the flange the nut is likely to work open, and so an accident may occur. Will the hon. gentleman be kind enough to tell us how much rolling-stock this $159,000 is likely to cover.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: It will cover two locomotives, two first-class cars, two second-class cars, two smoking cars, two baggage cars, etc., and we shall have to ask for an additional sum, in the Supplementary Estimates, for a box and platform car.

Resolution read the second time and agreed to.

Resolution 227 read the second time and agreed to.

On Resolution 228, Canadian Pacific Railway, $220,000,

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: With regard to the enquiry as to the item for the Pembina Branch, that will complete it in addition to the vote for the year. This is the amount that will be required by the 1st July next. The amount needed for its completion has already been voted in the general Estimates.

In reply to Mr. ANGLIN,

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: The new rolling-stock was to be delivered in June, 1880, including five first-class cars, twenty second-class cars, sixty box cars, and sixty platform cars, estimated to cost, in all, $60,000. This item is in addition to the ordinary Estimates. It is placed in the Supplementary Estimates for this year, because it must be paid before the 1st July next.

In reply to Mr. ANGLIN,

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: We were obliged to obtain the four locomotives for immediate use on the Pembina Branch. Their present value was estimated on their present condition by the Locomotive Superintendents at Moncton and Pembina, to be charged against the Canada Pacific Railway.

MR. ANGLIN: With regard to the $75,000 for Surveys, I think we have a right to some explanations. Are there location or exploratory surveys to be required by the 30th June next?

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: This item of $75,000 is to cover the Governor-

MR. ANGLIN.

General's Warrant issued for surveys required to be made, the money to be expended up to 1st July next. The general surveys, conducted during the past year, and explorations, were carried on in connection with the general Act. Up to 30th April, there had been charged in all against surveys, $267,392, to be transferred as properly belonging to construction. Out of that amount is $113,688, leaving a balance of $153,703, chargeable to Surveys. The vote last year for that purpose was $100,000. The balance of this Special Warrant of $75,000, unexpended on the 30th April, 1880, was $21,296, against which there will be the expenditure for two months, in connection with two parties who remained out during the winter to complete the work in which they were engaged—one from Nipegon to Thunder Bay, and the other from Nipegon eastward. Up to the autumn they had passed Long Lake, coming down to Nipissing from Nipegon. They were anxious to conclude the surveys, which they will do by the 1st July next. The only work then remaining will be the location surveys, as the construction of the Pacific Railway proceeds across the prairies.

MR. ANGLIN: The sum seems very large, even although the surveys described are progressing. Will the hon. gentleman tell us the result of the surveys towards Lake Nipegon? What sort of route, on the whole, has been discovered?

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: This item of $153,000 covers all the explorations of the past year. Of very large tracts of the land in the North-West, we know nothing, consequently exploratory surveys were carried out, and the result has been very satisfactory. Our most sanguine expectations, as to the great prairie region, have been exceeded. Then we had surveys of the two routes, and by Fort Simpson through to the Pine River Pass, and surveys from Winnipeg westward, locating the first 100 miles of the Railway across the prairies, and afterwards very difficult and elaborate surveys for the second 100 miles, with the result of obtaining a very good line through an admirable country for settlement, which section is being let at a cost not exceeding that of the first 100 miles, which is very low and satisfactory. Then there were exploratory surveys from that point to the base of the Rocky Mountains, which also resulted satisfactorily in the discovery of a line to the north of Edmonton, which will save ten miles in distance, and carry the road out of a difficult country, through a good district for settlement, while saving much money in construction. The result of the surveys through the Peace River country is also gratifying. Then we had almost a location survey from Nipissing westward to the Sturgeon River, sixty or seventy miles of a line that will ultimately run north of Lake Superior, and is expected to be on the same line as the extension of the Canada Central; and subsequently a survey from Spanish River, so as to make us quite certain that we shall have no difficulty in obtaining a good line to the Sault Ste. Marie from Nipissing. There was a survey, not concluded, from Nipegon, westward, to connect with the line from Thunder Bay to the Red River. It was also necessary we should strike that line about fifty or sixty miles west of the present terminus at Fort William. But no very satisfactory line has been obtained in that direction. The surveys of the past season now terminated, established the fact that we can get a good line from Nipegon to Fort William that will be found preferable to connect with the road further west. It will decrease the length of the line. The last account received from the party exploring and surveying from Nipegon to Nipissing states, we can carry the road up to Lake Superior, below Nipegon, connecting with the navigation at the head of Nipegon, at Lake Helen, at the head of Lake Superior, a very fair line, much better than we supposed, can be obtained as far as Long Lake. We are informed that a very good line, not difficult to construct, will be found from the head of Lake Superior down to the point to which the survey was carried, and westward of Nipissing to Sturgeon River. Those surveys will be completed by the 1st July, and this provision is simply made to carry them up to that point. Although the amount appears large, the results are commensurate. We have obtained valuable information, which will enable us to effect a very great saving in the expenditure in the ultimate construction of the line.

MR. ANGLIN: I think the House must be of opinion that a very large expenditure in surveys, where there is no intention of building the Railway, is premature and unwise. The outlay on the sections eastward from Nipegon, and from Nipegon to Fort William, where the road will not be built for years, should not have been incurred. We are not in a position to spend money thus prematurely and unnecessarily. Expenditures, however, on the prairie sections, to make known the character of the country, may be useful. The surveys in the Peace River and other districts, seem to have been productive of no result whatever. The line to Fort Simpson was well known, and the country adjoining it was well known before. Two parties went through the country, as if on a pleasure excursion, making no instrumental surveys, I believe, but merely looking around the country and forming a superficial opinion as to its character. The Report, so far as it goes, is entirely in favour of the adoption of the Northern Route to the Pacific, as the Chief Engineer advised, distinctly, in his Report, based on the reports of those parties, that the selection of the terminus should be deferred until further examinations were made. It is to be hoped those exploratory surveys will not be resumed until there is some reasonable expectation that the work of construction in the regions surveyed will be commenced in a few years.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: No doubt there is a great deal in what the hon. gentleman (Mr. Anglin) says; but the examination of the country eastward from Fort Simpson, was indispensably necessary to the final adoption of a route. So far from no instrumental surveys having been made as just stated, ten miles of the road in that section were actually located, to be submitted to contract. Should the Government adopt that route, we stood pledged to Parliament to commence construction during the season, and had to prepare for it. Consequently, the Government adopted that route. With reference to the surveys initiated in the Lake Superior region, the Government having propounded a scheme for the construction of the Canada Pacific Railway as a whole, and looking to the probability of launching the scheme in all its entirety, we felt we should be able to deal with it much more advantageously.

than we found possible last season, when we shall have 700 miles of the road in successful operation, and when we should be able to state definitely not only the cost of the road, but, from actual surveys, the period of its probable completion. For this object, it was desirable to get this additional information. Besides, a great deal of money has been expended on those surveys, and it was thought much easier to complete our information, while it was fresh and available for this object, in that way. It was considered we should thus be better able to present the whole question of the construction of this Railway than to leave the surveys in abeyance till we were obliged to deal with the subject, and when, without being able to give an answer, we might be asked the probable cost of the road from Thunder Bay to Nipissing.

Resolution 229 read the second time and agreed to.

On Resolution 231, Parliament Buildings, to cover cost of damage by fire, $12,000,

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT : There was a question asked on the first reading of these Resolutions as to the dismissal of Mr. Gilmour, the Engineer in the Parliament Buildings. A good deal was said about the fire having occurred through the incompetency of his successor. Perhaps the hon. the Minister of Public Works would give the explanation now.

MR. LANGEVIN : I was not aware the other evening whether the dismissal took place under my predecessor or under myself, but I find it was under myself. Mr. Gilmour, like any other of the firing staff, carpenters, or labourers employed about the Public Buildings, held no permanent appointment, but was employed simply during the pleasure of the Minister at $75 per month. The situation was merely Assistant Supervisory Engineer of the heating staff and ventilation of the Parliament Buildings. His employment dated back to 1876. The situation Gilmour held was abolished in September last, on report, for the following reasons: It was considered that Foreman Engineer Smith, of Public Buildings, could also attend to the duties required of an engineer in the Parliament Buildings during the Session—during the Recess the duties being nominal. Experience has now shown this assumption to be correct. The members generally, and the occupants of the Parliament Buildings, openly expressing their appreciation of the improvement. Mr. Smith has been employed on the Buildings since their commencement, and on the heating staff over ten years—and his present salary, $85 per month, was authorised by Hon. Mr. Mackenzie, in April, 1875—and no increase of pay has been allowed him for the additional duty he now has to perform. It was found that much clashing occurred by having two engineers in the Buildings under whom the workman and staff had to work—interchangeable as it were—and Mr. Gilmour, being of a very irritable disposition, was on speaking terms with but few of the staff; and his frequent noncompliance with orders made it a serious matter to have such disorganisation existing in connection with steam boilers, upon which so many lives were depending. Everything is now running smoothly throughout all the Buildings in connection with the heating and ventilation—and by the abolishment of Mr. Gilmour's situation, the Department saves in salary alone, $783.55 per annum. The hon. gentleman must see that the office was suppressed, because it was necessary for the proper working of the establishment. The officer who had charge of the same apparatus in the other buildings is now in charge of this one also; and his salary, which was fixed by the hon. member for Lambton at $75 per month, has not been increased. He performs both duties. The remark of the hon. member for Lambton that the fire was due to the dismissal of Mr. Gilmour is unfounded and frivolous. The fire that took place had no connection with the heating apparatus, but it occurred from heating some paint by the men who were repairing the ceiling. Mr. Gilmour's office has been abolished, and we have thereby effected a saving of $783.55 per annum.

MR. MACKENZIE : Will the hon. gentleman say that there is an engineer the less in the Buildings than before ?

MR. LANGEVIN : Yes.

MR. MACKENZIE : Was Mr. Gilmour the junior appointment of those who were here ?

Mr. LANGEVIN : He was the last appointed.

Mr. MACKENZIE : Who were the others ?

Mr. LANGEVIN : I do not know. Mr. Smith is the party who replaced Mr. Gilmour.

Mr. MACKENZIE : Mr. Smith was not in this building.

Mr. LANGEVIN : He was not in the building, but he was an officer in the Government.

Mr. MACKENZIE : I do not deny the absolute right of the Government to dismiss Mr. Gilmour, but it was an act of tyranny—it was a miserable business to dismiss a man for his political opinions. The hon. gentleman no doubt led the House to believe that there was an office dispensed with in this building, that there was an engineer less in this building than before. Now it turns out that, in order to make room for the dismissal of Mr. Gilmour, he has counted engineers in another building altogether. He might as well count the engineer in the Examining Warehouse at Montreal, or the Post Office at Toronto, and say there is one less.

Mr. LANGEVIN : I am sorry the hon. gentleman was not present when I gave the explanations, as I am sure he would have been saved the trouble he has taken now. I stated that a report was made to me that the office held by Mr. Gilmour, in this building, could be dispensed with, and that the public interest would be better served by suppressing the office of Mr. Gilmour, who was the junior appointment, and have his duties performed by Mr. Smith, the corresponding officer in the other building. That was done, and it has worked successfully. Mr. Smith's salary has not been increased by a cent, and Mr. Gilmour's salary of $783.55 has been saved.

Mr. MACKENZIE : That was not his salary.

Mr. LANGEVIN : I stated the salary was $75 per month.

Mr. MACKENZIE : That was $900, where did the other money go to ? The hon. gentleman says there was only $700 saved after dismissing a man getting $900. Who got the other $200 ?

Mr. LANGEVIN : That is the account that was given me. At all events

Mr. Smith has not received a cent additional.

Mr. MACKENZIE : If the hon. gentleman comes with information, we must have it made accurate. Some one has got that $200.

Mr. LANGEVIN : The hon. gentleman should be accurate. He said there was $200 not accounted for, he should have said $116.

Mr. MACKENZIE : The hon. gentleman said $700 was saved, and that Mr. Gilmour's salary was $75 a month, which would be $900 a year. The hon. gentleman has not given the figures correctly. I am exceedingly sorry he has lent himself to this miserable business of dismissing a worthy officer to make room for a political partisan, dismissed him because he was a political opponent of the hon. Minister.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD : I do not think the hon. gentleman ought to have said that in presence of the statement of my hon. friend. My hon. friend says no successor has been appointed to Mr. Gilmour ; that Mr. Smith looks after the heating of the two buildings, which was formerly done by Mr. Gilmour, and it was found that one man could do the duty for the three buildings. My hon. friend says Mr. Smith is asked to look after the heating of the three buildings at his own salary, and that no man has taken Mr. Gilmour's place. The hon. gentleman is not in a position to contradict that, and he ought not to make that statement ; it is very improper that he should make that statement ; it is unworthy of that hon. gentleman to make that statement.

Mr. MACKENZIE : The hon. gentleman will not tell me what is worthy and what is not. I know my place. I will not be lectured by the hon. gentleman. It is part of a system the hon. gentlemen opposite have adopted, ever since they came into office, of removing everyone who has a taint of political Liberalism about him. The hon. gentleman is afraid to defend these dismissals in this House. If the hon. gentleman brings a list of the engineers and firemen about the three blocks, it will be found that there is not one less. I challenge the hon. gentleman to bring this list.

Resolution read the second time and agreed to.

MR. MILLS : In relation to Item 207, respecting the Public Lands of the Dominion, I understand Mr. Jaffray, who was appointed agent of the Dominion Lands out on the Little Saskatchewan, has been removed from that office, and is transferred to the office at Winnipeg, and that some one else has been sent in his place. I enquired why that was done, because I had information that the change was not in the public interest. I was anxious the hon. gentleman should inform the House why the change was made.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD : I do not suppose the hon. gentleman will follow the course of the hon. gentleman who has spoken last, and say that Mr. Jaffray was removed for political reasons. It was conceded to be in the interest of the Department that Mr. Jaffray should be removed to Winnipeg. At six o'clock my hon. friend asked several questions about some surveyors. He referred to Mr. Stewart, Mr. Pierce and Mr. Sinclair.

MR. MILLS : I mentioned Mr. Stewart and Mr. Sinclair simply as instances, but I think there were many others. If the hon. gentleman will look at the list of surveyors employed by his predecessors, he will see that they were not employed with reference to their political predilections. There were at least as many of his supporters on the staff as there were others. I understand that is not the case now, and I am desirous that the hon. gentleman should bring down the list.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD : I can only tell the hon. gentleman that the settling of the names of the surveyors was left altogether to the heads of the Departments. I do not know any of the surveyors, nor did I know or did I enquire into their politics. Mr. Stewart has just finished his last employment, and most likely will be employed again in the spring. He is one of the nominees of hon. gentlemen opposite. Mr. Simpson has been continuously employed, and is now employed.

MR. MILLS : He is a political friend of the hon. gentleman.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD : Mr. Pierce, I do not know what his politics are, is still employed.

MR. MILLS : I mention these names as personal friends of the hon. gentleman, and I pointed out that they had not dealt with our friends as we had dealt with theirs.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD : I am not open to that charge. I have never enquired into the political leanings of the surveyors appointed, and have left their selection to the heads of the Department.

MR. CURRIER : A few moments ago I was called into the lobby by a surveyor, who said he could not get appointed on a survey. He also told me that the Government had appointed one who, I knew, to be an opponent of this Government. That is one case, proving that the Government do not in all cases make appointments for political reasons.

Resolutions 232 to 251 read the second time and agreed to.

On Resolution 260, to pay Mr. E. Miall a further sum, in recognition of his services in connection with the Halifax Fisheries Commission, $500,

MR. MACKENZIE : Mr. Miall received a stated salary of $2,400. He was absent for some months in Halifax, for which the late Government gave him $1,000 additional. The Government have now provided to give him still more. I think he has been paid a very large sum for the extra services rendered, for he received his salary regularly in addition to this bonus, or whatever you may please to call it. I do not think it right that the case should be reopened again by hon. gentlemen opposite and another payment of $500 proposed. I think it is altogether unjustifiable.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER : This subject was very carefully considered by the Government, and they were satisfied, after the fullest investigation, that the most valuable services had been rendered by Mr. Miall, in connection with this important adjudication in regard to the Fisheries. The uniform testimony of the officers of the Government and of Sir Alexander Galt, satisfied the Government that Mr. Miall was entitled to this additional compensation in consideration of the valuable services he had rendered—services which largely contributed to obtain the result which was obtained.

MR. MACKENZIE : I move that the item be not concurred in. The late Administration paid a liberal amount for the time given, and I think no one can justify the payment of this additional amount.

All his expenses were paid. If the hon. gentlemen are determined to throw away money in this way, they must vote for it.

MR. POPE Queen's (P.E.I.): There are a great many of these claims not settled. There are actions or intimations of intended actions. Several professional gentlemen deny that they have been paid the amounts alleged to have been paid to them, and claim that they have never been settled with at all. And so it is with regard to this. I do not think an officer who gives his time to a particular department can be called upon to go to Halifax, and spend days and nights working over figures, and doing all he can to establish the claim made by this country, and assisting in making good that claim to the extent of the very large amount received by this Government, without being remunerated for this extra trouble. We may require such services in the future, and they should be properly recognised and paid for.

Motion made and question proposed:

That the said Resolution be now read the second time and agreed to.—(Sir Samuel L. Tilley.)

Resolution read the second time and agreed to.

MR. CARON: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. Cameron) was not in the House when the question was put.

MR. SPEAKER: Was the hon. gentleman in the House?

MR. CAMERON: I was just at the door.

MR. SPEAKER: Was the hon. member in the House?

MR. CAMERON: I was within the walls.

MR. BLAKE: It is quite enough if the hon. gentleman was within the walls.

MR. CAMERON: I was standing at the door.

MR. CARON: The hon. gentleman was certainly not in the House when the question was put. He may have been within the walls.

MR. CAMERON: I heard the question put.

MR. SPEAKER: The House is not that part outside that railing, because sometimes we see strangers there. Was the hon. member outside that railing or outside the House.

MR. CAMERON: You were just putting the question as I got to the door.

MR. SPEAKER: Did the hon. gentleman hear the question put?

MR. CAMERON: Yes; you were just commencing to read it when I got to the door.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: If the hon. gentleman heard the question at the time it was put, he has a right to vote. It was observed by hon. gentlemen on this side that he could not possibly have heard it.

MR. O'CONNOR: The hon. gentleman did not come in until the nays were called.

MR. ROCHESTER: I saw him come in after the yeas were called.

MR. MACKENZIE: Neither of the hon. gentlemen could see the hon. member coming in at that time.

MR. O'CONNOR: Oh, yes.

MR. MACKENZIE: Can the hon. gentlemen see through a board?

MR. MACMILLAN: I saw the hon. gentleman as he passed through the porch coming in, and it was certainly some time after the motion was put. He may have been in the alley-way.

MR. FULTON: The yeas were being taken as the hon. gentleman took his seat.

MR. CAMERON: I was at the door when the question was being put, and I was about to enter the House to the left of the Speaker's Chair, but I turned round and entered by the door at the end of the alley-way, and took the seat I occupied when I voted.

MR. SPEAKER: The question is not whether the hon. gentleman had taken his seat or not. He has stated that he heard the question put and, therefore, his name must be registered.

MR. ANGLIN: And, having made that statement, it was a gross insult—

Several HON. MEMBERS: Order.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I deny that entirely. People must have the evidence of their own senses, and if twenty hon. gentlemen saw that hon. member, honourable only by courtesy after to-night—

MR. BLAKE: Mr. Speaker—

Several HON. MEMBERS: Order.

MR. SPEAKER: The member for West Durham rises to a point of order.

MR. BLAKE: I ask whether according to the rules of the House, a member is allowed to call an hon. gentleman "honourable only by courtesy."

MR. CAMERON: I do not complain of what has been said. I dare say hon. gentlemen stated what they believed to be correct, because they saw me coming in at the rear door; but I have reason to complain of the fact that I am disbelieved after I explained that I heard the question put.

MR. ROCHESTER: If the hon. gentleman was there when the question was put, I certainly saw him come in after the yeas and nays were called.

MR. SPEAKER: That question is settled.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT: The question raised is whether the words used "honourable only by courtesy," are Parliamentary or not. We are quite able to return insult with insult, as hon. gentlemen opposite. If you, Sir, are able to maintain the courtesies of this House, we will be bound by them; if not, there are plenty of ways and means of retaliation.

MR. BLAKE: The hon. the First Minister will surely withdraw that expression. I would rather not put the question of order, as I think the right hon. gentleman will feel more comfortable to-morrow if he withdrew the expression, otherwise I will ask the Speaker's ruling on the point. Probably the explanation of my hon. friend for South Huron was not heard at the far end of the Chamber—that he could not be seen, but that he heard the question and came and took a seat on the floor. Hon. gentlemen have disregarded his word and indicated that he told a falsehood, and the hon. the First Minister declares that the hon. member for South Huron is "honourable only by courtesy after to-night," which is a gross breach of Parliamentary rules, contrary to all decorum, and calculated to degrade this House, because such attacks will lead to recrimination.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD : I have simply to state that I do not think I am out of order, and that I do not think the language I used was unparliamentary—indeed, I am satisfied my language is not unparliamentary. I will ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blake) to go with me to the place where the hon. member for South Huron stated that he was at the time the question was put, and I will convince him that the hon. member could not by any possibility have heard the question.

MR. MILLS: The hon. member stated that he was this side of the door.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: The hon. gentleman has not stated so; I will leave it to himself.

MR. CAMERON: No; I did not state I was inside the House. I said I was at the door when the Speaker was putting the question.

MR. SPEAKER: I hope there will be an end to this. I am afraid that the words used are not exactly Parliamentary.

MR. BLAKE: I do not desire to pursue this disagreeable subject, but I wish to say that by the clear rule of Parliament, the statement of the hon. member for South Huron that he was within the precincts of the Chamber when the question was put, should have been accepted. I wished the Speaker's ruling on that, so that we might know whether disputes of this description are to arise on future occasions. I have always found the statements of hon. members accepted, except some other hon. gentleman moved for an inquiry in regard to some disputed point.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: The hon. gentleman stated that he heard a portion of the motion; he did not state that he heard it put by the Speaker.

MR. CAMERON: The hon. the First Minister is quite right. I do not state I was inside the Chamber, nor inside the door. I did not state I heard the whole question. My words were that I was at the door when the Speaker was putting the question, and that I turned back and came round the other way.

Resolutions 262 to 264 read the second time and agreed to.

265	}	Additional amount required for various Customs ports.....	$6,000 00
		Amount required for Board of Experts and outside Detective Service.....	10,000 00
		To pay claims for arrears of salary of officers and ex-officers of the Customs of Prince Edward Island.....	2,233 86

MR. BUNSTER said that the hon. the Minister of Customs had not given any consideration to the claims of the port and city of Nanaimo, from which $18,600 in duties were collected last year. It had only one Customs-house officer, when it was fairly entitled to two or three. There was considerable dissatisfaction at present owing to the great injustice done the port in this respect. The late Government had appointed an officer, but the present Government thought the port of so little importance as to place New Westminster ahead of it in the number of officers appointed. Nanaimo had more tonnage entering it than any port in British Columbia. He thought that the Government were derelict in their duty in not doing justice to Nanaimo, and hoped that the injustice would be remedied immediately.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT asked the hon. the Finance Minister to let the House know, on Monday, the amount received for Customs and Excise during April, 1880.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY promised to furnish it.

MR. BUNSTER said he was entitled to an answer from the hon. the Minister of Customs respecting the claims of Nanaimo.

MR. BOWELL promised that the city of Nanaimo should receive every consideration—justice included. He had not been able to meet the wishes of all the members who had asked him to increase the salaries of the different officers or make new appointments. Had he done so, he would have to ask $30,000 or $40,000 additional, which he thought he would not be justified in doing at present.

MR. BURPEE (St. John): I understood the hon. the Minister of Customs to say something about my not paying the arrears to officers of the Customs Department in Charlottetown during the Administration of the late Government.

Their claims were doubtless before the Department for a length of time, and a part was paid by the Collector irregularly some time ago, namely, $828. I think that arose from a mistake in the Department, as the Collector said he did not give the instructions to the corresponding clerk to order it to be paid; but the Collector understood he was ordered to pay certain officers in Charlottetown for arrears of salary from the time of Confederation to July, 1873, $1,400 odd, for the outside service, for officers, some of whom were not appointed by either Governments. I do not consider those officers were entitled to the additional salary they claimed. They claimed it under an understanding with the late Commissioner (Mr. Bouchette) who, it is said, held out the expectation that they would be paid at the rate of salaries given after Confederation, for the period previous to the entrance of the Island into the Union. He told me he understood himself that the officers of the Preventive Service should get the rate from the time of Confederation, that was allowed from the time of their appointment by Order in Council, but he would not say he promised anything of the kind. I admit there was an irregularity in paying these six officers of the Customs-house in Charlottetown, because I do not think they were entitled to the consideration given them.

Mr. POPE (Queen's, P.E.I.): I may remind the hon. gentleman that, when Minister of Customs, he told me during two Sessions, that he thought the claim of these men for the extra payment would be all right, that as some had been paid the others should be paid. It was only two or three days before the end of the second Session when he was Minister, that I could get a positive answer with regard to that matter. He submitted it to the Treasury and received a Report from his own Commissioner recommending the payment of the amount. After Prince Edward Island entered the Union in July, 1873, in August Mr. Bouchette visited it to look after some Customs matters, and he told those officers that their salaries would be paid from 1st July, at the rate fixed for Dominion salaries, but the change never took place. These men performed their work, and on November 3rd, the Government, previous to going out, passed an Order in Council fixing those salaries. Almost every one was an old appointee. They came in with the Province, and as much belong to the Civil Service of the Dominion as any other officers. Some of them were twenty years in the service, but were discharged without the slightest cause. I could name one, a good, honest man, who was afterwards employed by the late Government to go to Cape Traverse on important business. The salaries of those men were fixed after their appointment was formally made; the order distinctly declared that they should be paid at a certain rate from 1st July, 1873, but they were afterwards dismissed, whether properly or improperly I do not know, but I hold that they were entitled to their pay at the time they were dismissed at the rate named for the period from 1st July. They belonged to the Civil Service of Canada months before the Government went out of office, but the men who cheered for Mr. Laird when he came down to the Island as a member of the late Government, and who deserted their party, were afterwards paid by the Collector at the Dominion rate, while the other good men, who were improperly dismissed, were paid at the old salaries fixed by the Province. Some eight or nine items were paid by authority received from the Customs Department here, and the Government never had the honesty—I was going to say the courage—to admit the wrong and say that it was improperly paid by the Collector. Seven years have passed and they have never collected that money, if improperly paid, from the recipients. The Act was allowed to stand as against Mr. Bouchette till after his retirement and death. What remains then now, is the charge against Mr. Kelly. If improperly paid it was the duty of the Government to take the amount out of his salary or to call upon the officers to pay it back to the Dominion, and not to leave the favourites of the late Government to receive salaries different from those of the men turned out without cause. I was surprised to hear the hon. member for St. John say that he considered the amount should not be paid, after he told me repeatedly that it would be when the matter was before the Treasury Board, and his own officer,

Mr. Johnston, had, in 1877, recommended the payment.

MR. BURPEE (St. John): I told the present hon. Minister of Marine that I would refer the matter to the Treasury Board, who never gave the authority. The men who were paid the amount mentioned stood in a very different position from those not paid. They were in the Charlottetown Customs-house, for many years, receiving salaries from the Government. Most of all those servants outside, which this money goes to pay, were not appointed on 3rd November by this Government. They are outside entirely. They served, true, under the regulations on the Island for many years, and they got the difference in addition to the old salary—the difference between the Island and the Canadian currency. Standing in a different position, it was on that account that I was not allowed to carry out the order of the Commissioners, as to the dismissals complained of; it was a purely Island matter. After the Union, the officials were appointed, half from each party. But the appointments made by the late Government were not the whole of the servants employed. Only twenty-six were appointed, and forty-six were not discharged at all. Sixty-three since of those in the Charlottetown Customs-house received their additional payment. It is true the Collector made the payment from instructions from the Customs Department without my knowledge, and the Commissioner says without his knowledge. It was done by a letter, he said, from the chief clerk of the Department. In July, 1878, it was about $800. I had agreed to pay that, and the Commissioner had prepared a Memorandum for me to charge it to the Revenue. I went to New Brunswick in July, and left the order which was supposed to be sent to the Government and passed, but when I came back, I found it had not been touched. In September, after the Elections, I left the Memorandum with him, and told him to submit it to Mr. Fraser, as whether it should be charged, and he refused.

MR. BOWELL: I think the hon. gentleman is correct in that respect. I hold copies of the Order in Council in my hand. Prince Edward Island came into the Confederation on the 1st July, 1873. At that time certain officers of the Customs were in the employment of the Island. The hon. gentleman is mistaken when he says it was proposed to pay those amounts to the officers who were not in the employment of the Island Government at the time of Confederation.

MR. BURPEE: You misunderstand me.

MR. BOWELL: Perhaps I did; then these remarks do not apply. On the 3rd November, 1873, an Order in Council was passed appointing all the officers who were in the employment of the Island Government at the time of Confederation. The Order stated that these appointments, with the salaries attached, should date from the 1st day of July, the date the Island entered Confederation. Immediately on the access to power of my hon. friends opposite, in 1873, or shortly after, they rescinded the Order in Council making the appointments. Subsequently, a portion of them were paid at the salaries fixed by the Order in Council, and my hon. friend says that, just before leaving office, he gave instructions that the amount of $800 should be charged to the Revenue, and credited to the Collector. The question now arises as to whether these appointments, having been made by Order in Council, fixing their salaries at a certain amount from the 1st day of July, whether they were not all entitled to the amounts specified in the Order in Council. Under the circumstances, the Government thought it only proper that all these officers should be placed upon an equal footing, particularly as the Order in Council appointing them states their salaries should date from the 1st of July. I can inform my hon. friend that it is not proposed to pay one cent to any officer who was in the employment of the Island Government at the time it entered Confederation, and who was not mentioned in the Order in Council. Applications have been made, but constantly refused.

tenance of Way..... 10,000

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: This is a mere matter of account. The Government have resumed control of the Windsor Branch Railway, and they are to operate it by the Windsor and Annapolis Railway Company. The company pay all the expenses of operating the road, with the exception of the maintenance of the track, and receive two-thirds of the gross receipts, the Government receiving one-third, and paying the maintenance of the track. The result is that we have to ask a vote to pay for the maintenance of the track.

MR. BLAKE: How long has this arrangement been in force.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: Since last August.

MR. ANGLIN: Attempts are being made to bring about an adjustment between the Windsor and Annapolis Company and the Windsor and Yarmouth Company. Can the hon. Minister state how those negotiations stand?

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: No doubt the whole matter is not in a satisfactory position. The proposition has been made that by settling all the difficulties we would dismiss the disputed claims against the Dominion Government, and that proposition is under consideration.

MR. MACKENZIE: What claims are there against the Dominion Government?

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: The Windsor and Annapolis Railway Company long ago filed a petition of right, which has been pending in the Courts for two years or more; and the Western Counties Company are about to make a claim for the road being resumed by the Dominion Government, under the contract which was made with them, so that really we are between two fires.

MR. MACKENZIE: The hon. gentleman has placed himself between two fires by interfering and taking the road out of the possession of the company, as long as there was a chance of finishing it.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: There is no chance of finishing it whatever.

MR. MACKENZIE: I would like some particulars about Item 59.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: These figures are merely conjectural, but I can say no expenses are being incurred. The receipts are paying the expenditure.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER.

But we have to take a conjectural amount beyond what is supposed to be acquired.

MR. ANGLIN: I think there is much room for doubt as to the propriety of the course taken by the hon. Minister in insisting upon the literal carrying out of the arrangement between the Western Counties Railway and the Dominion Government. It is certainly taking away from that company the means of obtaining credit to enable them to raise money in the English market. It is to be hoped that the hon. Minister will do all in his power to bring about such an arrangement as will promote the speedy completion of that road, as carrying out a project in which so many people in his own Province are interested.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: The hon. gentleman is under a misapprehension as to the position of matters regarding the Western Counties Company when the Government resumed possession of the Windsor Branch. The Western Counties Railway Company had received large sums of money from Nova Scotia which they expended in constructing the road from Yarmouth to Digby. But the company became completely bankrupt and was unable to finish the line. A year passed over, and all their efforts to obtain aid to finish the road were completely abortive. They were taking the receipts of the Windsor Branch, but as for accomplishing the construction of the road they were unable to do it alone, until the Government of Nova Scotia came forward and guaranteed their bonds for the amount they required. Practically they had to build the line from Yarmouth to Digby, leaving the section from Yarmouth to Pictou entirely unprovided for. But their credit was gone and they could obtain no funds. It will cost about half a million dollars to complete it. That was the position of matters when, there being no prospect whatever of anything being done, and the trade of Nova Scotia being completely dislocated, the Government took the only course which, in their judgment, was at all conducive to the public interest, and resumed possession of the road.

MR. ANGLIN: We all know that this company started with very little capital, and its whole existence was a struggle. I would like the hon. Minister to say what time he allowed to elapse after the period at which the company were bound by their arrangement with the Dominion Government to have the road built before they took possession. My own impression is that he treated the company with peculiar harshness, when he demanded the fulfilment of the bond almost to the letter.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER : No time was allowed to elapse, for the simple reason that the inability of the company to carry out their contract was made apparent, and so thoroughly manifest, as to render it quite useless to allow time.

MR. ANGLIN : Mr. Plunkett, one of the contractors, was in England at the time trying to raise money on the bonds of the company. It is said he had a fair prospect of success, and could have raised the money he urgently required, had the Government not acted as they had done. I trust the hon. member will not interpose any objection to any arrangement that may be suggested for adjusting this matter.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER : The hon. gentleman is entirely misinformed. Mr. Plunkett had hawked the bonds of the company all over London for months and could not raise a dollar, and the attempt was abandoned before this procedure took place. The Government would be glad to give their consent to any arrangement of a character which would justify them in giving that consent.

MR. KILLAM : I desire to ask what policy has been considered and decided upon by hon. gentlemen opposite to fulfil the obligations of Parliament, two years ago, to build a railway between Halifax and Yarmouth.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER : If the hon. gentleman will not remain in his place, I cannot, for his special convenience, repeat the statements I have already made to the House.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT : While I was Minister of Finance, I had to repeat information, not once, but a dozen times, for the benefit of the hon. gentleman's followers, under precisely the same circumstances as those which exist in this case.

MR. ALLISON : The hon. member for Gloucester has insinuated very plainly that an opinion, which appears to prevail among certain of his party in the Province of Nova Scotia, is that the motive which prompted the Government in this matter was a political one. I think, both from public statements of the hon. member for Gloucester and private utterances of his, which I could not help overhearing, that he has insinuated very plainly that the motives of the hon. the Minister of Railways, in taking this action, were of a political nature. While I would be glad to see the question settled in an equitable manner, I think if any railway company in the Dominion has ever had fair consideration, with regard to an extension of time and an increase of the original subsidy, it is the Western Counties Railway of Nova Scotia. The hon. member for Gloucester complains that the company was not given additional time, but it is well known that there was a strong feeling in Nova Scotia that the hon. the Minister of Railways should have taken the step he has taken much earlier than he did. I had an interview with the hon. Minister in his own office on the subject, and in answer to my representations, which, perhaps, might have had some political application, he said, as nearly as I can recollect :

"That may be very true, but so satisfied am I that the people along the route of this line have been suffering from the inconvenience resulting from this state of affairs, that I am determined to regard and treat the matter entirely apart from political considerations."

MR. ANGLIN : It is happily, Sir, a novel proceeding in the House for an hon. gentleman to stand up and base a statement upon something he imagines he has overheard passing between two gentlemen in private. I did not say the hon. gentleman was actuated by political motives; nor did I insinuate that he was actuated by political motives. My sincere object was to try to get him to take such a view of the case as would, perhaps, lead him by-and-by, to provide the accommodation which is of the utmost importance to that section of the country. It is said out of doors, that the hon. the Minister of Railways was actuated largely by political motives, in his extraordinary conduct with regard to this matter, in not allowing the company a single day's grace. I brought the matter up for the purpose of giving him an opportunity of explaining why he took that course, and his intentions in regard to the future. I did say to my hon.

friend behind me that his action would still be considered political. That is still my impression, and if I have to say so in public, I say it now.

MR. KILLAM: I desire, in the first place, to call attention to the answer the hon. Minister of Railways has seen fit to make, or rather the insult he has thrown across the floor in answer to a very proper question I put to him. As far as the absence of members is concerned that is a matter for themselves. It is frequently necessary for members to be absent from their places, and when I consider it to be my duty to be elsewhere, or when convenience demands it, I shall do as the hon. Minister of Railways himself does, leave my seat and return when I please. Only to-day I had occasion to ask a question of the right hon. the First Minister on a matter connected with the affairs of his Department, but he was absent from his seat, and I had to repeat the question when he came in. I had no objection to repeat the question, because courtesy should be extended by hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House. I have been very careful, knowing the treatment the hon. Minister of Railways adopts to those who are politically opposed to him, not to provoke him; knowing that under the influence of political feeling he would do what he would regret in calmer moments, and that to the injury of his own friends who are interested in this work. The Bill brought in in reference to the Canada Central Railway is a laudable Bill, and it can be justified on financial grounds, as it will place in the hands of the Government, $1,500,000 without their going into the market as borrowers. The scheme for the Railway under consideration would have placed $5,500,000 in the hands of the hon. the Finance Minister, and would have saved him from the necessity of going into the market and borrowing, or from issuing a great part of his new paper currency. Nothing but spite, nothing but a desire to injure and destroy the counties who have not supported the hon. the Minister of Railways has been the cause of preventing the Government from carrying out that scheme. I can stand here and defend my conduct in connection with the Western Counties Railway, as well as the hon. gentleman can defend any of his political actions. I can appeal to my friends in all the counties interested in this work, and am sure all those who know me will say that nothing I have done in connection with it has been done with a desire to put money in my pockets or to obtain political favour. The people of my county have acted as independently as any people in the Dominion. My record in connection with this Railway is clear. I defy the hon. the Minister of Railways to bring up anything against me in connection with it from first to last, or to cast one shadow of discredit. I am sorry to have had to call this up so distinctly, but it was forced upon me. I would not have done it except for the insult of the hon. the Minister of Railways. In 1874, an Act was passed transferring the Windsor Branch to the Western Counties Railway Company, in pursuance of the agreement made with hon. gentlemen opposite in 1873. In 1877, the agreement was made that the road should be opened in two years, during which litigation arose and delayed the work. Other railways have been projected without being completed in the time intended. The Canada Pacific Railway was projected a good many years ago, and it was to be completed in ten years; and the Government have not succeeded yet in getting far on with it, though nine years have elapsed. How about the Intercolonial Railway? It was to be built in five years from Confederation, and yet was not finished in ten. The Western Counties Railway have done everything they could to complete the road. They spent a large sum of money given by the counties and by the Province, and raised from their own and other sources until the Windsor Branch was handed over. While the line was in progress, the hon. gentlemen stepped in, and from pure political motives and personal spite, took the branch Railway back, and for the sake of punishing Yarmouth injures the county of Digby, whose member I do not see in his place, and the county of Annapolis, whose member is silent on the subject, and destroys communication with Halifax for whose interests he pretends to be so anxious, and one of whose members is not in his seat, and all to kill the member for Yarmouth. Let the hon. gentleman try it; let him go on for the three years he may remain in office, and do what he can to injure those people. They are independent; they will put up with some inconvenience, in spite of his petty revenge and the wreaking of his animosity on those opposed to him, rather than accept the policy of taxation of the hon. the Minister of Finance who has been so unwise as to refuse to do what was so manifestly to the advantage of the Dominion as the proposed guarantee.

In reply to Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT,

MR. O'CONNOR said the amount was required for increased Post-office accommodation, also owing principally to increased railway communication, more especially in Ontario, and the appointment of additional men. The increased railway communication was shown as follows:—In 1877-78, there were 4,779 miles; in 1878-79, there were 5,121 miles; in 1879-80, there were 5,752; and in 1880-81, there were 6,052.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT asked what railways these were.

MR. O'CONNOR said he was not prepared to give full particulars. The Credit Valley comes in next year; the Picton and several other railways come in part of the present year. There is an increase for mail clerks' salaries. In 1877-78, their salaries amounted to $146,487; in 1878-79, to $156,160; in 1879-80, to $169,000; and in 1880-81, to $171,600.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT said the increase was very large. The present Government, in that particular Department, were not only unable to reduce the figure it had attained under the late Government, but had found it necessary to add over $100,000 to the expenditure which the late Government had incurred. It might be right. He was not disposed to question the necessity for the expenditure, but it showed that the hon. gentleman was in error in condemning the late Government for spending too much.

MR. BUNSTER: I am obliged to the hon. member for Centre Huron (Sir Richard J. Cartwright) for drawing attention—for drawing my attention in particular—to the fact that there is such a large increase in the expenses of the Postal Department, for in British Columbia it is $29,000 less. I wish to draw the attention of the hon. the Postmaster-General to the serious neglect of Nanaimo, and the carelessness with which that port has been treated.

In reply to Mr. BLAKE,

MR. O'CONNOR said he was unable to give details as to the probabilities of mileage to be used for Postal Service during the next year. He had the Estimates from the Deputy, and they were made up by him before he (Mr. O'Connor) came to the Department; but perhaps, at Concurrence, he would be able to furnish the information.

MR. PATERSON (South Brant) asked if the construction of railways had the tendency to decrease the expenditure of postal arrangements.

MR. O'CONNOR said it was quite the reverse.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: When the Estimates were made up for the current year, it was supposed that, by means of contracts and the application of principles of economy, we might reduce the estimate; and we did reduce it, taking into account the reductions that would be made by the renewal of the contracts and by the expiring contracts being let again. The estimate was made with good care. Under the system of reletting, wherever we adopted the use of railways instead of the ordinary system, we find it adds to the accommodation given, and for that increased accommodation the country must necessarily pay. When the Supplementary Estimates came down, it was stated by the Secretary that a new system was introduced; he said, if I remember aright, that the Postmaster-General had been in the habit of deducting his commission for stamps, and remitting the net amount; this made a practical difference of $75,000. That system is altered, and the Postmaster remits the money in full, and a cheque is retained for the commission." But still there is, no doubt, an increased expenditure, and a very large one, in the Province of Ontario. It results from the increased facilities given, and from increased mileage by railways, and from the fact that the amount saved by reletting of contracts has not been so great—perhaps, from the effect of the National Policy—because business has been improved and people would not contract so low as before.

MR. BLAKE: We have had two explanations. Perhaps if the hon. Minister who prepared the Estimates were to give us another we would have the explanation complete. The Postmaster-General evidently was not posted in this matter. He gave us a lot of figures, not having anything to do with the question put to him. It would be advantageous if the Government could give us a definite and precise statement of how this large increase is made up, and what branches it divides itself into. It would certainly appear that the hon. gentleman did exhibit faith in the accusations that had been made. They expected to let the contracts much cheaper and more economically; but even if they were ever so much better managers of such matters than their predecessors, perhaps they spoiled their own little game themselves.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: The country is not such a cheap one to live in.

MR. BLAKE: We know that to our sorrow. I have no doubt the hon. gentleman has been informed of that by the members for Prince Edward Island. It is not so cheap for men or horses, and, consequently, more money has to be paid. We might fairly know, first of all, how much of this is simply cross-entry, and how much is occasioned by the unexpected difficulties to which the hon. gentleman has referred.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT: If I remember correctly—and I have no doubt the hon. the Postmaster-General will correct me if I am wrong—Ontario is about the only Province in the Dominion which returns a surplus to the Revenue over and above the amount expended for Postal Service in it.

MR. O'CONNOR: No.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT:

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY.

Then it comes closer to it than any other Province.

MR. O'CONNOR: Yes.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT: I think I am also justified in saying that when increased facilities are given in Ontario, the expansion in the Revenue is generally pretty equal to the amount expended. I would like to ask the hon. Minister whether the income derived from the Post-offices has increased at all during the last year up to date?

MR. O'CONNOR: I think not.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT: I am sorry to hear that, because that would be a very decided sign of the improvement of business.

MR. BUNSTER: The hon. gentleman (Sir Richard J. Cartwright) states that Ontario is the only Province that returns a surplus in favour of the Post Office. I beg to differ with him. According to the Terms of Confederation with British Columbia, the Dominion agreed to carry our mails, on certain routes, as part of the purchase of our Province.

MR. BLAKE: Was British Columbia purchased?

MR. BUNSTER: I heard the hon. gentleman who is now leader of the Opposition (Mr. Blake) say the other day that she was seduced. We have not been treated well by the hon. the Postmaster-General, and the ex-Postmaster-General, and I feel it my bounden duty to call attention to the great injustice being done to British Columbia by reason of not giving us the mail accommodation we were promised on entering the Union. Very few of the hon. Ministers have done us justice, but I must say that the hon. the Finance Minister did a graceful thing in taking off the tax from powder when he found out it was distasteful to our people, and against their interests. I have only one fault to find against that hon. gentleman, namely, that he did not comply with my request to put a duty on rice in order to help us keep out the Chinese. I trust the hon. the Postmaster-General will take into consideration the advisability of giving us better postal accommodation, and so fulfil the Terms of Union.

MR. O'CONNOR: I will, at all events, see that no Chinamen pass through the British Columbia Post Offices.

MR. HUNTINGTON: When I had—the good fortune, shall I say—of presiding over the Post Office Department, my hon. friend (Mr. Bunster) used to make some representations to me about British Columbia; and although I showed a disposition to meet his views, I was never complimented as the hon. gentleman opposite have been complimented by him. I thought, when the hon. gentleman's friends came into power, they would do something for him; but while he complains that they also have dealt unjustly with the Province, he still expresses unbounded confidence in the Government and supports them all the same. I compliment the hon. gentleman upon the manner in which he stands up for British Columbia, and declares that she is oppressed day after day. I am sure the British Columbians must be proud of the representative they have in this House; and I must compliment him also for his declaration that he will stick through thick and thin, to the men who deal out this oppression to the country he represents. I am inclined to think the Post Office Department is growing in expense in consequence of the railway facilities that have to be afforded. I am inclined to think the hon. gentleman (Mr. O'Connor) has found that it costs something to supply the public with the accommodation they expect from that Department. Perhaps the hon. gentleman is not to be blamed because he cannot give the details at the moment, which have induced him to ask for a further vote in the Supplementary Estimates. I am willing to wait until he gets the information and gives it to us. But if it should turn out that the hon. gentleman finds that he is not able to administer that Department more economically than it was administered by those whom he and his friends denounced for their extravagance, I am sure he will come and say frankly to the country: We were mistaken when we brought those charges against you; we were mistaken when we thought you were extravagant; we have been obliged to exceed those expenditures for which you were responsible; we have the responsibility of office on us, and we want to admit the mistake. My own opinion is that the hon. gentleman should say that whenever he gets a chance, in order that we may see he is sorry of the wrong that was done when those false accusations were fulminated against the late Administration. The great Conservative party does not wish to stand before this country as having for years fulminated slanders against the Post Office Department, which, to-day, they see they are not able to justify; and having denounced that Department for extravagance, which to-day they find necessary to exceed. I am sure, if the hon. the Postmaster-General has not the candour to come down with the statement I suggest, the people will understand that, having obtained office, he is placed in position to justify those whom in years past his party slandered.

MR. O'CONNOR: I had not the honour of having a seat in the House at the time the hon. gentleman speaks of, when his Administration was denounced, and I know nothing about this except what I learned from the newspapers. I have just this to say, that the postal communication of this country is continually increasing. The accommodations in British Columbia, the North-West Territories, Manitoba and the new settlements in the older Provinces, have to be increased in accordance with the advance of settlement. It is not necessary to say anything further than that to account for the increase at the present time.

MR. BUNSTER: I challenge the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Huntington) to show where I have been inconsistent. It is my bounden duty to get up and point out to any hon. Minister of the Crown, where any injustice has been done to British Columbia. The hon. gentleman has given me a lashing that I do not deserve, simply for doing my duty to my constituents. I have supported the Government because they have exhibited more good will towards our Province than any past Administration, and I shall continue to support them in the hope and belief that all our demands will ultimately be carried out.

MR. GILLIES: I am of the impression that there are other places that have reasons to complain of the treatment received at the hands of the hon. the Postmaster-General's Department besides British Columbia. I wish to draw attention to an affair that occurred in the riding I come from. About the latter part of last Session I brought to the notice of the hon. Minister the fact that the Postmaster of Carnegie, in North Bruce, was about to retire from his position, and another person near by, who could suitably fill the position, was prepared to take it. But I received no definite reply at that time. Shortly after the prorogation of Parliament, and on the final resignation of the postmaster at Carnegie, I again communicated on the subject with the hon. the Postmaster-General, but still the reply was indefinite. Meantime, a report was current in the locality that the office was to be closed. On hearing this I further solicited information from the hon. the Postmaster-General as to the cause of closing the office, and whether its being kept open was a loss to the country? My object in making this enquiry was for the purpose of showing that the road on which the post-office in question was situated was between two points, Paisley and Cheeley, that being a post road travelled daily, and therefore the service could not incur any expense, so far as that office was concerned. But all I could learn was, on communicating the above facts, that the post-office had to be closed. It will thus be seen that the consideration of expenditure could not have actuated the Post Office Department in closing that office. I then endeavoured to investigate the cause, when I learned that representations had been made to the Postal Department by parties in the neighbourhood, who are opposed to me politically, that it was as well to close the office; that the people in that neighbourhood were all strong Reformers, Grits, thus indicating as much as that they are scarcely worthy of the common postal facilities. Those were the reasons given. I know that several persons in the neighbourhood, opposed to me, wrote to the Department desiring the closing of the office. I do not say positively that that was the reason why it was closed, but I could find no other. This office was opened in 1863, and continued open for sixteen years. It served about forty families and 100 adult individuals, and at which no less than forty Canadian papers were received.

