MANITOBA LANDS CLAIMS BILL.

(Sir John A. Macdonald.)

FIRST READING.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD, in introducing a Bill (No. 94) For the final settlement of claims to lands in Manitoba by occupancy, under the Act 33 Vic., cap. 3, said: A considerable number of claims are still outstanding of those intended to be provided for by the original Manitoba Act. It was proposed under this Bill to put a limit to the time allowed for these claims. A considerable portion of country is kept unproductive on account of claims which are said to exist not having been sent in; and this Bill provides that they must be sent in on or before the 1st day of May, 1882.

MR. MACKENZIE: Has this any reference to the half-breed lands?

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Yes; to all the claims outstanding of every kind that were set up under the Manitoba Act.

NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES CRIMINAL TRIALS FEES.

RESOLUTIONS CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole to consider certain proposed resolutions respecting the fees to be paid to coroners, jurors and witnesses attending criminal trials and inquests, and the salaries to be paid to officials in the North-West Territories.

(In the Committee.)

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: This resolution is nearly the same as the present law, but there are a few exceptions. There are now no means whatever in the North-West for trials before a Stipendiary Magistrate. There are no fees fixed by law for coroners, jurors and witnesses, and this Bill proposes to give power to the Governor-in-Council to fix such fees. There are two Stipendiary Magistrates now, and it may be necessary to appoint a third. The Chief of Police is made, ex officio, a Stipendiary Magistrate under the Act. It has been represented to be absolutely necessary that that country should be divided into a certain number of judicial districts. District Registrars are to receive each not more than $1,000. During the next year most likely two District Registrars will be appointed.

MR. BLAKE: In this connection I desire to make a remark bearing upon the future interests of that country. I think no more important measure could be devised for those interests than the one which would carry out the general principles of the Bill introduced by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), to promote the creating of evidence of titles to real estate there. It is time for the Government to consider that subject, with the view of adopting a policy for the easiest possible mode of transmitting real estate. It is obvious that the difficulties that beset the adoption of that system become greater with the lapse of time from which the patent issues. While we do not expect that a great deal of land will be patented, yet it is extremely important that the permanent system upon which that vast country is to be settled and estates transmitted for all time to come should be determined at an early period.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I agree that every means should be adopted to simplify and expedite the mode of transmitting estates and property in the North-West. That is the tendency in England and has been here.

Resolutions ordered to be reported.
House resumed.

(In the House.)

Resolutions reported, read the second time and concurred in.

WAYS AND MEANS.—THE TARIFF.

Order for the House to go again into Committee of Ways and Means (Sir Samuel L. Tilley) read.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: Before asking you to leave the Chair, Sir, I beg to state, for the information of the House, that, when we are going into Committee, I shall ask them to consider and adopt the following resolutions in amendment to the Tariff. I may say that two of the items contained in these amendments were omitted in the preparation of the schedule submitted on a former occasion. The others are matters that have received the consideration and the attention of the Government since the former resolutions were submitted.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD.

1. Resolved.—That it is expedient to provide, in addition to the provisions contained in the resolution of 10th March last, to further amend the Act 42 Vic., cap. 15, by the following additions to and alterations in the Schedule A of the said Act :—

1. After the item "Electro-plated ware," insert the words "Emery Wheels," twenty-five per cent. ad valorem.

2. After "Gloves and Mitts," insert the words "Gold and Silver Leaf," twenty-five per cent ad valorem.

3. In the item concerning "Malt" strike out the words "two cents per pound," and insert the words "fifteen cents per bushel, upon entry for warehouse, subject to Excise Regulations."

4. After the item "Paints and Colors, ground in oil," insert the words "Paris Green, dry," ten per cent. ad valorem."

5. Under the heading "Wools and Wool-lens," in the item "Felt for Boots and Shoes," after the word "Shoes" insert the words "and Skirts."

6. Under the heading "Gunpowder and other explosives," after the item concerning "Nitro Glycerine," insert the words "Provided that a draw-back of one and a-half cents per pound may be allowed and paid on all blasting powder actually used by miners in the Province of British Columbia, during three years next after the first day of April, 1880."

7. In the item "Soap, common, brown and yellow," after the word "cent," add the words "and a-half."

2. Resolved.—That it is expedient further to amend the Schedule of Free Goods, as follows :—
Embossed Books for the Blind.

From the item concerning "Colors," strike out the word "Castile" and the words "Paris Green."

These are the propositions that, when we go into Committee, I intend to ask the House to consider; but, before requesting you to leave the Chair, Sir, I wish to take advantage of the present opportunity of answering the strictures of hon. gentlemen opposite on the financial and trade policy of this Government. It has been my custom, as a member of the House, and as a member of the Local Legislature, in which I had a seat for many years, to discuss questions solely upon their merits. As in the submission of my financial statements in 1873 and 1879, so, in submitting my financial statement a few nights since, I avoided any reference, though my language has been designated as vituperative by hon. gentlemen opposite, to our predecessors, or the acts of the late Administration, feeling that it was only right and proper, in making a grave financial statement, to rest my case upon its merits and not fall back upon the shortcomings of our predecessors. My hon. predecessor (Sir Richard J. Cartwright), who, I regret, is not in his seat, thought proper, as on former occasions, not to meet fairly and argumentatively my case, but by sneers and insinuations; and were he present I would feel constrained to make some remark upon his course of dealing with my statements, although my hon. friend the Minister of Railways dealt with him on that occasion in a manner highly approved on both sides of the House. I will, in his absence, Sir, defer any special reference to him until I come to my closing remarks, when he may be in his seat; and I will, therefore, at once proceed to the consideration of the subject on its merits. In the discussion that has taken place, it has been stated, with reference to the financial affairs of the Dominion, that the Estimates of expenditure submitted for the next financial year are largely in excess of any previous Estimates submitted to this House, and gives evidence of extraordinary extravagance in the present Administration. It has been stated that the debt of the Dominion of Canada has been increasing to a very remarkable extent since the year 1873 down to the present time, and it warrants the most careful consideration, not only of the Government, but every member of the House, and is alarming in the extreme. It has also been said that the taxation of the country in 1867-68, the first year of Confederation, was much less than at present; and I desire to show what that increased taxation really is, and what has led to that increased taxation. I desire also to state what our prospective expenditure for railway purposes will be during the next ten years, and the prospect of being able to meet that expenditure. Having dealt with these, I then propose calling attention to the arguments and statements made with reference to the working of the Tariff during the past twelve months. In the first place, I will deal with the Estimates for the next year, which have been declared excessive. As far as the proposed expenditure is concerned, I purpose proving that, taking into account new expenditure, additional expenditure of an entirely new character, the expenditure proposed for next year is less, as far as controllable expenditure is concerned, than in any year since 1873. The estimated expenditure for next year is $25,207,203, which includes $200,000, the outside figure for Supplementary Estimates to be submitted, including provisions for public buildings in Manitoba. I proceed to compare that proposed expenditure with that of 1873-74: if we deduct from that expenditure of $25,207,203 the increased interest on the debt, the sinking fund and subsidies to Provinces, amounting to $2,294,883; if we deduct $186,000 estimated expenditure on the Prince Edward Island Railway, as expenditure that did not exist in 1873-74; if we deduct $500,000 for the section of the Intercolonial Railway between Moncton and Quebec, which was not operated in 1873-74, because it was not then opened; if we deduct $200,000 asked for next year for the management and maintenance of the Pacific Railway, which will then be in operation, we find that we have a total deduction to make of $3,180,838, leaving $22,026,360 against an expenditure of $23,316,316 in 1873-74. If we deduct from the expenditure of 1873-74, $540,000 properly chargeable to railway construction; if we deduct drawbacks or refunds of duties improperly returned during that year; if we take certain other items, which do not properly belong to that year, the outside being $1,000,000, you will find that, giving the late Government the benefit of that million, it will still reduce the expenditure for the next year in the items over which we have control, to $22,026,000, as against $22,313,316—a sum less, after making these deductions, than was expended that year. Then we come to the expenditure for 1874-75, for which the hon. gentlemen opposite certainly were responsible, and we find that, taking the Estimate of the next year, as before stated, as at 25,207,203, and deducting from that the increased interest and sinking fund, and the increased subsidies between 1874-75 and 1880-81, being $1,418,428; the expenditure estimated on the Prince Edward Island Railway being $135,000 more than we expended in 1874-75: deduct $450,000 for the management of the Intercolonial Railway, that was not opened at that time, and also $200,000 to be expended in the management and running of the Canadian Pacific Railway in Manitoba and you have a total deduction of $2,203,428 from $25,207,203 asked for 1880-81, leaving but $23,003,775, against an expenditure of $23,713,071 for 1874-75, or $710,000 less. Then we come to 1875-76. Again, if we deduct from the estimated expenditure for next year the increase in the interest and sinking fund, and the subsidies, which make up $1,401,742; the estimated expenditure on the Pacific Railway, $200,000; the working expenses on the Rivière du Loup section of the Intercolonial, $200,000, we have an expenditure of $23,405,461, against an expenditure in that year, 1875-76, by our predecessors, of $24,488,372, or $1,000,000 less. If we take 1878-79, and deduct from the estimated expenditure for next year the difference in the interest and sinking fund and subsidies, $631,235; for the expense of the management of the Pacific Railway, $200,000; Rivière du Loup Branch—formerly Grand Trunk—$200,000, we have a total of $1,081,835, leaving an expenditure of $24,175,968 to set against the expenditure of $24,451,481 for 1878. We are looking to an increased expenditure from year to year, as we extend the Pacific Railway. But if, as in the present case, from this increased expenditure, we obtain a revenue equivalent, in return, which we expect, there will be no increase of the burdens of the people. When we make those deductions on account of the sinking fund and other exceptional expenditures, you will find that there has not been a year, from 1873 to the present, that the outlay has not been largely in excess of the estimate for 1880-81. I come to another point of some importance, the increased taxation of the people of Canada since Confederation. Now, in 1867 and 1868 the Customs and Excise, which are the measure of the taxation on the people, yielded $11,700,681, or, in proportion to the population of that day, there being but the largest four Provinces in the Union, $3.55 per head. In 1878-79, we received from Customs and Excise $18,476,613, or, in the estimated population of that year, $4.55 per head, which was an increase of $1 per head.

MR. BLAKE: What was the increase of the population?

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: I estimate it now, with the new provinces

added, and the ordinary increase, at 4,000,000.

MR. BLAKE: Is the ordinary increase estimated at the rate that existed between 1860 and 1870?

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: Yes. The number must be about 4,000,000, upon which my calculations are based. It is very important to show what has led to this increased taxation of $1 a head. The first cause was a measure submitted by the Government of which I was a member in 1873, which was carried by an overwhelming majority, and which has been criticised with great severity by some of the hon. gentlemen opposite—the assumption of the whole debts of Ontario and Quebec when we entered Confederation, and the grant of equivalents to the other Provinces. The late Finance Minister condemned that proposal, declaring it would impose heavy burdens upon the people. But whether it was right or wrong, it was sustained by a large majority, and it did not entail increased taxation on the people as a whole. It involved practically the taking of money out of one pocket and the placing of it in another. It was, it is true, assuming the debts of Ontario and Quebec, and giving the other Provinces an equivalent for it, but, at the same time, it was relieving those Provinces from additional local taxation. It also enabled the Local Governments to develop the railway systems of the country, which was a great assistance to those Provinces, and in the adjustment of these claims we added $900,000 a year to our expenditure. Then, Sir, there has been added to the annual expenditure of the Dominion, for which provision had to be made, $1,115,000, the interest and sinking fund for the construction of the Intercolonial Railway. Is there an hon. gentleman on the floor of this House who will say that the construction of that road was not necessary? Did it not form a portion of the Terms of Union upon which we came into this Confederation? Therefore, the construction of that work became necessary, and the amount of $1,155,000, for interest and sinking fund, had to be provided for. In addition to that we have had to pay an average of $500,000 a year for the maintenance of that Railway, over and above the receipts. I hope and believe the day is about past when the Treasury will be called upon to continue the payment of that sum, but down to the present time that sum has had to be provided for, and in 1878-79 an additional sum of $200,000, although I have only taken the average into consideration. Then there was an increase in the Post Office expenditure, over and above receipts, of $500,000. The expenditure has increased by $1,100,000 and the receipts by $600,000. It may be a question whether it was desirable on the part of either or both Governments to give the extended facilities which have been given to that service, but still the money has been expended, and we have the advantages of that expenditure throughout the length and breadth of Canada. Then there is the interest and sinking fund of expenditure on the Pacific Railway and the Canals, amounting to $1,250,000. The whole of this makes a total of $4,265,000, or more than $1 per head of the additional necessary taxation imposed in 1878-79. I think it is important to bring this out, because we must take into account, in regarding the increase of the Public Debt, that we have added three or four new Provinces to the Dominion; that we have purchased a vast territory, and are opening it up; that we have constructed and are working a railway in accordance with the terms of Confederation, and that the increase of $1 per head has been caused by expenditures which, in the main, could not be avoided, but were absolutely necessary. I now come, Sir, to another statement. It is a statement of the increased expenditure, and is something of the same character as the one I have just submitted. We have heard, more than once from the other side of the House this Session, that the expenditure of the Dominion of Canada has increased with rapid strides; that when we came into Confederation we had an expenditure of but $13,486,000, while last year it amounted to $24,455,000. It is important, in this connection, to show how this expenditure has been increased, for what purposes it has been made, and the objects which rendered it necessary. The increase in the payments for interest on debt and sinking fund for subsidies, the readjustment of the debts of the Provinces, and the increase on the debt incurred for the Canals and Pacific Railway alone, amounted to $3,982,651. The expenditure under the head of Intercolonial Railway, that is, the increased working expenses (because, as the receipts form an item in our revenue, so the expenditure forms an item in our general expenditure), over and above what was expended in 1867, on the section of Intercolonial Railway then open from St. John to Shediac, and from Halifax to Truro, amounted to $1,873,535. Then we come to the item of Public Works. During the first two years of Confederation, we expended very little on Public Works, Sir John Rose, then Finance Minister, having laid down the principle that the expenditure should not exceed the income. In the first year of Confederation, the amount expended on Public Works was only $269,000. Last year, the expenditure reached $1,130,000, being an increase of $740,000. On Lighthouse and Coast Service, the expenditure has increased $270,000. The policy of both Governments, and I think it was a wise policy, has been to expend liberally on the construction and maintenance of lights, which are for the benefit of our commerce, and especially our importers and exporters. On Fisheries, the expenditure in the first year of Confederation was $30,572; last year it amounted to $82,319, and the average expenditure for Fisheries, since 1871, has been $90,000 a year; the propriety of encouraging this industry will always be recognized by the people. Then we come to a large expenditure, last year, in connection with the Indians in the North-West, and the Dominion Lands. The expenditure under that item has become very large and serious. It is a question whether any other policy could have been adopted, but I think it will be admitted that the money which has been expended under Treaty arrangements with the Indians, to secure peace with them, or to relieve them in the hours of their distress, is far better expended than in an increased armed force. The expenditure under this head reached $680,000 last year. Then there is an increased expenditure in British Columbia, Prince Edward Island, Manitoba and the North-West, not included in the items referred to above, of $700,000. On Ocean and River Service, we expended last year $130,000 in excess of what was expended in 1867; and the increased expenditure on the Post Office was $1,168,000. On Legislation, a part of the increased expenditure was caused by the accession of new Provinces, the increased number of members of the House and of the Senate, and a part was the result of an increase in the indemnity to members. That item was $153,000 more last year than it was in the first year of the Union. An increase of $31,000 was caused by the salaries paid to the four additional Lieutenant-Governors. On Weights and Measures there has been an increase of $84,000; and $100,000 has been added to the cost of management of canals, though they have brought an additional revenue of $90,000. This makes, altogether, an increase of $10,104,190, leaving about $865,000 to be accounted for by the increase in the cost of the Civil Service, Immigration, Pensions, Superannuation, Marine Hospitals, Customs and Excise, Insurance, Geological Survey and Observatories, the result of the admission of new Provinces, or new items of expenditure. These are the items which compose the increase since Confederation; but, if hon. gentlemen will take them up and examine them carefully, they will find that, although, probably, there are some expenditures which could have been avoided, there is a satisfactory reason, in most cases, for the increased expenditure since 1867.

MR. MACKENZIE: You have a revenue equal to the expenditure for Insurance, or a little more.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: O, yes; and in several of these items our revenue has gone on increasing. From 1867 to 1873, the increase in the revenue was much larger than that in the expenditure, which left us a surplus, and since then there has been an increase in many items, but it all goes to swell the general expenditure, and I think hon. gentlemen do not always take that as much into consideration as they should. Some state to the country that there has been an increase in the expenditure from $13,000,000 to $24,000,000, without saying anything about the increased revenue—from Public Works—received in return for those increased expenditures. Now, I come to what, I think, requires to be cleared up a little, and that is the increased debt from 1867-8 to the present time. The gross debt of the Dominion appears from the Public Returns to have been, in 1867-8, $93,046,000, or deducting the assets, namely, $17,317,000, it leaves a net debt of $75,728,000. The net debt in 1872-3 amounted to $99,848,000, as against $75,728,000 in 1867-8, leaving $24,119,820 as the net increase from 1867-8 to the close of 1873. I have heard hon. gentlemen opposite say that the increase in the debt during our Administration was enormous; and, the other night, one of them said that since 1873-4 the debt had been increased little or nothing, only, in fact, about $7,000,000.

MR. MACKENZIE: No.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: I think the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. Cameron) said so.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: He said there was no increase in the debt.

MR. MACKENZIE: I said there was no increase in the debt except what was caused by the obligations entered into by our predecessors.

MR. CAMERON (South Huron): That is stated in Hansard.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: The hon. member for South Huron said more than that. One of the items of increased debts is $14,520,000, expended on the Intercolonial Railway. Was not that an increase demanded by the terms of Union? Then there was an amount of $13,859,000 caused by the readjustment of the debts of the Provinces. That did not increase the taxation of the whole country, although it increased the debt and liabilities of the Dominion of Canada, but it was returned to the people through the Local Governments and Local Legislatures. There was an increase of liability of $28,379,000 on these two items alone, to say nothing about the expenditure on Canals, the purchase of the North-West, and the Surveys of the Pacific Railway, and other similar matters. These two items alone amount to $4,200,000 in excess of the total increase of the debt during that period.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: If my hon. friend will allow me, I will call attention to the statement of the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. Cameron), which will be found on page 705 of the Debates, as follows: "Scarcely a dollar was added to the public debt during the existence of the late Government."

MR. CAMERON (South Huron): If the hon. gentleman will refer to the speech he will find that I was referring to the large obligations which had been previously undertaken.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: Now, let us look at what the obligations were at the close of last year. We find that the net debt, at the close of 1879, was $147,481,070, making an increase in that period of $47,632,607.86.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: The hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Oliver) said the Public Debt of the Dominion was $147,481,557, when my hon. friend from Lambton left power. When he took office it was $140,000,000.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: That is just exactly what I said. Hansard may be right or wrong, but, as a rule, Hansard passes through the hands of members, and, I venture to say, that passed through the hands of my hon. friend opposite. Now, then, there is an increase, in that period, of $47,632,000, to which must be added the expenditure that is to be made under contracts that were entered into by our hon. friends opposite. From the first of July, last, their engagements for the Welland Canal, the Lachine Canal, the Cornwall Canal, and for the Canada Central Railway, amounted to $6,951,000, making in all $54,500,000. If we add to that $4,500,000 of the Fishery Award, it makes the increase of expenditure over income nearly $60,000,000 in six years. The hon. gentleman quoted from my speech in 1873, when I spoke of the prospective liabilities of the Dominion of Canada, when I spoke of the $10,000,000 to be expended on the Intercolonial Railway, of $20,000,000 as the prospective expenditure for Canals, that, under the recommendations of a Commission, was not bound to be made within five or six years, or within any given period at all. It was a Commission appointed for the purpose of examining into and enquiring as to the general system of canals, so that no money should be thrown away, but expended with reference to that general system. I estimated that the expenditure under that report would be about $20,000,000. And then, the engagement that we were under, of $30,000,000 for the completion of the Pacific Railway, made altogether $60,000,000. So it appears, from the end of 1873 until the end of last year, $60,000,000 has been added to the debt since we left office, and still hon. members opposite will say that the debt has not been increased, or not more than something like $7,000,000. What is more, when we came into office, we found not only these engagements entered into which required $6,900,000 to complete them; but we found the Railway contracts so let that the money expended on the two sections, one east of Winnipeg and the other west of Lake Superior, that if the expenditure made upon them was to be of any benefit at all, it became absolutely necessary for the present Government to provide for the missing link. In order, therefore, that these expensive sections might be at once proceeded with, and that the expenditure on the 400 miles from the head of Lake Superior to Winnipeg should be of value afterwards, it was deemed of the utmost importance that 200 miles at least beyond that, into that fertile territory, should be constructed in order to secure some benefit out of the enormous expenditure previously made. These expenditures, therefore, were necessarily demanded of us. In accordance also with the conditions that my hon. friend opposite entered into, we took steps to carry out in good faith the negotiations they had entered into with reference to the construction of the Pacific Railway. My hon. friend opposite said the other night that, when he asked for tenders, unless I misunderstood him, for the British Columbia section of that Railway, the location of which by the late Government was accepted by the present Government, he did it simply to ascertain what was likely to be the cost. I must have misunderstood my hon. friend, because, when I recollect the negotiations that were entered into between hon. gentlemen and British Columbia, when I recollect that Lord Carnarvon and the Imperial Government were taken into their confidence, and they engaged to construct it by 1890, if they could not do it sooner, and, in addition, they engaged to give British Columbia $750,000 in lieu of the portion of the road that was to be built on the island, or in lieu of that section, which proposition was subsequently rejected by the Senate; when I recollect all this, and when I find that there is a notice given by gentlemen opposite, of a proposition to stay proceedings in that section of the country, I confess that I am amazed, considering the position of my hon. friends opposite are in with reference to the obligations they solemnly entered into with British Columbia and with the British Government, through Lord Carnarvon. It is now a grave and serious question in dealing with this expenditure; and, I must say, I was surprised, when the vote was taken a few nights since, to find, on the other side of the House, gentlemen voting for a proposition that would, if it had been adopted, deprive the Dominion of Canada of the means, available from the sale of lands, for the construction of that Railway, and thus subject the older Provinces to increased taxation for the whole of that expenditure; and those gentlemen will, no doubt, vote for the proposition of the hon. member who is to move a resolution that these works are not to be constructed, knowing, at the same time, that our Treaty engagements must be carried out. When the right hon. Premier referred, yesterday, to a statement that had been put into his hands with reference to the revenue that was likely to be received from the lands of the North-West, there was some little laughter on the other side of the House; and, no doubt, in justification of their vote on the land question this morning, they will say there was no money in it, and, therefore, they did not sacrifice anything in voting against the sale of the lands. But I hold that that estimate was not an exaggerated one. But suppose it was large, taking but one-half the population that is estimated to go into the North-West, making this year 12,000 instead of 24,000, and adding 2,500 a year instead of 5,000, and then provide for the sale of but one-half of the lands estimated by the Premier, and what is the result? It produces in ten years, in money, according to that statement, $19,500,000 instead of $39,000,000, and it would leave a balance of payment due on the lands of $16,000,000 towards the payment of the debt. The hon. member for Gloucester called attention to the fact, that my hon. friend the leader of the Government did not refer to the interest that is to be paid in that time. Well, our calculation is this: that, in order to complete the Railway from the head of Lake Superior to Winnipeg and the 200 miles beyond it, we will have to spend $10,000,000 a year for two years. After that the Government policy is not to expend on public works over $5,000,000 a year; and you will find, by making the calculation, that the expenditure for the two years, when we have completed it from the head of Lake Superior to 200 miles beyond Winnipeg, together with that in British Columbia, will not exceed $5,000,000 a year. In the ten years, according to Mr. Fleming's estimate under this expenditure, it will be completed, involving an outlay of $60,000,000. Now, then, if we calculate the interest on the $10,000,000 for this year, $10,000,000 for next year, $5,000,000 a year afterwards, it amounts to $18,500,000 in ten years; $1,000,000 less than half the estimate of my hon. friend for the payment of the interest, and leaving $16,000,000 as a balance due, besides over 80,000,000 acres of unsold land to complete the road. Is it unreasonable to suppose that in ten years 250,000 people will be placed in that country? Mr. Fleming's statement is, that the road from Winnipeg to the Rocky Mountains will cost at the outside $15,000 a mile; $13,000 is his estimate, making the whole expenditure something like $13,000,000 or $14,000,000 for that section. I have heard the hon. member for Gloucester say that the experience in the other Provinces is that railways have not developed the country. Why, suppose we had put a railway through any part of New Brunswick that was difficult of access, and through such lands as we have on the banks of the River St. John—and this is the kind of soil we have in the North-West—I would like to know if that Railway would not be an effectual means of developing and settling the country? Well, Sir, if that be the case, I think there is every reason to hope, and be hopeful, with reference to the great future of this country. Our financial difficulties, as I stated in my Budget Speech, will be for the next year or two; after that our course will be clear, and the Government will have the control in their hands. If they find there is a difficulty with reference to the expenditure, they can limit it; but I believe they will find that $5,000,000 a year on that road, and upon the 900 miles beyond Winnipeg, will not be an unreasonable expenditure. This is a grave and serious question, no doubt, but I feel that the possession of that magnificent territory, affording the facilities it does, and the inducements to emigrate from the Old World to come and settle it, places us in an entirely different position from that we occupied before we came into possession of it. So much with reference to the financial view of the question. I come now to consider the Tariff and its effects during the last twelve months. I stated, when I made my first Budget Speech, that the most serious effect predicted of the policy the Government had inaugurated was that it would operate injuriously to certain Provinces. Well, Sir, I undertook to show briefly that the Province especially to which that reference was made would not, in my judgment, suffer very materially under the operation of that Tariff; that was the Province of New Brunswick. An hon. member of this House made an effective speech on this subject last year, and he made an effective speech this year; but as his statements did not happen to be consistent with the facts, the effect of that speech will not be as great as it was at the moment of its delivery, when he was surrounded by his friends and congratulated upon his speech. That hon. member (Mr. Ross), in order especially to show that this Tariff operated injuriously to Ontario and New Brunswick, stated that, in consequence of it, the duties collected per head of the population in Ontario had been increased last year $1.16 per head, whereas in Quebec they had only been increased 27c. per head; in Nova Scotia they had been diminished 9c. per head, but in New Brunswick they had been increased $1.40 per head. Now, though the returns for last year only embrace some four months' operations of the Tariff, if such had been the actual results of that Tariff, then the hon. member would have made out a case with reference to the unequal bearing of this Tariff upon the Provinces of Ontario and New Brunswick. But, when I tell this House that the difference per head of the population during last year was 16c. instead of $1.16 for Ontario—

Mr. ROSS (West Middlesex): Last year? My statement was correct.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: Your statement for last year is correct. I have the returns for last year to show that the increase in Ontario was but 16c. per head, instead of $1.16. It was 27c. in the Province of Quebec; and instead of its being in New Brunswick $1.40 more per head, it is $1.40 less.

Mr. MACKENZIE: How does the hon. gentleman count the entries at Montreal?

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: I am merely taking his statement, in which he refers to the increase of duties per head of the population.

Mr. MACKENZIE: If the hon. gentleman is giving figures; of his own, I want to know how he arrived at it.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: They are from the Trade Returns. If you turn them up, I will show you the figures; they speak for themselves.

Mr. ROSS: I referred to percentage.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: Turn to the Trade Returns of last year, where there is a comparative statement of the per capita rate of Customs duties—it was from that, I suppose, the hon. gentleman obtained his data, and, if the hon. gentleman expects his statements to have any effect upon the country, he must not make statements so inaccurate and so open to contradiction. I advise him to state things as they are instead of reversing them, and stating there is an increase of $1.40 instead of a decrease. That decrease took place in this way: In 1877-8, owing to the fire in St. John, there was a very large increase of imports into the Province of New Brunswick. That increased the rate per head on its population, and the result was that last year it was $1.40 less. Then the hon. member stated, and the statement was responded to by the members of the Opposition around him, that that was a point it was hard to get over. It only shows to what the hon. member will resort to make a point against the Tariff. I desire to enlarge a little upon the effect of this Tariff on the Province of New Brunswick. An hon. member for Ontario referred to a petition from St. John complaining of the operations of the Tariff laid on the Table of the House, and having about 2,600 or 2,700 signatures. I find that the signatures to that petition numbered just the same as the votes recorded by the late Minister of Customs at his last election. Then, the petition had this advantage: that, in a population of 40,000, where there would be 10,000 male adults, many of them not electors, many non-electors' signatures could be obtained. Moreover, I find that this petition was sent to every section of the country. This petition does not denote any great change of opinion. The petition is a very remarkable one altogether. I wonder it was not signed by everyone to whom it was presented. It asks that the duty should be taken off sugar, flour, meal and almost everything imported. I see that one gentleman, a supporter of the gentlemen opposite, was quite willing that the duty should be taken off everything but one article, in which he was largely interested, as he is a large stockholder in the Spring Hill coal mines, and he marks on the margin, "except coal." It is necessary to look carefully into a petition, in order to discover what value is to be attached to it. I notice that there is a marvellous similarity in the handwriting of the signatures, and an important feature in connection with the petition is that portions of it are much worn, and in a soiled condition, which is an evidence of the amount of labour expended in hawking it about. The parties signing this petition also signed a joint letter to myself and the county members, asking that the petition should be complied with. I did not receive the letter until several days after I made my financial speech, when it was not possible to take these subjects up and deal with them. I now come to a matter of somewhat personal character. The hon. member for Queen's, (Mr. King) who has taken charge of the city and county of St. John, read an elaborate paper, showing the number of mechanics and tradesmen in the city of St. John, and he took me to task for having made calculations, with reference to the effect of Confederation, financial or otherwise, that were proved to be entirely erroneous. I may say, in this connection, with regard to the question of Confederation, the hon. gentleman did, as he did upon a former occasion, refer to the fact that, I stated the probable Customs and Excise tax, under the arrangements made in Quebec, would be $2.75 or $3 a head. But what was the fact? If we bear in mind the arrangements made after the Quebec meeting, and subsequent concessions and readjustment of debts, we will find that the sums we are now receiving in New Brunswick, as interest on debts and subsidies, is $3 per head of the present population—a greater sum than it was supposed the necessary taxation would be under the original arrangement. I do not hesitate to say, and it is susceptible of proof, that New Brunswick has received a sum equal to what she has paid year by year into the Dominion Treasury, without paying, to this moment, one cent of interest on the expenditure in connection with the Pacific Railway, the Canals or the Civil Service. Notwithstanding this, I am held up here as entering into an arrangement that has been financially injurious to the Province of New Brunswick. With reference to the condition of that portion of the Dominion, I made some statements the other day in relation to the effect of the National Policy on the manufacturing industries of that Province. At the close of last Session, I stated that a charter had been asked for the establishment of a sugar refinery. As nothing had been done under that charter, my reference to the proposed refinery at Moncton was ridiculed. The other day, I thought I would telegraph to Mr. Harris in respect to this refinery, and I received a reply from his partner, stating that they had commenced the construction of the sugar refinery, and that Mr. Harris was in England for the purpose of purchasing machinery.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH: How many men will it employ?

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: It will employ enough men, so that, by its influence in the town of Moncton, and by the impetus it will give to the trade of Moncton, my hon. friend opposite, at the next election, will not be able to obtain as large a support as he has hitherto done in that town. Then I telegraphed to the Vice-President of the Lock and Brass Company, which has been established with $200,000 capital, $60,000 paid up. He says the building is all up, and they will commence work on the 1st of May. The hon. gentleman said: Oh, that is an enterprise that has been contemplated for a long time. An ingenious man residing at Moncton invented a lock and patented it, but he was never able, until this policy was adopted, to manufacture the article.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY.

They are not only manufacturing that lock, but an American capitalist has gone in with them, and they intend making all kinds of brass and plated ware. With regard to the cotton mill at St. Stephen's, which has been referred to by Mr. Weldon, I have received a telegram from the secretary authorising me to state that $80,000 capital has been subscribed, that the success of the concern was assured, and that the statement made by Mr. Weldon was entirely without foundation. Then there is the Nut and Bolt Company that was referred to. I telegraphed to Mr. Levy Young, the promoter of the Company, and he states that the building will be commenced by the first of May, and that they have orders ahead for all the work they can do for six months. I think this looks as if there was some vitality in the Province, that is said to be doomed and destroyed by the policy of the present Government, and I am satisfied the people of that Province will show as much enterprise as any other part of the Dominion. With reference to the alleged poverty-stricken character of that country, I have returns of the Savings Bank deposits during January, February and March. The returns of these Savings Banks give some idea of the condition of the working classes. What are the facts? These returns show that, during these months, $88,000 more have been deposited than withdrawn against $16,000 withdrawals in excess of deposits during the same period of the previous year. What has been the effect of the policy with references to the revenue? The revenue collected during the first six months of this year is $100,000 less than for the same period in the previous year; and add to that $40,000 on the sugar duties, collected this year at Montreal instead of St. John, and you have $60,000 less taxation on the people, in shape of Customs, than the year before. It may be said, on the other hand, that is a proof of the poverty of the people. If that be so, then the revenue collected in March, being $13,000 more than the previous March, and in excess of any March collections for ten years previous to the fire, is evidence of returning prosperity. The hon. member for Queen's says that all supplies cost him more this year than last. At the same time, he admitted that the reduction of the duty on molasses and tea paid the duty on cornmeal. Now, there is a rather conflicting testimony here, because he says there is no increased price in regard to oats, provisions and pork; and, if tea and molasses are cheaper than they were, how is it that the lumberers' supplies can be so largely increased in price? The hon. gentleman, and also the hon. member for Northumberland, declared that their predictions that wages would be increased had not been fulfilled; that wages had not increased. Well, I do feel that if they are getting a larger price for their lumber than they did last year, and the supplies cost the men more than formerly, as they allege, and as these gentlemen largely control the labour and the price of labour in their counties, they ought, in common fairness, to have advanced the wages of their men; such a course would have been more consistent with their great professions of regard for the poor man. With reference to the West India trade, I must say here that that interest has largely improved the value and paying capacity of small vessels, and coasters are now receiving freights such as they have not received for many years.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH: Where?

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: Out of the ports of New Brunswick. At St. John, a large number of vessels are, at this moment, being specially built for this trade with the West Indies, and for trade with the United States. The rates of freight are larger, and I have it from undoubted authority that, since December last, there have been more vessels in the port of St. John than for ten years, during the same months. I do not say that this all due to the National Policy, but it certainly does show that the National Policy is not ruining St. John or New Brunswick, and that St. John is not in the bankrupt and dilapidated condition that it has been represented to be by non-gentlemen opposite. You may go through that city and that Province, as I have had the opportunity of doing, and I do not hesitate to say, speaking of that Province with reference to its condition to-day, and the bankruptcies which are alleged to be the result of this Tariff, that the bankruptcies there are less than in any other portion of the Dominion, according to the population, and I ask hon. gentlemen opposite to name two men, or one man even, who has been forced into insolvency through the National Policy. They cannot do it. It is when they are called upon for details that they fail to establish their assertions; when they attacked the industries of St. Catharines they were met with their answer, and so it is whenever we bring them to particulars; they are met with a distinct and positive answer to the statements they make. And so it is with reference to St. John. The information on these points can be obtained, if it exists, in twenty-four hours. I ask for the name of one man who was forced into bankruptcy by the National Policy.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: How can it be shown? Why, the opposite statement has been made; but, if hon. gentlemen who have made that assertion know nothing about it, if they have no evidence of it, if no evidence can be given that one man was driven into insolvency by the National Policy, how can it be stated that many had been made bankrupts by the National Policy? If it cannot be shown, then I ask how can the opposite be asserted, and why was it asserted? The fact is that there was scarcely a man in St. John, who has since failed, who was not insolvent the day after the fire. I would ask, Sir, what would have been the result through the length and breadth of the Dominion, if we had not had the National Policy, and thus given vitality to the various interests of this great Dominion? Now, passing from New Brunswick for the present, because I have the advantage of replying to anything that may be said on the opposite side, I come to the question of manufacturers. I stated in brief, with reference to manufactories throughout the country, that, from my observation, after visiting a great many of them, I found that the result of this policy was satisfactory to them. The hon. the leader of the Opposition said that one-half of the manufacturers objected to the Tariff; reference was made to my visit to London in proof of it. I visited in all nineteen manufacturing centres, and some of these are the most important manufacturing districts; and, after visiting them, I was satisfied with what I saw, and that the great bulk of the manufacturers of the country were satisfied, and nearly all declared that the policy had been beneficial. Something was said about my being besieged in London by a number of persons dissatisfied. My visit there was very satisfactory. It is quite true I met some gentlemen on Saturday evening who had some representations to make, and I arranged to meet them at the City Hall on Monday, and discuss the various matters they had to present for consideration. I met them there; one complained about the tolls in the harbour of Port Stanley, and asked that they should be reduced; another, engaged in the slaughtering of hogs, thought that they were not fairly dealt with in respect to the difference of weight allowed between the live hogs and exported pork; and this complaint was dealt with in due course by the hon. the Minister of Customs, and concessions made. Another gentleman, in the cap and fur trade, had a grievance with reference to duties on a particular description of felt; but he told me that his friend in the same line of business opposite to him was perfectly satisfied with the Tariff; this I knew already, for I had seen the gentleman in question, who, by-the-by, was a firm supporter of hon. gentlemen opposite, and he had told me he was quite content with the Tariff, and had no suggestions to make in regard to it. I visited the carriage manufactories referred to by the hon. gentlemen opposite. The carriage-makers did object to the 30 per cent. on certain materials entering into the construction of carriages. Hon. gentlemen, however, had said that the Tariff had destroyed this trade with Australia. How could this be, as a drawback would be allowed on materials used in carriages exported? It was, probably, the imposition of a similar duty, and the adoption of a similar policy by Australia, that destroyed our trade in this respect—not our own National Policy. Our manufacturers would pay no duty on goods exported. A great number of waggons and agricultural implements are being sent out to Manitoba. A gentleman engaged in the manufacture of agricultural implements told me, when in London, that he had received orders from Manitoba for \$60,000 worth of agricultural implements and wagons, to be delivered this spring. I visited a furniture factory that had just re-opened, and I found the men in great spirits; I found the words "Success to the National Policy" posted up in every conceivable place. And what did I find them doing in this factory? I found them manufacturing the frames of sofas, an article that had never been manufactured there before, but had previously been transported from Chicago, and which they now manufacture for smaller manufacturers in the upholstery line. This was a new industry in this branch. I then went to a rolling-stock manufactory, and found them engaged in the manufacture of cars for the Southern Railway. Let me say here that the National Policy has had this effect of causing to be manufactured in Canada cars and locomotives that would otherwise have been manufactured in the United States. In Montreal there has been an immense number of men at work on rolling-stock. I was not only in London, but I was in Brantford, on my way from London, and at Brantford I met a great many who had formerly been supporters of the hon. gentleman opposite, and one, who had, according to his own statement, been a constant supporter of the Liberal party, who said, in the course of speech made by him at a dinner, at which I was: "I have been a supporter for twenty-seven years of the Liberal party; I have not agreed with them in the policy of Free-trade, but I have supported them with every vote; I am engaged in a business in which we have scarcely held our own for the last four years. I visited Ottawa; I appealed to the Government; I stated to the ex-Minister of Finance our difficulty, our sinking condition; and what the consequence would be if no relief was given; and I said to him: 'See, we are sinking; we must have some assistance.' 'Go back,' said the ex-Finance Minister, 'and sink, then.' Am I then to be called a traitor to my principles because I have in that sinking condition, laid hold of the lifeboat that has been prepared by Sir John A. Macdonald to save us? I have a living now; my profits are small, but, nevertheless, I am able to keep my mill going and keep my men employed." I visited another manufacturer with the political proclivities of hon. gentlemen opposite. As we passed through his place, there were many smiling faces. He said to me, before we went through: "You have a great many friends here, and I should not at all wonder if they give you a cheer; if they do, I will not object." I visited an establishment in another town. I was shown through by one of the partners, and general satisfaction was expressed. I will tell you the conversation that passed in the evening after being through this establishment. A gentleman asked me, "Did you see Mr. So-and-So?" I answered "No." He said, "I saw him the other day and I said to him 'Mr. Tilley is coming here in a few days, you will, of course, show him through your place'; he said, 'I do not want to see Mr. Tilley; I do not want to admit that the National Policy has done us any good, and I would have to do so were I to see him.'" Now, though giving unwilling testimony, that same gentleman had expressed himself satisfied, and that his business was in a prosperous condition. I visited Gananoque, where I went over several establishments, where the proprietors were of one or the other side of politics, and, with one exception, all admitted that the change in the Tariff had benefitted them, and I have not been in any town of the Dominion of Canada of the same population that showed more vitality than that town. I visited the principal manufacturing centres, including Oshawa, Belleville, Toronto, Montreal, Sherbrooke and Almonte, and conversed with their manufacturers and merchants. Almonte is an important manufacturing centre for woollen goods, partly owing to its magnificent water-power. I found the three leading establishments working after hours, though they had been shut down for some time before. The largest had been bringing in new machinery, to take advantage of the best inventions for the manufacture of new kinds of cloths. The other establishments were working overtime. The weavers received, the day I was there, or the following day, some 10 per cent., or 10c. a day additional to their wages. I was pointed out the building erected for a furniture factory, and have been asked here if I visited it. Yes, it was shown me; and I was told it had been burned out in 1876, and that the town of Almonte had agreed to give \$10,000 as a bonus for its reconstruction. The building was reerected, and the town having failed to give the bonus it stood there awaiting use; but it will not wait long, I trust, under Protection, for an occupant. It stands idle because the capital of the company was lost by the fire, and the promised bonus was refused. The other interests of the town, especially the woollen, were in a most flourishing condition. Wherever I went I found improvement. Take, for instance, Montreal, where it is estimated there are to-day 4,000 more operatives employed, and at better wages and at full time, than there were this time twelve months. A large machine shop is manufacturing machinery for the sugar refinery, and producing machinery for other manufactories being established; you will find in different parts of the country, workshops turning out new machinery. They have had an impetus given to their trade, as they are building engines, locomotives and machines for the new industries. I want no better proof of the success of the National Policy than in the construction and enlargement of cotton and woollen mills. A gentleman who was here last Session, and had opposed the duty on coarse woollen goods, afterwards went to England and brought out machinery formerly in use there, for a woollen mill erected at Montreal, and he had 100 hands employed in it in three months after the change of Tariff. One ready-made clothing establishment in Montreal has 900 hands employed. You find in factory after factory all the hands now fully employed, and in increased numbers. Hon. gentlemen opposite say that those are immense monopolies, taking, unfairly, the hard earnings of the masses. I have statements from the manufacturers showing that cotton goods, bleached and unbleached, were, on the 21st February last, for sale in this country as cheap as they could be bought in Boston, and the duty saved on them. I requested and got reliable statements from the manufacturers. There is a difference of less than 1c. per pound on the weight of the cotton manufactured in favour of Boston; but the manufacturers here give three months' credit, and 10 per cent. discount, while in Massachusetts but two months are given, and 5 per cent. discount, which makes the price about the same in both countries. With reference to woollen goods, taking the price of wool for 1873 to the present year, let us look at the profits on the manufacture of a pound of wool; in 1872, 52c.; in 1873, 42c.; in 1874, 43c.; in 1875, 47c.; in 1876, 48c.; in 1877, 46½c.; in 1878, 41½c., and in 1879, 30c.—that is down to the end of 1879. Then, here is the statement for 1880, so far as it has gone. The difference between the price of wool per pound and the price of 12½ ounce cloth per yard, in 1870, 55c.; in 1871, 35c.; in 1872, 40c.; in 1873, 45c.; in 1874, 40c.; in 1875, 40c.; in 1876, 40c.; in 1877, 35c.; in 1878, 35c.; in 1879, 30c.; in 1880, 35c. The duty was 15 per cent. in the earlier and 17½ per cent. in the latter years; but those goods are sold at present at a lower rate of profit on the manufactures of the wool than before. I have a statement in reference to grey and white blankets, and the profits per pound stand in the same proportion; and, in conversation with a gentleman, within the last few days, who deals largely in that article, he stated that, until the recent increase in the price of wool, the price of Cornwall blankets, notwithstanding the increase of duty, had not been increased to the purchaser. When wool rose from 22c. to 35c. per pound, the manufacturers of woollen goods had to increase their price in the same proportion. This gives cotton and woollen goods manufactured in Canada to the consumer at a less price than if the former tariff were in force. We come now to the price of sugar. My hon. friend behind me (Mr. White) made some statements that were very full and clear. He referred to the number employed in the refineries, and the additional work sugar gave, not only in refining, but in the manufacture of barrels, cartage, etc. One important point has been kept out of sight by hon. gentlemen opposite. Under the late Tariff, sugar above No. 13, paid 1c. per pound and 25 per cent. duty. Now, what did we do when we re-adjusted the Tariff last year? We said that all sugar, No. 14 and below, down to No. 9, should pay ¾c. per pound and 25 per cent. This description of sugar that I hold in my hand is very fair grocer's sugar, that may be consumed by any family. A very good and desirable sugar pays, to-day, ½c. per pound less than it paid under the Tariff of the hon. gentlemen opposite. It pays $\frac{1}{4}$ c. per pound specific duty less, and, when imported direct to the Dominion, the 25 per cent. levied on it is not charged on the cost of the packages and other charges, but on the first cost, which makes the rate to-day, to the consumer, $\frac{1}{2}$ c. per pound less than under the old Tariff; and on all grades between thirteen and nine, which can be used by any family, pays $\frac{1}{4}$ c. per pound less, because they do not pay the 25c. on the charges.