MR. O'CONNOR: Did the hon. gentleman move for the papers?

MR. GILLIES: I did, but they have not been brought down. One reason why the office should be allowed to remain open, on the hon. Minister's own showing, is that it did not incur any additional expenditure to the country. Again, many of the people who carried on correspondence through, and received papers by, this office, will cease to correspond as largely as before, and therefore a loss to the postal revenue must ensue. I desire to learn now, from the hon. the Postmaster-General, the cause of the closing of that office. If there is no better reason than hitherto shown to be offered, I am sure it should be reopened, for the people are suffering from the want of postal convenience in that locality. The hon. the Finance Minister referred to the matter of economy. It is desirable certainly to economise; but when the economical intentions of the Department and of the Government will not be interfered with, surely we ought to be allowed, in that section of country, to have the common conveniences allowed in connection with the postal service elsewhere in the country. The hon. the Finance Minister also stated that the postal necessities of the country are increasing. No doubt; they must increase along with the development of the country and the increase of population, which is a good reason why more offices should be opened and not closed. Therefore, if no better cause can be given than that certain individuals in that quarter of the country, without consulting myself, as its humble representative, take upon themselves to correspond with the hon. the Postmaster-General, and that upon their statements he chooses to close the office, it occurs to me to have been anything but creditable to the hon. gentleman to have done so on any such questionable grounds. On those particular points, to which allusion has been made, I hope I shall receive a satisfactory reply this evening, or, at all events, such as will set forth the actual state of the case.

MR. METHOT: I rise to give my testimony to the economy of the Government in my county. I find a little too much of this virtue. For instance, on the Arthabaska and Three Rivers Railway, there used to be two mail conductors, one paid $800 and the other $600 a year. As soon as this Government came to power, they removed both, and the mail now goes without any conductor. We desire economy as much as anybody, but not that it shall all be effected in one place. I have received no satisfactory reply to my questions on this subject. Instead of two officers receiving $1,400, I am asking for only one at $500 a year. The people in my county are suffering at present on this account. The $500 I ask for a conductor will not be all lost, because the Government will be obliged, I am afraid, at present, to pay the people who distribute the mails. The postmasters in Arthabaska and Three Rivers are asking an increase of salary, because of an increase of work. I hope in this respect we shall receive justice.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT: If the Postmaster-General cannot answer the remarks of the member for North Bruce (Mr. Gillies) just now, he can on Concurrence. Remarks on a grievance of the kind described by that hon. gentleman, ought to be answered. We ought, before the item is passed, to have an understanding that the information will be given on Concurrence.

MR. O'CONNOR: I think the hon. gentleman (Mr. Gillies) should have given notice of his question. At present I am not sufficiently informed to answer it, but hope to be on Concurrence.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT: Should there not be a contribution to this item from the United States authorities? It includes the praising of their lands by means of the pamphlets we have heard so much about.

MR. BLAKE: The item is for "advertising Dominion lands, etc." I suppose the "etc." is a place in the United States.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: The only State we advertise is Texas.

MR. BLAKE: This item would be included in the costs connected with the lands in the North-West, as coming within a separate account?

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I think fairly so.

In reply to SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT, SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY stated that the principle item was $210,183, expended on account of Intercolonial Railway over and above the vote taken.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT: It would be a very considerable convenience if the Finance Minister would cause to be laid on the Table of the House, when we meet again, those several classes of Returns that the hon. gentlemen on this side, charged with the financial affairs of the Opposition, has always to move for. It would save a great deal of time and trouble to the Department as well as to the Opposition; also the details of the receipts and expenditures. The Gazette returns are not sufficiently extended to give us any real information.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: Yes; they shall be prepared in advance, and will save a great deal of trouble.

NAVIGABLE WATERS OBSTRUCTIONS LAW AMENDMENT BILL.—[BILL 107.]

(Mr. Pope, Queen's, P.E.I.)

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the said Bill.

(In the Committee.)

In reply to MR. ANGLIN,

MR. POPE (Queen's, P. E. I.) said he did not see how the provision holding the owners of wrecked vessels pecuniarily responsible for their removal from navigable waters could be modified. The parties blameable for those obstructions would be obliged to remove them or pay the cost, instead of throwing it on the public as at present. Many of the wrecks in Lake Erie and other waters are those of foreign vessels, the owners taking no trouble to remove them. Where the parties can pay the cost of their removal, the Government should exact it. Under the law in Quebec, if a vessel is sunk and obstructs navigation, the owner is bound to put some signal there to warn other vessels of the obstruction, until it is removed. If he does not do it, he is liable to a penalty. In all other places there is no such law, and I do not think the people of this country should be called upon to pay the expense of removing obstructions to the navigation of our rivers.

MR. BLAKE: There is already a remedy existing, at any rate in Ontario, for such offences as this Bill proposes to deal with. At present, no person can leave an obstruction in any navigable water without being subject to proceedings in the Civil Courts to compel him to remove that obstruction, and these proceedings are not unfrequently taken. I have in my mind at this moment two cases, in which sunken vessels, one in the harbour of Owen Sound and the other in the harbour of Toronto, were required to be removed by order of the Court, because they were public nuisances and an infringement of the right of navigation. The difficulty is that we seem to be interfering, in these matters, with civil rights. The law, up to this point, has been within our jurisdiction and in the exercise of our power with reference to the navigation of harbours, etc., declaring that the Government has a right to give notice to remove obstructions, and in default of the owner of the vessel doing so, to seize and sell the obstruction and apply the proceeds towards the expense. What you now propose to do is, that the party should be responsible in damages beyond the amount realised by the sale of the wreck. It seems to me that is going dangerously near to the domain of civil rights. I do not think the hon. gentleman has met the difficulty which I pointed out before. I remarked that, as far as our jurisdiction goes, we ought to deal summarily with persons who buy a water-logged or bad vessel with her cargo, and then run her aground in a harbour for the purpose of breaking her up and taking what there is in her. But there may be cases of a different character, in which the wreck is caused by stress of weather or otherwise, and when the owner is not at all responsible. It seems to me it would be hard to apply, in such cases, the sharp methods proposed by the Bill, especially as our existing laws afford a means of dealing with them.

MR. SPROULE: The hon. member for West Durham referred to a case in Owen Sound. That case is still before the Courts, and, though considerable money has been lost in expenses, the hulks are lying there still.

MR. BLAKE: They went against the wrong party.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou): There may be some hardship, but I do not see that it affects the principle of the Bill. The question is whether a party should be compelled to remove an obstruction which is his own property, and which has become an obstruction of the navigable highway through his own negligence. I understood my hon. friend would not go so far as to say the Bill is ultra vires, because I fancy that under a true construction of the British North America Act that can hardly be said. The question, then, is only as to the expediency of the measure my hon. friend has introduced. I do not myself see the hardship. Of course there are always cases where rights are interfered with. If a man is driving along the highway and wrecks his carriage against an impediment he did not observe, it can hardly be said that he would have a right to walk away and leave the carriage on the highway to wreck the next passer by in the same way. The principle is the same. A harbour is a public highway. If a vessel is sunk there by the owner's negligence and becomes a nuisance, the party who owns the vessel is the one who ought to remove that obstruction. It is true the Government have the power of removing it and of indicting the party who willfully obstructs the passage, but at the same time I fancy it is the bounden duty of the owner of a wreck to remove it before it causes a loss to others. While I think cases of hardship may arise, it appears to me the principle of the Bill is well founded, and that the Bill ought to pass.

MR. BLAKE: If it is the bounden duty of such persons to remove the vessel, the law is already sufficient, and if the party does not do it, the law can compel him to do it.

MR. McDONALD: It won't do for a party to wait until the law enforces that duty. We say: If you do not do it we will do it for you, and make you pay for it. You must do your duty properly; if you do not, we will not permit the general public to suffer injury from your negligence.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY delivered two Messages from His Excellency the Governor-General.

MR. SPEAKER read the Messages, and they are as follows:—

“LORNE.

“The Governor-General transmits to the House of Commons, Supplementary Estimates of sums required for the service of the Dominion for the year ending 30th June, 1881; and, in accordance with the provisions of the British North America Act, 1867, he recommends these Estimates to the House of Commons.

“LORNE.

“The Governor-General transmits to the House of Commons the additional Supplementary Estimates of the amounts required for the service of Canada, for the year expiring 30th June, 1880; and in accordance with the provisions of the British North America Act, 1867, he recommends these Estimates to the House of Commons.

“GOVERNMENT HOUSE,

“OTTAWA, 3rd May, 1880.”

Ordered, That the said Messages, and the Estimates accompanying the same, be referred to the Committee of Supply.—(Sir Samuel L. Tilley.)

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: The late Finance Minister asked me if I would lay on the Table of the House a statement of the Customs and Excise Revenue for the month of April. I have prepared that statement, and have thought it advisable to give also a comparative statement for April, 1878 and 1879. I may state, for the information of the House, that the Customs receipts for April last were $1,152,260; Excise, $382,342. For April, 1878, the Customs receipts were $901,661; Excise, $310,306—making an increase of the Customs receipts of 1879, as compared with 1878, of $250,599, and of Excise of $72,036. Last April the Customs receipts were $628,785, and Excise, $139,588; making a difference in Customs of $523,475, and of Excise, $242,754.

PRIVILEGE—THE MEMBER FOR RICHELIEU.

REMARKS.

MR. MOUSSEAU: Before proceeding further, I beg leave to address a few words with reference to the petition presented by my hon. friend from Quebec East (Mr. Laurier). It is a petition against the hon. member for Richelieu (Mr. Massue).

MR. SPEAKER: I must tell the hon. member that no debate is allowed on the presentation of the petition without he has some motion to make.

MR. MOUSSEAU: It is only a preliminary motion I am going to make, which will not give rise to a debate. I will, at least, lay the facts before the House before we take any action.

MR. MACKENZIE: We do not want to know.

MR. BLAKE: The petition has not been received.

MR. MOUSSEAU: Then I rise to a question of privilege. I desire to ask two things: first, that the petition be ordered to be printed in the Journals of the House, so that hon. gentlemen may know, when the debate comes up, the facts of the case. When the motion to receive the petition is made I shall oppose it on the ground that, if the allegations made therein are true, they are allegations that should go before the Courts and not before the House.

MR. LAURIER: I suggest that the petition cannot now be received. To-morrow we will be called upon to proceed or not with the petition, and then I apprehend it will be in order for my hon. friend to give his objections to its being received.

MR. MOUSSEAU: I do not understand the opposition of my hon. friend. I must say the petition comes at a very late period of the Session.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman will do well to wait until to-morrow, when the motion is made for the reading and receiving of the petition.

MR. MOUSSEAU: I hope no one will oppose the motion I am going to make, which is that the petition presented by the hon. member for Quebec East be printed.

MR. BLAKE: I think it would be highly inconvenient to set a precedent ordering that a petition be printed before it is proposed to be read and received. It may contain allegations that should not have the degree of publicity, which would be unvalued by printing the petition. We know not what there may be in it at present.

MR. MOUSSEAU: I move that it be read and printed.

MR. BLAKE: It is a general proposition that a petition should not be printed without previous notice.

MR. MOUSSEAU: The allegations in the petition are very serious, and it will only prevent the petition going before the public, because the House will be pro-rogued on Wednesday or Friday, and justice will be prevented. From what I hear—

Several HON. MEMBERS: Order.

MR. DESJARDINS: I move the adjournment of the House. That will prevent any injustice.

MR. MOUSSEAU: I will say one word more.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. member for Hochelaga (Mr. Desjardins), has moved the adjournment of the House.

MR. MOUSSEAU: Now, the allegations in this petition—

Several HON. MEMBERS: Order.

MR. CASEY: It is not allowed—

Several HON. MEMBERS: Order.

MR. CASEY: I shall have order.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY.

The point of order is this: I claim that it is not in order to speak of or discuss anything on a motion for adjourning the House. It is out of order to discuss this petition, which it would not be in order to discuss before. I claim that it is not in order, according to the Rules of the House.

MR. KIRKPATRICK: You can discuss anything.

MR. SPEAKER: I am afraid it is not regular to discuss the petition just presented. It is not before the House upon the question for adjournment.

MR. MOUSSEAU: The House ought not to adjourn before that important case is disposed of; if it does it will be a great injustice. The hon. member for Richelieu—

Several HON. MEMBERS: Order.

MR. MACKENZIE: This is out of order to attempt to discuss this matter.

MR. SPEAKER: It is not in order to discuss a petition presented to the House, a petition which is in fact not before the House.

MR. CASEY: That is just what he is doing.

MR. SPEAKER: It is a question of privilege, affecting the seat of an hon. member of the House, and generally speaking it might be considered.

MR. MOUSSEAU: Then I ask it as a question of privilege. The petition is attacking the honour and dignity—

MR. LAURIER: I understand the object of my hon. friend is to have the petition read and received, or to know whether it can be or not. I would suggest it should be done to-morrow, as we are so near the end of the Session. He will find that course the best if he objects to let it stand over until Wednesday.

MR. MOUSSEAU: Do I understand the hon. gentleman that it shall be printed now and presented to-morrow?

MR. LAURIER: Not printed; but to decide whether it shall be received or not to-morrow.

MR. DESJARDINS: Then I withdraw the motion for adjournment.

Motion (Mr. Desjardins), with leave of the House, withdrawn.

MONTREAL TRINITY HOUSE AND HARBOUR COMMISSIONERS ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.

(Mr. Pope, Queen's, P.E.I.)

FIRST READING.

MR. POPE (Queen's, P.E.I.), in introducing a Bill (No. 124) To amend the Acts respecting the Trinity House and Harbour Commissioners of Montreal, said: The Harbour Commissioners of Montreal are most anxious to have authority for three of their own members to investigate the skill of pilots. It is very difficult to get five together, and they want to give that authority to three. I move that the sanction of the House be given to that effect. It is not necessary to do more than pass one clause giving this authority.

MR. BLAKE: If I rightly understand the hon. gentleman, the sole purpose is to confer on three members of the body, to be selected by themselves, powers which at present belong to a quorum of the whole body.

MR. POPE: Yes.

Bill read the first time.

MASTERS AND MATES ON INLAND WATERS.

REMARKS.

MR. POPE (Queen's, P.E.I.): With regard to a Resolution on the paper in regard to the examination of masters and mates of vessels sailing on the lakes, I may state that it is not intended to introduce a Bill this Session. Great necessity has been shown why masters and mates navigating the inland waters should receive certificates of competency. A serious loss occurred last season on Lake Superior, and it turned out that the officers of the boat had no certificates, and were not required to obtain them. After acting as pursers for a year or so, sharp young men are often put in as masters of vessels, and they do very well during the summer season; but it is absolutely necessary that persons navigating those lakes, which are really inland seas, should be thoroughly experienced and competent men. We will allow the matter to drop now, and bring in a Bill next Session.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH: It is not intended that the examination shall be the same as for the officers of sea-going ships?

MR. POPE: It will be a different standard altogether.

MR. MCCALLUM: The hon. gentleman has spoken rather strongly of the class of persons in charge of vessels navigating the lakes. I think they are as good a class of men as any in the world. Of course, accidents have happened, and may happen again, owing to circumstances over which the officers have no control. I think the hon. gentleman will find that most of the officers will be able to pass any examination he may deem necessary to convince him of their competency.

PETROLEUM INSPECTION ACT
AMENDMENT BILL.

(Mr. Baby.)

FIRST READING.

MR. BABY, in moving for a Committee of the Whole to consider the following resolution:—

“That it is expedient to amend the Acts respecting the Inspection of Petroleum, and to provide for raising the fire-test of Canadian Petroleum from 105 degrees to 115 degrees, Fahrenheit; and for reducing the fire-test on Foreign Petroleum from 130 degrees to 120 degrees, Fahrenheit; and for placing the responsibility as to the quality of Petroleum on the vendors thereof,”

Said: From the discussion which took place in the House some evenings ago, it was found necessary that certain amendments should be made to the law. In the Bill which will be introduced upon those Resolutions, there is a provision to secure a uniform system of testing petroleum. At present some of the officers have not the knowledge or the instruments to make proper tests, and it is the intention of the Government, whenever any difficulty occurs between the officers and importers of oil, to have the matter referred to a central office, either here in Ottawa, or at Quebec or Toronto. The Bill will also transfer the responsibility from the officers and place it upon those selling the oil. I hope the changes in the law will meet the approval of the trade.

MR. COLBY: Having spoken at considerable length on this subject on the second reading of the Bill, which I had the honor to introduce, I do not propose to occupy the attention of the House for any considerable time now. I will simply say that I have seen no reason to change the opinions, which, after considerable consideration, I deemed necessary to express. My own conviction is that a test of 115° is sufficiently high for the purpose of safety, applied either to Canadian or American oils, and that there is, intrinsically, no difference between them in the matter of safety, if they stand the same flash test; that if there be a larger percentage of volatile materials in the one oil than in the other, the test detects it. I know this is a controverted point, and that it is urged very strenuously by experts that there is a difference; that instead of the more volatile constituents being all eliminated from American oil by distillation, a certain proportion is held in suspension, in connection with paraffine, and that there should be a discrimination. However, that is a theoretical point. Since I have understood the proposition of the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue, I have taken some pains to ascertain, by communication with dealers in Portland, Boston, and New York, whether this difference of five degrees between the American and Canadian oils is of any practical significance, whether it would place the consumer of American oil in a worse position. My information goes in the direction of showing that, practically, it is of very little consequence whether the test be 115° or 120°; so I am not disposed to spin too fine a point in the matter when the hon. Minister has shown a disposition to meet the views of the country, not only in respect to the fire test, but other matters. The result of my enquiries is, that there are substantially three classes of oils manufactured in the United States. One class is manufactured for export, and stands 110° burning test, which is lower than any we have ever received in this country, and, in my judgment, too low for safety. Another is an oil standing a burning test of 150°, a superior oil for export—a most economical oil for general consumption; the price of this oil in the American market is 14c. a gallon. The third class embraces special oils manufactured to meet the requirements of countries where very high tests are adopted. This class is higher in price and inferior in quality to the class last mentioned. The difficulty under the old test was that we were not permitted to use the 150° burning test oils, but were driven to purchase a special oil, and we had to pay a very much larger price for an article that was inferior as an illuminating oil. I believe the proposition of the hon. Minister will relieve us from the difficulty of purchasing these high priced special oils, and will enable us to purchase freely the superior oils made in the interest of the consumer. Under these circumstances, without by any means admitting the proposition that there should be a discrimination, and maintaining the views I formerly expressed, that a test of 115° is sufficient for safety, I am not disposed to divide the House. But, if it should be found that I am mistaken in my assumption as to the classes of oils which will be admitted under the 120° test, and that practical inconvenience results, and that we are compelled to buy higher priced oils, I will, next Session, feel it my duty to call the attention of the House and Government to this subject again.

MR. FLYNN: I regret that the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue did not adopt the fire test contained in the hon. member for Stanstead's Bill, which made it uniform at 115° on all oils. For years we paid the large duty of 15c. a gallon on American oil, as a protection to the Canadian manufacturer. Some time ago it was considered, in the interest of the people of the Maritime Provinces, who are large consumers of American oils, that the duty was too high, and should be reduced. The people of the Maritime Provinces invariably used the American oils, even at the payment of this very high duty. As regards the test, no reason has been assigned by the Minister of Inland Revenue for a difference between the tests on Canadian and American oils. In 1868, the first Act in reference to inspection, the fire test for petroleum was made 115°. It was, after some years, in 1871, reduced to 105° on Canadian and foreign oils. No reason has been assigned why the fire test should have been increased last Session. Experience from 1871 to 1879 showed that the fire test of 105° was sufficiently high to assure every necessary safety. American oils has been found safer and more convenient for general use than any other. I fail to see any reason for the difference now made between the American and Canadian article. The British fire test on all foreign oils is only 100°, which Parliament considered sufficient to secure all requisite.

safety. Why, then, should the people of the Dominion be asked to submit to a fire test of 120° on American oil. If the test be raised to 120° it will still exclude a large portion of foreign oil. I have seen a letter from the Collector at St. John, to the hon. Minister of Finance, in which he says that oil which stands the test of 115° is a good, safe and merchantable article. Now, there is no doubt that if, by any refining process, you bring it up to a test of 120° , you not only reduce its illuminating power, but you add to its cost by 2c. or 3c. per gallon. This will, to a great extent, exclude American oil from the Maritime Provinces. One great advantage in favour of American oil, is that it is of less offensive odour than Canadian oil. Even in Ontario, where the oil is produced, I find, by the Returns of 1879, that they imported 241,000 gallons of American oil, while the imports into New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island that year were 628,000 gallons. I do not see why there should be a difference in the fire test of American and Canadian oils. I think it is an unfair discrimination against the Maritime Provinces, and will injure their trade and commerce. If the Government are determined to apply their policy of Protection to the manufacture of Canadian oils, if they desire to protect oil rings, let them do so by raising the duty. If 6c. a gallon is not enough let them raise it to 10c. or 15c., but do not interfere with trade in the manner contemplated in this Bill. Let us know what we really have to pay to protect oil rings, and do not compel us to use oil so offensive and disagreeable as the Canadian oil is. The Act of last year fixing the test at 130° was a practical prohibition of American oil, and if any was used in the Maritime Provinces, it was smuggled in. I have no doubt that even if the test is lowered to 120° a large quantity of oil will still be smuggled. If, from 1871 to 1879, a fire test of 105° was found sufficient, I see no reason why it should not be sufficient still. I do not know of any accidents having occurred under that test. If in England a fire test of 100° is considered high enough, why should we adopt 120° ? I cannot see why there should be a discrimination between the two oils, and I think the Government would do well to adopt the suggestion of the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr Colby), which made the test 115° on both Canadian and American oils.

Mr. ROSS (West Middlesex): I am exceedingly pleased the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue has seen fit to increase the fire test, and thus increase the safety of Canadian oil. The number of deplorable accidents that have occurred in this country, during the last year, called for some additional guarantee of safety. I notice hon. gentlemen take exception to the proposition of the hon. Minister, on two grounds: first, that the fire test proposed is higher than that adopted in England. But the circumstances of the two countries are different. A fire test that may be perfectly safe in a moist climate, like that of England, would not be safe in our climate during the heated summer months, nor yet in that of the Southern States. Another objection taken is that by increasing the fire test we reduce the illuminating power of the oil. Experts tell us that the illuminating power of oil depends upon its specific gravity. You will observe that, by the proposition of the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue, the specific gravity of Canadian oil is fixed at 8.2, so that we have in that fact a guarantee that the American oil introduced into this country, will be equal in illuminating power to Canadian oil. I think the simple fact of there being an absolute necessity to provide greater security in the consumption of coal oil is in itself a sufficient justification for the increase of the fire test on Canadian oil. Experts tell us, moreover, that the explosive material found in American oil is proportionately greater than in Canadian oil, and fully justifies the Minister in exacting a discriminating test as between Canadian and American oils. The discrimination is very light, indeed much lighter than it was under the old law, namely, five degrees. I think this discrimination, while, perhaps, it may not be quite just to the Canadian oil, will at least indicate the relative explosive character of the two oils. As to the other objection, that it has a tendency to prevent the importation of American oils, I think that is not borne out by the Return brought down by the Minister of Inland Revenue some time ago. I notice that, within the last six months, we imported nearly 400,000 gallons of American coal oil, which paid duty. How much came in that did not pay duty I cannot tell, but we have the fact that nearly 400,000 gallons did pay duty during that six months. During the corresponding six months of the previous year there were 624,000 gallons of oil imported that paid duty. Of course this is really a large decrease, perhaps, relatively, a larger decrease in this article than in many of the other articles imported from the United States. But there is the fact still remaining that a large quantity of the oil consumed in Canada comes from the United States; and if it comes in at a higher fire test there is additional safety, and with the uniform specific gravity proposed by the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue, there will be a uniform illuminating power. I think that the Bill, in the form in which it is brought down, should be acceptable to the House, inasmuch as it provides for those two important points to which I have referred, namely, safety and illuminating power.

MR. PLUMB: Having taken some part in the debate upon the Resolutions introduced by the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Colby) in respect to the test of petroleum, and taking a very strong interest in the promotion of every measure which shall be calculated to increase the consumption of the product of the Canadian wells, I was gratified to hear that the Government had decided to take up the question, feeling confident that it would be dealt with in the spirit of promoting, as far as it could be done with regard to the consumer, one of the great industries of the Dominion. I believe that the oil refiners of this country have to blame themselves only, for not having secured the home market; and I trust that the change in the fire test now proposed by the Government, will have the effect of compelling Canadian manufacturers to do what they are perfectly able to do if they choose, that is, to make the quality of their oil as good as that manufactured in the United States. I think there will be no difficulty about securing the Canadian market if they will take the pains which the American manufacturer takes in deodorising, bleaching and purifying their product. I have no doubt that the illuminating power of Canadian oil is greater than that of American oil, and that it contains a far less proportion of explosive gases. I am very glad to see that the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue has found it within his sphere of duty to accept, in some degree, the proposition which was made by myself and others in the debate which took place the other night. I think the compromise effected between the views expressed by the hon. member for Stanstead, by the hon. member for East Middlesex, and by myself, will be considered a fair one and acceptable to all parties, and will give the consumer a Canadian oil fully as agreeable for use as the best American, and possessing the superior recommendations of cheaper price, higher powers of illumination, and greater safety.

MR. CASEY: I think there is no part of this Bill which calls for any objection except the discrimination, small as it is, which it is proposed to make in favour of Canadian oils. I think no valid reason has been shown why any such discrimination should exist. It is, of course, absurd to argue that, of two oils which stand the same flash test, one will explode at a lower point than the other, since both explode at the same point. The only remaining argument is that there will be more danger with American oil after the explosion than with Canadian oil; but it has been shown, by the admission of the refiners themselves, that the difference between the flashing point and burning point of American oil is greater than with Canadian oil, and, consequently, that the former is less liable to burn after explosion than the latter. The House and the country should understand that by this discrimination, protection is intended to be given to refiners in addition to the enormous protection they already have. I think consumers of oil throughout the country will feel that they are still unnecessarily mulcted by this Bill, although it is a better measure than the one which precedes it.

MR. CONNELL: The practical result of the Bill of last year was that a great deal of dissatisfaction arose in the country. The people were willing to purchase Canadian oil provided that they could get it of equal value as to its illuminating properties with the American oil, but the fact was that the oil that was brought to our part of the country was no better than before, and, in consequence, we had to purchase the American oil at a higher price; thus the purpose of the Bill was defeated by the action of the oil refiners of Canada themselves. I perceive that in the Resolution introduced by the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue, he has made the test for Canadian oil 115°, and for American oil 120°, the reason for which difference I am unable to comprehend. From information received from experts, I am of opinion that there is scarcely any difference between the oils of the two countries as originally obtained from the reservoirs from which nature has stored them. I hoped that the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue would see his way clear to make the tests equal and not more than 115°. With respect to the test of 115°, I am confident from what I have learned, after a careful study of the question, that beyond 110° the illuminating powers are injured, and the cost of production increased, thus making at once the oil more costly and less serviceable. The proposed plan will be somewhat better than last year's Bill, but I am confident that, after a year's trial under the present arrangement, the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue will be satisfied that he has not placed the test where it ought to be, and that he will be compelled to change the test so that they will be alike.

MR. MACDONALD (King's, P.E.I.): I think the test proposed by the Government will enable us to bring in about the same quality of oil as came in under the 115° test. It might be well to give the new test a trial for a year, but, personally, I favour equality in the test. I think that while we are willing to give the Canadian manufacturer a fair Protection, so as to enable him to put his oil on the market on a favourable footing, still there should be an equal test. As the Government has taken a step in the right direction this year, and reduced the test on American oil from 130° to 120°, and increased the test on Canadian oil from 105° to 115°, it may result in inducing the Canadian refiner to put an oil on the market that can be used. So far as the Maritime Provinces are concerned, Canadian refiners have failed to put an oil on the market which will compare with the ordinary American oil we import.

The American oil of 115°, or even less, that we have heretofore imported, was far superior to any Canadian oil we have yet received there. Hoping that the result I have indicated will be obtained, I will support the motion of the hon. gentleman in favour of the proposed test.

Motion agreed to.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole and reported the said Resolution.

MR. BABY introduced a Bill (No. 123) To amend the Act respecting the inspection of Petroleum.

Bill read the first time.

ESQUIMALT GRAVING DOCK BILL.

(Sir Samuel L. Tilley.)

FIRST READING.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY, in moving for a Committee of the Whole to consider certain Resolutions respecting the construction of a Graving Dock at Esquimalt, said: It will be remembered by hon. gentlemen that one of the conditions in regard to this matter was that a guarantee of 5 per cent. on £100,000 should be given for ten years for the construction of the dock. On the application of the British Government to the Government of the Dominion in 1873, it was agreed that $250,000 should be given in lieu of that guarantee. By an Act passed in the 37th year of Her Majesty's reign, chap. 27, advances were authorised to be made by the Governor-General in Council to the Province of British Columbia out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund, for the construction of such Graving Dock, upon certificates of the progress of the work, to an extent not to exceed in the whole the sum of $250,000, in lieu of the aforesaid guarantee of the interest. The Government of that Province commenced work some two years since, and they expended about $180,000. They have recently entered into an additional contract with a party to complete the work by taking over the material the Government had on hand, and the work which had been performed, which is valued at something like $200,000. The contract for the completion of the work is, I think, a little under $400,000.

MR. BLAKE: $400,000 more money!

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: Yes; in addition to the $180,000 that has been expended. The Imperial Government have agreed to contribute towards the cost £50,000 sterling. Application has been made to, and is now under consideration of, the Imperial Government for a sum in addition to the £50,000, but no additional concession has been made in that direction up to the present time. A representative of the Local Government of British Columbia was in Ottawa in December last, and he brought the whole matter under the consideration of the Government. An Order in Council was passed upon the recommendation of the Finance Minister, which is as follows:—

“The undersigned has the honour to report that he has had under consideration despatches received from the Lieutenant-Governor of British Columbia, on the subject of the advances proposed to be made by the Dominion Government for the construction of the Graving Dock at Esquimalt, and that in order to arrive at a settlement of the question, he has had several interviews with the hon. the Attorney-General of the Province, who has been deputed to confer with the Dominion Government in connection with the same subject.

“The undersigned has given the subject his most careful consideration, and now begs leave to state that, in his opinion, it is desirable to modify the Order in Council of the 13th November last, and to substitute one in accordance with the following provisions and conditions:—

“Firstly, The hon. the Attorney-General having stated that the plans and specifications of the Dock, prepared by Messrs. Kinnipie and Morris, of London, England, have been left for inspection with the Department of Public Works, and are those upon which tenders have been invited. The undersigned recommends that advances be made to the Province as the work progresses, to an extent not to exceed in the whole the sum of $250,000, such advances not to include the value of any material or plant already obtained by the Provincial Government for the purposes of the Graving Dock.

“Secondly, That such advances be made on the certificate of the Engineer of the Provincial Government, countersigned by the Agent of the Dominion Government in British Columbia.

“Thirdly, That in case the Government of British Columbia should fail, from any cause, to proceed actively with the construction of the work for a period of three months after the receipt of a written request from the Dominion Government to prosecute the same, then that the latter shall have the right to enter upon and take possession of the works and premises, and complete the same.

“Fourthly, That in case of such entry, the Canadian Government shall be entitled to claim and receive from the Imperial Government the promised grant in aid of £50,000 sterling, or any increase of such grant. It is understood that if any balance of such grant in aid should remain unexpended after defraying the outlay made by the Dominion Government in consequence of the failure, as aforesaid, of the Province, such balance shall be paid to said Province; while, on the other hand, if said grant in aid should prove insufficient to complete the works, the amount of the deficiency shall be placed to the debit of the debt account of the Province. It is further understood that the right of property in the Dock shall, subject to the temporary right of possession, as before mentioned, remain in the Government of British Columbia.

“Fifthly, That the Imperial Government shall be made a party to this arrangement, and its approval obtained.

“Sixthly, That the sanction of the Legislature of British Columbia be also obtained to this agreement.

“Seventhly, That, subject to the foregoing conditions, the advances so made of $250,000, shall not bear interest, and shall be considered as a grant of money in lieu of the 12th Article of the Terms of Union between Canada and British Columbia.

(Signed) “S. E. TILLEY,

Minister of Finance.

“February 11th, 1880.”

That is now before the House for approval. It is considered desirable that the Dominion Government should have some guarantee that as they advance this money as the work progresses that the guarantee should not be discontinued, and that if the Local Government should cease to complete the work, the Dominion Government should be able to take the money to be received from the Imperial Government, and if there is any balance left after it is completed, that it should be paid over to the Local Government, or if the expenditure exceed the amount to be received from the Imperial Government, the balance shall be subtracted from the amount due the Province of British Columbia. In order to make that secure, the assent of the Local Government and of the Imperial Government is required.

MR. MACKENZIE: I have a very serious objection to this amount being paid in the way suggested. The practical result of this motion is that we are to pay as a free grant £50,000, or a sum equal to $250,000, to British Columbia. After due consideration of the matter, I am unable to see why we should do it. Hon. gentlemen opposite, when in office in 1873, by an Order in Council, a few days or weeks, or at any rate, a very short time before they went out of office, provided for the substitution of advances in money, in lieu of the guarantee provided by the Terms of Union. Now we have to consider what this guarantee meant; it meant simply this: that we were to endorse the bonds of British Columbia to a certain extent, and for a certain time, for the money to be raised by them for building this Graving Dock; we were not to hand out any sum from the Treasury of Canada; we were simply to endorse their bonds, to enable them to get a loan on cheaper terms than they could upon their own security. However, the hon. gentlemen opposite were in a strait in September 1873. Something in the shape of political support led to that Order in Council, by which it was provided that advances might be made in lieu of the guarantee. The Chief Officer of Finance, then Mr. Langton, stated that it was not contemplated that this money should be paid as a free grant to British Columbia, but that we were simply to advance the money which was to be charged against the balance of the debt. Accepting that definition of the Order in Council, we felt it incumbent upon us, in 1874, to confirm the arrangement by Act of Parliament. In the meantime, when the Act was passing through the House, the British Columbia representatives wanted to have it altered so as to provide for it being made a free gift. I refused such a modification. They then applied to the hon. the former Minister of Finance, who was at that time Governor of the Province of New Brunswick, and he furnished them with a certificate or letter that such was his intention. But whether it was his intention or not the Order in Council did not bear that interpretation. The hon. the Minister of Finance adheres to that interpretation of it; but if he wanted to make a gift, his Order in Council should have been worded differently. However, we have now a direct proposition to set the matter beyond all doubt by declaring it to be a free gift. Why this Dominion should, in consequence of this Columbian Union, assume another burden of $250,000, in addition to the other burdens imposed upon us, is beyond my comprehension. There is no possible justification for it. Why should we build a Graving Dock at Esquimalt or Victoria any more than at Halifax or Quebec? I protest most earnestly against such an act, because it was not originally intended that we should incur this cost. If it were intended it was wrong; and further, we will, by assuming this obligation, not only have the present cost of $250,000, but afterwards the dock will very likely fall upon our hands, and we shall have to maintain it or allow it to go to destruction. For these reasons—unless British Columbia will prefer us to charge the expenses against their subsidies, although wrong to undertake that in 1873—I object most strongly to the passage of these Resolutions.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: The hon. gentleman says that, in 1873, and at a time when he supposes there must have been some influence brought to bear, the Government agreed to a certain proposition which he does not approve of. If the proposition were such a proposition as the hon. gentleman has referred to, I should like to know what objection there could be, when, in fact, it was simply an advance out of the Dominion Fund of $250,000, which British Columbia was entitled to.

MR. MACKENZIE: No, no.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: Under an Act that the hon. gentleman himself brought in, there was a provision by which any Province might receive advances on account of their debt, and there could be nothing wrong in the Government paying $250,000 to British Columbia under that Act without the conditions contained in the other Act.

MR. MACKENZIE: It was simply to be a guarantee.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: The Government of British Columbia pressed the Dominion, stating that they were anxious to build the dock, but could not obtain the means necessary for its construction; but if the proposition that was made and accepted was simply to advance them their own money, there could be nothing extraordinary in that, absolutely nothing to justify the remarks of the hon. gentleman that the Government were in particular straits when they entered into this agreement. I was written to a year or two afterwards, and I simply stated that what the Government intended was, that this $250,000 was in lieu of the guarantee under the Terms of Union, and if you look at the Act you will find that it was based on Resolutions similar to these.

MR. MACKENZIE: Then why was the British Columbia members so anxious to have the wording changed?

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: It was changed.

MR. MACKENZIE: No, it was not.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: It is in pursuance of these terms and conditions—and the building of the dock having become necessary—that the Government have arranged to advance the $250,000, with the approval of Parliament; and they now ask for that approval.

MR. DECOSMOS: The hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie) denied that he confirmed the agreement made.

MR. MACKENZIE: I did not deny anything of the kind. There was an Act to confirm an arrangement, but I deny that it was to give a free gift. The hon. members from British Columbia endeavoured to induce me to alter it; and the hon. the Minister of Finance wanted it as an absolute payment. That was what I said.

MR. DECOSMOS: He stated that he brought in an Act to carry out the agreement with British Columbia with respect to the dock. The hon. gentleman did bring in a Bill, and one of the clauses with respect to the dock was, that the money would be paid as dock work progressed, and be charged against the debt of the Province. I took exception to that clause of the Bill. Now allow me to go into this matter. In the year 1873, I came here and negotiated this matter with the Government led by the right hon. gentleman. It was agreed that $250,000 should be paid to British Columbia, and that that sum should not be charged against the debt of the Province, but that it should be a bonus given to the Province in lieu of Article 12 of the Terms of Union. In 1878, before the General Elections, I took occasion to have this whole question placed on record, and, with the permission of the House, I will read part of the record. The first document is the following letter:—

“OTTAWA, November 3, 1877.

“DEAR SIR,—With respect to the conversation I had with you respecting the Dominion aid towards the Graving Dock, and your application to the Minister of Public Works upon the subject, I have consulted my colleagues, and we are prepared to submit to

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY.

Parliament a formal proposition to the following effect: That in lieu of the interest of £100,000 for ten years, which was secured by the 12th Section of the Order in Council, dated July 1st, 1871, we propose that advances should be made to you from time to time, upon certificates of the progress of the work, not on the whole to exceed £50,000 sterling.

“I have, etc.,

I was here in 1873 to negotiate this matter, and I had also to go to England in order to negotiate another bonus for the Graving Dock from the Imperial Government. I waited upon the hon. gentleman opposite (Mr. Mackenzie) in that year, 1873, after he had become Premier, and subsequently I had the following letter from him:—

“OTTAWA, 14th November, 1873.

“MY DEAR SIR,—With reference to the proposal you submitted in behalf of the Government of British Columbia, namely, to advance £50,000 to aid in the construction of a Graving Dock at Esquimalt, in lieu of the guarantee of interest at five per centum on £100,000 for ten years, provided by the Terms of Union, I have to say that any change in the mode of aiding in the construction of the work, from that agreed to, will require the sanction of Parliament. I can only say, at present, that the Government will submit a measure to Parliament to carry out your proposal, or some scheme equivalent to that.

“I am, etc.,

“A. MACKENZIE.

“Hon. A. DECOSMOS.”

That letter was delivered to me by the hon. gentleman in the Executive Council Chamber. It was after the question of guarantee had been considered by the Chief Justice of Quebec (Mr. Dorion), then Minister of Justice, that this letter was given to me in the full faith and understanding that the advances meant nothing more and nothing less than a grant of money.

MR. BLAKE: Hear, hear.

MR. DECOSMOS: The hon. gentleman says “hear, hear.” If I mistake not, I saw the hon. gentleman when he was an ornamental member of the Ministry, stalking through the Privy Council Chamber whilst this matter was under discussion, and I also recollect the ex-Minister of Finance passing through there, and if the ex-Minister of Marine and Fisheries were here, I think he would not have the confidence of the hon. member for Lambton to stand up in this House and say that was not the real understanding between the late Government and myself. Having mentioned the ex-Minister of Marine and Fisheries, I may state that he said to me before I received this letter: What will your other members do? Will they support the Government if they come down to Parliament with this grant? I said: Yes, they will; and to show that the members for British Columbia will support the Government on this grant, I will quote the statement of her representatives:

"OTTAWA, Nov. 11, 1873.

"British Columbia Representatives to the Hon. A. Mackenzie:

"SIR,—We fully agree with the proposal of the late Government to ask Parliament to grant to British Columbia £50,000 sterling, in lieu of the guarantee under the Terms of Union, for the construction of a first-class Graving Dock at Esquimalt, and now have the honour to say that, if the same be submitted by the present Government to Parliament for its sanction, it will receive our undivided support.

"We have, etc.,

(Signed), "A. DECOSMOS,
"E. DEWDNEY,
"J. S. THOMPSON,
"R. W. W. CARRALL,
"H. NATHAN,
"H. NELSON."

In this statement we do not ask for an advance. We said we fully agree with the proposal of the late Government, to ask Parliament to make this grant; and I believe in ordinary Parliamentary language "grant" does not mean a loan. After the difficulty between the hon. gentleman and the Government of British Columbia, when the terms proposed by Mr. Edgar had been refused, the hon. gentleman raised objections to carry out the solemn and deliberate agreement made by himself on behalf of the Government of the Dominion, and through myself on behalf of the Government of British Columbia. Allow me to draw attention to a telegram I received from this hon. gentleman on the 6th February, after I had returned to British Columbia from England. The question was raised in the Province at the time of the Election that the late hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Tilley) had not written the letter that I have read, which I believe was left by accident in possession of the hon. gentleman in the office of the Public Works Department. I telegraphed him to send me a copy of this letter, and I received the following despatch in reply:—

"OTTAWA, 6th Feb., 1874.

"Your telegram went astray. Government offer is to pay ($250,000) two hundred and fifty thousand dollars as dock work progresses, in lieu of guarantee provided by Terms of Union.

(Signed) "A. MACKENZIE."

MR. MACKENZIE: That is all right.

MR. DECOSMOS: That is all we want.

MR. MACKENZIE: We could not advance without pay.

MR. DECOSMOS: That will not pass muster.

MR. MACKENZIE: You will find it will.

MR. DECOSMOS: I find that it will not. When I brought this matter before the House, in 1878, the hon. gentleman worked himself up into a huge fidget, and wanted to know privately why I had brought this matter up, but he could not and did not say a word against one of the documents I had produced. He did not get up in this House and say the statement was untrue, and I challenge him now that if he would allow some of his Privy Council to be put on oath, I will prove it at the Bar of the House, and I believe those hon. gentlemen will state there was a deliberate agreement that the Province should receive that money as a bonus.

MR. MACKENZIE: I have no objection to the hon. gentleman taking evidence in any way he likes.

MR. DECOSMOS: On February 6th, I received this telegram, stating that the hon. gentleman would pay this money. I made my report to the Government of British Columbia on the 2nd February, 1874, four days before the receipt of this telegram:

"As a matter of record, it may here be stated that the nature of the guarantee in Section 12 of the Terms of Union respecting the Graving Dock, was considered during the negotiations with Mr. Mackenzie, and that the decision was that the £50,000 sterling in lieu of the guarantee of interest, in Section 12 of the Terms of Union, should be given to the Province as a grant or bonus, and was not to be charged as a debt against the Province."

More than that, however, the hon. gentleman said the Auditor-General said this was an advance. Now, in the presence and in the office of the ex-Minister of Finance, Mr. Langton said he never made such a statement to the hon. gentleman, and that if he had made any statement whatever with respect to the negotiations, it was with relation to taking over the difference between the actual and the allowed debt of the Province, and that he knew nothing about the other matter. Further than that, when our members gathered around the hon. member for Lambton on the floor of the House, to insist upon the proper wording of the Bill for aid to the Graving Dock, by insertinig that it was given as a bonus, the hon. gentleman stated that, if it could be shown that the agreement of the late Government was to pay this money as a bonus, he would pay it over. I wrote to Lieutenant-Governor Tilley, now the hon. the Finance Minister, and received the following reply:—

“FREDERICTON, 28th May, 1874.

“DEAR SIR,—In reply to your communication of the 23rd inst., I beg to state that the £50,000 sterling agreed to be advanced to the Government of British Columbia towards the Graving Dock, was in lieu of the facilities secured for that purpose under the Terms of Union. I cannot see how there could be any misunderstanding in the matter, as my letter of the 3rd November, 1873, appears sufficiently definite, and the Act just passed cites the conditions in the first section.

“I have the honour to be, dear Sir,

“Yours faithfully,

“S. L. TILLEY.

Inasmuch as some doubt might arise on this matter, as to the meaning of this letter, I sent a telegram:

“OTTAWA, 2nd June, 1874.

“Your letter of May 28th and telegram of May 29th received, and I understand them to mean that the £50,000 sterling, promised to be advanced in aid of the construction of a Graving Dock at Esquimalt, was to be a gift to British Columbia in lieu of Section 12 of the Terms of Union. Is that your meaning?

(Signed), “A. DeCosmos.

And I received this answer:

“ST. ANDREWS, 3rd June, 1874.

“£50,000 sterling was not to be charged to debt, but given in lieu of guarantee Graving Dock. Thought my letter explicit.

(Signed), “S. L. TILLEY.

“To Hon. A. DeCosmos.”

In order to have still further evidence to place before the hon. gentleman on his second agreement, in the presence of the members for British Columbia, I wrote to the hon. the Minister of Public Works, and received the following reply:—

“QUEBEC, 1st June, 1874.

“MY DEAR MR. DeCosmos,—Your letter of the 29th of May has just reached me. In answer, I have no hesitation to say that the Government to which I belonged promised to grant to British Columbia, as a bonus, the sum of £50,000 sterling in lieu of the guarantee contained in the 12th Section of the Terms of Union. We were convinced that British Columbia could not build their Graving Dock with that guarantee; and inasmuch as the intention of both parties to the Terms of Union was to secure that Graving Dock, we thought it but just to replace it by such a sum as would secure it to your Province, British Columbia and Great Britain contributing their share, or British Columbia supplementing the balance. Of course this sum of £50,000 sterling was not to be an advance of money, but a bonus in place of the guarantee. We knew we would have to obtain the sanction of Parliament to such an arrangement, and we told you we would do so. I am very positive about these negotiations, inasmuch as I was conducting them, chiefly, previous to the return of Mr. Tilley from England. I hope the above will prove satisfactory, and remain, my dear Mr. DeCosmos, “Yours very truly,

“HECTOR L. LANGEVIN.

“Hon. A. DeCosmos, M.P.”

Now, with the letter and telegram of Mr. Tilley, with the letter of the hon. Mr. Langevin, I attempted to place this matter before the hon. member for Lambton, then the Minister of Public Works, but he was impatient, and would not listen to an explanation. I then went to the ex-Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and if the Sessional Papers were produced it would be found that I enclosed those letters to the Secretary of State, stating that he might take a copy, providing that he would return the original; and I sent those letters in at the suggestion of the ex-Minister of Marine and Fisheries. But no action was taken by the Government, except the return of the original. Subsequently I went to the hon. the Minister of Finance, and it was on that occasion Mr. Langton was brought in, when he said he knew nothing of this transaction whilst Mr. Tilley was in office. He (Mr. Cartwright) recommended that the Province take the $250,000, and fight out the question afterwards—that it would be better to take the money, and leave it to be determined in the future whether it was a bonus or not. I told him that neither I nor the Province would accept it on any such terms—that there was an agreement, and if the Government wanted to repudiate it they could. The hon. member for Lambton did repudiate it, and told me in his own office that it was not his intention to give this money, and that it was only to save us the interest, between 5 and 6 per cent., or 1 per cent. on the sum, $250,000. That was his last excuse, when he wanted to shirk the agreement. His course in this transaction left me open to the charge of stating an untruth, and when I made that statement to him, in 1878, he said: "I do not wish to charge you with untruth or question your veracity in any way." Some of the hon. member's friends asked me why I brought this matter before the House, and I said because I wanted to place the whole facts before the country, and to show that we had made a final agreement for $250,000, and that it had been repudiated in the face of a multitude of evidence that proved indisputably that I was right, and that the position taken by the hon. gentlemen was a violation of the agreement. When I returned from England, I called upon the hon. gentleman, and he wanted to know how I got along with the negotiations with Mr. Goschen. I told him that I stated to Mr. Goschen that, in joining the Confederation, we surrendered certain rights and certain sources of revenue to the Dominion, and that one of the conditions of the surrender was that a guarantee should be given us for the construction of the Graving Dock, and that this money was to be given in lieu of this guarantee. The hon. member for Lambton said: "Not wholly," and I said: "Not wholly," it is the difference between the capitalisation of the guarantee at 5 per cent., and the $250,000. That is what the hon. gentleman meant by "Not wholly." I think there were some warm words between us at the time about other things. At any rate, I state here, on my honour as a man and a member of this House, that a deliberate agreement was made between the hon. gentleman and myself, that this money should be given from time to time as the work progressed, and that it should not be charged against the debt of British Columbia.

MR. MACKENZIE: I never heard of such an agreement, and I utterly deny it.

MR. DECOSMOS: Then the hon. gentleman denies that which is true.

Motion agreed to.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole and reported the Resolutions.

MR. BLAKE: The original arrangement between British Columbia and Canada, as appears in the Terms of Union, was that Canada should guarantee interest at 5 per cent. on £100,000 sterling for ten years, for the purpose of a Graving Dock at Esquimalt. That, of course, involved no charge on the Dominion Treasury, except in case of the insolvency of British Columbia; and British Columbia having in the hands of Canada a very large sum to her credit, on her debt-account, it is perfectly clear that Canada was perfectly secure in respect to that guarantee. The hon. member for Victoria (Mr. DeCosmos) has stated, in the course of this discussion, that this claim makes itself up in this way: He said you guaranteed us 5 per cent. for ten years on £100,000; that amounted to a guarantee in the gross, payable by instalments, of £50,000 sterling, which, capitalised, would be about $190,000; so you ought to pay us £100,000 and the difference between that and $250,000 and interest. I entirely deny it, and assert we did not agree to any assumption of the interest, or to pay the interest on £100,000. We agreed only to guarantee the interest. The obvious intention was that the bonds of British Columbia for £100,000 should be issued in order to raise funds for the Graving Dock, the negotiation of the bonds to be facilitated by the interest thereon for ten years being guaranteed by Canada. But the interest was to be paid by British Columbia; it was a charge on British Columbia, and no ultimate charge on the Canadian Treasury was contemplated by this provision in the Terms of Union. Now it is conceded that any alteration in that arrangement involving an entire charge, or a further charge, contingent or absolute, on the Dominion Treasury could take place only by an Act of Parliament. It is alleged that an understanding was come to in the dying hours of the Administration which preceded the late one, and a bargain made whereby the Government agreed to submit to Parliament a scheme substituting the payment of $250,000 to British Columbia, in lieu of this guarantee—that is the allegation at present. The language of the then, and present Finance Minister, in the letter he wrote to the member for Victoria (Mr. DeCosmos), does not, in my view, bear that construction. I do not understand that an advance means gift. I think the interpretation the word bears is a repayment. Repayment of an advance is the ordinary phrase used, and, therefore, there can be no doubt that the word does not, of itself, plainly—I think not at all—indicate that there was to be a free gift of £50,000 in cash to the Province, in lieu of the guarantee, which would involve no legitimate charge on the Treasury of the Dominion. Then there is another allegation, that the Administration which succeeded the first Canadian Administration, undertook to carry out the agreement of its predecessor with British Columbia, namely, that this amount should be made a free gift. That was denied. The Act then brought in uses precisely the same word “advance,” and during the discussion on that occasion there appeared a doubt in the minds of the British Columbia members as to whether they should get this difference, but there was no attempt made to alter the language of the measure. Parliament did not agree to make this a free gift. It is now proposed, for the first time, to substitute a free gift of $250,000 in lieu of the guarantee of £5,000 a year for ten years on the loan required for the dock. The hon. the Finance Minister says that British Columbia has expended $180,000 on this work, and has contracted for its completion at $400,000 more; that the Imperial Government is to give £50,000 towards it, and Canada $250,000 more, making, for both, a contribution of $500,000, and the total cost $580,000. The practical result is that this Graving Dock is to be built by England and Canada, with the exception of $80,000 to be contributed by British Columbia. That is the proposal at present. It does not seem to me that any ground has been laid why Parliament should determine to give £50,000 for this purpose. It is an obvious increased charge in connection with the Terms of Union with British Columbia. These charges are believed to be, by the large majority of the people, enormously too onerous as they stand without any additional charge. I move, therefore, in amendment:

That all the words after “That” be left out, and the following inserted instead thereof:—
“The Terms of Union with British Columbia, provided only for a guaranty of interest for ten years, in respect of part of the cost of the British Columbia Graving Dock.”

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I greatly regret that my hon. friend from West Durham has made this motion, and still more greatly regret the remarks made by the hon. member for Lambton. I think it unjust and unfair to British Columbia, and, coupled with the action of hon. gentlemen opposite, with respect to British Columbia, it cannot but be considered as a deliberate attempt to drive her out of the Union—to insult and injure that Province, that, out of regard to her material interests and self-respect, and to the position of her people, as an aggregation of British subjects, they should have no other course but break up the Union. I grieve to think that party objects—because I cannot conceive that hon. gentlemen opposite are actuated by objects of economy—should induce the member for Lambton to abjure and repudiate the agreement which, according to the statement of my hon. behind me (Mr. DeCosmos), he and his Government deliberately made with British Columbia, not only to advance, but pay this money to her. I cannot but believe that the House and country will reject with indignation the course taken by the hon. gentlemen opposite. What are the facts of the case? British Columbia arranged with the Dominion that she should guarantee, for ten years, 5 per cent. interest upon a sum not exceeding £100,000 sterling, as might be required for the construction of a first class Graving Dock at Esquimalt. The hon. member for West Durham says we had security in our own hands that the guarantee involved repayment. It was nothing of the kind. We were to guarantee that five per cent., and, if the profits of the dock were sufficient to pay the interest, our guarantee was gained. If it was not sufficient, we were to pay it. That was the common sense of it—the real, honest and honourable understanding.

MR. BLAKE : That was never stated.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD : The British and Indian Governments have, again and again, guaranteed to the shareholders of the Indian railways a certain percentage of profit or interest, the guarantee merely meaning this—if the profits of the railways reached the percentage the Government was free, if they did not the Government would make up the deficiency. They have no recourse afterwards against the railway, the shareholders or the work. The honest, fair, common sense arrangement was made. The dock was rather a grave undertaking for British Columbia with its sparse population and scanty means, being necessary for the military and commercial interests of the Dominion on the Pacific. It was absolutely necessary, in the interest of a Canadian Pacific commercial fleet, that we should have such a dock, and, therefore, we agreed to guarantee those bonds, and if the emoluments from the work would not pay the whole of the 5 per cent. we were to pay the balance or deficit. Now hon. gentlemen opposite attempt to repudiate that bargain. It is enough to make one blush with shame, the sight of any statesmen taking that course, men professing to be upholders of the credit of Canada. The work could not be completed by British Columbia; it was found the money necessary could not be raised on that guarantee, and we knew it was more than doubtful that a work so difficult in its inception could recoup us for the interest we paid. We felt that our engagement to guarantee the interest for ten years was equivalent to a promise to pay 5 per cent. for that time; and, therefore, as we wished to have this great work finished, instead of paying £5,000 a year for ten years, we agreed to pay in advance £5,000 a year as the work progressed. There can be no doubt as to our intention. It was shown by the telegram of the then and present Finance Minister, and by the letter of the then and present Minister of Public Works, we desired the construction of the dock, when it was certain a mere guarantee would not effect that object. The arrangement was made, perhaps, as alleged by the hon. member for West Durham in the dying hours of the Administration which preceded the last; but it was made to carry out honourably the bargain with British Columbia. But in 1878, before the Elections, what happened? Then political considerations might be supposed to have actuated the hon. member for Lambton. The hon. member for Victoria (Mr. DeCosmos) then, in his statement, went into the matter at greater length than to-day. He narrated all his conversations with the hon. member for Lambton, and stated that that hon. gentleman had agreed it should be a payment. It will be seen from the Hansard that although that statement was made in presence of the late Premier, and corroborated by another hon. member from British Columbia, the motion was unanimously carried, and not a single word in denial, explanation or refutation was uttered by that hon. gentleman. The hon. gentleman, when told that the money was a gift and not a loan to British Columbia, admitted it as plainly as man could admit a statement made to his face, in relating his own conversation, and going into a long detail of the circumstances connected with this obligation. And yet, to-day, he denies it, repudiates it, and disputes the accuracy of the statement of the hon. member for Victoria. The telegram of the hon. gentleman is specially remarkable. It appears that by some accident the hon. member for Victoria had left behind him the letter of the hon. the Finance Minister, in which he distinctly stated the money was to be a payment. The letter reads as follows:— [Vide p. 1926.] That letter states distinctly that the grant to British Columbia was a bonus and not a loan.

MR. BLAKE : No.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD : Your telegram, that went astray, states that the Government is to pay $250,000 as the work progresses, in lieu of the guarantee, as provided by the Terms of Union. There is not a word about a loan. The hon. gentleman knew what the hon. gentleman behind me wanted. He knew that he wanted a statement that it was a bonus and not a loan; he could not be mistaken about that. It was urged upon him; he knew perfectly well that British Columbia, as one man, said it was to be a bonus and not to be a loan, that a mere loan would be of no value to them, and that it was not to be a payment, if it was not to be a bonus it would be of no value to them. The then First Minister declared that the Government offered to pay $250,000 in lieu of a guarantee, a corroboration on that point which cannot now be gainsaid without dishonour. It was a pledge by that Government to pay this money instead of to loan it. My hon. friend behind me has stated now, as he stated before, that in conversation with the hon. member for Westmoreland (Sir Albert J. Smith), then Minister of Marine and Fisheries, the latter asked him what support was to be got? how the members for British Columbia would go?

MR. MACKENZIE: The hon. gentleman is misrepresenting us on that particular question—not to support the Government, but upon that particular vote.

MR. DECOSMOS: The ex-Minister of Marine and Fisheries asked me if the members for British Columbia would support this particular vote. I said I would prove to him and the Government that they would, and I then made this statement.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Then came the Act of 1874, to carry out the arrangement. I would like to have the hon. member for West Durham—sitting as a judge in this matter and not making the motion—give his opinion on this point. I have every confidence in his judgment, and I do not think there would be any necessity for appealing from it. Now this Bill, introduced on the 26th of May, 1874, by the hon member for Lambton, as First Minister, I think has two clauses. The first clause applies to this advance of $250,000 to British Columbia; the second clause provides for advances made to other Provinces. The first clause is absolute in its terms. The hon. gentleman says advances mean loans. Now, I take it that no Court, no dictionary, will say that advances mean loans. Advance means payments in advance. A loan is to be repaid; an advance is simply a portion of a sum of which the rest is to be paid when the work is done. That, I take it, any Court would view it to be ex necessitate. A loan is one thing, an advance before the work is done is a different thing; but the construction of this Statute does not depend upon that. In the first clause, which applies to the advance of $250,000, there is an absolute provision that the money shall be advanced; while the second clause provides that to any Province any sums may be advanced on condition of repayment, on condition that it be taken out of the Annual Subsidy. There is, in fact, no necessity for the first clause, as regards British Columbia; it might be struck out altogether, because the second clause provides that any Province may get an advance of $250,000, or any other sum that may be agreed upon, if it is charged upon the subsidy. The amendment before you, Sir, to-night, would be equal to dishonour, to repudiation. It would be doing a great injustice to British Columbia, which is not going to be treated as a spoiled child and subjected to every kind of injustice, as manifested by the whole course of hon. gentlemen opposite, with reference to that Province. But I know British Columbia will survive all that. I know that the Graving Dock will be built, and that a few years hence those who are now attacking that Province will regret that they have done so, and they will wish that they had taken the advice of the philosopher: "Let no man prophesy until he knows."

MR. MACKENZIE: The hon. gentleman had better take this lesson to himself, as he made a prophecy in the last sentence he uttered. It is natural that the hon. member for Victoria (Sir John A. Macdonald) should get himself in a heated passion about this matter. That is his constituency, he is working for his votes. I am not at all sure but the hon. gentleman should be prevented from recording his vote on this question, as being an interested party. The hon. gentleman imputes all sorts of evil motives to hon. gentlemen on this side of the House. That is getting to be his habit. He ought to know that we are just as capable of being loyal to the Confederation as he is. He ought to know that every public man in this country has got as much interest in the country as the hon. gentleman, who abuses every man who differs from him. What right has he to cast imputations on us for the views we take of public affairs? The hon. gentleman is endeavouring, by his whole policy, to create a feeling against British Columbia. It is he who, by his extraordinary conduct in regard to the Canadian Pacific Railway, is labouring to create an impression in British Columbia that the people in the east are hostile to them, when they are only loyal to themselves. It is he who is endeavouring, by his policy, to set British Columbia above all law, who has set the interests of the Province he represents so ably above all other interests in the country. If there should be such a feeling, as he says is getting abroad, he will have himself to blame for for it, in asking, in the first place, for British Columbia extraordinary privileges, and in the next place, endeavouring to force all the other Provinces, by his official wand, to come under his dictation, and do whatever is wanted for that Province. As to what the hon. gentleman says, respecting my messages and conversations, I cannot pretend to recollect any conversation I have had, but I am certain that my conversations were in unison with the view I took of the Order in Council of October, 1873. The Act of Parliament we passed proved this, and that I could not have done, or said, anything less, and what was not consistent with that Act. The use of the word "pay" in the telegram, instead of the word "advance," is a mere verbal alteration and means nothing. Whatever money we advanced we did as a matter of course, expecting it to be repaid. Why should we have intended to make a gift of $250,000 without any consideration for it? Why should we not, on the same ground, pay for the Graving Dock at Quebec, and pay for graving docks elsewhere? But, as I said before, we are not only providing for the payment of this as an absolute gift to that Province, but we are assuming other obligations. One of the Resolutions reads:

"That in case the Government of British Columbia should fail, from any cause, to proceed actively with the construction of the work, for a period of three years after the receipt of a written request from the Dominion Government to prosecute immediately the work, then the latter shall have the right to enter upon and take possession of the works and complete the same."

That is we are encouraging British Columbia to take such a course as to compel us, if she wishes, to complete them ourselves. I have only to say that I look upon the whole proposition as unjustifiable; and the evidence of Mr. Langton, as to what he understood when the Order in Council was drawn up in 1873, was, in my opinion, quite conclusive as to the intention of the Government at that time, although they may have veiled it in language for the purpose of working an impression which it was not intended to convey.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: The hon. gentleman asks why should we pay this? He asks why should we give $250,000 to British Columbia over and above the amount that was proposed to be given? In the first place, that is begging the question. The proposal to give $250,000 was simply to carry out the agreement which was perfectly well recognised on both sides. Did the hon. gentleman suppose, when he came to negotiate with British Columbia in reference to this matter, that the guarantee of interest would be repaid by the Province out of the profits on the dock? I will undertake to say that the hon. gentleman will not say that he expected the guarantee of interest would be repaid, and that he would not call for it because the profits of the dock would render it unnecessary.

MR. BLAKE: It would be a charge.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: It would be no charge because he undertook to guarantee the interest, to a certain extent, and that would be an absolute gift from the Dominion Treasury provided it was called for. The hon. gentleman cannot show a word in the undertaking that assumes that that guarantee of interest that is paid by the Dominion Government would be repaid from the British Columbia Exchequer. Let me answer the hon. gentleman on this question as to why we should do it. Why ought we to undertake the payment of so much money to be advanced as the work proceeded? There were two or three reasons. One was that it was found that they would not be able to perform the work with a guarantee of interest, and that it was necessary for its construction that the same amount, as was provided for in the former arrangement, should be advanced as the work proceeded. But there was another reason, I suppose, that induced the hon. gentleman to engage to spend $4,000,000 for the construction of a road from Nanaimo to Esquimalt. The hon. gentleman knows there was great disappointment in British Columbia at the Terms of Union not having been carried out by Canada, and the only excuse the hon. gentleman can have for having engaged to contribute so great a sum of money to construct a road which he was not called upon to build, was in order to allay the feeling of irritation that was excited, and in order to compensate British Columbia for the delay. Now I ask the hon. gentleman if it would be unreasonable to suppose that, when he put this Act upon the Statute-book, providing for a contribution of so large a sum of money, that he did not mean it should be something else than a loan? I assume that the hon. gentleman had some idea in his mind that it was desirable to meet the views of British Columbia, even a little outside the Terms provided in the Act of Union. The hon. gentleman wants to know why this $250,000 should be given? Will he tell the House why $750,000, were proposed by him—and acquiesced in by the member for West Durham—to be given to British Columbia in lieu of the construction of the Nanaimo and Esquimalt Railway? There was nothing in the Act of Union which required it. Yet these hon. gentlemen did propose to take $750,000, over and above any engagement that was made in the Terms of Union, to compensate British Columbia. So I answer the hon. gentleman by saying that this $250,000 is less by half a million, is a third in fact of the amount of money which he proposed to take from the Exchequer of Canada to give to British Columbia. Although I am not a lawyer, I will undertake to say that, if common law is common sense, this law is common sense; and I challenge the hon. gentleman opposite to consider the terms of this Act, put upon the Statute Book by the hon. gentleman from Lambton, when at the head of the Government, and put any other construction upon it. The Act of 1874 says:

“1. In lieu of the guarantee of interest at the rate of five per cent. per annum, for ten years, from the completion of the works, on such sum not exceeding one hundred thousand pounds sterling, as may be required for the construction of a first-class Graving Dock at Esquimalt, as provided by the terms of the Order of the Queen in Council, for the admission of British Columbia into the Union; advances may be made from time to time by the Governor in Council, out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund, for the construction of such Graving Dock, upon certificates of the progress of the work, such advances not to exceed in the whole, two hundred and fifty thousand dollars.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER.

Now mark what follows. Read the next clause of this Act, and tell me if it will bear any other construction in the world than that it would be a contribution to British Columbia; than that it was to be paid by the Government and not to be repaid by British Columbia. The next clause provides that inasmuch as it is proposed to give to British Columbia $250,000, so in like manner any other Province may have advanced to it such sum of money as may be agreed upon, providing that the debt which the Province was entitled on coming into Confederation will allow a margin on the advance. I will read the words of the Act:

“2. The Governor in Council may in his discretion advance from time to time to any Province of Canada, such sums as may be required for local improvements in the Province, and not exceeding in the whole the amount by which the debt of the Province for which Canada is responsible then falls short of the debt with which the Province was allowed to enter the Union,—such advances to be deemed additions to the debt of the Province, with permission to the Province to repay them to Canada, on such notice, in such sums and on such other conditions as the Dominion Government and that of the Province may agree upon; any amount so repaid being deducted from the debt of the Province in calculating the subsidy payable to it.”

Now, what does that mean? Does it mean that these advances are to be repaid by the Province receiving them? No member of the House will claim that, because we are advancing—and we have advanced, where the debt of the Province would permit it—that they are to be repaid. We have made advances in like manner to the several Provinces. Are they to be repaid? Not at all. The Act goes on to provide that, in case the Province wishes to return the advance to the Treasurer, it can be done, and that return shall be taken into consideration in calculating the amount of the subsidy. The amount payable to each Province was a fixed amount, an amount of 5 per cent. upon the balance of debt remaining due to the Province. And here it is provided distinctly, in so many words, that the other Provinces may receive that which they never were to be called upon to repay, but simply in reduction of their debt. I think it is impossible to read this Act without coming to the conclusion that the hon. the First Minister had then in his mind to place this on the Statute-book, for the purpose of carrying out the engagement of the former Minister of Finance, to change this guarantee of 5 per cent. on £100,000 into an absolute contribution of $250,000. I think that, under the circumstances, the hon. gentleman must have had that on his mind, and it affords an explanation of the telegram he sent. I think, under these circumstances, that it is very desirable at this late hour, that an engagement entered into in good faith between the Canadian Government and British Columbia should not be treated as a question open to reconsideration.

MR. CASEY: If this Act of 1874 authorised the gift to British Columbia, what is the necessity for getting another Act now, or for introducing a series of Resolutions on which to found another Act. It is plain from the fact of the hon. gentleman having brought down these Resolutions, that they know the existing Act does not authorise the giving of that money. It is plain, also, that the hon. leader of the Government and his first lieutenant (Sir Charles Tupper), differ as to the meaning of the Act. The right hon. the Premier said that the case of British Columbia was made a special one, by the authorisation given in that Act to make "advances" to that Province without any special provision for repayment, while in the next clause provision was made for the repayment of advances to other Provinces. The other hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper), held, on the contrary, that the Act authorised advances to the other Provinces on the same terms as to British Columbia, and that no repayment could be expected from any of them under the Act. This argument was drawn, forsooth, from the very clause which the right hon. the Premier held was a provision for reimbursing the Dominion out of Provincial Funds under its control. This was an inconsistency they must settle between themselves, but it showed the hollowness of the argument that a prior obligation to make this gift existed.

MR. SMITH (Selkirk): When the question of the construction of the Pacific Railway was under discussion, I had no hesitation in voting for the amendment of the hon. member for West Durham; as I believed, and do still think, that, while perfect faith should be kept with British Columbia, the true interests of the whole country would be best subserved by affording every facility for opening up the fertile prairies of the North-West for settlement, by constructing railways through them, as fast as this can be done, from the proceeds of the Public Lands, and by the efforts of those individuals or companies who are willing to furnish the means for so doing. This would secure to us such a large addition to the population and resources of the Dominion, as to enable us the more readily to pay for the much more difficult work of getting across the Rocky Mountains and down to the Pacific Coast. In carrying out this latter portion of the road, I think we ought to make haste slowly. In my judgment, the proposition now put forward by the Government, for the construction of the Esquimalt Graving Dock, is of an entirely different character; and as I have always understood that the interest on the £100,000, which the former Government were prepared to guarantee, must ultimately fall to be paid by the Dominion, I shall now vote with the Government

Motion made:

That the said Resolutions be now read the second time and concurred in.—(Sir Samuel L. Tilley.)

Motion in amendment made and question proposed:

That all the words after "That" be left out, and the following inserted instead thereof:—"the Terms of Union with British Columbia provided only for a guaranty of interest for ten years, in respect of part of the cost of the British Columbia Graving Dock."—(Mr. Blake.)

Resolutions read the second time and agreed to.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY introduced a Bill (No. 125) To confirm a certain Order of the Governor in Council respecting the Graving Dock at Esquimalt.

Bill read the first time.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY.

BRITISH COLUMBIA,

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

MR. BUNSTER: The hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Huntington), tried to read me a lecture for demanding the rights of my constituents. I want to express my disapproval of this. I do not want the right hon. the leader of the Government to be under the impression that I have a bad feeling towards him. I am satisfied that when the time comes, and it is a good way off, when he will want us to stand by him, we shall send him back with double the majority he had last time. I hope the right hon. gentleman will always do us the same justice as he has done to-day; and as for the hon. member for Shefford, I do not intend to put up with his—

Several HON. MEMBERS: Order.

MR. BUNSTER: Order. I am in order; if I am out of order I would like to know how.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I feel my hands very much strengthened by the remarks of the hon. gentleman.

HUDSON'S BAY COMPANY'S CLAIMS.

REMARKS.

MR. SCHULTZ: Before the Orders of the Day are called, Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct attention to the statement made in the Ottawa correspondence to the Toronto Globe of 30th April, which I will read:

"According to a Parliamentary Return in 1870, the Hudson's Bay Company preferred a claim against the Imperial Government to defray losses sustained by them during the Red River Rebellion, owing to the loss of five months' interest on the purchase money for the territory, by the plundering of goods at Fort Garry, and by the ransom paid to the Provisional Government for a stock of furs seized by them. The Imperial Government replied that they were not responsible, and the matter was afterwards continued by the Company's preferring the same claim against the Dominion Government. The Hudson's Bay Company assessed the losses sustained at £30,000 sterling. In 1877, Hon. David Mills, then Minister of the Interior, reported that the Canadian Government was not responsible for the losses, as the territory had not been transferred to them at that time, and was still in the possession of the Company. He suggested that it was desirable the Government should purchase the Company's remaining proprietary rights in the territory. The Hudson's Bay Company suggested that the whole question should be referred to the Judicial Committee of the Imperial Privy Council for settlement. This was acceded to, and the present Government, in June, 1879, asked the Company to present a full statement of their case. This has now been done."

I wish to call attention to this statement for the purpose of eliciting what information I can regarding it, and, at the same time, of expressing a hope that if the claim of this Company has been referred to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council of England, it will not be forgotten that this country has a certain account of a $1,500,000 which it cost us to put down the rebellion which was caused by officers of this Hudson's Bay Company, who are now pressing their claim for indemnity.

CRUELTY TO ANIMALS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.—[BILL 83.]

(Mr. McDonald, Pictou.)

THIRD READING.

Bill considered in Committee of the Whole, reported, read the third time and passed.

BILL WITHDRAWN.

The following Bill was, with leave of the House, withdrawn :—

Bill (No. 77) To facilitate the detention and safe keeping, in certain cases, of persons convicted in the North-West Territories or District of Keewatin, and sentenced to imprisonment.—(Mr. McDonald, Pictou.)

INVESTIGATIONS UNDER OATH BILL.
[BILL 113.]

(Mr. McDonald, Pictou.)

SECOND READING.

Order for second reading read.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT : Does the Bill empower the heads of Departments to summon parties who are not in the office ?

MR. McDONALD (Pictou) : It enables them to summon every person who may be able to give information in the matter to be enquired into. The Commissioner is authorised to issue his subpoena and the penalty for disobedience is $400, enforceable in a summary manner before the Courts.

MR. BLAKE : The law may be a judicious one, if it is confined to enquiries into the conduct of public officers in discharge of their duties, so long as they are not charged with criminal offences, under the law of the land. It seems to me it would be an innovation of serious consequence, one which would hardly commend itself to Parliament or the country, if we were to permit enquiries in this matter into matters which come under the law of the land. Two observations have occurred to me : First, that the law ought to be expressly so framed as that the power should not extend to any such investigations ; and second, that there should not, at any rate, be power to force the examination of the party charged. I think the hon. gentleman will see that the language is quite wide enough to enable an investigation to be held, providing that a person was charged with felony in connection with his duties, or powers which he performed in the execution of his office, and I do not think any such enquiry should be permitted.

MR. McDONALD : If the person were charged with felony, he would not be required to answer, and could not convict himself. Supposing a man was charged with the fraudulent appropriation of money, surely it would be a proper subject of enquiry to ascertain whether the charge be true. But the Commission will have no power to convict, but would recommend the Department to take legal proceedings and have the offender punished according to law. It seems to me the words of the Bill embrace only that view.

MR. ANGLIN : This is one of the measures which should have been introduced early in the Session, so that hon. members might have an opportunity to consider how far it was within the bounds of propriety. It seems to me a very startling proposition that the heads of Departments should have the power to compel subordinates to answer questions respecting any matter supposed to be offensive to the head of the Department, or against the public interest. Perhaps the hon. Minister can tell whether there is any such law in operation in England. I do not think there is any such law, and that the powers to be bestowed by this Bill are inconsistent with the whole spirit of the British Constitution and the administration of justice. Indeed I doubt whether we have power to create a tribunal of this kind.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER : If the hon. gentleman's memory will carry him back two Sessions, he will find that, while he was Speaker, an Act was passed authorising the Auditor-General to do exactly what this Bill proposes to give the heads of Departments power to do. It provided expressly that that officer, in relation to any matter or subject of audit in his Department, could confer the power to take testimony under oath, and he has the power to issue a Commission which enables the person investigating to take testimony under oath. The object of this Bill is to extend the same power to the heads of Departments. It is not for the purpose of inquisitorial investigation, but for a very different object. The necessity for such an Act was suggested by the complaints that are made against public officers. Complaints of a serious character, which, if true, would warrant the dismissal of an officer, are made to the Departments, and you are at present obliged to hold an enquete by a party who has no power to administer an oath, and who must receive the unattested statements of the parties making the complaint, who are often disposed to deprive the officer of his position. The effect of this Bill, if it becomes law, will be to enable the heads of Departments to authorise a Commissioner to take testimony in such cases. It is, in fact, a protection to the officer attacked, and a protection to which he is entitled.

MR. McDONALD: There is another precedent in the Act relating to Penitentiaries passed in 1875, which gives the Inspector power to investigate any irregularities, and examine witnesses under oath. Under that Act, in my capacity of Minister of Justice, I could appoint a Commissioner to visit any penitentiary to make an enquiry, and that Commission would not only have all the powers contained in this Bill, but power to commit to jail any person refusing to obey its summons.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT: My impression is that the powers to which the hon. the Minister of Railways alluded, were conferred, if not in the precise words, in substance, by the former Auditor. If it was a new power it was transferred from the hon. the Minister of Finance to the Auditor-General.

MR. ANGLIN: The hon. Minister has referred to precedents, of the value of which I do not pretend to say anything just now. There seems to me strong room to doubt the propriety of this proceeding. There may be instances in which it is desirable to ascertain the truth or falsity of charges made against officers employed at a distance from headquarters, but single instances do not justify wholesale proceedings; and I think hon. members must consider this a startling innovation on what we have been accustomed to regard as right and proper in such matters.

MR. MILLS: The purpose of this Bill is exactly the same as the Act providing for the appointment of a Royal Commission. The Government have a right to appoint a Commission, by Order in Council, to enquire into those matters. I do not know whether that power has proved inadequate or not, but I am not aware that any difficulty could arise out of the existence of the power conferred by that Act. If that has not been found sufficiently convenient for all practical purposes, why is there any necessity for this Bill, or if this Bill is necessary, why should that Act continue on the Statute-book? I can see no advantage to be derived from this Bill that that Act does not sufficiently provide for.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I wonder that my hon. friend did not think of that when he passed the Auditor-General's and the Penitentiary Bills. If those enquiries could be made as to any irregularity in the Penitentiaries, or as to the Public Accounts, under the general Act to which he refers, why were those Acts passed. But you can quite understand why the hon. gentleman drew the distinction. The general Act, which was introduced immediately after Confederation, provided that when any matter arose affecting the well-being of the Dominion, a Commission might issue under the Great Seal of Canada, and the Commissioners would have the power of taking testimony under oath. That was a very formal proceeding, and it established a tribunal somewhat in the nature of a preliminary impeachment. The hon. gentleman found it would be absurd that a Royal Commission should issue for all enquiries respecting the Penitentiaries, and the measure was therefore introduced, authorising the Inspector to examine witnesses and make the necessary enquiry. If the Speaker can do it quoad the Public Accounts, with the consent and advice of hon. gentlemen opposite, and if the Inspector of Penitentiaries can do it, surely the head of any Department should be able to do the same thing without all the expense and formality at present necessary. I do not think it lies in the mouths of hon. gentlemen opposite to oppose this Bill. If evidence of crime or a felony be discovered, there is only one thing to do—to send the offender to trial. But the preliminary investigation may be limited. Committees of the House of Commons have often held such investigations; they have reported irregularities, and have recommended to the Crown to order the Attorney-General to prosecute. There are an infinity of instances of this kind. So, here, if the head of any Department has to make an enquiry as to any irregularity, and a distinct case of felony appears, it can be reported for trial by the ordinary tribunals, by a recommendation of the prosecution of the offender.

MR. CAMERON (North Victoria): I understand the hon. member for Bothwell objects to the Bill on the ground that particular Ministers or Departments can only be responsible, while under the Royal Commission the whole Government are responsible for investigations. That objection has no foundation, because the Minister has only power to issue a Commission with the authority of the whole Government, while the Government is responsible for what is done by Order in Council. This Bill seems perfectly harmless, and one that, no doubt, in the administration of departmental duties, will frequently be found very effectual, and, as it is founded upon the authority and precedent of the hon. gentlemen opposite, I am in favour of it. I do not see any objection to its passing even at this late stage of the Session.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole.

(In the Committee.)

MR. BLAKE said he was not satisfied with the reasons given in support of the Bill. He did not think that the precedent of the Auditor-General's Bill was pertinent to the powers granted by this Bill. His substantial objection to it was that he did not think it would be regular or judicious, but contrary to our general dealings with criminal cases, to permit an enquiry to be entered upon or to proceed in an investigation when once we have touched a charge of crime. He could not agree with the hon. the Minister of Justice that this would be a useful preliminary enquiry. The law provided for preliminary enquiries. Once a man was believed to have committed a crime, he could be charged with it, then there would be a preliminary enquiry in open Court according to the rules of law. They were proceeding here a great deal further than in the Auditor-General's Bill—providing for a power that might be exercised with reference to some hundreds or thousands of persons. All the employés of the Civil Service would be almost, practically, at the discretion of the Ministers of the respective Departments. They ought, in such a general Act as this, having such an extensive operation, guard against such an injurious innovation as to permit enquiries to proceed in the way proposed by the Bill, once offences have reached the border land of crime. Irregularities in the conduct of business, misconduct, negligence or improprieties of various kinds, might be properly enquired into. Charges, not crimes in law, might be fit matters of investigation, the proof of the truth of which might result in censure or deprivation of office. For such offences a Commission might be right. But to render it possible that there should be a private enquiry of this description into matters which go beyond that line, and enter the territory of crime would be wrong. He would propose to add, after the words "as may relate to his official doings," the words "not, however, embracing any matters involving a charge of crime," or equivalent words. According to the British Constitution, there was but one mode in which men ought to be charged, preliminarily or otherwise, with crimes against the law, and that was in the ordinary process before the ordinary Courts.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou) said, if he understood the hon. member for West Durham, he was very much surprised at his doctrine. To say that an officer in the discharge of his public duty should be free from investigation as to his acts in any form whatever, was a surprising doctrine. According to the doctrine of the hon. member for West Durham, the moment a Commissioner examining the conduct of an offending official experienced the slightest suspicion of criminality on his part, he must stop, must not venture to ask him such a question as "Have you taken public money, or committed any other crime calculated to bring you before a magistrate?" It was just at that moment the enquiry ought to begin. If it ought to begin it was important it should proceed. The investigation could pass no sentence, could inflict no penalty, but must report to the head of the Department the information required, and submit the question: whether it was desirable to proceed to the punishment of the accused? Suppose the Act did not pass, and that the head of a Department ordered an investigation, not under oath, into the conduct of any clerk, under a charge of the gravest character, he (Mr. McDonald) would ask whether the enquirer would have to stop or should go on and complete the enquiry, and report the result, and thus lead to the detection and punishment of the offender? He did not see the sense of stopping if the enquiry could discover guilt. All that could be effected by the Commissioner was a report.

MR. BLAKE said there was no reason why a Government officer should be exposed to peculiar disabilities and particular modes of trial in respect of crime which other subjects were not exposed to.

MR. McDONALD: They were not.

MR. BLAKE said those accused officers were exposed to exceptional treatment. The hon. the Minister of Justice thought he answered the whole argument by saying the Commissioner could not inflict punishment. But a preliminary enquiry, the examination of witnesses before a private Court—perhaps before persons not learned in the law, without counsel for the accused, might result in the conclusion of the question, and a decision by the Department that the charge was proved, leading to the discharge of the officer, because supposed to be proved guilty of larceny, embezzlement, or some other offence.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou): He has his remedy.

MR. BLAKE: What is it?

MR. McDONALD (Pictou): An action at law.

MR. BLAKE: When he only holds office during pleasure.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou): That is a point for discussion.

MR. McDONALD.

MR. BLAKE said the offender or accused might be dismissed for contumely in consequence of this action. The enquiry should pause when there appears to be an entry upon a personal crime. The hon. the First Minister mentioned the powers of Committees of the House; but they had power to investigate everything or anything they pleased, from which it did not follow that Parliament ought to authorise such persons as Ministers might appoint to hold preliminary enquiries into crimes. Those are things that ought to be done decently, and in order, and in accordance with general law applicable to all classes of subjects. As to the second Section, the hon. the Minister declared it was the intention of the Bill that there should be an examination before the Commissioner, who should not pass to evidence of crime, but proceed to complete the evidence, so far as necessary—not with a view to punishment, but to the completion of the evidence. Under those circumstances, it was a most extraordinary step to take power to examine any person, including the accused. The second clause ought not to contain power to extract from the accused the evidence of his own guilt—not merely of his misconduct as an officer, but of acts rendering him liable criminally.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said that complaints had been made, for example, that, on the frontier, officers of the Customs had been conspiring with smugglers, and allowing goods to enter without duty, or at a nominal duty. They wanted enquiries in such cases, in the protection of the public Revenue, and particularly where public officers were in collusion with outside offenders. The smuggler would not give evidence, and therefore, an officer could be appointed under this Act, with the sanction of the whole Government, to call upon the suspected officials and examine all parties offending, by which means the offenders might be traced and the practice stopped. If an officer was shown to be guilty of such an offence, he could not be convicted before the Commissioner, because it was like all other enquiries under the Great Seal. It might result in tracing guilt home to a private individual, when all that could be done was to recommend his trial. But if the object was not to bring home a particular crime to a particular individuals, but in the public interest, to secure regularity throughout the Department, he could not conceive any real reason why it should not be adopted. The very fact that two other Bills, had been passed on the same subject, without any inconvenience arising from them, showed that there was no force in the objection of the hon. gentleman.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou) : I do not think there is any difficulty whatever in this clause. It gives authority to the Commissioner to summon before him any person to give evidence. A witness is summoned to give evidence in relation to any matter which, at first, may not point him out, but which, in the result, may indicate him. The moment he goes before the Commissioner and is asked to give his evidence, he has only to say : I will not give evidence, because I am afraid my evidence will convict myself. He has the permission everyone has under the English law, of refusing to give evidence which may convict himself. Therefore, I think the objection of my hon. friend falls to the ground.

ADMINISTRATION OF CRIMINAL JUSTICE IN DISPUTED TERRITORY (ONTARIO) BILL—[BILL 119.]

(Mr. McDonald, Pictou.)

SECOND AND THIRD READINGS.

Order for second reading read.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou) : As I explained in introducing this Bill, its object is, during the pendency of the suit between the Province of Ontario and the Dominion Government, with reference to the jurisdiction of the disputed territory, to secure the punishment of any crime committed in the disputed territory, by authorising the trial of any one charged with crime either in Ontario or Manitoba. That will enable criminals to be tried irrespective of any question that might arise as to the jurisdiction of the Courts over the territory where the crime was committed. The Bill is on the same principle as the Act of 1813, referred to in the discussion with reference to the boundary line. The Bill was drafted by the Attorney-General of Ontario and myself. I propose, if the House will permit the Bill to go into Committee, to engraft upon it the provisions of a Bill introduced by myself early in the Session. One amendment I propose to introduce will secure a more economical and speedy conviction and punishment of offenders against the law relating to the sale of spirituous liquors in our North-West Territory. Such criminals may be confined in jails in Manitoba or Ontario, if the magistrates think it advisable or more convenient. The fact, I believe, is, that along the line of Railway, in the Territory of Keewatin, there is only one jail, which was erected the other day, and magistrates had got into the habit of sending prisoners to Winnipeg. When the question arose, as it did the other day, they had no authority to do so, and several of these prisoners were discharged. The Bill is meant to overcome this difficulty. Instead of defining the disputed territory by metes and bounds, as it was in the schedule, I propose merely to state in the preamble : "Whereas, certain territory on the western and northern boundary of Ontario is claimed by the Government of Ontario as being within the said Province, etc." I think that is safer than to define the territory, because it might avoid difficulties in the future. For instance, suppose that the line running due north from the junction of the Ohio and Mississippi should not be adopted either one way or the other, a difficulty might arise.

MR. BLAKE : I do not see how the hon. gentleman is going to obtain any jurisdiction by this Bill. Suppose Ontario claimed that the Province has these boundaries awarded by the arbitrators, and, apart from that altogether, suppose these may be the boundaries of the Province, then would this Bill have any force? Would this House have any right to legislate in this way? Could we legislate in any other part of Ontario as we propose to legislate here?

MR. McDONALD : I fancy the House has power to declare by Act that an offence committed in Ontario shall be tried in Quebec. There can be no difficulty about that. Then, as a matter of course, if an offence is committed in an unorganised territory, we have the power to say where it shall be tried.

Bill read the second time, considered in Committee, reported, read the third time and passed.

EVIDENCE IN CRIMINAL CASES LAW AMENDMENT BILL.—[BILL 120.]

(Mr. McDonald, Pictou.)

SECOND AND THIRD READINGS.

Order for second reading read.

MR. McDONALD: This Bill is for the purpose of enabling evidence in criminal matters to be taken as provided in the first clause. It is, to a large extent, a copy of the English law on the subject, and is for the purpose of obtaining the testimony in criminal matters of persons who are ill and likely to die.

Bill read the second time.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the said Bill.

(In the Committee.)

MR. GUTHRIE: I desire to add the following clause:—

“Any Judge of Superior Courts of Law, and Judges of the County Courts exercising criminal jurisdiction, shall have the power to make any order in the foregoing sections of the Act.”

A doubt might arise as to whether a Judge of the Queen's Bench, sitting at Nisi Prius, is a Judge of criminal authority. I would, therefore, add a clause extending it to any of the Superior Courts.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou): I think if the amendment is confined to Judges of the Superior Courts, we shall have time to consider, before the next meeting of the Legislature, if we desire to extend it further. The amendment will be to the effect that any Judge of the Superior Courts of Law and Judges of the County Courts exercising criminal jurisdiction, shall have the power to make any order under the foregoing sections of this Act.

MR. KIRKPATRICK said he wished to add an amendment which would specially provide for the legality of some evidence, which was now being taken, in a special case involving life. The evidence was being taken, in anticipation of the passage of this Act, in one of the Courts in Ontario—a case in which a person might die before the trial, and before, in fact, the passing of this Act. It was desirable, under the special circumstances of the case, that the evidence should be taken in accordance with the law in force in England, namely, that a deposition taken before the trial may be read at the trial, in case of the death of the witness before the trial comes on. He (Mr. Kirkpatrick) knew it was not desirable to make any law retroactive, but under the special circumstances of the case, he proposed the amendment he had referred to. The prosecution would have notice to attend the examination, and, therefore, no wrong could be done.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou): I hope no such provision will be passed. It would be against the principles of justice; it would be dangerous to adopt such a course. It would make evidence at the trial of that which, when taken, was not evidence according to law. The hon. gentleman says no wrong could be done, because the prosecution would have notice. But as the law does make such using of evidence legal, then it would not be incumbent on the prosecutor to attend an examination which may be worthless. I shall certainly ask the Committee not to adopt the amendment.

Amendment (Mr. Kirkpatrick) negatived.

Bill, as amended, ordered to be reported. House resumed.

(In the House.)

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

SUPPLY—CONCURRENCE.

Resolutions reported from Committee of Supply further considered.

On Resolution 166 (April 23), Indians of British Columbia, $50,928.

MR. MILLS said he understood nothing had been done to give the Indians legal possession of their reservation. The Indians should be satisfied with reference to their claims on the reservation made to them, and he thought the appointment of Mr. Trutch was not a desirable one, if it was intended to allay feelings of distrust that had been created in the minds of Indians.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said a suitable man would be appointed as Superintendent of the Interior, and that the hon. gentleman might dismiss any fears about the Indians as they would be properly attended to.

Resolution read the second time and agreed to.

MR. McDONALD.

Resolutions 169 to 172 read the second time and agreed to.

Resolution 167 (April 27) read the second time and agreed to.

On Resolution 168, Agricultural Implements, etc., furnished under Treaties to Indians of Manitoba and the North-West, $67,460,

MR. MILLS asked how the instructors had been received by the Indians; how many were farmers and agriculturists? He understood that a number of Indian tribes had refused to receive farmers sent to them. Had reservations been given to these parties within the Indian reservation, or were they given distinct tracts of land? He (Mr. Mills) heard that some of the gentlemen appointed were never engaged in agriculture before, and were not, therefore, likely to be successful in cultivating the soil. To take two or three Indians upon a farm, with the expectation that they would be taught agriculture, was, in his opinion, a mistake. He was of opinion there was only one way to make a success of this—that was for the instructors to go upon the reservations and have the Indians join with them in farming operations. The Indians, he might observe, had received pretty much all the agricultural implements, cattle, etc., that were promised them under the Treaties. We had been engaged feeding them a number of years, but now that many of them were upon the reservations, that would not longer be absolutely necessary. He had been told by one of the agents, that, very often, when the cattle were driven along for supplies, the Indians expressed regret that such animals were slaughtered, and said they would forego being fed if they were allowed to keep those cattle for agricultural purposes. He thought if the Government were to be at all successful in this experiment, the Indians would require to be aided to some further extent by grants of agricultural implements and cattle. This could be done and at the same time the annual appropriations could be diminished.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: As regards complaints being made by the Indians about the farm instructors, I can only say that, upon enquiry from the gentlemen chiefly responsible for that branch of the subject, I learn that not one single complaint or representation of that kind has reached the Department. I think, therefore, my hon. friend has been misinformed. With regard to the statement that many of the instructors are not farmers, I can state that fifteen out of the nineteen were selected after a very strict enquiry as to their ability as farmers. I saw most of them—at all events the Deputy Minister saw them all—and discussed with them the whole subject of their duties before they started for the North-West. The others were appointed in my absence, but I have no reason to doubt that they were also good men. My hon. friend asks whether they live on the reservations. A small lot is set apart for the farmer contiguous to the reserve, so that it shall be the property of the Government, and the instructors should not intrude upon the property of the Indians. The instructor is there to teach them how to break up the soil, how to sow, reap and to plant. A man who merely walked among the Indians and directed them to do so and so, would not effect much. The whole thing is an experiment, however, and if it does not succeed, we can alter the mode of operations. I am told that the Indians have taken to the work in a remarkable degree, but, of course, there has not been time to learn much about the probable results of the experiment. I hope that, by 1881, whoever holds my place, will be able to give a favourable account. It is quite clear the experiment must be made. It is quite clear the ordinary supply of game is disappearing altogether, and the soil and the rivers and lakes for fishing are the only means of support left. Unless we want to sustain a nation of paupers, we must induce the Indians to cultivate the soil. An expensive effort is being made for the purpose, but it is better to feed them than fight them, and I know of no other way of doing this than the plan we have adopted. The complete disappearance of the buffalo has caused enormous destitution among the Indians. The hostile tribes have come into the country and are closely watched by the American troops on the south side of the border, who have driven back the buffalo in order to starve them out. Consequently, the buffalo has not been able to make their annual march to the north and supply our own Indians. The hostile Indians have suffered greatly, and if it had not been that they are not masters of International Law, and have crossed the boundary wherever buffalo could be found, they would have been reduced to utter starvation. I am glad to say there is no evidence before me that would warrant me to state to the House that any actual deaths have taken place, but there has been great suffering from the famine that has spread over the whole western portion of that country. Public sentiment would not allow it, and no Government would be worthy of their position, if they allowed the Indians to starve as long as we have the means to feed them. The Government adopted the best means for relieving them. We were obliged to find food for them. In some instances, perhaps, the Indians have been fed when they might not have been in an extreme position of hunger or starvation, and I dare say there have been instances of imposition; but as far as I can learn the officers have exercised due supervision over the food supply. I must say, however, that it was a dangerous thing to commence the system of feeding the Indians. So long as they know they can rely, or believe they can rely, on any source whatever for their food, they make no efforts to support themselves. We have to guard against that, and the only way to guard against it is by being rigid, even stingy, in the distribution of food and require absolute proof of starvation before distributing it. I have no distinct information to give to the House, but I understand that a very considerable number of those Indians, who retreated into our country before the American forces, have surrendered and are now surrendering by degrees, and betaking themselves to the reserves provided for them in the United States. I hope it may be so, because those Indians are not only the cause of irritation—which we need not allude to particularly just now—but they interfere very much with our own Indians. They kill the game and occupy the country which belongs to our own Indians. I hope, in another year, we will be able to give a prosperous account of the progress of the Indians, but if not we must meet the case as best we may. We cannot allow those people to starve, and we must continue our efforts to save the Indian from himself.

MR. MILLS: The hon. Minister says that fifteen, at least, of the farm instructors are persons trained to farming operations. I have a list of those instructors, in which I find the name of F. L. Hunt, Winnipeg. This gentleman was formerly a resident of Michigan. He went to the North-West some years ago, and up to the time of his appointment was engaged upon some newspaper.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Perhaps it was an agricultural newspaper.

MR. MILLS: No, it was not an agricultural newspaper. Then, there is Mr. George Scott, of Georgetown, who, I am informed, was engaged in mercantile pursuits before he went to the North-West. He was a friend of the supporter of the right hon. gentleman, and I suppose he was recommended for this position. Then there is Mr. B. Sharon, of Brantford, whom I think was in a similar position. I am informed that neither of those gentlemen were ever engaged in agricultural pursuits.