AN HON. MEMBER: That is not refined sugar.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: Certainly not; but the hon. gentleman told us the Tariff operated against the poor man. When we can establish that the rich man's sugar, as well as the poor man's, is admitted at $\frac{1}{4}$ c. less per pound than formerly, and the sugar between No. 13 and No. 9 at $\frac{1}{4}$ c. less than before the present Tariff, the cry with reference to the poor man's injuries by the change of duty on sugar is absurd. This trade involves far more than the employment of a large number of men in Montreal, Halifax, Moncton, Hamilton and other cities—more by the direct trade with the St. Lawrence, and New Brunswick, and Nova Scotia, with the West Indies. With this trade, a vessel leaving any of our ports with a cargo of lumber or fish for the West Indies, can find a return cargo of sugar for Halifax, St. John or Montreal. The party shipping the Canadian cargo can thus obtain a lower rate, giving increased profits to the shipping interest, or reduced freight to the shipper, by which his profits are increased. The hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross), said the difference between the quantity of sugar imported from England and that brought to Canada from the West Indies, under the new Tariff, was about 4,700 tons a year. He will find it amounts to 26,000 tons. Vessels from Canada can accept lower rates to the West Indies when they have those return freights, and they can get higher rates and more profit when there is competition among merchants. It is true that foreign vessels come to Montreal with cargoes from Cuba; but that has its advantage, as they load with our grain, and foster trade between Canada and other countries. These vessels, with sugar and coal required for refining, provide tonnage at Montreal at rates that enable them to compete with vessels offering at New York, and thus secure our exports via the St. Lawrence. It may be said you are interfering with the extent of the outward-bound freights by your National Policy. I answer: does it not take more tonnage to bring here 100 tons of wool than it does to bring the products of 100 tons? Does it not take more tonnage to bring iron here, in the raw state, than if manufactured, and the same with other articles of trade? Let the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mackenzie) gainsay this if he can. The National Policy is encouraging our shipping, and developing the North-West as well. We are spending a large amount to improve our inland navigation and trade by the St. Lawrence. We find the Americans in sharp competition with us, as the large emigration to that country gives its vessels return business. But we shall hereafter have steamships carrying European emigrants to settle in our North-West, and carrying back the products of that region and of the older Provinces, at lower rates, and thus enable us to compete with our neighbours. In that way also, we will see the advantages of the National Policy. Let it be properly worked out, and the country sufficiently developed, and we shall have a larger outlet by the St. Lawrence than ever before, and the benefits of an increased carrying trade. With regard to the statement that $\frac{3}{4}$ c. to $1\frac{1}{4}$ c. per pound is the addition to the price of sugar under this Tariff, the quotations of November, December and January last will show it has been selling at a little less than under the old Tariff. We will do still better if we buy when prices are higher and there is a larger balance in our favour. We shut out the American article, by adding to the value of this sugar the amount of their drawback. Our American neighbours can remove this difficulty at any moment by reducing their drawbacks. But there is no objection to a competition to keep our refined sugar at a reasonable price. The competition of the Mother Country will be strong enough. It has no duties on raw sugars, which her merchants buy on the most favourable terms, with capital at 3 or 4 per cent. Labour is low, and they can get their freights from the West Indies and to Canada at a little more than we pay for freights from the the West Indies to the Dominion. With this British competition, our manufacturers could not, if they desired to do so, take from the people of this country any undue profit. And, in this connection, let me say that the remark I made on one occasion, when reference was made to the increase in the price of sugar and tea, that I was pleased to know, that, under our policy, the country was full of sugar, that Montreal and Halifax warehouses were well stocked, and that it was not only in the hands of Messrs. Redpath, but of merchants in the leading cities as well, who had this description of sugar brought in under this favouring Tariff, which they were selling to their customers, and that instead of twenty million pounds, they had three times that amount, and the profit went into the pockets of Canadians instead of the pockets of the people of the United States. I was ridiculed, and it was said that it was most extraordinary for the Finance Minister, or anyone else, to say the people were to be congratulated because the price had advanced. Mr. Speaker, it would have advanced without reference to the Tariff arrangements, but we would not have had the profit. When visiting a warehouse in Hamilton, I said to the proprietor, "So the price of tea has greatly advanced," and he told me that it had. Under the system of the last two or three years, a large portion of the stock then in Canada would have been lying in Boston and New York, and in the hands of American traders there, while now the profits on the advance were in the pockets of Canadians. Is there anything wrong in congratulating Canadians on Tariff arrangements which have given them the profits instead of giving it to the Americans? With reference to the farmer, if his sugar costs him no more, and the sugar which most of our people consume costs less; if the cottons furnished to them cost no more; if the woollen goods cost no more, what difference does it make to him? With reference to the cost of flour, I have a statement here as to the flour brought into the markets of New Brunswick during the past year. The writer says:—

"The accompanying statement gives the

"The flour imported from the United States, and the quantity was limited, was strong bakers' flour, made from Minnesota wheat, a quality of wheat not grown in Canada, except in the North-West, and an inferior flour used for ships' bread. The quotations given are actual transactions, and show that the duty of 50c. per barrel has not materially increased the price to consumers."

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH: Is this gentleman in favour of the duty?

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: I do not know whether he is in favour of the duty or not, but he is in favour of the policy, and he is one of the largest dealers in New Brunswick, and gives this as his experience of the result of the policy.

After Recess.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: When addressing the House, before separating at Six o'clock, I was anxious to place my hands upon some papers that I could not find at the time. I now have them before me, and, as the statement I made was without reference to the documents, perhaps the House will bear with me if I make reference to them now. In reference to the statements made by the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross), I have here a table taken from the Trade and Navigation Returns for 1879, No. 8, page xxv., showing the rates of Customs duties per head of the population, paid in each Province and in the Dominion, from 1868 to 1879. I find by this that, in 1878, the amount per head in Ontario was $2.90, while, in 1879, it was $3.06, leaving a difference of 16c. instead of $1.16, as stated by the hon. member for West Middlesex. In New Brunswick, the Customs duty in 1878, was $5.07 per head, and, in 1879, $3.67 per head, making the per capita for 1879 $1.40 less than in 1878, instead of $1.40 more, as stated by the hon. member for West Middlesex.

MR. ROSS: The report of that speech, from which the hon. gentleman has quoted, is not correct. The Hansard report is not correct. I remember perfectly what I said. It is not so reported in the Toronto Globe, nor in any other report that I have seen. It is a misstatement as to the difference between per head and per cent.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: I looked at the Toronto Globe the next day, supposing that a speech delivered with such force and with such effect as that of the hon. member would have appeared in full; and I venture to say that no one was more congratulated by his political friends than he was in reference to that speech, and for the reason that he made reckless statements, of which I have given an example. I took down the remark at the time, and it was a question with me whether I would then refer to it, or wait until I had an opportunity of replying. When I looked in the Globe the next day, to my astonishment, I found the hon. gentleman, who was entitled to at least two or three columns, was favoured with very little space. I could not understand it, unless the explanation was that some of his colleagues had given the hint to the reporters that it would not do to publish the speech in full. I saw the Hansard report, and found that my impression of the speech was correct. The hon. gentleman said (Hansard, page 644):

"Let me give you a fact or two, which will illustrate the working of the tariff. The percentage which Ontario paid upon dutiable goods she consumed last year was increased by $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.; the Province of Quebec, $1\frac{1}{4}$ per cent.; Nova Scotia, $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.; New Brunswick, $3\frac{1}{4}$ per cent.; British Columbia, 21.5 per cent.; Prince Edward Island, 2 per cent. So unevenly does this tariff rest upon the various Provinces that the Customs duties paid by Ontario have increased by \$1.16 per head; those paid by Quebec only 27c. per head; New Brunswick, \$1.40 per head; British Columbia, \$1.80 per head; Prince Edward Island, 27c. per head."

I noticed the statement at the time, and, if my memory serves me, called attention to it across the floor of the House, and the hon. leader of the Opposition called to the hon. gentleman, as if to say, "the hon. the Finance Minister wishes to speak to you," but I stopped. I thought it would be better to take it up afterwards. An error of that kind is very grave, and it is very important that these comparisons should be accurate and perfectly reliable. I did not find the remarks in the Globe, but I looked in the Hansard, and found that, after it had received the hon. gentleman's revision, it corresponded with my notes taken at the time. Therefore, I read from these returns to show that, instead of the amount being as stated by the hon. gentleman, it was very different. As far as New Brunswick was concerned, if there was anything in the argument of the hon. gentleman at all, the National Policy affects it beneficially. I do not claim that, but for peculiar circumstances in 1877-8, the large importation of goods to replace those destroyed by fire, made the revenue larger than usual, and the population larger, and the difference in the duty was $1.40 between that year and 1878-9, but it was a decrease per head instead of an increase. I have here a telegram which was sent to me from the Secretary of the Cotton Manufacturing Company, in St. Stephens, which I will read:

"ST. STEPHENS, N.B., March 25th.

"Sir Leonard Tilley:

"Weldon's reference to St. Croix Cotton Factory excites great indignation here. Cotton mill enterprise progressing most favourably. Subscription list upward of $30,000. Capitalists, regardless of politics, promise good additions. Town Council of Milltown vote to issue detentures for $50,000 in aid. James Murchie, Judge Stevens, the Eatons, Boardmans, Charles F. Todd Chipman, and other leading men, all taking active part. The Committee wish this to be made as public as Weldon's statement.

"DAVID MAIN,

"Secretary to Committee."

Then I took the liberty of telegraphing to three gentlemen connected with proposed new industries in New Brunswick, as my statements with reference to them were said by hon. gentlemen opposite to be all moonshine. I wrote to Mr. Stephens, of Moncton, Vice-President of the Lock factory there, and asked what the condition of that concern was, and here is what he said:

"Machinery will be in and work commenced by the 20th April.

"H. T. STEVENS,

"Vice-President, Lock Company."

I then sent a telegram to Mr. Harris, a gentleman who has taken a deep interest in the establishment of the sugar refinery at Moncton, and a warm political and personal friend of the hon. member for Westmoreland (Sir Albert J. Smith). While I am upon this subject, I am reminded that one of the hon. gentlemen on the other side said it was no wonder a sugar refinery was being established at Moncton, because it was understood that the Company would have the Government at their back. Now, this was an implication, at least, that the Government were, either at the expense of the public or in some other way, offering help in that undertaking. I may say that the difficulty the Company had was with reference to the difference in the freight charged on the Intercolonial for raw and refined sugar. That Railway, for the purpose of taking the business as far as possible between Halifax and Montreal, had placed a charge of something like 17 cents per 100 pounds upon raw sugar, being less than that on refined; and it was for the purpose of making the rates more equitable, a reduction was made on the rates of refined sugar taken to the different parts of the Dominion from that refinery. Therefore, there was no concession made beyond what was granted to others, and what was reasonable, and no peculiar advantage was given to that industry. I sent a telegram to this firm, and here is what Mr. Harris says:

“March 29th.

“Put in foundations for buildings; will commence bricklaying about the 1st of May. J. L. Harris in England purchasing plant. Will commence operation 1st September.”

Then, with reference to the Nut and Bolt Company, here is Mr. Young's answer:

“Company have started four weeks since, and is incorporated. Half the stock taken up and Directors appointed. Expect to commence building as soon as frost permits. Six months' orders ahead.

These telegrams give some evidence of something tangible and reliable, and is likely to produce a marked effect on the industries of that section of the Dominion, under the operation of the National Policy. I now return to the point I was discussing of the cost to the consumer of the articles manufactured in the Dominion of Canada. I have spoken of Canadian woollen goods and of flour. An hon. gentleman endeavoured to show that the National Policy had really diminished rather than increased the difference of prices of wheat in Toronto and Chicago. It will be quite apparent to every hon. member that the imposition of 15c. duty per bushel on wheat could not decrease the difference between the prices in Toronto and Chicago; such a result could only be produced by exceptional causes. What were the facts of the case? The circumstances were of an exceptional nature, and they arose from two causes. There was for months a corner in the wheat market in Chicago, and parties were keeping the price up higher than it was in Canada, much higher, in fact, than they were warranted in holding it at even for the English market. Then there was another difficulty, and one that it would be exceedingly difficult for any Government to remedy. It is a fact that any Tariff enactments we may make here will, to a certain extent, be interfered with by arrangements made by the railway companies for carrying freights between certain points in the Dominion, and from the Western States to points in the Dominion. The low freights that existed for a long time last year between New York and Chicago had a great deal to do with keeping up the prices in Chicago, as compared with those in Toronto, because there were times when you could carry from Chicago to New York freight as low as you could carry the same quantity of wheat between Toronto and Montreal. It is under these circumstances possibly that a repetition of such a state of things as existed during the last four months may occur. The whole thing has, however, entirely changed recently; this corner has been broken up, and prices have gone down, and the difference now is three or four times as great as it was. Now, I do not hear hon. gentlemen rising on our side of the House and exclaiming that the imposition of this duty has made the difference, nor do I hear hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House calling attention to the great difference, and giving us credit for that change. Now, let us go a little further with respect to prices. I recolect visiting a most interesting establishment for the manufacture of leather, opposite the city of Fredericton, in New Brunswick. This company has not a large capital, it is true; they could do more if they had more capital. They manufacture a particular kind of leather, for the lining of carriages and railway passenger cars. Since the establishment of that factory, that description of leather has been sold for from 20 to 25 per cent. less than it could be bought in the city of Boston. Now we come to another important industry that has been referred to by hon. gentlemen opposite, that of agricultural implements. That is an important industry in this country, and gives employment to immense numbers of men. Under the present Tariff, they have nearly the whole of the market of the Dominion of Canada. With reference to Manitoba I think that during the first six months of this year only $3,000 duty was collected on mowers and reapers imported from the United States, as against $70,000 in the same period of the year before. That industry has so developed that the manufacturers now control nearly the whole of the home market. They are, however, asking for the free admission of a description of iron not made in the country. They also ask that the regulations of the Customs Department should be so construed as to put on the free list certain kinds of steel for use in that manufacture. There was a question as to whether that description of steel was subject to duty or not. The Government felt disposed to make every reasonable concession in that respect, and gave them the benefit of that. But what do they represent to the Government? One gentleman brought me a memorandum showing that under our Tariff they would have to pay $6,000 a year more of duty on the iron and other materials that they imported than they had paid the year before. The question was asked, can you not increase your prices? and they answered that they could not. I visited one establishment where the proprietor told me that in 1878 they turned out 1,800 mowers and reapers, last year 2,500, and this year they are manufacturing 4,000. They pay into the revenue on the material which is used more than they paid under the old Tariff; the mowers and reapers cost no more to the farmers who require them, and the men who manufacture them make a larger profit on the increased number they are producing, and an increased number of men receive employment in their manufacture. Why, some of these gentlemen ask for an increase in the present Tariff, in order to exclude from Manitoba American machines, and I, for one, would have no hesitation in recommending to my colleagues an increase in the duty, so that the Tariff might prevent importation from abroad, if the present Tariff should not be found to do so, in order that they should have the entire home market, as they are producing articles at such a moderate price. Now, we will come to the nail industry. It was stated in my own Province and in Quebec that an increase of the duty from 5 to 17½ per cent. on the iron would compel the manufacturers to raise their prices, but I found that in those Provinces they were selling nails for less than they could be bought in Boston.

MR. MACKENZIE: What has Boston to do with it?

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: That is where the sharpest competition is. They manufacture a larger amount of nails, the consumer pays very little more for them than formerly, we get a duty on the raw material, and they make profits on the increased manufactures. There is an illustration of how our industries really are benefitted and the Treasury not injured, because we get in return a considerable increase on the raw material and duty on goods consumed by the operatives as an equivalent for what we lose on the articles that were previously imported. The hon. member for Westmoreland (Sir Albert J. Smith), asked me, in reference to the flour duty, "Is the gentleman who wrote that letter in favour of the duty?" I answered that he was; and, from his manner of putting the question, I inferred the hon. gentleman placed less importance on his testimony on that account. On this point I will give the testimony of a gentleman who is well known to be a most determined opponent of the National Policy. That gentleman resides in the Province of New Brunswick, and publishes a paper there, the leading organ of the hon. gentlemen opposite. I will quote from that paper, with reference to the furniture manufactures, upon which, they say, the duty has been doubled. I will read a very inconsistent article, after this declaration, that the manufacturer can sell cheaper than the same furniture can be bought in the United States. Now, when running the late election in St. John, a message came to me from one of the gentlemen referred to in this article. He was a large commission merchant and importer of furniture from the United States. He had been a life long supporter of mine. The message was to this effect: "Mr. So-and-so has supported you ever since you entered public life; he is anxious to do so still, but he requires one promise from you." I said, "What is that promise?" He answered, "Unless you promise not to increase the duty on American furniture, an article in which he is dealing, he cannot support you." I said, I would be sorry to lose his support, because he had stood by me through evil and good report, but I could not give that promise. When the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie) was scolding the House the other night, he gave me a passing notice, and said that I had made statements in St. John that were not consistent with the policy we had introduced to this House. I stated distinctly the policy I advocated was a readjustment of the Tariff in such a way as to give Protection to just such industries as this, and that being part of the National Policy. I declined to give any promise of the kind, because I felt it was one of the industries that required and would receive protection from Parliament. More than that, if I erred at all in my calculations or in my statements, when I stated it was a readjustment of the Tariff and not an increase of taxation we had in view, it was because I believed in the correctness of the Estimates of the late Finance Minister, which turned out to be for Customs and Excise, $2,500,000 over and above what would have been received if there had been no change in the Tariff. Therefore, if the receipts had been $13,750,000 for the one, and $5,250,000 for the other, making $19,000,000 in all, that would have been sufficient for this Government, without necessitating a resort to additional taxation. But, when we were face to face with this deficiency, it became necessary not only to readjust the Tariff for the purposes which we declared, and which we advocated, but in order to get an increased revenue, so that our expenditure might not exceed our revenue. I will read from the article referred to from the St. John Telegraph. Mr. Elder is the editor, a gentleman of great energy and ability, and a most determined advocate of Free-trade and an opponent of the National Policy. He says:

"MESSRS. STEWART & WHITE'S ESTABLISHMENT.—Messrs. Stewart & White, who gained such a reputation prior to the National Policy, by their importation of splendid furniture from abroad, have now in their fine ware-rooms on Charlotte street, probably the finest display of parlour and bedroom furniture ever seen in St. John. Much of this has been made by their own workmen, and most of the remainder has been upholstered here. The display comprises magnificent sets of the various celebrated styles, upholstered in gorgeous silks and plush, and handsome sets equally beautiful and highly finished.

"The National Policy forced Messrs. Stewart & White to abandon the importation of furniture, doubling, as it did, the duty. They saw that if they were to remain in the furniture business, they must do so as manufacturers. Their experience as such in this line has proved that the enormous duty of 35 per cent: was wholly unnecessary, and that the Canadian manufacturer without it could compete on even terms with the best makers of New York and Boston."

How contradictory. They could not compete with them before, but, under this Tariff, they have abandoned importing, and turned to manufacturing themselves. He summed up as follows:—

"One of their workmen is now making a bedroom set which will be shown at the exhibition, although it will be completed much earlier, which will challenge comparison with any $1,000 set made by the most celebrated manufacturers in Boston, although they will be able to produce it for about half the Boston price. Persons desiring elegant and beautiful furniture need not go abroad for it, for they can buy it as cheaply in St. John as they can in New York, and save 35 per cent. duty besides."

Now, there is a declaration from an authority who is an out-and-out supporter of Free-trade. That ought to be considered as valuable testimony by our friends opposite.

MR. GUTHRIE: Is not that an advertisement? Is it not a paid business notice?

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: No, it is not an advertisement. I will tell you what I have observed. You may take up local articles in any of the Grit papers giving an account of what is taking place in Toronto, Hamilton, Montreal, or elsewhere, pointing out the great impetus given to the industries of the country, and you will find editorials contradicting and making statements directly opposite to the local reports. Then my hon. friend says, in connection with the editorial I have read, that the editor was paid for it. I do not think my hon. friend, the editor of that paper, will thank my hon. friend opposite for the supposition that he was paid to make this statement.

MR. MACKENZIE: An editor is not bought because he takes pay for advertisements.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: Here is a distinct statement, and no doubt true, that furniture can be bought in the city of St. John, to-day, of that description as cheap as can be bought in New York or Boston, which is a saving of 35 per cent., or 17½ on the old Tariff.

MR. ANGLIN: That is not true.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: Well, I venture to say that there is a great deal of furniture that can be so bought; there may be some few special kinds that cannot, but there is no question about a large portion being required for common use. I might occupy the attention of the House for a longer time in giving the result of my visits to London, to Brantford, to Berlin, etc. I was greatly surprised to find in Berlin a very important industry, employing 250 people, making buttons, and the gentleman who was in charge of one of the manufactories said the number would be increased by fifty or seventy this year. In that town alone there are three establishments for the manufacture of buttons.

AN HON. MEMBER: How long have they been established?

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: They may have been established for years, but have been in a declining condition for some time past, but new energy has been given to them by the operation of the Tariff. The number of persons employed in them has been increased or doubled in many cases. The hon. gentleman maintained that, because these manufactures were established in 1872 or 1873, no credit is due to the National Policy for an increased prosperity. I will not occupy the time of the House by relating my experience in Hamilton, one of the largest and most important manufacturing centres of the Dominion; in St. Catharines, where there are two large flour mills, grinding about 400 barrels of flour each per day. The gentlemen owning these mills are politically opposed to us, and one of them said to me that times have not been so prosperous with them for the past four years as they have been lately. I accompanied them to see the capacity of their mills, and to ascertain the extent of their operations, and I found that they were in a very flourishing and satisfactory condition. Then, in Dundas, we found cotton mills in a most flourishing condition; we found that the tool factory was in a good condition. In the oatmeal mill we found them grinding for the home market, and also doing a large quantity of work for the export trade. Though I did not visit the St. John market, as suggested by the hon. member for Queen's, I met with gentlemen representing the agricultural interest in various parts of the Dominion, and I may say that, notwithstanding all that has been said to dissatisfy the farmers and make them believe that their tea is taxed more than formerly; that their sugar costs more than formerly, under the new Tariff; that all the articles they purchase, such as cotton and woollen goods, cost more, and that they themselves get no benefit whatever, let me say this: they appeared satisfied. I met a gentleman in Toronto, engaged in the grain trade. He was on the other side of politics. He admitted that he had an increased demand for Canadian oats, for a portion of the Dominion, formerly supplied from the United States, and he said: "We are now supplying Canadian oats, and Canadian oats alone." He also said, speaking for the farmer, whatever else the National Policy may have done, it has benefitted him. I was a little surprised to hear the statement made that, because our harvest had been a magnificent one during the past year, and because the farmers had been directing their attention to the fattening of cattle for the English market, and thus causing an increase of exports, it was argued that the home market for the farmer had not been increased. We know there is no way in which the farmer would be more directly benefitted than by the increase of the home market, which must necessarily be improved for farm products, by the development of the manufacturing industries of the country. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Sproule) made a speech, in which he called attention especially to agricultural products. His arguments have not been answered. He showed, step by step, the increase which had taken place in the price of agricultural produce, and the great benefit the farmers of the Dominion derived from the operation of the Tariff, and, with the home market for perishable articles, was largely increased. Then, my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, or some other hon. member, read from my speech, and criticised my reference to the fact that this year our exports are likely to equal our imports. He also read from my speech in which I pointed out, in 1873, that our imports were considerably in excess of our exports. He read a statement, by which I undertook to show that, from the freights we receive from our ships, and from various other sources, we would make up, to a considerable extent, the difference between the exports and imports, and prevent another financial crisis. I recollect the hon. gentleman, on Thursday, commented on that statement, and said it was absurd to make any reference as between the imports of Canada and those of the United States. The hon. gentleman said that diminished imports meant poverty.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I did not say so, I said they might mean poverty, and they often did.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: Well, I am glad the hon. gentleman qualified it. Largely diminished consumption would indicate the poverty of a country, but not largely diminished imports. How is it with the United States? Their imports have diminished year by year, until, for the last three years, the exports exceeded the imports by $250,000,000 a year. That country was not impoverished by that. The people consumed as largely as ever, but she consumed her own manufactures. If she was not consuming as usual, it would be an indication of the poverty of the people. When the hon.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY.

gentlemen opposite are speaking about the terribly destructive character of the National Policy, they point to the haven to which all our people are going. They point to that country that has, so long since, adopted this policy in the interest of their own country—a policy that is leading our people away—a policy that is making that country, at the present moment, more prosperous than it has been for many many years. I would ask hon. gentlemen, when they are referring to this matter, what would have been our position in the Dominion of Canada if we had not adopted a policy that has enabled us to give employment to our industrial classes? They would have had to go abroad for the purpose of seeking employment. It is stated that 23,000 persons have passed over to the United States from Sarnia, but we all know that a large portion of them belong to the United States. But admitting, for argument sake, all that has been said by my hon. friend opposite, we would have had an emigration much larger than we have had, had it not been for the adoption of this policy.

AN HON. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: The hon. member says, hear, hear. My hon. friend opposite said I had made a vituperative speech. I do not know that the speech I made on the 9th March, or the speech I have made to-night, contain any vituperative remarks. Perhaps I would have wounded the feelings of hon. gentlemen opposite if I had referred to what I consider the vituperative course of certain parties in the Dominion in decrying the country, in running it down and injuring its credit; but I do say this, that, under existing circumstances, without giving the National Policy credit for it, it would have been much more gratifying if the hon. gentlemen had taken the course taken by some of their papers three or four months ago, and have admitted that the country is more prosperous than it was, but that the National Policy was not the cause of it. Every unprejudiced man must admit that the country is in a more prosperous and hopeful condition, and I think it would have been more patriotic and more in the interest of the country to have admitted that fact. Many hon. gentlemen in this House communicated with me last Session before we submitted the resolutions in reference to the Tariff, and will probably remember that in the conversation that I had with them, I said that the next Session of Parliament will be the Session upon which this policy will be more especially put upon its trial than any other, because we had had depression before for five years. Everything had been going down for five years. You cannot immediately stop a locomotive after running four or five miles on a down grade; though you put on the brakes, it takes some little time to bring it up; so with this matter. Many manufactories have been closed, and it could not be expected that the full effect of the policy would be felt within eight or nine months, and I urged upon our friends not to be too sanguine as to its immediate results. My expectations have been more than realised. My expectation would have been more than fulfilled even if we had not been able to present half the facts that we have presented during the consideration of the amended Tariff, and, instead of having any want of faith, that faith is stronger to-day than when I submitted the proposition on the 10th of March, because there has not been an argument advanced by hon. gentlemen opposite that has not been fairly met, and not a single statement put forward by them that has not been completely demolished. There were two or three things I referred to in my speech—two especially—one with reference to the loan. The late Finance Minister said it was a pretty good loan. The loan he made in 1876 was nearly as good. He went on to depreciate it, although admitting it to be a good loan. But the hon. gentleman in his statement, and it was done intentionally, no doubt to place me, if it was possible to do so, in a false position before the people of this country, said that, when I visited England to negotiate a loan, Sir A. T. Galt was there at the same time. I may say that, when I was in England negotiating the last loan, he (Sir A. T. Galt) was on this side of the Atlantic. It was said when I was at Washington negotiating any business, Sir A. T. Galt was there also. He was not there with me. But I feel it an honour to have it supposed that any business transacted by me, or any proposition submitted by me, was so conducted and of such a character as to entitle it to the supposition that it emanated from so able a statesman as Sir Alexander Galt. I will say no more upon the subject at present; but there is another matter that I refer to with great satisfaction. It was said that the policy, when proposed, was less favourable to Great Britain than to the United States, and that, therefore, it was an unwise policy. Oh, what a wonderful change since this time twelve months, when they imagined that it was against England and in favour of the United States. Now, when the result proves it to be favourable to Great Britain as compared with the United States, their tune has changed. But I have produced evidence, which has not been gainsaid, that the duty on the whole of the goods imported from Great Britain was only increased about 1 per cent., and 3 per cent. on the whole imports from the United States. As I am about drawing my remarks to a close, I will just refer to the reference that has been made to the evidence of public sentiment against the National Policy. It has been stated that we had some such evidence in the elections that have taken place. Has there been any given by a single election for a member of this Parliament for any change of opinion, on this point, since the 17th of September, 1878? It has been said, over and over again, that the Ontario election was evidence that the National Policy had lost its hold on the people of that Province.

AN HON. MEMBER: So they are.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: Well, Sir, I am not a resident of Ontario. I happened to visit—

AN HON. MEMBER: It was a pleasant visit?

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: It was a pleasant visit. But no one could go into Ontario, previous to these elections, and come to any any other conclusion, but that the National Policy, of all other policies, was the most popular. What is the fact? Down to within two days of the elections, the leading organ of the party, the supporters of Mr. Mowat's Administration, the leading men of that party deprecated the idea of making the National Policy an issue.

MR. MACKENZIE: Why did you do it, then?

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: Why did we do it? Because our friends saw that Mr. Mowat's friends were in the majority, unless they were divided by the National Policy. Mr. Mowat's friends said: "We have been beaten on that in Ontario in the Dominion elections. Let us abandon that altogether, and keep to our own party lines, and we will succeed; but if not, we will be beaten."

MR. MACKENZIE: What did you do?

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: The Liberal Conservatives knew the National Policy was popular, and, as they were in a minority, they naturally tried to make it the issue, because it was popular, and would give our friends the only chance of success.

MR. MACKENZIE: As far as you could, you made it the issue.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: But the Liberals would not have it; and, therefore, the Ontario elections are no evidence whatever of the unpopularity of the National Policy. Let us see. There has been another evidence given of the unpopularity of the National Policy in the Dominion of Canada. The people of England have declared against the foreign policy of the Beaconsfield Administration. That is given as an evidence of the unpopularity of the Tariff, because, as was said by the hon. member for West Durham, it is evidence of a good time coming. Why? Because the Liberal party in England had succeeded in obtaining a majority against the foreign policy of Lord Beaconsfield. But there is a good time coming. It has been said, "the Opposition are greatly elated. 'Why?' it was asked. Why, it is understood that there was some arrangement between the present leader of our Government and Lord Beaconsfield in reference to the settlement and development of the North-West. But members of the Opposition say that is all upset now. Now, Sir, you would suppose that any change which would deprive us of the alleged expected assistance would have been the subject of regret and not of rejoicing. A good time coming! I believe, Sir, there is a good time coming. I believe that the policy of this Government has inaugurated a good time with reference to the encouragement of the industries of this country, giving a home market to our farmers for their produce, giving business for everybody, and filling up the vast territory in the North-West in preparation for the millions that will populate it in the future. This is the good time coming. And I do not hesitate to say, Sir, that, when we meet in Parliament next Session, we will have fully entered upon the good time coming, the success of our policy will be assured, and the prosperity of the country will be so manifest that its strongest opponents will have to admit and appreciate its value. Yes, Sir, there is a good time coming, and in faith of that good time coming, I desire to submit the resolutions I have already placed before you.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH: I think I would not be doing my duty on this occasion if I did not make some observation on this discussion, particularly as I was a member of the late Government, and as I come, too, from the same Province as the hon. the Minister of Finance. The course that hon. gentleman has taken to-night reminds me of by-gone days. I can remember, about twelve or fifteen years ago, when the hon. gentleman, then a Liberal now a Tory—

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: A Liberal still.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH: I will not say he is a renegade. He was a Liberal, and I cannot help thinking that his true convictions are still Liberal; but he became a converted Tory. He has played the rôle to-night of prophet, as he has done for many years. He is a prophet, but he is a false prophet; his prophecies have always been and ever will be falsified; he is not a true prophet. He has always addressed this House with that dignity and decorum, which I cannot say characterises the hon. member for Cumberland (Sir Charles Tupper), who in that respect, really excelled himself the other night; the exaggerations he indulged in went beyond whatever he was accustomed to deal out; his speech was replete with vituperation, invective slander, egotism and threat; and I was surprised to hear the hon. the Minister of Finance, who says he does not indulge in vituperation, endorse that speech of the hon. member for Cumberland. I say that such a speech does not become a gentleman of his position or the dignity of this House. He has referred to the Pacific Railway Scandal as being one of the proudest acts of his life to justify and defend. I do not desire to revive recollections which it gives me no pleasure to revive ; but i cannot allow hon. members to be assailed by that hon. gentleman for the position they assumed on the motion by the hon. gentleman who sits next to me. I took an independent stand in the matter. I cannot understand why the hon. gentleman opposite wants to revive the matter. He said that every man who disapproved of that transaction was guilty of fraud and corruption ; that the dissolution of 1874 was a midnight attack upon the people. The people understood that transaction well, and I wish, feeling it my duty to do so, to refer to a few facts in regard to that Pacific Railway Scandal. Does he not know that not only the hon. members of this House condemned it, but also that the sentiment and the press of England were unanimous in its condemnation? What do we find occurred in reference to that transaction, which I would rather forget, but that I cannot allow the hon. member for Cumberland (Sir Charles Tupper) to attack me and other members on this side because we felt it our duty to censure it? I propose to read a few extracts from the correspondence published in reference to it, in order to exhibit its character :

Extract from letter of Sir Hugh Allan to Mr. G. W. McMullen, dated August 6th, 1872.

"Yesterday we entered into an agreement by which the Government bound itself to form a Company of Canadians, according to my wishes ; this company will make me President, and I and my friends will get a majority of the stock, and that the contract for the building of the road will be given to this company. In terms of the Act of Parliament Americans are to be carefully excluded, through fear that they will sell it to the Northern Pacific. But I fancy we can get over that some way or other. This position has not been obtained without large payment of money. I have already paid over $200,000, and I will have at least $100,000 more to pay. I must now soon know what our New York friends are going to do."

"(Private and Confidential.)

Hon. gentlemen opposite show by their manner that they do not like the re-call of these facts. They would prefer to listen to the hon. member for Cumberland, who condemns every man who disapproves of that transaction. It is well, however, to hear both sides.

"JOHN A. MACDONALD."

Then, five days afterwards, Sir John A. Macdonald telegraphed for another $10,000.

Mr. BOWELL: Read the letter as to the distribution of the stock.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH: I do not well understand what the hon. gentleman wants. He can read the passage he refers to himself. I repeat that it gives me no pleasure to read those letters; but I appeal to the sense of propriety of hon. members on both sides to decide whether upon all occasions, after a lapse of seven years, the hon. member for Cumberland, should refer to this particular transaction and denounce those who condemned it. Whenever he attacks me and hon. members on this side in this fashion, I will use this evidence and quote those letters against him. The hon. gentleman has told us that the whole five years of the late Administration presented only one green spot, the Fishery Award. He said that for the Fisheries Commissioner we had to select a gentleman not within our own ranks, but on the opposite side of politics, who was a personal friend of Sir John A. Macdonald. I am not prepared to say whether Sir A. T. Galt was, then, a personal friend of the present Premier. I know that during the last two years he was in Parliament, he opposed Sir John A. Macdonald and his Government. They were many years associated together, and may have been personal friends. Why should we not have appointed Sir A. T. Galt, even if he was a friend of the First Minister. Let me explain the circumstances connected with the Halifax Commission. When the duty fell on the late Government of attending to it, we cast about to see whom we should select, preliminarily. We decided not to appoint one of ourselves—we thought it would be inexpedient to appoint a member of the Government. The name of Sir Alexander Galt was suggested, and no man in this Chamber more cheerfully bears testimony to his high character and fitness for the work than myself. It affords me the greatest pleasure to speak in the highest terms of his great ability, great fidelity and loyalty to his country. We felt that such a man, who had filled the position of Finance Minister for many years, who was well-known in this country and in England, possessed peculiar qualifications for that position. We did not consider the question of his politics, or ask whether he was a friend of Sir John A. Macdonald or not; this was of no consequence. Sir Alexander Galt was accordingly appointed, and when the Commission met at Halifax, he acted with becoming dignity, great decorum and impartiality. He had associated with him two gentlemen of high character, and considerable ability. The United States were represented by Judge Foster, a man of high character and remarkable ability, and with him an able lawyer on that country, Mr. Dana, well-known in the domains of jurisprudence and literature; and also with Mr. Trescott, from Washington. We attended at Halifax, prepared our case, called our witnesses, and occupied several months in the enquiry. I had much to do in the initial stages of and in the preparation of the case. I gave my whole undivided time and attention to the work, for months, without receiving a cent of compensation therefor. I was assisted by Mr. Whitcher, and two other gentlemen from the Departments, who rendered valuable service. In the professional duties connected with the enquiry, I was assisted by able lawyers. I had also associated with me Mr. Ford, the agent of the British Government. But I had the sole responsibility of attending to this business on behalf of this Government. I was not aided by the advice of my colleagues, as they were so far away from the place of the enquiry. I endeavoured faithfully to discharge my duty throughout, and I think I understood the case. The hon. member for Cumberland, who is not willing to give a political opponent credit for anything, and who was in Halifax at the time of the enquiry, I believe he did not attend it, and knew nothing of the case or how it was conducted. But after his election, he denounced me, though we had been on friendly terms personally, so far as I know, for thirty years. At least I never had any personal altercation with him, and we have been the representatives of adjoining counties for many years, his in Nova Scotia and mine in New Brunswick. I conducted my election honourably, and never indulged in expressions derogatory to him, nor in personalities of any kind. Well, on the day of the declaration in his own county, the hon. the Minister of Railways made a violent attack on me, and abused me fearfully, representing me as false to the country, as one who had no interest in it, but who seemed desirous of destroying its best interests; and not satisfied with that, when the battle had been fought, and he might have been supposed content, he attended a meeting in my county, at Moncton, being accompanied by the hon. the Finance Minister, and the hon. member for King's, N.B., (Mr. Domville), being present at this enthusiastic demonstration; when he thought fit to denounce me, in the heart of my own county. He told my constituents that I was an office-seeker, and always had been; that I had knocked at the door of his Government for office. If that is not true, he can rise and correct me. He added, that his Government had refused me office, which, had they given me, would have placed me on the Government side instead of the Opposition. The hon. member for Cumberland must have known there was no foundation in truth for such a statement, and he had a witness beside him, the hon. the Finance Minister, who also knew it was false and baseless. The hon. the First Minister, to do him justice, I believe would say that I never asked for office; but he was kind enough to offer me the Lieutenant-Governorship of my own Province, as did also the hon. the Minister of Railways himself. The latter also offered me the Governorship of Nova Scotia, and a seat in the then Government. I had two offers of a seat in it, which I declined, and yet the hon. gentleman had the hardihood to declare, in my own constituency, that I had asked and been refused office by himself and colleagues. Have I not reason to complain, also, of the conduct of the hon. the Finance Minister, in letting that statement pass uncontradicted? We had been colleagues in the New Brunswick Government, ten or fifteen years, before Confederation; and I appeal to him, whether I ever asked for an office of any kind, either in the Provincial or Dominion Government? The hon. gentleman does me the justice to say I never did. Then, why did he not contradict the charge or the hon. member for Cumberland, made in his presence? I think that was his duty. The hon. Minister of Railways must have been actuated by magnanimity or very bad personal feeling towards me. I can imagine no other motive for his conduct; to villify and abuse seems to be an instinct of his nature. All I want is fair play in the matter, from both sides, which I believe most hon. gentlemen will allow me. I now wish to read from the Moncton Times, the report of a speech of the hon. gentleman, made on the 27th September, 1878, ten days after our elections, in which he speaks of me in this fashion:

"When Mr. Mitchell was Minister of Marine and Fisheries he proposed to protect our Fisheries by fitting out a fleet. The idea was derided by Mr. Mackenzie and his crew, but Mitchell went on with his fleet and soon seized and condemned the American craft and saved the rights of our fishermen. So other industries should be protected.

"Sir Albert Smith had been spreading himself a good deal over the Fishery Award. He ought to be ashamed to speak of it. The Treaty of Washington, under which that Award was made, was carried at the point of the bayonet against Mackenzie and his army. The late Government had carried the Treaty, and they had selected Mr. Mitchell to represent Canada on the Commission. Mr. Mitchell had prepared the case—a case that with anything like fair management must have secured a handsome Award for Canada. But the present Government—and they deserve credit for it—recognised the fact that they had no man of sufficient ability in their ranks, and they selected Sir A. T. Galt, an old friend of Sir John A. Macdonald, to act for Canada. The Knight deserves his title for entrusting the work to Mr. Galt instead of doing it himself, as he thereby secured five and a-half millions instead of half a million that otherwise he would have got. People must be very ungrateful to object to his empty title, as he really saved us $5,000,000 by recognising his own incapacity and entrusting to Mr. Galt the work he was unfit to do himself.

"Sir John A. Macdonald—and he could not mention that name without saying that he fully endorsed the remarks of Mr. Tilley in declaring that Sir John was the greatest man in Canada, a man who had rendered signal service to his country, to his own personal loss, a man of commanding talents, who could have enjoyed all the comforts that money could procure had he chosen to avoid public life. Sir John A. Macdonald had asked Mr. Mitchell to act as his position entitled him to, but Mr. Smith, who had the same right, waived his claim, and thus saved at least $5,000,000, that the country undoubtedly would have lost had the case been handled by Mr. Smith."

So far from my having opposed the Washington Treaty, I supported it. I felt, when Sir John A. Macdonald returned from Washington, that the settlement was unfair to the people of this country, but that grave consequences might flow from our opposition to it—that the true interests of the Dominion and Empire demanded our support of the Treaty. I do not know whether the hon. the First Minister, whose distinguished ability we all recognise, knew that the hon. member for Cumberland had made this statement. Now, is the House, after these explanations, prepared to approve of his charge, his calumnious attack on me? How could he know that if I had been a Commissioner, instead of Sir A. T. Galt, the Dominion would only have got $500,000 instead of $5,500,000 from the Americans? He speaks of it with the greatest confidence, and said he knew we would only have got half a million of dollars if I had been the Commissioner. The hon. member for Cumberland (Sir Charles Tupper) knew nothing of my services in connection with the Fishery Commission. Sir A. T. Galt, a credible witness, a gentleman to whom he has referred here in terms so eulogistic, and in which I entirely concur—he had an opportunity of knowing the value of my services, whether they were in reality worth anything or not. Had Mr. Ford, the British agent, an opportunity of knowing whether my services were of any value or not? I think he had. These are the two gentlemen I call as witnesses in contradiction of the statements made by the hon. member for Cumberland. It might be considered egotism on my part, under ordinary circumstances, to make reference to this matter, yet I feel, as a public man, I am justified in refuting these slanders, and in referring to gentlemen who know the falsity of the hon. gentleman's statements. Sir A. T. Galt, on the 24th November, 1877, the day after the Commission closed, in writing to Earl Derby, refers to my services in these terms:—

“In all the proceedings, Mr. Ford has been most ably supported by Mr. Albert J. Smith, Minister of Marine and Fisheries, who has constantly attended the Commission, as representing the Dominion Government, and of whom it is difficult for me to speak in fitting terms of appreciation.

“As Commissioner, I have had an opportunity of observing the great value of the services of these two gentlemen, and I most respectfully bring them under the notice of Her Majesty's Government.”

This is the testimony of Sir A. T. Galt.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH.

The hon. gentleman may say that it is of no value, but I do not think that Sir A. T. Galt would make a statement like that unless he believed at all events that there was some foundation for it. Mr. Ford, in making his report to the Government, speaking of me, says:

“But placed, as it has been my good fortune to be during the past six months, in almost daily communication with him I cannot refrain from bringing to your Lordship's notice the great assistance he has rendered me in the discharge of my duties as British agent to the Halifax Commission. To his cordial co-operation in all matters affecting the interest of the two countries, and to his unceasing exertions in the promotion of our cause, I mainly ascribe the success that has attended the enquiry which has just been terminated, and which has been crowned by so gratifying a result.”

Now, there is the testimony of these two gentlemen. One, occupying the position I did, and feeling deeply my responsibility to the country, felt naturally a great anxiety in the success of this case, and I devoted the best talents I possessed to the furtherance of the interests of this country in that connection. I felt it extremely hard, considering that I never had any altercation with the hon. gentleman, that he should have made such a defamatory attack upon me. I felt called upon to advance this testimony here in refutation of the slanderous statements made by the hon. member for Cumberland. I would not be afraid to appeal to the hon. the Minister of Justice also. He was in Halifax during the whole time this enquiry took place. I would not be afraid to appeal to the hon. members from Halifax, who likewise know something of my services, in contradiction of the charge made by the hon. member for Cumberland, if it were necessary to do so. At Moncton, the hon. member for Cumberland told the people that he would look after their interests, and be their friend, and that I had been direlict in my duty to my constituents. It is well-known that Moncton is the great centre of the Intercolonial Railway system, where the machine shops are situated. But how did the hon. gentleman promote the interests of Moncton and the working-man. He dismissed hundreds of employes from the shops at that place. I may also state that the hon. the Minister of Railways and Canals seemed to think that it was necessary for him to make some apparent economy in the expenditure connected with the administration of the Intercolonial Railway, because he had accused the late Administration, in its management of that railway, of being extravagant and corrupt, and so he felt it was necessary, apparently at all events, to do something in the direction of economy. He discharged hundreds of men. I do not think there are at this hour one-half the number of men employed at Moncton that there were when the General Elections took place. The hon. gentleman felt it was necessary, in order to exhibit a spirit of economy, to reduce the salaries of the railway employés from one end of the line to the other, even of those employés whose salaries were already too small. At the present time the salaries of the men of that line are much less than they are in almost any other branch of the Civil Service of this Dominion. I would ask why should he strike at the railway employés, why not extend this economy to other officers and employés of the Dominion? Why victimise and sacrifice them alone? I find in the Estimates that in other branches of the Civil Service, the number of employés has, in some cases, been multiplied, and their salaries increased. The hon. gentleman said that since he had charge of that railway it had begun to be profitable to the Government. Well, it is known throughout the whole of that country that the road is running down. From Moncton to Rivière-du-Loup the testimony is universal, showing that the engines are disabled, and that the stock is deteriorating in consequence of this false economy. I may say that some change is absolutely necessary in reference to the management of that railway. But we are told on the other side of the House that we are not to criticise the management of the railway, that to do so is unpatriotic, that we are striking at the best interests of our country, that we are injuring the reputation of the road, and that people will refuse to travel upon it, and therefore that we ought to say nothing about it. My hon. friend from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) criticised, yesterday, the land regulations of the North-West, and he was immediately asked from the other side, "What right have you to say anything about this." Your speech will go abroad. It will injure our country, and therefore you ought to keep silent. Now, coming to the National Policy, I shall be obliged to recall many events that took place years ago in connection with the Confederation—the hon. the Finance Minister's career at the time when he played the part of a false prophet. After the hon. gentleman had attended the Quebec Conference, and agreed on behalf of New Brunswick to accept 80c. a head on the population of 1861, and $63,000 for ten years, he returned to that Province, and at public meetings he took counsel with the people and advised them to accept these terms. He expressed great amazement that the delegates at that Conference had consented to extend such generous terms to New Brunswick, but I would ask that hon. gentleman now, if the people of New Brunswick at that time had taken his advice where they would have been at this hour? They would have been in a state of hopeless bankruptcy. They have now an income of nearly $600,000, which is more than twice what it would have been if they had taken his advice. Yet, even now they are in great straits, financially. They are driven to the utmost extremity for money. It may be necessary for me to refer to the fact that the hon. gentleman told us that New Brunswick would become the Birmingham of this whole Dominion, and that the people of that Province would do all the manufacturing for the back country, as he called the Provinces of Quebec and Ontario. Well, Sir, the people are disappointed. They were led to expect great things, which have not been realised, and, although I trust this Dominion will never be dissolved, yet I believe that if a poll was taken in New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island, the people would pronounce most emphatically against the Union. The hon. gentleman's promises of prosperity have all been falsified. I did not mean to say that the hon. gentleman at that time wilfully deceived the people, but he indulged in that kind of prophetic fancy which he does indulge in when he desires to carry a point. He told us forty times to-night that there was a good time coming, and these are the kind of prophecies and visions he has indulged in throughout his whole political career. The hon. gentleman seems to be, at the present moment, an ardent Protectionist.

I would like to ask when his mind became so intent on this subject. I have said my hon. friend became a Tory from being a Liberal; now I would like him to tell us when he became a Protectionist from being a Free-trader. Until the change of Government, in 1873, we never heard anything about Protection from him. I must refer to a speech of the hon. the Finance Minister, in 1873, which will convict my hon. friend once more of being a false prophet. He says :

"I would like to take you with me in imagination to the time of the expiration of the next ten years, when the Pacific Railway will be built. I believe that there is too much patriotism in this House, and this country, to allow either personal or political considerations to interfere with the prosecution of this national enterprise. I look to the completion of this work with as much confidence as I do upon any profession that has been made by this Parliament during the last five years. We will go to the Pacific. We find that the miners now engaged there are paying 14c. per pound for all goods they consume, and a man must earn $4 or $5 a day to make it an object for him to remain. This House can appreciate the effect that will be produced in that far-off Colony when the railway is in full operation, and when the miners can be sustained there at $1 a day. A very large and rapid influx of population will take place, and the fertile valleys will be settled by industrious agriculturists, who will obtain good and ample compensation for their labour. The produce of their lands will be carried to the seaboard by the Pacific Railway, and a large increase to the revenue of the Dominion will be the result. Let us come a little way east and visit the North-West Territories. With this railway complete through it, a territory than which there is no better on this continent, capable of the highest state of cultivation, three times the size of the State of Illinois, is it not to be expected that such a territory, with the same railway facilities that settlers had twenty-five years ago, will have its population increased so rapidly, that we may soon expect one or two Provinces between Manitoba and the Rocky Mountains, all contributing to the Dominion Treasury. Let us come a little further, with the Canal system completed, and the connections made with the Pacific Railway at the head of Lake Superior, and the settlers of the North-West producing double what they require, the surplus being brought down by the railway, placed on our vessels and sent through our canals. Toronto, the trade of which has doubled within the last five years, will be quadrupled by that trade, and Hamilton and London will be equally favoured; and all this will contribute to the revenue of the Dominion. Let us come further east still, to the Province of Quebec, and look into Montreal. There will be nothing in the world to prevent that city becoming the rival of New York. With reference to the ancient city of Quebec, with the public spirit shown by her people of late, she would bid fair to come next to Montreal in importance in the Province and double her revenue. Then, coming to my own Province, with, perhaps, limited advantages, compared with Ontario and Quebec, but prepared as we shall be with the aid of the railway, we shall fight hard for our share of the shipping trade. Passing to Nova Scotia, I have no doubt that before the expiration of the ten years, she will have a railway from Cape Breton to the most westerly point of the Province. Halifax will secure her share of trade as the necessary result of the Intercolonial; and this, with the development of her vast mineral resources, may reasonably be expected to enable her also to contribute more largely to the Dominion. With all these influences, may we not expect to derive an income fully able to meet the increased expenditure."

It is a remarkable coincidence that the hon. gentleman should have been Finance Minister in 1873, and now that he is Finance Minister again, and as the hon. member for Cumberland (Sir Charles Tupper) said, is the Saviour of his country, that he should have made such a speech. Now, Mr. Speaker, these are dreams of fancy which the hon. the Finance Minister indulged in in 1873. Seven years have passed since then, and what portion of his prophecies have been realised. He would like to tell us, but he cannot tell us. Now, I read this to show his declaration, as clear and distinct as any declaration can be, that in 1873 the hon. member was not a Protectionist, he was a Revenue Tariff man. We have the hon. the Finance Minister speaking there, with all the responsibility of a Finance Minister, telling us that, in view of this increased expenditure, all we have to do is to increase the taxation $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. I wonder if the hon. gentleman had then any idea of a Protective policy. I wonder where this idea of Protection first entered his mind; was it at Fred-erickton, while enjoying, as Lieutenant-Governor, otium cum dignitate, that he solved the problem? It is a very remarkable coincidence. The hon. gentleman then only advocated a $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. increase; but, seven years afterwards, he advocates a policy which involves a taxation of 26 per cent. on dutiable goods, and 20 per cent. on free and dutiable importations. It was stated by the hon. member for Cumberland that, during the five years we were in power, we nearly swamped and destroyed the country, by increasing its indebtedness. I watched anxiously to see if that statement would be repeated by the hon. the Minister of Finance, but it was not. And I think he is a much better authority than the hon. member for Cumberland. I affirm what the hon. gentleman has practically admitted that the increased expenditure during our Administration, resulted from carrying on public works, the responsibility of which was assumed and undertaken by hon. gentlemen themselves. We find the hon. the Finance Minister himself, in 1873 stating: Here is \$60,000,000 of liability, the hon. gentleman's speeches at that time state, was assumed by their own Government. The Government changed a few months after this. Its obligations were transferred from them to us. It was our duty as far as possible, to carry out these works in good faith, with the resources at our command. In discussing this subject, many important events in the history of the country are recalled. Let us consult the Debates of 1871, when the scheme for the entrance of British Columbia into the Confederation was under discussion. What cause did hon. gentlemen, then as now in Opposition, take when this scheme was presented to the House. The hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie), the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), and several hon. members then and now in the House, raised their voice against the assumption of this terrible and insane liability of building the Pacific Railway in twelve years. I must, in justification to myself, refer to some observations I made at that time on that subject. It would be interesting for hon. gentlemen, when it is charged that the late Government was responsible for embarrassing this country with an enormous debt in connection with the construction of the Pacific Railway, to read the speeches made at that time. I said, Sir :

"There were two very important considerations—one was that there was a great departure from the principles of the Constitution in the matter of the representation. With regard to the financial aspect, however, he could not but believe that lasting injury would be done to the country by the expenditure to be incurred. The cost of the railway could not be less than $100,000,000, and it was equivalent to the Imperial Government asking England to embark in an enterprise involving a thousand millions. Was not the matter, therefore, sufficiently grave to merit the most serious consideration—and he entreated the Government to pause. The faith of the Government was pledged by the resolution to complete the railway within ten years, no matter if the result should be ruin. No verbal reservation could have effect, the written record alone could hold, and the words of the resolution were clear, and if, in two years, the railway was not commenced, British Columbia could appeal to the Imperial Government. They had been told that the expenditure would not burden the people; but could that be believed, and no one would undertake to say that a company would undertake the work as a remunerative scheme, and, therefore, sooner or later, the Government would have to pay every dollar of the expense, and the contractors would want the land as a profit. No one could suppose that even after the road was built, it would pay one-tenth of its working expenses, and how, therefore, could British capitalists be expected to undertake the work. The hon. the Minister of Customs had intimated that if they did not strike quickly they would alienate British Columbia from the enterprise; but was that an element for discussion? No. If such were the case, the matter belonged to the Imperial Government only. Was the House ready to involve the country in so large an increase of debt? That debt was already $100,000,000, and there were many burdens that would arise from the Intercolonial and other works. The Union Act had provided for the extension of the Court system, and that had only been delayed because of the deficient state of the finances of the Dominion. The cost of the railway could not be named, it might be much greater than the amount named, and yet coûte que coûte the country would stand pledged to complete it. He should oppose the measure because it would impose burdens on the people that they were not able to bear, and would involve the country in ruin and disaster."

It is not fair, it is unjust, it is not treating their opponents with fair consideration to charge upon them the responsibility for the indebtedness of this country, as the hon. member for Cumberland has done. This Pacific Railway policy has been an incubus upon the country ever since it was initiated. When we came into power there is no doubt we felt called upon to maintain and support the public faith of the country as far as possible. Hon. gentlemen who composed the late Government opposed this railway scheme at its inception, but, inasmuch as the faith of the country was pledged to its completion within ten or twelve years—though they felt this was absolutely impossible—they considered that to a certain extent it devolved upon them to carry out the Treaty engagements made with British Columbia, as far as they possibly could. But, Sir, what did we do? The late Premier endeavoured, as far as possible, to get as much information by exploratory and instrumental surveys as would enable us to proceed with the work as far as consistent with the Act of 1874, which declares that we shall not proceed with the work if the result is to increase the burdens of taxation upon the people. The present Government, however, are determined to proceed with this work. The resolution introduced last night, clearly indicated the policy of the Government. There is a general feeling prevalent in the country that the Government should not proceed with the work in the manner proposed. They have let 125 miles in British Columbia, that will cost from $10,000,000 to $20,000,000 alone. The Government have a strong power at their back, and can carry any measure they choose; but I warn them that the feeling of the country is hostile to their proceeding with this work to the extent they are doing. There is some excuse for opening up the North-West Territories with railway communication, but to construct a line across the Rocky Mountains is an undertaking the Exchequer of the country cannot bear, and it would deprive other portions of the Dominion of necessary appropriations for public works. Look at the Estimates, and what do we find. New Brunswick is utterly neglected in regard to public works. We are contributing to the expenditure of the Pacific Railway and we get nothing in return. The people of this country ask the Government to pause in their too reckless Railway policy. They ask us to open up the Great North-West coast for the reception of the emigration to the country. But, Sir, is it any benefit to the people of this unsettled portion of the Dominion; is it any benefit to the people of our own Provinces? It is not. I am sorry to say that the exodus of our people from this country is absolutely alarming. What benefit is this Railway policy to the people of the Lower Provinces. It may suit the North-West. It may suit land speculators and lead to an increase of population there, but it will injure the country from which that population migrates. I will undertake to say that one-half of the people who went to Manitoba, last year, were people from the Dominion of Canada. It seems certain, however, that the Government will cross the Rocky Mountains, and they suggest that they have some means of getting $38,000,000 from emigrants and $32,000,000 by promissory notes besides, but this is a delusion. I had intended, in connection with the remarks I made, to ask the hon. the Finance Minister when he became a Protectionist? I would like, however, to ask the hon. the first Minister, because I believe he would like to give an answer according to his honest convictions, whether he became a Protectionist until he found that it was absolutely necessary to invoke some agency as a means of defeating the late Government.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I can answer that question at once. Sir Alexander Galt announced that the policy of the Government in 1859 was Canada for Canadians; that it was so to adjust the Tariff as to incidentally assist our Canadian industries. That policy, as I said was announced in 1859 and it has been our unvarying policy ever since.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH: Is it possible that my hon. friend can state to this House and the country that those were his honest convictions in 1859, and that he did not give effect to those convictions until 1878. Why did you not introduce Protection before, if these were your views?

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Because the United States by their action relieved us from the necessity of doing so; because we had a market there whether or no.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH: The hon. gentleman kept his convictions in abeyance for twenty years. Surely the hon. gentleman must have been recreant to his duty to his country if he felt that the principle of Protection should form the basis of the fiscal policy of the country, to allow those convictions to remain in abeyance for so long a time. The hon. gentleman has changed his policy. We are told by the hon. member for Cumberland (Sir Charles Tupper) that Sir Alexander Galt is one of the greatest financiers that ever lived, that he is a heaven-born financier, and he further says that the hon. the Minister of Finance was perfectly justified in consulting Sir Alexander Galt with regard to the fiscal policy of the country.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: I cannot permit the hon. gentleman to put a statement in my mouth that has no foundation in fact. I made no such statement as that which the hon. gentleman is now attributing to me.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH: Did not the hon. gentleman say that the hon. the Finance Minister acted wisely in consulting Sir Alexander Galt?

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: In answer to the taunt that the hon. the Minister of Finance had consulted Sir Alexander Galt, I said that it would have been well for the country if the late Finance Minister had done so. I did not say that the present hon. Finance Minister had done so. I give the hon. gentleman's statement a flat denial. I say that what he has just stated on this point is entirely unfounded in fact. There is a record of what takes place here. I will refer to the Reporters' notes and I say he will search in vain to find a single note to substantiate his statement.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH: Does the hon. gentleman say that the hon. the Minister of Finance did not consult Sir Alexander T. Galt? It is not of much consequence what he said. It does not reflect upon the hon. the Finance Minister; it is no reflection upon him at all; the hon. the Minister of Railways says "the late Finance Minister is a king of deficits, and no man is fit to be Finance Minister who does not avoid deficits." I think he reflects on the hon. the First Minister when he says this.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: I did not say so.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH: You did say so.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: I did not.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH: You said he was king of deficits, and that—

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: I did not make the assertion that no man was fit to be a Finance Minister who accumulated deficits. What I did was merely to quote the statement, to that effect, made by the late Finance Minister himself.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH: Did not every member of this House understand the hon. gentleman to say "that any Finance Minister who could not balance the receipts and expenditures was unfit for his position."

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: I quoted the late Finance Minister's assertion to that effect.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH: Very well, let us go on. Now, we find that for each of the six years from 1858, there was a large deficit; and I do not think the hon. the First Minister, who was at the head of the Government at that time, should be reflected upon by his colleague. I do not think he should be rebuked by the hon. member for Cumberland for these deficits. Deficits may occur in spite of the best financing efforts. The tide of depression had set in; the volume of trade could not be increased. Two and a-half per cent. was added to the taxation of the country, and that gave a higher revenue. Sir Alexander Galt, who was the Finance Minister at that time, declared himself entirely opposed to a fiscal policy such as we have now. Last year we had a deficit; the hon. the Finance Minister was not at fault. Not at all. This year he acknowledges a deficit of $500,000; but I believe the result will show a deficit of upwards of $2,000,000. Surely, then, the hon. the Minister of Railways will not allow the present Finance Minister to remain where he is. He had everything in his favour; he put on the duties just as he wanted, and, therefore, there is no excuse for his having a deficit. But he will have a deficit, increasing year after year; because, if he puts duties on manufactures he cannot have them imported, and, therefore, he must lose the revenue. Now, the people are weighed down with $7,000,000 of additional taxes. I think, however, the hon. the Finance Minister will never receive such money as he expects; the people will have to pay it, but it will not come into the Treasury. We are informed that prosperity reigns everwhere; he informed us that St. John was prosperous. Why, there never was such depression there as exists now. What did the hon. gentleman say last December? It cannot be much changed now. He was received with great éclat, surrounded by a great many friends; he went to Fredericton, and had a good time there; he made a great many visits; but he did not visit Mr. Gibson who employs about 3,000 hands, and is one of the largest manufacturers in our country. Did he visit any of the timber mills? Are not they entitled to Protection and consideration? I should think so. The hon. member behind him will think so, having regard to the various articles affected that are current in that business.

AN HON. GENTLEMAN: Give any of the articles that are raised.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH: I could not stop to enumerate them; the average duty is 20 per cent.; whereas, before, it was 12½ only.

AN HON. MEMBER: I have asked the hon. gentleman to give the articles used by lumbermen that have been increased.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH: Cottons, woollens, pork, iron, and everything in fact. I say that the lumbering interest is an important interest, and the labouring population engaged in lumbering should not be ignored. Why did he not take counsel with the lumbering community, and the farmer of the country? Why should we look to any particular interest? Did he go to the rolling mills, at St. John, when he visited that place? The hon. member for King's knew where it was. There is one fact I would like to refer to, that is, that according to the speeches of hon. members opposite, and particularly the speech of the hon. the Minister of Finance, we are to come to the conclusion that we had no manufactures in this country before; that they have all sprung up through the agency of the National Policy. Now, I would ask whether, five years ago, we had not more men engaged in manufacturing than we have now? Why, according to his own statement, they were rolling up surpluses in those times; depression and scarcity of labour was unknown; the country was happy and prosperous under their rule. Now, Sir, what kind of a fiscal policy had they then? Just the same as we had during our five years' Administration, except that we increased the duties by 2½ per cent. How then does the hon. gentleman show that we cannot find prosperity except by the adoption of this new fiscal policy of theirs? They say they prospered before, under the old Tariff of 15 per cent., which we raised to 17½ per cent. I could read, Sir, a speech made, in 1874, by the hon. member for Cumberland, in which he said the farmers of this country were as prosperous as any in the world, and that under a Revenue Tariff. He seemed on the question of the tea interest to think this policy had been doing a great deal for the shipping interest. I say it is doing nothing. It is impossible to foster the direct importation from China and Japan; and the policy operates injuriously. The small tradesmen of the country ought to have a chance as well as the large traders in Montreal and Toronto. The people of New Brunswick have little trade with Ontario. Why not allow them then to buy in Boston or New York? Now, Sir, the sugar business, what about that? The hon. the Minister of Finance said a good deal of sugar is imported by the River St. Lawrence. How many vessel loads come up to Montreal? If he has got information I would be very much pleased to receive it, because I think there is a very small quantity. But suppose it does, what benefit is that to our ship-owners—we have no monopoly. Foreign vessels can enter into the trade as well as our own. The effect of the legislation on the sugar duties is to transfer the trade from one Canadian city to another. We have a return showing the importation of sugar into Canada during the last six months from which I find that the amount received in Ontario, in the last six months of 1879, was 32,617,000lb., and for the corresponding six months of 1880, ending January, 9,685,000lb. Sugar is not imported into Ontario to the same extent. Then coming to Quebec, we see the result of the duties there; the importation for the last six months of 1879 were 19,000,000lb., and for the six months of this year, ending January, 46,000,000lb. In Nova Scotia, it has increased from 5,000,000lb. last year to 14,000,000lb. this year; and in New Brunswick there was a decrease from 3,000,000lb. last year to 2,200,000lb. this year. So the effect has been to change the current of the trade from one Province to the other, and that is all. With regard to our shipping interest, which I think I know something about, I believe it does not derive any benefit from the National Policy on the article of sugar. Whether sugar is refined in this Dominion or the United States is of little consequence I believe it was much better

under the previous system so far as the shipping interest of the country is concerned with the United States. Our vessels take sugar from Cuba and the West Indies to the United States; most of them are engaged in that trade. We build vessels thus to do the carrying trade of our own and that country. A large portion of the trade of the United States is done in British bottoms. We are told that as regards St. John, N. B., the effect of the change in the sugar duty has been to increase its shipping business. I suppose the hon. the Finance Minister thought he was supported by authority in that statement, but he was entirely in error. I have learned that in the months of January, February, and March, not one single vessel cleared from St. John to the West Indies, although the hon. gentleman states that that port has never done so much business before. My hon. friend informs me that only one vessel cleared from the West Indies to St. John, while during that time six English vessels engaged in the trade with the West Indies cleared from West Indies to New York. This shows conclusively the change is of no benefit to our shipping. There may be half-a-dozen small vessels in Halifax which take away cargoes of fish and shooks to the West Indies and bring back sugar, but the greatest portion of sugar comes now to Halifax. Merchants then telegraph to Montreal to see if they can send it there, and if no orders are received they despatch it to New York. A great deal of sugar goes from Halifax to New York, much more than to Montreal. It has been stated by the hon. the Finance Minister that the people did not pay any more for their sugar than before, that, in fact, it is cheaper at present. He said that the kind of sugar that can be used by the common people, and the grades above that, were even cheaper than ever. If that be true, why did the refiners want this present Tariff, and why unless it were beneficial to them. It is stated the Red-paths make from $600,000 to $1,000,000 a year by it. Has any hon. gentleman been authorised to deny that statement. None so far as I know. The hon. gentleman has referred to the elections in the Dominion since the present Government took office, and claims as a compliment to it a few isolated cases. He seems to ignore entirely the elections in Ontario, and to think that they had no significance whatever. The greater Province, Ontario, has reversed this National Policy. Did not the hon. the Finance Minister go to the Ontario constituencies before the last Provincial Elections and tell the people that if they supported the Mowat Government that there would be a practical reversal of the fiscal policy of the Dominion Government. He told them so in so many words, as did also the hon. the Minister of Railways and Canals. The hon. the First Minister also visited that Province and endeavoured to enforce his policy upon the people, saying that the fiscal policy of the Dominion Government was imperilled if they sustained Mr. Mowat. That was the key-note this Government sounded. I could refer to many other matters in reference to the hon. the Finance Minister so far as New Brunswick is concerned, and the course he has taken since he entered Parliament. He must know that it would be impossible for him to be re-elected for St. John; the people of New Brunswick are adverse to his policy. I will undertake to prophesy that he will never run an election in St. John again. The power will pass from the hands of these Ministers as surely as the sun sets in the west, at the first chance the people have. Ministers think the people are with them, as do some of their followers on the back benches, but I would like to see the question tried, and, as the Finance Minister and other speakers on the other side have said that our manufactures have not increased as rapidly as they would have done, inasmuch as uncertainty exists in the public mind as to whether the present policy would be permanent, and there may be something in that view, would it not be in the interest of the country to try the question before the people; then, if sustained, the present policy would be considered permanent. It seems proper and wise that we should have an election now, but I think the hon. the first Minister has no desire for it. He knows better. He knows that he would be beaten. The hon. the Finance Minister seems to think that my re-election in my county would not be certain. I would like to try the question, practically with him. He says the sugar refinery, established in Moncton, is going to destroy my popularity.

AN HON. MEMBER: It will employ twenty-three men.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH: Yes. That small benefit would upset and overturn me in my county, he thinks; but I would not be afraid to try the issue with him or anybody else. I repeat that this is inimical to the best interests of the country and, that the people, particularly of New Brunswick, are against it. There is no emigration from our country every day. I do not mean to say that it is altogether due to the National Policy, for I know that would not be fair; but we will say that if the people would accept this policy they would be able to remain in this country—that anybody and everybody would be employed—that there would be ample work for all. To show the depression it has caused in St. John, I may refer to the reception given to the hon. the Finance Minister in December last, and I do not think any change has taken place since. I think he was a little unfair in his introductory speech, in claiming that the temperance ovation given to him, was of a political character, and in his utilising that compliment for the purpose of showing that the people of St. John approved of his policy. I believe the ovation was given in his honour as a temperance man, and that the gentleman that presided was not a supporter, but an opponent of the National Policy. I think I can show the hon. gentleman his mistake in saying that prosperity exists in St. John in full measure. There was at this dinner a friend of the hon. gentleman who is now, I am glad to say, a Senator (Hon. Mr. Boyd), who made a speech on that occasion, in which he said:

“He knew that Sir Leonard sympathised with the misfortunes of St. John, the city which had been his home, and where his property was. When he came to it this last time; he spoke to him of the dullness of business here, and the necessity of giving us all the help he could; when he replied—almost with tears in his eyes—that he was prepared to do what he could reasonably for the city, and the Government was willing to carry out what could be done for our benefit. (Cheers.) He referred to the stories which had been spread of his having quarrelled with Sir Leonard but affirmed that none of them were true. It was nearly thirty years since he first had the honour of Mr. Tilley's acquaintance, and he had never had an unpleasant word with him. A truer friend or a better man he had never met, and he hoped his right arm would wither, and his tongue be palsied before he uttered the first word against him. He, like all other good citizens, was greatly concerned for the prosperity of St. John. He trusted that, whatever our political differences might have been in the past, we would forget them until our city is built up, and be neither Liberals nor Tories, but St. John men. If we do this, we may yet see great results; we shall see a line of steamers to Europe, and to the West Indies; docks, wet and dry; warehouses, and many other things. They would find that, if Sir Leonard made promises, he would keep them. They might say of him, as was said of a Mexican dollar, the more you rub him the brighter he gets. (Cheers.)”

Does the hon. the Finance Minister recollect that he exhibited so much emotion that the tears started from his eyes at a description of the great distress prevailing in St. John. Mr. Boyd uttering these sentiments should at least become a Senator, and he has since become a Senator, and I have no doubt whatever that he will make a good one. He said: “There is great distress in St. John, in which the hon. the Finance Minister deeply sympathised.” Mr. Boyd then promised that the people of that city should have docks, wet and dry, and a line of steamers to Europe and the West Indies. I see as yet no provision made for any of these enterprises. Therefore, I presume that Mr. Boyd was mistaken. I feel that I have sufficiently shown that the hon. the Finance Minister is a false prophet—that he is as unreliable in his principles and prophecies now that he is a Tory as he was when he was a Liberal.

MR. TASSÉ: Mr. Speaker, having submitted at some length my views on the merits of the National Policy, when it was considered and carried by Parliament, at its last Session, in obedience to the wishes of an overwhelming majority of the people, I do not intend to go over the same ground on the present occasion, especially after the very eloquent and exhaustive addresses in favour of that policy, in which I am now an humble but as firm a believer as ever I was in former days. I do not pretend to be able to throw much additional light on this important matter, which has been already treated by some of the ablest members on both sides of the House; I wish, however, to devote my attention to some particular points which have been slightly discussed, and take exception to a few statements made by hon. members of the Opposition. As many references have been made, since the beginning of this Session, to the city which I have the honour to represent—specially by some hon. members of the Opposition, who have manifested a deep but fresh interest in the welfare of my constituents, for which, no doubt, they will feel grateful, I will, at the outset, as in duty bound, take up that point which is the most entitled to my immediate consideration. Sir, in his extreme desire to undervalue the beneficial effects of Protection on the country, the hon. leader of the Left stated, in his speech on the Address, that it was admitted even by Government papers that there was an unusual amount of distress in the city of Ottawa. In the first place, I do not know of a single Conservative paper which has admitted that there was an unusual amount of distress in this city; and, in the second place, I deny that the statement of the hon. gentleman is well founded. Furthermore, I contend that the distress which may now exist to a certain extent is far from being as wide spread as that which prevailed during the last two or three years of the previous Administration. The maintenance of a soup kitchen in our midst has been advanced as an argument against the National Policy, but hon. gentlemen opposite should not forget that that noble institution—the soup kitchen—is but a legacy of their own Government, that it was implanted in Ottawa during the late Government, that it flourished not only here, but in various cities of the Dominion in the same ratio that our most useful and important industries were then decaying and falling down one after the other. But, Sir, my hon. friends need not feel uneasy on this point, for another winter will most probably prove that owing to the revival of trade, the usefulness of the soup kitchen has gone. It is true that an assemblage of unemployed workingmen—which has been so often referred to on the other side of the House—took place a few weeks ago, but it could not be denied that it was far from being as large as the one which paid a visit to my hon. friend in the winter of 1877, and which, I dare say, he has not yet forgotten. I could not give a better or more authoritative illustration of the distress that prevailed in Ottawa during the Administration of the hon. gentleman than by quoting a short extract from a speech delivered by the Liberal candidate, Mr. C. W. Bangs, one of my opponents during the last elections:—

“Last winter he (the Mayor) had gone to Mr. Mackenzie and laid before him the condition of the poor people of the city. Mr. Mackenzie replied that he would do all he could to assist the city, and had it not been for this he did not know what they would have done. Every morning, when he came down to the City Hall, he found from twenty to one hundred men seeking assistance—men who were willing to work, but who had families starving at home. Some of the men were not able to earn 25c. per day, but still he sent them up to Mr. Henderson, the superintendent of works. Mr. Henderson would come down and say: ‘Don’t send another crowd that can’t do anything.’ He replied: ‘These men are starving and may as well be supported by the Government as by the city.’”

Such was the glowing, the brilliant condition of things in Ottawa during the Mackenzie Government. Well, Sir, after such a statement uttered by a Liberal candidate—and which gives but a very imperfect idea, a very imperfect picture of the misery then desolating the capital, the House will easily perceive how little foundation there is in the assertion of the hon. the leader of the Opposition that there is an unusual amount of distress in the city of Ottawa. I will come now to another point which concerns to a very great extent my constituents, which concerns also to a great extent the inhabitants of the Ottawa Valley, nay, of the whole country. One of the main objections raised against the National Policy when it was at first propounded in this House; one of the main objections raised against the National Policy in the press and on the hustings, in the last political campaign; and one of the main objections raised against that policy in the last Session was, that a Protective Tariff would destroy, would ruin our lumber trade. That industry being one of the largest, if not the largest industry of the Dominion; that industry being the foremost industry of the Ottawa Valley, that industry employing every year 50,000 people, and involving as it does many millions of capital, such an objection, if sound, would have been calculated to impress unfavourably the public mind against the National Policy; but the people, thanks to their good sense, and not owing to their ignorance, as it was contended by the hon. member for Centre Huron, did not believe that such an objection was well grounded; they had no confidence in the men by whom it was urged; they thought that the lumber trade could not be more prostrated, as every other industry, than it was during the Reform Administration, and they gave their warm adhesion to the National Policy, almost every constituency of the Ottawa region returning Conservative members, by large majorities—the vast county of Ottawa alone giving a well-deserved majority of 1624 votes to its worthy member. In this connection, it will not be without interest to read the following declaration, made last Session by the hon. member for Centre Huron—who is supposed to be the financial light of the Opposition—in his second speech on the Tariff:—

“We are to have all the trade and business of the country revolutionised; we are to have, to take but one illustration alone, the lumber interest of this country, employing from 45,000 to 50,000 men, with their families depending on them; we are to have this interest put in the greatest peril, because it is impossible to conceal from the House that the imposition of a further burden of 30c., or 40c., or 50c. per thousand on the manufacture of lumber will go very far to give that great industry its death blow for the time being. They can understand, from that illustration alone, how exceedingly trifling all the benefits which are proposed to be secured under this Tariff are, compared with the enormous mischief which will result from its operation. Which is true of the fishing interest and of the transportation interests, and as the agriculturists will find true of their own interests also.”

In fact, every interest in the land, including the lumber interest, was going to suffer most severely—was to receive its death blow. Well, Sir, what has been the result of the mournful prediction of that hon. gentleman, who seems determined to emulate that famous Trojan prophetic, Cassandra, who had nothing but the most gloomy things to predict for her country? Let me hasten to say that it is yet as unfulfilled as many other lugubrious predictions emanating from the same source. This fact is not surprising, for that hon. gentleman has not been a success so far in the prophetic vocation—indeed he has reaped more laurels as a maker of deficits, as a mixer and muddler of figures, to employ the language of the Globe. No one has forgotten that the hon. member for Centre Huron puzzled, once, every member of this House when he stated, in one part of his speech, that Protection would enrich a few manufacturers at the expense of the working class, whilst, in another part of the same speech, he asserted that Protection would produce such a home competition that it would ruin the manufacturers themselves. To come back to the lumber trade, I am happy to say that, far from being ruined, far from being annihilated, far from receiving its “death blow for the time being”—to use the very word of that hon. gentleman, the lumber trade has received, within the last year, an immense impulse—an impetus unparalleled for many years. Far from receiving their death blow, lumbermen have considerably enlarged their operations, have increased the number of their woodmen, have employed them at higher wages, and have vastly increased their consumption of agricultural products, for which they offer an immediate and most advantageous market. Far from receiving its death blow, the demand for lumber has been such that for the first time it had to be shipped on rails from Ottawa, and that not only are the immense piles accumulated for years around the Chaudiere already sold, but that an enormous quantity of lumber, which still lies in the forest, has been contracted for at the highest prices ever offered in Canada. Far from receiving its death blow, the transportation traffic connected with the lumber trade will be greatly revived, and we shall see, as soon as navigation opens, a large fleet of steamers and boats carrying the products of that industry to a foreign destination, whilst many of our railways will be fully occupied, as they are now, for the same purpose, at profitable rates. Far from receiving its death blow, there will be an unusual activity in a few weeks around our magnificent falls; the “hum” will resound once more agreeably to our ears, and my hon. friends opposite shall hear it, if our legislative duties are not concluded at the beginning of May; mills which had been silent for years will be reopened, and others which had worked during the day only will be then in full blast day and night—a state of things which we had not the gratification to witness during the five long years of the late Administration. In fact the only death-blow that will be inflicted anywhere, will not be inflicted on the lumber trade, but on the unpatriotic operations of the party which to-day dare to rise their powerless voice against the almost unanimous wish of the nation. In reviewing some speeches delivered last year by hon. gentlemen opposite, I noticed that the hon. member for South Brant laid then great stress on the fact that bank stocks had greatly fallen from the 17th September, 1878—a date inscribed in black letters in the Reform day-book—up to last Session. Of course the National Policy was made responsible for that falling off, although it then existed but on paper, in the resolutions submitted to the House by the Government. It is obvious that a comparison made at such a time, when the previous Tariff was in existence, was most unfair, and that it was necessary to wait a few months at least to ascertain its probable effect on the monetary institutions of the country. This Session, it seems, would have been a more fitting opportunity—although a longer experience is undoubtedly required to judge such effects with some accuracy—to institute a comparison between the actual quotations of stock banks, and the quotations existing at the very time when the National Policy became the law of the land. Our opponents having failed to compare those figures on that basis—the only fair basis that could be adopted to ascertain the influence of the National Policy in that respect, I will supply the comparison which will establish the healthier condition of the banks, and the greater confidence enjoyed on them by the public since the present Tariff has been in operation. I will give the quotations of the previous week compared to those of the corresponding week for 1879—such as they appear in a late issue of the Shareholder:

I may add that not only have most of the bank securities advanced notably, but also that many of the stocks of other public institutions or companies have risen in the same proportion: a result which fully indicates that the tide of prosperity has fully set in. In fact, every stock is going up, is advancing, except the political stock of the hon. gentlemen opposite, which seems to be more depressed than ever. In this connection I may observe that the hon. member for West Durham almost said the other night that the success of the Liberals in England was an indication of the triumph of his party in a near future. But I will take the liberty to advise the hon. gentleman not to be over-exultant on that account, for by a strange coincidence Liberals have only succeeded in securing power since Confederation—and this event has not been too often repeated for our common sake—when a Conservative Government was presiding over the destinies of Great Britain. We have learned from the speeches of the Opposition that there was a great reaction in the country against the National Policy, that the people generally were already disgusted with it, and that the “passing craze”—to use the language of the Globe—“which led the Provinces to vote directly against their interest, is already over.” And when we have called for a substantial evidence of that so-called reaction, we have received the uniform reply: “How can you entertain any doubt about it, when the last local elections of Ontario—a Province which gave at first such a warm support to the National Policy—have been so favourable to the Liberal party.” To make good such an argument, our opponents should prove that the National Policy, and not provincial matters, was truly the main point at issue. But they have failed, utterly failed to establish that fact. Some of our Conservative leaders, some of the Conservative papers offered them, I am aware, to fight the electoral battle on that score, but they refused to take up the gauntlet thus thrown to them. The speeches of the Ontario First Minister, the Hon. Mr. Mowat, and the articles of the Globe, the Hamilton Times, and other leading Liberal papers which were quoted the other day by the hon. member for Hamilton, fully demonstrate that they refused to engage in the contest on that ground; and they were for once wise men in their generation, for they knew perfectly well that the verdict rendered a few months previous would remain unchanged; that an intelligent people like the people of Ontario would not stultify themselves by condemning, after a short interval, a policy which was then but in embryo, which has just been voted by Parliament, which had not even a month's trial, and which they had approved by an overwhelming majority, after the most mature deliberation ever given to any public question at the polls. If the National Policy has influenced, to a small extent, the last elections of Ontario, there is one question which, I am sorry to state, had much to do with them on the Liberal side, a question which the leaders of that party would not dare to introduce in this House. I had been led to believe, Mr. Speaker, by the public utterances of the hon. leader of the Opposition, that the days had passed when my fellow-countrymen would be traduced, and sneered at by his party. In fact, not very long ago, I had the pleasure to read some very graceful compliments paid to my race by that hon. gentleman, in a speech delivered in Scotland the land of his birth, where he received such a gratifying welcome—and I was under the impression that his party would cease to stir up the national prejudices of one portion of the people against the other; that the bugbear of French domination, for instance, of which we heard so much in the past, which had been worked up so unfairly, and so unscrupulously, to the prejudice of our Conservative allies in Ontario, was used up, and would never be invoked again, even for electoral purposes. But, Sir, that was but a delusion, which recent events have entirely dispelled. In the absence of better argument, in their desperation, in their thirst for power, the Liberal party resuscitated that very bugbear of French domination, to speculate on the worst prejudices of the people; and, I regret to say, it met with an ill-deserved success in some quarters. To remove any doubt on this point, I will quote a few extracts from different issues of the Globe, which will simply suffice to illustrate the unfair measures resorted to by the Liberal party, to delude the electoral body of Ontario. The Globe said, on the 24th May, 1879:

“When Ontario joined the Confederation, her supposition was, by doing so, she had escaped from Lower Canadian domination. The present subservience of the Government to Quebec Conservatives throws a doubt on this and on our future position, and brings up the whole subject again.”