MR. ROYAL: I happen to know Mr. Hunt, and the hon. member for Bothwell is rather mistaken when he criticises one of the few appointments, perhaps, that can be well defended, of the farm instructors. Mr. Hunt is a man of intelligence, understands farming, has been a resident of Manitoba for a number of years, is married to an Indian woman, and is familiar with the customs and the language of the tribes as well. I dare say that if there were more appointments like this, the experiment we are making in this direction would probably succeed to a larger extent. The farm instructor who cannot speak to the Indians in their own language, labours under the most serious difficulty; how can the teaching of husbandry, in its numerous and complicated details, be done with proficiency if it has to be done through the slow and incomplete agency of an ignorant interpreter? It is a matter of regret that farm instructors have not been chosen, for the greater part, from amongst the half-breed population in Manitoba and in the North-West Territory. Not that the knowledge of the Indian language is to be the only requirement of a farm instructor, for without strict principles of morality, without liberality and good-will, without the perfect understanding of his duties without the knowledge of intelligent farming, a farm instructor may do great deal of harm if his only qualification is the possession of the Indian language. But I say that successful and clever farmers might have been selected from amongst the half-breed population, at a lesser cost and with a greater chance of success, than sending out indifferent Ontario farmers. While upon this very important subject, I will repeat what I have already stated, namely, that the Government cannot be too watchful of the experiment they are making just now. I believe the only way to civilise the Indians is through the good work of Christian missionaries. Religion can alone work this wonderful transformation. Let us not lose sight of the teachings of history in this respect. We must interfere in no way whatsoever with the labours of the missionary, but rather facilitate his sublime mission by all means in our power. And, Sir, experience shows on the other hand that to improve the Indian, to train him in habits of civilisation, we must begin when he is a child. So long as we do not take possession of the Indian child by our schools, by our various institutions, we shall work and spend money without any result. It is sheer folly to attempt to make farmers of the roaming bands of the plains. Necessity may force them, for the time being, to extract something from the soil, but they would rather eat their cows and oxen; and the day the buffalo will reappear, the plow will be at once left in the field, and you will see the baulky pupil of the farm instructor rush back to the wild pleasure of hunting. What is now needed in the North-West, is the teaching and the training up of the Indian children. Such an admirable work is being done already with success at St. Albert by devoted sisters of charity and missionaries. Why not take the means to extend and consolidate such an enterprise? I earnestly hope, Mr. Speaker, that the Government will take such an important matter under their very serious and earliest consideration, and that in the solution of the grave problem of civilising the Indians, experience of what has been and is still being successfully done, will guide our experiments and direct our policy.

MR. BUNSTER said that the Indians of British Columbia were generally of a superior class to those from the interior part of the continent. They were intelligent, and made good farmers. Many of them were educated in the Roman Catholic religion, members of which church had taken great pains in civilising them. Those Indians make a good class of settlers, but Chinese emigration was very obnoxious to British Columbia. He wished to draw the attention of the Minister of the Interior to the fact that the Chinese question was the great trouble, and Chinese emigration a great curse. It was the bounden duty of the Government and the people to put the Chinese out of the country.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I can understand the strong opinion the gentleman has respecting the Chinese, but we are now dealing with a horse of a different colour. We are discussing the question of red men, not yellow men. The Chinese question might come up next Session.

MR. BUNSTER: I accept the explanation of the right hon. gentleman.

MR. PATERSON (South Brant) said the hon. the Minister of the Interior promised information with reference to the number of tenders received for furnishing supplies under consideration, how many were received and considered for the delivery of the supplies at Winnipeg. He would like information with regard to the supplies required under Treaties Nos. 6, and 1 and 2. He understood that American breaking ploughs had been procured under this Treaty. This—the standard plough required—was an American plough or standard. Was it absolutely necessary that an American standard should be selected, or could they not make ploughs in Canada suitable to the purpose?

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said the motion made for the Return of all these tenders had not yet produced what was wanted. He imagined that it covered a great quantity of ground. The information which had been obtained would be submitted to-morrow. With respect to the American breaking ploughs, the advertisement was not at all for American made ploughs; he had called upon tenderers to give the lowest tender for ploughs of that pattern. Those who understood the matter declared that the experience of the Americans in breaking up the prairie soil, had made them adopt a certain kind of plough, which was far more useful than any other, but they hoped that, under the fostering influence of the National Policy, Canadians would ere long make these ploughs themselves.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT said that the attention of the Ministry ought to be specially directed towards securing suitable employment for the Indians. Mr. Dewdney, in one page of his Report, speaks of certain articles as of inferior quality. It would be outrageous to furnish these poor Indians with inferior tools. However, in this case, it does not appear that that was the fault of the contractor, yet he thought that the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) and the late Government were very much impressed with the necessity of looking after the agents in matters of this kind.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said that the hon. member was quite right. There had been articles sent to the Indians of which the Indians had a right to complain, in regard to implements and other supplies. That happened for some years back as well as last year. They were trying, in every possible way, to put an end to that wrong to the Indians, and prevent inferior articles being foisted upon them. He admitted that he stood in a more favourable position, in regard to the Indians, than his predecessor, or his predecessor, because the country was better known lately, and all matters affecting it could be more intelligibly dealt with. He had no doubt his predecessors were actuated by a desire to carry out the Treaties in a proper spirit. The present Government were trying to carry out the same system, and that, as the country opened up, they involved greater advantages in getting better and cheaper articles, which could be more easily furnished the Indians as they become more accessible.

MR. MILLS said that no doubt the Premier did not stand in a better position, in this respect, than his predecessors. Serious frauds had been practiced on the Indians, but the late Government succeeded in putting an end to them. The great difficulty was not in the want of specifications of the articles required, but in the absence of strict uprightness and integrity on the part of those carrying out the instructions of the Government. He believed that the success of the hon. gentleman, in the administration of the affairs of the Department, would depend very much upon the system of strict inspection of all the agencies so as to ascertain how the former instructors were discharging their duties, the character of their supplies, and so forth. He would like to ascertain how the Government proposed to distribute $50,000 or $60,000 between the Indians under the different Treaties, and for what purpose the money had been applied.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said it would be applied under the Treaties with the different bands.

MR. MILLS said in some places the Indians had received all they were entitled to. Under Treaty 7 a very large number of cattle were supplied in the first instance.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said the bands supplied already could not expect a second supply. It was the intention of the Department to replace some unsuitable cattle that were given to the Indians. I quite agree with the hon. gentleman as to the necessity for rigid inspection. Mr. Dewdney will see that all the reports will be collected under him. He is a man whom we all know, and I believe he is a good selection. He understands the Indian character at all events. He is accustomed to rough it, and has gone over immense tracts of country. He is a most active person, and I have every confidence he will do his whole duty in visiting the different Indian instructors and seeing that they are kept up to their duty. I quite agree with the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Royal) who says he thinks we would have done better to have employed as instructors some of the men up there. That is quite true. It does not need a scientific farmer to teach the Indians to break up ground, and learn the various operations of farming, but it needs a rough man who knows himself how to handle the plough. As to the assistance we had to render the Indians last year, it had to be done in a hurry. The Government received sudden information that the food supply was lacking. There was no time to theorise about it, and we had to send up the men at once. In the future we shall adopt the suggestion of the hon. member for Provencher, and as vacancies occur in the Department they will be filled up with men on the spot, men who understand the Indian character and who know how to guide them better than strangers. That is the policy of the present Government, and Mr. Dewdney will carry it out. Now, it is quite true, as my hon. friend says, that you can never make an Indian an agriculturist. It is quite true that to civilise an Indian you must commence with the child. I hope that we shall have a system by which the children may be, as it were, withdrawn from the parents as much as possible, and brought under the influence of civilised Indians. But that cannot be done in a day. The adults are there; they must be fed and they must have grain to put in a crop for next season. I hope that hereafter, when we have more leisure, we may be able to devise a more scientific mode of Government for our Indian wards in the North-West.

MR. MILLS: Does the hon. gentleman expect to have one inspector for the whole of that country?

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I have one inspector to visit them all, but, perhaps, not all in one season. Mr. Dewdney himself will visit one portion of the country, and the next season visit the other portion. Then there is the Indian Agent who has supervision over the farm instructors, and who will act with Mr. Dewdney.

MR. SCHULTZ: I know that one of the farm instructors, Mr. Scott, is a practical farmer, and has resided for over twenty years in that country. In addition to that he is a middle-aged man, a strict teetotaler and speaks the Indian language almost as fluently as English. I regard his appointment as one of the best that has been made. I agree with the hon. member for Provencher in the advisability of taking, as far as they can be got, people up there to act as farm instructors. I am glad of the assurance that this will be done, because it will go a long way towards preserving the state of peace and good feeling which now prevails among the Indians.

MR. ELLIOTT: I wish to make an observation regarding the criticisms of the hon. member for Bothwell on the subject of the appointment of Mr. Scott as Indian Farm Instructor. I know Mr. Scott well; and am personally aware of the fact that that gentleman was reared on a farm, that he was a thoroughly competent man, and that he was in every sense of the word, an agriculturist. My high opinion of Mr. Scott's abilities has been borne out completely by the evidence already given by the Department, that one of the best and most practical farm instructors in the North-West was Mr. Scott himself. Mr. Sharon has also come in for a share of the adverse criticism of the hon. member for Bothwell, though—the hon. member for Bothwell stated the contrary—an agriculturist. He was brought up on a farm; he is, in every respect, a competent instructor; and, as report stated, he was getting along well with the Indians whom he is instructing in farming in the vicinity of Battleford. In my opinion, the Government acted wisely and judiciously in appointing officers to proceed to the North-West and teach the Indians how to raise food for their maintenance and support. In view of the disappearance of the buffalo, and the rapid strides which civilisation is making in that country, there can be no doubt whatever that, in a few years, the Indians, unless induced to follow the avocation of farming, will be left without the means of subsistence. The endeavour to teach them agriculture is, therefore, laudable; while the appointment of instructors, who, I understand, had no less than 640 acres fenced and ready for crop, is highly commendable.

On Resolution 270, Post Office, additional amount required, $60,000,

MR. BLAKE: There is a Supplementary Estimate of $60,000, and it turned out, after a good deal of discussion the other evening, that it was supposed to be composed of three items, one being merely a cross entry which is supposed to represent $12,000. That leaves a balance of $48,000. The hon. the Finance Minister said that was partly due to the Government having been disappointed in their expectations of making cheaper contracts than before; and as to the residue, that it was due to an increase in the railway mileage. We were promised information as to how much of this increase vote was due to increased mileage, and how much to disappointment in making cheap contracts.

MR. O'CONNOR: I think that is to be found in the Annual Report of the Post Office Department.

MR. BLAKE: We may find it in the Report next Session.

MR. O'CONNOR: When this matter was first mentioned, I applied to the Deputy, and he was to let me have a Memorandum, which he has not yet sent in. I think there is an increase in the Railway mileage, and in other ways, as I mentioned two evenings ago.

MR. BLAKE: I have a particular suggestion with reference to the Supplementary Estimates. We have various headings, as, for instance, "Harbours and Rivers, Quebec," "Nova Scotia," etc. I propose we should have a separate heading, "Galt," with different sub-headings.

In reply, to Sir RICHARD J. CART-WRIGHT,

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY said this item was to pay the rent of his house and other contingencies. If there be travelling expenses, they would fall under that item.

MR. MACKENZIE: Who is the $600 for?

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: Mr.
Griffin is the Chairman and Mr. Powell the Secretary of the Board. The item has been paid since 1867—out of Contingencies. We thought it should be voted by Parliament instead.

MR. CASEY said this Board really had nothing to do unless some Department insisted on the examination of some candidate for the service. It hardly seemed worth while to continue it.

MR. BLAKE said the item seemed more intended to remunerate certain gentlemen who had little or nothing to do for it than to accomplish any other object. The House was now called on to make it a regular vote.

Vote agreed to.

282 Library—Amount required for the readjustment of the salaries of five Library Clerks and Chief Messenger, vide Report of Library Committee. 500 00

283 For purchase of books (this amount to be considered as an advance on account of the usual Grant for 1881-2) vide Report of Library Committee. 3,500 00

MR. MOUSSEAU: This appears a wonderful item. We are asked to vote $3,500 on account of 1881-2. We should know exactly the kind of Librarian, Administrator and Manager we have got for our books and moneys. A Report published in the proceedings of the Senate will uncover interesting matters on this subject. I think the Librarian does not know how to keep accounts, as he has concealed the figures every year since Confederation. If I am correctly informed, his administration extends to only $6,000 or $7,000 a year, although one year he had $10,000 under his control. It was purposely to purchase books. Now, one thing we do know—that, however audited, his accounts were never well kept; all the figures were concealed; and as a great Constitutional writer and a great Librarian, the Auditors thought he was great at managing $7,000 a year without verifying the accounts. They always took his dates, etc., as good. Now, it is our duty who vote the money, to enquire whether it is the intention of the Government to continue Mr. Todd as Librarian, or, at least, as manager of the moneys he receives. He has been forced to admit that, during six or seven years, he either purposely concealed figures, or else was incompetent for the position he held. I understand, from many sources, that his capacity as Librarian is not greater than his capacity as financier. His failure in this respect is explained by the fact that, being unable himself to make a good choice of books, he trusted the matter to his bookseller in England. Most of those books are worth very little, and an English scholar, living not far from here, told me that at least ten thousand of those English books might be advantageously sold by the Government for waste paper. Mr. Todd is said to be very clever, at least by many hon. members of this House, and I am sure many young members regard Mr. Todd as a great man. He writes splendid books, and we see a specimen in a volume which has been published during the Session. This book is of a most outrageous partisan character; it was printed in Boston, but the money therefor is paid by us. I see another item, in the Supplementary Estimates, of $1,600, for 400 copies of Mr. Todd's bad book, and when this item comes up I may speak of the book itself. I am curious to know how Mr. Todd could attend to his duties as Parliamentary Librarian and find time to write a book in favour of Mr. Letellier.

ARTS, AGRICULTURE AND STATISTICS.

284 To provide grant to assist in giving to the forthcoming Quebec Exhibition (to be held at Montreal) a Dominion character; the distribution of the grant, or any part thereof, to be applied and apportioned in such way as to satisfy the Minister of Agriculture..... $5,000

MR. ANGLIN: Is it the intention of the Government to vote a sum every year for giving the various Provincial Exhibitions a Dominion character? We are anxious in New Brunswick, under adverse circumstances, to get up a Provincial Exhibition. The city of St. John this year has largely contributed towards erecting a building. The Provincial Government is also giving a considerable amount, and the people of St. John desire very much that this effort of theirs should be seconded by the Dominion Government, and that a Dominion character should be given to the exhibition.

MR. BLAKE: I think the suggestion is perfectly reasonable. Last year the House adopted the policy of giving a Dominion character to the Provincial Exhibition in Ontario, and this year it is proposed to give a Dominion character to the Provincial Exhibition of the Province of Quebec. I think, therefore, that if this is to go on, similar assistance should be given to Provincial Exhibitions in the other Provinces.

MR. POPE (Compton): We have thought that as large sums of money have been expended hitherto in competing with other countries in the Paris and Philadelphia Exhibitions, it would be just as well for a time to dispense with those large exhibitions, and give some aid to Provincial Exhibitions, and give our farmers and mechanics an opportunity of coming together and comparing the productions of the different Provinces. In this view this grant was made to Ontario last year and to Quebec this year. As for Manitoba, a considerable sum was given last year out of this vote to bring productions of that Province down here.

MR. MACKENZIE: What was done with the $5,000 last year.

MR. POPE: About $2,500 was expended in cooperation with the Boards of Agriculture of Ontario and Quebec. They met here and consulted upon this matter, and, as far as I could, I acceded to their request; $2,500 was expended in gold, silver and bronze medals, that were given as prizes; $1,000 of the balance was spent in assisting Manitoba towards getting their productions here for competition.

MR. MACKENZIE: I am informed that such was the peculiar manner of expending this money; that the hon. gentleman gave some gold medals to competitors who did not receive a first or second prize, and some other parties who had received medals from the Association, got medals from the hon. the Minister of Agriculture. I would like to know whether these statements are correct or not.

MR. POPE: I suppose the hon. gentleman believes it; he would believe any story that was circulated respecting any member on this side of the House. I can say that not one single medal was given by the Government. The whole thing was arranged, mostly by the Board of Agriculture of Ontario. I had nothing to do with the matter. I gave two prizes, but paid my own money for them. Except the $1,000 given to Manitoba, every dollar of the $5,000 was distributed by the board itself.

MR. JONES: We should be careful how we inaugurate a system of giving large sums for Provincial Exhibitions. I think the Government have begun at the wrong end. I believe Ontario and Quebec should be able to take care of themselves, and a few thousand dollars might be well expended towards assisting the smaller Province to bring their produce to a focus.

MR. RYMAL said that the experiment of giving the exhibitions a Dominion character, well nigh beggared the Association of the Province of Ontario last year, notwithstanding that we gave them $5,000; and if it well nigh beggared them in Ontario, our friends in the Lower Provinces could imagine the fate that awaits them. It was utterly impossible to expect that any great amount of contributors would come from distant Provinces to any particular point.

MR. RYKERT said that by attempting the experiment of giving the exhibitions a Dominion character, large sums of money had been lost; $7,000 was lost in that way on the Ottawa Exhibition. But it was not due to the money in aid being voted by this House. He could not understand why the Governor should retain the money in his own hands. They all approved of that, but they did not expect that $1,000 would be taken from the $5,000 voted. He thought it would be better to place the money in the hands of the Board of Lower Canada, who know how the money is to be expended.

Vote agreed to.

IMMIGRATION AND QUARANTINE.

285 Immigration—Towards settling accounts for Immigration Commission, outstanding since 1876. $8,000

MR. POPE (Compton) explained that this was to settle commissions to steamship agents for services during 1877 and 1878. From the vouchers that had been sent in, he did not think that many of the claims could be established, but no more money would be paid than the vouchers showed as correct.

286 Quarantine—Towards assisting in the maintenance of the Tracadie Lazarette..... $3,000

In reply to Mr. ANGLIN,

MR. POPE (Compton): It is a question whether this can fairly be said to be a quarantine, and whether those people should be kept quarantined there. I am not prepared to say what the policy of the Government will be in future; but we feel that this is an exceptional case, and that the Dominion ought to contribute to the support of those people. Before another year comes round, we will be able to tell the House what we purpose doing. We have not decided how the money is to be expended. The matter will be carefully enquired into before a dollar is expended. The money, however, will be expended by this Government, and not by the Local Government.

MR. ANGLIN said the Provincial Government, owing, no doubt, to its poverty, did not make proper provision for the care of those poor people. It would take very little more, however, to make them comfortable. He thought the ladies of the Hotel Dieu, who went down from Montreal to attend to those people, would be prudent, careful managers of any moneys the Government chose to place at their disposal. They would be accountable to the Government, and their accounts would be found satisfactory. They had but one object in view—that of making those poor unfortunates comfortable and happy, an object to which they devoted themselves day and night.

MR. MACKENZIE: In 1878, when I was at the head of the Government, and when the first grant by Order in Council was made to this Institution, I made special enquiry as to the method of conducting it, and found that the money would undoubtedly be better spent by those ladies than by any other persons. We then ordered its expenditure in that way. It is a terrible business to undertake, and any humane ladies, like those who undertake such a work, are worthy of all encouragement.

289 Fees of Arbitrators in Milner land case..... 650 00

In reply to Mr. MACKENZIE, MR. LANGEVIN said the Chief Architect recommended this payment.

MR. MACKENZIE said he reported against it before.

MR. LANGEVIN said the claim was $2,555, but the Chief Architect concluded to recommend $650.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER said the arbitrators were appointed by the late Government under the ruling of a Judge. Mr. Milner claimed, in fact, the whole of the land of the town of Dorchester. He sued everybody. I found when I came into office that there had been almost as much paid in fees to counsel as the land was worth. He claimed $15,000 or $20,000, and as the Judges' were of opinion that he had some claim, I made up my mind the cheapest way out of it was to settle it. We agreed to leave it to arbitration, and Mr. Milner was so disappointed with the result that he refused to accept the sum awarded.

300 Parliament Buildings, Winnipeg—Amount required..... 12,000 00

301 Lieutenant-Governor's Residence—Amount required.... $10,000

In reply to Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT,

MR. LANGEVIN: All the other Provinces when they came in had Parliamentary buildings and residences for Lieutenant-Governors, but Manitoba being a new Province was not provided with those buildings. It was understood when Manitoba entered Confederation, that these buildings would be provided at a future time. The Chief Architect prepared the plans and specifications for the buildings, and told me that $300,000 would be the probable cost. Of course that sum was out of the question. I told him we could not afford more than $80,000 altogether. He has, therefore, prepared plans for buildings that will cost about the latter sum. For this year we will not expend more than $12,000.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT: I was not aware there were any promises or pledges given in the Terms of Union with Manitoba. There are other Provinces in the Dominion that are asking for Parliament Buildings. Suppose New Brunswick makes a similar claim to Manitoba.

MR. LANGEVIN: All the other Provinces had buildings except Manitoba, and it is only fair that she should be equally well treated.

MR. ANGLIN: Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Quebec, Ontario and British Columbia had all erected those buildings at their own cost. It is true that, under the Terms of Union, all property belonging to the Provinces came, for a time, into the possession of the Dominion Government, who handed them back to the Provinces. But because that transfer, by Act of Parliament, took place, we are not to assume that the Dominion made a present to these Provinces of the buildings which they then possessed.

MR. SMITH (Selkirk): The case of Manitoba is different from that of the other Provinces. Manitoba has no land, and it is only fair the General Government should forward in her aid. I would ask the hon. Minister if he would say when he expects these buildings will be completed.

MR. LANGEVIN: It will depend on the extent of the votes which this Parliament may be disposed to give for that purpose.

303 Toronto Harbour—To continue improvements..... 12,500

In reply to Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT,

MR. LANGEVIN said that large amounts, nearly $50,000, had been expended on this harbour, and it was intended now to have a thorough examination made by two or three eminent engineers, so that whatever was done in the way of improvement should be permanent.

MR. BLAKE: The hon. gentleman is correct in deciding to have an exhaustive survey made of the whole harbour; and he will do well to get evidence of what changes are taking place in the interior part of the harbour. It seems to me that the gap is increasing very largely, and I think it must be apparent to any one familiar with the harbour for the last fifteen years, that there is a very great change at the western end of the spit or bar. It seems to me to have enlarged, and to be forming a new island or projection to the west; and I think the engineers should learn from reliable information what the formation is. Unless the survey be a perfect survey, it will not be of much importance.

MR. OUMET: Does the Government draw any revenue from the harbour improvements in Ontario?

MR. LANGEVIN: No; but the improvements encourage a large trade. The harbour of Toronto is considered, not only a commercial harbour, but a harbour of refuge, and it is on that ground the Government give an annual vote for this purpose.

MR. OUMET: There are a great many harbours of that sort in Ontario, and I would like to know if we cannot convert our Quebec harbours into harbours of refuge. It would save us a great deal of money if the Government would undertake the improvements.

MR. McCALLUM: If we had no harbours of refuge in Ontario, the cargoes would never reach Montreal. This expenditure is a very necessary one.

MR. OUMET: Of course, if Ontario did not exist, Quebec would soon starve.

I am also sorry he has not seen fit to make repairs at the breakwater. There is danger of its being carried away by another storm.

MR. LANGEVIN said he thought the item would suffice to secure the repairs, and prevent the pier being damaged. It was, at all events, a beginning.

MR. SMITH (Selkirk) asked if it was the intention of the Government to dredge the bar at the mouth of the Red River this season. That improvement would greatly assist the navigation.

MR. LANGEVIN replied that it was not thought proper to ask a special vote for it. But should the bar require to be dredged, they might be able to take the cost out of the general vote.

MR. SMITH (Selkirk) enquired if it was intended to improve the Saskatchewan this season, by removing boulders and other obstructions at Cole's Falls. Captain Moore offered to effect this improvement for $4,000, which would be well spent in such a useful work.

MR. LANGEVIN said they could not ask for a vote for the purpose this year. The locality would be examined, this season, to see what improvements were required.

OCEAN AND RIVER SERVICE.

329 Dominion Steamers—Amount required for the purchase and maintenance of a steamer to replace the Lady Head..... $55,000

MR. ANGLIN said that was a large amount. They should dispense with the services of some of those vessels, which cost a great deal, unless they were found absolutely necessary. Their principle or only work was visiting the lighthouses.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT said the hon. the Minister of Marine should give explanations as to this item, and explain the reasons for it.

MR. POPE (Queen's, P.E.I.) said the Government required steamers, not only to visit the lighthouses, but do police duty round the coasts, and so forth. The Americans had vessels watching the interests of their fishermen, and the Dominion Government had to protect theirs also. They should be prepared for any difficulty that might happen in future. The value of a great many steamers might be lost by the want of such services as those steamers rendered.

MR. ANGERS: I do not think the amount of $55,000 is too large, perhaps not enough, to procure a first class vessel of a small draft, so as to be able to come to the assistance of vessels wrecked in the Gulf, and which would also be able to lay a submarine cable from the Magdalen Islands and Anticosti to the main shore. I was surprised to hear the hon.

member from Gloucester complaining of this amount, when he must know that it is to be expended for the benefit of the Fisheries. We have from that source a capital of four and a-half million dollars, which represents an income of $225,000 a year, and $50,000 is not too large a sum to take out of this amount for the purpose of protecting the Fisheries, and perhaps laying the cable.

MR. BLAKE: What is the principle on which it is proposed to compensate these officers of the Mounted Police for injuries received in the discharge of duties?

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: There is no rule laid down as yet. I desire to have some rule laid down, and I propose, during Recess, to devise some rule with regard to the Mounted Police and the Militia generally. All kinds of claims are being set up. For instance, one young man in the Mounted Police, the son of a gentleman and educated, got his feet frozen, and his father is asking $10,000 as compensation.

MR. BLAKE: I quite agree with the view as to the necessity of some comprehensive scheme, but it is certain that this matter will have to be regulated with great particularity and upon a very moderate scale of compensation. It will have to be made particularly clear in reference to injuries received from carelessness, excesses, etc. I have heard of injuries from frost which were rather due to the negligence of the party than anything else. If we are to introduce a system of compensation for injuries in the Mounted Police, it is difficult to see why we should not extend it to all branches of the Civil Service.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: That is the trouble.

MR. BABY: Illicit distillation has gone on for a number of years, and as population increases it becomes more necessary to provide against illicit distillation. I cannot say exactly that the business is increasing, but I find the stills are larger than they used to be.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT: I am afraid the case is so. I am afraid the hon. gentleman's returns for this year will show a considerable falling off, more particularly in the article of spirits. I do not know what his estimates may be, but I doubt if they will exceed 4,200,000 gallons for this year.

They may be directed to go where they will find certain sections open; but they do not know where to go. We have adopted the American system and have stationed at Winnipeg a chief guide, who is instructed to employ a number of men to guide the emigrants to their destinations. We have sent out a gentleman, a Mr. Peter Reid, who knows the country well. He will be stationed at Winnipeg, and as emigrants come up from Pembina he will arrange them in parties and send them in the different directions leading to their locations. That is the object of having land guides.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: This is an item which requires an explanation. The sub-contractors on the Lachine Canal ran away with a considerable amount of money. The Government took the work into their own hands, and found an amount of $20,000 due to the labourers, and an Order in Council was passed authorising the payment of this money. The men to whom the money was due had given due bills for their board, which were accepted by this party to the amount in the vote. The claim was made, and was entitled to consideration. The money was due, for labour, to the men, and it seemed necessary to put the item in the Supplementary Estimates.

In reply to Mr. SMITH (Selkirk),

MR. LANGEVIN said the amount was to cover relief given those fishermen in the autumn of 1878. The Local Government had given aid the two previous years; but Mr. Joly, Premier in 1878, declared they could not spare anything at that time. There being insufficient relief at hand, he (Mr. Langevin), in the absence of his colleagues, ordered assistance to be forwarded to prevent the people from starving.

MR. SMITH (Selkirk) said he had no doubt this assistance was very much required. The people on that coast was very often on the verge of starvation, and it would be a great saving to both the Dominion and Quebec Governments if they were removed from that inhospitable coast to the North-West where they might always be sure of a living.

358 To pay for 400 copies Todd's
 "Parliamentary Government in the British Colonies" (vide Report of Library Committee) 1,600 00

MR. DESJARDINS: I would like to know if, when the Government subscribed for 400 copies of Mr. Todd's work, they were acquainted with its character and its tendency, and if they were aware of Mr. Todd's object in publishing a book which is not only insulting to a large number of the members of this House, but contains very grave insinuations against the religion of one-half of the population of this Dominion.

MR. BABY: I may say, in answer to my hon. friend, that the Government did not subscribe to the number of copies mentioned in this item, but they were purchased upon a Report of the Joint Committee on the Library. I am bound to say, moreover, that when this item was placed in the Estimates, the Government were not aware of the character of the work, and the subscription was made on the strength of Mr. Todd's great reputation, and under the supposition that the book was but a continuation of a celebrated historical work of his, known both in this country and Europe. As to the character of the present work, I believe the opinion of my hon. friend is shared by many others.

MR. ROYAL: It may be inopportune at this late hour to act the part of an iconoclast, and break the idol of a fine reputation, yet this is what I feel myself compelled to do in the case of Mr. Todd. That gentleman has enjoyed the confidence of this Parliament for over twenty years. No doubt he has written a very valuable work on constitutional practice, but in this instance he has drawn upon his credit in publishing the work. It was upon this reputation that the Library Committee advised the subscription to 400 volumes of a work which is certainly no credit to the man who wrote it, and it is no credit for this Parliament to vote $1,600 for such a work. In the first place this work maintains a principle which has been condemned by this Parliament, and in the second place, Mr. Todd has, in a most unwarranted manner cast reflections upon the faith of a large portion of the Dominion of Canada, which certainly ought not to be found in a work subscribed to by this Parliament.

MR. DESJARDINS.

MR. BLAKE: I think this work has been rather hardly treated by hon. gentlemen. I can readily understand that they do not sympathise with all the views expressed in it. I do not myself. There are several opinions expressed in it which I certainly do not share. But surely hon. gentlemen do not expect that any author, whom they might think it worth while to subscribe to, would do otherwise than express his sincere opinions on those facts of which he was treating. Though Mr. Todd cannot have expected to meet the views of hon. gentlemen opposite, I myself see no reason why we should decry the general merits of his work, which is, I consider, a useful collection of precedents and historical events occurring in the various colonies. I have read the work with a great deal of interest and instruction, and, apart altogether from the circumstances that it condemns the treatment of the Letellier case by the Government, I think the work will be referred to in many other points for information and instruction, even though it should be tabooed from our Library. With reference to the observations of the hon. member for Hochelaga (Mr. Desjardins), my attention has not been attracted to that part of the work which is said to justify them. Of course, if there be any part of the work which justifies those observations, I do not in the slightest degree sympathise with them.

MR. DESJARDINS: We would not object to the expression of Mr. Todd's views on any constitutional question, but what we object to is his contemptuous treatment of principles which are accepted by a large portion of the people of this country. I think he ought, at least, to have respected our faith.

MR. OUMET: I think this work ought to be paid for by the friends of ex-Lieutenant-Governor Letellier, because Mr. Todd has taken up their cause, and has endeavoured to stultify and ridicule the vote of this House. It is certainly not very creditable to us now to vote such a large sum of money to purchase a work which justifies the course of our opponents. It would be well to print in the appendix of this work the speech of the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. Mc Carthy) as an antidote.

- 360 Amount required to cover cost, freight and packing of Indian curiosities purchased by Superintendent Powell. 1,235 55

In reply to Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT,

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Dr. Powell, the Superintendent of Indian affairs in British Columbia, has been making a collection for some years. He has made a tour along the coast of British Columbia to observe the peculiar habits, customs and ceremonies. Samples are rapidly disappearing with the pressure of the white man's progress. During his last visit to Queen Charlotte Island, he secured a number of antiquities, if I may use the term, of some importance. Such a collection as he has, cannot, perhaps, be secured again, and he offers it to the Government. We are going to have it sent up here to be placed in, perhaps, the Geological Museum for the present.

MR. SMITH said he thought such a course would be well extended to other parts of the country. It was now only for a short time that it would be possible to have anything to show that these Indians were, and these collections would be very valuable.

MR. BLAKE: We shall have one lasting memorial of them in our Public Accounts.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT said he thought when officers were abolished, officers thus dismissed without cause of complaint against them, should allow them something more than the amount paid in by them to the Superannuation Fund.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said he was afraid that would subject the Government to the charge of adding enormously to the public expenditure. That principle, however, would be taken up, but the hon. gentleman opposite must promise not to attack the Government for extravagance.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT said he would take care always to give them credit for it.

- 365 Intercolonial Railway—Compensation to representatives of the late E. C. Ennis, injured by an accident on the Intercolonial Railway in February, 1878. 400

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: This is a case which ought to be stated. In consequence of the breaking of a rail, the first-class car in which Mr. Ennis was a passenger, was thrown off the track, and he had his collar-bone broken and sustained some internal injury from which he died. That was in February, 1878. About a year afterwards a claim was made for compensation, the amount being based at $2,400. The claim was not allowed by the Department in consequence of the evidence going to show that there was no negligence on the part of the employes of the road, the law being that the injury or death of a passenger caused in the ordinary course of transit by railway, involves no claim against the railway, unless there is connected with it some want of due precaution by the managers of the road or those in charge of the train. After Ennis's death his representatives sent in a claim, and the Department of Justice advised us that while there was no legal claim, if we could make a compromise for $400, it would be better than contesting the suit, because a suit might involve that expenditure on the part of the Government, and this amount has been placed in the Estimates in accordance with the recommendation of the Department.

MR. Fiset: Mr. Speaker, knowing as I do the character of the accident which befel Mr. E. C. Ennis, while he was a passenger on the Intercolonial Railway, I am of opinion that this sum of $400 is not sufficient as a compensation for the wounds he received. Mr. Ennis, when he was in the service of the Government, earned $100 per month, and even supposing that the wounds which he received were not the direct cause of his death, nevertheless lost a year or more of his time, for, by reason of this injury to his shoulder, he was more than a year out of work; but I will go further yet, and say that I am of opinion that these wounds, if not the direct, were the indirect cause of his death. The Government alleges that this sum of $400 is given by way of compensation, and that it was not liable for any damages. Well! I say that if the Government is not liable for any damages it ought to give nothing; and if, on the contrary, it is liable, it ought to pay to the heirs of Mr. Ennis what is just and reasonable. The fact of voting a certain sum as a compensation is in some respects an admission that it is responsible for the injuries sustained by Mr. Ennis. My intention is not to oppose the voting of this item, but I am in a position to declare that this amount will not be accepted by the heirs of the late Mr. Ennis, and that they will demand that their claims be carried to the Supreme Court in order to obtain justice there.

OFFICIAL REPORT OF THE DEBATES.

COMMITTEE’S REPORT PRESENTED.

MR. STEPHENSON presented the Fourth Report of the Select Committee appointed to supervise the Official Report of the Debates of this House during the present Session.

MR. MACKENZIE: There is one thing to which I desire to call the attention of the Committee, the practice which has prevailed all through this Session of the reporters never taking down extracts from papers or books that are read, but sending in their reports with a blank marked “extract.” This has necessitated the hunting up of papers, perhaps a week after the speech has been delivered, and it is utterly impossible to do it accurately. When one reads carefully and slowly, there is no more reason why the extracts should not be taken down as well as the speech. For myself, I would infinitely rather make my speech over again than correct the report in that way.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I quite agree with my hon. friend. It is an inexcusable piece of laziness on the part of the reporters not to take down the extracts read during the speech. When the speaker has come to extracts the reporters have generally dropped their pencils and not taken a note. It is much easier work for a reporter to take down such portions of a speech, because they are always read slowly and more deliberately. At present, the reporters drop their pencils and bore one afterwards to get the extracts. As far as I am concerned, I have never once given the extracts, and if my speeches have suffered thereby I cannot help it.

MR. MACKENZIE: Then the hon. gentleman had better not look at the book.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I look at the book for the speeches of my hon. friend.

MR. WHITE (East Hastings): I think if the extracts were left out altogether, the speeches would be better. A great many hon. gentlemen give scarcely anything else but extracts in their speeches.

MR. BLAKE: If the extracts were left out, the best part of the speeches would be left out.

MR. STEPHENSON: The Committee have given this matter a great deal of consideration, and we expect that some good results will come from the change. As the hon. member for West Durham remarked the other day, this is an experiment. We have adopted it as such, but we think it will be advantageous to the House, because we think we will get better reports hereafter than we have had hitherto.

CANADA TEMPERANCE ACT AMENDMENT BILL.—[BILL 112.]

(Mr. Bowell.)

THIRD READING.

House resumed the adjourned debate on Mr. Bowell's proposed motion for the third reading of the Bill, and Mr. Boul-bee's proposed motion in amendment thereto.

MR. BOWELL: This Bill, which was passed by the Senate, without division, is simply intended to make some slight amendments in what is termed "The Canada Temperance Act," without affecting the principle of the Bill in the least. The amendments were found necessary in order to enable the law to be worked more effectually, not only in Ontario, but in New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island. I presume that most hon. members have read the Bill; consequently, it is not necessary that I should enter into full explanation of it. The amendment proposed by the hon. member for East York (Mr. Boulton) would, in my opinion, effectually destroy the whole principle of the Bill.

MR. BOULTBEE: No, no.

MR. BOWELL: My hon. friend says "no, no," but I find by it that not only must you have a majority of the whole vote in the electoral division or county, wherein a poll is held, in order to bring this Act into force, but you must have an actual majority upon the voters' list of each sub-division in each county. Now, I was not aware that that was the effect of the amendment till I read it a minute or two ago. The amendment says there must be a majority of all the voters whose names are entered on the voters' list in "each polling."

MR. BLAKE: I think there is a clerical error here. That that is not the intention of the amendment.

MR. BOULTBEE: It is not intended to have that effect.

MR. BOWELL: I took the language as printed. If that be not the intention the hon. gentleman had better say—the voters' list used in such polling place, or county. However, which ever way it is passed, the amendment will effectually defeat the intention of those who introduced, and of Parliament which passed the Act. I am decidedly opposed to the adoption of any such amendment. If the principle involved in the amendment were adopted and acted upon in every election held, I am of opinion there would be very few of us occupying seats on the floor of the House to-day. It is almost impossible, under any circumstances, unless under great political or other excitement, to get a full, clear majority of the voters on the voters' list to record their votes on any occasion. As the general principle of elections is a decision by a majority, I think the opinion, as expressed by a majority, whenever a question is put to the people, should be accepted as sufficient, particularly when the question submitted to them, is one effecting the general welfare of the country.

MR. ROSS (West Middlesex) : Before the question is put, I wish to offer a few observations in regard to the amendment proposed by the hon. member for East York. I cannot understand his motive in submitting such an amendment. The Bill, in its present form, appears to be a Government measure. It was introduced in another place by an hon. member of the Government, and into this House by the hon. the Minister of Customs. His name is attached to it, at least ; and why this Bill, which has received the cordial approval of the Senate, should be subjected to such an amendment I cannot understand. I suppose my hon. friend is aware that there is no movement in the country in favour of such an amendment as he proposes ; at least we have had no intimation of it. There have been no petitions presented in favour of such an amendment ; but the hon. gentleman (Mr. Boulton) will remember that, before the Act which is proposed to be amended in this serious way was introduced, the House was deluged with petitions in favour of some restriction on the liquor traffic. Now, it is proposed to emasculate this Bill—virtually to destroy it—and that without a single petition being presented in favour of such a course. Nor does the hon. member show that any injustice is being done by the Act as it stands. It would have been reasonable to suppose that, in regard to a Bill passed unanimously—a Bill of the character of the Temperance Act of 1878—an hon. gentleman bringing down an amendment of such an important measure, would have shown, or attempted to show, that some injustice was inflicted on some portion of the community by the Bill he proposed to amend. This, however, has not been shown. I venture to say he is afraid that his amendment would not bear investigation. He was afraid to bring it up upon a single argument or statement of facts. But in the dead hour of the night, at the last sitting of the House, it was proposed to take a division on the amendment. I decidedly objected to this course, and I think that the hon. gentleman and those who act with him, if there are any, before they can expect this House to support such an amendment, must prove that some serious wrong is done by this Bill as it now stands. My hon. friend cannot pretend to be acting in the interests of those for whom the Bill was originally passed. It was passed in conformity with what was believed to be a well founded public opinion: that some reasonable restriction should be placed upon the liquor traffic ; or, in other words, that the people of this country should be allowed to say themselves how far they wished that traffic to prevail amongst them. The Bill being carried through the House with that object, it would be natural to suppose that if any amendments were proposed it should be by those who originally sustained the measure when introduced. My hon. friend has not told us that he so acted. I do not suppose he is sustained in his course by a single representative body of the temperance party in this country ; I do not suppose he is acting in consonance with a single temperance man in the Dominion ; I do not suppose he is able to say to this House that the amendment is calculated to promote, by any manner of means, the purposes for which the Bill was originally intended. He proposes to introduce into our electoral institutions an entirely new principle. Hon. gentlemen, on both sides of this House, as the hon. the Minister of Customs has remarked, sit here by a majority of the votes polled in their respective counties. [I do not know that there is a single member of this House—unless he was elected by acclamation—who is able to say that he sits here by a clear majority of the registered voters of his constituency. I notice in a Return, brought down to the Ontario Legislature, a comparison between the number of votes polled for the old Dunkin Act and those polled in the Parliamentary Election. In the county of Bruce, for instance, there is a total of 11,820 votes. In the Parliamentary Election there were polled 5,032 votes, and in the vote under the Dunkin Act 6,352 votes, showing that in the contest for the suppression of the liquor traffic in that county, there was a stronger sentiment manifested, and a greater number of the electorate impelled to go to the polls, than in the Parliamentary Election. Now, if the argument be good, that we have a right to sit and legislate on the strength of the majority of votes polled in any election, why should not the same argument apply in regard to an important measure of this kind? Can my hon. friend say that, in any election authorised by any Dominion or Provincial Statute—with one exception provided for in a small Bill passed by the Ontario Legislature last year—there is any such principle introduced? I venture to say he cannot. We must remember that the people of this country have so far only been appealed to, to a limited extent, to decide whether they are satisfied with the principle contained in this Act. Why propose, so early in its history and before hearing from the people, to emasculate and destroy it by incorporating an entirely new principle which will place the temperance community at a great disadvantage. If this amendment is adopted, it will be exceedingly difficult for us to fulfil the primary object of this Act. The Preamble of the Temperance Act, 1878, says: "Whereas, it is desirable to promote temperance in the Dominion, and secure uniform legislation," etc. The object being the promotion of temperance, it is clear the effect of this amendment will be to make it much more difficult to secure that object. Is this House prepared to retrace its steps? Is it prepared to see, within two short years of the passage of the Temperance Act, 1878, an amendment made to it which will render the Act practically useless? Is a principle so important in its effects upon the well-being of the community to be discarded by this House in the dying hours of the Session, undoing the work of a former House after the most careful deliberation and most serious consideration? I trust the House will more regard the object of this Bill, will more regard the public sentiment of this country, than to adopt the amendment proposed by my hon. friend. It has been hinted, in private conversation among the members of this House, that the object of the amendment was to relieve the minority from the control of a tyrannical majority. If that is the object sought to be accomplished by my hon. friend, does he not leave the majority to govern still? Is there not a tyrannical majority in the one case as well as in the other? Perhaps he may say the power of the majority is reduced, but the principle remains there still. It is by the voice of the majority, in either case, that this Act goes into effect, or does not go into effect. Even admitting that the principle for which my hon. friend contends is sound, it is impossible to apply it. You will find in many towns and cities individuals who have a vote in several polling sub-divisions. Suppose John Brown is anxious to vote for the Temperance Act and that he has a vote in ten polling sub-divisions, he goes up and votes for the Act in polling division No. 1, but, in spite of himself, his own vote is recorded against him nine times by the amendment of my hon. friend. Is there any decency—not to say common sense—in a proposition that for every once that a man records his vote according to his convictions, he is compelled, by law, to vote against himself nine times. Is this legislation by which my hon. friend proposes to amend the Act which was unanimously adopted by this House a few years ago? It is well this should be known. Let the House distinctly understand that, instead of dealing fairly with the public opinion of the country, this amendment proposes to take an unfair advantage of it, and to render it almost impossible for public opinion to be fairly recorded. Suppose the amendment is adopted, and that a majority of the qualified voters should be required; then no election could take place without a scrutiny of every vote, in every polling sub-division in the county, in order to ascertain who are the qualified voters, who are the duplicates, who are the dead and missing, who are the absentees, and all the particulars that enter into some of the contested Elections. But, Sir, I do not propose to take up the time of the House. I feel convinced that this Bill will not receive the approval of the House. From what my hon. friend, the Minister of Customs, said, I feel convinced that it will not be supported by the Government. I hope he has given expression to what he believes to be the opinion of the Government. I believe there are hon. gentlemen in this House who, two or three years ago, supported very heartily the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Lisgar in favour of a prohibitory liquor law. I am going to appeal to those hon. gentlemen who, in 1877, were so strongly in favour of a prohibitory liquor law, and who, I hope, in 1880, will accord us the privilege of saying as counties, whether we shall pass a prohibitory liquor law. Among the hon. gentlemen then in favour of prohibition, I find still in the House Sir Charles Tupper, Hon. Mr. Baby, Mr. Plumb, Hon. Mr. Masson, Mr. Kirkpatrick, and so on. Now, if these gentlemen, in 1877, were favourable to the prohibitory law, pure and simple, they will surely oppose any attempt to make partial prohibition easy. I do not believe that any prohibitory liquor law will prove effective unless it is sustained by that public sentiment. That is what I contended for in regard to the Temperance Act of 1878, and I am going to ask the hon. gentlemen who voted for that Resolution in 1877, to assist me in voting down the amendment of the hon. member for East York. I would remark that this is an Act that, as yet, is comparatively untried. It has only been in force since the 1st of May last, and we have not had an opportunity of judging of its merits, and I would regret that hon. gentlemen would prevent us from reaping fruits which we expect this Act is calculated to produce. I can appeal with confidence to members of the Government, and to the supporters of the Government on the back benches to, under the circumstances, give the Bill a fair trial, and if it should be found to be inoperative to join in devising some remedy for the evils gentlemen on both sides of the House so much deplore.

MR. BOULTBEE: I am not sufficiently old in parliamentary practice to know whether the action of the hon. gentleman is correct, but it was not courteous of him to spring up before me when I was about to support my amendment. It seems to me to be a conduct unworthy of a member of Parliament, and of one gentleman associating with another. I shall endeavour to treat this question with the calmness and moderation with which it ought to be treated. I do not yield to any hon. gentleman in my desire to suppress the evils of intemperance, although we may differ widely as to the means to be used. Having given this matter most careful consideration for many years, when so situated, from the position I then held, as to have special advantages for judging in this respect, I very much doubt whether the cause will be at all served by harsh restrictive legislation. My own opinion has always been that temperance is only well and safely promoted by means of proper and well considered example, and great strides have been made by this means in the last quarter of a century. I defy any man on the floor of this House, or in the broad world to show that temperance has ever been promoted by this sort of restrictive legislation. The statistics in relation to the Dunkin Act show that there are more convictions for intemperance in counties and districts when that Act was in force than there were before. The reason for this is not hard, and far more in proportion to population than in districts where the Act was not put in force, to find. To make it effective it must be sustained by a large majority, a majority so large and decisive as to make it distinctly as the result of a complete consensus of public opinion. The hon. member for West Middlesex puts in my mouth the theory that I desired, by my motion, to protest against the action of a tyrannical majority. That is not the view with which I proposed the amendment at all. I wished to avoid and protest against the action of a tyrannical minority. When we make such a law as this, however averse many of us may be to it, if it is passed by a clear majority of the people, I apprehend the minority have nothing to say against it. One of the principle objections to this measure is that the whole instincts of our race are opposed to harsh sumptuary laws such as this restrictive of personal liberty. Consequently the Act is not received with favour, and being united on the action of a small minority of the people, is rebelled against and set at defiance. If, however, the law was adopted by a large majority, a different state of things would result, for, subject to proper conditions, our people are a law abiding people. We have found, moreover, that in instances where this Act was put in force, there was a sort of feeling that a wrong was being done, an injustice being suffered, and a very natural feeling it is, because in the action that is sought to be taken in these matters no arrangement is ever made to compensate those whose property is ruined and destroyed in giving effect to this law. It seems to me that if we desire to deal justly in this behalf, if we desire to popularise this obnoxious law, some compensation should be given to those men whose property is to be affected, whose business is to be destroyed. Mr. Gladstone, surely one of the first of living Reformers, during the late Election, on this subject, in one of his speeches, said :

“As to the liquor traffic, he was prepared to give due consideration and support to any well considered scheme of local option. In fact the late Government did introduce a Bill with that object, but were unable to pass it. However, whatever action was taken with reference to this great question, in cases of loss of property, there must be compensation for losses sustained.”

But here, unfortunately, I think for the cause they champion, the advocates of a prohibitory law say expressly that no such compensation should be made advocate, indeed an act of deliberate spoilation, which must always be repugnant to the views of right thinking and just people. The view of Mr. Gladstone, than whom no man has, perhaps, travelled further in the cause of reform, is directly antagonistic to this, and wisely so. My belief is strong to conviction that we should endeavour, instead of seeking to impose a harsh sumptuary law on the people, to promote, as much as possible, the use of our wholesome Canadian wines and ales, and discredit, as much as possible, the use of the more severe intoxicants, whiskies, brandies and rum ; and promote a carefully considered license law, which will afford a good opportunity of making a living to the keeper of a well-conducted hotel, and to visit the most severe penalties and restrictions on grogeries, licensed and unlicensed. This will do more to promote temperance than any endeavour to stamp out intemperance by a law like this, repulsive to the instincts of a free people, and fruitful of evil in its practice. A license law, to have a good effect, must be framed in the interests of good order, and administered in all parts of the Dominion with justice and equity ; it must not be made, as it is in Ontario, the means of bitter and malignant political persecution, where men are deliberately ruined if they refuse to support the Local Government. The amendment I have proposed does not mean, as was suggested by one of the hon. Ministers of the Government, that there should be a majority at every polling place. It simply proposes that there shall be a majority in the whole district where the law is sought to be put in force. I did not understand what the hon. member for West Middlesex meant by saying that a voter might vote at one polling place in favour of the Bill, and in eight or nine other places in the same constituency, against it, I do not understand it. It seems to me his objection was rather a puerile one ; possibly he does not understand exactly what he means himself. The Resolution simply provides that a majority of votes of the district shall be necessary to give effect to the law. It does not mean that any man that happens to have eight or nine pieces of land in eight or nine different places shall have eight or nine different votes. It is perfectly absurd to put it in that way. The hon. member for West Middlesex also seemed to regard the measure as a Government measure. I did not understand, from the remarks of the hon. the Minister of Customs, that it was regarded as a Government measure. As I understand it, the Government intend to let this measure go on its own merits, each member voting as he pleases. In reference to the Dunkin Act, there seems always to be a feeling of injustice grow up when it is enforced, and a desire engendered to break the law. I call the attention of the House, and those hon. gentlemen who are opposed to the Resolution, to the fact that, when men once come to regard the breaking of the law as a light matter, there is much less hesitancy in breaking it in other cases, nor will the distinction be nicely drawn as to which law may be broken ; and it cannot be denied that in setting at defiance and breaking the Dunkin Law, there is not attached that penalty of shame and public condemnation which attends the infraction of other laws. If then, hon. gentlemen wish to support the Temperance movement, they should join with those who wish to make it necessary that a majority of the whole vote should be pronounced in favour of the law before it is sought to be imposed on the community ; were this done, and some system of compensation settled for injury sustained, the law would become a living force, respected and supported by the people, while, as at present, it is simply a source of constant worry and annoyance, producing no result but loss of revenue, increase of taxation, and discredit to the Temperance cause, which, in itself, is a great evil.

MR. CASEY: The hon. gentleman tells us there are more convictions for drunkenness since the operation of the Dunkin Act. That is not very extraordinary, perhaps, when we consider that where the Dunkin Act is not in operation people will be more slack in prosecuting than they will in a temperance community. The increased number of convictions only indicates a vigorous carrying out of the law. The hon. gentleman tells us there is a greater desire to drink, on the part of young men, where that Act is in force. I do not know how he knows this for a fact, unless the young men have made him their father confessor, and that is extremely unlikely. The hon. gentleman knows that many other indulgences when forbidden become sweeter when the law forbids them; but that is no reason why an enactment, which is proper, should not be enforced. With reference to a majority of the total vote being required to pass the law, it appears to me, as I understand the law, that a majority of the entire votes in counties where two parties are reasonably equal, will be almost impossible. By this proposed amendment, a majority of the whole of the names on the voters' list will be required. It is well known that there are many non-residents and many repeaters. There are many absentees who cannot vote; some may be dead at the time, and yet the hon. gentleman would require that all should vote, whether living or dead, or otherwise absent, in order to carry the Bill into effect.

MR. BOULTBEE: No, no.

MR. CASEY: That will be the effect of this amendment. Suppose a man has several votes; he might in one place vote to have the Bill put in force, and in the other places where he did not vote, he would in effect be put down as against the Bill. But the hon. gentleman, and the Licensed Victuallers' Association, of which he appears to be the champion, wish apparently to have the votes of the living and present voters killed by the votes of the dead and the absent.

Several HON. MEMBERS: Order; question; order; carried.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I must ask for order; really we must have order.

MR. CASEY: The hon. member for East York (Mr. Boultee), and the association of which he is the mouth-piece, wishes the votes of men recorded in one place killed by the same man's own name registered in another place, but not voted. I cannot think the hon. gentleman has looked at the Bill seriously, and I am sure that he has not thoroughly considered the legal and inevitable effect of his amendment, which is utterly unfair, ridiculous and unjust in its nature. What we really want, in order to carry out the law, is the majority of influence in any particular community, and not necessarily their numerical majority.

Several HON. MEMBERS: Order; carried; question.

MR. SPEAKER: I hope hon. gentlemen will keep order.

MR. BLAKE: I think we ought to have some degree of decency observed. A sense of duty compels me to say that these disgraceful exhibitions are becoming intolerable.

AN HON. MEMBER: Nine-tenths of the noise is on the Opposition side of the House.

MR. CASEY: I think that the majority of those who take the trouble to vote on a Bill of this character, the Scott Act, ought to be sufficient to ensure the carrying out of the Bill efficiently and reasonably. The argument in reference to the loss to be sustained by persons having investments in the trade is of no weight, except in favour of awarding some compensation, which is not the question now before us. As this is a Government Bill, the Government will, if they do not use their influence one way or the other, renounce their functions on a most important question. I must allude briefly to the attack made by the hon. member for East York upon the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross), for his alleged ungentlemanly and unparliamentary conduct in rising to speak before him. The hon. member for East York introduced the amendment at the last moment last night. He made what remarks he had to make.

MR. BOULTBEE: No, I did not.

MR. CASEY: I think so.

Several HON. MEMBERS: No, no. He did not speak.

MR. CASEY: Well my recollection was that he had spoken.

Several HON. MEMBERS: No, no.

MR. CASEY: Well, then, he made his motion without saying anything in support of it.

MR. BOULTBEE: I do not know whether it is parliamentary or not to have to sit here and listen to a man saying what is untrue.

Several HON. MEMBERS: Order, order.

MR. CASEY: I—

Several HON. MEMBERS: Order, order.

MR. CASEY: I speak to a point of Order.

MR. SPEAKER: What is the point raised?

MR. CASEY: I stated, in the first place, that the hon. gentleman had spoken to his motion when he introduced it, last night. I was under the impression that he had, but I have just admitted his own statement of the affair, and it is this admission and repetition of his own statement which he has characterised as entirely untrue. After the motion was made, the hon. member for Bruce (Mr. Blake) had moved the adjournment, and at the opening of the House to-day, the hon. the Minister of Customs had also spoken to the motion. In fact, the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross) had only continued a debate begun some time before, and for so doing he had been called "ungentlemanly." As a matter of fact, the hon. member for East York (Mr. Boulton) had no right to speak at all on the motion at this stage except by the courtesy of the House—a courtesy he had grossly abused, by making such an attack on another hon. member.

MR. PLUMB: I only rise to say a few words in reply to the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross), who called upon hon. gentlemen who had supported the Resolution of the hon. member for Lisgar, not to go back on their record, but to vote down the motion of the hon. member for East York (Mr. Boulton). The hon. gentleman did not however state the case, in that connection, precisely as it appears on record. I will, therefore, read the record in order that the hon. gentlemen, appealed to by the hon. member for West Middlesex, may see how far they are bound, and in order that they may in fact understand the nature of the appeal made to them by that hon. gentleman on the 4th of April 1877 (see Votes and Proceedings, page 236) from which the hon. member for West Middlesex has been apparently and hesitatingly quoting. It will be found that the hon. member for Lisgar moved:

"That in the opinion of this House, a Prohibitory Liquor Law is the only effectual remedy for the evil of intemperance, and that is the duty of the Government to submit such a measure for the approval of Parliament at the earliest moment practicable."

At that time the hon. member for West Middlesex strongly opposed the Resolution and offered the following amendment:—

That all the words after "that" in the original motion be expunged and the following substituted in lieu thereof:—
"Whereas, grave doubts exist whether under the provisions of the British North America Act, 1867, this House has the power to deal with the sale of intoxicating liquors as a beverage, and whereas the Court of Error and Appeal in the Province of Ontario has referred a case to the Supreme Court whereby the relative jurisdiction of the Provincial and Dominion Legislatures, in re the Liquor Traffic, will be argued, be it therefore resolved, that this House, while not receding from any previous declaration on the importance of a Prohibitory Liquor Law, deems it inexpedient, under these circumstances, at present to express any opinion regarding the action to be taken by the Government in dealing with this question."

This amendment was carried by 104 votes to 59, and the question on the Resolution of which it was an amendment was not therefore put at all. The names of the hon. gentlemen who voted against the amendment have been cited by the hon. member for West Middlesex, and the impression given by his remarks would be that they had voted affirmatively for a prohibitory liquor law. The 104 who voted for the amendment were the political friends of the mover; the 59 who voted against it were on this side of the House, then in Opposition. The hon. gentleman did me the honour to say that my name was among them. I therefore, thought it right to explain the matter, which clearly does not bear his interpretation. We voted in favour of temperance, but not in favour of the arbitrary measure now advocated. It is not a question in which we are bound to follow the hon. gentleman and his friends. I shall support the amendment of the hon. member for East York, and I shall not be deterred by the nonsensical and impertinent charge that, if I do so I must be an agent of the Licensed Victuallers' Association, directly made by the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) against every one who may support the Resolution of the hon. member for East York, and who, in the course of his ingenious remarks, has, as usual, managed to bring his argument to support conclusions exactly the reverse of what he was intending to support. He generally contrives to overshoot the mark, and score a point for his opponents. No man will go further than I in support of any measure which will fairly and squarely meet this case, and tend to assuage the fearful evils of intemperance; but I say, that any sumptuary legislation, of an arbitrary character, which may be forced upon the community by a bare majority of the voters who go the polls, representing, perhaps, a third or a fifth of the voters registered, will fail to command respect or obedience, and that it will have anything but a beneficial effect, from the fact that it has not the moral nor the numerical support of the community upon which it acts. The very fact of the hon. member for West Middlesex making such an appeal as we have just heard, shows that he has no confidence in the community, that he has no hold on the community. I certainly feel myself at a disadvantage in speaking on the temperance question of prohibition, against such an able advocate of that principle. But, Sir, I firmly believe that he has no evidence in the attitude of the people of the Dominion in respect to that question, and I say that the clearest, best possible test that can possibly be made of the sincerity of that hon. gentleman, and of those who act with him, is to insist upon this Resolution, and compel them to vote upon it. I shall vote for it without regard to any sneers about ulterior motives. It did not become the hon. member for West Elgin to lecture this House, and to say the Resolution was brought forward by a person who was the agent of the licensed victuallers.

Mr. CASEY : I never said he was the agent. I said the hon. gentleman made himself the mouthpiece of that association.

Mr. PLUMB : The hon. gentleman not only said that, but he stated the hon. member was the agent.

Mr. CASEY : If I said that, it was a slip of the tongue.

Mr. PLUMB : I hope the Resolution will receive the calm consideration of the House. Every hon. member has a right to take his own view on a question of this kind. Wherever forced measures have been tried, they have proved a miserable failure. In the State of Maine, there is a habitual violation of the law, which demoralises the people. In the town of Bangor, where it has its strongest advocates, the police are in such a position that they dare not report the violations, because, if they did so, they would lose their places. While I am willing that this experiment should be tried, I am not willing to have it tried in a way by which the minority, a handful of voters, will be able to coerce the whole community. The Resolution being a perfectly fair one, I trust it will meet with the support of the majority of this House.

Mr. HACKETT : I think the amendment is a perfectly reasonable one. In looking at the Act of 1878, I find that the 6th Clause states that the genuine signatures of at least one-fourth of the electors shall be deposited with the Sheriff before the proclamation can issue. We all know that the Dunkin Act has proved a perfect failure in those counties in Ontario in which it has been tried, and it has deprived municipalities of a large revenue during the time the Act was in force. Indeed, wherever it has been tried, it has only lasted a few months before the electors have turned out and voted for its repeal. I believe that nothing short of a Prohibiting liquor law will stop drinking in this country and if such a law was brought forward and provided for a compensation for all those engaged in the liquor traffic, I would prefer to support it. If this measure comes into force it will last for three years, and in that way be worse than the Dunkin Act, and I, therefore, hope the House will vote for this amendment.

MR. LONGLEY: This question, sprung upon the House, as I may say, in the last hours of the Session, is not, if the advocates of temperance can prevent it, to be passed in a single hour. I was not in Parliament when the Canada Temperance Act was passed, but I am familiar with the circumstances which led to the passage of that Act, and I beg to inform this House that the authors of that Act did not from the beginning contemplate the passage of a prohibitory Act, and therefore, in my estimation, my hon. friend from West Middlesex was quite consistent in opposing a motion in favour of prohibition, which he did not believe at that time, and which he does not believe now, was made in sincerity. It is a peculiarity, a marked characteristic of those gentlemen who have always stood opposed to the temperance movement, in which there is more of human happiness, and peace, and material prosperity bound up than in all the questions of the day, to work in this way against it. The temperance question is worth ten questions of National Policy, important as that may be, because if you had prohibition, pure and simple, you would challenge the exercise of the common sense of some of those who, in practice and precept, have stood opposed to the cause. Prohibition has been tried in some of the Provinces of the Dominion. I do not say it has had a fair trial, but it reached the stage in Nova Scotia that a strict prohibitory enactment was passed by the House of Assembly in 1855, by a majority of twenty-nine against nineteen, which was a pretty clear indication of the sentiment of the people of the Province at that time. Simultaneously, a prohibitory enactment was passed in New Brunswick, which, owing to a variety of combinations, unfavourable in their character, never accomplished what was expected of it by its friends. The sentiment of the temperance people of the whole Dominion had settled down to the belief that it was better to try something practicable than aim at once for prohibition, avowing, at the same time, that it was a settled conviction that, for the ultimate cure of inebriety, nothing less than prohibition would answer the purpose. Let us consider for a moment the scope and bearing of the amendment which has been proposed. I do not wish to impute unworthy motives to any hon. member of this House, and I say in the beginning, that I am willing to accord to every hon. gentleman who differs from me the same liberty that I claim for myself; but when hon. gentlemen undertake to advocate a cause, we naturally expect something in the form of argument, and we expect that the reasons they assign for opposing a good measure will be cogent reasons, for the course they have adopted. I have not yet heard such an argument in favour of the amendment. I am inclined to assume that, during the last twenty years, the minds of the people have not been more deeply stirred than they were by the vote in Nova Scotia in 1878, and the feeling of interest in regard to that Election was never more all-prevalent than at that time. What was the result? Under that state of public feeling we would naturally have supposed that almost every man would have gone to the polls and voted. Yet out of a total vote of 62,042 only 49,044 polled, or 82 per cent., or thereabouts, of the whole electoral vote. I assume, in regard to a question like the one under discussion, that the interest would not be as all-absorbing as it would be in reference to a question of a broader character with regard to which everyone might be supposed to feel an interest. Again, it is only fair to assume that the men who are actuated by interested—I will not say sordid—motives, would naturally make a greater effort to defend their interests than the temperance men, many of whom, I regret to say, are lukewarm or half-hearted in the cause, and can scarcely be depended upon in an emergency. The odds, therefore, are all in favour of those interested, directly and indirectly, in the traffic, and they would be more likely to poll a larger proportionate vote than the temperance men. Each would be at least upon equal terms, and I think it is fair to assume that the rum interest would be more stirred than those who have been labouring on behalf of teetotalism. I am inclined to think that the men who have been labouring in the cause of teetotalism for thirty-five or forty years, continually sacrificing their time, their comfort and their means, and during this long interval, having acquired a very extended and intimate acquaintance with the subject with which they were called upon to deal, are rather better prepared to form an opinion upon this question than the novices who are always ready to find fault, but who, neither by precept or practice, have lifted a hand to save the thousands of men going down to drunkards' graves, and from all the pains, penalties, sorrows, tears and woes which spring from the liquor traffic. I have heard hon. gentlemen talk about vested rights, and about the ruthlessness of men who would take away their property. What rights are there connected with a business which goes to sap the morality of the people and interferes with the industries of the country? What is the condition of the leading cities of the Mother Country—London, Liverpool, Glasgow, etc.? What unsexes fair women, embrutes and makes them shameless? It is the drink, and here, forsooth, we are asked to vote for an amendment which is not designed, as it is professed, to make the law operative, but is designed expressly to defeat the law, to strike such a blow at it that it cannot be brought into operation in one-eighth of the constituencies of the Dominion. It is not, in my judgment, with a view of backing up the law with a strong, moral sentiment and with numbers, but to prevent the law from going into operation. Hon. gentlemen tell us that this is a tyrannical law, but they have not established that allegation. What is more reasonable. I appeal to the unbiased opinion of every hon. gentleman in regard to a great moral question like this, in connection with which men's views and interests naturally clash, whether it is not safe to leave this question in the hands of the people. We are willing, when great issues come up from time to time, which divide the people, to accept the mere majority of votes polled; and such a principle as is sought to be introduced into this law is not to be found in our law, except in regard to certain local matters involving heavy taxation, where it is thought better, for the security of all, to have a two-thirds or three-fourths vote. It is an instance of the unfairness, or want of thought, or reason, of the advocates of this amendment, that they thus seek to introduce a new feature into our law. I was amused to hear the hon. gentleman who made himself so prominent respecting this amendment, refer to a certain Bill introduced into the Committee of Railways and Canals the other day, requiring a majority of all the stock-holders to be present and becoming assenting parties to any business transacted. Why was this? Were all those stock-holders on hand so that they were comeatable in one or two or three days? They might be spread all over the continent, and in England, and in other places, and, therefore, it was only deemed fair to all that there should be a majority present, but there is nothing in connection with this law analagous to that condition of things. For centuries past, we have had legislation acknowledging the dangerous character of the liquor traffic. We have sought to restrain and trammel it, and prevent just as many men as we could from getting a license—in other words for $20, $30, or $50, parties could purchase the privilege of ruining and bringing to poverty their neighbours. Who can deny it? Do we hear of a murder, or arson, or theft, or any crime in Canada? We hear of them frequently enough. The Judges of the land who should be supposed to be not only disinterested, but abundantly competent to form a fair and impartial opinion, testify that seven-eighths or nine-tenths of such crimes may be directly or indirectly traced to the liquor traffic. That is not the worst of it. If you wish to make a brute of a man, just create in him a thirst for intoxicating liquors, and he goes from one state of degradation to another, only to become an object of pity and loathsomeness to his nearest and most intimate friends. What other vice can do all that for a man. A man may be charitable and honest towards his neighbour, and be guilty of many imperfections and sins; but show me a drunkard, and he is everything that is contemptible, vile, and pitiable. What takes down to dishonour and premature death 4,000 persons in this Dominion annually? What costs us $16,000,000, at the lowest estimate, annually? Wipe out the liquor traffic, and in five years you will save money enough to build the Pacific Railway; and you will do more, you will save the morality of the people, and the energies of the people, the industry and capacity of a very considerable portion. Talk about liberty. If you want to see a slave, bring up the man who has the bottle in his hand half the time. It is the man who eschews the evils, and seeks by force of example to lead others away from that bad path, who can boast of his liberty. The moderate drinker will express pity for his weaker brother, and wonder that he is such a fool as to indulge to excess, and yet, in five years his own condition will be worse than that of his neighbour, whose weakness he laments and deplores. It cannot be denied that a considerable percentage of those who are not drunkards to-day, became such, in course of time, and often in a very short time, and it is incontrovertible that a certain large percentage of those who drink, after a course of years, drink deeper and deeper, until they lose all sense of shame. I have another objection to this amendment. In many of the counties during an Election at a certain season, one-third at least of the whole voters would be absent. Now, assuming there is even a measure of truth in this statement of our Free-trade friends, that thousands of our people, have gone to the States this year, what about them? The Election under this law would be lost. By the latest electoral list it would be seen that about one-tenth or one-fifth of the voters at the previous election would be out of the country so that, looking at it in any way you please, it is fruitless to put an amendment the avowed object of which is to carry the law into effect, but which would really defeat its purpose. For curiosity's sake, I would like to know how many teetotalers will vote for this amendment. They are the men who know best about the law, who are the best judges of its merits, and what would assist them. I do not want too claim to much for the temperance men, but I am assured that there is quite a large percentage of men who have been saved from drink, and the lowest depths of degradation, through our efforts. But for the efforts of the temperance men who are denounced on the right hand and on the left, we should have been a whole nation of drunkards. In 1875, the temperance men from the different sections of the Dominion met in Convention, and after days of careful discussion and consideration of the question of temperance and prohibition, it was settled that they should not ask for prohibition, pure and simple, feeling that possibly the country was not ripe for such a measure, and that they would, therefore, ask for a permissive measure, and try the effects of that, in the hope that it would steadily lead up to prohibition. Now I am not an admirer of the Canada Temperance Act. It is not by any means so stringent as the License Law we have in Nova Scotia, which has been in force for the last ten years. Let me say a few words about it. It is by the way, I fear, swept away by the recent decision of the Supreme Court. In Nova Scotia, for the last ten years, before a man could get a license to degrade, and make unhappy, and ruin his fellow-men, he had to get the consent of two-thirds of the voters of the polling district, and then had to go to the Grand Jury and get the recommendation of two-thirds of that body, and in the third stage had to go before the Court of Sessions, which had the power after all his pains of rejecting the prayer of his petition, and refusing his license. So through the instrumentality of that law, when vigorously enforced, as it was now and then, we find it easy to close up the grogeries in any given place, in a very short period. What is the testimony in reference to this matter. It is that with three or four energetic men, we can carry out the law. It has been asserted by some hon. members that the Maine Law has been a failure. Some persons, who I fear, are too fond of drinking themselves, state that more drinking occurs where the Maine Law has been adopted than elsewhere. The testimony of Judges, District-Attorneys, and the Chiefs of Police, and all the various classes who have the best chances of obtaining information in connection with the subject, shows the beneficial working of the law. In one place where there were 100 grogeries, three months after the passage of the Maine Law there was not one selling liquor openly, and very few who were selling secretly; and with reference to the number in the state prisons and asylums, and in regard to the cost of maintaining this worthless part of the community, the testimony has been surprisingly in favour of the operation and effects of the Maine Law. I might say much more on this subject, were the Session not so advanced, but I want specially to impress on the mind of every intelligent gentleman this fact: that we are paying an immense sum of money, directly, for the privilege of perpetuating the drink traffic which destroys the lives and happiness of the people, and blasts the prospects, in the case of many a man, both for time and eternity. $16,000,000, at the lowest estimate, is the amount spent on this liquor traffic; some put it as high as $20,000,000—that is, the first cost. But what is the cost when retailed by the glass? In fact it is manufactured ad infinitum, the quantity first imported is multiplied ten-fold. Another thing not unworthy the attention of every man who would not run the risk of his life is, that a large portion of what every person drinks, who indulges in intoxicating liquors, is little short of absolute poison. The man who drinks intoxicating liquors thus runs the hazard of his life. There was a time when men were less injured than now, when liquors were said to be good, and I believe that was true in a large measure. But it is equally true that a skilled wine merchant or liquor dealer can imitate any sort of liquor he pleases, in such a way that he may deceive the greatest connoisseur. Many incidents might be brought forward to illustrate the character of the liquors that are in use, and the dishonest and debasing devices that are resorted to with a view of perpetuating this traffic. I want to know if this business were like any other business why is it that we need to restrain it? The moment you seek to restrain it, you admit that it is an evil, that it is like an adder, or a serpent, in its dangerous character. There are awful warnings in the Bible in regard to this. We are told: "Look not upon the wine when it is red, when it giveth its colour in the cup, for at the last it biteth like a serpent and stingeth like an adder. Who hath woe; who hath sorrow; who hath contention; who hath redness of eyes; who hath wounds without cause." Are there any here who can testify? Mr. Speaker, there is always some consolation in adversity. When one has been engaged for thirty or forty years in arduous toil for a cause which he believes essential to man's present and future good, and sees that things are going wrong, and is apprehensive that the tide is turning against him, there are a few facts from which he may draw consolation. Who are the men who are in favour of this reform? Who are they who have sought for years to save their fellow men from intemperance? Do they not include the best men of the country? I am glad to say that we find the clergy of all sects and denominations—perhaps I may say seven-eighths of them—in favour of total abstinence and prohibition. These men not only preach but they practice. What we complain of is that our friends opposite preach a good deal and practice precious little. Now, it may be an extreme view to take, but I hold there are cases in which a moderate drinker is worse than a drunkard.

Mr. WHITE (East Hastings): Do not look at me.

Mr. LONGLEY: I refer, of course, to the force of example. If there is a poor, despised drunkard, imbecile, his clothing in rags, who tumbles about the streets, men do not point to him as a justification for their drinking. He is looked upon in the light of a warning. But if you find a very respectable man, who can drink or let it alone as he pleases, who, perhaps, only drinks once a week or once a month, that man is at once referred to as a justification for deeper drinking on the part of another; so that, in the light of example, the influence of the moderate drinker is worse than that of the drunkard. It is not denied that 4,000, at least, out of a population of 4,000,000, annually die drunkards. These were once moderate drinkers, from whose ranks the inebriates were recruited. There are professed friends of temperance on the other side, who would have us believe they are heart and hand with us. We know they are not. I am not disposed to censure unduly, I hope the Ministry, but I have felt a shade of disappointment that there was not brought to bear upon the promoters of this enterprise that sort of influence which a Government, backed by eighty majority, can always bring. I know the delicacy of the position of the Government, but still I would have preferred that they had thrown their influence in the right scale. I will make no predictions, but it seems to me that it must come to this: that, no matter how wide are the differences that separate men in regard to politics, the day is not far distant when men, who have taken an interest in the temperance reform and believe it transcends in importance all other schemes for the promotion of the welfare of our people, will inevitably be drawn together, and the issue will be brought before the people at the polls before we are a score of years older. If we could relieve our country from this great burden, if we could relieve it from the attendant taxes, the attendant miseries in connection with the liquor traffic, then we would be happy, virtuous, and free. I trust the amendment will be voted down, as it should be, and that a measure, designed to promote sobriety and public virtue, may not be marred by the insidious proposal which I have sought, in conjunction with others, to oppose.

MR. WHITE (Cardwell): I would certainly not intrude myself upon the attention of the House at this period of the Session, were it not that I cannot give a silent vote upon the motion. It appears to me the hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Longley), has forgotten that the question before the House is not whether teetotalism is a good or bad principle, but whether this particular amendment will be an advantage in the working of this law or otherwise. I was glad to hear the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross), who is an authority on this subject, and the hon. member for Annapolis, say they were not in favour of a prohibitory liquor law, because they do not believe the public sentiment of this country is far enough advanced to justify the enactment of such a law. I can remember when I was defeated for Parliament six years ago, for expressing precisely those views and when, in my first contest for Montreal, I had the whole Temperance Electoral Association against me because, when they called upon me, I told them frankly that, while I would do all I could to promote temperance in the use of intoxicating liquors, I did not believe public opinion in this country was ripe for a prohibitory liquor law, and consequently that I would never vote for a law which I did not believe would be for the advantage of the people at the time it was passed. Now, what is the proposition made to us to-night? We have had a local option law in this country for a great number of years. It has been adopted in almost half the counties of Ontario, and in a great many counties in Quebec. What has been the experience in relation to the working of this law in those counties? It has not brought about those results which the hon. member for Annapolis so eloquently described as desirable. It has not stopped the use of intoxicating liquors; it has simply produced Free-trade in liquors of the worst description. So apparent has that been, that, in almost every county where the local option law has been adopted, its practical operation during a few months led the people who adopted it to reverse their decision and repeal the law within a year, or at most two years, after its adoption. No one, I think, will venture to say that, if the mere adoption of this law in any county had the effect of stopping the sale and use of intoxicating liquors, and of producing those results which were described to us by the hon. member for Annapolis, we should by all means have that law. But experience has not pointed in that direction, particularly as regards the local option law in the Province of Ontario. Why? Simply because, as it seems to me, unless you have a very strong public sentiment in favour of a law of this kind, it cannot succeed. I do not mean that kind of public sentiment which is exhibited by a mere majority of persons who are brought up to vote—I do not mean that kind of feeling which is promoted by momentary excitement, aroused by the kind of weapons which are used on those occasions, and I think properly used, by those who are sincere and earnest in their advocacy of this question, nor do I know the kind of feeling that is promoted in that way—but I mean that, unless you have a strong sentiment on the part of an actual majority of persons, and such as this amendment would render necessary, the result of the passage of such a law would be simply to stop the licensed sale of intoxicating liquors, but nevertheless would not prevent them from being sold. That being the case, I believe it is not in the interest of temperance itself that this law should come into operation in counties where there is not such a strong and overwhelming sentiment in its favour, as would justify the belief that it would be enforced. Now, I do not believe a mere majority vote—that is, a majority of those going to the polls—is an evidence of that feeling. The hon. gentleman from Annapolis has told us that, in Nova Scotia, where they have a License Law which he says is much better than this, a license can only be granted upon the consent of two-thirds of all the voters upon the electoral list. That is substantially the principle sought to be enforced by the amendment proposed, except that it is carried much further; and I cannot see the distinction in principle which is sought to be drawn between requiring an arbitrary number to permit the granting of a license, and the refusal of a license. I repeat that, if I believed it possible, by the adoption of the Scott Act by a mere majority vote in any county, to stop the use of intoxicating liquors, I would heartily support it. I am a total abstainer, and to the extent of my personal influence and example, I do what I can to enforce that principle. I am as deeply impressed with the evils of intemperance as the most ardent of those who are opposing this amendment. I have always supported, as a journalist, the adoption of local option laws wherever they have been proposed, and where my influence could be felt; but a careful study of this question, a study extending over thirty years, during which I have been familiar with all the phases of the temperance movement, convinces me that the drinking habits of the people cannot be prevented by the passage of a mere incidental majority of a by-law, prohibiting the retailing of intoxicating liquors within particular localities. The failure of such laws in the past has tended to injure the temperance movement. Nothing but an overwhelming temperance sentiment will enable the law to be enforced, and it is in this conviction that I vote for the amendment now proposed.

MR. HUNTINGTON: I simply want to make one observation. It has been made before, and it appears to me it is an observation which should impress itself upon the memory of the hon. gentleman who has moved this amendment. The Act is upon its trial, and I ask the hon. gentleman to let it alone for a little while. It appears to me that the passage of this amendment will be a repudiation of the law which we recently passed, at the request of a great many people in this country, before they have had time to verify their views, as to whether that Act may be efficient or not.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: The difficulty I have experienced in this matter is simply this: We know, and the country understands perfectly well, that from 1873 to 1878, the country was stirred from one end to the other as to the best measure that could be adopted for the suppression of intemperance. It culminated in the passage by this Parliament of an Act that appeared to be accepted by both sides of the House. That Act was passed in 1878, and the first election that took place under its provisions was in the city of Fredericton. It was put in force, and its constitutionality was at once questioned. The result has been that, though the Act has been in force practically since 1878, no opportunity has been given by which we have been able to test it, as has been the case with the Dunkin Act. I hope we shall have an opportunity of ascertaining whether the Act may prove effective, and with that view I should be sorry if the amendment of the hon. member for East York became law. As one who has proposed to this House a measure, which I believe is calculated to give employment to the people, and make the masses happier and place them in a better condition, I naturally desire to see followed up a proposition that, while their earnings are increased, will save them from temptation. Therefore, I, for one, will feel myself called upon to vote against the amendment of the hon. member for East York.

MR. BRECKEN: I, myself, agree with the principle of the amendment proposed by the hon. member for East York, but I cannot vote for it for the reason that Prince Edward Island occupies a peculiar position. We would have no means of ascertaining, under our present system of conducting elections, whether a majority of the electors had voted yea or nay on that question. A large number of the people of the Island are in favour of the measure as it stands, and, therefore, I cannot support the amendment.

MR. GILLMOR: I am quite satisfied, from present appearances, that hon. members are not disposed to listen to a speech from any hon. member on the question now under discussion. If they will give me a hearing for five minutes, I promise not to trespass longer on their patience.

I agree with the hon. the Minister of Finance, as regards the effects of this amendment, on the Temperance Act. But it was quite unnecessary for him to introduce any reference to his famous National Policy. I am not an enthusiast on the question of prohibition; my experience in New Brunswick, on that question, has been such as to cause me to be cautious. But hon. members must know that those who agitate and labour in this cause of total abstinence are doing so for the purpose of educating public opinion up to their standard. Their efforts, after years of labour, has resulted in bringing public opinion to a point sufficient to cause this Legislature to pass the Temperance Act, now on the Statute-book. It has taken two years to establish the constitutionality of the law. After this decision, I think it unwise and unfair to attempt to destroy the Act, by attaching this amendment. Whether the law will, or will not, meet the object of its promoters, can only be decided by giving it a fair trial. If this amendment is carried, it will have the effect of rendering the Bill inoperative, and it might as well be repealed. It is better for all parties that this law should now have a fair trial, if not, there will be great dissatisfaction, and social discord is sure to follow. The law has already been adopted by six populous counties in New Brunswick, the votes polled were not numerous, but the majority in favour of its adoption was four or five to one. There is no denying the fact that, whether the law can be worked successfully or not, so far as public opinion has been expressed, both in and out of Parliament, that a large majority of the people want to try it, and the better course will be, to let it go to the country untrammelled by this amendment.

Motion made :

That the said Bill be now read the third time.—(Mr. Bowell.)

Motion in amendment made and question proposed :

That the Bill be not now read the third time, but that it be re-committed to a Committee of the Whole, with instructions that they have power to amend it by inserting the following Clause :—

“The 57th Section of the said, The Canada Temperance Act, 1878, is hereby repealed, and the following Clause substituted therefor :—If the majority of all the voters, whose names are entered on the Voters' Lists, used at such polling, vote for the Petition, the same shall be held to have been adopted, but not otherwise, and the Returning Officer shall make his return to the Governor-General in Council accordingly.”

Motion resolved in the affirmative.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, and reported the Bill as amended.

Question proposed on the third reading of the Bill.

MR. ROSS (West Middlesex): I move in amendment that the Bill be not now read the third time, but that it be read the third time this day three months. I think the House will, on reconsideration of the subject, deal summarily with the amendment just carried, and it is for this reason that I now propose the present amendment.

MR. BLAKE: I think the amendment of the hon. member for East York (Mr. Boulton) destructive of the Bill, and, therefore, I shall vote for the three months' hoist.

MR. ANGLIN: The Bill is based upon the assumption that a majority of the people, in any particular district, shall be able to put the Act in operation. Those who look at this question from a reasonable and sensible point of view, will see that the Bill, as it stands, is fair and proper. I am not a prohibitionist: I am entirely opposed to prohibition; but I believe the Bill, as now amended by the amendment of the hon. member for East York (Mr. Boulton), will work most beneficially and reasonably.

MR. McCUAIG: I have been nearly half a century a member of the Total Abstinence Society, and have taken an active part in the temperance movement. After a year and a-half's experience of the Dunkin Act in my own county, I have come to the conclusion that it is an absolute failure. The consumption of intoxicating drinks has been far more than before. In the town of Picton, where I reside, there are 40 places where whiskey is sold. I am sorry to find this as a result of legislation; but it is true, and I shall vote for the amendment of the hon. member for East York (Mr. Boulton). We cannot legislate so as to make men sober, so long as adjoining counties sell liquors, and so long as we derive very large revenues from that source. I feel bound to say that I look upon all legislation in the way of restraining the sale and consumption of alcoholic liquors as a failure.

Motion resolved in the negative.

Bill read the third time and passed.

PETROLEUM INSPECTION ACT AMENDMENT BILL.—[BILL 123.]

(Mr. Baby.)

SECOND AND THIRD READINGS.

Order for second reading read.

MR. BLAKE: Are there any other material changes in the Bill, beyond those discussed, with regard to the alteration of tests?

MR. BABY: No; the only changes are those I have indicated as to the fire test. In order to make the Canadian oil of better quality, the fire test is raised from 105° to 115°. Then the responsibility of the inspection of petroleum is transferred from the officer to the trader and the retailer, in order to ascertain if it is actually what it is represented to be in the packages. Then, instead of gauging the packages, as under the old law, which was very inconvenient both to importers and retailers, their weight is to be taken. I think it is a step in the right direction. It is well-known there is a difference between American and Canadian oils of between five and seven degrees. The reason we have established such a high fire test is to prevent explosions; to secure that a proper quality of oil is brought into the market. In every country where petroleum is in use, a fire test is applied to see that the oil does not contain those explosive matters which endanger life and property. Under this law the same instruments will be used by all the officers, so that the inspection will be uniform. Should any misunderstanding arise between the officer, the importer, the refiner, or the retailer, the matter will be settled at the central office.

MR. SCRIVER: I understood the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue to say that it was admitted on all hands that there was ground for discrimination against the American oil in the fire test. I believe the hon. member for Stanstead assumed that there was no ground for discrimination between American and Canadian oil, and in that I fully agree with him. The result of all the experiments I saw, and I believe they were quite fair, were not such as to lead me to believe that any ground for this discrimination exists. I regret that the hon. Minister, for reasons which are, no doubt, sufficient to himself, has been induced to raise the test on American oil from the degree proposed by the hon. member for Stanstead, 115°, to 120°. If the hon. Minister had been willing to accept the former as a proper fire test for American oil, it would have permitted many of us living on the frontier to import and make use of a grade of American oil, which we have been in the habit of using for some time past, and which has been productive of no accident. A difference of five degrees will shut us out from the use of that particular grade of oil, and will inflict an injury upon those of us who prefer to use American oil. I believe this action will have the result of affording, in an indirect way, to Canadian refiners and producers, an addition to the Protection they already enjoy, and which, I think, was already sufficient to satisfy all reasonable people.

MR. BABY: According to the tests we have made, there is certainly reason for making a difference in the fire tests of American and Canadian oils. We took very great care to have reliable experiments. We engaged for that purpose very good men from the other side of the line, who were themselves inspectors. The test, as it stands now, does not exclude American oil. The oil the hon. gentleman alludes to is much above 115°, it is 125°. That is Downer's oil, in Boston, and is the one which the Eastern Townships people use. The Department have been in close relations with that house in Boston, and the latter are perfectly satisfied with the test as it appears in the Bill. This test will not exclude that oil, nor will it exclude any good American oil. It may exclude those oils which contain dangerous explosive materials. In raising the gravity and the fire test of Canadian oil, we hope to secure a better quality of oil for our market, and one which will not explode.

MR. WRIGHT: I have been in the habit of getting from New York an oil called the astral oil, which gives an exceedingly agreeable light. Last fall I ordered this oil as usual, and found that it did not meet the test laid down by the regulations. I went to the Customs house to enquire why this fine oil, that I had used for ten years without accident, had been, all at once, found to be so very dangerous, and if it was so to send it back to New York. I wished to know who this special chemist was that had pronounced this oil dangerous. I was ushered into a room in which there were many retorts, and I found there a gentleman, who had been previously connected with the Post Office Department, who applied the test. I found it rather strange that a man who, to my certain knowledge, possessed no special skill in chemistry, should be engaged in that class of operations. I said to that gentleman: "What special knowledge have you in this matter?" "O," said he, "we are furnished with a book, and we are furnished with these retorts." I said:

"Given the books and the retorts, where is the chemist who is to apply this knowledge?" He looked at me carefully, and silently pointed to the retorts. The whole was like a scene in the famous play of the Alchemist. I retired a sadder and wiser man. My oil had to be sent back to New York, as not having stood the requirements of the law in the judgment of the chemist, and after a certain time a different kind of oil came in return, more expensive than that which had been sent back.

MR. COLBY: The remarks of the hon. gentleman are quite in point. Under the law, as it stood last year, under the 130° fire test, Pratt's astral oil, which diffuses such a beautiful radiance, was excluded. As a matter of necessity, a higher grade of oil, a special oil by the same manufacturer, had to be imported, in order to meet the requirements of the law. The oil which my hon. friend had previously used, stood the burning test at 150° or the flash test of 130°. The oil which he subsequently purchased from the same manufacturer, cost him three or four cents a gallon more than the other, and was an inferior illuminating oil. I am assured, by a gentleman from New York, an oil inspector of fifteen years experience, that the 150° burning test oil, the standard white oil, will still come in under the 120° test, so that my hon. friend will not be subjected, in the future, to the annoyance he has experienced. The oils in the United States, I believe, are classified into three or four grades. There is an ordinary export oil standing a burning test of 110°, which is used in England and other foreign countries. I think it is an inflammable and dangerous oil, and never could be admitted into Canada under the old fire test of 105°. There is another test of superior oil standing the burning test of 150°, and comparing in its quality with Pratt's astral oil. The superior classes of illuminating oils, and perhaps the most profitable in the interest of the consumer, are not excluded by the proposed flash test of 120°. Now, I have not, in the slightest degree, changed my view with regard to the comparative safety of the two oils. I believe the American oil and the Canadian oil, standing the same fire test, are, intrinsically, equally safe. The use of the pyrometer is to detect the presence of gasoline, benzine, naphtha and several other inflammable substances. If, at a test of 110° the flash is not discovered, then these substances are not present in dangerous quantities; consequently, I believe the one oil is as safe the other. There may be a very slight difference between them, as many practical men insist that a portion of gasoline may be held in suspense, mechanically associated with paraffine. But as the hon. Minister has carefully investigated this question, and shows a disposition to meet the reasonable views of hon. members, I am not disposed to press the matter upon a theoretical point. But, as I stated to the House last evening, should I find myself mistaken in this matter, that practical inconvenience is resulting, that we are in any way compelled to purchase a class of special oils, I shall return to this subject next Session with more earnestness and determination to get justice done, than I have this Session. Upon the whole, observing that the hon. Minister has incorporated many excellent features in this Bill, particularly that with reference to the inspection of petroleum, I shall give it my support. One, at first, can hardly understand why the cost of inspection of Canadian oil should be 10c. a barrel, and the cost of inspection of American oil 30c. a barrel. The discrimination is, perhaps, too large, but the reason of it is that Canadian oil is inspected in large quantities. I understand that the hon. Minister desires to make this branch of the service self-sustaining. He desires to derive a sufficient amount of revenue from this source to cover the cost to which the Department is subjected, and he believes the additional cost will provide for a more thorough inspection in the future. Under these circumstances, while the matter might have been more satisfactorily adjusted, I am not disposed to object to that provision, being satisfied that the disposition of the hon. member is to meet the wishes of the House and the country, and being satisfied with the general excellence of the Bill as a whole.

Bill read the second time, considered in Committee of the Whole, reported, read the third time and passed.

SUPPLY—CONCURRENCE.

Resolutions reported from Committee of Supply further considered.

Resolutions 230, 252 to 259, and 261 (May 3rd) read the second time and agreed to.

On Resolution 276, amount required to provide for contingent expenses of the High Commissioner of Canada in London, $4,000,

MR. BLAKE: I think the proposal to pay $14,000 in all to the High Commissioner of Canada is excessive. I do not think that expenditure is commensurate with the resources of the country. The American Minister, at the Court of St. James, only receives $17,500, and the proposal to pay our London Agent $14,000 seems to me to be entirely disproportionate. I move in amendment:

That the said Resolution be not concurred in, but that it be resolved, That the proposal to pay the London Agent $10,000 a year for salary, and in addition $4,000 a year for rent for a dwelling house and allowances, in all, $14,000, is excessive.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: It was stated very clearly and distinctly, I think, that this arrangement is calculated to save a very large sum of money to the Dominion. With regard to this vote I would say the Lieutenant-Governor of Ontario has a salary of $10,000 a year, and he has his house-rent, fuel and various other contingencies, amounting to far in excess of $4,000 allowed him. I think it could scarcely be expected that the representative of the people of Canada, living in London, should not receive something like an equivalent to the sum appropriated for the expenses and salary of the Lieutenant-Governor of Ontario.

MR. BLAKE: I am not disposed to admit that he is worth twice as much as you are.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: That is no test at all, because we are supposed to be here on patriotic principles, and not from mercenary considerations. When I state what is a fact, that some managers of banking institutions receive $20,000 to $25,000 a year, I think the amount proposed to be voted is comparatively small. I think the House will not sustain my hon. friends proposition.

Motion resolved in the negative.

Resolution read the second time and agreed to.

Resolutions 277 to 317 read the second time and agreed to.

On Resolution 318, Cow bay—To pay Messrs. Archibald and Company, for work executed in 1876, $5,974.30.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT: I should like to know on what principle this is now brought forward after the expiration of four years. To the best of my recollection, this work was purchased from these gentlemen at a large price three or four years ago, and, unless I am greatly mistaken, this is an old claim which was presented and adjudicated upon by the late Government, and found to be unreasonable.

MR. LANGEVIN: This claim was under the consideration of the Government three years ago. The work was purchased by the hon. gentlemen opposite in 1875, and in 1876 a storm damaged the works, and Mr. Archibald, fearing that they would be carried away, and in order to protect the Government property, and his own property, expended $5,974. Reports were made at different times by the engineer, Mr. Perley, who stated that the work was necessary, and that if it had not been done, the Government property would have been in danger of destruction. Mr. Tomlinson, the engineer of the Department of Marine and Fisheries, also reported in August last year, that the work done by Mr. Archibald, though prompted by anxiety to preserve his own works from injury, was of the utmost service in preventing serious damage to the Government property, and that he considered the items correct, and the charges proper. On the strength of those reports, the Government decided to ask Parliament for this vote.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY.

MR. MACKENZIE: Wherever any claim has been adjudicated upon by the late Government, and disposed of against the interests of the claimants, the present Government appear always prepared to take it up and pay it. If I recollect right, this is the twentieth instance of that character, and I think it would be interesting to make up a list of those claims and the reasons for their payment. Mr. Archibald believed he had a right to enter upon our works and make additions to consult his own views of its strength without consulting the Government. That those additions made the work better there is no doubt, but Mr. Tomlinson is not warranted in saying that our pier would have given way if that work had not been done. They went to work and expended money where we did not intend to spend any, and I refused to entertain the claim. The reasons why the hon. gentleman has entertained it are not to my mind sufficient. True hon. gentlemen opposite have gained a supporter and I have lost one, for Mr. Archibald avowed his intention to oppose the Government at the last General Election because we refused to pay his claim for those repairs. It is rather hard that the late Government should have lost this very independent supporter because of their adherence to the public interests, and that hon. gentlemen opposite should pay him $6,000 in order to gain his support. There is no ground whatever for the claim.

Resolution read the second time and agreed to.

Resolutions 319 to 335 read the second time and agreed to.

On Resolution 336, Welland Canal—amount required for repairs at Port Maitland, $25,000,

MR. McLENNAN said: Before this item is passed, I wish to say a word on the subject of the Welland Canal and the St. Lawrence route. With respect to the canal, my own impression is, that more can be said than that the present works should be completed. I believe they are all under contract, and, when they are completed, the country can afford to wait for results. I believe, however, that no reliable estimate is yet before the country, upon which the cost of getting 12 ft. of water, from Kingston to Montreal can be judged; and I believe further, that no expenditure in that direction would bring a commensurate return. In my opinion, no measurable expenditure upon the St. Lawrence Canals will make the transport of the great staple produce of the country appreciably cheaper.

MR. CASEY: Is it in order, Mr. Speaker, to discuss the general canal policy at this time?

MR. SPEAKER: I do not wish to stop the hon. gentleman, but I think it is not quite in order to discuss the general policy relating to canals now. Port Maitland pier is now under consideration.

MR. McLENNAN: Then I bow to the ruling of the Chair.

Resolution 337 read the second time and agreed to.

WAYS AND MEANS.

House again resolved itself into Committee of Ways and Means.

(In the Committee.)

1. Resolved, That towards making good the Supply granted to Her Majesty for the financial year ending 30th June, 1880, the sum of $1,712,346.55 be granted out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada.—(Sir Samuel L. Tilley.)

2. Resolved, That towards making good the Supply granted to Her Majesty for the financial year ending 30th June, 1881, the sum of $23,301,208.76 be granted out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada.—(Sir Samuel L. Tilley.)

MR. BLAKE: This vote, I presume, will include the Canada Central subsidy?

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: Yes.

MR. BLAKE: The hon. gentleman knows that there has been an error in this matter; that he has taken something like $800,000 or $900,000, when all he will really want is the interest for the next financial year for that amount.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: That is probable. It is just possible that, instead of taking the vote for the larger amount, $35,000 for the year may be appropriated.

MR. BLAKE: It is just certain.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: It would not be right, when it appears an error has been committed, to propose a vote which is not intended to be taken, and embrace it in the Ways and Means in Supply. The amount ought to be reduced in Ways and Means accordingly. But it is like other appropriations, though taken, not necessarily expended.

MR. BLAKE: Is it understood, then, that the Finance Minister will make it plain that only the small amount is to be voted?

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: We will arrange that.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT: It is desirable that the Minister of Railways should understand, distinctly, that this vote is not the same vote as the Estimates.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: I think the hon. gentleman had better explain why he, when Finance Minister, for the first time, introduced a statement in the Estimates, such as had never appeared before.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT: What statement?