In another article, on the same day:

“The Tories follow the lead of their precious chieftain and would put Ontario, which Province they know they cannot either cheat or control, back again under the rule of the Frenchmen, whom Sir John can humbug and swindle if he cannot control.”

On the 26th May:

“The people will show by their votes, on the 5th of June, that this Province is not to be tamely cheated of its due, either because Sir John A. Macdonald is again under the thumb of his Quebec followers, or because he longs for fat things to present to the hungry office-seekers who have yet to be rewarded from the plunder acquired by the late elections.”

In another article, published on the following day, and written in that same liberal-minded spirit, the French supporters of the Government are styled, in that felicitous, in that delicate language peculiar to the Globe, “the French tail of Sir John A. Macdonald.” Well, Sir, if we are but a tail, we have at least the consolation of being the tail of an illustrious statesman, who but recently enjoyed the unprecedented honour, for a colonist, to be admitted into the Privy Council of Her Majesty the Queen. We have at least the consolation of knowing that our tail is longer than the whole—I will not say tail,—but the whole following of Mr. George Brown in this House, which has been rather shortened by the last elections. And we have this further consolation of knowing that the so-called French tail of this Government would never have submitted themselves to the humiliating treatment which our predecessors had to experience under the iron rule of the hon. member for Lambton. Sir, that spirit of antipathy to our race is so manifest in the Globe—that great power behind the Throne—that this Government can hardly decide upon a single French appointment without it should be criticised and objected to on that single ground—without it should exclaim: “Another Frenchman appointed!” I believe that even the number of charwomen, who happen to be of French origin, is instanced as a strong evidence of that terrible, that threatening French domination. Of course, those attacks of the Globe appear during the recess, when they are supposed not to attract the attention of the members of this House, but as I presume that the hon. member for Quebec East—the gallant leader of the gallant little French band opposite—is a constant reader of the Globe, it would be interesting to hear what he thinks of the course thus followed by the leading organ of his party. This crusade against French appointments is as unjust as unwarranted, when it is well-known that this Government is only treating us with that spirit of fairness which they strive to display towards every class, every creed, every nationality in this country; when it is well-known to those, at any rate, who are aware of the facts, that the French people, far from receiving the lion’s share, as it is sometimes falsely contended, do not even obtain in the whole distribution of patronage the share to which they are strictly entitled by their numbers; when it is well-known that in the French speaking Province of Quebec, our people, with that spirit of generosity so characteristic of them, and which should be imitated in other Provinces—give to their fellow-citizens of other origins a larger share of patronage than the latter could justly claim. Sir, it is sometimes a matter of wonder to many Liberals that their party is not more popular, is not better appreciated by the French speaking element of this country, that they are losing election after election in the Province of Quebec—whenever the people have an opportunity to record their votes against them; but in the face of such insults, in face of the hostile attitude of the Globe—it only surprises me that

French Canadians in this House—few as they are—or outside of this House, should be found so forgetful of their sense of dignity, so forgetful of their duty towards their race, that they could devote their talent, their energy, to the advancement of a party which strives to inflame, to our injury, the worst prejudices of the people, which strives to array Province against Province—Ontario against Quebec—one class of the community against the other—Englishmen against Frenchmen—and which strives to disunite instead of binding by the strongest possible ties, as it should be the strong aim, the strong desire of every true lover of our country, the heterogeneous, but most valuable element which constitute our Canadian population. As I stated, Mr. Speaker, the Liberal members of the House have exhibited a peculiar delight—and it may be a legitimate one—for they have very few causes of comfort at the present juncture—in extolling the last elections of Ontario as a proof of a wonderful reaction against the National Policy. This proof, however, cannot be held as very conclusive when we know that, in all the partial federal elections held since 1878, and they have been many—they have not been able to redeem a single constituency—nay, they have lost three seats: East Hastings, Argenteuil and Charlevoix. In endeavouring to make that point, they only forget that they give another striking evidence of their inconsistency. Have they forgotten, have the hon. members of the House forgotten, that when the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries mentioned last year, during the debate on the Tariff, the result of the local election of Prince Edward Island as a further indication of the popularity of the National Policy—which had been greatly discussed during the campaign—the hon. member for Lambton rose indignantly from his seat and rebuked, in the severest terms, that hon. gentleman for having introduced provincial matters, which, in his opinion, were entirely irrelevant to the debate. As my hon. friends opposite seem to have lost sight of that incident, I will read from the Hansard what occurred on that interesting occasion.

“ Mr. Pope, (Queen’s, P.E.I.), said he did not wish to make a speech, but he had a little intelligence to announce to the leader of the Opposition and his friends, who had endeavoured to convince the House and the country that the people of the Maritime Provinces would be injured, and the Province of Prince Edward Island destroyed, by the Tariff. The local elections had just been held, the National Policy being of course the greatest question discussed. It was said the country was to be ruined on account of the heavy taxes imposed by the Conservative Government, at Ottawa; however, he was happy to say that the Local Conservative Government, who supported the National Policy, was returned by twenty-five against five.

"Mr. Mackenzie said it was the first time he ever heard a Cabinet Minister make such an announcement. If the hon. gentleman had no more sense of the dignity of his own position he might, at least, have some respect for the Cabinet of which he was a member."

It can easily be surmised that such an announcement was far from being agreeable, far from being cheering to the hon. member for Lambton, and that on the spur of the moment he uttered harsh words, which he probably regrets now. Nevertheless, if it be true that the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries—to use the very same language of that hon. gentleman—exhibited by this announcement, an utter lack of respect for the dignity of his position, what shall we say of the hon. leader of the Opposition, what shall we say of his hon. followers, who have been sinning in the same manner, and on a much enlarged scale, since the commencement of the debate, in connection with the local elections of Ontario, contradicting themselves in a manner that should amaze every member of this House. We have heard it stated by some hon. gentlemen opposite that even the manufacturers were dissatisfied with the National Policy—that very policy which, according to them, had been concocted in their sole interest, to the detriment of the mass of the people—as if the interest of the manufacturers could be diametrically opposed to the interest of the nation of which they form a most important element. The hon. member for West Elgin has specially devoted himself to that task, employing for that purpose a process of fabrication which, I regret to say, is not altogether unfamiliar to the opponents of the present Tariff. But, Sir, if ever a statement made by a member of this House has been demolished by an avalanche of the most crushing evidence that could be brought against it, it was the statement which the hon. member for West Elgin made, it is reported, under the responsibility of a certain Reform club. The visits which the hon. the Minister of Finance has taken the trouble to pay to many of the most important manufactories of Canada, and for which he deserves the warmest praises of the country, has fully established to every unprejudiced mind that the condition of the manufacturers has been greatly improved to their own benefit and to the benefit of the working classes. And the public returns which have been submitted to the House fully demonstrate also that the productive powers of the Dominion have been vastly developed—a fact fully corroborated by a considerable reduction of our imports of foreign fabrics—a reduction which has operated specially to the prejudice of the American producer, who, but for that wise policy, would have secured an almost absolute control of the Canadian market. Sir, a meeting of the manufacturers of Ontario took place not very long ago at Toronto, and not a dissentient voice was heard against the National Policy. Far from it, every one present—and amongst them were life-long Reformers—manifested his warm approval of the present Tariff. In a long speech on the effects of the National Policy, the President, Mr. E. Guerne, jun., uttered the following words, which I will read from a report published in the Globe:

"The Tilley tariff is the boldest piece of commercial legislation that was ever instituted in Canada. He had confidence to predict for all classes of industry a course of prosperity equal to the hopes of the most sanguine supporters of that measure. Already a most decided improvement had taken place, and the results of the next twelve months will be of such a pronounced benefit as to make it extremely hazardous for a leader to bring forward a measure proposing its repeal."

Let me now draw the attention of the House to the very important declaration made by Mr. W. H. Howland—a gentleman well-known as a Liberal and as a man thoroughly versed in commercial affairs. I am again quoting from the report of the Globe:

"Mr. Howland said that in the face of the great change in the financial affairs of the country since the last meeting of the association, he desired to move a resolution. In looking back over the past they could all see how black a time they had passed through, and how many were upon the verge of ruin. He did not think that they realised at the time the blackness of the commercial interests of the country. If times had continued in the condition they were in at one time, all the industries of the country would have been closed. (Hear, hear.) He thought they had every reason to be thankful for the great change that came about. The National Policy had been tried. The country sympathised with the policy, which had been, to a great extent, the cause of the return to prosperity. The advance had been gradual, and he felt confident to say that within twelve months the advance would be such that they would be on a sounder basis than before. He could say with confidence that all the people wanted was reasonable Protection, and that they never intended to make unreasonable demands. Hereafter if the demands were moderate, and expansion was not attempted too rapidly, on on too great a scale, he thought those present would see, before many years had passed, the Dominion of Canada one of the leading productive countries of the world. (Hear hear.) He was a Liberal, and, as an old Liberal, he was looking forward hopefully to the time when the leaders of his old party would become convinced that the present National Policy was beneficial to the Dominion, and would change their views, whereby it would enable their old friends to join again under the old banner. It was his firm belief in the good that had resulted from Protection that inspired him to move the following Resolution: 'Resolved, that this association desires to express its general approval of the Tariff legislation of the last Session of the Dominion Parliament, which, it is evident, has in a large measure helped to bring about the marked commercial improvement and financial confidence now existing in this country.'—The Resolution was carried unanimously."

Hon. gentlemen opposite may now proclaim, if they dare to do it, that even the manufacturers are dissatisfied with the National Policy. In the speech which I have just quoted, Mr. Howland expresses a strong confidence that the National Policy will work so well that all parties will ultimately give their assent to its principle, and that old Liberals like him will thus have an opportunity to join their old friends under the same banner—an act which, at best, I may observe, would not be very grateful towards the promoters of that policy. Well, Sir, such also is my confidence in the National Policy that I do expect to see a similar result; that I do expect to see the day when Liberals as well as Conservatives—when the whole country will be so much satisfied with the effects of the National Policy—that that question, having been solved for many years to come on the basis which we now advocate, will cease to be the main dividing line between our two great parties, to be replaced, perhaps, by such nice political problems as the representation of minorities—I quite understand that some of the hon. gentlemen opposite should be anxious to increase the minority at the present moment,—such as the compulsory vote in order that the Liberals should give to the country a fair idea of their views on the freedom of the subject—and other political problems—not including the photographing of criminals, which was recently unveiled to our admiration;—problems delineated for our future consideration in that celebrated oration at Aurora, which the hon. member for West Durham called himself a "disturbing speech," perhaps an imprudent speech"—a speech, at any rate, full of discussions, which, according to the Globe, "must be classed rather with the recreations of leisure hours than with the graver efforts and more earnest work of high and practical statesmanship." Supposing that such a change should occur in the mind of the leader of the Opposition in connection with the present Tariff, it would be an easy one, and would be less amazing than his contemplated change on the Pacific Railway enterprise—for the day is not very far distant when that hon. gentleman, notwithstanding his Free-trade proclivities, opposed a reduction of a Tariff of 20 per cent. to 15—this was in 1866—and when he asserted in a later speech, at Hamilton, that the duties could not fail to be increased, on account of our increased obligations, and that they should be levied in such a manner as to favour the home industries—the very principle which we have successfully carried out in the adoption of the present policy. Lest I should be suspected of misrepresenting the hon. leader of the Opposition, I will quote a very few words which he uttered on both occasions. In 1866, the hon. member for Lambton opposed a reduction of a Tariff of 20 per centum—and this Tariff is not higher in many respects—on the following grounds, to which no Protectionist could take exception:

"He admitted that the policy of the Government had not been in harmony with the tendency of public men towards Free-trade. But large interests had grown up under our system of incidental Protection, which, he considered, should not be destroyed. In reply to a question, he said he was in favour of the Pro-protective system which had been the policy of the country for some years, and under which interests had been created which the House should respect."

Let us see now what he stated at Hamilton on the 16th of January, 1874, on the eve of the general elections:—

"Sir Francis Hincks stated last year, on his election tour and in the House of Commons, that he was in favour of incidental Protection. I said I was also in favour of it. It is a stupid phrase at best, but it means simply this, that as long as duties are levied upon articles imported, they should be levied upon the articles produced by our own people."

Such a result, I repeat, would not be a surprising one, for it has been witnessed in more than one country, Protection gaining ground steadily everywhere, whilst the theory of Free-trade—which has never been truly practised—has, to-day, perhaps, less advocates than it had in the days of Adam Smith and Richard Cobden. When Protection was established in the neighbouring Republic, under the auspices of the celebrated Henry Clay—a man whom history will class among the greatest statesmen of the age, and the greatest benefactors of his country—one of its foremost opponents was another political man, almost as highly considered, almost as celebrated, as his great rival, Daniel Webster. Well, Sir, the Tariff—the American system as it was called—worked with such advantageous results, it revived agriculture, commerce, and industry so rapidly, it developed the national resources to such an extent that, after a few years of experience, Daniel Webster became a convert to that same policy which had been the main lever of the prosperity of the Republic. Let me quote a short extract from a speech he delivered after an experience of nine years of a Protective Policy:—

"Candour obliges me to remind you that when the Act of 1824 was passed, neither he who addresses you nor those with whom he usually acted on such subjects, were ready or willing to take the step which that Act proposed—they doubted its expediency. It passed, however, by the great and overwhelming influence of the Central States. New York, Pennsylvania and Ohio. New England acquiesced in it. She conformed to it as the settled policy of the country, and gave to her capital and labour a corresponding direction. She has now become vitally interested in the preservation of the system. Her prosperity is identified, not perhaps with any particular degree of protection, but with the preservation of the principle; and she is not likely to consent to yield the principle, under any circumstances whatever. And who would dare to yield it? Who, standing here and looking round on this community and its interests, would be bold enough to touch the spring which moves so much industry and produces so much happiness? Who would shut up the mouth of these vast coal pits? Who stay the cargoes of manufactured goods now floating down a river, one of the noblest in the world, and stretching through territories almost boundless in extent and unequalled in fertility? Who would quench the fires of so many steam engines, or stay the operation of so much well-employed labour? Gentlemen, I cannot conceive how any sub-version of that policy which has hitherto been pursued can take place without great public embarrassment and great private distress. I have said that I am in favour of protecting American manual labor; and, after the best reflection I can give the subject, and from the lights which I can derive from the experience of ourselves and others, I have come to the conclusion that such Protection is just and proper, and that to leave American labour to sustain a competition with that of the over-peopled countries of Europe would lead to a state of things to which the people could never submit."

Let us hope, Mr. Speaker, that we shall find more than one Daniel Webster in the ranks of the Opposition, if our National Policy continues to revive the commerce and the industry of the country as it has done since its establishment. But even if the National Policy had not been so advantageous to Canada within the last months, I claim that it would be premature to judge of its usefulness, and that it would be detrimental to the best interests of the country to change it after such a short experience. There should be but one opinion, Sir, on the desirability of remodelling our Tariff as seldom as possible in order not to create uncertainty and uneasiness in our commercial and industrial operations, and I contend that my hon. friends opposite are doing an unwise, an unpatriotic work in clamouring at the present juncture for a complete change in our fiscal system. Nay, I will prove that the present course they are following in opposing the present Tariff has been condemned by no less an authority than the hon. member for West Durham, who stated in the last Provincial campaign of Ontario—in which he took a very prominent part—that the National Policy should have nothing to do with the local elections, and that it would not be wise to reverse our present fiscal system until a sufficient experience had proved that it was not suited to our best interests. That hon. gentleman made that two-fold declaration in a great speech, which he delivered at Toronto, on the 21st of May, 1879—and which has been reproduced by the Globe, from which I will quote:—

“ Well, Sir, I wish to say one word upon the National Policy, not upon its own merits, but just this that my own opinion is that the attempt to bring it into the contest is doubly disingenuous, because it is plain that the question is disposed of for a certain period—whether rightly or wrongly, for weal or woe—by the majority; although by no means a decided majority, as the returns seem to indicate, still a majority of the people of Canada, determined for a change in their fiscal management. That change has taken place, and I do not hesitate to say that until the lesson of our experience shall be added to the lessons derived from the experience of other countries, and to those arguments derived from reason and research, it will not be best to reverse the fiscal policy which has so long been laid down ”

A more stronger condemnation of the course followed by the Opposition, in so far as this Tariff is concerned could not be adduced, coming as it does not only from one of its prominent members, but from one who, in the estimation of many Reformers, is their coming leader. Mr. Speaker, if there is one thing more than another that has pleased me since the adoption of the National Policy—besides the most material proof that it is working well, that it is fulfilling our expectations—it is the fact that this Government seem disposed to give the example to the nation, that is to say, to encourage the homeproduction—to purchase everything that we can successfully produce, but which we used to import from foreign countries in former years. I think the thanks of this House and of the country are due, for one, to the late Minister of Militia, the hon. member for Terrebonne, for having taken the proper steps to expend in this country a large sum of money which we had to send every year beyond the sea. Henceforth the clothing required for our gallant militia will be manufactured here, and at reduced prices, if I am correctly informed; henceforth, we shall also manufacture our powder, our cartridges, and even the guns that we might be called upon to fire in defence of our country, if the sad day ever comes that it is necessary to furnish more deadly weapons than those which are employed in our party warfare. However important may be the manufacture of those articles, the annual expenditure caused thereby is trifling, compared to the large sums of money which we have disbursed for years, to the benefit of foreigners, in connection with the building of our railways; sums of money which should have been spent long ago in the country had a proper system of Protection been adopted to foster the home production—to foster the production of iron. Indeed, Sir, we possess an immense and inexhaustible supply of that most valuable mineral throughout the length and breadth of the Dominion, in every Province, except Prince Edward Island, but nowhere in a larger quantity and in a better quality, than at a very few miles from our legislative halls, in the magnificent county of Ottawa. Sir, there are few persons, I dare say, who are aware of the extent of our market for the consumption of iron; few persons are aware of the immense quantity of iron which has been brought into this country in various forms; few persons are aware of the enormous amount of money which Canada has exported to England and to the United States on that account since Confederation—although many are fully aware of the cost of buying steel rails in a foreign market. The magnitude of the importation of iron in Canada may be judged, when it is established that for twelve years the Dominion has imported iron alone to the value of more than $96,000,000, according to the following statement, drawn from official sources, and which I will submit to the House. In 1872 we imported iron to the amount of $12,291,908; in 1873, $20,202,753; in 1874, $18,878,411; in 1875, $15,783,960; in 1876, $11,600,897; in 1877, $9,330,982; in 1878, $8,298,517, making a value in the aggregate of $96,387,428, or, if we include the last year's, more than $100,000,000—a sum sufficient to construct the whole Pacific Railway. Well, Sir, is it not to be regretted that Parliament has waited so long to encourage the manufacture of an article which exists here in such abundance, and for the production of which we possess all the necessary facilities? We possess, for instance, in the immediate vicinity of our iron ores, all the coal, all the peat, and all the lumber required to work them profitably—for so far as the iron ores of the Ottawa county are concerned, there is a depth of more than 150 miles of forests to fall back on—an advantage which is not to be found almost anywhere, the lumber of nearly every country which is adjacent to iron mines being exhausted. In this connection, Sir, I may be allowed to express the wish to see the duty on pig iron increased from $2 a ton to $3—the American duty is $7—an increase which is demanded by those who are engaged in that valuable industry, and those who feel inclined to embark in it. This industry was fearfully neglected under the late Administration, like almost every other industry for their sole ambition appeared to buy in the cheapest market, as in the case of steel rails, for instance. But now that we have statesmen—instead of flies-on-the-wheel—at the helm of affairs, we may fairly expect to see that most important industry assume a development yet unknown in this country. We may fairly expect to see the day when the iron industry will do for Canada what [it] has done for Great Britain, and in later years for the United States, and become one of the mainstays of our industrial prosperity. In 1873, the neighbouring Republic imported iron to the value of $7,477,556, its export reaching the sum of $12,129,939; but four years later, in 1877, the iron industry had taken such a wonderful development that the import of that article was but $1,632,815, the export being not less than $16,659,675. Truly, Mr. Speaker, I have felt a very deep gratification when I read, lately, the following advertisement, signed by the hon. the Minister of Railways and Canals—one of the staunchest champions of the National Policy, and who seems so well determined to practise what he knows to preach so eloquently and so forcibly:—

Canadian Pacific Railway, at Fort William, or in the Province of Manitoba.

By order,

F. BRAUN, Secretary.

Dept. of Railways & Canals,)
Ottawa, 7th February, 1880. }

I do not hesitate to say, Sir, that the Government, that the hon. the Minister of Railways and Canals, deserve our warmest congratulations for having made such a patriotic move in the right direction. I trust it will produce the good results which are to be expected from this true and sensible application of the National Policy. Sir, the country is committed to a gigantic scheme, the building of 2,500 miles of the Canadian Pacific Railway; the country has already made, and is prepared to make, the greatest sacrifice to ensure the success of our national undertaking; the country will not accept the policy of repudiation, which will be offered to it, after having condemned a policy of negation; the country believes that this railway will consolidate our political union, and vastly assist to attract immigration and develop the boundless but still unemployed resources of the Dominion; but the country has every reason to expect that these great sacrifices will be incurred in such a way as to give our people—to those who shall bear the greatest share of the burden—the largest immediate returns possible. I have not the slightest hesitation to state that if we were going to continue to expend elsewhere a large portion of the enormous sums required for the construction and for the equipment of our trans-continental railway, I would, perhaps, hesitate before giving further assent to such an expenditure, which cannot but greatly increase the Public Debt of Canada. But let the Government persevere and, preserve energetically in their policy, and they will find this House and the country at their back, fully determined to assist them in their patriotic and statesmanlike course. In 1877, the Government of Victoria, one of the Australian colonies, advertised for tenders for the supply of 5,000 tons of iron water pipes, and, with the view of encouraging home enterprise, accepted the tender of a colonial factory at £17,000 more than they could have been imported for. Let us follow that policy which is the true National Policy; let us follow that policy on all occasions and in all its legitimate directions; let us follow that policy which has been endorsed, not only by the Conservative party, but by thousands and thousands of Reformers, who have ceased to believe in a Reform party that had nothing to reform—and let us not forget that the glorious motto inscribed on the banner which we carried triumphantly at the last elections was that of Canada for the Canadians.

MR. GILLMOR: Members on this side of the House propose to fight the question out upon this line: We are not influenced by expediency, but are influenced by nothing but principle. We are opposed to the whole principle of Protection. I do not propose, in the few remarks I may make to-night, to refer to the speeches of any hon. members who have preceded me, other than to say, with reference to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Tassé), who has now closed his remarks, that he has manifested considerable sharpness, and which reminded me of a circumstance occurring down in our country. A young man, ambitious in theology, went off to attend a theological training school, and when he came back he was called upon to officiate. An old man, who had listened to him, was asked what he thought of the progress the young man had made. "Well," he said, "my young friend, you can whet a case-knife, but you cannot make a razor out of it." Now, my young friend over there, who has endeavoured to demolish the hon. member for West Durham and the hon. leader of the Opposition, is very sharp when he has been whetted up, but the material with which to make a razor is not in him. I did not intend, Mr. Speaker, to speak on this question, as I do not see that any very great good can come out of this discussion. The few remarks I shall make will be those which have suggested themselves to me in listening to this discussion since it commenced. I am an attentive listener, and I would not speak on this question except that I think my constituents expect me to enter my protest against the fiscal policy adopted by the present Government, on all suitable occasions. In speaking at this time it will be my duty to go back a little, and I promise not to go back more than fifty years. Some of the hon. gentlemen who have spoken went back more than a century. I will take occasion to go back in this discussion to the time of Confederation. I will read the remarks made by the hon. Finance Minister last year, when introducing this Tariff. He said:

"The time has arrived when it will become our duty to decide whether the thousands of men throughout the length and breadth of the country, who are unemployed, shall seek employment in another country or shall find it in this Dominion."

He goes on:

"Whether we will confine ourselves to the Fisheries and certain small industries, and cease to be what we have been, and not rise to be what I believe we are destined to be under wise and judicious legislation."

The hon. the Finance Minister in the opening remarks of his Budget Speech, did not appear to be much elated with the success of the National Policy so far. He wanted a little more time, and said, that if he had it, the results would be more satisfactory. Like the barren fig tree, he wanted another year, when he would dig about it, and dung it, and then it would bring forth fruit. Mr. Speaker, I have been a long time acquainted with my hon. friend the Finance Minister, and in any remarks I may make to-night, I want it understood that I do not love Cæsar less, but love Rome more. I discover that he still retains his old characteristics. I will say, at the outset, that I never knew my hon. friend to make a prediction that was fulfilled, and I never knew him to admit that he had been mistaken in any prediction. Give him time and all his predictions will come true; and this reminds me of another story: Some young men in Portland, in the State of Maine, were amusing themselves on the bank of a river, trying if they could throw stones across it. A strapping fellow from the country happened along, picked up a brick, and threw it further than they threw the stones. They said to him: "You are a powerful man." "Yes," said he, "pretty strong. I think I can throw one of you across, and I will bet $10 on it." They planked down the money, and he took hold of one fellow, who came forward, by the breeches and the scruff of the neck, and pitched him some ten or fifteen feet. He swam back and said "I want the money." "No," he said, "I can do it," and threw the man in again. He again swam back, and demanded the money. "No," rejoined the country chap, "I can throw you across, and I will throw at you from now until this time next year, but I will throw you;" and so my hon. friend (Sir Samuel L. Tilley) says, if you will only give him time all will come true. With regard to the effects of the National Policy, of course, I am more acquainted with its influences upon the county I represent, and upon the Province of New Brunswick, than with its influence throughout the Dominion. I can speak with regard to the Fisheries, which is one of the small industries to which the Finance Minister referred. In the county which I have the honour to represent, there are between 25,000 and 30,000 persons, and of that number 5,000 souls receive support from that industry. It is an important industry, because it is a school of training for our seamen, and for those persons needed for commerce. Without commerce no country can become great. It is an industry accompanied by a great deal of toil and hardships, and ought to be encouraged. Does the National Policy encourage the Fisheries of the Dominion? What is it calculated to do to help the thousands and tens of thousands who are engaged in this industry? It is calculated to oppress them, to crush them with enormous taxation, and by placing a tax upon everything they use in that calling. There is a tax placed upon the food that they consume, on the rigging and sails, and on everything required in that industry. That industry is one of the largest that we have. Our Government placed the value of a partial use of them to the United States for twelve years at the enormous sum of $12,000,000. And this was the industry which the hon. the Finance Minister has chosen to term a small industry—an industry of small importance. It is very much more important, I suppose, to encourage the manufacturer of clocks, of very much more importance to encourage the manufacture of agricultural implements, and of very much more importance to encourage the manufacture of buttons. The hon. the Finance Minister has spoken of the visits he had made; but he does not appear to have conversed with more than twenty men engaged in the manufactories of the country. Altogether he has not named more than twenty persons with whom he conversed with regard to the manufactories of the country, and with regard to the fiscal policy which is to build up the industries of the Dominion; only these twenty men, every man of whom is interested in this system of spoliation, to control the interests of a Dominion composed of four millions of people. The exports of fish last year, taken from the deep sea, amounted to $6,000,000, and the products to $12,000,000. When will the manufacturers export to foreign countries an amount like that? Mr. Speaker, I think that too much attention has been given to the manufactures of this country. This fiscal policy is the illegitimate offspring of the political necessities of the Tory party. What has brought about this Protection? It was never dreamt of by the late Finance Minister. It has not been dreamt of by the leaders of the Conservative party for years. The only necessity which existed for that policy was, that they were out of power and wanted to get back again. They talked about the distressed condition of the country, and presented to the people this nostrum, this quack remedy, which is destined to come to naught. I feel that I am on the right side on this question; I feel that we have right on our side, and I propose to fight it out on this line. I care very little with regard to the majority in this House; majorities do not affect men of honesty or principle; therefore, I did not intend to say anything on this question. But how far have the Finance Minister's predictions been realised, with regard to the keeping of the workingmen in this country? For the last forty years I remember none that has seen so many able-bodied men—men the most valuable to New Brunswick and the most needed—leave the Province. I would not be unfair enough to charge this exodus to the National Policy. I believe it has sprung from the general depression; but the National Policy has failed to keep them in the country, as was promised it would, or to give them increased employment. It has proved a most signal failure in this respect. I have received a letter from a friend in the county of Carleton, one of the best agricultural districts in New Brunswick, stating that no less than 1,000 good, strong young men have gone to the United States. I never knew so many in my own county go away; and they have left St. John, not by hundreds, but thousands, since the National Policy came into operation. These men have gone where they expected to better their condition. Of course, many would come and go under any circumstances, but the friends of this policy predicted it would find food and work and comfort for all. They knew better at the time—that it would not produce that effect; or they ought to have known it. I remember the Finance Minister, in replying to an address at St. Andrews, N.B., said:—“Six months from the time the Conservative party succeeds, there will be work found for every man, woman and child in that town.” Was that a figure of speech? Did it mean anything? I should expect to see any promise of mine fulfilled. That speech, to a certain extent, perhaps, influenced the people, who thought that the new policy would furnish them with labour, food and clothing. Not only has it not furnished a day's work to those people, but it has heaped upon them a load of taxation; everything they eat, drink and wear being more expensive than before. So far as the county of Charlotte, and the whole of New Brunswick is concerned, I believe this policy has proved injurious to every interest. The Fisheries have suffered as well as other industries, and the Government may thank their stars that prices have improved in England and the United States. That is the only bright spot of comfort they have. I have heard it attributed to the National Policy—a statement no more absurd, however, than many others from hon. gentlemen on the Government side. The National Policy has established warehouses in Calais, that very important lumbering concerns may be able to carry on their business successfully there. I do not know of a lumbering concern of any magnitude that has not established a warehouse on the American side since the adoption of that policy. I have been told by one of the cleverest merchants of St. Stephen, a large lumber operator, that it has fixed a tax of $100 additional on each team of two horses that the lumbermen send into the woods. It must have crushed that industry in New Brunswick but for the improvement in the foreign market. That has given some satisfaction and encouragement to our business men, however. But, excepting the improvement in the lumbering interest, I never knew so much depression and darkness in regard to the business prospects of New Brunswick. The National Policy has injured our shipping and coasting trade, by depriving it of return freights, and reducing earnings. We have no shipping trade with Western Canada; our vessels carry our lumber and farm products to the United States, and it is of great importance they should have return freights. Our trade and business is with the United States and Great Britain. We have nothing to send to Canada west; and it is in the interest of our people to buy, with the proceeds of their exports, what they most conveniently can in those countries, and bring it back in our vessels. We are now compelled to pay a duty of 50c. a barrel on flour, bought from Canadians, of the same grade as we used to get without that duty in the United States. I am assured by merchants that we now pay that much more for the flour. That is one of the fruits of the National Policy. I do not think I exaggerate in saying that, within the last year, 20,000 people, mostly men, have left the Lower Provinces. The emigration is as large, proportionately, from Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island as from New Brunswick. That policy, so far as New Brunswick is concerned, has resulted in nothing but oppression, heavy taxation and ruin. If there are any hon. gentlemen in the country responsible for this sad condition of things, it must be the hon. the Minister of Finance and the hon. the Minister of Railways, none of whose predictions of prosperity have been fulfilled. They were like the golden pictures sketched to induce us to enter Confederation. The stream of prosperity was to flow quick and violent. I was willing to make the best of Confederation, after we were in it, but there was no necessity for making Confederation a failure by this policy. I am glad it has fallen to the lot of the hon. the Finance Minister and colleagues to introduce it—to inflict it upon the country. I am glad the Reform party has not been guilty of this craze, if I may so style the National Policy. My thoughts are carried back some twenty-five years, to the time I first entered Parliament in New Brunswick, when I had the honour of being associated with the hon. the Finance Minister. The Conservative party had then ruled the Province, perhaps fifty years. The family compact had controlled affairs a long time. The hon. the Finance Minister was then a Liberal, and on the defeat of the Conservative Government, when it was necessary to form a new Administration, he was selected as the most eligible man for Provincial Secretary. He had some reputation for financial skill, having acquired it largely by his addresses on Temperance. He was very clever in toting up totals, and used to indulge in many figures to show the enormous evils of intemperance, and the cost of the drinking habits of society. He would represent to his audience how many horses and waggons in a straight line it would take to draw the money, in silver, that the drinking habits of society cost; and, occasionally, to vary the entertainment, he would tell us how long a canal, and how broad and deep would be that which the rum and water would represent, that was drunk in the country. Having had a large experience in public speaking and in this kind of arithmetic, we concluded he was about the best man for that office. He took charge of the Provincial Finances in 1854, and controlled them ten or twelve years, till the question of Confederation came up. During all those years I supported him in the main, and found him very amiable—full of the milk of human kindness. But I found he became very much changed when defeated and out of office, after his office had, for the time being, been filled by another man. He was remarkably kind and gentle, as pleasant as he is now when he is in a majority. But he has certainly assumed a very different character. He became very uneasy out of office; he was certainly a different man out of office from what he was in office. I had occasion to fill that office, and I say he and his supporters acted more like a set of political hyenas than anything else. Instead of being a docile person, as he was when he became so lamb-like, he was more like a roaring lion going about seeking whom he might devour. He devoured me; financially, I was used up when I went in. There was nothing in the Treasury, and there never will be where my hon. friend has been. When I went into office, there was a very considerable sum in the Treasury. I think there was $6,000, with which to meet Parliament and commence my financial operations. The first thing I had to do was to go off and try to borrow some money. Parliament was to meet, and I had to provide for the indemnity of the members and other financial engagements. I had never had much to do with finances; I did not know how to meet the banks at that time. I had no acquaintance with them; but I mustered up courage, and went up to St. John and went into the Bank of British North America. I told them I wanted to raise a little money to carry us through the Session, and they said that as they were an institution of the country and wanted to render all the help they could, as they were doing business there and making money, it was but right for them to write to Montreal and see what they could do. I went to another bank and could not get anything. I went to another bank and managed to borrow some $20,000. I borrowed some $15,000 or $20,000 from another bank. I went back to Fredericton and began to attend to my duties. In a short time I got an answer from the Bank of British North America that they would loan us $5,000. I thought I would not be under an obligation to an institution of that magnitude for a sum like that. Well, the hon. gentleman, as I said before, very soon devoured us. We went to the country and were defeated. But when my hon. friend went into the office of Provincial Secretary there was no Public Debt in New Brunswick. I think the debt at that time could not have exceeded $100,000. The Tariff was not over 10 per cent. My hon. friend was in office until Confederation, at which time there was a debt of $5,000,000, and we had obligations to the extent of $2,000,000, so we came into Confederation with a debt of $7,000,000. Such were my hon. friend's financial operations in New Brunswick. Little as I regarded the Tories when we turned them out, financially speaking, I thought we might have been as well off if we had kept them in. My hon. friend went into the agitation for Confederation. He told us that would be a panacea for all our ills; that we were going to manufacture for the back Provinces, as he called Ontario and Quebec; that New Brunswick was to become the Birmingham of the Dominion of Canada. I do not think that prediction has been fulfilled. I do not see any Intercolonial cars being loaded with our manufactures to go up west; but that was the whole strain of the arguments and speeches about the benefits we were to derive from Confederation, according to my hon. friend. The result has been the opposite of what he predicted. The manufactures of the Lower Provinces have been going down since Confederation. Instead of having our commercial agents up here in the west, looking out a market for our agricultural implements, we find quite the opposite. We find our Lower Provinces traversed by commercial agents from Montreal; every hole and corner of the Lower Provinces is flooded with them. Our proportion of the net National Debt, allowing for our assets, is estimated at $11,500,000, while our share of the gross debt amounts to $13,000,000. We have a Tariff of over 20 per cent., and are taxed beyond endurance. Our industries are burdened. What encouragement has the agricultural industry received from the National Policy? What has this policy done for the farmer? It taxes enormously everything which he has to eat, drink and wear, and far from increasing the prices of his farm produce. I have never known a period when the products of the farm were so low as they were last year. What has the policy done for the mercantile classes of New Brunswick? It has driven trade from the merchants and the middlemen all along the frontier. It has driven trade from St. Andrew's and St. Stephen's into Eastport and Calais on the Maine sides. I have talked with two of the largest importers in the county of Charlotte, in reference to this policy, and though they are warm supporters of the party in power they admit frankly, notwithstanding their political preferences, that the Tariff was very injurious to them. The Fishery Award was $5,500,000. Of that one million went to Newfoundland, leaving $4,500,000 for the four Maritime Provinces in Confederation. Set apart $900,000 for Quebec, and we have then $3,600,000 for New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, and Prince Edward Island, which divided over a period of twelve years would give to those Provinces $300,000 a year. As it is in the Treasury of the Dominion it should bear interest. Interest on $300,000 at 6 per cent., one year—$18,000; so that in the year 1880, the three lesser Provinces would have from this fund, to divide amongst them $318,000. Allowing their population to be 750,000 it would give us 42½ cents per head. In 1881 we would have two years interest on the next $300,000, making $336,000 to be divided in 1882, which would give us 45 cents per head. It would increase 2½ cents per head per annum for the twelve years, making an average per capita during those years of 56 cents per head, and would pay more than two-thirds of the 80 cents subsidy we now receive from the Dominion. I am inclined to think, however, we will not receive any portion of that Award. I have seen no evidence yet that we may expect it. I trust the hon. gentlemen now managing affairs will feel it to be their duty to do something for the fishing industry, that has contributed so much to the Treasury. New Brunswick is to-day in the most humiliating position, and is suffering the greatest commercial depression which has prevailed in that Province since the hon. the Finance Minister took charge of its finances twenty-five years ago. Although the electors were warned of the consequences of this policy, and sent here twelve men out of the sixteen to oppose it, we find ourselves powerless to do anything for our Province. Indeed our political humiliation is even greater than our commercial humiliation. The predictions of my hon. friend, with regard to the balance of power that we would exercise in the Confederation, have not been verified. He told us in his speeches on this question, that in all moral questions we would have Ontario with us, and on all matters of fiscal policy, matters of trade, we would have Quebec and the Lower Provinces with us, and, therefore, we would always have the controlling power. But how do we find ourselves now? We find ourselves in a hopeless minority, with very little support from the other Maritime Provinces. We did not dream, when we entered Confederation, that our tax per head would, in so short a time, be raised from $2.75 to $6 a head. In a speech made in 1864, my hon. friend said:

“It has been said that figures never lie; but if you start on an erroneous basis, you make figures do as much lying as anything else."

Again :

"Mr. Lawrence says we cannot compete with Canada in manufactures. Mr. Lawrence tried to lead the manufacturers of New Brunswick to believe that they could not compete with Canada. I gave you the impression that you would manufacture a great deal for Canada, and be, as it were, to it what Birmingham is to the west of England. In short, I feel that Mr. Lawrence's calculations, from end to end, are the emanations of a mind which is impressed with the insignificance of our people. Mr. Parks, the owner of our cotton factory, has, through a friend, authorised me to say that, if he had the extended market that would be made by this Federation, he could sell at 10 per cent less than he can at present."