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: A statement to which I drew before the hon. gentleman's attention, in which he gave no column, though one had always been given before, and has been since, showing the amount of appropriations in that Estimate chargeable to the Consolidated Fund. In the Estimates for 1874-5, he mixed up Capital Expenditure and Expenditure chargeable to Income. From his Supply Bill, in that and other years, I can prove that he took Estimates for Expenditure, chargeable to Revenue, apart from Capital Expenditure, of over $26,000,000 and $27,000,000. Over $27,000,000 was taken for 1874-5. I can establish that point from the Supply Bill of the hon. gentleman, just as easily as from his Estimates. The reason for producing his Estimates in a form never before or since submitted to the House, which I have given, he has never been able to meet; he took out of the Appropriations, chargeable to Capital, $500,000, and put it in the Public Accounts, chargeable, to Revenue, for the purpose of swelling abnormally, the ordinary expenditure of 1873-4, which he hoped to be able, for all time, to charge against the expenditure of his predecessors.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT: I confess I am very much puzzled to know what the hon. gentleman means. The total amount of the Estimates for 1874-5, brought down by me, amounted to $24,803,285.10. Now, $26,168,000 was the exact amount brought down in the Supply Bill for 1874, in the Statutes. The member for Cardwell (Mr. White) had the honesty, when his mistake on the subject was exposed by my hon. friend behind me (Mr. Anglin), to say candidly and frankly that he did not know the difference. He withdrew the statement in the report in the Montreal Gazette, although, undoubtedly, he allowed the mistake to appear in the Hansard, for reasons he stated in the House. But the hon. member for Cumberland had not the honesty and the frankness to admit he was ignorant of the difference between the Supply Bill and the Estimates. So the financial critic of the late Opposition, who had criticised the financial policy of the late Government for five years, in every form and shape, had not mastered the very pons asinorum of the financial discussions carried on in the House; he did not understand the very simplest elements of the mode in which Supply and Estimates are brought down in the House, and had not the honesty to admit he was grossly mistaken. He ought to have known that, in 1874, I brought down two Estimates, the original and the supplemental, the total amount being precisely $24,803,285. I hope the hon. the Minister of Finance will explain to his colleague in the future, and for all time to come, that the Supply Bill and the Estimates are two totally distinct things—that in the Supply Bill is not included a single item authorised by Statute, while it includes all the items chargeable ordinarily to Capital. It was not creditable to the hon. the Minister of Railways that he should have attempted to get out of the plain and obvious meaning of his own words, and which admit of no possible construction, except what I have placed upon them, by attempting to bring in the Estimates brought down in the Session of 1875, and which had nothing whatever to do with the first Estimates, to which the hon. gentleman in the very page from which I have read distinctly alluded.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: The hon. gentleman (Sir Richard J. Cartwright) finds it convenient to go off upon a side issue, leaving the main question in controversy untouched. I quite admit that I have recently paid no attention to those discussions with regard to finance knowing this matter could be very safely left to the hon. the Minister of Finance, and being entirely occupied with other matters, myself. When rising on the spot at the moment to answer the hon. gentleman, I took the figures $26,000,000 from the Supply Bill. But all that I required to make the statement accurate was to use the word "Statutes" instead of "Statute." I will find in the Statutes of 1874-5, the votes brought down in his Estimate, put into the Supply Bill, and voted chargeable to Revenue, a sum between $26,000,000 and $27,000,000. That was just the question.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT : No.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER : That is the question. They were charging my hon. friend with bringing in an extravagant Estimate. That was the issue. My answer to the hon. gentleman was that he ought to be the last man in the world to make this Estimate an extravagant one, at a time when my hon. friend is obliged to provide for $1,600,000 for Interest and Sinking Fund, over and above what he had to provide for in 1874. The Statutes show every dollar in the Supply Bill, chargeable to Income. I think it is hardly worthy the hon. gentleman to seize captiously upon an expression of that kind, and deliberately say to me across the floor of this House, that I do not know the difference between the Estimates and a Supply Bill. I think the hon. gentleman would not like to be treated in the same way from this side of the House. I would not wish to treat him so, because I am not obliged to go beyond a fair and honest criticism in order to give the hon. gentleman quite as much as he finds it convenient to deal with.

SUPPLY BILL.

(Sir Samuel L. Tilley.)

FIRST READING.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY introduced a Bill (No. 126) For granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money required for defraying certain expenses of the Public Service for the financial years ending respectively the 30th June, 1880, and the 30th June, 1881, and for other purposes relating to the Public Service.

Bill read the first time.

BANKING ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

[BILL 115.]

(Sir Samuel L. Tilley.)

SECOND READING.

Order for second reading read.

MR. DOMVILLE : This is a matter of great importance, and is one that should be thoroughly considered before it is laid before the country. I think it might be well to consider the question of merely extending the charters for one or two years, in order to get rid of the difficulty of the maturity of the charters. I am of opinion that the bank circulation should be taken up by the Government. If there is any profit to be made by the circulation, that profit should be made by the Government. I am opposed to the circulation being made a first lien on the bank, believing that immediately upon unfavourable rumours being circulated about a bank, the depositors would immediately convert their deposits into notes. Banks depart from their legitimate business when they take liens on different kinds of products or goods. It was never intended, in the history of banking, that banks should enjoy that monopoly. Banks have a right to buy and sell exchange. They have a right to deal in gold and public securities, but they have no right to deal in other articles of a miscellaneous character. I would ask the hon. the Finance Minister, if this Bill has not gone too far, and seeing that we are at the close of the Session, to let the Bill stand over till next Session, and we shall have time before then to fully think it over.

MR. GUTHRIE : There is no doubt that the Bill touches matters of the utmost importance, and it ought to be referred to the Committee on Banking and Commerce. It touches not only the question of banking, but the rights of property very seriously. The warehousing clauses are proposed to be so extended as to open the door to wholesale fraud. It is well-known by legal men that the Ontario Courts do not view with much favour the power which banks have of obtaining security for money by way of warehouse receipts. It is a violation of chattel mortgage law, which requires that a mortgage of a chattel, in order to be valid, shall be registered. The giving of these warehouse receipts is a purely private transaction, a sort of secret security, and the system is not to be viewed with favour; at all events, it is to be looked upon very jealously. It is proposed to authorise any person to give a warehouse receipt. Under the old law, and under the Bill, before it was corrected, the power was conferred to a miller, or one or two other businesses. It is proposed now to make valid any receipt given by any person or any company for any goods, wares or merchandise in possession of the bailee or bailees, so that all a merchant has to do is to get a brother merchant to take part of his stock and issue a warehouse receipt. The public know nothing about the affair, and it will give a valid title to the goods under the receipt. Before such a sweeping change is made it should be fully considered. It is also proposed to give the banks power to take security for any debt, whether due, matured or maturing, or for any liability of a person endorsing a note, or a person secondary liable. Under the old law it could only be done for a bill or note discounted at the time. That clause, the 47th, is taken out altogether; it provided that no bill of lading or warehouse receipt should be a valid security for a bill or note unless given at the time. The Act also purposes to give the banks a lien upon their stock against all obligations of the owner of that stock. The hon. gentleman who spoke before me dealt with one or two other points; but viewing the Bill from the point of view as a lawyer, I think these changes, before being made, should be well discussed before the House.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: I do not know that the hon. member for Kings (Mr. Domville) should take exception to the bank statements being required to be signed by the president before the manager. There has been too great a disposition for the presidents to shelter themselves behind the manager. The president is supposed to know as much as the manager, and it was thought better that the chief accountant should make the statement as proposed in this Bill. I was led to alter the provision respecting warehouse receipts, from the fact that the tendency has been to afford facilities to the trade of the country by permitting banks to make advances on lumber, grain and cereals of various kinds, and to pork packers and various other industries, the means of the people being limited, and a man's credit depending upon his character to a certain extent. It is important to a business, having character and reputation, that the old Bill should be extended by the provisions of the new Bill, to enable them to obtain advances on goods when they have limited capital. It will be seen, after careful consideration, that the term "bailee" will obviate the other difficulty raised by my hon. friend. While it has been the desire of the Government to give facilities for increasing our commerce and manufacturing industries, we have been very anxious to guard against anything which might place innocent parties in a false position. If we go into Committee we can fully discuss these various clauses.

MR. DOMVILLE: I would like to point out an error that has crept in—I have no doubt inadvertently. The hon. the Finance Minister said that the practice of the cashier signing statements before the president, had been reversed, because, hitherto, presidents had sheltered themselves behind the statement as signed up to the present time. I think the responsibility should be consecutive—should follow from one to the other, and when the president signed he would have the assurance of every one before him.

MR. McLENNAN: This Bill has been pretty well considered by the representatives of the banks, and I may say to my hon. friend from Kings (Mr. Domville), that this is an Act for banking, not for the Law Courts. With respect to warehouse receipts and bills of lading, I think they should be as free for transfer or lending upon, or any other purpose of exchange, as the ordinary bill of a bank.

MR. SMITH (Selkirk): With respect to the declaration to be made by the president and general manager, I think that after the accountant has approved of the statement, it ought to be the duty of the president, in concert with the general manager, to examine it, and they ought to be satisfied, as far as possible, that it is correct.

Bill read the second time.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the said Bill.

(In the Committee.)

MR. BLAKE said they ought not to be compelled to pass certain clauses of this Bill without communicating with persons with whom they ought to have an opportunity of communicating with.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: They have been before the House for several days.

MR. BLAKE said they were dealing with a corrected copy of the Bill, in which there were many changes. We have been sitting up to two o'clock and three o'clock in the morning, and it has been utterly impossible to give a proper consideration to its details. I suggest that there are clauses, in regard to which we should not go through the farce of legislating on.

MR. ABBOTT: There is no doubt that a great many points have arisen on the clauses respecting bills of lading and receipts. The effect of Clause 46 is only to remove a few ambiguities in the old law, and set at rest the uncertainty of the law as to the legality of warehouse receipts, and the persons who can give them. The 45th Clause has been recast, to make it plain that any person, not a professional warehouseman, may give such a receipt, and it also makes plain what a bill of lading is, and for what wares or goods it may be given.

MR. GUTHRIE: It has been for ten years held in Ontario that none but professional warehousemen can give these warehouse receipts. There are two or three warehousemen who give valid receipts, and no receipt has been valid except given by those, or by a miller, and some special persons like that class.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: The discussion has shown that these points are of special interest; and that there is great difference of opinion. We will, therefore, pass over these special clauses, for the present, and let them have further consideration.

PRAYERS.

PRIVILEGE—THE MEMBER FOR RICHELIEU.

The petition of L. Morasse and others, representing that there has been a failure of justice, in the matter of the trial of the Election Petition, complaining of an undue Return for the Electoral District of Richelieu, and praying to be allowed to make proof before the House, was read.

MR. MASSUE: I beg to state from my place that the allegations made in a petition, presented to the House by the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier), on Monday last, during my absence, are untrue and unfounded.

MR. LAURIER: At this late stage of the Session, I will not move that the petition be received to-day, but I will reserve to myself the privilege of bringing it up again next Session.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Perhaps it would have been as well if the hon. gentleman had not made that statement. Of course, it is his privilege to introduce the petition next Session, or any time he likes, but it looks as if the hon. gentleman were holding out a threat.

MR. LAURIER: I presented this petition as every petition is presented. I do not undertake to take charge of it, or be responsible for it. I merely made the remark to save the privilege of the petitioners and not mine.

MR. BLAKE: Had my hon. friend proposed to withdraw the petition without making that statement, I think the fair inference would have been that it was not to be brought forward again. It was perfectly legitimate that the hon. gentleman should be furnished an opportunity to make the statement he did make, and it is equally clear that the petition could not be properly dealt with at this late stage of the Session. The remark was simply to indicate that the petition was withdrawn, not because it was not intended to prosecute it, but simply because of the late stage at which it was presented.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: That places the matter in quite a different position and is quite right. I am glad that it will appear in the Debates that such is the ground upon which the withdrawal is based.

Petition, with leave of the House, withdrawn.

VILLAGE POST-OFFICES.

QUESTION.

MR. LAURIER enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to establish a second post-office in the village of Lachute, in the county of Argenteuil; and, if so, will it be hereafter the policy of the Post Office Department to multiply post offices in the several villages of the Dominion?

MR. O'CONNOR: As there is one post-office in the village already, it is not the intention to establish another. I cannot say what the future policy of the Government will be.

LAMBTON COUNTY COURT JUDGE.

QUESTION.

MR. ROBERTSON (Hamilton) enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to take any action upon the petition signed by about 1,000 ratepayers of the county of Lambton, presentments by Grand Juries of the said county of Lambton, motions of the County Councils of the said county of Lambton, asking to have a Commission appointed to enquire into the conduct of Judge Robinson, County Court Judge of the said County of Lambton.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou): It is not the intention of the Government to take any such action.

PRINTING COMMITTEE'S REPORT.

REMARKS.

MR. BANNERMAN: Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to know what steps are to be taken in connection with the Report of the Joint Committee on Printing. It is about time to decide what is going to be done with it, if it is to be dealt with during the present Session. I am sorry that the Chairman is not in his place; if he were, some of the members of the Committee have an amendment to make to the adoption of the Report.

MR. BLAKE: The hon. gentleman is not in order; there is no motion before the House.

MR. BANNERMAN: I will move that the House go into Committee to consider the Report, if I am in order.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD.

MR. BLAKE: The time is past.

MR. BOWELL: The proper course would be to move the adoption of the Report of the Printing Committee. I would suggest that the matter be allowed to stand till the Chairman is in his place.

MR. BLAKE: The time is now past; it must be done by an arrangement.

DOMINION LANDS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.—[BILL 95.]

(Sir John A. Macdonald.)

THIRD READING.

Order for consideration of the Bill read.

MR. BLAKE: I think that one of the clauses of this Bill should receive another amendment—that which deals with the minerals and coal measures. I have before me the amended Bill, which shows that there has been very properly taken out of the ordinary regulations the mineral lands and coal measures of the North-West. No subject could be more important to the future of that vast country than the disposition of the coal measures particularly. I cannot consider anything more vital than that sound regulations, calculated to preserve, for the population at large, the benefit of those coal measures, and prevent any possibility of monopoly in them or any considerable possession of them by speculators could be adopted. All I have to propose is, that the hon. the First Minister should add to the clause, with reference to the regulations to be made by the Governor in Council, the same clause which, at my suggestion, he made with respect to the British Columbia lands—that the regulations should be published in the Gazette, and laid before both Houses of Parliament for thirty days, without disapproval by either House. I do not think that the Government ought to ask the House to give it absolute power to determine how that important part of the economy of the North-West should be disposed of.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I quite agree with the hon. gentleman. I accepted that suggestion for another Bill, and think it ought to be accepted here. I will move that the amendments be referred to the Committee of the Whole for amendment.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT: I would like to call the attention of the Government to the propriety of reserving, absolutely, after due exploration has been made, a very considerable proportion of the best coal lands as the property of the Government. I know that, in our country, it has never been a very popular thing to alienate, to a great extent, mineral lands; but a large amount of public revenue has been obtained from just such reservations. Now, in addition to that, we are likely to become very extensive railway proprietors in the North-West, and on both those points I think it is worth while, at any rate until we know a great deal more about that country than we do now, to retain absolutely a very considerable portion in hand in the nature of Crown domain. If the hon. Minister has considered that question at all, I would be glad to hear his views on the subject. He is aware, no doubt, that, in other countries, this has been done with great advantage. I really do not see any reason why, in future, some additional revenue might not come from that source.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: It has been suggested that we should prevent any disposition of the mineral lands between now and next Session. So far as the coal measures are concerned, I do not think there can be any objection, because I do not think there can be any disposition of the coal measures in that country, until we know a great deal more about them. With regard to the other minerals, if we locked them up, it might retard explorations.

MR. BLAKE: I think we had better settle up the country in the meantime.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: We are doing that, to a large degree, contrary to the suggestions of my hon. friend. As regards the suggestion of the hon. member for Centre Huron (Sir Richard J. Cartwright), I entirely agree with him as regards the expediency of keeping a certain amount of reserves of coal for our own railways. I do not know the extent of that coal field. There is a great rush of speculators where this coal is known to exist, but the nature or the value of the supply is not known. If it be a limited supply for our railways, then great precautions should be taken by the Government that speculators do not get hold of it, and raise the price and rule our railways so far as the fuel supply is concerned. Very large privileges have been granted to prospectors in order to induce people to go into that country. I think the suggestion of the hon. member for Centre Huron is a good one, that there should be a royalty charged on every mine.

MR. MILLS: If the hon. gentleman is going to charge a royalty on coal mining in the North-West it will increase the price of coal there, and that country would have to pay a tax that the rest of the Dominion would not pay. I do not think the policy will be found advantageous.

MR. BANNERMAN: I would like to ask whether it is the intention in this Bill to deal with parties whose claims have been entered previously, who have spent large sums of money in opening up those coal fields. To my knowledge one party has spent over $20,000.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: This Bill does not affect any rights acquired under the old law. Any parties who have legal or equitable claims under the present law are supposed to be considered in the future.

MR. MILLS said that a good deal of inconvenience resulted from the operation of Section 5. If settlers were permitted to dispose of their settlement to new-comers, and allowed to take up another homestead, we would retain a considerable population at present lost.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said that there were men who preferred to live by their wits ends, and who went round and homesteaded the best portions of the country with a view of disposing of them to emigrants, and thereby making $50 or $100 out of new-comers. The clause referred to was framed with a view to stop that kind of thing.

MR. MILLS said it was a great advantage to a settler with a few hundred dollars to be permitted to buy a homestead on which there was a house and buildings. Under this regulation it was utterly impossible that that could be done.

MR. BLAKE said the mischief alluded to by the right hon. gentleman should be avoided, but, on the other hand, he thought it really would be a very great improvement in the case of a substantial settlement to allow the homestead to be sold.

House again resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, and reported the Bill as amended.

Bill read the third time and passed.

NAVIGABLE WATERS OBSTRUCTIONS LAW AMENDMENT BILL.

[BILL 107.]

(Mr. Pope, Queen's, P.E.I.)

SENATE AMENDMENTS CONCURRED IN.

MR. POPE (Queen's, P.E.I.) moved that the amendments made by the Senate to the said Bill be now read the second time and agreed to.

MR. ANGERS: I must apologise to the House for drawing attention to this Bill. I was not in the House when it was passed, but before leaving I made a suggestion in relation to part of the wording, which I think was of some importance. I find, however, that the language remains unchanged, and I think, if the measure passes into law, it will have the effect of materially injuring the shipping in Canadian waters. The owners of a vessel will be responsible to the Government for raising the hull of a shipwrecked vessel, even when the remains of the shipwreck are insufficient to defray the expenses of the removal. This is more stringent than the English Maritime Law in relation to collisions. There are many shipowners who do not sail their own ships, which are chartered to corporated companies, and those companies navigate the vessels in the St. Lawrence. If a collision occurs under such circumstances, the real owner of the vessel is not responsible for the collision. You must take the action at them or against the company navigating the vessel. That is the common Maritime Law of England; but this Bill would make the position of an owner of a vessel, who, without any negligence on his part, has lost his vessel, responsible for the expense of removing the remains. Shipowners will hesitate about letting their vessels come up the St. Lawrence when they are exposed to this penalty, in case of shipwreck, and trade will be greatly injured thereby. I would suggest that it is inexpedient, at this late hour of the Session, to concur in the amendments. It would be better to leave the matter over until next Session.

MR. POPE (Queen's, P. E. I.): I stated when this Bill was introduced, that it was simply for the purpose of saving the Government a large amount of money which they had to expend for the purpose of getting rid of the obstructions left about the shores, and the sides of channels to the endangerment of navigation. The St. Lawrence is not the only navigable water in the world, and the measure will not affect it more than any other part. Vessels are usually well insured, and the owners can well afford to remove the remains of shipwrecks. There is no reason why the people should pay for the neglect or carelessness of shipowners in this respect. I cannot see how the Act would affect the chartering of ships, or interfere with the navigation of the St. Lawrence, and I hope my hon. friend will withdraw his objections to the Bill. There is no desire on the part of the Government to deal harshly with the shipowners, or involve them in any unnecessary expense. We simply desire to protect the public from the expense of taking away obstructions which ought properly to be removed by the owners of the shipwrecked vessels.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I fear very much that the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Angers) is a little out of order in reintroducing a discussion upon a Bill which has passed this House; and I am afraid I must also censure my hon. friend (Mr. Pope) for discussing a matter which has been settled by this House. The expression of the House has been given on this measure, and I do not see how the House, with a due sense of respect, can reverse its decision. We passed this Bill after full consideration.

MR. BLAKE: No.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: We passed it after such consideration as hon. gentleman opposite and those behind me chose to give it, and they must be accountable in a parliamentary sense. But the Bill passed this House, and was sent to the Senate, who passed it with a single amendment. The simple question now before the House is whether that amendment should be adopted or not, and I hope the discussion will be confined to that point.

MR. BLAKE: I must protest against the statement of the hon. gentleman. We are called upon to consider whether we will agree to this amendment or not, and the hon. member for Montmorency suggested reasons why the amendment should not be considered. If the consideration is postponed, certain results will follow which may be good results. It may be that this Bill is all right. I maintain that the hon. gentleman is all wrong when he says there was opportunity for full discussion in reference to this measure, and when he charges upon us parliamentary responsibility if it was not fully discussed. It was the 29th April when this Bill was read the second time, when no less than thirteen Government Bills were advanced that stage. Prior to that day, full, fair and parliamentary discussion had become impossible owing to the lateness of the Session, and except in a single instance of a speech upon the subject of temperance, which was delivered under some difficulties and some stress upon the patience of the House, I know of no full, ample, parliamentary discussion since April 29th. Those of us who are opposed to converting this Legislative body into a mere machine for registering the views of individual Ministers, do not like to see matters pressed in this fashion. I thought there were objections to some parts of the Bill. Some portions are not unreasonable, but others I think will be extremely harsh in operation. I agree with the suggestion of the hon. member for Montmorency that it would be better to let this measure go over for another year.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I think the hon. gentleman has passed considerable censure upon himself when he intimated that there had been no opportunity to consider the Bill. I know the indefatigable industry of the hon. gentleman, and I think he is rather too modest in that statement. I deny the statement that Parliament is less fit or less capable to do work in the last days of the Session than at the first. The hon. gentleman knows well that the Crown will not exercise the despotic power of prorogation until all the business before the House is disposed of; and if the House feels that the interests of the Dominion require discussion of the measures before it for some weeks more, I have no doubt the constitutional advisers of His Excellency will not advise him to come down and ruthlessly cut the thread of the discussions. The hon. gentleman suggests that, while the Opposition would be prepared to fight the Ministerial measures at the beginning of the Session, their courage, like that of Bob Acres, oozes out of their finger ends at the close, and my hon. friend cannot offer so effective a criticism as his parliamentary virtue and conscientious principles would have induced him to offer at the beginning of the Session.

MR. DOULL: I am sorry the Government are pressing this Bill through the House. I have endeavoured to convince hon. Ministers of its unfairness and injustice. The hon. member for Montmorency has stated good reasons why it should not pass. I will give an instance of the probable evil operation of the Bill. A lighter or scow, which I rented to a party to carry stone to the railway, was sunk at the entrance to the harbour and had to be removed. Would it not be a great hardship to compel me to remove that vessel, or any owner of a vessel, sunk through the fault of another?

MR. SPEAKER: The question under consideration is that of the amendments made to Bill No. 107 by the Senate. The discussion ought to be confined to them.

MR. ANGERS: I apologise to the House for protracting the discussion when out of order. I now move that the House do not concur in the Amendments made to the Bill in the Senate, because it is inexpedient to consider the same at this late period of the Session.

Amendment negatived on a division.

Amendments read the second time and agreed to.

BANKING ACT AMENDMENT BILL.
[BILL 115.]

(Sir Samuel L. Tilley.)

THIRD READING.

House again resolved itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the said Bill.

(In the Committee.)

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: When the House was in Committee this morning, early, some objection was taken to certain provisions of the Bill, and I have had some amendments prepared which will meet the objections of the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) that those securities should be held for old debts, and extending over a certain period, or upon the understanding that such warehouse receipts or bills of lading be transferred to the bank.

MR. GUTHRIE: These amendments, I think, will meet the objections I urged. I think the Act thus amended will be a good thing for the public as well as the banks.

MR. BLAKE: So far as I can judge of the amendments, they are certainly improvements. I have stated that the general public has had no opportunity of considering or consulting about the clauses of this Bill. We understand to-day from the hon. the First Minister that, although that is the case, yet, constitutionally speaking, we are presumed to have had the opportunity, and are responsible for this legislation being proceeded with. I renew my protest against such a responsibility being imposed, in the face of the physical impossibility of dealing with the subject. The partial measure of discussion the Act has received, without that opportunity of communicating with the persons most interested in its provisions, which was very desirable, has shown that serious and important improvements are necessary—that the proposed law is defective. It was defective with reference to the liability for bank shares, and is defective in regard to the very important question now under consideration, and was very defective and injurious in respect to the power it gave banks to take warehouse receipts in relation to past overdue debts. All this indicates one cannot trust as infallible the wisdom of an Administration in bringing down laws, and it is important there should be some time for discussion. There has not been sufficient time in this case. But these alterations are improvements in the crude and defective measure which, at this late stage of the Session, the Government calls on Parliament to pass.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: It is not unusual, when a Bill of this importance is submitted, to find many amendments suggested; and, although this Bill was submitted very late in the Session, the hon. member for South Wellington, in his parliamentary right, called attention to certain propositions which the Government asked time to consider; and the discussion, though, at a very late hour, has secured a consideration of the subject and propositions which, I am happy to find, meet with the approval of hon. gentleman on both sides.

MR. BLAKE: My hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Weldon), who has been obliged to leave, desires me to call the attention of the hon. Ministers to what he thinks is a serious defect—not one created by these changes, however. It appears the mode by which agents is defined, is by reference to a former Act—the 59th chapter of the Consolidated Statutes of the late Province of Canada. He states that this mode of defining an agent is one of great practical inconvenience to everybody, and particularly to persons in the outlying Provinces, who have not the old Consolidated Statutes, and cannot get them, the edition being long out of print. Under these circumstances, if the Administration is not able to bring down a moderate clause, giving a proper definition of an agent—and it would only involve the expense of a little printer's ink—it might attach as a schedule to the Bill that Act of the Consolidated Statute in question, so that those to be governed by the law may have it before them.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou): I do not think it would be quite convenient to have the schedule proposed attached to the Bill. An inconvenience that had not been much felt for the last ten or twelve years, could not be greatly felt the coming year. I do not mean to say it would not be better to define the word "agent" in the Statute, so that every person would understand it clearly; but, at the same time, I do not think the emergency so pressing as to require us to delay the Bill for the present.

MR. BLAKE: It is not inconvenient to the profession in my Province, for we have the old Statute. But my hon. friend from St. John says, it is not to be found in the Lower Provinces. I do not make the suggestion with a view to delay, but I do not think it need very much delay the Bill to insert five lines, stating, as to the old Act of the Consolidated Statutes, that the Act is the schedule appended.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou): I have no objection to that.

Bill, as amended, ordered to be reported.

House resumed.

(In the House.)

Bill reported.

Question proposed on the third reading of the Bill.

MR. GUTHRIE: In reference to bringing down such important matters, at so late a period in the Session, I find that the very same objections which have been urged from this side of the House on that point, were urged two years ago by the hon. gentlemen now composing the Government when they were in our places. It was in connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway Bill. Hansard says:

"MR. TUPPER said he did not intend to enter into a long and vain discussion at this advanced stage of the Session, because he knew it was useless. He might say, however, that it was a great pity that measures of such great importance should be brought down so late in the Session."

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: It only shows that all the charges brought against the present Government were equally applicable to the late Government.

MR. KIRKPATRICK: I move that the Bill be referred back to the Committee to insert a clause. I find there have been some individuals in the country who have been assuming a very important title, and have formed themselves into partnerships, calling themselves bankers, and assuming corporate names. I hold in my hand the advertisement card of a firm who call themselves "The Bank of New Hamburg." I find that some gentlemen elsewhere call themselves "The Richelieu District Bank." They give themselves out to the public as receiving deposits. They assume these names, evidently with the intention of misleading the public, and getting themselves trusted as incorporate bankers coming under this Act. But they are in nowise amenable to the law we have just passed. I think it is our duty to protect the people of the country, so that they may not be misled into thinking that these individuals, who assume these high sounding titles to which they have no right, have any status under this Bill. I think that persons who assume these names should be made amenable to the Act. I, therefore, move the following additional clause:—

"That any person, firm or company, assuming or using the title of bank or banking company, without being authorised so to do by this Act or by the Acts relating to Banks and Banking, or by some other Act in force in that behalf, shall be guilty of a misdemeanour."

MR. ROSS (West Middlesex): Do I understand that an individual cannot engage in a private banking enterprise and advertise himself?

MR. KIRKPATRICK: It does not apply to him if he calls himself a banker, but only if he assumes the title of a bank.

MR. ROSS: Suppose Mr. Kirkpatrick should say: "Mr. Kirkpatrick's Bank," and John Brown should say, "John Brown's Bank," and put his name on the sign?

MR. KIRKPATRICK: If he is a banker that is no harm—if he has money enough to support the title.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT: I think the penalty proposed to be inflicted is rather severe. Calling an offence of this kind a misdemeanour, without some consideration, seems to me to be going too far. A more proper penalty would be to fix a fine on the party. I think it would better come from the hon. the Minister of Finance to say whether we should call a thing of that kind a misdemeanour.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I do not think the evil can be put down effectively without making it a misdemeanour. If there be two or three men who join themselves together and call themselves "The Bank of Hamburg," or "The Bank of Richelieu," or "The Bank of Galt," etc., it must be for the purpose of entrapping the public. They know perfectly well that they have no right to take a corporate name.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou): I do not think that a private individual should be prevented from doing business in his own name and calling himself a banker.

MR. BLAKE: I think he ought to be allowed to call himself a private banker; but I think an Act of this nature should not come into force until 1st July next, because there may be honest persons who call themselves bankers, as the law at present allows it, and they should have an opportunity of becoming acquainted with this Bill.

Motion in amendment agreed to.

House again resolved itself into Committee of the Whole and reported the Bill as amended.

Bill read the third time and passed.

PARLIAMENTARY PRINTING CONTRACT.

MOTION TO ADOPT COMMITTEE'S REPORT.

MR. STEPHENSON moved that the 13th Report of the Joint Committee of both Houses be now concurred in.

MR. BLAKE: Is it intended that this motion should include the adoption of the Report of the sub-Committee.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: No; the Report of the sub-Committee is merely appended for the information of the House.

MR. ROSS (West Middlesex): The Report of the sub-Committee is a part of the Report of the Committee, by which it was regularly adopted.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: The hon. gentleman does not read the Report as I read it.

MR. ROSS: The right hon. gentleman will find the words appended to the Report: "All of which is respectfully submitted for the consideration of both Houses."

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: You submit it, but you do not approve of it.

MR. ROSS: I know the Report of the sub-Committee was adopted.

MR. BLAKE: It would appear that the Committee has imperfectly performed its work. They have only given a partial answer as to the point of cancellation.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou): We have the recommendation of the Committee to the House. Speaking for myself, I should say the matter should not be questioned for a moment. If these contractors have made themselves liable to the severe censure passed on them by this Committee, surely we cannot say with one breath, you have been guilty of gross fraud, and your contract ought to be cancelled; but, inasmuch as it would be slightly inconvenient to part with you fraudulent contractors just now, we will hold on to you a few weeks longer, until it is more convenient to part with you. That is a kind of thing I cannot personally understand. Therefore, I think we have only one question to consider, and that is, whether the contract ought to be cancelled or not.

MR. BOWELL: The remarks of the hon. the First Minister are strictly correct. The Report is not a correct Report of the proceedings of the Committee. Not only was the Report of the sub-Committee adopted, but it was adopted on a division. There were three voted against it. I am surprised that that portion of the Report does not appear on the record. The sub-Committee went fully into the question as to the best mode of securing tenders, so as to prevent fraud in the future; they decided to advertise for contracts in the future, and to require the tenderer to deposit $1,000, which he must forfeit on refusal to enter upon his tender. The manner in which printing is done in the United States, in France, and in England, was considered, but it was thought by the sub-Committee that there was no time to enter into it; they thought they ought to cancel the contract at once, and that none of the parties interested in the recent fraud should be permitted to tender again, but the difficulties of carrying on printing in a city like this presented themselves, and they did not consider it would be advisable to go to the extreme that they could have gone in a city like Toronto or Montreal, and, therefore, it would, on the whole, be better to defer the change for the present.

MR. BLAKE: I think after this frank explanation, it is quite impossible to act upon the Report as it stands. If there is any possibility of putting out the printing as it should be, it is quite clear that we should not delay the cancellation of the contract; but I think we ought to have evidence of what the deliverance of the Committee was, and deal with it.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I think we have got the deliverance of the Committee as a Whole that the contract should be cancelled, on the ground that it was obtained by improper and irregular means. There is a Report of the sub-Committee that it should not be cancelled immediately; but I quite agree with the hon. the Minister of Justice that it should be immediate. The matter was brought fairly before the House, and the contract was to be cancelled without reference to consequences. My idea is that we should adopt the Report cancelling the contract, and send the Report back to the Committee on Printing for further consideration. If the House believes that the Committee was right, that there was irregular practices, and that, therefore, the contract should be cancelled, it ought to be cancelled. I propose, therefore, that the Report of the Committee should be adopted, and that the Report of the sub-Committee should be referred back for further consideration.

MR. ROSS (West Middlesex) : The remarks of the hon. the First Minister would seem to imply a censure upon the Committee. The right hon. gentleman should not come to a hasty conclusion. The sub-Committee is part of the Committee, and their Report is part of the Committee's Report. It would be unfair to the Printing Committee to say that the Report they supplemented does not represent their views and opinions, after a careful consideration of the whole question.

MR. PATTERSON (Essex) : The Joint Committee on Printing have recommended the cancellation of the contract; and it would be unjust, under all the circumstances, to delay the cancellation. Without making any further remarks, I move in amendment :

"That in the opinion of this House the Government should take the necessary steps to cancel the contract awarded to Messrs. McLean, Roger and Company, for the Printing of Parliament from the 1st of January, 1880; and that the said contract be offered to Patrick Boyle of Toronto, whose tender appears from all the evidence to be the only legitimate tender below that of Messrs. McLean, Roger and Company; and that so much of the Thirteenth Report of the Joint Committee of both Houses on the Printing of Parliament, as is consistent with the foregoing Resolution, be adopted."

MR. BLAKE : In order to give the hon. Chairman of the Committee on Printing an opportunity to call his Committee together, and remedy the existing defect I rise to a point of order. It is necessary that two day's notice should be given before the adoption of the Report.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD : I object to this; the hon. gentleman has spoken twice or thrice to the motion.

MR. BLAKE : I have not.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD : The question before us was the adoption of the Report. It is quite clear that the hon. gentleman is out of order altogether. He cannot, in any way, make the objection in regard to want of notice; it is too late for him to do that after speaking on the question, and discussing it so far. One would think it was the desire of the hon.

member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) to allow a continuance of these irregular and improper practices.

MR. BLAKE : I rose to a point of order.

MR. MILLS : I—

SEVERAL HON. MEMBERS : Order.

MR. MILLS : I am about to speak to a point of order. It is always competent for a member to rise on a question of order. If any motion is out of order, its irregularity is not cured by any discussion that takes place on it. A question of order can always be taken.

MR. SPEAKER : From what I can judge from the debate, the question is, whether the Report of the Committee ought to be adopted or not.

MR. BLAKE : Whether notice of motion for its adoption is requisite.

MR. SPEAKER : I think that notice is required.

INDIAN LAWS AMENDMENT BILL. [BILL 90.]

(Sir John A. Macdonald.)

SECOND AND THIRD READINGS.

Order for second reading read.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD : When I introduced the Bill I explained its meaning partly. It is a consideration of the laws relating to Indians, including a system for newly organising the Department and creating the Indian Branch into a separate and distinct Department, under the control of the hon. the Minister of the Interior. My worthy subordinates agree with me that the duties of the Indian Branch are so onerous, that instead of being a sub-branch, it should be a separate Department, under one Minister.

MR. PATERSON (South Brant) : This Bill is of considerable importance to some members of the House, and it is desirable, at this late period of the Session, that it should be allowed to stand over.

AN HON. MEMBER : Oh, no.

MR. PATERSON : It is scarcely fair to discuss this Bill now. The hon. the Minister is well aware that many may want to speak on the Bill. My objections to the Indian Bill passing at this time, are as follows :—In the first place it is a consolidation of the Indian laws, and that being the case, the hon. the First Minister would be disposed to resent next Session the introduction of any amendments by private members. The objection would be that the law was only consolidated last year, and there was no necessity for re-opening the question after so short an experience. Then the Bill does not provide for the enfranchisement of the Indians, for according to them the rights, opportunities and privileges of citizens is, I think, the only solution of the Indian question, more especially the only solution which affects the more advanced tribes, on whose behalf and with respect to whose circumstances, I am more particularly acquainted. Any change that has been made in the law is only in the direction of still more firmly fastening the shackles of tutelage upon them—a change tending to keep the Indians in their present condition. I speak on behalf of 3,000 Indians, among whom six missionaries have been labouring for the past thirty years, and who have twelve public schools and an industrial institute. In that band there has never been but one enfranchised under the Act of 1868, and that Indian was unable to get the land to which he was entitled; he petitioned to be restored to his former condition as an Indian. If there is such a record after twelve years' experience, is it not time that some step was taken by which more progress might be made? The whole Indian law discourages the assimilation of the whites and the Indians, and the solution of the Indian problem can only be found in wiping out the distinction which exists between the races, in giving the red man all the liberties and rights enjoyed by the white man, and entailing upon him all the responsibilities which attach to those rights and privileges. For those reasons I am opposed to the discussion of this subject at the present time. The Indian question is the question of the country. It means, as we know from the Estimates brought down yearly, the expenditure of millions for the maintenance of the Indians—it means one of the most pressing and vital questions of the hour, and I warn the House, as I warn the hon. the First Minister, that legislation in the direction proposed, old-time legislation, simply means that it will entail upon the people, year after year, and for all time to come, the voting annually of hundreds of thousands of dollars to keep the Indians in the low, degraded state in which they are at present. What I advocate is this: That we should have an Indian policy, which will not only tend to relieve us from those heavy burdens, but will give to the Indians more rights than they now possess, and wipe out the race distinctions that now exist. The policy adopted by this Government, whether mistaken or not, has had in view the object that the Indian should not have a wrong done him. We have endeavoured to show ourselves superior to our neighbours in the management of those men. I submit, and I say it without egotism, that without any greater ability than other hon. members possess, that I know more of this subject than most of the members, because it has been forced upon my consideration. I wish my words had weight enough to induce the hon. the First Minister to allow this measure to lay over. I would be glad to render any assistance I could in trying if we could introduce a Bill, next Session, which would bring about what I think the hon. gentleman desires, and by which our Indians may be benefitted to a much greater extent, and in a more rapid manner, than is possible under the provisions of the Bill now under consideration.

MR. WHITE (East Hastings): The hon. member stated that he did not want to address the House at this period of the Session. At what period would the hon. gentleman like to speak? Have the Government said we must close? This House can, if necessary, sit all next week, or the following week, in order to complete the business of the people. The hon. member has said some very true things. It is time we began to give our intelligent Indians all the rights and privileges which pertain to other classes of the community. He has referred to the fact that we are yearly giving thousands of dollars which are of no real benefit to the Indians. I believe that is correct. We are making them believe that the country will support them, and putting them in a position in which they have no credit or standing in the community. We should no longer treat the Indians as children. Something should be done to put them in a position to make them know and feel that they were responsible to themselves and to the country. On one reserve there are not more than two Indians; the rest are half-breeds, and many of them are educated, and had they responsibilities of members of this House, could fill positions here with credit to themselves and to the country. I hope the hon. the First Minister will give one or two days more for the consideration of this measure, and I hope the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson) will stay and give his assistance. No one is more anxious to do his duty towards the Indians than the hon. Premier, and there is no one in the world whom they respect more; and I trust this measure will be carefully considered before it passes into law.

After Recess.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I do not propose to reply to the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson) at length, but I may say, in reference to one of his objections, that this Bill has passed the Senate, and has been printed and distributed for a very considerable time. If any hon. gentleman wishes to move an amendment he has plenty of opportunity. He said that whatever alteration is made in the Bill has the effect of limiting the power of enfranchisement. I see no clause altering the Bill in such a way, and think the hon. gentleman is misinformed.

MR. PATERSON: The right hon. gentleman misunderstands me on that point. I did not say that.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: The hon. gentleman made an appeal to the House about the necessity of advancing the interests of the Indians, civilising them and putting them in the condition of white men. After all, I am afraid that the hon. gentleman's views are affected by the influence of party. Disguise it as we may, wherever there is an Indian settlement the whites in the vicinity are very naturally anxious—when they see the slovenly, unfarmerlike way in which the Indian lands are cultivated especially if the lands be very good—to get rid of the red men, believing, and perhaps, truly, that the progress of the locality is retarded by them, and that the sooner they are enfranchised, or deprived of their lands, and allowed to shift for themselves, the better. I dare say it would be better. If the Indians were to disappear from the continent, the Indian question would cease to exist. But we must remember that they are the original owners of the soil, of which they have been dispossessed by the covetousness or ambition of our ancestors. Perhaps, if Columbus had not discovered this continent—had left them alone—they would have worked out a tolerable civilisation of their own. At all events, the Indians have been great sufferers by the discovery of America, and the transfer to it of a large white population. We are bound to protect them. The United States, British and Canadian Governments have all agreed as to the necessity of defending and protecting the Indians. As to giving the Indian lands away, enfranchising the Indians, and giving patents for their lands, the policy would be a failure in this country, as it has proved a failure in the United States. The experience in regard to the granting of lands to the Indians, call them enfranchised or not, means simply this: The Indian gets his deed, and by some injurious or unfortunate process, sells or leases his land, and becomes a vagrant without property. We have seen individuals of this race succeed, by means of education, but the exception proves the rule. The general rule is that you cannot make the Indian a white man. An Indian once said to myself: "We are the wild animals; you cannot make an ox of a deer." You cannot make an agriculturist of the Indian. All we can hope for is to wean them, by slow degrees, from their nomadic habits, which have almost become an instinct, and by slow degrees absorb them or settle them on the land. Meantime they must be fairly protected. The hon. gentleman says this Bill should stand over until we have an opportunity of discovering or inventing some new system of civilising the Indians. I am afraid he and I would not agree as to the best means of doing so. I am afraid he would favour the dividing of the different reserves among the Indians, giving them deeds in fee simple, and leaving them to shift for themselves. That would be cruelty of the worst kind. I think this Bill is called for until we can, by common agreement, come to some understanding as to some means of advancing the Indians in the scale of civilisation.

MR. FLEMING : The hon. First Minister says he is in favour of the enfranchisement of the Indians, but only by slow degrees. When the right hon. gentleman, in 1857, introduced the first Enfranchisement Bill, he expressed himself then as being desirous of seeing them speedily placed in the same position as the white settlers. Twenty-three years have elapsed since that Bill became law. Amendments have been made to it from time to time, all with the view of giving increased facilities for enfranchisement. What has been the result? Some fifty-seven persons, including children, out of the 90,000 Indians of the Dominion, have been enfranchised. At this rate, five persons every two years, it would take 36,000 years to enfranchise the Indian population of Canada. Surely, this is proceeding by very slow degrees indeed. The right hon. gentleman thinks the object of the advocates of enfranchisement is the possession of the Indian lands. In defence of the white settlers in the county of Brant, living in the neighbourhood of the reserves, I beg to say that they are actuated by no such covetous desire. They simply wish to see Indians made subject to the same law they themselves are called on to obey. At present settlers on land adjoining a reserve suffer a great many annoyances, for instance, the reservation is very often a perfect nursery for noxious weeds; a farmer may see, day after day, the seeds of the Canada thistle blown on to his land, but he has no redress. Indians are not subject to municipal law. It is said the reason why so few Indians are enfranchised is because they are not fit for the position. With regard to the Six Nation Indians, the fact that the more intelligent and industrious among them have not enfranchisement, under the present law, is the most conclusive proof of their ability to look after their own interests. At present many of this class occupy from 200 to 300 acres of land a piece, were they to be enfranchised, as the law now stands, they would get only their share of the reserve, something less than fifty acres. In such circumstances they are not so foolish as to seek for enfranchisement. I am sure the hon. the First Minister must see that if it is desirable to raise the Indian to the station of the white man, our legislation heretofore has been inoperative; on the other hand, if it is not desirable so to raise him, the enfranchisement clauses ought to be eliminated from the Statute-book, as it is they are regarded by the Indians themselves as a perfect farce. Surely, the right hon. gentleman will not attempt now to keep the red men in their present position for an indefinite period. I trust rather he will give this subject his attention, and try if a scheme cannot be devised which will hasten rather than retard their advance in civilisation. The hon. the First Minister cannot but see that the old machine which has been tried for twenty-three years has failed to do the work for which it was designed, a new one, therefore, is essentially necessary.

MR. MILLS : The hon. Premier has, in this Bill, added very little that is new. There is no material change in the law, as it stands, as to the status of the Indians. The existing law is simply consolidated. But there is some change in the organisation of the Department itself. If I understand it rightly, the policy aimed at in the Bill is to make the Indian Branch of the Department of the Interior a distinct department. It is to place the Chief Clerk at the head of that Department, and make it separate and distinct from the ordinary Department of the Interior. I do not think that this part of the Bill can be sustained by the argument of the First Minister. If, because the business of the Indian Branch be separate and distinct from the Lands Branch, there should be a separate and distinct Deputy head, by the same parity of reasoning there should be a Deputy Minister for the administration and the government of the Territories. At present there are but two governments for the district of Keewatin and the North-West Territories. But if the hon. gentleman's anticipations of the future are likely to be realised, at no distant day the North-West Territories will be divided into a number of distinct colonies, with a territorial government in each, if the population be not sufficiently numerous to warrant the organisation of each into a Province. If, then, the argument, by which the hon. gentlemen undertake to support the making of the Indian Branch a distinct department, has any force, it is equally applicable to the branch for the administration of the territorial Governments. The proposed policy does not coincide with my own views. I think the hon. gentleman has a Surveyor-General at the head of the Lands Branch. He requires a person capable of supervising the work at the head of the Indian Branch. I hold there is great advantage in having a permanent Deputy Head supervising the entire work of the Department, who is not immediately connected with the administration of each particular branch in that Department. It saves the hon. Minister a great deal of work, and there are too important persons upon whose judgment considerable reliance may always be placed by the Minister. To consider every question of administration, there will be the Deputy Minister and the Chief Clerk of the branch, so that the Minister will have every question sifted through them, men of experience and ability, and one of whom will take the official—the routine—view. The other will be farther removed, and it is most desirable that he should be so. I think that is an advantage too great to be lightly estimated, and that the plan proposed will not be an improvement in this respect. For some time the Department was organised in this way: One person had charge of the Ordnance Lands; one of Indian Affairs in the old Provinces; the Deputy Minister had charge of Indian affairs in the North-West and Manitoba and the territorial government; and the Surveyor-General had charge of the Lands Branch. Each acted, practically, as Deputy Minister of his own branch. Before I left the Department the practice had been changed, and the person, nominally Deputy Minister, was acting as Deputy Minister for all the affairs in the Department. I believe that was an advantage, because there were, as I have said, two to consider every question before its final disposal. The judgment of two being thus secured, in all affairs coming up for disposal, was an unquestionable advantage. If the hon. gentleman's plan is to be acted upon, there is one provision that will have to be changed. If it is intended by the 3rd Section that this should be a separate Department, to be placed under some other Minister, this clause ought not to be here. If it is the intention of the Government not to do this, but to retain this as a branch of the Department of the Interior, then there is no propriety in calling the hon. the Minister of the Interior Superintendent-General for Indian Affairs. He is the Minister for that branch, the same as for any other of the Department. If it is the object to have a separate Deputy for this particular branch, on account of its importance, he ought to be called Deputy Minister of the Interior for Indian Affairs. I observe, too, there are certain clauses of this Bill, from Clause 23 to Clause 28, to which there were strong objections offered two or three years ago, by the present hon. Minister of Public Works. He strongly objected to the arbitrary power, that he said was given to the hon. the Minister of the Interior, with regard to trespassers upon Indian lands. I was Minister of the Interior at the time the objection was made, though not Minister when the law was enacted. But this Bill has not made any change in the law in these particulars. The same extensive powers of dealing with trespassers without appeal to the ordinary courts of justice, which existed in the old law, and which, he said, were so objectionable—and I agree with him—are retained in this Bill precisely as they were before. With regard to the question of the administration of Indian affairs, I am of the opinion that this Bill is wholly inadequate to the wants of the country at this moment. I think legislation of a much more radical character than anything contained in this Bill is required to meet the present exigency in the administration of Indian affairs. When I was at the head of the Department of the Interior, having given a good deal of attention to this subject, I came to the conclusion that important changes in the law were necessary, and had we remained in power, it was the intention of the late Administration to submit a measure to Parliament on this subject. When the hon. Minister proposed that we should occupy a long series of ages—on the principle of development, I suppose—in the elevation of the Indians, on the ground that it was absolutely necessary, I did not agree with him. If you can select a single Indian tribe, and if, in the administration of the affairs of the Indians of that tribe, you can show that, on the whole, they are capable of intellectual and industrial improvement, you show thereby that the whole Indian race is capable of being elevated from the condition in which they now exist. An experiment of that sort was tried. Mr. Duncan, in the administration of the affairs of a particular tribe of Indians in British Columbia, has succeeded in civilising this people, and in making them an industrious population. They are not only self-supporting, but they are producing much more than is necessary for their subsistence. What he has accomplished shows that there is a radical defect in the administration of Indian affairs in this country, or the condition of the Indians would not be what it is at present. I would like to call the hon. gentleman's attention to a work which will throw some light on this subject, and that is the "Life and Labours of Sir James Brooke in Borneo." It is a work of great interest. It shows what can be accomplished in the elevation of a race comparatively barbarous. What Sir James Brooke accomplished then, may be, in a large degree, accomplished with regard to the Indian population of this Dominion. Now, the objection I have to the present management of our Indian affairs is, that we are going in the in the same groove in which we have long been moving, and are rapidly reducing the Indians of the North-West and of British Columbia to the same condition of helplessness and dependence in which the Indians are in the older Provinces. I think that ought to be guarded against, and to that end very important changes are necessary in the legislation upon the question. There was one thing that impressed itself very strongly upon my mind, and that was the mischievous effects that flow from allowing the Indians, on the various reservations in the old Provinces, to hold their property in common. In these cases they have all sunk, and necessarily so, to the level of the most indolent; and I fancy that, if the white population of any district was dealt with in the same way, if the consciousness of separate and independent property holdings was taken away, you would, in great measure, reduce them to the same barbarous condition in which the Indians are found at this moment. One of the difficulties of dealing with the Indians in their present condition is the fact, that, although you do not allow the white population to purchase real estate from them, or to lease real estate from them, you do allow one Indian to traffic with another with regard to his holding, and the consequence is, that upon the reservation in the vicinity of Brantford, you find overreaching, grasping Indians holding, not merely his own fair share of the reservation, but that of half a dozen others; you have those half dozen others without any property holdings at all, without any means of subsistence, and who, in case of disease or famine, are the first the Government require to deal with. One of the first things we ought to do is, not to emancipate the Indians, but to authorise those who hold more than a fair share, to sell their property or cause it to be divided up so as to give to each Indian his fair holding. My impression is that while an Indian might be allowed to sell, this power to sell should be something like the power of the Israelites, in ancient times, to sell or alienate it for a limited time, that he should be liable for necessaries but he should not lose his property for debt for more than a limited period, and that, at the expiration of it, he should again come into possession. This system would put each Indian upon an equality, and at each recurring period he would be able to make a new start in life. I think if this were done, great changes for the better would be made in the present condition of the Indians in the older Provinces. If this were done with regard to the North-West Territories, I am satisfied that you would have at a very early period a wholly different state of things from that which exists at this moment. On Walpole Island, in my constituency, there are some 1,500 Chippewa Indians. Some twenty years ago, through the carelessness of the Indian Department, a number of the Pottawatamies came from Michigan and settled among the Chippewas on that Island. These Pottawatamies were drawing annuities from the United States, and they were allowed in some way to acquire rights upon the Island. When I proposed to the Indians there that the Island should be divided up, and each Indian have a separate holding to cultivate as well as he pleased, many of them were pleased with the proposition, and there would have been no difficulty in inducing them to accept that proposition if some other provision could be made for the Pottawatamies who are settled amongst them. But, they said, the moment you make that division, you will be giving them a share of our lands, and so they pronounced against the proposition. Then, again, I hold not only that our Indian population should have some limited power in disposing of their holdings amongst themselves, but that more extensive and liberal provisions should be made for the emancipation of the Indians. Under the present condition of the law the Indians are discouraged from seeking emancipation. I think the moment the Department is satisfied that the Indian is fit for emancipation, every effort should be made to emancipate him and throw him wholly upon his own resources. I think there should also be a provision made to introduce, amongst the various Indian bands, a system of municipal government. I do not say that the Indians should be incorporated with the municipalities in which the reservations are situated, but I think they should be required to take an active part in the administration of their own affairs. They can be easily guided and assisted in this matter by the agents, and by the hon. the Minister of the Interior himself. I know there is a provision in the Act, with regard to the performance of statute labour, and for other purposes, connected with the management of the Indian reservations; but with these reservations 1,500 or 2,000 miles away from Ottawa, it is utterly impossible for the Minister to judge of their condition and give them proper supervision. Municipal institutions of a simple character should be given them, such as the election of a council, to impose taxation, to a limited extent, for certain specified purposes; to require them to perform statute labour; to require them to contribute from the products of their industry towards the maintenance of schools amongst themselves. I am satisfied such a change would be greatly to the benefit of the Indians. I maintain that the provisions of the law exempting the Indians from all obligations for debt have not worked satisfactorily. I am sure that must have been the experience of the hon. gentleman himself. I know from my own observation that the tendency is to demoralise the Indians. They have gone to traders and bought necessary articles of food, and being protected by the law against any legal process for the enforcement of their obligations, have refused to pay their debts and have set the white population at defiance. The effect has been to make them dishonest, and to make them unpopular with the white population. The hon. gentleman has spoken of the extent to which the Indian lands are bought up by the whites in their immediate neighbourhood. Now, if the Indians were an industrious population, there would be no more disposition to buy them out than there is for one portion of the white population to buy out another. The first duty of the Government is to seek to promote habits of industry, independence and honesty among them by the means I have indicated, or at least to make the experiment. If intelligently and efficiently made I have no doubt as to the result.

MR. DAWSON: In this discussion there seems to be a general idea prevalent that it would be greatly to the advantage of the Indians if they were allowed to dispose of their lands. Now I am of opinion that the tribal system, at present followed, is the best for the protection of the Indians. If you give an Indian the power of selling his lands whenever he chooses, the result would be that a few white people would get possession of the Indian lands, and the Indians themselves would be driven all over the world. Within the past six or eight years, under a more careful administration of Indian affairs than formerly prevailed, the condition of the Indians has very much improved, and is continuing to improve. I think the present Act is very defective in some respects, particularly in the provision with regard to enfranchisement. The only condition on which an Indian can become enfranchised is by separating his share of the lands or his particular allotment from the lands or reserve held in common by the band at large. This is holding forth a premium for the breaking up of the tribal system, which is the only true protection remaining to the Indians against the rapacity of the white man. If an Indian is an educated man, if he has become equal to his white neighbours, why not allow him to become enfranchised without hampering him with a lot of utterly impracticable rules and regulations, such as are continued in this Act? Why should it be impossible for him to become enfranchised, and still remain a member of his band. That would lead to the Indian bands being scattered. I think it would be possible to devise some system by which the Indians could be enfranchised and the tribal system, at the same time, continued. I know Indians at present who are very well off, who employ white men as their servants, and yet cannot vote at Elections, because they will not consent to separate from their people. They look upon separation from their bands as a disgrace, and the Indian who does so is stigmatised among his people as a traitor to his race. I am satisfied that the Indians would be elevated in their own estimation, and that it would tend to their civilisation, if they could become enfranchised, when otherwise qualified, and still remain connected with their bands. The tribal system is the first protection of the Indian, and the abolition of that system would lead to the demoralisation and eventual destruction of the race.

MR. CASEY: I do not consider it is treating this House with the consideration to which it is entitled to bring down a measure of this importance upon the last working day of the Session, and more especially is this the case when this Bill, as it professes to be, a consolidation of the laws relating to Indians. There is really very little that is new in the measure. There is nothing new in it that is urgent, unless it is claimed that the changing of the name of the head of the Department is so. I am of opinion that it would be well to allow it to stand over until it can be rationally considered, which it cannot be now. The general tendency of our Indian legislation has been to make matters worse than they were before. The hon. member for Algoma has stated that the tribal system is the best for keeping the Indians together. The question for us to consider is, whether it is advisable to keep the Indian tribes together, and separate from the rest of the community. That was necessary, no doubt, when the Indians were the helpless wards of the Crown, but I should be very much surprised if the country at large would think it advisable, in the case of Indians who have settled down, that they should con-time in that state of tutelage for ever. For my part, I do not consider that it is advisable to make this condition of things permanent. I think Indians, who are equal to whites in intelligence, who are superior to many whites in wealth, and who are full grown citizens of the Dominion, should not be placed in a worse condition than the negro. I think it is quite possible to get over the objection the hon. member for Algoma has alluded to, that Indians will not leave their bands by allowing them to retain their tribal connection, but not their share of the funds. In the 24th Clause there is another objectionable provision. It provides:

“ That if a person has been once convicted of trespassing on Indian lands, he can afterwards be imprisoned by the Superintendent General, or whoever he may depute, without notice or trial, on the information of interested parties that he has repeated the offence.”

An instance came to my knowledge, recently, in which a man was arrested and put in jail without having received the slightest notice that he was charged with a repetition of the offence. He claims that the affidavit was a perjured one, but he had no opportunity of showing its falsity, and no remedy whatever; such a law is monstrous. There are several other sections which interfere with citizens' rights. One says that if any timber, stolen from Indian lands, becomes mixed with other timber so as not to be easily distinguishable, the whole may be seized. In such a case the timber may belong to an innocent third party, who may be thus deprived of his property for the benefit of the Indians. I do not see why the laws protecting the rights of Indians in regard to trespass should be any more stringent than those affecting the white man. The tendency of the Bill is to place Indians under the protection of the Government and above all law.

Bill read the second time.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the said Bill.

(In the Committee.)

On Section 12,

MR. PATERSON (South Brant) said its principle was all wrong, since it maintained the tribal system. This was wise and prudent years ago, and was wise and prudent yet with regard to many lands in the North-West; but an Indian law should be so elastic that its conditions would operate among the most advanced Indians. He trusted that the hon. gentleman (Sir John A. Macdonald) would see the propriety of striking out the clause.

Section agreed to.

On Section 22,

MR. PATERSON said this clause also involved a principle that was wrong in itself. It declared that no white person, or any one not an Indian, shall be permitted to lease or occupy land on the reserves. He thought it was desirable, in the interest of the Indian, that he should have the right to lease to white men if he saw fit. The presence of white men on the reserves would tend much to instruct the Indians in the proper modes of working the land.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said he did not believe in the whites getting into the reserves so long as the tribal system is kept up.

MR. CASEY said he thought it would be of great advantage to the bands if Indians were allowed to lease to persons who knew how to till the soil.

MR. DAWSON said the result of such a privilege would be to break up the bands. Until the Indians are further advanced and better instructed in the ways of the white man, it would not do to introduce a foreign element amongst them. Experience proved that such experiments were ruinous to the Indians in their present condition. There were some non-treaty Indians in Algoma, a good many of whom were not recognised as belonging to the band. They are looked upon as American Indians, but they are not, and they had sent down petitions to be considered as the rest of the tribe. It was desirable something should be done to let those poor people into the band.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD : That is worthy of consideration.

Section agreed to.

On Section 77,

MR. PATERSON (South Brant) said he was opposed to the principle of protecting Indians from being sued. This "protection clause," as it was called, was rather a disadvantage to them than otherwise. An Indian might desire credit, and it might be in his interest to have credit, but there being no recourse for the collection of a debt against him, no one will give him credit.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said there were great difficulties in the way of a change.

Section agreed to on a division.

On Section 81,

MR. PATERSON (South Brant) said he was in sympathy with the hon. the Minister of the Interior in this matter of the sale of liquor to Indians. Situated as they were in his county, there was a great deal of trouble arising from the liquor traffic. He would suggest a provision to this effect: That if a person saw an Indian drinking liquor, he should lodge information with the Local Superintendent, that officer being allowed to prosecute without divulging the name of the informer. The trouble was that no one liked to inform, because when their names were divulged they subjected themselves to annoyance from the drink seller. The informer should be allowed to give the names of witnesses who might be summoned, but not compelled to give evidence himself.

Section agreed to on a division.

On Section 94,

MR. PATERSON asked if it would be too much to keep the Indian until he did tell where he got his liquor.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD : That is pretty hard; it is not treating them like white men.

Section agreed to on a division.

Bill ordered to be reported.

House resumed.

(In the House.)

Bill reported.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the third reading of the Bill.

MR. CASEY moved in amendment :

That the Bill be not now read the third time, but that it be recommitted to a Committee of the Whole, with instructions that they have power to amend it, by leaving out all the words in Section 23 between "made to him" in line 13 and "issue" in line 14, and inserting the following :—"summon before some Stipendiary Magistrate, Police Magistrate, or Justice of the Peace such person or Indian; and such Stipendiary Magistrate, Police Magistrate or Justice of the Peace shall, after hearing the complaint and defence, if the complaint be proven to his satisfaction."

Motion, in amendment, negatived on a division.

Bill read the third time and passed.

QUEBEC, MONTREAL AND OTTAWA
OCCIDENTAL RAILWAY BILL.

[BILL 118.]

(Mr. McDonald, P. C. O.)

BILL WITHDRAWN.

Order for second reading read.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou): The preamble explains its object. The clauses are very short. Their object is to remove some difficulty with respect to the title of the Railway acquired by the Province of Quebec in two Sections, one from Quebec to Montreal, and another from Montreal to Ottawa. I need not call the attention of hon. gentlemen to the fact that the road from Montreal to Aylmer was by an Act of this Parliament made a Dominion road, and, therefore, the legislation in reference to it rests in this Legislature. The road from Montreal to Quebec was previously ceded to the Local Government, and it is the opinion of the officials of that Government that the cession of these rights should be ratified by an Act of this Parliament, and it is for the purpose of obtaining that ratification that this Bill is introduced.

MR. BLAKE: I am obliged to object to the second reading of this Bill. I have a letter from a well-known advocate in the Province of Quebec, setting forth that this Bill will interfere with the rights of parties who have claims against this Railway; and as there is no petition of right in that Province, the Local Government could not be proceeded against. This Bill, affecting as it does private rights, ought to have been introduced in the proper course by petition. That would have enabled these private rights to be discussed before the appropriate Committee. On the 12th of March, 1875, a motion was made by a member of then Government for leave to bring in a Bill affecting the Northern Railway. It was objected that as the Bill affected private rights it should be introduced as a Private Bill. The Speaker then held that this point was well taken, and it seems to me the same point of order arises here.

MR. ANGERS: I am sorry the hon. member for West Durham has raised this point of order in relation to this Bill. By referring to the Statute passed by the Province of Quebec, I think the House will be easily convinced that the point of order does not lie, and that there are no private rights which may be affected by the Bill. The Bill is rather a public measure, affecting one of the Provinces of the Dominion. The Quebec, Montreal, Ottawa and Occidental Railway Company will still remain in existence after this measure is passed and may be sued by any parties having rights of action against it. Therefore, I maintain that no private rights can be affected by the measure and that it should be treated as a public Bill. A Bill was introduced last Session to empower the Province of Quebec to build a bridge over the Ottawa, but I do not believe it was treated as a Private Bill but rather as a Public Bill.

MR. ABBOTT: No private rights can be interfered with, because the Province of Quebec will assume the liabilities of the company.

MR. BLAKE: I think the discussion shows that there is some question as to whether private rights are affected.

MR. McDONALD moved that the order be discharged, and the Bill withdrawn.

Motion agreed to, and Bill withdrawn.

CANADIAN WATERS NAVIGATION
BILL.—[BILL 121.]

(Mr. Pope, Queen's, P. E. I.)

SECOND AND THIRD READINGS.

Order for second reading read.

MR. ROBERTSON (Shelburne): This is a very important Bill, and should, in order to be properly discussed, have been brought in at an earlier stage of the Session. It makes many changes in the law. I am aware that similar Acts have been adopted by the Parliaments of the maritime nations of the world, but the clause in reference to lights of fishing vessels, largely affects that important industry, and should be suspended as in those other countries where similar legislation has been adopted. The regulations regarding lights should be suspended, so far as fishing vessels are concerned, as suggested in England by the Board of Trade.

MR. POPE (Queen's, P. E. I.): The rules and regulations have been adopted by the United States. The consequences would be serious if this Bill did not become law, and you cannot adopt a part of the regulations without the whole. The rules are necessary to prevent collision, and they will keep fishing boats from the risk of being run down when outside the three-mile limits.

MR. BLAKE: The hon. Minister has been kind enough to give me a memorandum showing what the Bill proposes to do, and to show me that there is very little difference between the old Bill and the new Bill; but still it is to be regretted that this measure has not been brought down earlier. Taking into account the statement made by the hon. member for Shelburne (Mr. Robertson) to the effect that the new rules are to be suspended elsewhere, it would seem that if we put them in force before the end of another year, we shall be, during that time, in advance of other countries, and that we shall, meanwhile, be making a distinction between this and other countries. It would be better to amend the Bill as regards fishing vessels, so as to give the Governor in Council power to suspend those regulations, and bring them into operation when it is found expedient after due consideration.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I have spoken now to the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries; and he thinks there is a good deal in the suggestion of the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), and we shall arrange to have it carried out.

MR. BLAKE: Then on that statement it would be as well to allow the Bill to go to-night.

Bill read the second time, considered in Committee of the Whole, reported, read the third time and passed.

GOVERNMENT BILLS.

SECOND AND THIRD READINGS.

The following Bills were severally read the second time, considered in Committee of the Whole, reported, read the third time, and passed:—

Bill (No. 122) To ratify and confirm an agreement therein mentioned, between the Government of Canada and the Canada Central Railway Company.—(Sir Samuel L. Tilley.)

Bill (No. 124) To amend the Act respecting the Trinity House and Harbour Commissioners of Montreal.—(Mr. Pope, Queen's, P.E.I.)

Bill (No. 125) To confirm a certain Order of the Governor in Council respecting the Graving Dock at Esquimalt.—(Sir Samuel L. Tilley.)

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY—LAND REGULATIONS.

RESOLUTION ADOPTED.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the following Resolution:—

That it is expedient to substitute for the seventh of the series of Resolutions relating to the Canadian Pacific Railway, adopted by this House on the 12th and 13th May last, the following Resolutions:—

(a) That one hundred millions of acres of land in Manitoba and the North-West Territories be appropriated for the purpose of constructing the Canadian Pacific Railway.

(b) That such lands shall be from time to time selected and reserved by order of the Governor in Council as Railway lands, and shall be of fair average quality for settlement.

(c) That such lands shall be sold at prices to be fixed from time to time by the Governor in Council, but in no case at a rate of less than one dollar per acre.

(d) That the proceeds of such sales, after deducting the cost of survey and management, shall be devoted exclusively to the purpose of defraying the cost of the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway.

(In the Committee.)

MR. ANGLIN: Parties will not be permitted by the Resolutions to go in upon those lands and take up homesteads.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: The Resolutions will not prevent that. It is not proposed to alter the regulations for the sale of lands, but it is proposed to conform the Railway Resolutions of last year to the existing Act, which leaves the homestead regulations as at present.

MR. BLAKE: I think some explanations should be given before those Resolutions pass. I think the purpose of the hon. the First Minister is to substitute these Resolutions for the 7th of the former series, with a view to their harmonising with the present policy of the Government which has been developed by the regulations in Council in the formation of the various belts, and not with a view to any new policy. It is out of the belt of 220 miles, established by these regulations that the 100,000,000 acres are expected to be obtained?

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Not necessarily.

MR. BLAKE: How many acres do you expect to find in that belt for your purpose, and how many are fit for fair average settlement?

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I cannot state the exact quantity of land in those belts. It will not fall short of 100,000,000 acres. It has been ascertained beyond a doubt that beyond those belts there are good lands—220,000,000 acres fit for settlement. That is the Report of the Surveyor-General and the Deputy Minister of the Interior. So, whatever may be the deficiency of those belts, it can be made up elsewhere.

MR. BLAKE: The statement is certainly very satisfactory. Not long ago we had a detailed statement, with a map, from the hon. the Minister of Railways, to the effect that the whole region from the American boundary on the south and the Rocky Mountains on the west, including the whole Peace River district, contained but 189,000,000 acres, of which he estimated that from 30,000,000 to 39,000,000 acres were unfit, and 150,000,000 acres fit for settlement, comprising the arable and pasture land. Does the hon. the First Minister, in his totally different statement, include the British Columbia lands?

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: No.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: Whatever I may have said, I intended to say this: My calculation applied to the region from the western boundary of Manitoba to the Rocky Mountains, including only a portion of the Peace River district, as was based upon a very careful examination of the territory by Professor Macoum, whose Report will shortly be published.

MR. BLAKE: No information can be given as to the exact quantity of land supposed to be available for settlement?

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: No.

MR. BLAKE: Are the free grant lands counted in the 100,000,000 acres? We have first the railway lands; second, the preemption; last, the free grants. Are the 100,000,000 acres to be exclusive of the homestead lands?

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Yes.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT: In that case you will have to set apart about 133,000,000 acres or thereabouts, because you have now four distinct portions: two are reserved for the Railway, one for homesteads, and one for preemptions.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: Yes.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT:

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD.

I shall be delighted if the computation of 220,000,000 acres proves accurate. I may observe that 100,000,000 acres by themselves make 160,000 square miles.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I will lay on the Table a map prepared by Professor Macoum, that has been placed in my hands, showing 220,000,000 acres of good arable land fit for settlement. It is prepared upon the best information that can be got in the country. The Professor has gone all over that country and tried every available means to ascertain its character. He has found that even in those parts heretofore considered a desert, considerable portions are fit for settlement.

MR. MILLS: In my opinion no real advantage can be derived from reserving lands for the construction of a road that are not to be improved or made available by the road, and that all the lands situated at a greater distance than twenty miles from the line of Railway ought not to be reserved for the construction of that road. If railways through these lands are necessary to make them good for settlement, how are you going to get railways through them if the lands themselves are reserved for sale to build the railway?

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: We must remember that we are obliged to build the Pacific Railway without increasing the taxation of the country, and, therefore, we must set aside lands for that purpose. If there were no such restrictions as to taxation we might allow other considerations to enter into this subject. But these two premises being granted, first, that we must build the Railway, and second, that we are not to incur increased taxation for it, we must use those lands. As the lands increase in value, we will, in my opinion, derive a much larger fund from the sale of those lands than will be required to pay for the Railway. I am quite satisfied of that. The whole experience of the United States proves that. Look at the Northern Pacific road, where, at this moment, it is found that the company have made so much money out of their lands, that the subject is up in Congress to take away the balance of the land, because they are selling it for $150 an acre instead of $10. It is important for us that we should be able to show in Europe, as well as America, that our lands are of sufficient value to build the road, that there will be no taxation, that emigrants can go and settle in that country and have railways, and that they are not going to suffer from extreme taxation. My estimation may be a sanguine one, but if my ideas about the value of those lands be correct, then their sale will produce not only enough to build the Railway, but leave a large fund besides, with which we can do just as we like. We can assist auxiliary railways, and pay all the expenses of the Government.

MR. MILLS: The objection to the hon. gentleman's proposition is that it prevents the construction of auxiliary railways until the main line is built, and it locks up all the lands for the time being. There can be no advantage to the country in reserving any lands to build this Pacific Railway that are not to have a direct increased value given them by the construction of that particular road. If you commence reserving lands 100 miles away which can only have a value by building a road through those lands, you prevent yourselves from building such roads. Such roads are to be built long before the Railway reaches them, and the policy proposed by the Government is one which will retard the settlement of the country. The policy should be to confine the land reservation to a reasonable distance from the road, leaving the hands of the people and the Government untied to their lands, free to aid those roads which will best contribute to the settlement of the country, which is of far more consequence than any sum of money to be derived from the sale of those lands.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: The Government do not at all propose to lock up any given piece of land in that region of the country. They have provided that the even-numbered lots shall be provided for homestead purposes, and the odd-numbered lots for railway lands. The hon. gentleman must know that the proposition of the present Government is far more liberal in these matters than the proposition of his own Government. The hon. gentleman knows that by the Orders in Council of his own Government, there are twenty miles on each side of that road, as far as North Lake, absolutely reserved, withdrawn from settlement as railway lands. When the line of Railway was altered by the present Government and was run south of the lake, the same provision which exists in regard to North Lake was carried out in the South Lake. Then, in consequence of the statements made in the press, that we excluded the settler by making a provision similar to that of the hon. gentleman's Government, the regulations were altered and only alternate lots were reserved for railway purposes. We adopted the United States system which was that there should be alternate sections, one of which should be railway land and the other homestead preemption land. All that this Resolution provides for is simply that there should be 100,000,000 acres reserved. If the same policy is adopted with regard to any other land lying outside the present belt, then, of course, it will be that every alternate section shall be railway land and every other section open to the settler. Should that policy require alteration, we can modify it at any time. But it is of great importance, in order to relieve all anxiety about this country being overtaxed, to build the Railway, that the emigrants from Europe should know that the produce of those acres stand between them and the possibility of taxation. Hereafter should it become known that, instead of 100,000,000 acres, a smaller amount was sufficient for the purposes of building that Railway, then we can gracefully diminish the amount to 75,000,000 or 50,000,000 acres, and we can afford to be more liberal in the sale of those lands. The hon. gentleman must see that we are only carrying out the policy his Government proposed. Now let us look at these Orders in Council.

MR. MILLS said the hon. gentleman was mistaken, because he knew there was an Order in Council reserving those lands.

MR. BANNERMAN said he had travelled fifty or sixty miles over that road, and until he came within twenty-eight or twenty-nine miles of the city of Winnipeg, there was not one lot of land taken up.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: It is because they did not know what price would be charged.

MR. BANNERMAN said that was exactly what he was trying to prove. He was told by parties that they would have gone on the Railway Belt, but they did not know what price would be charged. Since the new regulations had been made, quite a number of settlers had gone on the original Railway Belt.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said he was in error in regard to the statement he had made with regard to the Order in Council, and he apologised to the hon. gentleman for the statement he had made.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY.

RAJIFICATION OF CONTRACT.

Resolved, That the House do approve of the contract for the construction of one hundred miles of that portion of the Canadian Pacific Railway, commencing at the end of the 48th Contract, near the Western Boundary of Manitoba, and extending to a point on the west side of the Valley of Bird Tail Creek, which Contract was laid on the Table of the House on the 3rd instant.—(Sir Charles Tupper.)

SECOND AND THIRD READINGS.

MR. COLBY: Before you leave the Chair, Sir, I desire to call the attention of the House to a subject, which although outside the general range of subjects now engaging our attention, I deem to be of sufficient importance to justify a brief mention, even at this late period of the Session and this late hour of the night. I refer to the great project which is now attracting so much attention on this continent and in Europe, namely, the project of an inter-oceanic canal across the Central American Isthmus. The Conference at Paris last year, the project which has been inaugurated under the auspices of ex-President Grant, the recent visit of M. de Lesseps to the Isthmus and to the United States, the recent discussions in the United States Congress, the recent message of the President in reply to a resolution from the Senate, the active interest manifested in high financial circles on this continent and in Europe, all indicate a growing feeling among the statesmen and capitalists of the most wealthy nations that the time has arrived when, in the interests of commerce, the narrow band that separates the two oceans should be pierced and a great national water-way opened for the traffic of the world. I shall not delay the House by any disquisition with regard to the comparative merits of the rival routes, or the great commercial advantages of the scheme, nor will I refer to the engineering difficulties which have to be overcome, or any material questions of that kind. But there is one incidental question which forces itself upon our attention, deeply affecting, as it does, the prosperity, the commercial interests and the prestige of this Dominion. It is a question of international concern, and one which may be the subject of negotiation between the Government of the United States and the Government of Great Britain, before we shall have an opportunity of meeting in this hall. It is obvious, and, I believe, undisputed, that this canal, when constructed, must be open to the commerce of the world, as freely as are the great oceans it will connect. Those oceans are the common property of mankind, and should not, nor should any waterway, natural or artificial, which may unite them, be subjected to the sovereign authority or exclusive control of any particular nation. Whatever route may be adopted, it must pass through the territories of some feeble Central American State, which is quite unable either to construct the work, or to protect the foreign capital invested in it. Some one or more of the great powers, therefore, will, in the interest of all commercial nations, be under the necessity of assuming the directorate of that canal, and the protection of the capital therein invested. The practical question which is likely to be forced upon the attention of nations, very shortly, will be this: Which power or what combined powers shall assume that responsibility? It is obvious that, of the great commercial nations, the two having the greatest interest in the work are Great Britain and the United States. It concerns not only the American possessions of Great Britain, great and important as those possessions are, but it concerns also the interest of the Empire at large. She is the foremost commercial nation, and having dominions on all the continents and in all the seas, she lacks this link only to complete the girdle of direct continuous navigation around the globe, which would bring more nearly together her scattered possessions. The interests of the United States are felt, by the people of that country, to be even greater than those of Great Britain and the other nations. They seem to feel that the project is peculiarly their own. The question of a protectorate of this great enterprise was, at one time, a subject of negotiation between the United States and Great Britain, was once settled—and is now settled, so far as treaty obligations and conventions can settle it—by the Treaty known as the Clayton-Bulwer Treaty. I beg to call the attention of the House to the provisions of that Treaty, to the fact that it was initiated by the Government of the United States, and to the grounds upon which it is based. In a letter from Mr. Rives to Mr. Clayton, dated September 25th, 1849, Mr. Clayton is informed by Mr. Rives that, under his instructions, he had an interview with Lord Palmerston on the question, and Mr. Rives says he told Lord Palmerston, in this interview:

“That the United States sought no exclusive privilege or preferential right of any kind in regard to the proposed communication, and their sincere wish, if it should be found practicable, was to see it dedicated to the common use of all nations, on the most liberal terms, and a footing of perfect equality for all, securing it beforehand, by proper stipulations, against unreasonable and oppressive exactions for the use of it, either from the State through whose territories it should pass, or the individuals or companies who might be authorized to construct it; that the United States would not, if they could, obtain any exclusive right or privilege in a great highway, which naturally belonged to all mankind, for they well knew that the possession of any such privilege would expose them to inevitable jealousies and probable controversies, which would make it infinitely more costly than advantageous; that while they aimed at no exclusive privilege for themselves they would never consent to see so important a communication fall under the exclusive control of any other great commercial power.”

That was the basis on which the overtures were made, and those overtures were accepted in the same spirit; and the result of the negotiations which ensued was the Treaty consummated in 1850, known as the Clayton-Bulwer Treaty. The preamble sets forth the following:—

“The United States of America and Her Britannic Majesty, being desirous of consolidating the relations of amity which so happily subsist between them, by setting forth and fixing in a convention their views and intentions with reference to any means of communication by ship canal which may be constructed between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, etc.”

The first article provides :

“The Government of the United States and Great Britain hereby declare that neither the one nor the other will ever obtain or maintain for itself any exclusive control over the said ship canal; agreeing that neither will ever erect or maintain any fortifications commanding the same, or in the vicinity thereof, etc.”

Guaranteeing, in fact, the neutrality of the proposed canal. Article three guarantees the protection of those who might be engaged in the construction of the work. Article six provides :

“The contracting parties in this Convention engage to invite every state with which both or either have friendly intercourse, to enter into stipulations with them similar to those which they have entered into with each other, to the end that all other states may share in the honour and advantage of having contributed to a work of such general interest and importance as the canal herein contemplated. And the contracting parties likewise agree that each shall enter into treaty stipulations with such of the Central American States, as they may deem advisable, for the purpose of more effectually carrying out the great design of the Convention, namely, that of constructing and maintaining the said canal as a ship communication between the two oceans for the benefit of mankind on equal terms to all, and of protecting the same.”

That is the scope and effect of the Treaty. Mr. Webster, in 1852, speaking of this Treaty, says, in his instructions to Mr. Lawrence :

“Considering that the United States and Great Britain have jointly agreed to protect such a canal, and in consequence of their possessions on the coast of the Pacific, and of other obvious causes, have a similar interest in its success, it seems desirable that the capital required for its construction should be advanced by the citizens and subjects of both countries.”

These statements establish sufficiently that the canal was conceived to be an enterprise in the interest of all mankind, while it specially interested those two nations. Mr. Webster said the interests of Great Britain and the United States were similar. The Convention was designed to consolidate and perpetuate the relations of amity existing between the two countries. The eighth Article of the Treaty says :

“The Governments of the United States and Great Britain not only desired, in entering into this Convention, to accomplish a particular object, but also to establish a general principle.”

It was, therefore, designed to permanently settle the question. A more liberal, generous, cosmopolitan arrangement than that, one characterised by greater consideration for the interest of contracting parties and of the world at large, could not be conceived. It recognised the more immediate interest of the contracting parties, but made equal provision for all other nations who might choose to undertake the responsibilities and share the advantages of the contemplated water-way. True, some complications subsequently arose; some questions as to the abandonment of rights which England claimed to have acquired previously, but the substantial fairness of the main propositions was never questioned, I believe, until recently. Some members of this House who have not given attention to the subject, may be surprised to learn that the President of the United States has recently, in a communication to Congress, submitted as the policy he proposes the United States should pursue in this matter, one as nearly as possible the reverse of that which these two contracting parties deliberately agreed upon in 1850. Without any cause assigned for this novel proposition, he announces that hereafter this is not to be considered an Anglo-American project in the control of which other nations may join, but is exclusively an American project, and must be exclusively under American control. In the overtures for the Clayton-Bulwer Treaty the United States expressly disavowed any desire to have exclusive control. Now the new and somewhat startling doctrine is announced that the United States must have exclusive control of the great inter-oceanic canal, and that if any obstacles stand in the way of that policy they must be removed. The President, in his Message to the Senate on the 9th of March last, states :

“In further compliance with the Resolution of the Senate, I deem it proper to state briefly my opinion as to the policy of the United States with regard to the construction of an inter-oceanic canal, by any route across the American isthmus. The policy of this country is a canal under American control. The United States cannot consent to the surrender of the control to any European power, or to any combination of European powers. If existing Treaties between the United States and other nations, or if the rights of sovereignty or property of other nations stand in the way of this policy—a contingency which is not apprehended—suitable steps should be taken by just and liberal negotiations to promote and establish the American policy on this subject consistently with the rights of the nations to be affected by it. The capital invested by corporations or citizens of other countries in such an enterprise must, in a great degree, look for protection to one or more of the great powers of the world. No European power can intervene for such protection, without adopting measures on this continent which the United States would deem wholly inadmissible.”

He goes on say :

“ Without urging further the grounds of my opinion, I repeat, in conclusion, that it is the right and duty of the United States to assert and maintain such supervision and authority over any inter-oceanic canal across the isthmus that connects North and South America, as will protect our national interests.”

The proposition seems to be this, if I rightly apprehend the significance of this Message, that, if existing Treaties stand in the way of the policy he proposed, those Treaties must be removed by negotiations or otherwise. We are, consequently, on the eve of negotiations between the United States and Great Britain for the removal of any difficulties that may stand in the way of carrying out this exclusively American policy. Now, Sir, this policy, which the President recommends is, as I view it, an entirely new policy—a new departure. It foreshadows the inception of negotiations for the abrogation of the Clayton-Bulwer Treaty. It signifies an exclusively United States protectorate, in place of a joint protectorate of the Central American States. It means the supremacy of the United States in commercial affairs on this hemisphere. My purpose in drawing attention to this subject, is not so much to controvert this proposition thus stated, in explicit and firm, though not offensive, language, as to state it, in order that the House and the country may consider whether we, as a community, occupying a considerable portion of the North American continent, would be in any way affected by it if adopted. I observe that some American press writers, and some speakers in Congress, treat this declaration as the legitimate outcome or sequence of the Monroe doctrine so-called, and discuss the question as if the Monroe doctrine was universally accepted and recognised, and had become part of the law of nations. Now, Sir, I venture the proposition that the Monroe doctrine was never so recognised, and that if it were indeed so recognised the case, now being considered, does not fall within either its terms or intentions. The Monroe doctrine was purely of political significance. The inter-oceanic canal is essentially a commercial question. The Monroe doctrine was promulgated to meet a special exigency, and being addressed by the President to the Congress of his own country, was not stated in a way to challenge acquiescence or dissent or definitive action by other nations; indeed it has been disregarded by the United States themselves. The occasion which drew out the promulgation of the Monroe doctrine, and the doctrine itself, may be briefly stated. In 1822, an alliance was formed, between France and Austria, for the purpose of suppressing the destructive and revolutionary ideas then widely prevalent. Spain wishing to reclaim her revolted American colonies, invoked the assistance of the alliance. England was opposed to the intervention of the allied powers, and invited the cooperation of the United States in her endeavours to prevent it. The Government of the United States cheerfully fell in with the proposition. The “Monroe doctrine,” as first announced by President Monroe, in his seventh annual message to Congress in 1823, was enunciated as follows:—

“ In the wars of European powers, in matters relating to themselves we have never taken any part, nor does it comport with our policy to do so. It is only when our rights are invaded or seriously menaced, that we resent injuries or make preparations for our defence. With the movements in this hemisphere we are of necessity more intimately connected, and by causes which must be obvious to all enlightened and impartial observers. The political system of allied powers is essentially different in this respect from that of America. This difference proceeds from that which exists in their respective governments. * * * We owe it, therefore, to candour and to the amicable relations existing between the United States and those powers to declare that we should consider any attempt, on their part, to extend their system to any portion of the hemisphere, as dangerous to our peace and safety.”

That refers to the system of the allied powers, the political system of Austria and the legitimist Government of France, the nations which then were attempting to strike at those principles for which Americans had fought, and it was against that system that this "Monroe Doctrine" was a protest. It was so considered by one of their great writers on International Law, Henry Wheaton, who says :

"It was impossible that the allied powers should extend their political system to any portion of these continents without endangering the peace and happiness of the United States. It was, therefore, impossible that the latter should behold such interposition in any form with indifference."

This doctrine was purely political. It was a protest against the establishment of a certain political system on this continent. Such is the view taken by Henry Clay upon the memorable occasion when he, as Secretary of State, had been solicited to assist Mexico when it was supposed France was meditating an invasion of Cuba. In his report of March 24, 1826, to the House of Representatives, he said :

"If, indeed, an attempt by force had been made by allied Europe to subvert the liberties of the southern nations on this continent and to erect upon the ruins of their free institutions monarchical systems, the people of the United States would have stood pledged, in the opinion of their Executive, not to any foreign State, but to themselves and their posterity, by their dearest interests and their highest duties, to resist to the utmost such attempt."

This was, so far as other nations were concerned, a declaration expressive of the policy of the United States, given by their Executive to their own Congress, a policy by which they distinctly disavowed any form of connection with the other States of America or obligation to carry out the Monroe doctrine, except so far as it suited their own interests. That this doctrine was never recognised by other nations, I shall quote from Calvo on International Law :

"This political formula has been to a great extent acted upon by the United States, especially with regard to their taking no part in European politics. Nevertheless, it still exists as a 'doctrine,' and has not been incorporated into any legislative enactment or into any convention."

It has never been recognized by foreign nations as a doctrine which binds them in any way. True, the United States have abstained from intervention in the affairs of Europe, and in one instance have had occasion to exercise that doctrine. That was the invasion of Mexico by France, and the endeavour to establish the ill-starred Maximilian as sovereign of that country. There were several circumstances, apart from the Monroe doctrine, which would justify the United States in not recognising the Government he established at Mexico. He was there under the auspices of Napoleon III., who endeavoured to obtain recognition of the Southern Confederacy, and to establish an Imperial system in America under the auspices of the European powers; and the United States could, therefore, be justified in refusing to recognise his de facto Government, and subsequently assisting in expelling the French army of occupation. This doctrine propounded by President Hayes, is not the one promulgated by President Monroe. The Monroe doctrine was purely political. This is a purely commercial question. It is difficult to see how the Monroe doctrine, which was merely a protest against the compulsory establishment of the political systems of Europe upon feeble and reluctant States on the American continent, can be made to cover the policy of the exclusive control of a great commercial enterprise, which is of interest to all the world, and the establishment of a United States coast line remote from the boundaries of the nation. The isthmian canal involves no political question. No European power seeks to obtain new territory, or to impress its political system upon any part of the continent. It is strictly a commercial project and does not fall within the scope of the broadest interpretation of the Monroe doctrine. Suppose that, by some great natural convulsion, the wall which divides the two oceans should be rent asunder and a great waterway opened for the commerce of the world, by what right could any nation except the one having the sovereignty, appropriate the exclusive control of a great natural channel? Unless a single nation provides the capital and constructs the work, how can it pretend, except by convention with other nations, to the right of exclusive control? The assumption of such a right would, I think, be untenable and the message of President Hayes, properly interpreted, may mean nothing more than the recommendation of a policy to be adopted with the assent and concurrence of the other great powers. It is well to consider what would be the relations of European powers to the affairs of this continent if the new policy be engrafted upon the Monroe doctrine and both be adopted as a rule of International Law. Thereafter no European power could, under any circumstances, interfere with political affairs on this continent; but the United States would be free to throw the great weight of their power and influence into any political contest in any of the weaker States. Thereafter, not only the European States but all the American communities, except the United States, would be precluded from any voice or control of the interoceanic canal in which all have an interest, and they would be obliged to content themselves with such privileges as the United States declares she is willing to accord to the world at large. The unconditional recognition and acceptance of this policy would be a precedent to justify the occupation of every strategical commercial point on this continent in the interest of American commerce, just as the Monroe doctrine, if accepted in its broadest sense, would justify the occupation of every strategical military and naval position in the interest of the peace and safety of the United States. Now, Sir, I do not think that Great Britain, which is a great power on this continent, and has great possessions and great interests here, can be fairly asked to unconditionally accept this new policy, engrafted upon the old doctrine and all the logical consequences, which would flow therefrom. In the interests of the millions of her faithful American subjects she has duties and responsibilities of which she cannot divest herself. It may be convenient, in the interest of the world at large, that the United States should be permitted to assume the protectorate of the Central American, States and the control, as the trustee of all the nations, of the interoceanic canal. Such an arrangement, based upon comity and considerations of mutual convenience, would involve no principle to which any reasonable objection could be taken. But there is a broad distinction between such a convention and one which would compel the Queen of Canada, and of her other possessions in America, to abnegate the powers, functions and influence which she exercises, without question or objection, upon all the other continents in similar circumstances. As Empress of India she observes and takes an active interest in all affairs, political and commercial, which concern the welfare of her Asiatic subjects. As Queen of the British Isles, her voice and influence are potential in the affairs of Europe. It would be anomalous if, upon this continent alone, she should refrain from the exercise of her legitimate influence in matters which concern the welfare of her faithful subjects here. We, Sir, as a British community in North America, occupy a territory as extensive as that of the United States. Like the United States we span the continent and have a frontage upon both oceans. We are striving to develop our great resources and populate our extensive territory, to build up internal commerce by great systems of railways and canals. But while doing so, we should not forget the requirements of our external commerce, or our great capabilities of becoming a great commercial nation. Our facilities for building and manning ships are unrivalled. Our forests and our mines, upon both oceans, abound in the best material for ship-building. We have, upon both oceans, the finest Fisheries in the world, the nurseries and training schools of seamen. What California is to the United States, British Columbia is to us. We desire to compete with the United States in commerce with the South American States upon the Pacific coast. For whatever purposes the United States require to use the interoceanic canal, when built, we need it also for similar purposes. I believe, Sir, that for the reasons I have suggested, rather than explained, we should consider this great subject in its relation to our future as a growing community on this continent; that we should protest against the surrender of any power, influence, or prerogative of our Sovereign, which might be rightfully exercised for our advantage, and that as an American community having a deep interest in all questions relating to the interoceanic canal, we should be vigilant and energetic in pressing for a recognition and guarantee of our rights and privileges.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I am sure the House, on both sides, are very much obliged to my hon. friend for bringing up this subject, even at this late period of the Session. I am quite sure that every hon. gentleman who has heard this speech must agree with me that his statements have been made with great clearness and moderation, and with the usual logical power which distinguish that hon. gentleman, as much, if not more, than any other hon. gentleman in this House. The question is one of the very greatest importance, and it has already attracted the attention of the other branch of Parliament, and in the Senate Debates, no doubt, every hon. member has read with very great interest the elaborate speech of Senator Wark on the subject. As far as Canada is concerned, I take it that it has no immediate interest in the building of the canal at Panama. We are building a Canadian Pacific Railway across the continent which will, I believe, serve our purposes for very many years. The United States are in the same position. They are not only building a trans-continental railway, but they have already such lines in existence, and I rather fancy the United States do not desire a canal to be built at Panama any more than we do. But when the project was entertained in Europe, the United States took the action to which the hon. member for Stanstead has alluded. All we have to say in the matter is that, if that canal is once made, we have as much interest in it, in proportion to our population and trade, as the United States. We have almost, if not quite, as large a territory as the United States have. We have nearly as large an Atlantic and Pacific coast line as the United States, and it would be absurd to suppose that if a canal should be carried across the isthmus, all the shipping of the United States, coasting from the Atlantic to the Pacific, would go through the canal and visit the Pacific ports, and enjoy all the Pacific trade, while Canadian vessels would have to take the longer route by Cape Horn, or more than double the distance for Canadian vessels visiting the Pacific coast. With respect to the Monroe doctrine, there can be no doubt that it has no immediate reference to this subject. It is historically known that what is known as the Monroe doctrine, originated in an ill-advised casual remark of George Canning which, no doubt, he regretted very much before he died, and from that came the Message of President Monroe. Suppose that doctrine were admitted to the utmost extent—suppose every nation in Europe or America should admit that the United States had established a right to consider the Monroe doctrine as a principle of International Law, it could have no possible effect on Canada. The Queen of England is as much an American power as the United States. As Queen of Canada she has the same rights as the South American Republics through which the canal would pass; and admitting the Monroe doctrine to its utmost extent, which I do not admit, which England cannot admit, which no European power will admit, yet the Queen of Canada and the people of Canada have the right to expect that, in regard to any canals across the continent to connect the Atlantic and Pacific, the same principle should prevail that prevails in respect to the Suez Canal, namely, that it should be a canal open to all nations and under the guarantee of all nations, and that not even war should close that channel.

MR. DECOSMOS: I think the House and the country owes a vote of thanks to the hon. gentleman from Stanstead (Mr. Colby), who has brought up the question of the Monroe doctrine. I intimated to the House when addressing it upon the subject of the Pacific Railway, that I would take occasion before the close of the Session to speak with respect to the Esquimalt-Nanaimo section of the Pacific Railway. I propose to do so now, and will be as brief as possible. With regard to this section of the Railway that was agreed to be built under the Carnarvon Terms, I expect the Government during Recess to prepare a measure for its construction, and submit it for the sanction of Parliament at its next Session. At this advanced period of the Session, it cannot be expected. I have no express authority from the Government for stating that I expect it to be prepared and submit a measure for the construction of the Esquimalt-Nanaimo section of the Railway, except its general expression of intention to keep faith with British Columbia, supplemented as that has been by making contracts to construct the Yale-Savona section. The hon. Min.

ister of Railways and Canals, when making his general statement on the Pacific Railway, alluded to the obligation assumed by the late Government under the Carnarvon Terms to construct the Esquimalt-Nanaimo section; and stated that it would cost $4,000,000. I am satisfied, Sir, that the hon. gentleman has placed the cost too high. The result of my enquiries in various quarters, satisfy me that it can be completed and set at work for $2,500,000. I will not trouble the House with details on this subject at this late hour. I will, however, undertake to show how small an outlay of capital and interest will be required to construct the road, which when completed, will only be sixty-eight miles long. It will be remembered that the hon. the Minister of Finance, as part of his scheme to provide funds to meet the expenditure of the Dominion Government, asked and obtained the sanction of Parliament to a resolution authorizing him to increase the issue of Dominion Notes to $20,000,000, on condition of always holding for the redemption of such notes "in gold, or in gold and Dominion securities guaranteed by the Government of the United Kingdom, equal to 25 per cent. of the total amount of notes then outstanding, and that at least 15 per cent. of the total amount of such outstanding notes shall be held in gold." Now, Sir, on this financial basis I propose to submit for the consideration of the House and Government certain statements that will show conclusively that the means to construct the Esquimalt-Nanaimo section of the Pacific Railway are within the easy reach of the Government, and that the expenditure will fall so lightly on the country as not to make it necessary to increase appreciably the annual charge for interest on expenditure in British Columbia. I estimate that the total cost of the Esquimalt-Nanaimo section will be $2,500,000; that it may be completed within four years; and that that sum may include the entire sum for working surveys, construction, and interest. I will not, however, enter into detail on this branch of the subject, but will direct attention to the following statements:

SUMMARY.