The hon. the Minister of Finance told them then they had every facility for manufacturing. Mr. Lawrence told them that such would not be the case ; in Canada they had the population, the capital, and manufactories already in operation, and that New Brunswick could not compete. Since Confederation, has the Intercolonial been seen freighted with manufactured goods coming up to Canada ? Have commercial agents been seen looking for a market for New Brunswick manufactures ? Quite the opposite. Canadian goods have been going to New Brunswick, both to the injury of our importers and manufacturers ; and runners from Canada have infested every hole and corner of the Lower Provinces. Mr. Lawrence was the fool before Confederation ; who is the fool now ? The cotton manufactory was established twenty years ago, and has been enlarged since. Mr. Parks has been manufacturing goods ever since, and that establishment is not due to the National Policy. I am satisfied Mr. Parks will not send any cotton into Canada. I fancy I can see one distressed manufacturer, the hon. member for Centre Toronto. I fancy I can see him going over to the hon. the Finance Minister and begging for some protection in order that he might continue his manufacturing. He got that protection, and that is the reason for his leaving the Liberal party. In order to help that hon. gentleman, worth $500,000, every poor man who wants a table or a chair has to pay more for his furniture. Have the masses of the people no claims upon the Government ? We are told that notwithstanding this increased taxation that goods are cheaper than they were before the National Policy was adopted. The idea is a new one that taxation makes goods cheaper. Hon. gentlemen must think the people are very stupid to believe any such assertion. The predictions of my hon. friend the Minister of Finance are never realized. When he was told that the Federal Government would be expensive he said, $13,000,000 annually would be all that would be required to carry on the affairs of the country for a quarter of a century. I would not intimate that the hon. gentleman would for a moment state what was not correct, he would not lie I am sure, but he has told us that figures will, and, Mr. Speaker, so far as the figures are concerned, I pronounce this a "whopper." He told us that $2.75 would be all that would be required for a quarter of a century to come. That statement, in view of the actual facts, I am tempted to describe as a "whopper." He stated that so great would be the increase of population, as the result of building the railroad that, in 1880, the population of New Brunswick would be 400,000. The hon. gentleman never states what is correct, and, so far as figures are concerned, that is another "whopper." He stated that the Intercolonial would go through the centre of the Province and cost $15,000,000. It has not gone through the centre of the Province, and it has cost about $30,000,000 ; that is another "whopper." I could produce hundreds of calculations made by the hon. the Finance Minister to induce us to enter Confederation, which calculations he could prove to a demonstration, yet none of which have come true. Now, I am sure, no one can imagine that that hon. gentleman would deviate from the path of rectitude and truth ; but if the Scriptures are true, where it says that the liars have their place in the lake that burns with fire and brimstone, I pity that hon. gentleman's figures ; and if the liars are to be cast into outer darkness, where there is weeping and wailing and gnashing of teeth, salt cannot save these figures. David and Jonathan were not more closely allied than were the hon. gentleman and these figures, yet the best of friends must part. I listened attentively to the hon. the Minister of Railways, while delivering his speech, powerful it certainly was, and well calculated to rally his supporters. I thought, while he was speaking, of Vesuvius, and expected, with the rest of my friends, to be buried with the lava. I thought of a flaming fire, a rushing, mighty wind, and an earthquake, and I thought of a very essential element which was not in the speech at all. As the interests of trade are identical in the three Maritime Provinces, I am sure the National Policy has been as injurious to Nova Scotia as to New Brunswick. I see that the Government have sent $1,000 worth of food to the starving fishermen of Guysboro. The National Policy has not done much for them. I am anxious to hear the representative of that county (Mr. Ogden) expatiate on the beauties of the National Policy. The contrast between the beaming face of that hon. member, whose eyes stand out with fatness, who has more than heart can wish, and the hungry, gaunt forms of his emaciated constituents is great indeed. The National Policy has helped them with a vengeance. I understand the Government propose this as a loan. I trust it will be considered as a gift. They have helped the poor of Ireland, why not the poor of Guysboro', who, to some extent, have been made so by their National Policy? I was amused at the changes which came over the countenance of the hon. the Minister of Railways during the speech of the hon. member for Annapolis on the British Columbia Judges' Bill. When he found his hon. colleague was disposed to rat on that vote, he fairly trembled—

“For Satan trembles when he sees
The weakest saint upon his knees.”

I hope the hon. member will not prove a weak saint—but that the seed has fallen in good and honest soil and will bring forth much fruit. My heart warmed towards him, and I felt like giving him the hand of fellowship and welcome him to our sorrows just now and our joys three years hence.

MR. KILLAM moved the adjournment of the debate.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: No. It is necessary to go into Committee on the resolutions submitted.

MR. KILLAM: It would be unfair to proceed at this late hour. There are several hon. members of the Opposition who desire to speak upon the subject.

MR. MACKENZIE: It is not necessary to go into Committee now.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: With our usual good nature we will consent to adjourn the debate.

House adjourned at

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

QUEEN'S BIRTHDAY—QUEBEC CELEBRATION.

QUESTION.

MR. DOMVILLE enquired, Whether the Montreal Volunteers will be permitted to go to the city of Quebec to take part in the next celebration of the Queen's Birthday, and what assistance they are to receive from the Government to enable them to do so; whether the 54th Battalion of Infantry and the Richmond Field Battery of Artillery, nearly one hundred miles nearer to the city of Quebec than the Montreal Volunteers are, and in every way equal to the Montreal Volunteers, will be permitted to go upon the same terms as to Government assistance; and if not, whether the Government will assist the Eastern Townships' Volunteers to meet at Richmond to celebrate the Queen's Birthday.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: The Montreal Volunteers are to go to Quebec to attend the review; two battalions and a battery of artillery. One battalion will be taken from the Eastern Townships, number of battalion not yet fixed; one from the Province of New Brunswick, not yet fixed; also one from Ontario, not yet fixed. An allowance towards covering the expenses of each battalion attending the review will be made.

MAIL CONTRACT IN LÉVIS:

QUESTION.

MR. LARUE enquired, For what reason the Government cancelled the contract for the carriage of Her Majesty's Mail between Lévis and St. Joseph de Beauce, and intermediate stations, awarded to Laurent Roy, of Lévis, on the 1st August, 1878, and which was to expire only on the 1st August, 1882.

MR. LANGEVIN: This contract was cancelled because it had been granted without having been advertised, as required by law. Nevertheless, it appears that the only person who has received money for the service mentioned in this contract is Mr. Roy himself.

EMIGRATION OF BRITISH TENANT FARMERS.

QUESTION.

MR. STEPHENSON enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to appoint special agents for the purpose of promoting the emigration of tenant farmers, or others, resident in Great Britain or Ireland, to the Dominion of Canada, during the present year; and if not, why?

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: The Government have their ordinary and regular staff of emigrant agents in the Old Country, and they do not propose to appoint any special agents.

NEW BRUNSWICK—INTERNATIONAL BRIDGES OVER RIVER ST. JOHN.

QUESTION.

MR. COSTIGAN asked, If the Congress of the United States appropriate one-half of the estimated cost of certain proposed International bridges over the river Saint John, N. B., will the Government of Canada provide the remaining half of said estimated cost?

MR. LANGEVIN: If the United States Congress will offer to pay one-half of the cost of certain proposed bridges over the St. John River, the Government of Canada will be prepared to consider the matter.

ST. MAURICE RIVER IMPROVEMENT.

QUESTION.

MR. MONTPLAISIR enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to place in the Supplementary Estimates any sum whatever for the improvement of the river St. Maurice, more particularly between the Piles Falls and La Tuque.

MR. LANGEVIN: The engineer who has been sent to make an inspection has not yet reported; and the Department is unable, therefore, to say whether a sum of money will be required for improvements. Under these circumstances I am unable to submit to my colleagues, and they are unable to submit to Parliament, any proposal in reference to any such improvements, at all events during this Session.

OTTAWA RIVER FISHING PRIVILEGES.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

MR. COCKBURN (West Northumberland), in moving for an Order of the House for the production of copies of all grants, leases, and agreements made between the Department of Marine and Fisheries, or any of its officers, and any persons owning or possessing lands, bays and marshes, or portions thereof, lying on the north side of the Ottawa river, between the city of Ottawa and Grenville; also, full and complete statements of all moneys paid by the Department, during the last three years, for or in respect of fish-breeding or game protection, on those grounds, bays and marshes, or any of them, and the names of persons to whom paid; also, copies of all instructions given to members of the Dominion Police, or officers of the Department, touching game and game protection; also, copies of all correspondence touching game protection on said grounds, bays, or marshes, and copies of all complaints in respect of the same; and, also, a copy of a circular dated on or about the 15th December last, issued by the said Department to fishery overseers, in reference to game protection, together with copies of all objections or complaints made concerning the enforcement of the Provincial Game Laws by Dominion officials, acting under instructions from the Department of Marine and Fisheries, said: I desire to state briefly the grounds upon which this motion is made. A number of persons in this city, and in the neighbouring counties, have felt that a very grave abuse has existed for the last two years or more. It is well known that this Parliament and Government have no concern in the matter of game protection. That is a subject which, under the British North America Act rests entirely with the Local Parliaments and Governments. During the last two years, however, persons engaged in legitimate sport on this river, and in the neighbouring marshes, have found that the Dominion Police have been employed to warn them off. A great many persons in the city, as well as those living in the neighbourhood—artisans of the little villages, and farmers and farmers' sons—felt that they were being deprived harshly, unjustly and illegally of a pastime they had hitherto enjoyed without let or hindrance. It was found, upon making enquiry, that those policemen, who sometimes acted in an arbitrary, high-handed way, going so far as to threaten arrests, and in one or two instances actually making arrests, were employed under the authority of the Fishery Department, and under the express orders of the Commissioner of Fisheries, Mr. Whitcher. The case of two gentlemen being thus interfered with, came prominently up last September, and they requested me, as a public man, to interest myself in the question. I told them there must be a great mistake—that it was impossible to conceive that the Department of Marine and Fisheries should meddle with the question of game protection in this or any other neighbourhood; but I was assured that such was the fact. I wrote a letter to the Department, couched in courteous terms, and asked if it were possible that those police officers had authority from the Department to warn off and prevent persons from enjoying their lawful sport on the marshes and bays of this river; but I could not get any satisfaction. I received several long letters from the Commissioner on the subject of game protection, couched in vague generalities and avoiding the question, which I put as pertinently as I could, i.e., whether those officers were employed for the purpose of preserving game on this river? At last I got one letter, from which I will read an extract. The correspondence was so very voluminous that I will not trespass upon the time of the House by reading the whole of it. Mr. Whitcher says, under date of the 9th September last:

“Allow me to state that I shall always cheerfully afford you, or any other gentleman, whatever information on this subject it may be thought proper to ask. At the same time, permit me to mention, that the class of persons from whom damage is always to be apprehended in a locality within easy reach of a populous city, like Ottawa, must necessarily be excluded by rigid means from all opportunities to do injury, although it may happen that the general and absolute terms of exclusion bear with some degree of hardship on others whose presence is not only innocent, but desirable on account of the moral and intelligent support, which every enterprise for the protection and propagation of game, fishes (and incidentally birds), it is most essential to secure, as a countervailing influence to that aggressive spirit evinced by parties who complain that the restraints of Game and Fishery Laws infringe the public liberty to kill and destroy game at all seasons.”

Now, here we have a position taken by this Department, not merely to protect game generally, because I do not think sportsmen would object to that, even if it had been done by an illegal extension of authority. There is no question raised as to the protection of game during the close season, but there was an attempt made to prevent certain classes of persons from shooting at all seasons of the year on this river. This action of the Department is certainly the assumption of an authority of a very obnoxious kind; it is a game law of a most offensive character. But it turned out that there was a great deal more in the thing than this. It was not merely the protection of game, in making the river a place of refuge for all the birds of the air, it was the protection of game for the private use of a gentleman and his particular friends. That is what this protection of game resulted in. It was not a general protection of game, but the protection of a selfish and isolated interest, at the expense of the whole community; and that was being done, not at the expense of those gentlemen, but it was being done at the expense of the public, and by the employment of the Dominion Police, who, in their uniforms and bright buttons, were ranged along the edge of the river, to warn away all the young men from this city, and all the artisans, habitants and farmers on the river side. It grew to be a very great abuse, and was felt to be such. I addressed, then, when I found I could not get anything more satisfactory than those general statements, one of which I have just read, a letter to the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, in which I formulated a charge. The letter is dated 29th Sept., 1879, and reads thus:—

“DEAR SIR,—I beg to call your attention to a correspondence which has just taken place between Mr. Whitcher of your Department and myself.

“I have a right to complain that this gentleman has (although he has generously given me at considerable length his personal views on the protection of birds, game and fish—a subject on which I did not desire any information) entirely evaded answering the simple question which I proposed. I will put the case as clearly and concisely as possible.

“It appears that Mr. Whitcher, while acting for the Department in certain fish-breeding arrangements on the Ottawa river, acquired a personal interest in certain bays and marshes for the purpose of shooting game (I assume this to be the fact, partly from his own words and partly from other information), and that under his orders the policemen, or officers employed for the protection of the fish-breeding operations, have acted as his special game-keepers and personal servants; and that they recently ordered from off certain of the marshes (not even within the limits of the lands held by the Department, as I am informed) certain gentlemen of this city who were merely engaged in the lawful sport of snipe shooting, and who were not in any way interfering with fish-breeding, a process which, I believe, cannot be prosecuted where men can walk and where fish cannot swim.

“The impropriety of this proceeding must be obvious, as though the Dominion Government may, I shall assume, lease lands to the water’s edge, and also the bays and water courses thereto belonging, for fish-breeding purposes it can have nothing to do with the question of game protection, which is a matter of Provincial concern only. The fact, besides, of Dominion officers being employed under a color of public duty of a totally different kind, in protecting the game preserves of individuals, whether under a joint or separate arrangement as to the relative share of compensation which is apparently the defence put forward by Mr. Whitcher is, to say the least, a highly objectionable and novel feature in Departmental administration.

“I simply call your attention to this correspondence with the desire of clearly understanding if the practice is sanctioned by you as the head of the Department.

“I am, dear Sir,

I received no reply to this letter for a considerable time, but I acquit the Minister, personally, of any complaint in that respect: there were reasons of a private character for the delay, and I certainly do not, nor did I ever intend to attach any importance to that. It was the delay in sending me the report, or, rather, the mistake in permitting any such report which I have reason to complain of. Mr. Whitcher shortly afterwards issued a circular, a part of which I will also read, as showing, clearly the pretence put forward by the Department. He says, addressing the Fishery Officers, under date of the 15th of December, 1879:

MR. COCKBURN.

“It is known that many of the Fishery Officers have regarded it as somewhat onerous for them thus incidentally to enforce the Game Laws, without receiving any extra allowance for either salary or expenses; but this Department has felt justified in doing so, from an official point of view, because of the practical assistance which it afforded to their regular duties. We have been, nevertheless, grateful to those Fishery Officers who have so spiritedly and efficiently exercised their powers without any remuneration therefor, actuated solely by a desire to preserve the valuable game of the country, which, without some such active interest and authorised supervision, would have been now very much decreased, if not in many parts almost exterminated.”

We have this circular issuing from the Department, and the full, complete control of the game not only justified, but asserted in the most formal terms, and the employment of those officers in the protection of the game justified. I received a letter from the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, shortly after this circular was issued, which certainly surprised me very much. It contained, to some extent, an excuse for the action of the officers, and was also, to some extent, a hauling down of the colours that had been flaunted by the officers of the Department; and it contained, besides, a report by Mr. Whitcher, to which I take special exception. The gravamen of this offence is, that the case we submitted to the Minister, which I have just read in the letter of 29th September, having been by him referred to Mr. Whitcher for his report, that officer does not confine himself to a justification of his illegal act as he should have done; but he proceeds to inquire into the motives of the member who had brought this subject before his Department—a course which, I take it, no hon. member of the House will for a moment approve of. I will read my letter to the Minister, dated January 20th, 1880, which contains an extract from the objectionable report and my remarks thereon:—

“SIR,—I have the honour to acknowledge your letter (received only to-day) under date of 17th inst., being a reply to a letter addressed by me to you of 29th September last, and also a copy of an official report by Mr. Whitcher of 1st October, this being the first intimation I have had of any such report.

“The correspondence which took place prior to the 29th September with Mr. Whitcher, speaks for itself, and I prefer to refer you to that, rather than to Mr. Whitcher's erroneous comments upon it. The letter of 29th September, however, formulated certain charges against this gentleman which remains unanswered to this hour. His long arguments about the propriety of game protection and the desire which he states is entertained (notwithstanding the British North America Act to the contrary) by some persons—names unknown—that the Dominion Government should assume this charge in connection with fish-breeding, are all quite beside the questions raised in that letter.

“Game Protection” is properly limited to the close or breeding season, but all this correspondence points to something very different—to the preservation of game, for private use, during the open season, by the employment of Dominion Police officers, and that for the benefit of a certain person who claims that he has a perfect right to do this, either at his own expense, or at the expense of the public, or at the joint expense of himself and the Department (the question of cost being of course unimportant in his view), and all this is to be done under the false pretence of fish-breeding.

“Every word of my letter of the 29th September I maintain; and every charge therein contained will be amply supported.

“But Mr. Whitcher to whom, I am now informed, my letter was referred for report, instead of confining himself to the charges preferred against himself, and answering them if it was in his power to do so, has attempted to avoid the issues by invoking other, and totally foreign subjects for consideration. I will quote his own words: ‘Knowing of the threatened law-suit by Mr. Cockburn’s clients, I was the more cautious in answering his enquiries; and it now seems to me that it is not because, as he pretends, the proper information was withheld, but because he did not elicit such replies as would commit either the Department, a policeman, or myself, and afford some foundation for the intended suit. The spiteful attack on myself, made in his present letter (No. 5) is probably as much in revenge for failing to commit me in the interest of his client as for a previous act connected with the dismissal of his brother-in-law by your predecessor, for which Mr. Cockburn has unjustly blamed me and openly avowed his intention to annoy or injure me. I am justified in supposing this, as Mr. Cockburn mixes the trivial subject of his former letters, which he says consisted of a simple question with new matter of a malicious kind, and thereby discloses his motive and the plausible tenor of his correspondence.’

“Let me say, Sir, that there is not one word of truth in these idle and absurd imaginings. I wrote your Department in my public capacity as a member of Parliament, in the public interest, and to protect the sportsmen of this city and neighbourhood against the continuation of an abuse. I was never asked professionally or otherwise to prosecute Mr. Whitcher nor any one else, nor had I any such intention; and I have further to say that I never had the distinguished honour of having a brother-in-law in Mr. Whitcher’s Department, nor indeed any other relation by blood or kindred in any of the Departments of the Civil Service. The whole story is either a wicked invention or a singular hallucination.

“I observe, with satisfaction, by the concluding words of your letter to me, that the practice of employing Dominion officers, in connection with game protection, is hereafter to be discontinued; so far good, it would have been better, however, had this been conceded at first, as it might possibly have saved the reputation of an official whose pen has been proved to be prolific of blunders and absurdities.

“I am, Sir,

“Ottawa.”

I have again to say that, when a public officer, in any Department, ventures to go outside of his duty, and to enquire into and criticise the motives of a member of Parliament in bringing a charge against his Department, he is doing that which, I trust, this House will never sanction. The mischief of such a pretension must be evident. Perhaps there is a moral lesson in it, for it comes home to all in this Chamber. The gentleman says he has a perfect right to employ these policemen in any one part of his domain, because, he says, he has private interests, and he has a right to supplement the services of the policeman by giving them some pay for the performance of those services, although they are connected with the protection of fish. In one paper (the circular) he ignores that view of the case, and says these officers have the duty to perform, and no remuneration at all. Poor fellows! They have been working for the public, in the interest of game protection, and they have the reward of knowing that they have been doing their duty free of any kind of remuneration. But now he says, in this report of the 1st of October:

“If I choose, or any other person chooses, to employ a policeman, or fishery officer, to work for me, at my own expense, there is nothing objectionable about it. * * * * There is certainly no novelty about the practice. Even clerks in the House of Commons, the Senate, and other public officers sometimes assist members and Ministers, who have professional or domestic affairs to conduct. Nobody thinks of seriously questioning the use of time, fuel, light, office accommodation, stationery, etc., etc.—incidents to this custom. There is an honourable understanding of the distinction between using and abusing such common privileges.”

So we have Mr. Whitcher catching at what takes place in this Chamber and also in the Departments, putting himself on a level with Ministers and members, and saying that, because these things are tolerated there, he is, therefore, to be at liberty to employ the Dominion Police in the protection of his private interests, as the possessor of certain sporting privileges on this river. In conclusion, I have to say that this matter has been made the subject of a good deal of newspaper criticism and correspondence. There has been some party feeling about it, and I have no doubt an effort has been made in this House to canvass the question with members and to raise, if possible, a prejudice against this motion, which, however, is made entirely for the reasons I have given. I have nothing, whatever, to say, for or against Mr. Whitcher personally. I know very little about him, and I do in this case as I would in every other, where I see a man stepping forward and assuming to take upon himself a power and privilege which will give him a special advantage and exclude everybody else from the same. Where such is done and is not backed up by the authority of law, I will be always one to protest against it. I beg now, Mr. Speaker, to submit this motion for the papers.

MR. WRIGHT: I have much pleasure in seconding the motion of the hon. member for West Northumberland. During the past autumn, my attention had been called, through the public press, to the condition of things which existed in the county of Ottawa, in connection with this matter. On the 19th of November, 1879, an article appeared in the Aylmer Times, a paper published in the county of Ottawa, in which the following statement was made:

"Some three or four of our people left, some days ago, to pass a few days fishing and shooting in the township of Lochaber, some thirty miles north-west of this village. After spending a few days tranquilly, they were visited, on Thursday last, by a fishing detective from Ottawa; but, fortunately for them, he found nothing in their possession to incriminate them. They confiscated two or three old nets, the property of a settler on the lake. How is this? Any number of gentlemen from Ottawa, many of them connected with the Fishery Department, can go where they please, and no attention is paid to them; but let a resident of the county go out into the northern wilds and he is dogged by a Government detective. Along the front of this township (Buckingham), is also a Government reserve, both for fish and fowl. About a month ago, some of our sportsmen went down to the bays that extend along the whole breadth of this township, when they were met by a Dominion policeman, and informed that they would not be allowed to shoot, as the whole of the bay was under the Government. Nevertheless, week after week, parties in Ottawa come down and shoot without let or hindrance, under the eyes of one of the heads of the Department of Fishery and Fowls. This thing has gone far enough. It is the duty of our member, Mr. Alonzo Wright, to see that equal justice will be meted out to us, and that his own constituents, at least, have an equal right with others; and that when a license is applied for to fish in our lakes, and the law complied with, that the same may be granted, on the payment of the legal fee, and no favour shown."

It must be evident that such an appeal from my constituents could not be made in vain. Accordingly, I made the most careful enquiry into the truth of the statements made in the letter, and I am satisfied of its substantial correctness. Representations have been also made to me by many of my constituents, which convinced me that they have been illegally, unjustly and unfairly dealt with. Capt. Archibald McNaughton, an old friend of my own, and a gentleman whose respectability and veracity cannot be questioned, corroborates all these statements. I have in my possession a letter written by Mr. Joseph Riopelle, in which he states that he thought he had some rights as a Canadian, but is now satisfied that a Canadian has no rights which a fishery officer is bound to respect. He states that he was driven from these grounds by a Dominion policeman, in a most insolent and offensive manner. Now, Sir, I agree with the gentleman who wrote to the Aylmer Times, that this has gone far enough, and that such illegal interference with the rights and privileges of my constituents can no longer be tolerated, and that the insolence of these officials shall be promptly rebuked by their superiors. We all thought that the functions of the Department were accurately defined by the name Marine and Fisheries, but it appears that they claim dominion, not only over the waters and the fish therein, but likewise the fowls of the air, and the ferce nature, the animals of the forest. Their motto should be: "Per mare per terram." This is not the first time I have had to complain of the insolence and arrogance of Dominion officials. During the late regime my constituents were most wantonly outraged by the Inspector of Weights and Measures, who treated them as though they were the inhabitants of a conquered country, confiscating their weights and measures in a most tyrannical and offensive manner. Representations to that effect were made to me by the late lamented Col. Pritchard, of Wakefield, Messrs. C. Devlin and Prentiss, of Aylmer, and most of the leading merchants of the county. I did all in my power to obtain redress for them but unhappily without effect. I hope that, in the future, nothing of this kind will occur. It may be said, that this is a small matter, and unworthy of the attention of this House and the country. But I maintain, that any matter that affects the rights, privileges, and liberties of my constituents, or any portion of the Canadian people, is not too small to engage the attention of the members of a free Parliament. The thirty shillings, which Hampden was called on to pay as his share of the ship money, was a small matter; but it was the principle which troubled him. To use his own words, he could lend his money as well as another, but he feared the curse invoked in Magna Charta, on anyone who should palter with the rights and privileges and liberties of the English people; and so, for this thirty shillings, for the principle involved in this payment, he threw himself across the pathway of a despotic monarch, of a haughty aristocracy, of the minions of a court, and cheerfully gave his life for the rights and liberties of the land he loved so well. And so I, too, fear the curse invoked on all hon. members of Parliament who shall palter with the rights, privileges, and liberties of their constituents. A curious custom prevails in the English Channel Islands, called the clameur de haro. It was ordained by Duke Rollo of Normandy, that if any of his subjects were wronged they might appeal to him and his successors for all time to come, until the final judgment day. Mr. Freeman tells us, in his history of the Norman Conquest of England, that when William the Conqueror was carried to his rest in the great Abbey of Caen, a Norman Knight, Ascelin by name, barred the pathway of the procession, and claimed that he had been unjustly deprived of the land on which the Abbey had been built, and at the grave in which the Conqueror was to be laid he made his appeal to Rollo. And these fierce Normans, who had stormed the heights of Hastings, and slaughtered King Harold and his fighting men, and conquered broad England, halted before the open grave, and the appeal to Rollo was heard, and the wrong was righted, before the stark King could be laid to his rest. And to-day, in the English Channel Islands, if a subject of Duke Rollo is wronged, he calls on his Prince for aid and succour, and his cry goes up through the dim centuries, and the Prince hears his cry, and comes to his rescue, and though his followers were down in the press of battle, and his successor the Queen of England, rights the wrong done to the subject of Duke Rollo, and so we trust it will be in every English land until the final judgment day. And so my constituents being wronged, appeal to this Parliament, which represents all the traditions and privileges of the English Parliament from the beginning to the present day. It is this principle of justice, of liberty, and regard for law which forms the basis of the English system. It is this principle of liberty and justice, and equality of all before the law, which makes us to differ, as Lord MacAuley tells us, from the serfs who crouch beneath the sceptre of Brandenburg or Braganza. I was told only the other day, in a sneering manner, that this was a small matter and unworthy of the attention of the House, because only a few poor miserable hunters and fishermen who were concerned. This was not strictly true, although I believe that many poor hunters and fishermen have been wronged, for my constituents are as substantial and well to do a body of people as are in the Dominion; but if this statement had been correct, if these people had been poor and miserable, so much the stronger the reason why their member should defend them. If they were rich and powerful they might defend themselves. But, Sir, I would say as Touchstone did of Audrey: She may be a poor thing, but she is all mine own. It would be a base and infamous thing in me to desert those, who have stood to me in storm and sunshine because they were poor and unable to defend themselves, to allow their rights and privileges to be interfered with by officials whose stipends come from the earnings of the masses of the people. I recollect well the first canvass I made in the forest county which I have the honour to represent, very often we had no town hall in which to assemble, no roof to shelter our heads, but in the heart of the primeval forest, with the tall pines waving over our heads, we held our sylvan gatherings. The impression made on my mind will never be erased, as I saw the hardy settlers, the pioneers of civilization, come trooping to the place of rendezvous. They were exiles from many a land, all the divers elements—English, Irish, Scotch, French—which make up our people, and every man had his tale of wrong, oppression and outrage to relate. At last the meeting would be organised and the chairman would announce to me its decision. He would say, and the statement of one was that of all: We care not for abstract questions of politics; with regard to the great questions of the day, do as you will; with us the great struggle is for existence. All we ask of you is to guide and assist us, and to stand between us and our oppressors. Well, I have done so to the best of my ability. In season, and out of season, I have been at their service. If they came to my door at midnight, I was ready to do their bidding. And my reward has been the faithful and loyal support of as many and independent body of constituents as the sun ever shone upon. But it is not a pleasant life to lead to make, day after day, the everlasting round of the Departments without any result—to climb those awful stairs which Dante describes as the punishment of politicians, to wait patiently in the ante-chambers of the great, to witness the perpetual exaltation of the creature above the Creator, and to bear the insolence of office, such is the everlasting round to which politicians are, doubtless, for their sins condemned. It is not a pleasant task, and no gentleman could perform it, were it not for the pleading eyes and wan cheeks which force us to it. I did not wish to take any part in the discussion of this matter, but was forced to do so by my constituents, and sense of public duty. I have the greatest respect for the Department of Marine and Fisheries, and for many of the able officers who compose its staff. I have also a feeling of great respect for its author and creator, the Hon. Peter Mitchell, who may be said to have evolved it from his inner consciousness. And if we have reaped the rich harvest of the sea—if we have swept five millions of American dollars into the Treasury of the Dominion. The meshes of the nets were woven and the lines and buoys, by which that operation was performed laid down, by the patient perseverance, practical ability, and statesmanlike sagacity of the Hon. Peter Mitchell. But my regret is, that the services which he rendered to the Dominion have not received a better reward. But in the political field the fruition never equals the expectation. The labourer who sows rarely reaps the harvest, and we are told the race is not to the swift, the battle to the strong, or riches to men of understanding. I say this without wishing to derogate in the slightest degree, from the services rendered by the late Minister of Marine, in carrying out the most difficult and delicate negotiations which resulted so satisfactorily in the Halifax Award. We have been frequently told that the Dominion of Canada ranks fifth among the maritime powers of the world, and certainly of the Department of Marine functions are of a most important character. The duty is to look after all our marine affairs, to do for the toilers of the sea what the hon. the Minister of Agriculture is supposed to do for those on the land, guard, aid, and assist them; to stud our ironbound coasts and inland waters with lighthouses and beacon-lights; to make the shrill music of the fog-whistle warn the mariner of his danger; to ponder to the passions of the piscatorial tribes; to increase the food supply of the nation; these are a few of the duties which devolve on this Department. Among the ideas which preside over the development of the human intellect, that of industry occupies a most important position, but there are also the ideas of the good, the true, the beautiful and the just. If I am permitted, I think I can show that, in addition to obtaining for us material advantages, the Department has conferred on us a genuine intellectual pleasure. We all recollect the debates which took place between the two knightly Chancellors of the Exchequer on the question of finance. We know that the finances of a nation are most important factors and elements of prosperity, and under the ancien regime, a good old rule, a simple plea obtained that they might take who have the power, and they might keep who can. King John was in the habit of replenishing his exchequer by extracting the teeth from the Jewish money-lenders, one by one, until the requisite number of shekels were handed over. But the whirligig of time brings its revenges, and now when the Hebrew star, financially at least, is lord of the ascendant, one fears that the descendants of Isaac of York will make us pay compound interest for all the dental operations performed on their ancestor. Lord Macaulay tells us that the rule which applies to individuals does not apply to nations; that the course which in the individual produces calamity, in the nation produces prosperity. With regard to the individual, the system of that eminent economist—the late Wilkins Micawber undoubtedly obtains, income £20; expenditure £19.19s.6s., result, happiness; income, £20, expenditure, £20.0s.6d.—result misery. With regard to nations there is a grander system and more glittering generalisation. Lord Macaulay assures us that the more a nation gets into debt, the richer it becomes, and the Englishman of to-day is better able to pay the interest of 800,000.000, than the Englishman of the time of William the Third was able to pay the interest of 1,000,000. If this statement of his lordship be correct, it is a most comforting economical evangel. If the ratio of prosperity is that of our debt, we may ask: "Oh, what shall the harvest be." The English debt was incurred for foreign wars and subsidies to foreign nations; the Canadian debt is incurred in developing our material resources—constructing a great railway across the Continent, and let us trust solving the great problem of the Empire by transferring the surplus population of England, Ireland and Scotland to the fertile lands of the North-West, and the older Provinces, let us trust that Lord Macaulay's theory is correct, and that a Greater Britain will be founded on this side of the Atlantic. I have alluded to the debates which took place between the two knightly Chancellors of the Exchequer, they reminded us of the picture painted by Sir Walter Scott of the combat between Saladin and Cœur de Leon near the little well of the desert. The little well representing the Dominion Treasury, in which we hope the water will never get low. The fierce Sir Richard swooped down like an eagle from his eyrie on the Conservative Cœur de Leon, who for forty years had fasted from everything except sin, who for forty had never tasted what the hon. member from Vancouver would call a truly British beverage—horse and man went down before the infidel knight, and the National Policy shrieked when good Sir Leonard fell. But the race is not to the swift—the battle to the strong, nor the best loans to Liberal financiers. Many a victory has been lost through over confidence, and here I will address myself to the military members of this House, and not to lawyers and laymen who cannot be expected to understand such matters. If stout King Harold had kept his bold brothers and his Kentish axemen within entrenchments at Simlac, not been lured to the fatal pursuit of Eustace of Boulogne, the Norman's would have been driven to their ships, and English history written in a different manner, and the descendants of Harold be seated directly, as they are seated indirectly on the English Throne. If the Emperor Napoleon had known of the sunken ditch of Otrain, the last desperate charge of the Imperial Guard at Waterloo might not have been made in vain, fierce Sir Richard desiring to obtain possession of the talisman the mystical National Policy which had brought victory to the Conservatives and defeat to the Liberals, dismounted from his steed of darkness, and lost the advantage he had obtained. The stout Sir Leonard who had gained strength Antea-like from his mother earth, and partaken of a draught from that crystal fountain, which for forty years had been his only beverage, retired within the leafy coverts of finance, where the little foxes play, and soon emerged therefrom with the largest loan at the smallest rate of interest—the fatest pullett from his opponents hen-roost. We all remember the excitement of these contests, how the fierce light of the London Stock Exchange dazzled our eyes, and the mystical mirage of lapsed balances led to optical and mental delusions. And so it was with a feeling of great pleasure I saw the past and present Ministers of Marine, like two tall admirals, nail their colours to the mast, and hoist the signal for action.

“As they drifted on their path,
There was silence deep as death
And the boldest held his breath
For a time.”

Like the soldiers of Xenophon we cried, Thelatta, as we heard the murmur of the sad sea waves and felt the fresh sea breeze fanning our heated brows. It was a contest of leviathans, a combat of marine monsters, which a great painter would have liked to depict. Mr. Green tells us in his history of the English people how the great Armada sailed in slow and stately and Spanish fashion to the conquest of our English land, and so the late Minister sailed in stately manner to the conquest of the present occupant of the Treasury Benches, but the hardy Islander, only waited for the word to spring upon his foe. We all know the result of that contest, which need not be repeated. We of the rank and file on both sides of the House, smelt the battle from afar, and like the Norman and Breton fishermen, waited quietly for the waifs and strays which might come to the shore, without caring for any nice questions of flatsam or jetsam which might arise. I think I have proved that the late Minister of Marine has deserved well of his country—has brought five millions of American dollars into the Treasury of the Dominion. He has founded a piscatorial aristocracy. He has conferred on us a genuine intellectual pleasure, and I now proceed to show how he secured for us a social recognition. A few years ago Canada was a terra incognita, a land of outside barbarians in which, socially speaking, there was much weeping and wailing and gnashing of teeth. To the average Englishman it was like that heath on which the weird sisters haled the Thaul of Cawdor, it was a “blawsted country.” It was a country in which many Englishmen had made investments in a great railway likely to be of a permanent character. It was a land of magnificent distances, of great forests, rushing rivers, great inland seas, and inhabited by a people that never calculated odds, and fancied they could hold their own against all-comers, as their fathers did in 1812. It was a land inhabited by people of diverse nationalities, by many Frenchmen, who preserved the ancient faith, gentle courtesy, and chivalrous gallantry of their Norman and Breton ancestors; by many Englishmen, Irishmen and Scotchmen, who had made for themselves fair homes in the wilderness, and were animated by devoted love to their Queen and undying love for the old lands beyond the sea. It was a land on which the people looked on toadies and flunkies much as the free Northmen looked on the creeping and crouching and crawling things which abased themselves before the Byzantine Emperors. It was a land without a literature of its own, but where the people were satisfied with the Bible, the Shakespeare, the Milton, the Bunyan, of their fathers. It was, with some drawbacks, a beautiful land waiting, like the statue made by Pygmalion, to be warmed into life by the caresses of its Creator. It was in this benighted land a new day was about to dawn, in which a new social evangel was about to be preached. The late hon. Minister of Marine had secured for us a great store of treasure, and founded a piscatorial aristocracy. He determined to procure for us social recognition. Accordingly, he despatched an eminent official, who combined the graces of a Chesterfield with the diplomatic talents of a Tallyrand, as Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary to the older civilizations. At first the Canadian Chesterfield was not as successful as we had a right to anticipate. An eminent statesman, who occupies a high place in the estimation of his countrymen, was at that time in England. Any compliment paid to him would have been regarded as a compliment paid to the Canadian people. It is true that we may mourn his peculiar proclivities, and regret that we are not able to fathom the mystery of his mystical minorities. We might regret his roaring speech at Aurora, and his unhappy allusion to the inhospitality of British Columbia; but for all that, he is a statesman of which any country might be proud. In the plenitude of his power, the Envoy Extraordinary determined to launch the bark of the statesman on the social sea; but man proposes and the Department disposes. In this country—in Canada—it is the man we consider, and not the clothes he wears; the head, and not the hat which covers it. In the older countries a different rule obtains, the clothes take precedence of the man, the hat of the head which covers it. For the first time we realise the full significance of the clothes philosophy, which is propounded by Mr Carlyle in Sartor Resartus. But one swallow does not make summer, and one defeat does not deter a great general. The Envoy Extraordinary, literally came, saw and conquered. His success were duly recorded in the journals of this arctic lumber village, to borrow the language of Mr. Goldwin Smith. As account after account reached us, those accounts which quickened the slow pulse of Canadian society, those accounts told us of breakfasts with barons, lunches with lords, and delicious dinners with dukes and duchesses, we felt that many cubits had been added to our Canadian stature, that at last we had been admitted to what Mr. Stanley calls the brotherhood of nations. It might have been thought, that after all these achievements, the Department would have been satisfied. It had created a navy, replenished the Treasury, founded a piscatorial aristocracy, and secured for us social recognition, but the French proverb says "l'appetit viendrai a mangeant." Mr. Buckle tells us, that there is no instance on record of a nation or individual having power without abusing it. The Department had the northern part of this continent on which to work its will, the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans with three marine miles of our coasts in which to cast its nets. All our magnificent inland seas, in which to promote the passions of the piscatorial tribes, every river and brook and rivulet within the Dominion was at its disposal. It had all the fishes in the sea, but it must have the fowls of the air as well. It was like Ahab, who although he cast his glance over the great expanse of moorland and mountain which composed his domain, could not keep the gleam of the grapes in poor Naboth's vineyard out of his covetous eyes. One would have thought that having almost a continent at their disposal, they might have left the county of Ottawa alone.

Mr. PATTERSON (Essex): After having listened to the eloquent address of the hon. member for Ottawa County, who has treated us to his classical quotations and poetical allusions, it must be felt that it would be a dangerous matter to infringe upon the dignity which doth hedge about the "King of the Gatineau," who has evidently ridden into town on his Pegasus this morning. With a view, not of controverting anything that has been said, but rather of bringing out all the papers necessary to understand this matter of the enforcement of the Game Laws by the Marine and Fisheries Department, I desire to move, that additional information be furnished by adding certain words to the motion. The hon. member for Ottawa has wandered very far afield from the solitary Dominion policeman on the little bay on the north shore of Ottawa county, who was the cause of all the trouble. The hon. gentleman's speech reminds one of the lecture of Artemus Ward on "Africa," the great feature of which was, that in a lecture occupying more than an hour in delivery, no reference was made to the dark continent. In order to put the question more fairly before the House, I purpose, with your permission, Mr. Speaker, reading a letter addressed by the Commissioner of Fisheries to the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. It is as follows:—

"DEPARTMENT OF MARINE AND FISHERIES,
"OTTAWA, 1st Oct., 1789.
"MEMORANDUM.

"Minister of Marine and Fisheries.

"In re further letter of Hon. Jas. Cockburn referred to the undersigned for particulars:—

"Copies of the previous correspondence to which the Hon. James Cockburn's present letter refers are herewith.

"Mr. Cockburn complains that my replies are impertinent, officious and evasive. I respectfully submit them to the hon. Minister's judgment, believing them and having intended them to be courteous, regular and satisfactory, as is proved by the following summary of the questions put and answers given:—

"Letter No. 1 asks if any and what 'bays, lands and marshes' on the north shore of the Ottawa River are reserved from the public. Also mentions an occurrence in connection with which it is asked if the same took place by my order or that of the Department; and by what authority or law two gentlemen were prevented from shooting near Buckingham wharf.

"Answered, by specifying the limits of reserves; and promising enquiry into the circumstances of the case mentioned. It was added the places referred to could only be visited for sport by consent of owners.

"Letter No. 2 states that this answer does not convey the information desired, and puts an entirely different question relative to a place which is assumed to be, but is not within the limits, and is known to be private property; and also asks if any person 'shooting snipe' thereon will be turned off by a policeman or other official of the Department.

"Answered, apologising if the reply failed to convey the information desired, and adding that the places to which his notes referred are not within the limits described. Also explaining at length the necessity for excluding the general public from places used in connection with fish-breeding.

"Letter No. 3 puts the same questions in a different shape, applying the enquiry as to persons shooting snipe 'on any of the marshes or bays on the Ottawa river,' being subject to interference by a Government policeman or other official under orders of the Department.

"Answered, that the rule adopted at all the fish-breeding places in the Dominion prevented strangers from using the premises without authority. Manifestly no answer was needed as affects any other of the places named, as it had been already stated in my first letter that they were private property, and could be used only by consent of the owners, with whom public officers (as such) had no connection. Besides, the shooting was not anywhere controlled by this Department.

"Letter No. 4 pronounces this civil and sufficient answer impertinent, and styles my previous replies officious evasions. They were written during your absence and in your name; this being the ordinary mode of conducting the office correspondence under official sanction. No answer was necessary. Meanwhile the two gentlemen whose 'case' Mr. Cockburn had in view made their statement and received explanations. One of them was satisfied; the other said he had consulted Mr. Cockburn and threatened a law-suit. The instance referred to proved to have been an entirely private affair, which occurred some four miles away from where the Government guardian is located, and outside of any reservation, as Mr. Cockburn admits. Knowing of the threatened law-suit by Mr. Cockburn's client, I was the more cautious in answering his enquiries; and it now seems to me that it is not because, as he pretends, the proper information was withheld, but because he did not elicit such replies as would commit either the Department, a policeman or myself, and afford some foundation for the intended suit."

MR. COCKBURN (West Northumberland): What is the hon. gentleman reading?

MR. PATTERSON (Essex) stated that he desired to justify the conduct of the official whose conduct had been under discussion. He read extracts from the official correspondence between Mr. Whitcher and the head of the Department and others upon the subject.

MR. COCKBURN asked if the hon.

MR. PATTERSON: Yes.

MR. COCKBURN (West Northumberland): Does the hon. gentleman, to whom the letter which is now being read was addressed, know that this official correspondence has been printed by Mr. Whitcher for the use of his friends outside of the Department? I think this is a very irregular course, and one which should at once be condemned by this House. The hon. gentleman is reading from a printed paper, which is a copy of the one addressed to the Minister. That paper has been printed by Mr. Whitcher for private use in this House, before the motion has been granted and before the papers have been ordered by this House to be made public.

MR. MACKENZIE: This cannot go any further. If the hon. gentleman is reading from papers belonging to the Fishery Department, and which have not been laid before this House, it is quite irregular. We are all as much entitled to these papers as he is. I ask the right hon. the First Minister to interfere.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: The interruption of the hon. member for West Northumberland (Mr. Cockburn) is quite irregular. The hon. gentleman who has the floor was reading some papers; when he is through we can judge. We can judge whether the Department of Marine and Fisheries has given documents out improperly, or for improper publication. The hon. gentleman can read any paper he likes. We can judge what it is when he gets through.

MR. COCKBURN: He has stated what he is reading.

MR. MACKENZIE: I understood him to say so.

MR. PATTERSON: I did not obtain it from the Department of Marine and Fisheries.

MR. COCKBURN: I have asked the hon. gentleman if he was reading a paper containing the remarks addressed by Mr. Whitcher to the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries; and he has admitted that he was reading a copy of an official document, which is one of the papers I have asked this House to order to be laid on the Table. It has been printed, as I am informed, for the use of the members without the knowledge of his chief; and if that is so it ought not to be read.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: That has to come out by-and-bye. The hon. gentleman is as much a member of this House as the hon. member for West Northumberland (Mr. Cockburn); they stand in exactly the same positions; the hon. member for West Northumberland read from papers; he had a right to read them, and so has the hon. member for Essex the same right. The question as to whether the documents have been properly or improperly put in print is another matter.

MR. COCKBURN (West Northumberland): I read from a paper which was addressed to me by the Department and became my private property the moment it was mailed to my address; but the hon. member for Essex (Mr. Patterson) is reading from the official records of the Department of Marine and Fisheries, and he has admitted that he is so reading.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I do not see why he should not read any document, if it is legitimately in his possession. Let us hear the whole case, and then we can judge. There is nothing irregular or improper in what the hon. gentleman has been doing.

MR. PATTERSON (Essex): Well, Sir, the letter which I was reading runs on as follows:—

“The spiteful attack on myself, made by his present letter No. 5, is probably as much in revenge, for failing to commit me in the interest of his client, as for a previous act connected with the dismissal of the late Fishery overseer, J. K. Cameron, by your predecessor, for which Mr. Cockburn has unjustly blamed me and openly avowed his intention to annoy or injure me. I am justified in supposing this as Mr. Cockburn mixes the trivial subject of his former letters, which, he says, consisted of a simple question; with new matter of a malicious kind, and thereby discloses his motive and the plausible tenor of his correspondence.

“The statements now made, and gratuitous assumptions advanced, relate chiefly to personal matters; and although I might properly decline to gratify Mr. Cockburn's desire by giving any explanation of private affairs, I will gladly do so in deference to the hon. Minister if so desired. Such of his remarks, however, as can be separated from the rest and replied to as public matter, are noticed as follows:—

“Mr. Cockburn asserts—‘It appears that Mr. Whiteher, while acting for the Department in certain fish-breeding arrangements, on the Ottawa River, acquired a personal interest in certain bays and marshes for the purpose of shooting game (I assume this to be the fact partly from his own words and partly from other information) and that under his orders the policemen or officers employed for the protection of the fish-breeding operations have acted as his special game-keepers and personal servants, and that they recently ordered from off certain of the marshes (not even within the limits of the lands held by the Department, as I am informed) certain gentlemen of this city who were merely engaged in the lawful sport of snipe-shooting, and who were not in any way interfering with fish-breeding, a process which, I believe, cannot be prosecuted where men can walk and where fish can swim.’

“I emphatically deny that ‘policemen’ or ‘officers’ employed by the Department are used by me as special game-keepers and personal servants—presumably at the public expense, for that is the only objection there could be against doing so; or that any such persons acted in a public capacity as Mr. Cockburn alleges towards certain gentlemen of this city. This latter fact has been already explained to the gentlemen in question. If I choose, or any other person chooses, to employ a policeman or fishery officer to work for me at my own expense, there is nothing ‘objectionable’ about it; and there is nothing ‘novel,’ for the Department allows salaried fishery officers to act as private guardians on the salmon rivers, and they are paid therefor by the lessees. It is an advantage to the public service, by enabling this Department to hire efficient men at salaries, their pay being supplemented by private contribution. Dominion policemen are also allowed to act apart from their regular duties at public places, or in business for private persons. Parliamentary and Departmental messengers notoriously perform many public services for public men and government officials, as well as for private citizens, that would hardly appear deserving of formal protest by any public man of many years' experience. There is certainly no novelty about the practice. Even clerks in the House of Commons, the Senate and other public offices, sometimes assist members and Ministers who may have professional or domestic affairs to conduct. Nobody thinks of seriously questioning the use of time, fuel, light, office accommodations, stationery, etc., etc., incident to this custom. There is an honourable understanding of the distinction between using and abusing such common privileges. But I claim that by paying for any personal service rendered to me by fishery constables or policemen (on or off duty) there is no room for reasonable objection, provided there is no interference with regular duties for which they are paid by the public.

“Respecting the practice of which Mr. Cockburn complains of allowing fishery officers to enforce the Game Laws, which are under control of the Provincial Governments, the same objections would apply to the Insectivorous Birds Act, and to that part of the Sabbath Observance Statute which relates to fishing on Sundays; also to the municipal law relating to the obstruction and pollution of streams. Occasion is taken to mention that formerly the game laws were enforced by fishery officers under occa.

sional instructions, and endeavours have been made to have these laws placed under jurisdiction of the Dominion Government. There was no additional cost, although some extra trouble, attending this arrangement, and it proved advantageous to both the fishery and public interests, as the persons who usually frequent the shooting places for water-fowl are the very persons who fish illegally, and also shoot fish in the bays and marshes; and when they have no 'lawful excuse' for being about these bays and other localities where fish and game abound, the expense and trouble of keeping them away is very much lessened. The Provincial authorities have always materially assisted Dominion officers in enforcing the Fishery Laws, so that we are every way gainers by the exchange. In fact the two services are so peculiarly related that the public interest in both of them would be greatly promoted by their combination under uniform authority. However, if the Minister, in view of the Hon. Mr. Cockburn's exception to the system, thinks it advisable to instruct the fishery officers in future to abstain from enforcing the game laws and other Provincial Acts, it will spare me considerable personal trouble and expense, and relieve all and singular of us from unremunerative and apparently thankless duty.

"Respectfully,

"W. F. WHITCHER,

"Commissioner of Fisheries."

The result of the correspondence was that a circular was issued to the Fishery Overseers of the Dominion, and this having been sent to me led me to enquire into the causes which induced the Department to issue this circular; and I find in the course of my enquiries that the Fishery Overseers have been the only parties acting in the preservation of game. Their services in that respect have been very great. I came into possession of the correspondence read to this House, in the course of my enquiries. It is to be regretted that there is a divided authority and that the game laws are not under the control of one Department, instead of being under dissimilar Provincial regulations, so that there could be a due enforcement of the game laws. In moving my amendment, I desire to establish some facts, but before they can be established the circular will need to be read; however, as the motion will call for the production of the circular I will not now trouble the House by reading it. It will be among the papers to be brought down under this motion, and it will be satisfactory evidence of the manner in which the Fishery Overseers have performed their duties. I therefore move the following amendment:—

MR. PATTERSON.

That the following words be added at the end of the said motion:—"including also reports and accounts of Dominion Policemen, or other officers, employed by the said Department in the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec during the same period, explaining what proportion, if any, of the expenses incurred by them in the service of protecting the Fisheries relates to the enforcement of any of the Provincial Statutes affecting hunting and fishing; together with a statement showing in what manner the Provincial authorities may have co-operated with Dominion officers in enforcing the Fishery Laws."

MR. MACKENZIE: I wish to call attention to the point I raised just now. The ground I took was that the hon. member for Essex could not read from official papers unless they were laid upon the Table of the House. The hon. gentleman disputed that. I am certain I was correct in my contention. I find it laid down in May, page 320, as follows:—

"A Minister is not permitted to read or quote from any despatch or other state paper unless he is prepared to lay it on the Table * * * The principle is so reasonable that it has not been contested, and, when the objection is made in time, it has been generally acquiesced in."

Then cases were cited in the British Parliament in 1865, in which this principle was maintained. A public document obtained from one of the Departments has been cited, and it must, therefore, according to the rule of Parliament, be laid on the Table of the House. Early in the Session, I complained that the hon. member who moved the Address was supplied with documents which he used in the debate and which were not laid upon the Table as I demanded. This practice ought to be put a stop to. It places every member at a disadvantage, except the hon. Minister or the hon. member to whom he gives documents of this kind. I, therefore, claim that this document should be at once laid on the Table, and ask your ruling.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: The hon. gentleman is quite right in claiming that the document should be laid on the Table for the use of hon. members. The rule is very properly laid down in May, when he says that no second-hand evidence can be given, but that the documents should be produced at once. But what I object to is that my hon. friend (Mr. Patterson) should be interrupted in the course of the discussion, on the ground that he was quoting an official document which could not be used until it was first laid upon the Table of the House. That objection is quite unsupported by the authority the hon. member (Mr. Mackenzie) read. Of course, the papers ought to be produced. In the remarks I made when I first spoke on the question, I vindicated the right of the hon. member for Essex (Mr. Patterson) to quote these documents. I thought he had quite as much right to use them as the hon. member for West Northumberland (Mr. Cockburn) had to use those he quoted. At the same time, I am bound to say that a very strong case has been made out by my hon. friend from West Northumberland, and I think also, while the hon. member for Essex had full right to answer him in such remarks as he thought proper to make, that, as far as the officer himself is concerned, if he placed the papers in the hands of the hon. member for Essex, he was guilty of an act of insubordination, and guilty of gross disrespect to the hon. Minister in charge of the Department. I think my hon. friend (Mr. Pope) will find it his duty to enquire how a subordinate officer, even though he may be mixed up directly or personally in the matter, dare take papers from his chief's hands, and place them in the hands of a member of Parliament. I think this matter should be fully enquired into, and, unless the fault is satisfactorily explained, the officer is worthy of censure. There is no doubt we have nothing to do with the preservation of game. We have full charge of all legislation respecting Navigation and Fisheries, and the duty of protecting the Fisheries is imposed upon the Dominion Government; but the game laws, from the conflict of jurisdiction between the Provinces and the Dominion, do not belong to the Federal Government, but are altogether in the hands of the Provincial authorities. Therefore, the Department of Marine and Fisheries, or its officials have nothing to do with the ferre nature in the various Provinces. I will also say that it was an ill-advised and improper act, and one which ought not to be countenanced, for anyone to take away the Dominion Police from their legitimate duties for the purpose of protecting the rights of any individual either as to fish or flesh. Those officers have specific duties to perform, and their becoming game keepers or fish inspectors does not form part of the duties assigned to them. The Dominion Police are here to guard the Government's property and they are to attend to such duties as are imposed upon them by the Government and the heads of the Departments with which they are connected. I feel bound to make these remarks, while at the same time vindicating the right of the hon. member for Essex to proceed with his speech without interruption; but, having made use of those papers, the hon. gentleman is bound, at the request of an hon. member, to lay them upon the Table. I will say further that, if the suspicion of the hon. member for West Northumberland is well-founded that the officer has taken official documents and got them printed and circulated, without the knowledge of the hon. Minister of the Department, he is guilty of an act of insubordination.

MR. SPEAKER: There is no doubt that the practice is that, when a member reads a document, he must be ready to lay it upon the Table of the House.

MR. MACKENZIE: I want to see those documents before the debate proceeds.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I will not ask that it be done, but really the hon. member for West Northumberland is bound to lay his papers before the House as well.

MR. PATTERSON (Essex): The document I read was part of the document read by the hon. member for West Northumberland, and I ask that he put his papers before the House.

MR. COCKBURN: I shall put in all mine with the greatest pleasure. But I think the hon. member had better put his in, because I will be able to show that there is a misprint or change in the paper.

MR. POPE (Queen's, P. E. I.): I have not the slightest objection to lay before the House every paper asked for, and all the information it is possible to give. It appears that there is a pond down the Ottawa river, which was purchased in March, 1878, while the late Government was in power, for the purpose of breeding fish. A large quantity of fish has been put into that pond, and some of the adjoining streams, which have been leased or purchased, I do not know which, but not with my authority. Officers have been kept down there to protect those fish. As soon as it was represented to me that some of the sportsmen visiting that neighbourhood had been interfered with, I enquired whether any instructions had been issued from the Department to the Fishery officers authorising them to interfere in any way in the protection of game. I was informed that no such instructions had been given. I saw, however, that there was something in the charge, and I caused instructions to be issued to the Fishery officers, informing them that the protection of game formed no part of their duty, and forbidding any interference in that direction for the future. On the 29th September, I received the hon. member's letter complaining that some correspondence had taken place during my absence between the Commissioner of Fisheries and himself, and that not receiving satisfactory explanations from Mr. Whitcher, he had decided to apply to me. I at once sent this letter to Mr. Whitcher and asked him for a report. Two or three days afterwards I was called away to the deathbed of my brother. When I returned, I found an accumulation of business awaiting me, and some delay occurred before the hon. gentleman received an answer. I apologised for the delay, giving the reasons for it, and stated that positive instructions had been given to Fishery officers not to interfere in the future. I do not see why the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Wright) should complain about any interference with the fishermen. No complaint or charge has been made to that effect, and so far as I know there has been no interference. If the hon. gentleman has any complaints to make to the effect that those people have been improperly treated and deprived of their rights by officers of the Department, not a moment will be lost in correcting the offence, and putting his constituents on as good a footing as any others in the Dominion. There are certain regulations which must be carried out, and I know the hon. member's constituents feel it a hardship to conform to those regulations at all times, and to abstain from fishing in the close season. The hon. member for West Northumberland seems to complain of my sending him Mr. Whitcher's report. I did it with the best feeling in the world; I wanted to show him what the report was, and, although some of the language reflected upon him, I thought it was right he should see the report. With reference to the printed correspondence, I know nothing at all about it. The papers were not issued from the office with my knowledge, and I therefore repudiate all connection with them. There is no law authorising Fishery officers to interfere with the protection of game, and any such interference was without my knowledge or consent.

Mr. WHITE (North Renfrew) : I believe that, if Mr. Whitcher has overstepped the duties appertaining to his office, he has done so with a desire to preserve the game in this particular district. From my knowledge of the destruction of game throughout the Ottawa district, I think it would be desirable if some arrangement could be made between the Dominion and Local Governments of Ontario and Quebec, to protect the game, under the supervision of the Fishery Department. In this district, during 1878 and 1879, a large number of moose and red-deer were recklessly destroyed out of season. I merely rose to throw out the suggestion that, if it were possible to bring about some arrangement between the Local and Dominion Governments for the preservation of game, under the supervision of the Fishery Overseers, a very desirable object would be attained.

Mr. COCKBURN (West Northumberland) : There seems to be an entire misapprehension on the part of the hon. gentleman who has just sat down as to the object of the motion. These proceedings which called it forth have not been taken in the interest of game protection. We are all agreed, I think, that anything that can be legally done for the purpose of saving and protecting the game of the country ought to be done. There is here certainly a pretence of that kind which has been very sedulously put forth with a view of excusing and justifying this high-handed action; but the sole object of Mr. Whitcher was to get the whole of this shooting for his own gun; it was not to protect the game for the general good, but for his own individual good at the expense of everybody else. The right hon. gentleman has put the case very clearly, as he always does, and I am satisfied and think my hon. friend the member for Ottawa county (Mr. Wright) is also, that the object we had in view has been gained by the very clear statement of the law as regards this subject, and the duties of public officers, which has thus been laid down. I just wish to remind the hon. member for Essex (Mr. Patterson) of one thing: I rose to complain that I, as a member of Parliament, in making a charge against a public officer—which anyone will admit I made in proper language—was doing nothing out of the way, but was performing a public duty; and I insisted that, in doing so, my motives were not to be enquired into by any official in any of the Departments; that the hon. gentleman who ventured to do that was going altogether beyond the line of his duty. I stated to the House that that report of the Commissioner of Fisheries was moreover untrue as regards the motives assigned to myself. I used, deliberately, the word "untrue." The hon. gentleman should have allowed my statement to go unchallenged. Every hon. member who rises in his place, and makes a statement, with his hand on his heart, of his own knowledge, must be accepted as speaking the truth. I think, therefore, it was not for the hon. gentleman, after hearing my statement, to allow himself to be made the medium of conveying to this House what I assure him is a slander. The printed statement which he read is not even a correct copy of the one that was officially sent to me. It has been altered. Mr. Witcher himself, having found that the most momentous part of the charge against me which he made to the hon. Minister was untenable, altered it. I think, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member for Essex should not for a moment have lent himself to give currency to a false statement.

Mr. CURRIER: It appears to me that the complaint made against the Commissioner of Fisheries has arisen altogether in consequence of the custom that has prevailed, not only here, but elsewhere, of the guardians of the Fisheries Department looking after the game as well, which they have had no authority to do. Yet that custom has prevailed for years, though not altogether regular. Still those officers have performed a good work, not in protecting the game for any individual, but for its increase in the interest of the public.

Mr. COCKBURN (West Northumberland): That is not the matter I was dealing with.

Mr. CURRIER: Notwithstanding the complaints against the Fishery officers, they have done a good work on the Ottawa in setting up the fish-breeding establishment, which has, to a very large extent, replenished this river with fish. I hope the Government will encourage that establishment with such appropriations as the case requires. I think that the officer complained of has been greatly instrumental in overcoming the difficulties that existed in connection with the throwing of mill-rubbish into the river. The fish-breeding establishment has settled to a large extent the question as to the effect of this rubbish upon the fish, by proving that sawdust is not detrimental to them, since, in spite of the sawdust, the river could be restocked with fish in so short a time.

Mr. COCKBURN (West Northumberland): Have they done so?

Mr. CURRIER: Everybody along the river says so. Mr. Witcher may have exceeded his duty in using the Government Police, but I believe him to be an efficient officer, and that he acted without selfish motive throughout.

Mr. WRIGHT: I remember hearing of a very distinguished gentleman who made a fortune by minding his own business. I think that perhaps the Department of Marine might take that lesson to heart. Its business is to look after the fish and not the fowl. The hon. member for Ottawa City (Mr. Currier) appears a little confused on the subject. He speaks of the great sawdust question having been settled, and of the benefits of the fish-breeding establishment. I do not think that the cultivation of a few mud-pouts and suckers in the waters of my county has secured a satisfactory solution of this fish question. I should have hoped it had; but my object has been to complain that my constituents have been most unfairly and illegally dealt with, so far as their rights and liberties are concerned, by the officers of the Department, who had no right, as admitted by everyone, to take charge of the fowl. I have my desk full of letters complaining of this interference.

My constituents, many of them French Canadians, have complained of being turned off the sporting grounds by policemen. The people say they think they have a right to shoot so long as there is no law against it. The defence of this action should not be rested upon the fact of the accused being an efficient or desirable officer; he should not be allowed to act simply for his own benefit and that of his friends. That conduct cannot and should not be tolerated.

MR. PATTERSON (Essex): I had no desire to impugn the veracity of the hon. member for West Northumberland (Mr. Cockburn). He had read certain passages of a document and denied their truth, when I thought it would be only just to Mr. Whitcher that the whole document should be read. It was in that spirit I read it. But I had no desire in reading it to express the least doubt as to the accuracy of anything the hon. gentlemen said.

MR. MACKENZIE: The attention of the Government ought to be directed to the very extraordinary passage in that letter justifying the employment of the Dominion Police. Explanations were sought for by the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), a few evenings ago, with regard to the increase of the vote for Dominion Police, and were given. Now, if a Dominion Policeman may be employed, when off duty, for an hour or two, in doing something about the city, that is one thing allowable; but, if he is taken to guard game, he may be away whilst he should be discharging his proper duties. It is quite clear those policemen have been employed for this purpose; therefore, they must have had nothing to do here. There must have been too many of them, or they could not have been spared for this service. I was glad to hear the hon. the First Minister condemn the whole practice.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I believe the number of Dominion Policemen is the same as under the late Government. It is quite improper that these men should be taken away from their legitimate duties to perform others, however good.

MR. MACKENZIE: With regard to the number of those Policemen, we discovered during the last year of our incumbency of office that two of them had erred during the whole of our term, guarding the ducts of this House from incursions by Fenians. So there were ducts to protect.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: That is another kind of game.

MR. MACKENZIE: Yes; but none of this game was to be found, after all, in the neighbourhood. Those two men might be taken to supplement the Force, or for other purposes.

MR. MACDOUGALL: I think the House ought not to assent too readily to the suggestion that these Dominion Policemen should be confined to their duties in the neighbourhood of these buildings, or in Ottawa, if they can be used for those public purposes clearly within the jurisdiction of this Government, without impropriety. It has long been the practice to use the force in this way—one continued under both political parties. It seems, from the statement of the hon. the First Minister, which has met with the approval of the hon. leader of the Opposition, that that practice of occasionally employing the force on outside service, in cases of exigency, is now to be abandoned. I fear that will involve the appointment of other officers. If economy is to be the result, I do not object, but I doubt if the Dominion Police Force can be much retrenched. Occasions may arise when it will be convenient to have a confidential force near these Ottawa buildings. We have seen the necessity for such a force, and may see it again. I think we cannot safely dispense with an organisation which can be used in the absence of any regular military force; and, therefore, if the Fisheries Department, in the protection of the inland fisheries, a duty clearly within its jurisdiction—though I have doubts as to rivers and brooks—can utilise the force for that purpose—and we have the testimony of the member for Ottawa (Mr. Currier) that they have done so with good results.—I do not see why they should not continue the practice. I, too, can bear my testimony to the great efficiency of Mr. Whitcher, and to the important services he has rendered, not only to this particular interest, the Inland Fishery Service, but on the larger theatre at Washington and Halifax, in matters of international importance. I am very sorry to hear complaints against him, as he was one of my own officers, when as

MR. WRIGHT.

Commissioner of Crown Lands, I directed this service many years ago; very sorry to find that, his temper being, perhaps, a little irritable, he has found himself at cross purposes with the hon. member for West Northumberland (Mr. Cockburn)—a very amiable gentleman, as we all know. I think it would have been better if he had pursued a different course; but I understand the hon. gentleman to be now satisfied with the assurance given that, hereafter, the Fisheries Department will not interfere with the fowls of the air, or with the sporting constituents of the hon. member for Ottawa county (Mr. Wright). Perhaps it may not be necessary to bring down these papers, after the explanations we have received from the hon. the Minister of Fisheries. While regretting this difficulty, I trust that, notwithstanding the tone of censure of the hon. the First Minister, no measures of severity will be taken against Mr. Whiteher. So far as he has laid down the law in respect to the proper functions of this Government, and the duties of Dominion officers, I entirely agree with him. If the Fisheries Department is to perform, efficiently, its delicate, difficult and important duties in the protection of our Inland Fisheries, it must receive on all proper occasions the support, confidence and generous cooperation of this House.

MR. MACKENZIE: The hon. member for Halton (Mr. Macdougall) mistakes my meaning if he thinks I object to the employment of the Dominion Police upon any other than objects connected with these Buildings. The late Government had occasionally to employ members of the force in connection with charges of coining spurious money in several districts, and that was, though they were remote from this city, a perfectly legitimate employment for those officers. No doubt, the force is somewhat larger than it otherwise would be, on account of having to be employed sometimes in other services than these Buildings would require.

Motion agreed to.

CARLETON (ONT.) ELECTION.—INTER-FERENCE OF HON. R. W. SCOTT.

MOTION FOR COMMITTEE OF ENQUIRY.

MR. ROCHESTER moved:

That Mr. Rochester, Member for Carleton,

having stated in his place in the House, that at the last election of a member of this House for the County of Carleton, the Hon. R. W. Scott, a member of the Senate, and then occupying the position of Secretary of State, did interfere and intimidate in the said election by furnishing money to the Rev. John May, to induce him to become a candidate at the said election, and that the said Hon. R. W. Scott did offer to bribe one John A. Grant, also at said election, to withdraw from the contest in favour of the said May, a Committee be appointed to examine and investigate into the said charges, and that such Committee be composed of Messrs. McCarthy, Thompson (Haldimand), Colby, Trow and Richey, with power to send for persons and papers.

MR. MACKENZIE: I presume the hon. gentleman, at the head of the Government, has not looked after this motion, else he would have made some statement of his views upon it. In the first place it charges the Hon. Mr. Scott with having furnished money to the Rev. John May to induce him to become a candidate at the said election. I would have no hesitation in inducing any friend of mine to become a candidate, if I could help him to pay his legitimate expenses at the election. There is nothing in that charge that should even be mentioned in this House, or anywhere else. The second charge is of a somewhat similar character. Why we should appoint a Committee to investigate charges of this kind does not appear to me very clear. I may say that I have had no communication with the Hon. Mr. Scott on the subject, nor had I looked at the Order Paper in advance to-day, nor even thought of doing so; but if there is anything whatever that comes properly in the nature of a charge, that charge should be brought where the hon. gentleman is a member himself. If there is anything that requires enquiring into, it is questionable if this is the mode of making the enquiry. I do not think there is any precedent for such a course upon our Journals, nor am I aware that there are any anywhere else. There was a charge, two or three years ago, brought against the present Governor of Manitoba, for having in some way intimidated the electors in the county of Montmorency, and that it was framed upon a statement made by a member of the House, when it was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections and enquired into. That Committee in their report, exonerated the hon. gentleman from all blame in the matter. Except that case I cannot recall to mind anything of a similar kind. But the charge made against the Hon. Mr. Cauchon was clearly an offence under the Election Law; he was a member of the House where the charge was made, and the House undoubtedly acted with propriety in sending them to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. This is wholly of a different character. The party against whom the charge is made is not one over whom this House has any control. The offences are not alleged to be contrary to any Statute in existence. The first part of the motion, it is perfectly clear, cannot possibly be a charge of any kind. No power is vested in us to make any enquiry of the kind suggested. I am sure the hon. gentleman at the head of the Government has not observed the phraseology of this motion, or considered the propriety of making this motion at all, or he would have drawn the attention of the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Rochester) to it.

MR. ROCHESTER: The hon. member for Lambton has, perhaps, forgotten that the Hon. Mr. Scott was then Secretary of State in his Government. I do not for a moment pretend that every hon. Minister has not as much right as any other person to use his due influence in securing the success of an election. But what I complain of is the undue method taken by the hon. gentleman to gain this election. At the last Session I explained to the House the reasons I had for putting this motion on the Notice Paper. I do not think it necessary to go over that again, unless the hon. gentleman opposite desires me to do so. What I complain of is that this hon. member of the late Government sent the employés of the Government into the two counties adjoining the city of Ottawa as canvassers and as returning officers, carrying their confrères to and from this city to the polls, and hiring buggies and paying for them. Now, Sir, what I want to know is who paid all the expenses. If a member of the late Government did so, although he may not be a member of this House, I think he is amenable to this House. Perhaps I am wrong in this—there are better authorities than myself on that point. My object is to show just what course the Hon. Mr. Scott pursued during the late election. The gentleman, whose name is mentioned in this resolution, styled himself on the hustings at the nomination, "A Tory of the deepest water." I quote his own words. Now, the late Secretary of State took hold of the Rev. Mr. May, who, unfortunate man that he was, like somebody else of old, sold his birthright for a mess of pottage. He sold himself for filthy lucre to run his election with, and to get the influence of the Government of the day, and to secure his return to Parliament. The hon. gentleman in his communications with some of the electors of the county, stated his object in supporting my opponent. His object was to buy over a Conservative in the interests of the Reform Government. He found that he could not run a Reformer in the county of Carleton. The hon. gentleman, in some of those letters, stated that the county of Carleton was not sufficiently well educated to accept a Reformer. I am glad to say it was not, and I hope it never will be. The hon. gentleman thought that the best course for him to pursue was to purchase a Tory, and run him as a Tory with the understanding that if he got in he was to support the Administration of the day. This I will have no trouble to prove if the Government will give us this Committee, and I have no doubt the hon. member for Lambton will be able to throw some light on the subject; for, if I am correctly informed, he was approached but did not give those who approached him any encouragement. The hon. gentleman's answer was to the effect that if a man would sell himself one way he would as readily sell himself another.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH: What did he get for himself.

MR. ROCHESTER: I am informed he wanted a certain amount of money with which to pay off certain liabilities and also to pay his election expenses. From all the information we can get, he got the amount he required. Where he got it from, I think it will be interesting for us to know. An hon. gentleman, a Reformer, came out to run for the county of Carleton; the Hon. Mr. Scott was approached on the subject, but he replied that he must run Mr. May. I want, also, to prove before the Committee what every member of the House must admit is a great wrong. It is not right that Civil servants should be used for the purpose of canvassing for votes for the support of the Government. This, however, was extensively done. I think it only just that the matters I have referred to should come to light; especially as the present stringent Election Law was adopted by the hon. gentlemen opposite, and they were found to be the first to break it. I have received the following letter from Mr. May :

“ To John Rochester, Esq., M.P.

“ SIR,—According to the published report of a speech delivered by you in the House of Commons, I am charged by you with certain nefarious dealings respecting the late contest in the county of Carleton, with the Hon. R. W. Scott, late Secretary of State. If the report of that part of this speech which refers to me be this, that I was bought by the late Government. You further stated that it was your intention to ask for a committee to investigate the charge. I have waited patiently for the fulfilment of this announcement, I have waited in vain. No committee has been granted as yet. No committee has been asked for. Might I presume most respectfully to enquire, ‘Why this delay?’ Is it not cruel to keep Mr. Scott and myself so long in suspense? I can speak for myself—I am ready to meet such committee, I am more than ready, I am anxious to meet such committee. I feel that my character has been traduced—traduced in the most public manner, and in a place where reply was impossible. And I now take the liberty of endeavouring to impress on your mind the fact that, having made the statement above mentioned, and having intimated from your place in the House that you intended to ask for a committee, it is your bounden duty to do so. I would further remark that if you fail to make good your promise, I shall ascribe such failure to the supposition that you are not nearly so willing to meet a committee that will admit evidence on both sides of the electoral contest in Carleton, as I am myself.

“I have sent a copy of this letter to the local press and to the Globe and Mail of Toronto.

“I have the honor to be, Sir,

FISHERY AWARD—CLAIMS OF THE MARITIME PROVINCES.

ADJOURNED DEBATE.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion, (Mr. MacDonnell, Inverness). —[vide page 787.]

MR. KILLAM: I desire to ask if the papers in relation to this subject, which the hon. the Minister of Finance stated, were necessary to its proper consideration, and which he also stated would be laid upon the Table this afternoon, will be brought down this evening.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: What I stated was that papers were being prepared which it was necessary the Government should have, before proceeding with this discussion. From this statement the inference was drawn by some hon. gentlemen that these papers would be laid upon the Table of the House. I am willing, however, to lay the papers upon the Table. I have made enquiries concerning them, and I expect they will be laid on the Table of the House before the conclusion of this debate.

MR. RICHEY: I do not require any further papers than are already before the House for the line of argument which I propose to adopt. Before proceeding to the main portion of it, I may be permitted to offer a few observations regarding the course pursued by hon. gentlemen on the opposite side of the House when this question was last under discussion, and followed up in some quarters by their supporters in the press. I think it very objectionable that, in a matter of this kind, hon. gentlemen should resort to the fierce party denunciations in which they have indulged. I submit, that in regard to a question, the solution of which must very largely depend, if it do not entirely depend, upon the impression to be made on the minds of the members of the Administration, fiery declamation cannot be expected to produce any very beneficial effect. When, on behalf of the Government, the request was addressed to this House that an adjournment of the motion should be granted. I felt it to be due, in courtesy, that the adjournment should take place. The motion I then made did not stifle discussion. And what is the position in which we now find the question? Instead of having it at the end of Public Bills and Orders it has, at the request of the right hon. the leader of the Government himself, been placed in the most prominent position. And when it was found inconvenient to proceed with it on Wednesday evening last, the hon. leader of the Government, in the frankest possible manner, offered to give us the following day, a Government day, for the discussion of this matter. We should have had it before us then had it not been for the technical objection taken by the hon. leader of the Opposition. And now, Sir, I find that I am represented in the Halifax Chronicle, by some one having facilities afforded him for hearing debates in this House, and acting as correspondent to that journal, in the following light:—

“After recess, on the adjourned debate concerning the Fisheries Award being called,

“Mr. Richey said the motion should be allowed to stand, and it stood accordingly. This gave profound offence to the Maritime members, who were all ready and expectant of a debate on this much-canvassed subject. Mr. Richey's action was, therefore, received with marks of discontent. It was evident that he was merely acting as a catpaw for the Government, who appear determined to stifle the discussion till such a late period in the Session that it can be of no practical purpose.”

There are just eleven lines in that paragraph and a misstatement for every line. Mr. Richey after the original adjournment did not once ask that the motion should be allowed to stand. It was, as I understand, a matter arranged between the hon. the First Minister and the hon. leader of the Opposition. There was no desire manifested on the part of the Government to stifle discussion.

MR. MACKENZIE: Did I understand the hon. gentleman to say that I had made an arrangement with the hon. leader of the Government to adjourn the discussion.

MR. RICHEY: No; but there was an understanding between the hon. leader of the Government and the hon. leader of the Opposition that it should be proceeded with as early as possible. He then objected to its being taken up on a Government day.

MR. MACKENZIE: The hon. gentleman is mistaken. What I said was that I had no objection to their giving up their day, but they must do it in the regular way, by taking up the Orders in their natural sequence and moving either to take each Order separately and pass them over, or move to pass on immediately to that particular Order. That is what I proposed, and the Government declined to do that.

MR. RICHEY: Whatever it was it had the effect of stopping the discussion until the present moment; and I think the position given to this question was the best justification of our confidence that the Government had no desire to stifle debate.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I think this is a matter that ought to be settled at once, and with my hon. friend's permission, I will state, to the best of my recollection, how it stands. I stated to the House that it was inconvenient, for the reasons mentioned by my hon. friend, to go on with it at that time, that I would secure him an early opportunity of bringing it on. I said it would be done as the first Order of the Day. My hon. friend objected to this and stated we must call the Orders in turn. I felt the objection taken by the hon. gentleman was a Parliamentary one, and a correct one, therefore, I could only submit.

MR. MACKENZIE: The hon. gentleman consented to give up Thursday, Government day, and as Government Notices have precedence next after Routine Business, the Order for Thursday was Government Measures, and this Order was naturally succeeded Government Orders. It was perfectly competent to move that the First Order of the Day be not taken up, but that the House pass on to the First Order of Public Business. It is one not frequently made with us but it is one that is frequently made in the French Chamber. The Order was that it should be the First Order of the Day, and it was either the First Order or it was nothing.

MR. RICHEY: It is not because I attach any importance, personally, to this matter, that I have thought it necessary to mention it at the commencement of my remarks, but because I deem it a great impropriety for writers, who are here for the purpose of communicating with the press in different sections of the country, to draw upon their inventive powers for the items they supply. I shall now, Mr. Speaker, proceed with the argument which I desire to address to this House. When, in 1872, the question was put in this place, “Whether the Government was prepared to give a pledge that the money compensation which might be obtained by virtue of the Fishery Clause of the Washington Treaty, should be expended for the direct benefit and improvement of our sea Fisheries?” The right hon. gentleman who was then, as he is now the leader of the Government, replied that such money would be subject to the vote and pleasure of Parliament; and when asked the further question: "Whether any arrangement had been made between Her Majesty's Britannic Government and that of the Dominion?" He said no arrangement had been made; the money would belong to Canada and be subject to the vote of Parliament. The cause is, therefore, before the proper tribunal this evening, and I may here remark that it was due to the astuteness and prevision of that right hon. gentleman that no question could arise as to the claim of the Dominion to the Award. I wish to quote, at some length, in proof of this, and for other impartial reasons connected with my argument, from a speech delivered when the right hon. gentleman introduced the Bill to give effect to the Treaty. In referring to the fact that this amount had been secured for Canada, he said:

"I did not for a moment forget that I was there to represent the interests of Canada. I must ask you to look at the despatch of 16th February, 1871, which reached me at Washington, a few days after I arrived there. It will be seen that Lord Kimberly used this expression: "As at present advised Her Majesty's Government are of opinion that the right of Canada to exclude Americans from fishing in the waters within the limits of three marine miles of the coast, is beyond dispute, and can only be ceded for an adequate consideration. Should this consideration take the form of a money payment, it appears to Her Majesty's Government, that such an arrangement would be more likely to work well than if any conditions were annexed to the exercise of the privilege of fishing within the Canadian waters." Having read that despatch, and the suggestion that any arrangement might be made on the basis of a money payment, and there being an absence of any statement that such an arrangement would only be made with the consent of Canada, I thought it well to communicate with my colleagues at Ottawa; and although we had received, again and again, assurances from Her Majesty's Government that those rights would not be affected, given away, or ceded, without our consent, it was thought advisable, in consequence of the omission of all reference to the necessity of Canada's assent being obtained to any monetary arrangement, to communicate by cable that Canada considered the Canadian Fisheries to be her property, and they could not be sold without her consent. That communication was made by the Canadian Government on the 10th March, and of that Government I was a member; and not only did that communication proceed from the Canadian Government to England, giving them fair notice that the Canadian Government, of which I was so a member, would insist upon the right of dealing with her own Fisheries, but I took occasion to press upon the Head of the British Commission at Washington, that my own individual opinion, as representing Canada, should be laid before Her Majesty's Government. The answer that came back at once by cable was extended in full in the despatch of the 17th March, 1871, and it was most satisfactory; as it stated that Her Majesty's Government had never any intention of advising Her Majesty to part with those Fisheries without the consent of Canada. Armed with this, I felt that I was relieved of a considerable amount of my embarrassment. I felt that no matter what arrangements might be made, no matter whether I was out-voted by my colleagues on the Commission, or what instructions might be given by Her Majesty's Government, the interests of Canada were safe, because they were in her own hands, and reserved for her own decision. Now, Mr. Speaker, it must not be supposed that this was not a substantial concession on the part of Her Majesty's Government. It is true that Lord Kimberly stated in his despatch of 17th March, that "When the Reciprocity Treaty was concluded, the Acts of the Nova Scotia and New Brunswick Legislatures relating to the Fisheries were suspended by Acts of those Legislatures, and the Fishery rights of Canada are now under the protection of a Canadian Act of Parliament, the repeal of which would be necessary in case of the cession of those rights to any foreign powers." It is true, in one sense of the word, but it also true that if Her Majesty, in the exercise of Her power, had chosen to make a Treaty with the United States, ceding not only those rights, but ceding the very land over which those waters flow, that Treaty between England and the United States would have been binding, and the United States would have held England to it. No matter how unjust to Canada, after all her previous promises, still that Treaty would be a valid and obligatory Treaty between England and the United States, and the latter would have had the right to enforce its provisions, override any Provincial Laws and Ordinances, and take possession of our waters and rights. It would have been a great wrong, but the consequences would have been the loss, practically, of our rights for ever; and so it was satisfactory that it should be settled as it has been settled, without a doubt appearing upon the records of the Conference at Washington. Now, the recognition of the proprietary right of Canada in her Fisheries forms a portion of the State Papers of both countries. Now the rights of Canada to those Fisheries are beyond dispute; and it is finally established that England cannot, and will not, under any circumstances whatever, cede those Fisheries without the consent of Canada. So that in any future arrangement between Canada and England, or England and the United States, the rights of Canada will be respected, as it is conceded beyond dispute that England has not the power to deprive Canada of them. We may now rest certain that for all time to come England will not, without our consent, make any cession of these interests. Now, Mr. Speaker, to come to the various subjects which interest Canada more particularly. I will address myself to them in detail; and first, I will consider the question of most importance to us, the one on which we are now specially asked to legislate, that which interests Canada as a whole most particularly, and which interests the Maritime Provinces especially. I mean the Articles of the Treaty with respect to our Fishery rights. I would, in the first place, say that the protocols which accompany the Treaty, and which are in the hands of every member, do not give chronologically an every day account of the transactions of the Conference, although, as a general rule, I believe the protocols of such Conferences are kept from day to day; but it was thought better to depart from the rule on this occasion, and only to record the conclusions arrived at. Therefore, while the protocols substantially contain the result of the negotiations ended in the Treaty, they must not be looked upon as chronological details of facts and incidents as they occurred. I say so because the protocol which relates more especially to the Fisheries would lead one to suppose that at the first meeting, and without previous discussion, the British Commissioners stated 'That they were prepared to discuss the question of the Fisheries, either in detail or generally so as either to enter into an examination of the respective rights of the two countries under the Treaty of 1818, and the general law of nations, or to approach at once the settlement of the question on a comprehensive basis.' Now the fact is that it was found by the British Commissioners, when they arrived at Washington, and had an opportunity of ascertaining the feeling that prevailed at that time, not only among the United States Commissioners, but among the public men of the United States whom they met there, and from their communications with other sources of information, that the feeling was universal, that all questions should be settled beyond the possibility of dispute in the future, and more especially that if by any possibility a solution of the difficulty respecting the Fisheries could be arrived at, or a satisfactory arrangement made by which the Fishery question could be placed in abeyance as in 1854, it would be to the advantage of both nations."