Total Dominion Notes issued, July 1, 1881 to July 1, 1885.....$2,500,000
Total Bond Reserve held..... 250,000

Total Gold Reserve.....	$375,000
Total interest on Gold Reserve paid	37,500
Total yearly interest on Gold Reserve, $375,000 at 4 per cent after completion of E and N section of Canadian Pacific Railway.....	15,000
Total cost of Esquimalt-Nanaimo section when completed.....	2,500,000

These statements, Sir, show conclusively how very small an annual expenditure for interest is required to build the Esquimalt-Nanaimo section of the Pacific Railway, and to meet the interest on the Gold Reserve after its completion. The amount of the annual charge is so insignificant that it can never be felt, whilst the construction of the Railway will meet one condition of the Carnarvon Terms, keep faith with British Columbia, and fulfil a solemn obligation too long delayed in its fulfilment. Before leaving this branch of my subject, I will state that half of the $750,000 offered by the hon. member for West Durham, when in the late Government, to British Columbia as a consideration for all future delays—for postponement for an indefinite period—in construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway in that Province, is equal to the total Gold Reserve required to build the Esquimalt-Nanaimo section on the financial basis that I have proposed; and that the other half would pay the annual interest on the Gold Reserve for twenty-five years after its completion, without counting the interest on it, if it were invested. I will now endeavour, Sir, to show that no increased taxation will be required to pay interest on the money required to build this section of the Pacific Railway; and further, that the reduced expenditure for the Mail Service between San Francisco and Victoria, with the increased Customs Receipts, consequent on the increase of population on Vancouver's Island, incident to the building of this section of the Railway, will show an aggregate gain and saving of several hundred thousand dollars over interest on Gold Reserve. It will be remembered that the Mail Service between Victoria and San Francisco costs annually $54,000. The contract expires on the 1st of July next. The new contract for the Service goes into operation at that date, and will cost only about $18,000 a year. That will make a saving of $36,000 per annum, or a total saving, in five years, of $180,000. I estimate that the minimum increase of the population in Vancouver Island, between 1881 and 1885, if this Railway be constructed, will be 3,000. At $10.42 the present per capita of Customs paid by British Columbia, the minimum increase of population 3,000 would, in four years, yield $125,040 additional Customs Revenue over the present Receipts. The following summary shows the net aggregate gain and saving between 1880 and 1885:

SUMMARY.

Saving on San Francisco Mail Subsidy during five years, 1880 to 1885, at $36,000	$180,000
Increase in Customs receipts on increase of population, the minimum 3,000 at $10.42 per capita ..	125,040
<hr/>
Total gross Gain and Saving.....	$305,040
Interest on total Gold Reserve of $375,000 from 1881 to 1885—(see prior statement).....	37,500
Total net aggregate Gain and Saving, 1880 to 1885	267,540

From this showing, it is apparent that there need be no fear of increasing taxation, or laying a heavy additional burden on the country, in order to build this Section of the Railway, and carry out the Carnarvon Award. On the contrary, it is established that there would be a net aggregate gain and saving of $267,540, showing that the construction of the Railway will be a profitable transaction for the Dominion. I will now direct attention, Sir, to the estimates of Expenditure and Receipts of this section of the Railway, after it shall have been set at work. It is important that the Esquimalt and Nanaimo Section of the Canadian Pacific Railway should yield enough annually to meet the yearly charge for maintenance, repairs, and operating expenses, and leave a net surplus besides. I know of only one railway on the Pacific coast of which the expenses and receipts would give an idea of what the probable expenses and receipts of the Esquimat-Nanaimo Section would be; that is the Tacoma-Kalama Section of the Northern Pacific Railway, connecting Puget Sound with Columbia River, a distance of 105 miles. Speaking from memory, and subject to correction, for I have mislaid my notes on the subject, the annual expenses of this Railway under all heads, a few years ago, was $105,000; and the net profits over interest and charges, $37,000. I give this statement merely from memory, without vouching for its exactness. I will, however, draw your attention to two short railways connecting with this city of which we have statistics of the cost of maintenance, Repairs, and operating expenses in the return of Railway Statistics for 1877-8 laid before Parliament. The first is the Brockville and Ottawa Railway, 86½ miles in length, and cost of maintenance, repairs, and operating charges, $119,126; and secondly, the St. Lawrence and Ottawa, 59 miles in length, and expenses, $112,559. Now, Sir, the Esquimalt-Nanaimo Section will be about 68 miles in length, and I estimate that the maximum expenditure for its maintenance, repairs, and operating expenses will be $100,000. My reason for placing the expenses lower than the two roads entering this city is, that the chief freight that will be carried for some years will be coal, and according to the regulations with respect to moving coal on the Intercolonial in Nova Scotia, the shippers and consignees of the coal have to load and unload at their own expense, making a very considerable saving to the Government; and applying the same regulation to the Esquimalt-Nanaimo Section. I reduce the expense to a maximum of $100,000 per annum. Now, Sir, I will give a statement of my estimate of receipts and expenditure of this section of the Railway after it shall have been fairly put in operation. It is as follows:

STATEMENT OF RECEIPTS AND EXPENDITURE.

40,000 tons coal delivered at Victoria for local consumption, at $1.00 per ton.....	$40,000
60,000 tons coal, delivered at Victoria, or Esquimalt, to be shipped foreign, at the special rate on the Intercolonial between New Glasgow and Londonderry iron mines, at 65 cents per ton.	39,000
50,000 tons coal, delivered to shipping at Nanaimo for exportation at 50 cents per ton.....	[25,000
5,000 tons produce and merchandise at $2 per ton.....	10,000
10,000 passengers at $2.....	20,000
Royalty on 100,000 tons coal raised within the Railway coal fields, at 20 cents per ton.....	20,000
Saving on carrying mails between Victoria and Nanaimo, per annum.....	4,000
Sales of land, timber, &c.....	10,000

Total gross estimated receipts....	$168,000
Total annual expenditure for E. and N. Railway.....	$100,000
Interest on Gold Reserve.	15,000
	$115,000

Total Estimated Net Receipts... $53,000

I believe, Sir, that, in the near future, after this road shall have been put fairly in operation, my estimate of receipts and net profits will be verified; and that when the continental portion of the Railway shall have been extended to English Bay, Burrard Inlet, with a ferry to connect with Nanaimo, that the passenger and freight business that will be done by the Island Section of the Pacific Railway, will exceed any other short section on the whole transcontinental line. I have only now to direct attention to the Railway Land Belt on Vancouver Island that will pass to the Dominion Government as soon as it is prepared to commence the construction of this section. There will be a very considerable area of land, chiefly timber land, in the belt, that will prove valuable. But it is the coal fields along the line of Railway that will be most valuable. I estimated that between Esquimalt and Nanaimo, within the Railway Belt, that there are 200 square miles of good coal fields. Now, the very least it will be worth to the Government, on the average, is $50,000 per mile. At that rate the 200 square miles would be worth ultimately $10,000,000—a sum equal to four times the estimated cost of the line between Esquimalt and Nanaimo. This shows, in connection with my estimates of the net receipts that the building and operating of this section would prove a profitable undertaking. I trust the Government, during Recess, will give this subject their best attention, and at the next Session of Parliament will submit a measure for its construction.

MR. MACDONALD (King's, P.E.I.): I desire to say, in reference to the petition against the National Policy, that it was signed not by 6,000 as was stated, but by 5,000. In regard to the number of electors who signed that petition, I may say, that while 2,400 voted against me, only 1,300 voters, or 1,100 less than voted against me, signed the petition against the National Policy, notwithstanding the fact that the constituency was scoured for the purpose of obtaining signatures. The petition, if it shows anything, shows that a smaller number of people than voted against me are opposed to the Tariff.

MR. BLAKE: It was my desire to have made a short review of the work of the Session, but our time has just been taken up by so many topics that I do not intend to detain the House at this late hour. We have built the Panama Canal, we have vilified the Monroe doctrine and scattered it to the winds, we have proved most conclusively, of course, that the building of the Nanaimo Railroad would be one of the richest investments presented to the world; and having done all this, we may fairly go to bed. I desire, however, to make one or two remarks. I think we began the Session too late: if we meet earlier, in future, than we did this year, I think it will be better. I should like to see the Session commence in the latter part of January or extremely early in February. Having said so much with reference to the period of commencement, I desire to suggest that the financial statement should be brought down earlier, so that we may get sooner into Supply. Having, this year, met on the 12th of February, the financial statement was not submitted until the 9th of March, and we did not get into Committee of Supply until April 2nd. My third observation is in reference to the Government business, which ought also to be presented to this House at an earlier period than it has been this year. In the last week—that is from the 29th April—we have read a second time twenty-six Government Bills, on more or less important subjects, but all becoming law so far as this House is concerned. Of those twenty-six, I think only three were susceptible of any parliamentary discussion whatever, by virtue of there being Resolutions on which they were founded. The Supply Bill and one or two other Bills, of course, were not open to those observations in regard to the lateness of introduction of Government measures. Three of the twenty-six Bills were presented, adopted and disposed of in the last week of the Session, and I say that is converting this House not into a body for making laws, but into a body for registering the views of hon. gentlemen who bring down measures and those who support them. However much we may desire the Monroe doctrine, as applied to another country, it is plain that the hon. gentleman has made a practical application of that doctrine in this House, because the inference is that the majority shall have exclusive right to deliberate and discuss and determine what shall be done. I hope the hon. gentleman will initiate some reform in this particular next Session. This could be done if it were understood that Ministerial measures were to be prepared during the Recess, and that if introduced at a late period of the Session they will receive scanty encouragement, and will only be agreed to when some obvious, pressing emergency requires prompt action. Our own reputation and the interests of the country require that we should set ourselves to work to remedy this evil. There are two other practical suggestions that I will mention in order that Ministers should consider them during Recess. We have had a good deal of discussion with reference to the evils caused by the delays of Private Bill legislation. I think it would be convenient in the future after the first Standing Orders' Committee has been appointed, they should, except in the case of death or vacancies from other causes, continue for future Sessions, and should meet immediately after the opening of the Session, so that the persons having charge of Private Bills would be able to take steps for their early introduction. Then, with regard to the Public Accounts Committee, I gave notice at the last meeting of a Resolution to the effect that it was essential it should be constituted at a very early period of the Session. The Public Accounts are brought down immediately, and the slack time of the Session, which takes place before the other great Committees get to work, might be properly utilised in the discussion of matters which come before that Committee.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I am afraid I lost some of the remarks of my hon. friend in the beginning of his speech. When I came in, however, he was speaking of the importance of the House meeting early. We thought of that, having had it discussed in 1867 and 1873, when we were succeeded by another Administration which had the same opportunity of observation that we had, and which came to the conclusion, apparently, that Parliament could not profitably meet before the first week in February. In the first place, by the whole system of our Statutes the Reports, Returns and Accounts end on 31st December, and cannot be adjusted and prepared in any satisfactory form in a shorter period than four or five weeks. Then, there was a practical objection to an earlier meeting, which more particularly affected Ontario and Quebec. A great many members of Parliament are more or less intimately connected with the municipal institutions of the country; and we knew that when we met in January, on one or two occasions, Ontario members left Parliament to attend to the municipal elections. Some members were Mayors, some Reeves, and some Wardens. We came to the conclusion, on both sides, that the earliest time we could meet profitably is February. I think the earlier we meet in February the better. There were some reasons why we did not meet, this year, a week or ten days earlier. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Blake) complained that the Government measures were not brought down early enough. That is a complaint always made by the Opposition. It was made by us when we sat on the opposite side, and by hon. gentlemen of the Liberal party when in Opposition, from 1867 to 1873, and now we have a recurrence of it. But the real answer to that objection is, that the Government measures, the mere acts of legislation, form, really, a very small portion of the work of Parliament. We have got a very large body of law copied from England, and I would call the attention of hon. gentlemen to this fact, that, supposing, with the exception of the Supply Bill, we did not carry a single measure for the next five years, this country would not be impeded in its progress. We have got a good, large, sound body of law.

MR. BLAKE: I thought I would rise to eliminate all question as to the number of Bills submitted. We objected to the late period at which you brought down your Bills.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I think the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blake) will admit that the House applied itself at once, from the day the Speech from the Throne was delivered, with great zeal and industry to the discussion of the various matters brought forward. It is a matter of no consequence, in a free country, whether the measures be introduced by the Government or by independent members, or whether the questions raised in the first place emanate from the Government, so that Parliament has a full, free and fair opportunity of discussing all those measures. From the very beginning of the Session we have sat late and early to discuss all those matters; and I think that the Hansard of this year and Session, when read hereafter, will disclose a greater amount of earnest discussion on matters affecting the interests of the country than any other Session I ever saw. Of course, it is well the Government should bring down its measures as early as possible. The measures of chief importance this Session were the Tariff, Currency and Banking. Those subjects were discussed to a very considerable extent in the press and by experts. The hon. the Finance Minister received, after Parliament met, a series of deputations and delegations on the various subjects connected with the Tariff, Currency and Banking, and I think that the result has been a success, and that the measures laid before Parliament have received, not only the concurrence of the Ministerial supporters, which might have been expected, but the concurrence of hon. gentlemen opposite, except the single measure of the Tariff. Now, in regard to Private Bills, I go very far with the hon. member for West Durham, as he knows, in relation to the necessity of checking legislation. I have seen so many instances, during my Parliamentary life, of wrong done by Private Bills, the introduction and manipulation of which have injured interests that nobody in Parliament knew were being prejudicially affected, that I concur with him in the propriety of full notice being given in regard to every matter connected with Private Bill legislation. I would go with him, perhaps, altogether in his proposition that the Standing Orders Committee, at the beginning of any Parliament, should be considered a permanent Committee, to reassemble the moment a new Session commenced, in order to deal with this class of legislation. The hon. gentleman has stated that the Public Accounts Committee should be made permanent. I think that would be highly unconstitutional. I think he will find the doctrine laid down by Sir Robert Peel on that point, was in opposition to a Public Accounts Committee. He laid down the sound constitutional doctrine. We have gone infinitely further than the Commons of England in this matter. Every Government has resisted the establishment of a permanent or Sessional Public Accounts Committee, upon the ground that no Government could stand or be supposed to submit to a permanent, an annual, indictment. We have submitted to it, and I do not know we have suffered much by it. But a Public Accounts Committee, supposed to be a permanent tribunal, sitting outside the House, fixed at the beginning of the Session, to be a continued court of impeachment of the Government, could not constitutionally, be sanctioned. I agree with the hon. gentleman in this respect that a Public Accounts Committee, judging from our own experience, which differs from the experience of England, in which they oppose it, is a serviceable institution, inasmuch as it is a very considerable check on the Government of the day. I do not think it is an unsalutary check, but I do not think that we ought to go so far as to make it a permanent Committee.

MR. BLAKE: The hon. gentleman quite misunderstood me. I do not wish it to have any functions outside the Session.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT: I would remind the hon. First Minister that unless he had been greatly assisted from this side of the House, this Session must have lasted several weeks longer. But we have been badly repaid by the extreme disorderliness which has marked the meetings of this House the last fortnight. You know, Mr. Speaker, and the hon. First Minister knows, that this House has never presented so unruly an appearance for so long a time. Undoubtedly, most expensive results must occur next Session if that kind of thing is persisted in. I propose for the consideration of the hon. First Minister—who, to do him justice, has generally been desirous to uphold the decorum of the House—whether we can permit these interruptions to go on in future without taking some more effectual steps to restrain those who have deliberately and constantly interrupted hon. gentlemen on this side of the House. The difference has been very marked. Hon. gentlemen have risen on that side and not a word has been said from those hon. gentlemen who support my hon. friend; but when hon. gentlemen have risen on this side, there has been a steady and continuous interruption. Now, I say, if this is continued the results will be extremely unpleasant, and will tend greatly to protract the length of the Session.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I quite agree with every word the hon. gentleman has said about the necessity of putting down these unseemly interruptions. It is a great degradation of our dignity and our position. But I will not accept the statement of the hon. gentleman that the disorder comes from our part. We have occasion to know that the interruption sometimes comes from hon. gentlemen who usually act with him, and if the noise is not so great it is because the number supporting him is not so great. The fact of the matter is, we can throw no reproaches on each other. In the last Parliament, the majority were rioting in their strength, and sometimes, perhaps, the present majority may be guilty of the same charge. But it is absolutely necessary that better order be observed. I speak with all sincerity, as the oldest member of the House—I may say, the father of the House—that I have been deeply grieved at the noises and unseemly interruptions that have taken place. There are legitimate means of putting down a member of the House, who forces himself against the patience and the common sense of the House, generally. At home they raise cries of “question,” “hear, hear.” A member rising in the House of Commons in England, and attempting to speak against the will of the House, has not the slightest chance of being heard. The experience there has been such, that a man can at once see whether he has the ear of the House, and if he has not, and is a man of common sense, he will not attempt to speak. There are parliamentary means of indicating to a member that the House does not wish to hear him. I grieve much to know that, in the House of Commons here, we go much further than the utmost limit allowed in the House of Commons in England during the greatest excitement. I had occasion to regret that fact years ago when members of the English Parliament were present at one of our sittings, and when papers and books were thrown about and a riotous state of confusion existed. This greatly injured us in their estimation as a legislative body. I hope that when we meet again we will be more decorous in the expression of our approbation or disapproval. I intend, if I live, to take an early opportunity when the House meets again, and before the doors are open, to appeal to the hon. gentlemen, on both sides, to restrain their animal spirits and those unseemly disorders which must tend to diminish respect for a grave assembly of this kind, whose duties involve the happiness and future of this country.

MR. ANGLIN: I think it would be unfair for us to allow to pass unchallenged the statement of the First Minister that we, on this side of the House, have done much to prolong the Session. The hon. gentleman has more than once had occasion to check the unseemly interruptions that were made by gentlemen usually supporting himself. I must say that neither during last Session nor this Session did I know of a single instance of a member of the Opposition speaking with a view to waste time, nor do I remember of a single occasion during the five years of the former Administration when an important question was brought up at an early hour in the evening, when only one or two members had spoken upon it, that an attempt was made to put down the other speakers as has been done during the present Session. We on our side feel that we have done everything we could to make the Session pass pleasantly, and to facilitate the progress of public business, and we want to go away with kindly feelings towards hon. gentlemen if they will allow us to do so. All we want is fair play, but we are determined we will not allow ourselves to be placed in a false position before the country. Let us resolve, when we part this morning that if we meet again, to try to behave as a deliberative assembly should behave.

Bill read the second and third times and passed.

RETURNS TO ORDERS OF THE HOUSE.

REMARKS.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD, in presenting a Return, said: I desire to call the attention of what remains of the House, to the inexpediency of granting, just because a member chooses to satisfy his curiosity, every motion for a Return of papers. Here is a Return, that costs an immense sum of money to prepare, and I do not suppose that the member who asked for it will ever look into it.

PARLIAMENTARY PRINTING CONTRACT.

COMMITTEE'S REPORT CONCURRED IN.

MR. STEPHENSON moved that the Thirteenth Report of the Joint Committee of both Houses on the Printing of Parliament be now concurred in.

MR. PATTERSON (Essex) moved in amendment, that the following words be added to the said motion:—

“And that in the opinion of this House the Government should take the necessary steps to cancel the contract awarded to Messrs. MacLean, Roger and Company, for the Printing of Parliament, from the 1st January, 1880; and that the said contract be offered to Patrick Boyle, of Toronto, whose tender appears from all the evidence to be the only legitimate tender below that of Messrs. MacLean, Roger and Company; and that so much of the Thirteenth Report of the Joint Committee of both Houses on the Printing of Parliament, as is consistent with the foregoing Resolution, be adopted.”

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: The difficulty in the way of the amendment is this: Any motion in this House can have no effect. The Printing Contracts of the House are under the Joint Committee of both Houses. The Senate has already concurred in the Report, and any action of this House is of no value whatever, because it would only put the two Houses in conflict.

MR. COSTIGAN: The amendment does not attack the Report, but states the Contract ought to be cancelled, pointing out certain other things that should be done afterwards. The Report of the Committee merely declares the Contract should be cancelled, and this amendment does the same thing, only going a step further.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: If it is a separate motion, of course it cannot be moved now. If it is an amendment, it must be in the form of an amendment.

MR. COSTIGAN: My desire is to add to the amendment. We had a great deal of difficulty to move a proper amendment, and the Report itself was pretty hard to deal with. The amendment was prepared to meet the case as it came before the House. The Committee have spent a great deal of time in enquiring into this matter, in accordance with the expression of public opinion in this House and in the Press. A thorough investigation into the facts connected with the Printing Contract was demanded, and the Committee have been taking evidence during the whole Session, and enquiring into the subject. It is unfortunate the Report was not submitted earlier. It might have been presented two or three days earlier. But it was kept back, and it places those, who differ from the majority of that Committee in a false position, in trying to find it out now. But one thing is certain, to my mind—the Report does not go far enough—it does not carry out, fully, the instructions of the House. It might have gone on and stated that the parties found guilty of the practices they were charged with, in connection with the Printing Contract, were not entitled to tender for a new contract. Besides, at this late stage of the Session, the Committee cannot give effect to what, I think, the public expected. There is no doubt that from the first moment of those exposures, public opinion has been in favour of the cancellation of the Contract. Now, the Report simply says it should be cancelled, and that has been adopted by the other branch, and the adoption of the Report has been moved in this House. The mover of the amendment simply declares that, in adopting the Report, the next bona fide tenderer should have the benefit of his tender.

MR. TROW: I dissent entirely from the remarks of the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat. I consider the Joint Committee on Printing had no jurisdiction in the matter. The reference to the Committee on this subject, did not give them any authority to transfer the Printing Contract to any party, or even to consider that matter at all. The Committee's instructions were merely to investigate the evidence in reference to the tenders and letting of the Contract, and advise some means for the prevention of improper practices, in regard to tendering, for the future. The Committee was not officially aware who were implicated in such practices in the past. I do not know but that Mr. Boyle was as much implicated in those practices as the others who tendered. We find Charlton and Cotton swore that they had authority from Mr. Boyle to make the best bargain for him that they possibly could with MacLean and Roger. They were his agents, and whatever they did he should be held responsible for. I cannot see any reason why the House or Committee should interfere with his claim any more than with that of any other tenderer. It is evident there was blackmailing in this business. The present contractors have done the printing properly, and in a manner creditable to themselves; they have given general satisfaction. They have a very expensive plant on their hands and would, if deprived of the contract, sustain great loss. Unprincipled characters levied blackmail upon them, and placed them in their present unfortunate position. Their only safety, under the circumstances, was to yield and purchase imaginary interests held by unprincipled parties, or suffer heavy loss in disposing of their plant at a sacrifice.

MR. JONES: I do not see how the amendment can be carried. It would create very great confusion. How could the Contract be cancelled for the period mentioned in the Report? The whole of the work has been done from the first day to this. How is it to be paid for and settled? Is it to be paid for under the terms of the Contract? I think this amendment would create very great confusion. Messrs. MacLean and Roger must continue the work, on account of this Report being insufficient, and not being brought down in a proper manner. They should be allowed to continue the work, at all events, until next Session, until its completion.

MR. WHITE (East Hastings): Unless some action is taken to-day, MacLean and Roger will continue to hold the Contract from the end of this Session, and they will retain it after the commencement of the next Session, the difficulty continuing also. The people of the country have been educated to thoroughly understand this question. I give all credit to the Globe for discovering the discreditable acts of the parties concerned in this Contract. Though prosecuted in the Court for its action, the Globe won its case. The Mail, another able paper, has exposed the fraudulent, corrupt transactions of the parties, in this city, implicated. This paper went further, declaring that every person connected with Parliament, from the highest to the lowest, should be exposed and punished for any action against the public interest. I contend that Roger and MacLean have no right to hold the contract which they got by corrupt practices. It is said that every tenderer or contractor, who comes to Ottawa, is blackmailed—has to pay parties, who profess to control the departments, for their influence, a large sum. Is not that corrupt, dishonest, wrong? Is it not against the honest administration of public affairs? The Printing Committee have not properly discharged their duty. What did the Committee appointed by the late Administration, to investigate certain printing matters with which the late Speaker of this House was connected, do? They kept the Report against him to the last moment of the Session in the same way as the present, and, at last, one Minister was seen going out this way and another that way, while the Chairman was watching for Black Rod, so that at the last moment there was no chance to say a word. If there was one thing more than another that condemned that Administration, it was its dark, mysterious acts. Let us not do things in the dark—let us do our work openly, honestly, and in good time. The Printing Committee should bring in proper Reports. The hon. leader of the Opposition, the other day, said this Report did not come before the House properly. The hon. the Minister of Customs said the Report was adopted by thirteen members of the Committee, but the Chairman sat still. Why did he not rise like the hon. Minister, and frankly admit the Committee adopted that Report? What is the use of this beating about the bush? Let us see if we have men in Ottawa who swindle the people in this way and blackmail contractors, and use their position to pull down the public men of the country. Why not let the Chairman of the Committee give the facts in full to the public, instead of keeping them back to the last moment? I can tell that hon. gentleman that he has lost a good deal of that nobleness of character, and goodness of heart, which were formerly ascribed to him. I am sorry to see in this House an attempt to screen that man at the expense of the Conservative party. I say, unhesitatingly, that Mr. Mackintosh need not think that because he is editor of the Ottawa Citizen he is going to drag the Conservative party of this country at his feet, while he pockets $12,000 of Roger and MacLean's money. The Conservative party of this country are not going to take on their shoulders the responsibility of an act of that kind. I, for one, will take none of the sins of Mr. Mackintosh, or any other Conservative, on my shoulders in the East Riding of Hastings, when the next Election comes round. I think we ought to give that Contract to the man that had put in the only honest tender, and I think we ought to have brought in a report giving that contract to Patrick Boyle. He is entitled to it. It is said he has not the plant, but if he gives security he will have the plant. Unless we stamp Mackintosh out, we cannot go to the country with a clean record. I think the Globe and Mail newspapers deserve thanks for what they have done in exposing him.

MR. STEPHENSON: I am surprised at the hon. member for East Hastings (Mr. White) taking this matter up so warmly. If that gentleman had given as much attention to his Parliamentary duties, and the working of Committees generally, as the members of the Printing Committee have done, he would be more reticent on many matters than he is. This Committee, I do not hesitate to say, has sat more times and has done more days' work this Session, than all the other Committees of the House put together. We have presented to the House no less than sixteen Reports, to say nothing of sub-Committee meetings. When, therefore, the hon. member for East Hastings gets up and talks about certain hon. members beating about the bush, I think if he looks over the evidence carefully, he will find that he has gone a little too far, and is not altogether fair. I, for one, am not so positive on all matters as some hon. gentlemen are; but when I am sure that I am right, I act upon a certain prominent person's advice, and then go ahead. When, two days ago, this matter was sprung upon me at a moment's notice, I stated, in reply to the question put to me by the hon. member for West Durham, that I could not positively answer the question that was asked, but it was my opinion that the Report of the sub-Committee had been submitted to the General Committee, and that it had been adopted. I could not state positively whether it had been adopted on a formal Resolution or not. Therefore, I hesitated in giving a decided answer, and sent a page to the Clerk's office to get the Minute-book. The debate, meantime, proceeded, and was concluded before I had time to get the information I sought for, and which was contained in the Minute-book; and, moreover, I wish the hon. member for East Hastings to understand, once for all, that I am not a person to beat about the bush in this or in any other matter. I have a reputation in this House and country of far longer date than the hon. gentleman has, and I have never yet been accused of beating about the bush, or of shirking any responsibility that rightfully belongs to me. The Committee discussed this matter with reference to Mr. Boyle, and the other parties who tendered for the contract, and in connection with the Report of the sub-Committee, I will recite the following Resolution, as it appears on the Minute-book:—

“Moved by Mr. Ross, and seconded by Mr. Macfarlane, that the Report, as read by the sub-Committee, be adopted.”

The following amendment was also moved to the main motion:—

“That Patrick Boyle having withdrawn his tender, and as we find no evidence of anything improper on his part, the Committee think him entitled to the contract, if he is prepared to enter into it.”

This amendment was voted down, and the original motion was carried by a vote of 14 to 3; and now, if the amendment moved by the hon. member for Essex be put to the House and carried, it will place this House in conflict with the Senate, who have adopted, without opposition, the Report which is now in the hands of the Speaker. We have, therefore, got to adopt this Report as it is, and without amendment, during this Session, or else all our action will be null and void. I think the amendment is ill-timed, and will result in no good to the party whom it is designed to benefit.

MR. WHITE: I do not wish the hon. gentleman to think that I am all alone in this opinion of him. A great deal of fault has been found with him by different members, who have not independence enough to come forward and say so. I certainly wish the hon. gentleman well, occupying the position he does, next to that of a member of the Cabinet; I think he ought to have a portfolio in the next Ministry. I do not want to hurt him; I would rather stand up in defence of his character. I want him to hold an independent position in this House. I would not say a word against him to injure his feelings. The hon. gentleman says, no other Committee of Parliament has done so much work; I may make this remark—perhaps it is not parliamentary—that a cow is a very poor cow that gives a large pail full of milk and then kicks it over. All the work of the Committee amounts to nothing at this moment. It leaves the parties who have got the contract in the same position for twelve months longer.

MR. TROW : I consider the remarks of the hon. member for East Hastings (Mr. White) are unguarded and uncalled for, with reference to the conduct of the Chairman of the Printing Committee (Mr. Stephenson). I regret that an error did creep into our proceedings through the inadvertence of the Chairman. At all events, the sub-Committee's Report, with the Resolution of the Committee, should have been brought before this House, and then all the proceedings would have been proper. But a mistake crept in, and it was our duty to-day to rectify that mistake. I am satisfied it was the unanimous desire and expressed opinion of the Committee that the Contract should be cancelled. I take credit to myself that I was the first who proposed to the Committee to cancel the Contract. I considered those who tendered were all equally guilty, and the proper proceeding was to have advertised for tenders at the close of the work for this Session. The Committee thought that, until the proceedings of this Session were printed and placed before the country, it would be out of place to cancel the Contract, and could not be entertained and carried out without the country suffering loss.

MR. BANNERMAN : As a member of the Committee, and one of those who voted in the minority, I feel that, before this matter is settled, I should give expression to my views upon this subject. The hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Trow) says they were all equally guilty. Now, no member of that Committee can show that they were all equally guilty. Any one who looks into the matter will see that Mr. Charlton's evidence before the Committee, and that given before the Court in Toronto, do not agree. Mr. Charlton stated before the Committee that he understood Mr. Cotton was acting as agent for Boyle, while in his evidence at Toronto he distinctly stated the contrary. Moreover, the only evidence that went to show that Boyle was willing to come to an agreement with MacLean, Roger and Company, was, that he was prepared, if he received the contract, to enter into partnership with them at his prices, they receiving two-thirds and he one-third.

Mr. Starrs' evidence also shows that Boyle would not entertain any other proposition except to enter into partnership at the prices specified in his tender. Mr. Boyle says himself, in his evidence, that when he delivered his letter of withdrawal to Cotton, there were no conditions whatever accompanying it. The evidence also goes to show that Boyle did not give this letter of withdrawal to Cotton until two days after the Committee had awarded the Contract to Mackintosh. The hon. member for Perth says the Committee would be going beyond their power in recommending that contract to be awarded to Boyle. I think it was the duty of the Committee to make whatever recommendation they thought best, leaving the House to adopt it or not. It was the right and duty of the Committee to sift the matter, and if they found an honest tenderer in the whole crowd to award the contract to him.

MR. TROW : The hon. gentleman states that Charlton exonerated Boyle before the Court of Queen's Bench, in Toronto. I think quite the reverse; and for the information of the House will read the evidence on that point. The question was put to Mr. Charlton :

"Can you remember anything more that was said ?

"Answer. When Mr. Boyle was going away, he said he would leave the matter in Mr. Cotton's hands, or, I think, in Mr. Cotton's hands and your hands."

Evidently, Mr. Boyle left the matter entirely in their hands for them to decide. They received the money for him, consequently he is responsible for their acts. They received $3,000 in notes and cash. Roger and MacLean both swear before the Committee that they paid the money expressly for Boyle; whether he received it or not, is a matter of indifference.

MR. ROBINSON : I regret much that after all that has been said, the vote which this House is about to give, can have little or no effect. For my part, I find fault with what has been said against Mr. Boyle, because he is an esteemed and estimable citizen of Toronto, and particularly skilful in the printing business. I think he has done nothing to forfeit his position in the matter of this contract, and if the question came up in an independent way, I think his case is irresistibly strong. Some two years ago he took a contract for the printing of the Corporation of Toronto, and he did it as well as any other contractor has been able to do it. No fault was found with him whatever. He has an excellent plant, and is a very industrious, capable man of business. I am very sorry he did not succeed in obtaining the contract, which, in my opinion, he tendered for in good faith.

MR. ORTON: Not a tittle of evidence has been adduced to implicate Mr. Boyle. A letter was obtained from Mr. Boyle, and sold to McLean, Roger and Company for $3,000, of which Mr. Boyle did not receive one cent. It is, therefore, nothing but right, in the interest of public morality, that the tender of Mr. Boyle should be accepted. I regret that the matter has been brought before the House in this irregular way, but I desire to express my views before any further step is taken.

MR. PATTERSON (Essex): I think the hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Trow) has taken advantage of this debate to assail the character of an honest man, and to make statements on the floor of this House which he dare not make outside. There is not one word of evidence that implicates Mr. Boyle. If this Report is adopted, the Contract is cancelled, and it will be for the Government to let the Contract for the printing for the time being. I do not think any injury can be done by carrying the amendment, but that it will complete an act of justice commenced by the Committee, and I think it is due to the only man who came out of this unsavory matter with clean hands. The hon. member for South Perth has also assailed Mr. Boyle, while the facts of the case do not warrant it. I consider it my duty to press the amendment before the House.

MR. TROW: The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat has entirely misconstrued my observations. I have not said a word against Mr. Boyle, as a contractor; I merely said his agents had implicated him. With regard to the remarks of the hon. member for West Toronto, I know nothing whatever about the circumstances of Mr. Boyle, but I am informed that he was not prepared to take the contract for the printing for the Local Legislature some three months before this contract was let for the Dominion printing. I also know that he had to get a cheque for $500 from Mr. Starrs, in order to enable him to tender for the work in question.

MR. ORTON: If the previous remarks of the last speaker meant anything, they were a special effort in favour of McLean, Roger and Company, and a special effort against Mr. Boyle, the only honourable man connected with this scandal.

MR. TROW: If the hon. gentleman will examine the reports in the local press in reference to the evidence taken before the Printing Committee, he will find that I was the first to impress upon the Committee the absolute necessity of cancelling the Contract of Roger and MacLean, consequently I could not have been advocating their claim.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I am glad to learn from the remarks made by the hon. member for South Perth that he was the first man to move the cancellation of that Contract, but I think he ought to explain how it was that this morning he took quite a different course.

MR. TROW: Not at all.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: In regard to the matter before the House we are unfortunately in a difficulty, and we must try to get out of it. The Report was discussed the day before yesterday, which provided, merely by mistake, that the Contract should be cancelled. The Upper House has adopted that Report; therefore, so far as the Senate is concerned, they have cancelled that Contract. It is not at all likely that the Joint Committee can make another Report this Session. If we concur in the Report, then, so far as we are concerned, the Contract is cancelled. I am quite in favour of its being wiped out. I think the conclusion of the Committee is a right one. The amendment, however, goes a step further. The Government has no control, as a Government, over the printing, which pertains to the Joint Committee of both Houses. Therefore, that portion of the amendment must fall. Then, as to giving the contract to Mr. Boyle, the carrying of that portion of the amendment would have no value unless the Upper House passed a motion to the same effect. It seems to me that the only course for the hon. gentleman to take is to withdraw his amendment. He has stated his case, and evolved the opinion of the House, to a certain extent, with regard to the case of Mr. Boyle, and I think he ought to leave it there. By concurrence in the report the contract of MacLean, Roger and Company is cancelled, and there is an end to it.

MR. PATTERSON (Essex) : In deference to the opinion expressed by the hon. leader of the Government, although I am personally dissatisfied with the delay of the matter by the Committee, and although I am satisfied justice has not been done in the premises, I beg to withdraw my amendment.

Amendment, with leave of the House, withdrawn.

MR. STEPHENSON : In reference to the remarks made in relation to the delay of this matter, on the part of the Committee, I have to say that the Committee has held sixteen meetings. The first was held on the 21st of February and the last to-day. So, I think, that no other Committee could act more fairly.

MR. ALLISON : It appears to me that the country will be dissatisfied if something is not done. If there is anything in which absolute faith should be kept, it is the question of Government contracts.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD : This is not a Government contract.

MR. ALLISON : I very gladly accept the hon. the First Minister's correction. Then, I say, that in a question with reference to all public contracts of this character, not only with regard to individual tenderers, but with respect to the general public, it is important that absolute faith should be kept. It is well that this subject has been prominently brought forward by the Press. There is no doubt that, for years, all matters of Government contracts have been made too much a matter of speculation. I have no doubt of it in my own mind. For myself, I can see no ground of complaint against a contractor, who has obtained a contract in the usual way, by the acceptance of the lowest secured tender, if he chooses to sell it out to any other contractor, provided the Government receive the same security for the performance of the contract ; but whenever such dealings has a tendency to lead to the rejection of a lower and the acceptance of a higher tender, then such speculation should not be allowed. It appears to me that the matter would be very largely remedied by this simple means : as soon as the contractor, who makes the lowest tender, fails to pay his deposit or give security, let the Government readvertise it, and after a general notice relet the work. This would have a tendency to check the system which seems to have prevailed for years.

MR. MACDONELL (North Lanark) : I concur in the remarks of the hon. members for East Hastings (Mr. White) and Victoria, N. B., (Mr. Costigan), and I regret that the amendment, proposed by the hon. member for Essex (Mr. Patterson), was ruled to be not in order. I must also express my disagreement with the remarks of the hon. member for Perth (Mr. Trow), in reference to Mr. Boyle. In glancing over the evidence, I came to the conclusion that, Mr. Boyle, personally, had no knowledge of the corrupt practices that have prevailed, no matter what his agents may have done or how he may have been deceived by them. His hands were clean, and I believe that those who know him personally, and are acquainted with his transactions, would not, for one moment, claim him to be capable of anything dishonourable in any way. When we find the Printing Committee bringing in a Report at so late a date, when it must have been known that this question has occupied public attention so long, we should pause before we shut off discussion ; there ought to be a thorough investigation. As a humble member of this House I do very much regret that the Printing Committee, no matter for what reason, delayed bringing down their Report till this late period of the Session. It will be a greater injustice to the country if discussion is shut off now, with so few members here, than if it were left over to the next Session. It may be an injustice to give the contract to MacLean, Roger and Company till next Session, but it may be a greater injustice to shut our mouths, than to leave it over till next Session. I, therefore, ask you, Mr. Speaker, if the proper notice of the adoption of this Report has or has not been given ; I ask your ruling, so that if you rule that it has not, the members of this House will have plenty of time till next Session to consider the question, and be then able to discuss it in a proper manner.

MR. SPEAKER : When the question was under discussion, the other day, no notice had been given. Notice has now been given. I have already ruled that the adoption of the Report is in order.

MR. DOMVILLE: In reply to the hon. member for North Lanark (Mr. Macdonnell), I would point out to him that there could not be much discussion; there are only four or five members on that side of the House.

MR. MACDONELL (North Lanark): The Report should have been brought down sooner.

MR. DOMVILLE: I think it has been shown that it could not, and that my hon. friend has nothing to complain of on that score. As regards corruption, my hon. friend ought to take that word back. He has endeavoured to make the country believe that we are making additional taxation, which is not the fact, for this Contract has been given out at a lesser rate than before. I doubt if any firm would take it at a less price. Many may have been struggling to get the work, and some may be disappointed. Any private bargain made between two people, however questionable a construction we may put upon it, is really of no consequence, if we bear this in mind—as we most certainly do—the country does not lose money by it. It was a private arrangement. One of the parties said: "There is so much money in it." I am not going to justify the transaction at all, but I want to do away with the idea that there was corruption, or that the Government or the country lost anything by it.

MR. HESSON: The hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Macdonnell) tried to leave the impression that the hon. members on this side of the House, or hon. members of the Committee, were attempting to put down discussion on this question.

MR. MACDONELL (North Lanark): No; I charged the Committee as a Whole, and my grounds were the remarks of the hon. member for Victoria, N. B., and the hon. member for East Hastings.

MR. HESSON: He must remember that the hon. the leader of the Opposition raised an objection the other day, and had the discussion thrown over when there were more members in the House to carry on the discussion, and the onus of shutting off discussion and throwing it over to a time when there are so few members in the House, must be thrown upon the hon. the leader of the Opposition clearly.

MR. WHITE (East Hastings): One word to the hon. member for King's (Mr. Domville). If there was nothing wrong about the Contract, why was it cancelled after an investigation into the circumstances? Does he think that the people of this country do not see through this matter? If MacLean and Roger can give a large sum to one man and another large sum to another, the people must pay for it at last. The other House has adopted this Report, and we must adopt it; but what course will be pursued?

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I do not think the hon. gentleman has a right to ask that question. I can only say that I do not know. The Government have nothing to do with making the Contract. The Contract must be cancelled by the Joint Report of the Joint Committee of both Houses before the desirable result of advertising it for tenders, and letting it to the lowest, can be attained. The censure upon the Committee is altogether unfounded; they have other duties besides this one Contract to attend to. The whole of the printing of the House—comprising some fourteen or fifteen Reports—is under their care; and it is in the discretion of the joint body to say when and how they are to report. The Chairman, who is only the mouthpiece of the Joint Committee, is in no way open to the attacks made upon him. I may say to the hon. member for East Hastings (Mr. White), who has taken a very strong, and I do not say improper stand in behalf of Mr. Boyle, that if the Report had been duly presented, and the Report of the sub-Committee incorporated in it on Wednesday, it would have been adopted, and Mr. Boyle would have been cut off. I do not think that I am uncharitable in saying that the objection taken by the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) was taken to throw over the Report.

MR. DOMVILLE: I did not, as the hon. member for East Hastings (Mr. White) seems to think, endorse the statement that there was corruption. I do not endorse the transaction at all. I merely say that the country loses nothing by it.

MR. WHITE (East Hastings): Mr. Boyle is not my friend at all; and the only ones to whom I am a friend are the honest contractors. I am in favour of honest contractors: nothing beyond that.

MR. BOULTBEE: It seems to me that the whole conduct of this transaction has been unfortunate in some shape. The net result of the whole matter seems to have been to place the contract in the hands of men who obtained it corruptly, and who ought to have been deprived of it. The result seems to be a miscarriage of justice in preventing this man Boyle, who appears the only honest tenderer, from obtaining the Contract, and this unfortunate result seems to have been brought about by two causes, namely, the delay of the Committee, and the prevention, the other day, of the matter being gone through in consequence of the objection raised by the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake).

Motion agreed to and Report concurred in.

RELIEF OF THE DISTRESS IN IRELAND.

MESSAGE FROM HIS EXCELLENCY.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD delivered a Message from His Excellency the Governor-General.

MR. SPEAKER read the Message, and it is as follows:—

“LORNE.

“The Governor-General transmits to the House of Commons, a copy of a Despatch from the Right Honourable the Secretary of State for the Colonies, conveying the thanks of Her Majesty's Government to the Parliament of Canada, for the grant of $100,000 in aid of the great distress in Ireland, and enclosing copies of a correspondence which has passed relative to the application of the Fund.

“GOVERNMENT HOUSE,

“OTTAWA, 7th May, 1880.”

ONTARIO AND QUÉBEC SAVINGS BANKS BILL.—[BILL 127.]

(Sir Samuel L. Tilley.)

FIRST, SECOND AND THIRD READINGS.

Bill read the first and second times, considered in Committee of the Whole, reported, read the third time and passed.

CERTAIN MEMBERS' INDEMNITY.

Resolved, That the Accountant of the House be authorised to pay to C. J. Coursol, Esquire, Member for Montreal East; J. B. Mongenais, Esquire, Member for Vaudreuil; and M. P. Ryan, Esquire, Member for Montreal Centre, the full amount of their indemnity, as if they had been present in this House on the 12th of February, last, in consequence of the severe illness which prevented these members from attending to their parliamentary duties.—(Mr. Caron.)

CLOSE OF THE SESSION.

REMARKS.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: It was understood, at our adjournment on Wednesday, that no new measures of legislation should be undertaken to-day, and, indeed, it would be unfair and improper, in consequence of the thin state of the House, and the fact that the leader of the Opposition went away on that assurance from myself. I hope that arrangement will be considered obligatory on the House. Without moving any formal adjournment, I think it should be understood that the Speaker may leave the Chair, and resume it for the purpose of receiving Messages from the other Chamber and for no other purpose.

MR. TROW: I notice in the Court Journal of April 17th, that Captain E. Palliser has been appointed Military Attaché to Sir A. T. Galt. The brother of that gentleman has made himself familiar in this country by his construction of materials of warfare, and I would like the hon. the First Minister to inform us whether Captain Palliser has been given that position for any particular purpose.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I think that question requires notice. If the hon. gentleman will give two days' notice, I will answer it.

MR. PLUMB: As the time draws near when we shall be compelled to part, I may be permitted to congratulate my hon. friend of the Opposition the member for South Perth (Mr. Trow), for the masterly way in which he has discharged his duties in this House since all his friends on that side have deserted him and gone home. It is fortunate for my hon. friend, the leader of the Opposition, that there was no division to-day in the ranks of his party, because it would have been exceedingly difficult for him to have divided himself. But I see the hon. gentleman for North Bruce (Mr. Gillies) is also in his seat, and if there had been a division to-day the Opposition could have cast two votes, which, no doubt, would have been quite as effective as any other vote cast by the Opposition during the Session. I am glad to see in his place—and indeed a little in advance of his place the hon. member for Ottawa County (Mr.

Wright) who holds regal sway in his district as the "King of the Gatineau." That hon. gentleman has the largest constituency, the largest majority and the largest heart of any member of this House. I trust we may all meet again next Session in the enjoyment of health, and with our strength undiminished.

MR. TROW: My extreme modesty will not permit me to accept the flattery that has been heaped upon me by the hon. member for Niagara (Mr. Plumb). If the Opposition are few in number they are strong in weight and backbone. I must say my following to-day has not been as encouraging as I anticipated. One of my hon. friends went off at a tangent and the other left for the smoking room.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Is the hon. gentleman going to say the Opposition ends in smoke?

MR. TROW: At all events we are here on duty. For myself I never lost a day in Parliament, and I am determined, when I occupy that honourable position to do my duty to the best of my ability. I can say that the Opposition have done their duty during the Session, and have assisted materially in maturing and perfecting the laws this Parliament has passed.

MR. WRIGHT: It is exceedingly gratifying to all of us to notice that the pleasing murmur from Niagara has not entirely ceased, nor that voice become silent. I think we can congratulate the House and the country upon having passed a useful and pleasant Session. I think, notably, our congratulations are due to yourself, Mr. Speaker, for the excellent manner in which you have conducted yourself in the Chair. I am sure that both sides of this House will bear witness to the kindness, the urbanity and the wisdom with which you have performed the duties appertaining to your distinguished position. We have enjoyed very pleasant relations and intercourse with the gentlemen who represent both the great political parties in this country. During the Session we have had many pleasing incidents, and also some painful ones, but in both cases, I think, the House has shown that it always does rise above mere party feeling, and elevate itself into that higher latitude where our common humanity alone bears sway. I have again to thank this House, and the members individually, for their sympathy and great generosity in the sad calamity which a few days ago overtook the city of Hull. I may state, for the information of the House that the evil effects of that calamity have been repaired so far as that was possible, and that an active and energetic people have devoted themselves to relieving the distressed in such a way that I believe the object in view will be attained.

A Message from His Excellency the Governor-General, by the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod:

"In the name of the Commons, I present to Your Excellency a Bill intituled an Act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money required for defraying certain expenses of the Public Service, for the financial years ending respectively the 30th June, 1880, and the 30th June, 1881, and for other purposes relating to the Public Service, to which I humbly request Your Excellency's assent."

To this Bill the Royal Assent was signified in the following words:—

"In Her Majesty's name, His Excellency the Governor-General thanks Her loyal subjects, accepts their benevolence, and assents to this Bill."

His Excellency the Governor-General was then pleased to close the Second Session of the Fourth Parliament of the Dominion with the following Speech:—

Honourable Gentlemen of the Senate:

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

In relieving you from your attendance in Parliament, I desire to offer my thanks for the care and assiduity with which you have applied yourselves to the performance of your important duties.

The evidences of a recovery from the long continued state of depression, to which I alluded at the opening of the Session, are, I am glad to believe, steadily accumulating, and we may, I trust, look forward with some confidence to a prosperous year.

The measures relating to Banking and the Currency and to the amendment of the Tariff, with the other laws passed this Session, will, I hope, aid in the promotion of the anticipated prosperity.

The expectations of a large immigration of valuable settlers into the North-West, in which I then ventured to indulge, appear from the latest information to be fully realised.

The laws for the better organisation of the North-West Territories, for the amendment of the Dominion Lands Act, and for the more efficient management of Indian Affairs, must tend greatly to the advantage of that vast and interesting region.

The measure for the consolidation of the laws concerning the Inland Revenue, and the other important Acts relating to the public interests, seem well adapted to promote those interests.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons :

I thank you in Her Majesty's name for the Supplies you have so liberally voted.

I trust that the vigorous efforts made to settle the Indian bands of the North-West, on their Reserves, will diminish, in the future, the calls made on the public Treasury for aid to save them from starvation.

Honourable Gentlemen of the Senate :

Gentlemen of the House of Commons :

The appropriations made will enable my Government steadily to prosecute the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and to hasten the completion of our Canal system.

In bidding you farewell, I desire to express my earnest desire for your happiness and prosperity in your several homes.

The Parliament of the Dominion of Canada was then prorogued to Wednesday, the 16th June next.