I desire to congratulate the right hon. gentleman upon having so completely settled that question as to the right of Canada to the Fishery Award. But I am led to ask, if these Fisheries belong to the Dominion of Canada, by what right did they become hers? They are hers through the several Provinces on whose coasts they lie. One main point, then, which I think it concerns us to consider is, that these several Provinces entered this Confederation with certain defined limits, and we have to ask what were those limits? and what, within these limits, did the Provinces surrender and what did they reserve? I need not refer to the British North America Act to settle that point. Its language is doubtless familiar to every hon. gentleman within the range of my voice. It provides that "The Provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick shall have the same limits as at the passing of this Act." Before seeking to define those limits, I may premise that grants made of those Provinces to private subjects of old time, both by the Kings of France and the Kings of England, included the Fisheries connected with them, for the fisheries and the fur trade at that time were regarded as the greatest value attaching to these colonies and in the grants from the King of France they were specifically included, as also in the grants from the Kings of England. I may refer especially to that from Cromwell to Sir Charles Latour, the language of which is, after describing a large tract of country, "and including all the islands and fisheries upon the coasts." But to come to the period when, after varying fortunes, the Province of Nova Scotia was, by the Treaty of Utrecht, ceded to the Crown of England, I would draw your attention to the words of that Treaty in connection with the question as to the limits of Nova Scotia, and whether they embraced the Fisheries:

"The Most Christian King shall take care on the same day, that the ratifications of the present peace shall be exchanged, to have delivered, to the Queen of Great Britain, solemn and authentic letters or instruments, by virtue whereof the Island of St. Christopher is to be possessed alone, hereafter, by British subjects; likewise Nova Scotia or all Acadia, with its ancient limits, as also the city of Port-Royal, now called Annapolis-Royal, and all other things in those regions, which depend on the said lands and islands, together with the dominions, property and possessions, and all right whatsoever, whether by Treaties or any other way acquired, which the Most Christian King, the Crown of France, or any of its subjects have hitherto had to the said islands, lands, and places, and inhabitants thereof to be yielded and transferred to the Queen of Great Britain and to Her Crown for ever as the Most Christian King now yields and transfers all the said particulars; and that in such ample manner and form that the subjects of the Most Christian King shall, hereafter, be excluded from all kind of fishing in the said seas, bays and other places on the coasts of Nova Scotia, that is to say, on those which lie towards the south-east, within thirty leagues, beginning from the Island commonly called Sable, inclusively and thence going towards the south-west."

Upon a question subsequently arising between England and France respecting the boundaries, Commissioners were appointed for the adjustment of the dispute. Hon. gentlemen by glancing at a map will see what was the extent of the boundaries claimed by the Commissioners on the part of England as set forth in the following statement:—

“On the west, towards New England, by the River Penobscot, otherwise called Pentagoet: that is to say, beginning at its mouth, and from thence drawing a straight line towards the north to the river of St. Lawrence, or the Great River of Canada; on the north by that river all along as far as Cape Roziers, situated at its entrance; on the east by the great Gulf of St. Lawrence, from Cape Roziers to the south-east, by the Islands of Cape Breton, leaving these and the Gulf on the right, and Newfoundland and the Islands belonging to it on the left, unto the cape or promontory called Cape Breton; on the south by the great Atlantic Ocean, going south-west from Cape Breton by Cape Sable, taking in the Island of that name round to the Bay of Fundy, as far as the mouth of the River Penobscot or Pentagoet.”

Although the negotiations between these Commissioners were fruitless, it was ultimately settled by the Treaty of Versailles, in 1763, what should be the limit of Nova Scotia. I shall now quote from Haliburton's “History of Nova Scotia,” vol. 2, pp. 1 and 2, which says:

“To the northward, our said Province shall be bounded by the southern boundary of our Province of Quebec, as far as the western extremity of the Bay des Chaleurs; to the eastward by the said bay and the Gulf of St. Lawrence, to the cape or promontory called Cape Breton, in the Island of that name, including that Island, the Island of St. John's, and all other Islands within six leagues of the coast; to the southward by the Atlantic Ocean from the said cape to Cape Sable, including the Island of that name, and all other islands within forty leagues of the coast, with all the rights, appurtenances whatsoever there-to belonging; and to the westward, although our said Province hath anciently extended and doth of right extend, as far as the River Pentagoet or Penobscot, it shall be bounded by a line drawn from Cape Sable across the entrance of the Bay of Fundy to the mouth of the River St. Croix, by the said river to its source, and by a line drawn due north, from thence to the southern boundary of our Colony of Quebec.”

Subsequently this large Province of Nova Scotia was divided into the Provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island and Cape Breton, and one boundary between Nova Scotia and New Brunswick is drawn through the centre of the Bay of Fundy. Having thus established the ancient and existing limits of the Province of Nova Scotia, and, I think, having shown to the satisfaction of those who may have carefully followed me, that they include the Fisheries on the coasts, I am led to enquire what, by the Act of Confederation, was surrendered by this Province of Nova Scotia, what was surrendered as to its revenues, what as to public property? The revenues which were not reserved by the respective Provinces or should be raised by them in accordance with special powers conferred upon them, were, it is true, to form one Consolidated Fund for the Dominion of Canada; and I have no doubt that, looking at the British North America Act as it now stands, and noting the fact that the exclusive powers of legislation given to the Dominion, comprehend inland and Coast Fisheries, the argument will be founded on that fact, that the power of legislation carries with it all power over these inland and coast Fisheries. But on perusal of the first draft of the Act of Confederation, I find that inland and coast Fisheries were assigned to the Local Legislatures, and this after the financial arrangements were complete. It is true that concurrent power was given to the Dominion; but what if the draft had not been amended as it was, I presume, simply from the fear of inconvenience to arise from these concurrent powers of legislation? There was an additional compensation for their being withdrawn from the purview of the Local Legislature, and confined to the Federal Parliament; and it is a fair argument from which to infer that all rights of property were not intended to be transferred together with the rights of legislation. Let us then examine what property was given under the Act to the Dominion. The public works and public property of the several Provinces vested in the Dominion are enumerated in the third schedule to the Act, and comprise all canals, with land and water power, public harbours, rivers—

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD:
Rivers is a misprint.

MR. RICHEY: If it is a misprint, this affects, I confess, my argument to a certain extent. I should have enquired whether the express mention of rivers did not operate to exclude coast Fisheries from being considered property of the Dominion ; but that source of argument under the explanation of the right hon. gentleman is, of course, removed. What, then, were reserved to the respective Provinces? All lands, mines, minerals and royalties belonging to the several Provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island are, by Section 109, reserved to those Provinces; and by Section 117 it is declared that they shall retain all their respective public property not otherwise disposed of to the Dominion of Canada. I now ask, are Fisheries property, so as to come under the designation of "public property?" If the boundaries of Nova Scotia include these Fisheries; if, at the time of Confederation, Nova Scotia had proprietary rights in these Fisheries, my question is: Are Fisheries public property of the State with which they stand connected? If they are public property, then, being public property, are they, as royalties, such property as fall to the Crown, and may be aliened either absolutely or under certain limitations? Now, I shall not simply assert that these Fisheries may be designated as public property; I shall refer to the language of one who has been properly described as the most popular and the most elegant writer on the law of nations, whose work is cited more frequently than that of any other public jurist, and is still the statesman's manual and oracle. What does Vattel say?

"Everything susceptible of property is considered as belonging to the nation that possesses the country, and as forming the aggregate mass of its wealth."

He then distinguishes between what becomes public property, common property and private property:

"When a nation, in a body, takes possession of a country, everything that is not divided among its members, remains common to the whole nation, and is called public property."

"The various use of the sea near the coasts," in another place he says, "render it very susceptible of property. It furnishes fish, shells, pearls, amber, etc. Now, in all these respects, its use is not inexhaustible; wherefore, the nation, to whom the coasts belong, may appropriate to themselves and convert to their own profit, an advantage which nature has so placed within their reach as to enable them conveniently to take possession of it in the same manner as they possessed themselves of the dominion of the land they inhabit."

I have mislaid my reference to another quotation; but, he goes on to amplify

upon that statement with special reference to Fisheries and coasts, to show that they may be the subject of property. Speaking of that portion of the sea adjacent to a country, within a marine league from the shore, Puffendorf calls it "an accessory to the land as much as the ditch of a town is accessory to a town." "What," asks Dr. Lushington, in the course of a judgment pronounced by him, "are the limits of the United Kingdom? The land of the United Kingdom and three miles from the shore, is the only answer I can give." Now, then, what are royalties? Do they include the Fisheries upon the coast? Is that word of sufficient significance to comprehend those Fisheries? I have read from the Statute, that royalties are reserved to the respective Provinces, and all lands, mines and minerals. What is here referred to is the substance of the thing, not that which issues out of it, though the tribute paid to the proprietor of the soil may, by some, be deemed the ordinary acceptation of the word royalty. This latter restricted meaning could not have been the intention in any of the grants that have been made to the Provinces from the Crown, because the word is associated with those only conveying territorial rights, and the revenues derivable from them are subsequently referred to in other words. Having reference to the language of writers on International law, and to the definition given in ordinary dictionaries as well as in law dictionaries, royalty means the rights and prerogatives of the Crown. We do not pretend—it would be absurd to contend—that, under the term royalties, all regal rights and prerogatives are granted to the Provinces: it means such royalties as the Crown is capable of alienating. There are two kinds of royalties, those which appertain to the Sovereign as the representative of the nation, and those which belong to him by virtue of his Sovereignty, but which are more of a proprietary nature. In Halleck's "International Law," it is said:

"Upon the breaking up of the Roman Empire," says Gibbon, "the princes and cities which declared themselves independent, appropriated to themselves those parts in which nature, most rich and liberal, yields extraordinary products. These portions or reserved rights were called regalia. The same writer, in other places, applies the term regalia both to rights, and to things, and to the things themselves,—to jura and corpora. So of the feudal and English law writers. They sometimes apply this term to things—as the Crown, the Sceptre, and Royal and Church lands, and sometimes to the dignity, power and pecuniary rights of the King. When applied to the power and dignity of the King, they are called majora regalia, and when applied to his fiscal rights, they are called minora regalia. The former, says Erskine, are not alienable without the consent of Parliament, while the latter may be communicated to his subjects by the Sovereign himself at his pleasure. The term regalia, therefore, differs from Sovereignty, or jura majestatis, as being applicable both to things and to rights to things—corpora and jura—and also as not being inherent to or inseparable from the Sovereign power, for regalia may be alienated either with or without the consent of Parliament. When applied to property, it may include both that which necessarily appertains to the Crown and that which is alienable, or which may be passed to individual subjects.”

I will also read from Tomlin’s “Law Dictionary,” under the head “King,” defining what are the prerogatives and rights of the King. He says :

“It is also held that the King is by his prerogative universal occupant, as all property is presumed to have been originally in the Crown.

“The King hath this sovereign dominion in all seas and great rivers, which is plain from Selden’s account of the ancient Saxons, who dwelt very successfully in all naval affairs ; therefore, the territories of the English seas and rivers always resided in the King.

“And as the King hath a prerogative in the seas so hath he likewise a right to the fishery and to the soil.”

I must now ask permission to present a case or two in favor of the construction which I have put upon the word royalties—that is to say : the rights of the Crown in connection with those Fisheries ; and the first to which I shall refer is a case determined in 1876, in regard to salmon fishing, where the Lord Chancellor, Lords Cransworth, Wensleydale and Kingsdown affirming the decree below, concurred in the following propositions as reported in 3 Macqueen’s Appeal Cases, page 419 :

“The right of the Crown is not merely a right of fishing for salmon, but a right to the salmon fishings around the sea coast of Scotland.

“It is not to be regarded simply as an attribute of Sovereignty, but rather as a patrimonium, a beneficial interest constituting part of the regal hereditary property.

“The assertion that the sea is common to all and that there can be no appropriation of it, except where it adjoins the shore, is an erroneous assertion.”

That is the solemn determination of the Judges before whom the appeal was heard. What was the contention of Her Majesty’s Commissioners and the Lord Advocate, which was sustained by this appeal ?

“All nations being equal all seem to have an equal right to use the unappropriated parts of the ocean for navigation. But those parts of the sea which adjoin the land are appropriated as accessory to the coast that commands them. The doctrine laid down by Heineccius is that now generally received by the best writers. He maintains that the ocean is incapable of appropriation, but that parts of the ocean and narrow seas may be appropriated subject to the rights of navigation. * * * The right of fishing in the sea is totally distinct from the right of maritime dominion”

The point to which I wish to draw the attention of the Government and this House is “that the right of fishing in the sea is totally distinct from the right of maritime dominion.” I hold that whilst the power of legislation and the right of maritime dominion is vested in the general Confederation, there may still remain reserved a right of property in the different Provinces :

“The English,” the case proceeds, “have never pretended to have a property in all the seas over which they have claimed maritime dominion by means of their fleets. But all these portions of the sea adjacent to and commanded by the coast so far as capable of appropriation are held to form a part of the national territory.”

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Hear, hear.

MR. RICHEY: The right hon. gentleman says “hear, hear.” I fully appreciate the view that is taken by him in connection with this subject. When I heard the hon. mover of the resolutions the other night content himself with citing authorities to show that the sea within three miles of the shore was a part of the territory of the nation, I saw at once that he stopped short of that which it was necessary to prove, because halting there the answer would be perfectly obvious, that the territorial right was the right of sovereignty, and the sovereignty being in the Dominion no question could be raised upon it. It is on this account that I have felt it necessary to detain the House so long, pointing to the fact that the Crown had conceded territorial rights to the Provinces, and that by the British North America Act those rights were confirmed. But to pursue my quotations :

“It is contended that these rights in the sea are national or public rights, which are vested in the Sovereign merely as trustee for the community. Here, however, it is necessary to make a distinction.

“The Sovereign of this country is the supreme head of the nation, and as such vested with the executive power of protecting the interests and vindicating the rights of the people against any outrage or invasion by foreign states. But the rights which belong to the Crown are of two different kinds : 1st.—The jus publicum which belongs to the monarch in jurisdiction and sovereign right, and which may be held as a mere trust for behoof of the public ; and 2nd.—The jus privatum under which the Sovereign possesses the land and sea adjoining the coast as a patrimonial property, so far as it is capable of appropriation. * * *

“The public rights belonging to the Crown are inalienable, while the private ones, being capable of yielding profit, may be retained or alienated to a subject.”

The distinction upon which I insist is here most clearly drawn, and confirms the view which I have endeavoured to place before you, that whilst as regards the jus publicum the right of legislation is conferred upon Parliament, the jus privatum has been granted to the Provinces and continues to reside in them. I may be told that the propositions which I have read refer simply to salmon fishing which is regarded as more valuable than other fisheries. There are, however, not wanting other cases to show how specifically fisheries are included under the designation of royalties ; cases to show that fisheries extending two miles from the shore granted by the Crown have been held to be well granted. But it is needless to adduce further authorities upon the right of the Crown in that respect, when we have the authority of the right hon. the Prime Minister himself in the passage which I have read in your hearing. Now it is quite appropriate here to refer to the grant made in 1844 to Nova Scotia of the casual and territorial rights of the Crown. The same words are there employed, “land, mines and minerals, and royalties.” If, then, the fisheries be within the designation of royalties if they were to be considered property which pertained to the Crown, I hold that under that Act, an Act having its operation during the lifetime of Her present Majesty, the control of those lands, mines, minerals and royalties, were made over to the various Provinces in consideration of their assuming the charge of the civil list of the Provinces at that time, and except so far as the territorial rights and revenues thus granted to the Provinces are taken away by the Act of Confederation, they remain in the respective Provinces. I next enquire, if those Fisheries were vested as property in the Provinces could any right therein be justly ceded even by Treaty without their consent ? In his “Manual of International Law,” President Woolsey remarks :

“An interesting question here arises whether the Treaty making power in a federative union like the United States can alienate the domain of one of the States without its consent.”

The alienation here I admit is not of the domain, but it is of a right in that property, a property which, it is contended, is still in the Province. The same writer argues :

“A States’ territorial right gives no power to the ruler to alienate a part of the territory in the way of barter or sale, as was done in feudal times. In other words, the right is a public or political and not a personal one. Nor, in justice, can the State itself alienate a portion of its territory without the consent of the inhabitants residing upon the same, and if in treaties of cession this is done after conquest it is only the acknowledgment of an unavoidable fact.”

I have read to you the words of the right hon. leader of the Government in connection with the explanation he made regarding the right of property in Canada to those Fisheries—to the effect that there was a sale of them. It was pro tanto a sale. It was a lease or license of those privileges to a foreign power. And here I may quote from Chancellor Kent who, in his work on International Law, whilst admitting it to be a clear principle that private rights may be sacrificed by Treaty to secure the public safety, claims that the Government would be bound to make compensation and indemnity to the individuals whose rights had been surrendered. I also call to mind a case which was brought before this Parliament, by one no longer living, but whose name, I am sure, is cherished with respect by all who had the honour of his acquaintance, and were conversant with his ability. I refer to the late Hon. Hilliard Cameron, who, when the Bill to ratify the Treaty was under discussion, and when he was advocating its acceptance on the ground that there was nothing inconsistent in accepting a pecuniary recompense for the privileges conferred, adverted to the fact, in connection with the Ashburton Treaty, that when it was found that Maine had not agreed, General Jackson said: "Agree to the Treaty and we will give you $1,200,000!" Maine, however, would not agree. A new Treaty was made, and Maine thought she ought to have a Commissioner, and there was a doubt whether the United States could take her territory without her consent; and subsequently she did consent, and was paid for her territorial rights, though awarded less than she had previously refused. I am quite conscious, Mr. Speaker, that I am referring to cases and authorities which cover, in strictness, only the actual cession of territory or private rights, but they announce and illustrate a principle which is applicable to the case before you; and I feel that I may trust with confidence to the members of this House to make a proper application of that principle. Such, then, Mr. Speaker, are the facts and arguments which appear to me to lend some countenance to the resolutions introduced by the hon. member for Inverness (Mr. MacDonnell), which give colour to the contention he has put forward, that fishery rights are territorial rights belonging to the various Provinces. I confess that whilst I feel how strongly they do tend to substantiate that claim, I recognise that they are in the nature of a legal argument on which the minds of legal gentlemen might differ. I feel it is rather a precise statement of the rights of those Provinces to place before this House, and to ask it immediately to endorse. The question as to whether they are strictly territorial rights of the Provinces might well be deemed a subject for further consideration, and to be decided by another tribunal. Therefore, whilst I have drawn out these arguments, I present them as leading to other considerations, and feeling that it is not desirable to call upon the House to decide this question of abstract right. I will venture to propose an amendment, which I hope will meet the views of those who contend strongly for the territorial rights being in the Provinces, and will also be acceptable to those who are not prepared to go so far. I believe that without one word of the argument which I have addressed to the House, there are other considerations to be taken into account sufficient to induce the House to decide that this Award should be appropriated to the different Provinces whose inhabitants are affected by the cession of privileges in their Fisheries. The first of these considerations to which I desire to draw attention is, that this Treaty is limited in its operation to certain Provinces—to Quebec, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island; and it was so limited of set purposes and with a special design. Here, again, I must refer to the speech of the right hon. leader of the Government in introducing the Bill to give effect to the Treaty. He said:

"It will be remembered that we have not given all our Fisheries away, the Treaty only applies to the Fisheries of the old Provinces of Canada, and in order that the area should not be widened, it is provided that it shall only apply to the Fisheries of Quebec, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, so that the Treaty does not allow the Americans to have access to the Pacific Coast Fisheries, nor yet to the inexhaustible and priceless Fisheries of the Hudson's Bay. Those are great sources of revenue yet undeveloped, but after the Treaty is ratified, they will develop rapidly, and in twelve years from now when the two nations sit down to reconsider the circumstances, and readjust the Treaty it will be found that other and great wealth will be at the disposal of the Dominion. I may be asked, though I have not seen that the point has excited any observation, why were not the products of the Lake Fisheries laid open to both nations, and in reply I may say that these Fisheries were excepted at my instance. The Canadian Fisheries on the north shores of the great lakes are most valuable. By a judicious system of preservation and protection we have greatly increased that source of wealth. It is also known that from a concurrence of circumstances and from situation the Fisheries on the south shores are not nearly so valuable as ours, and it therefore appeared that if we once allowed the American fishermen to have admission to our waters, with their various engines of destruction, all the care taken for many years to cultivate that source of wealth would be disturbed, injured, and prejudiced, and there would be no end of quarrels and dissatisfaction, in our narrow waters, and no real Reciprocity, and therefore, that Canada would be much better off by preserving her own Inland Lake Fisheries to herself, and have no right to enter the American market with the products of those Fisheries. This was the reason why the Lake Fisheries were not included in this arrangement."

Then, if those Fisheries are bartered away, and the Fisheries of Ontario,

British Columbia and Hudson's Bay, represented as being so magnificent, are retained and protected, what object induced the sale of the Fishery rights of the Nova Scotians, New Brunswickers, Prince Edward Islanders and the people of Quebec? The object was the maintenance of peace; and, therefore, it was not inappropriate in me to cite from the writers on International Law, passages to show that, where a Treaty is made in the interest of peace, compensation is due to those whose interests are affected. The object aimed at in this Treaty, and the reason why we were compelled to surrender those privileges in our waters, was for the preservation of peace. "It was known," said the right hon. gentleman—

"It was known that what was commonly known as 'the Alabama claims' was a subject of dispute between the two countries, involving the gravest consequences and that hitherto the results had been most satisfactory. An attempt had been made to settle the question by what was known as the Johnson-Clarendon Treaty, but that Treaty had been rejected by the United States authorities. So long as this question remained unsettled between the two nations there was no possibility of the old friendly relations that had so long existed between them being restored, and England felt that it was of the first importance to her that those amicable relations should be restored. It was not only her desire to be in the most friendly position towards a country which was so closely associated with her by every tie, by common origin, by common interest, by common language, but it was also her interest to have every cloud removed between the two nations, because she had reason to feel that her position with respect to the other great powers of the world was greatly affected, by the knowledge which those other nations had of the position of affairs between the United States and herself. The prestige of Great Britain as a power was affected most seriously by the absence of an entente cordiale between the two nations. * * * And, Sir, in my opinion, it was of greater consequence to Canada than to England, at least of as great consequence, that the Alabama question should be settled (cheers). Sir, England has promised us, and we have all faith in that promise, that in case of war, the whole force of the Empire should be exerted in our defence (cheers). What would have been the position of England, and what would have been the position of Canada, if she had been called upon to use her whole force to defend us, when engaged in conflict elsewhere. Canada would, as a matter of course, in case of war between England and the United States, be the battle ground. We should be the sufferers, our country would be devastated, our people slaughtered and our property destroyed; and while England would, I believe, under all circumstances, faithfully perform her promise to the utmost (cheers), she would be greatly impeded in carrying out her desire, if engaged elsewhere. It was therefore, as much the interest of this Dominion as of England, that the Alabama and all other questions that in any way threatened the disturbance of the peaceful relations between the two countries should be settled and adjusted."

And that, let me say, refers very specially to Canada proper. Encompassed as we are by the navy of England, we have little fear of the consequences of a war between England and any other power. We know her fleets will ride in our waters, and that we shall be secure. It does not so much concern those whose Fisheries have been given away as those who live by the inland waters. The interior of the country would be devastated by a war. This, then, brings the Treaty and the cessions made under it clearly within the rule I have already stated. For what has the pecuniary compensation been given? What should have been aimed and what was aimed at in that Treaty? Reciprocity of trade. Had you obtained the markets of the United States for the coal of Nova Scotia, the lumber of New Brunswick, and the agricultural products of Prince Edward Island, we should not, perhaps, have been urging so strongly this contention, and our resources would have received a great development in those industries. The hon. the Premier strove, I know, for those advantages. It was this Parliament that interposed, by a precipitate repeal of duties, and took away from him the power he could have used so well. He then had to carry on that Treaty, and as he professed, when he introduced the Bill to ratify it, if it had not been for the action of Parliament, he might have been calling on the House to confirm the Treaty that embraced those articles of coal and lumber. Is it not plain, from every aspect from which this case can be viewed, that the privileges in those waters which pertain to the Maritime Provinces alone have been taken and ceded to the United States, and compensation has been paid for them; and is it not the merest equity and justice that those whose privileges have been granted away should receive the compensation obtained? Then, Sir, it is alleged that those privileges have been granted to the detriment of the fishermen and of the Maritime Provinces as a whole. Anything that injures the Nova Scotia fishing industry, for example, most materially affects the whole Province, as the value of its exports of fish is just twice as much as the value of all the other products combined. With regard to the destructive character of the fishing carried on by the Americans on our coasts, I need only remind the House of the facts presented in the discussion last Session, relative to their use of purse seines and trawls, and to the testimony taken on this subject at Halifax and elsewhere. All the evidence goes to show that the Americans, after having depleted their own Fisheries, are now engaged in the process of destroying ours, and that in five or six years, if their present course of conduct be pursued, our noble Fisheries, yielding millions upon millions of dollars, will become a mere reminiscence. I might cite abundant evidence in support of this view, but will content myself with some statements which we are all bound to respect. On page 220 of the published Debates of last Session of Parliament, I find the following utterances of the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries:—

“The Commission had established the fact, that the practice now prevailing of using the seines would, if persevered in, entirely destroy the Fisheries. * * * Some of these nets were 250 fathoms long; with them they surrounded and caught all kinds of fish in large quantities, including the small and coarser fish, which usually supplied food to our valuable cod-fishery. * * * If these Fisheries were destroyed—as they certainly would be if this practice continued—the $5,000,000 would be no compensation for their loss to the Maritime Provinces.”

I will refer also to George R. Young's letters to Hon. Mr. Stanley, which says:

“And upon whom does that loss devolve? Upon the people of the Maritime Provinces—upon that eighty or a hundred thousand hardy sons of the sea-coast, to whom Sir George Cartier pointed, during the debates preceding Confederation, as your resource in case of conflict with a maritime power, whether upon your coasts or in your lakes, or wherever duty might call them.

“It does not fall upon the people of Ontario, of the Far-West, of British Columbia; they were carefully exempted from the operation of this Treaty, as I have already shown.”

This is not a new thing in our experience. I might refer to the evidence of the destructive course pursued by the American fishermen under former Treaties. Now, this loss devolves upon the people of the Maritime Provinces, upon those 80,000 or 100,000 seamen, upon whom you must rely, if at any time it should be necessary to have them rally to your support and defence, upon the lakes of Canada as well as upon her coasts. The loss does not fall upon the people of Ontario and the west, who are protected in the enjoyment of their Fisheries. Is it then not plain, altogether apart from strict technical construction and interpretations, upon the broad principles of National Law and the immutable principles of justice that if, to the detriment of a portion of the community, you concede great privileges to a foreign nation, you are bound to compensate that portion of the community for the injury you have done them. When I contend for an indemnity to those Provinces, I may be told that this Award is not given as an indemnity for damage done, but only as the price of privileges conferred, the price for licensing those Fisheries, and that because the Dominion Government has supreme control over all legislation respecting them, it has the power to legislate them away and place the price in the Dominion Treasury. If it be true that there rests in you this supreme predominant power—that Nova Scotia has surrendered to you her main source of wealth, that she brought so rich a dowry, I have only to express the hope that you will, at least, be generous to her, out of her own resources, and not force her to rue the day when she linked her destiny to yours. I may be told that, because the burden of protection or defence falls upon the general Exchequer, the Dominion is entitled to receive this money. To that I have several answers. In the first place, she assumed that burden of protecting the Fisheries as a part of her duty under Confederation, without any eye to the compensation she is now receiving; it was a portion of the charge that devolved upon her when she assumed the duties of defence; it is a burden which she assumed, not as regards those Provinces alone, whose interests are now at stake, but as regards all the whole Dominion; and further, it is a duty which to-day she continues to discharge, as regards the western Provinces, whilst, by the operation of this Treaty, she is largely relieving herself of her obligation in that respect to the Maritime Provinces. I believe that to-day, owing to the fact of our being able to withdraw the marine police, you must be saving at least some $50,000 as a consequence of this very Treaty. I find that the amount which has been expended for protection where the Fisheries are small is high in comparison with the amount expended upon those vast Fisheries of Nova Scotia. And further, the Dominion has not assumed, and I think I will be justified in saying the Dominion does not intend to assume, the full duty of Protection in regard to our Fisheries. I remember some years ago the question was asked, I think in the Senate, regarding the amount expended for the protection of the Fisheries by Canada. In that year it was $84,000. The inquirer went on to ask what was the amount expended by Britain. The hon. Minister could not give a very correct answer, but said it must have been some hundreds of thousands of dollars. Then we have the observation made by the right hon. the Premier that Britain was obliged to come to our rescue. We have the late Mr. Harrison, in that debate upon the Treaty to which I have so frequently referred, asking as a point to be made in favour of its acceptance, what would be the value of our Fisheries without the protection of Great Britain, and urging that, in order to secure the protection of Britain it was necessary to confirm this Treaty. This matter of protection, moreover, is one which the Provinces were led to expect would be fully and faithfully performed. The Hon. George Brown, in the speech which he delivered at the time when the scheme of Union was under discussion—and I suppose at that time no one was more fully authorised to speak for those who were connected with the negotiations than he—referred especially to the advantages which would be derived by the Maritime Provinces from entering into this Union. Referring to the fact that, under the Reciprocity Treaty, the fishing by Americans in our waters had rapidly increased, and to the effect of the repeal of that Treaty on the American fishing interests, he said :

“The repeal of Reciprocity on the American fishing interest. The Americans, in 1851, had engaged in the cod and mackerel fishing, in our waters, shipping to the extent of 129,014 tons—but under the influence of the Reciprocity Treaty it rose, in 1861, to 192,662—an increase, in ten years, of upwards of 63,000 tons, or fifty per cent. (Hear, hear). The repeal of Reciprocity will give us back all this increase, and more, for it will be a very different thing in the future from what it was formerly, to poach on our fishing grounds, when these provinces are united and determined to protect the Fisheries of the Gulf. This fishing interest is one which may be cultivated to an extent difficult, perhaps, for many of us to conceive. But we have only to look at the amount of fish taken from our waters by the Americans and other nations, and the advantages we possess, to perceive that, if we apply ourselves, as a united people, to foster that trade, we can vastly increase the great traffic we now enjoy.”

That was the prospect which was held out to the Maritime Provinces, and we are here to-night, in full view of the fact that these interests, which were to have been held so sacredly and exclusively, are now enjoyed only in common with citizens of the adjoining Republic, and we are here discussing the question whether the compensation, awarded for that concession, is to be apportioned to the Provinces which suffer from it or not. I have but one word further to say in connection with this subject, and it is to ask you to consider the precedent you may establish; for if this House decides, by its vote, that the money, which has been received as an equivalent for these privileges, is to be absorbed by the Dominion, I say it will be to establish an evil precedent. It will be to hold out to some succeeding Administration, perhaps that when pressed for means, there are rich resources to which they can apply. But, Mr. Speaker, I shrink from any such suggestion, and only say that it is establishing a precedent which is evil, when it can even be made to point to such a possibility as that. Has not this Dominion, as such, benefitted enough by the Washington Treaty, in the amount saved from the protection of the Fisheries, and in the fact that, by our acceptance of this Treaty, you obtained from the Imperial Government a guarantee of a loan of £2,500,000? For what purpose? Not to be expended in improvements in the Maritime Provinces, but for the purpose of extending your canals and aiding the Pacific Railway. Those advantages reaped by the Dominion as consequences of its acceptance of the Washington Treaty should render it the more ready to view the Award in the light of the obligation to regard the interest of the Provinces peculiarly affected.

To summarise my argument, it is this : Whilst I have claimed that though the supreme legislative power exists in the Dominion, there remains a right of property in the Maritime Provinces which ought not to be granted away without compensation. I have also said that I do not wish to rely solely upon a strict legal argument, a stringent interpretation of the Act of Confederation. I prefer to base my appeal to this House upon other grounds as well. I would place before you then the following propositions : By the Act of Confederation you have received, as you contend, such legislative authority as entitles you to dispose at will of the main source of wealth of one of the most important Provinces within your Dominion. I say one of the most important Provinces, for I have confined myself very much in advocating this question, to the position of the Province of Nova Scotia, not, however, with any disposition to ignore the claims of the other Provinces, and I may say that I think Prince Edward Island establishes a peculiarly strong claim. No one, in my opinion, can read the letter of Earl Kimberly, in which he urges upon the Government of that Island the acceptance of this Treaty, upon the ground of compensation to be made, without feeling that such an appeal being made by the Government of Prince Edward Island whilst it was a separate Province, entitles it to consideration ; but I have confined myself so much to the case of Nova Scotia, because there were certain grounds which I felt I could, in this way, more strongly urge. I say then, that even if we assume your possession of the power you claim as flowing from your legislative authority ; that power of legislation was a trust to be exercised beneficially for those over whose domain it extended. Under the pressure of Imperial interests you have used that legislative authority to ratify a Treaty which confers privileges upon the citizens of a foreign nation, and you have received compensation for so doing. By every principle of public law and national morality, the indemnity should follow the damage. The damage to the Provinces is proved even to the extent on the authority of your own Minister, specially conversant with the circumstances of the imminent destruction of the Fisheries, in which you have sold those rights. By reason of that sale, you have not damaged the remaining portions of the Dominion, but protected them ; and you have not placed in the Treasury of the Dominion any further charge than previously existed. On the contrary you have, for a time, withdrawn the protection which, under your compact with the Provinces, implied if not clearly expressed, you were bound to afford. You have at the same time relieved the Treasury of a burden which would otherwise have devolved upon it. I ask this House, then, to consider fully and fairly the question which is now placed before it ; to consider the ultimate as well as the immediate consequences of the course which it may see fit to adopt. In pursuance of the notice which I have already given to the House, I beg leave to move that the resolutions proposed to be submitted to the Committee of the Whole be amended as follows :—

In the third Resolution all the words after "That" be expunged, and the following inserted instead thereof :—"the privileges so accorded to the citizens of the United States are in derogation of the rights of British subjects, which enured to the benefit of the people of the different Provinces to which the Fisheries in which they were granted are adjacent, respectively."

In the seventh Resolution all after the word "That" be expunged, and the following inserted instead thereof :—"in the opinion of this House, the Provinces of Quebec, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, are entitled to an appropriation of the Award, in such a manner as to afford to the inhabitants of the said several Provinces, the full benefit of the same in proportion to the value of the privileges conceded upon the coasts and in the waters of those Provinces, respectively."

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD : For once during this Session we have heard the argument on a serious question, carried on upon its own merits. We have heard no personalities, no imputations of motives, no animosities used in this argument, and I can congratulate the House and my hon. friend, and I can congratulate the interests he has advocated so ably before this House. The case is of a two-fold aspect—political and legal. My hon. friend has, after an able argument as to the legal rights of the case and the legal position of the Maritime Provinces, concluded his speech by some remarks as regards the position of the Province in a political and in a financial sense ; and he has strongly and eloquently appealed to this House, and through this House to the country, as to the sacrifices and the losses which the Maritime Provinces have sustained by the loss of their rights in the waters surrounding their coasts. I am not at all unwilling to admit every right of the Maritime Provinces to a consideration of all the circumstances of the case, I am quite willing to consider their fair claims to consideration at the hands of this House in the protection of those rights which are said to be so inestimable and so extremely valuable, and in the development and encouragement of those rights, I may say that I believe since Confederation there has been a uniform action on the part of the Dominion Government to try and develop them, and to protect them from aggression and invasion. We have done that with no niggard hand, and, until the time that the Treaty threw open those waters to the American fishermen, this country was placed, as the hon. gentleman has truly stated, in such a position as that she was obliged to assume the obligation, which she did most willingly, to protect those Fisheries and rights, and expended lavishly all the means of the country in their protection. I feel, however, that, in the discussion of this subject, not only my hon. friend, but myself, more especially, as a member of the Government, as well as every hon. member of this House, must observe a due degree of reticence. I am unable, in the interests of the country, as a whole, and in the interests of the Maritime Provinces themselves, to enter, without restriction, without limitation, into the discussion of this subject. We all must remember that the Washington Treaty is of a limited duration. We all know the expressed intention of the American Government to put an end to that Treaty. Unless they change that determination, at the earliest moment possible, in a few years we will be placed back in the same position we occupied in 1871, and, therefore, every word that any member of Parliament may use in this House, and more especially every word that may be used by a member of the Government or a leading member of the Opposition, who may fairly be supposed to enter into any succeeding Government—every expression used will be carefully watched and quoted as evidence against Canada, against its interests, and against the interests of the Maritime Provinces, and of those Fisheries, in any new negotiations that may be undertaken, some three or four or five years hence ; and, therefore, I feel myself obliged to deprive myself of a great portion of the argument which otherwise I might use in strengthening and supporting the case of the Dominion, and the claim and right of the Dominion, on every principle of equity as well as of strict law, to the amount of the Award found in the case. I will only say one thing with respect to that. While Canada has assumed, while the Dominion has undertaken the defence and the protection of these Fisheries, while that duty is thrown upon her by the Act of Union, while we have in view the limited duration of the Washington Treaty, we cannot avoid remembering all the cost, all the expense, all the responsibility of this protection, of this defence, and that it must fall upon the Dominion as a whole—on the Dominion Treasury—while all the benefits of these Fisheries accrue to the several Maritime Provinces. In the past the Maritime Provinces have been, and they will be, during the continuance of this Treaty, which was effected in 1871, the only practical gainers. So much for the appeal to the House,—a just appeal, a reasonable appeal, and one which this Parliament, and previous Parliaments, have acknowledged. We have always acknowledged the obligation to provide for the protection and development of the Fisheries. Before the Washington Treaty, we guarded the coasts of the Maritime Provinces with a fleet of our own, as well as that of the Imperial Government ; and now, during every Parliament, each Government, at every Session, has voted some provision for the protection, for the development of the Fishery interests, and for the lighting of the coasts, so essential to the successful prosecution and enlargement of the fishing trade. As to the legal question, in the first place, it seems to me that the exclusive right of legislation, and the administration of legislation, is vested in this Parliament. The British North America Act declares that the Dominion Parliament is to have the sole and exclusive right of legislation respecting these Fisheries, and that the Dominion Government must be charged with the protection of all interests relating to the Fisheries. Canada has its coasts, as England has its coasts. The coasts of England belong to England, to the people of England—to the people inland as well as to those on the shores and coasts. When Canada was formed into one great Dominion, the coasts of each Province—the coasts of Quebec, the coasts of Nova Scotia, the coasts of New Brunswick, and the coasts of Prince Edward Island—became the coasts of the Dominion; and with these coasts, go all the Fisheries, and all the seas, and all the wealth of the Provinces, to form the Fisheries, the seas, and wealth of the Dominion. The argument of my hon. friend is based principally on the language used in the British North America Act, which provides that all lands, mines, minerals and royalties belonging to the several Provinces, and so on, shall belong to the several Provinces of Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, in which the same are situated or arise. Fisheries are not lands, mines, or minerals, nor do they come within the term “royalties.” We know what “royalties” means. My hon. friend has quoted some authorities showing that sovereignties and regalities are the same things. But “royalties” has a distinct signification at law. The word “royalty” in this application, and its evident use in the British North America Act, is limited by the ordinary use and signification of the term. The word arose in its limited legal sense. In its large or general sense the word “royalty” signifies all that belongs to the Sovereign; in its colloquial sense in the English language “royalty” means all that pertains to the royal person, dignity and rank and prerogative. In the legal sense it arose in this way: we know that in England, no matter who may be the owner of the soil, still under the law of England the royal mines mean those mines of gold and silver belonging exclusively to the Sovereign, and that the fact that the owner of the soil may have the fee simple in the land does not give that owner any right or claim to the gold or silver mines on his estate; those belong to the Sovereign, and, when grants were made either to the owner of the soil or to strangers from that owner, the Crown was in the habit of claiming and insisting upon an annual compensation, a compensation as to quantity, which compensation, in either case, was called the “royalty;” it was a recompense to the Sovereign for handing over that portion of the Royal mines. Hence the expression “royalty,” and this expression has been extended to every kind of charge of that nature, whether by the Sovereign or by the owner of any mine of any kind, whether a mine of gold or of silver, or of iron, of copper, or any other mineral whatever; the word has come to be applied to the rental, charge, or compensation made for the use of a mine. I say, therefore, that this word “royalty” was evidently so used in the British North America Act; and, consequently, in this sense, it does not apply to the Fisheries; it does not apply to the soil over which the seas flow. My hon. friend has truly stated that the argument that the Crown is supposed to own and does actually own the three miles of sea outside the coast, has no connection with this right of fishing. By the general law of nations the sea is common to all; the right of fishing in the sea is common to all the world, that is the general principle laid down by all International writers. The limitation which has been imposed upon that universal right, the limitation of three miles of the sea, bounding the coast, was introduced and finally established by different nations for the purposes of national defences; it was not thought safe to allow foreigners, in no way interested in the welfare and affairs of a nation, it was not thought safe or prudent to allow them to enter upon your coasts; and it came thus to be established, by International comity, as a principal of International Law, that three miles from the coast of any nation belongs exclusively to that nation, and that foreigners are to be excluded from that limit; but, subject to that limitation—which was established, as I have said, from the necessity of excluding aliens from the coasts, and for protecting these coasts from any probable hostile attacks—the sea belongs to every one. Then, as regards the Fisheries within these limits of three miles, foreigners are excluded; but the seas within that limit do not belong, nor do the fish in those seas, nor the right of fishing in those waters, belong to any particular portion of the population; they do not belong exclusively to the people on the coasts; but just as the right of fishing in the waters surrounding England, Ireland and Scotland, belongs to the whole of the population—both to the people on the coast and to the people inland—and to the people, not only of England, Ireland and Scotland, but of all the dependencies of the British Empire, to every British subject in fact, so also does the right of fishing in these waters surrounding the coasts of the Maritime Provinces of Canada belong to every British subject; and a man living in the centre or any other part of Ontario or the Dominion, if he chooses to go, has the same right to fish within these three miles of the coasts of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick or Prince Edward Island as the people of those several Provinces have; he has precisely the same right; it is no exclusive right. If I choose, I have a perfect right to go and fish there without being interfered with by the fishermen of those coasts. Every British subject has that right; it is a common right, and, being a common right, it cannot be claimed exclusively for the coast inhabitants or for those living in the different Maritime Provinces. So, when Confederation was consummated, when these several Provinces consented to surrender their entities, and to be merged in the Dominion, the coasts of Nova Scotia, of New Brunswick, and of Prince Edward Island ceased for ever, for they became the coasts of the Dominion of Canada; their waters became the waters of the Dominion of Canada, and their Fisheries became the Fisheries of the Dominion of Canada. Now, I have contended that the word "royalty" applies in no way to Fisheries; but, even supposing, for the sake of argument, that it did apply to the prerogative right of the Crown; supposing the argument of my hon. friend to be true to the fullest extent, and that the Crown did hand over to these several Provinces these royalties or sovereign rights, and proprietary territorial rights; supposing all this, then I say that the Crown could only hand over that which it had to hand over; it could not hand over the right of fishing, which was not in the power of the Crown either to withhold or give; it might be given or withheld by Parliament, but the Crown could not hand over any royalties, any sovereign rights, which it had not. The right of fishing is a common right—within three miles of the coast—of all the subjects of Her Majesty; it is one of the communia jura belonging to every British subject, and a grant or conveyance of royalties does not convey this common right, simply because not being a royalty, it does not come within the term. My hon. friend has quoted a case which at first would appear to be at variance with the principle I am laying down—the case of Gamel versus Commissioners of Forests, Woods and Fisheries, in the Queen's Appeal Cases—but I find that in that case the decision is not at all a decision on the law of England, or according to the law of England. It is a case which arose in Scotland, and which is based on Scotch law only. I find that, in that case, the whole argument of counsel, and the whole decision of the Courts, are based upon the law of Scotland, no reference being made to the general law of England on this subject; and on a proper examination of the case you find that the feudal right held by the Sovereign, as Queen of Scotland, still existed, and to a larger extent than by the law of England, and the decision was that it was clear, therefore, that the salmon fisheries in Scotland were the property of the Crown, and that the Commissioners of Fisheries, Woods and Forests were the proper parties to pursue, on behalf of Her Majesty. But even in this case we find, even with respect to the law of Scotland, that it is not held to be a right in the nature of a royalty. It is part of the private estate of the Sovereign, more in the nature of regality, as distinct from a royalty; the latter is not one of the privata patrimonii held by the Sovereign to support the royal dignity; the privata patrimonii do not, even under the law of Scotland, come within the meaning of the term "royalty." But, as regards England, the law is laid down, again and again, in the words of Chitty, in his work on the Prerogatives of the Crown, that :

"The King has an undoubted sovereignty and jurisdiction, which he has immemorably exercised, through the medium of the Admiralty Courts, over the British Seas, that is the seas which encompass the four sides of the British Islands, and other seas, arms of seas and navigable rivers (but not unnavigable rivers, these belonging to the owners of the adjacent soil) within and immediately connected with the territories subject to his sway. The law of nations and the constitution of the country have clothed the sovereign with this power that he may defend his people and protect their commercial interests. By implication of law the property in the soil, under these public waters, is also in the king. But in this, as also in most other instances, the prerogative does not counteract or interfere with the natural right of the public to fish in the sea, in arms of the sea, and in creeks and navigable rivers, and to take fish found on the sea shore between high and low water mark. This is one of the jura publica or communa, which never was vested exclusively in the Crown, and, of course, is not to be considered as a legal franchise."

It is a public right, a common right, a right belonging to everyone and, therefore, it has never been held to be a regal franchise—a royalty—and if not a royalty is not conveyed in the grant of all the royalties to anyone in this Province. True, the right of protecting the sea and the right of ownership of the land belongs to the Crown; true, a general sovereignty exists over those waters, and over the land in those waters, but the Fisheries and the right of using them do not become vested in the Crown, but are communa jura—belonging to all the people, and can, therefore, not be granted by the Crown. If that is so, the argument fails. I contend that the rights of legislation involve the rights of administration, and that the rights of administration and the responsibility forced upon the Administration, must be correlative, and all the advantages that are to be gained by that legislation must pertain to the authority which, in the first place, is acted upon by legislation, and then by the Administration which carries out that legislation. I beg leave to move in amendment:

That all the words after "That" be expunged, as also, the proposed amendment thereto, and the following inserted instead thereof:—"By the British North America Act, 1867, the sea coast and inland Fisheries in the Dominion and the control, regulation and protection thereof were vested in the Government and Parliament of Canada.

"That the responsibility and duty of regulating and protecting such Fisheries were, from 1st July, 1867, undertaken by the Federal Government and Legislature.

"That great expense was thereby cast upon and defrayed from the Dominion Treasury.

"That such responsibility cannot constitutionally be surrendered or transferred to any of the Provinces, and if it were possible to do so the transfer would be injurious to the best interests of the Provinces, more immediately concerned in the development of the Fisheries, as they would be alike legally and pecuniarily unable to bear the burthen and afford the necessary protection.

"That the duty of fostering and protecting the Fisheries is certain to entail great expense on the Dominion in the future.

"That such expenditure and the public advantage to be derived therefrom are correlative, and that the portion of the Fishery Award paid over to Canada constitutionally and of right belongs to the Dominion of Canada."

I would ask, what would be the consequences to the Maritime Provinces, which are more immediately concerned than any other, if that doctrine were to obtain? Do you suppose that if the people of Canada, that if the people inland in Canada, were not interested in the Fisheries immediately, they would willingly bear the chief burden of the protection and development of those Fisheries; and that, in case of those rights being assailed, in case of possible hostilities being threatened, that the whole responsibility would be thrown on the people of the Dominion, the sole advantage for which, pecuniary and otherwise, was to be enjoyed at the expense and cost of the whole of Her Majesty's subjects in this country, and that the Maritime Provinces should have all the property and the rest of Her Majesty's subjects should have the responsibility. It is not in human nature to suppose that the Legislature of Canada, that the majority of representatives here, representing inland constituencies, would agree, or would be allowed to agree by their constituents, to expend all their treasure, and, possibly, all their blood, in defence of these rights, and that everything in the way of pecuniary advantage and gain should be handed over quietly to three or four localities engaged in those Fisheries. I put the proposition in that way so that it will be seen it is utterly out of the question that this right can be surrendered, that the Dominion should assume all these responsibilities and give up every possible advantage which that responsibility involves, when the responsibility of defending and protecting those rights and privileges all fall upon the Dominion. It is true the Dominion has willingly assumed and undertaken them, and she has already expended freely in order to defend them. The votes of Parliament this Session will show the anxiety of the people of Canada to protect those Fisheries by lighting the coasts, by building harbours of refuge, by building lighthouses, by planting buoys, by maintaining telegraph cables, and by all the other means by which our Fisheries are being developed, and the fishermen protected in the enjoyment and maintenance of their rights. Canada has, with no niggard hand, already gone forward in the defence of those rights, and it cannot be expected that she shall have all the toil, all the expense and all the danger, while the Provinces in the vicinity of the Fisheries are to have all the gain and all the property.

Mr. McISAAC: During the discussion which took place on the adjournment of this debate, fault was found with hon. members on this side of the House for pressing the debate. I fail to see how that charge can be made, how, at least, it can be justified. It is well known the question was brought to the attention of the Government and the House on several occasions last Session. This Session also it was taken up at a very early period. The Governments of Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island have been in constant communication with this Government, for more than a year, and in the face of these facts, are we to be told that this Government had not yet sufficient time and sufficient information to deal with the question decisively? The hon. the Minister of Railways went so far, the other day, as to say that this was not the time for the hon. member for Inverness to move his resolutions, that he should have done so in the Session of 1878, when the party he supported was in power. I consider that a very extraordinary statement from the hon. Minister, when he and every member of this House must know, that the Award was not paid until some time after he and his colleagues came into office, and that until almost the very time of its payment it was a matter of considerable uncertainty that it would be ever paid. A glance at the hon. the Finance Minister's Budget Speech last Session, proves that to be the fact. In referring to the financial condition of the Dominion, when he and his colleagues took office, on the 19th October, 1878, he said the only source on which he could depend to meet the maturing liabilities of Canada, was the prospective payment of the Fishery Award. The hon.

Minister must now admit that, at least, for six months after the Session of 1878, the Award was not paid. Perhaps he meant that a member who is in opposition, has no right to ask anything of a Government, has no right to criticise any act or policy of a Government. Well, if that is to be taken as sound Parliamentary doctrine, I think I shall be allowed to tell the hon. Minister that, for the last five or six years, his own conduct has often been a very notorious violation of it. If others from Nova Scotia have been committing mistakes in reference to the matter, why did not the hon. member for Cumberland himself get up, and say, and do the right thing. He was in the House in the Session of 1878, and he has been a member of the Government since the payment of the Award, and not a word has he uttered as to the disposition of it, although he owes more to Nova Scotia than any man in this House, or out of it. True, he has made more promises to his native Province than any other man ever did, but that hardly satisfies the indebtedness. He has an opportunity now forced upon him of showing his appreciation of the claims of Nova Scotia, and I hope he will turn it to true account. The fair consideration and settlement of the question, even at this late hour, will fully atone for all the delays complained of. In the course of the few observations I propose to make on the subject, I consider it unnecessary to endeavour to show the benefits secured by the Treaty to the United States, or the value of the special advantages obtained for the Provinces interested. That there is a difference between the advantages interchanged, is beyond a doubt. We must also take it for granted that this difference is in favour of the United States, and that the extent to which this difference is at the expense of the Provinces, is the measure of the damages which the Commission at Halifax was appointed to ascertain, and which by the Award that Commission determined and declared to be five millions and a-half dollars. Under the section of the Treaty authorising the reference, it is plain that the Commissioners were nothing more than a board of assessors, to fix the amount in money which the United States should pay for the injury done to the Provinces by the interchange of concessions. An Award could not be made in favour of the United States, the Treaty did not contemplate that that country could be the loser by the transaction. It therefore provided, as I have said, for making an Award in favour of Great Britain, which Award is $5,500,000. One million of that sum was paid by the British Government to Newfoundland, and the balance, four millions and a-half was handed over to the Government of Canada. What we have to consider is, who is entitled to the latter amount, whether the Dominion generally, or merely the Provinces whose sea-coast Fisheries have been affected by the operation of the Treaty. The Confederation Act is always, and properly, referred to for the settlement of this question. It is contended by those who oppose the Provincial right, that the Fisheries which the Provinces enjoyed before the Union, became by that event the exclusive property of the Dominion, and in support of that view Section 91 of the Union Act is invariably relied on. On reading this section, and comprehending its obvious and natural meaning, one cannot see that its object is the transference or vesting of property. It simply confers upon the Parliament of Canada the exclusive Legislative authority over a certain number of subjects therein specifically enumerated. Among these subjects we find Sea Coast and Inland Fisheries, the Postal Service, Sable Island, the raising of money by any mode or system of taxation. In conferring legislative power over these subjects upon the Parliament of Canada the section takes it—that is the same power from the Provincial Legislatures. Whatever powers of making laws respecting these subjects the Provincial Legislatures possessed before the passage of Section 91, became by it vested in the Federal Parliament. Only the powers of legislation over, not the ownership, or property in the subjects were transferred. If the contrary view is correct Section 108 of the same Act and the schedule to which it refers, become mere surplusages in the Act of Union. No one will admit that. This section declares that only the Public Works and the property of each Province enumerated in the third schedule to the Act, shall be the property of Canada. Looking at this schedule, we find it includes Post Offices,

Custom Houses, Sable Island, etc.; thus vesting them in the Dominion Parliament as its property, and showing that section 91 did not do so, and was not intended to do so. We find the Fisheries are not included in the schedule, and therefore must conclude and admit that, the property in the Sea Coast and Inland Fisheries exists exactly where it did before Confederation. We must always bear in mind, that the Union Act makes an important distinction between the legislative powers over, and the property in, certain subjects. Before 1867 the sea within three miles of the shore, was the domain of the Province, and therefore formed a part of its territory. Up to that time the Province had a right to legislate respecting this territorial domain; and by the Union only, that right had been conferred on the Parliament of Canada. It may be said the Fisheries were never vested in the Province, that they always were the property of the Crown. I am not disposed to maintain that they were not the property of the Crown, but if they were the property of the Crown before the Union, I say they are so to-day. I believe the proprietary right did vest, and does vest, in the Crown as a trustee for the benefit of the Provinces which so long enjoyed the Fisheries, and which, to such a large extent, depended on them as a source of wealth, and as a means of livelihood for hundreds of thousands of their population. The British Government practically declared that to be the case, by the payment of a million dollars to the Province of Newfoundland, and, I venture to say, expected that this Government, on receiving the balance, would follow the just example, and fairly apportion it between the other Provinces affected. I trust the example will be followed, especially as the relations existing between these Provinces and the rest of Canada, are supposed to be closer than those existing between England and Newfoundland. It has been said by some, and it has been said just now by the hon. the Prime Minister, that the money belongs to Canada, and should not be paid over to the Provinces affected by the Treaty, because as the right hon. gentleman remarked, Canada in a few years, that is, when the Treaty will be terminated, may have, at a great expense, to protect these Fisheries, and because

Canada now is expending largely in lighting the coast, and improving the coast navigation of the Maritime Provinces. It is well known that this Parliament became bound to protect all the Fisheries in the Dominion as well as the land of the Dominion, when it assumed the Militia and Defence of Canada. The Fisheries were protected by this Parliament before the Washington Treaty, and the Maritime Provinces contributed their share of the cost of the protection given. Should they require the protection the First Minister predicts, and should Canada refuse to give it, I am sure England, as in other days, would come to the rescue. We remember that this House, in the Session of 1871, voted $200,000 to meet the expenditure incurred in repelling the Fenian invasion of 1870, and this sum was in excess of the Parliamentary provision made for that purpose in the preceding Session. The Maritime Provinces paid at least their share of this expenditure, although it was not they, but old Canada that had been threatened or injured by the invasion. The Fisheries cost the Dominion a large sum of money to-day which, perhaps, is money well spent. I will be allowed to refer to the unequal and unfair manner in which this expenditure is apportioned among the various Provinces of the Dominion. The reference will show that Ontario at least has no reason to complain of her share. I find the expenditure on account of Fisheries for the last year to be as follows: Ontario, for overseers' salaries, $11,741.40; for fish-breeding, $7,102.54, amounting to $18,843.94. Quebec, for overseers' salaries, $13,606.06; fish-breeding, $5,772.70; Fisheries Protection Service, Gulf of St. Lawrence, $8,994.48, in all $28,374.44. Nova Scotia, overseers' salaries, $14,312.76; fish-breeding, $2,687.44, amounting to $17,000.20. New Brunswick, overseers' salaries, $10,858.64; fish-breeding, $1,139, amounting to $11,997.64. British Columbia, overseers' salaries, $1,423.73, and Manitoba, $200. It is necessary to give the value of the products of the Fisheries of the Dominion to properly appreciate the discrimination. The value of the products in the same year is the following: Ontario, $348,122; Quebec, $2,664,055; New Brunswick, $2,305,790; Prince Edward Island, $840,344; British Columbia, $925,766, and Nova Scotia, $6,131,000. Nearly one-half the aggregate value belongs to Nova Scotia, and if we deduct the shares of British Columbia and Ontario, because they are not subject to the Treaty, Nova Scotia will be found to possess more than one-half the value of the products of the Fisheries in all the Provinces of the Dominion subjected to the operation of the Treaty. The hon. the First Minister, while at Washington negotiating the Treaty, took good care to exempt from its operation the Fisheries of his fond Ontario. In reference to the exemption, we find him, in the Session of 1872, while introducing the Bill giving effect to the Fishery clauses of the Treaty, making the following statement: "He reminded the House that the Lake Fisheries, and the valuable Fisheries of Hudson Bay, did not come within the operation of the Treaty. He believed that, twelve years from now, when the British and American Governments sat down to readjust this Treaty, these Fisheries would be found to be a great source of wealth to the Dominion. The inland lakes were excepted because the Americans had, by their reckless management of the Fisheries, destroyed the value of the Fisheries on the south side of the lakes." If the Fisheries of Ontario, which yield now only some $300,000 annually, were expected by him, under the exemption, to become in twelve years a source of wealth to the Dominion, what wealth had not the Dominion a right to expect from the Fisheries of Nova Scotia if similarly privileged, when, in spite of the Treaty and the "reckless management" of the Americans, they produce a yearly value of nearly $7,000,000? We find the Fisheries of Ontario excepted, and we find them, although worth only a trifle over $300,000, to cost the Dominion, last year, nearly $19,000, while the Fisheries of Nova Scotia enjoyed and destroyed by the Americans, and still giving nearly $7,000,000, receive Protection only to the extent of $17,000. To assume that the Fisheries of the Maritime Provinces were to be protected at the expense of these Fisheries, is something never dreamed of at the time of Confederation. I see before me, on the Treasury Benches, four hon. gentlemen from the Maritime Provinces, who took a very prominent part, in their respective Provinces, in consummating the Union. I ask them if even the most extravagant opponents of the measure at that time anticipated such a result. Every hon. member in this House must remember the unpopularity of the measure in Nova Scotia, although no one at the time foresaw its effects on the Fisheries. So unpopular was it, that at the next election, the hon. member for Cumberland was the only advocate who escaped to come here to tell the tale. Our harbour improvements and lighthouses, by the terms of Union, are plainly chargeable to the Dominion, although, the hon. the First Minister insinuates their maintenance gives a claim to this Parliament on the price of the Fisheries. He stated that large expenditures are being made in these services. Perhaps there are, but I fail to see that they are made in the direction of compensation to the Provinces affected by the Treaty. Looking at the last Estimates brought down in this House, I observe, that while Ontario gets $59,850 for harbours and breakwaters, Nova Scotia gets $21,770, about one-third of the subsidy to Ontario.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I said the Maritime Provinces.

MR. McISAAC: That only strengthens my position more and more. The same unjust discrimination is applied to the other Lower Provinces. New Brunswick gets $21,000, and Prince Edward Island $9,900, just a little more than the salary enjoyed by the Cabinet Minister from that Island. We see by this that Ontario which is so much more favoured in its Fishing interests, receives for navigation improvements more than the aggregate provision for the Maritime Provinces for the same purpose, and as I remarked, about three times the grant to Nova Scotia. I may observe that the harbours and piers of Nova Scotia upon which our fishermen and ship-owners so much depend, for convenience and safety in their perilous calling, were not for the past ten years so much neglected, as they had been for the last fifteen months. Useful works that were commenced two years ago are either suspended or abandoned altogether. Piers and breakwaters that had been started and wrecked by recent storms are allowed to disappear, when the timely expenditure of a few thousand dollars in many cases would save the loss of tens of thousands, and be a valuable benefit to the fishermen and others interested in the sea coast navigation. Instances of this description are to be found in the county I have the honour to come from, and they are fully and truthfully brought to the notice of the Government, both by petitions and personal representations, yet, that they are under the consideration of the Government is the most encouraging reply. In the Estimates referred to, it will be seen that this year, the sum of $2,491,400 is voted for the canals of the Dominion, $17,400 of this amount is for St. Peter's Canal, the only canal in the Maritime Provinces. Last year $4,032,000 was voted for the same purpose, of which $90,000 was for St. Peter's. This expensive attention is bestowed on the canals, because it is well known they greatly contribute to the development of the trade and commerce of the old Provinces of Canada. I shall not refer to the millions and millions of dollars that are expended in the North-West and on the other side of the Rocky Mountains, in building a railroad that will never be of any benefit to the Eastern Provinces. I will simply say that the admitted cost of completing and equipping the Pacific Railway, will be something in excess of one hundred and fifty million dollars, to which Nova Scotia under the ordinary mode of making revenue, contributes more, proportionally, as she does to every Public Work in Canada, than any other Province of the Dominion. Hon. gentlemen say that is not so, but I say it is so, and before I sit down I shall prove it by authorities which are recognised by both sides of the House. The Washington Treaty as we all know, was not negotiated for the settlement of the Fishery question. It was negotiated primarily for the settlement of the Alabama question. But according to the speech of the Prime Minister in 1872, to which I have already alluded, the settlement of the primary question would be difficult, if not impossible, without at the same time settling and adjusting all other questions—including the Fishery question—which threatened to disturb the peaceful relations between England and the United States. The settlement of the Alabama case, he said was of more importance to the Dominion than it was even to England, therefore he asked the House to support the Bill he was introducing. The Alabama question is settled, and with greater advantage to the Dominion than to England,—its settlement was made practicable at the expense of the Provinces affected. Nothing, therefore, seems to be more just and natural, than that the compensation awarded should be handed over to those who had to make the sacrifice. I would draw the attention of the House to the settlement of the Alabama claims. It is well known the Arbitrators at Geneva awarded $15,500,000 to the Government of the United States in damages for the depredations committed by the Alabama and other vessels allowed to escape from British ports. That amount was paid by the British Government to the American Government. It was the money of the American Government, just as the Fishery Award was the money of the British Government. The two sums legally belonged to the Governments respectively receiving them. Yet we find the United States did not place the money in the American Treasury for national purposes. No, the Government of that Great Country is yet distributing it among those who suffered loss by the acts complained of. England also might drop the $5,500,000 into the Imperial Treasury, but she did not choose to do so. It would be not discredit to this Government to follow the example. I heard it maintained by some gentlemen, not on the floors of the House, that because so many representatives from the Maritime Provinces supported the Treaty in 1872, that, thereby, these Provinces waived their right to their present claim. I admit no representative from Nova Scotia, as far as I can ascertain, at that time, claimed that the money compensation should go to the Provinces to be affected. I believe, however, they distinctly understood it would be so disposed of, and that in consequence they gave the Bill their support. The answer of the hon. the leader of the Government, before he said Bill finally passed, to the question asked in the House by the present Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec, as to what pledge the Government would give in reference to the disposition of the compensation, would leave no doubt in the minds of hon. gentlemen on the matter. The answer was, that the money or compensation, would be subject to the vote and pleasure of Parliament, and that the Government could give no pledge as to its disposal. This shows the leader of the Government himself at that time believed the money was not in the nature of an item of ordinary revenue—that it was special or casual revenue and should, therefore, be specially disposed of. The hon. the Finance Minister did not wait for this vote of Parliament, because it seems from his own statement this was the first money he took hold of on assuming office. I may also state that this money was promised to the electors of Nova Scotia during the last election. My friend, the hon. member for Guysborough was frank enough last Session to make the following statement in reference to this matter. He said that he had stated to his constituents, that as we had received an Award of five and a-half million dollars, the fishermen of Nova Scotia would receive their share. He stated that either in building breakwaters, or in some other way the Government would judiciously and wisely expend the money. On the same occasion he said that he believed the same Government that protected the Fisheries in former years would do so in the future, and that when the Estimates would come down, the Government would show that they were disposed to do justice to the Maritime Provinces. I fail to discover what additional or new protection the fishermen received since. It is true that by the influence of the hon. member with the Government, an Order in Council was passed last Session limiting the time for catching lobsters. Perhaps that is the protection he meant and promised. If that is so, and if we are to believe petitions recently addressed to the Legislature of Nova Scotia, we must conclude that that famous Order in Council protected only the lobsters, and probably the hon. member for Guysborough, while it starved the fishermen. If we take the Estimates brought down since that announcement was made, we cannot see that much of the award or any other money had been voted for the breakwaters of Nova Scotia. Of the $21,000 in the Estimates this year for the harbours and breakwaters of Nova Scotia, I notice the hon. gentleman gets $5,000 for a burying ground in his county. This may satisfy him, however. Hon. members, say oh no, for a burying ground! I say yes, and refer these gentlemen to page fifty of the Estimates. It may be a misprint, and I confess I was surprised myself when I saw the item, but on recurring to the starving condition of so many of the hon. gentleman's constituents, I thought it rather a considerate appropriation. He says they are not starving—that they are well fed. I hope so. I was told a few days since that the Government sent 350 barrels of cornmeal to these poor people, to be paid for by labour on some public work. I am happy to learn they got relief, although they should have to pay dear for it. This quantity of meal, it is said, was bought at $3.50 per barrel, making the cost of the lot $1,225. Of this amount $140 is for duty, at the rate of 40c. a barrel, imposed on that article by hon. gentlemen last year, as a part of their great protection scheme. They will see now that the effect of that protection on the poor fishermen is to give them only 350 barrels of cornmeal for $1,225, when, without the protection of 40c., they could receive forty-five barrels more for the same money. It was stated by some hon. gentlemen opposite last year, when this cruel duty was opposed, that cornmeal was used only as feed for cattle; that its imposition would not affect the poor man. But when the wail of distress from Nova Scotia reached them, the only relief they would give was in the shape of this cattle feed.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: It ought to be oatmeal.

MR. McISAAC: That certainly would be human food, and I am glad to see the right hon. gentleman does not forget its superior virtue, but it seems he and his friends consider it too precious for the starving multitudes of Nova Scotia. I may be asked on what basis I should propose to make an apportionment of the $4,500,000 between the Provinces claiming a distribution. The basis is quite a natural one. Let the money be divided according to the value of the fish yield of the Provinces affected. Regard should be had, at the same time, to the shipping, boats, nets and all manner of capital used in the prosecution of the Fisheries of these Provinces. On this basis Nova Scotia's share could not be less than $2,000,000, the interest of which at 5 per cent. would give the Province $100,000 year. Two or three hon. gentlemen from Prince Edward Island, apart from the grounds they advance in common with the other Provinces seem to attach great importance to two special grounds—these special grounds are first that their Province was not a part of the Union when the Treaty went into operation, and secondly that the National Policy does not suit their Province—that it benefits other portions of the Dominion, and that, therefore, the Island should get something for the sacrifice. I believe these special arguments apply equally to Nova Scotia, because it never entered into Confederation as the hon. member for Cumberland must distinctly remember. As to the bearing of the National Policy argument on Nova Scotia, I will merely refer hon. gentlemen to the unceasing migration of the people of that Province for the last eight or ten months, not to any other part of Canada, but to the United States. I would not touch this matter had not hon. gentlemen from Prince Edward Island done so in discussing the question before the House. The other day the hon. the Finance Minister gave as a reason for asking an adjournment of the debate that the Government were preparing papers in connection with the subject that should be brought down. The debate is resumed but these papers have not come. He, however, stated this evening, that the address of the Nova Scotia Legislature in reference to this question, and the financial condition of that Province, would be laid on the Table before the Debate would close. This information will render it relevant for me to make a few remarks respecting this address which I had an opportunity of seeing in the public papers. It asks, among other things, for a renewal of the better terms subsidy to Nova Scotia. I trust the Government will take that matter into consideration, and see it proper to grant a renewal. I may be told that this is not the time for me, or for any member on this side of the House to make such an application. I may be told the application should have been made when the subsidy was about lapsing. I can reply that the application was made at that time to the Government of the day by their friends from Nova Scotia in this House, and by the late Government of that Province. The application, however, unfortunately was not successful. It elicited a piece of information which is of importance to Nova Scotia, and that much good the application effected. It is this. The late Finance Minister (Mr. Cartwright) in his reply to the application for a continuance of the $82,000 better terms, made this statement. "Moreover, an examination of taxation per capita paid by the people of Nova Scotia seems to show conclusively, that in this event they would probably be compelled to pay more into the Exchequer of the Dominion than she could possibly receive again. He refers, of course, to a statement in the first part of his reply, that no additional grant could be made to Nova Scotia without involving similar grants to the other Provinces. This shows, as far as Mr. Cartwright is an authority, that the people of Nova Scotia pay more per head into the Dominion treasury than the people of any of the other Provinces. Sir John Rose, Finance Minister in the right hon. gentleman's Government in 1869, virtually confirms the above statement. In his report on the case presented by Messrs. Howe and McLellan, for better terms, he says: "The undersigned is not insensible to the arguments which were verbally pressed, that the smaller Provinces—Nova Scotia and New Brunswick—are in some respects at a disadvantage as compared with the larger ones; that the cost of their Local Government must necessarily be more per head; that the resources of Nova Scotia are comparatively undeveloped; that the coal trade, on which she depends for a considerable portion of her revenue, is in a condition of unusual depression; and that the physical character of the country entails on her a larger expenditure to secure the necessary means of communication than the other Provinces have to meet." He concludes his report as follows: "The undersigned would add, in conclusion, that he has carefully analysed the estimated local expenditure of Nova Scotia, for the years 1868 and 1869, in conjunction with the gentlemen representing the Province, and he believes that, if the arrangements proposed are carried out, Nova Scotia will have sufficient means at her disposal to meet those services which devolve upon her by the terms of the Union Act, provided they are placed on a moderate but efficient footing. If, on the contrary, the Province has to depend on the provision made by the existing terms of the Union Act, no inconsiderable deficiency must be met by the imposition of direct taxation." We have it now plainly before us from the pen of these high financial authorities representing the two great political parties in Canada, that Nova Scotia by the terms of Confederation, occupies the most disadvantageous position of all the Provinces of the Dominion. It is as possible as it is proper to do her justice yet. We are often told in Nova Scotia, that members on this side of the House, opposed the granting of the better terms in 1869, and that they will always oppose the interests of that Province. If they did oppose the better terms, I hope they will not oppose the renewal of these terms. Even should some of them offer opposition, the Government is strong enough to grant us justice without them. I should not, however, state that gentlemen of the Opposition in 1869, opposed the better terms on the ground that Nova Scotia had no just claim, they merely disapproved of the mode in which the re-arrangement was proposed to be made. On that occasion the hon. member for Cumberland, if my recollection is accurate, was the only man who declared his Province had no just claim on the merits of the case. He said he would not ask for an increased subsidy to Nova Scotia on the ground of a just consideration of her claims, but on the ground of a legal consideration of the Union Act. The Opposition of that day also opposed the adoption of the Washington Treaty, and if Nova Scotia shall not receive her due share of the award, the opponents of that measure should be considered the friends of that Province. The Government and their friends always claim credit for the addition of $82,000 to the Nova Scotia subsidy. They should not lose the credit, if they are entitled to much. The 82,000 amounted, in the ten years of its continuance, to 820,000, taken, of course, out of the General Treasury and given to Nova Scotia.

The interest on Nova Scotia's share of the award every year is at least $100,000 which, in ten years, amounts to $1,000,000. If gentlemen opposite withhold that fair proportion, they present in point of establishing the credit claimed by their action of 1869, the novel spectacle of being benefactors of the Province by giving it $820,000 in ten years, and taking from it $1,000,000 in ten years, and $1,000,000 annually ever afterwards. In 1869, when the better terms were arranged, the surrender of the Fisheries was not foreseen, and, therefore, did not enter the calculation. It is plain that if the award goes into the Dominion Treasury, Nova Scotia will have paid back, in less than ten years, the amount received by the $82,000, and who will call the arrangement of 1869 better terms for that Province after that. I hope now both sides of the House will generously unite and raise Nova Scotia to the financial level of the other Provinces. The chief grounds on which the better terms were urged in 1869 were mainly these, 1st.—That by Confederation Nova Scotia was importing more dutiable goods per head of the population than any of the other Provinces; 2nd.—That its Tariff was increased and, therefore, its taxes. As is well known the Tariff then was 15 per cent., and it was promised it would not at any time go beyond that. 3rd.—That the annual amount at the disposal of the Province at the time of the Union, for local services, was reduced at least by $200,000. These reasons exist to-day as strongly as they did in 1869. To realise the financial condition of the Province, I would refer the House to the Address the hon. the Finance Minister is placing on the Table. Since the sum of $82,000 was granted to Nova Scotia for ten years, as instalment of justice, under a 15 per cent. Tariff, now that the Tariff is doubled, that subsidy should be doubled also. I would not urge that it should be doubled. Let it be $100,000, not for a term of years, but for all time to come. That sum, added to the interest of our share of the Award, which I put down at the reasonable figure of $100,000 also, would give Nova Scotia $200,000 additional subsidy. This amount, of course, is not to be limited to five or ten years, but is expected to be a perpetual annuity to the Province.

Nothing less would be justice. I hope the Government and the House will fully and fairly consider the whole subject and decide to add, in perpetuity, $200,000 to the subsidy of Nova Scotia.

Mr. OGDEN: It appears very strange that, during the last few nights, both myself and the county I represent have been made the targets for certain hon. gentlemen opposite. With reference to my speech last year—I would not call those few remarks a speech, but considering that it was my first Session in this House, I thought a few words from me would be expected—I had not been here for five years without opening my mouth, as has been the case with some hon. gentlemen opposite, and I thought I would let my constituents know where I was, and show them that I advocated the same principles here that I advocated on the hustings. The same words I made use of on nomination day I made use of on the floor of this House last year. I said I believed we were entitled to a fair share of the Fishery Award, that, as it came from the sea, the fishermen were entitled to a fair portion of it. I said on nomination day that I had full confidence in Sir John A. Macdonald and his party, and hoped they would be returned to power, believing they would deal justly and generously with the fishermen; and those opinions I expressed in this House last Session. With regard to the National Policy, I pledged myself to support it. I read Sir John A. Macdonald's resolutions to the people and put my own construction upon them. I said I was willing to vote to tax flour 50c. per barrel, that I was willing to vote for a duty of 50c. on corn meal, provided we received a similar protection on every ton of coal imported into this country, and a reduction in duty upon tea, molasses, and other necessaries of life. That was square; the people believed I would fulfil my pledges, and I was returned by a majority of the electors. I did not come in by a fluke, as did the hon. members for Antigonish and Shelburne. The hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Gillmor) made a shot at me last night about the starving fishermen in Guysborough county. The hon. member for Shelburne (Mr. Robertson) also alluded to me, a few days ago, by putting upon the notice paper several questions relative to the affairs of my county. Well, I thought the hon. gentleman was busying himself very much about every part of Nova Scotia, and, not only Nova Scotia, but I observe he has also taken the Provinces of New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island under his protecting wing. A short time ago he sailed up into the lakes of the Upper Provinces, and inquired how many tug boats there were, and how much coal had been imported for their special use, and at what cost per ton. Looking over the notice paper I find that the name of the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), appears thirteen times; that of the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie), six times; that of the hon. member for Victoria (Sir John A. Macdonald), eight times; that of the late Finance Minister, ten times; that of the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross), ten times; that of the hon. member for East Northumberland (Mr. Cockburn), eight times; that of the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Keeler), four times. Several other members have had motions on the notice paper, making an average of four for each member, and none above five; but the name of the hon. member for Shelburne (Mr. Robertson), one of the youngest members in this House, appears twenty-five times, far exceeding those put by the hon. the Premier, or the hon. leader of the Opposition combined. Now, I was going to suggest that the Government change the order, and set apart one day in each week for the special benefit of the hon. member for Shelburne, for if his questions increase in the future as rapidly as they have in the past, it will be absolutely necessary to do so in order to get through with the business of the House before the first of June. Now, with reference to the starving fishermen in Guysborough county, I am sorry to have the circumstance paraded before the public, and I do not think the fishermen will thank hon. gentlemen for their action. I am sorry to hear it asserted in this House that there is, or has been, anybody starving there. There is no starvation in my county. It is true, that owing to the failure of the mackerel and other fisheries last year—a parallel case has not been known since 1868—I believe there has been in some cases destitution. As regards the Government supplies to the fishermen, I suppose the Government is fully competent to explain how that was done; but when word came to me that the people were almost starving in some places, and could not procure any assistance, that is where there were no Government works in operation, what did I do? I did not stick a question on the notice paper and then stand up in the House and say that I was receiving too much indemnity, that we were receiving twice as much as we ought to receive, but I dipped down into my own pocket and took out a quarter of my indemnity for this year and purchased therewith, provisions and sent them down to the suffering people in my own county, and so long as I have the honour to represent them in this House, they, I trust, shall never starve. I think it is grossly impertinent of the hon. member for Shelburne to be continually prying into the affairs of other members' counties. It would be equally as impertinent for me to go to the hon. the Minister of Agriculture and say to him, "Will you furnish me a return of the number of pigs taken from some lunatic asylum in Nova Scotia and sent by the hon. member for Shelburne into his county" thus propagating a race of lunatic pigs, and selling them to farmers at $2.00 each. With reference to the amendment moved by the right hon. the Premier, I do not agree with it, and cannot support him. He may be right from a constitutional point of view, but in equity I think we are entitled to a share and should have it. We want the money badly for our Province as it is almost bankrupt. I think if the hon. gentlemen of the Opposition from the Lower Provinces had only talked a little more fairly, they might have awakened some sympathy for our cause in the minds of Ontario members, and have induced them to vote with us. But it seems no speech made by these hon. gentlemen can be complete unless it contains an attack either upon the hon. the Minister of Railways or upon myself. I am glad, however, to be in such good company and am willing to support the hon. Minister in everything that is right; and I do not know but I would strain a point to support him even if he was not quite right, because our case would not be any better in the hands of our opponents, and I have a great deal of confidence in the ability of the hon. gentleman. I hope we shall obtain our full share of the Fishery Award. I would object to giving it to the Local Governments to spend in each Province, because I think it ought to be distributed in some way for the benefit of the fishermen. I say these men must and shall be protected; and if the Government should fail to lend them a helping hand when called upon, I would be the first man to vote against the Government.

We never hear of a murder, theft or any kind of crime being perpetrated by those hardy sons of toil; and when hunger, nay, when death itself, stares them in the face, you will find them honest and true, and ready to sacrifice their own lives to alleviate the sufferings of their fellow-men.

MR. BRECKEN: I am sorry to see this important question treated with so much levity by hon. gentlemen on the other side; we have had coal, breakwaters, estimates, better terms, and even pigs, brought into this discussion. The question now under the consideration of the House is this: Have the Lower Provinces the right or not to ask for the money that was paid by the United States for the concessions made to them by the Washington Treaty? I exceedingly regret I was not present when the right hon. the Premier addressed the House on the constitutional aspects of the question; for although my acquaintance with him has been short, his reputation is such that I have formed the impression that to listen to him on a question of constitutionality is to learn something. I do not know what the right hon. member said, but I can draw upon my imagination as to the course of argument he would likely pursue. I am not prepared to say that, by the strict and unbending rules of International Law, the Fishing territory, from which the Americans were excluded previous to the Washington Treaty, is Provincial property; but leaving out of consideration the strict principles of law, I would ask the hon. leader of the Government to say whether we are not in justice entitled to what we are asking for. The Premier is a great statesman, he has a large and generous heart, and an excellent and well cultivated mind; and when he goes down to his little, narrow, cold home—his dust to fraternise with his kindred dust—before he is consigned to his grave, if a post-mortem were held upon him and his heart examined, we would, I believe, find distinctly engraved on it the words: "Canada and her prosperity, God bless her." I ask him to listen to me; and, although he is a lawyer, he must remember that law is one thing and justice, sometimes, another. I would ask him to consider the claims of Prince Edward Island. I am not asking for pity; I am not begging for bread, I am demanding what I believe to be her right; and I will tell you why, Mr. Speaker. The Treaty of Washington was made in 1871; at that time Prince Edward Island was not a part of the Dominion of Canada. It is a calamity for her that she ever threw in her lot with the Dominion. I am loyal enough to believe that the policy of Confederation is one which tends to bind us closer to the Mother Country, and is one which every Canadian should support. We were assured that, if we came into the Union, this little Island of ours would receive many advantages; that the little baby of the Dominion would never want for food. I would like to know what interest the rest of the Dominion has in our Fisheries. If they were developed would it put one cent into the pockets of Ontario or the more distant western Provinces? If they were destroyed would it take a cent out of their pockets? The right hon. the leader of the Government tells us the Fisheries are Dominion property. Technically he may be right, but practically he is wrong. On the very day that the Treaty of Washington was signed, Mr. Fish, Secretary of State for the United States, addressed to Sir Edward Thornton, the British Minister at Washington, a despatch asking that the citizens of the United States should have the enjoyment; or the liberty to fish within the territorial waters of Her Britannic Majesty on the coasts of Canada, Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland, during the seasons of 1871 and 1872. I was Attorney General of the Island at that time, and when we acceded to the request of Mr. Fish we gave up a trump card. We knew well the value which our American friends put upon our Fisheries. We always considered that, with the Fishery limit in our hands, we were in a position to deal with the Americans, and that we had then something to offer them in lieu of reciprocal Free-trade. We knew about the difficulties of the Mother Country with the United States—the Alabama Claims—and we unselfishly yielded up our interests, rather than that any trouble should arise between England and the United States. That the right hon. the First Minister may not think that I am drawing upon my imagination, but that I am stating what the Government of Prince Edward Island felt and thought was their true position, I will read from the Minutes of Council of the Island Government, of the date of the 17th July, 1871. The Committee of Council, after referring to the despatch of the 17th June, 1871, from the Earl of Kimberly, then Secretary of State for the Colonies, to Lieutenant-Governor Robinson, then administering the Government of the Island, in which it was strongly urged upon the Government of the Island that, for reasons stated in a despatch of the same date as above from Earl Kimberly to Lord Lisgar, the same course should be pursued as in 1854, and the application made by the United States Government, acceded to by Prince Edward Island, so that the American fisherman might be at once allowed during the present season the provisional use of the privileges granted to them by the Treaty, set forth:

“That they have respectfully to submit that Prince Edward Island is the most fertile and productive Province in British North America, in proportion to its extent. That the natural market for its principle productions is to be found in the United States, as was very satisfactorily proved during the continuance of the Reciprocity Treaty of 1854. That the Fisheries of this Island are the best and most valuable in America, and are much appreciated by the fishermen of the United States. That the different Governments and Legislatures of this colony have always hoped that these Fisheries would have done much to secure the advantages of another Reciprocity Treaty, or of some Tariff concessions authorising the free admission of the products of our agriculturists, who form the majority of our population, and which would have resulted in promoting the prosperity of the colony. That by the Treaty now under consideration, the inhabitants of the Island are asked to surrender to the citizens of the United States these valuable Fisheries without receiving in return any just or fair equivalent, such as was hoped to be obtained.”

“That the surrender by the United States of the right of fishing down to the thirty-ninth degree of latitude is comparatively worthless to the people of the Island, and as the United States assert that the privileges accorded to their citizens under Article 18 of this Treaty are not of greater value than those accorded by Articles 19 and 20 to the subjects of Her Britannic Majesty, the amount of money compensation that would be given to the Island would be insignificant. The Committee of Council, by their Minute, further submitted that a commercial arrangement with the United States, in consideration of the use of the Fisheries, would have been most acceptable; but as the Royal High Commissioners were unable to induce the American Government to change its commercial policy, the people of the Island, being extremely loyal, and devotedly attached to British institutions, would be most unwilling to throw any obstacle in the way of an amicable settlement of all causes of differences between Great Britain and the United States, and would therefore willingly accept any reasonable money compensation in addition to the privileges granted as an equivalent, but under the Treaty nothing of the kind was guaranteed them.”

It cannot be said we do not understand the meaning of the word “enough.” I once saw it defined in the Toronto Globe as meaning “a little more.” We believed that when we were going into Confederation the Fisheries belonged practically to us. If the Americans were admitted to fish within the three-mile limit we would receive compensation. Looking over the right hon. gentleman’s resolution, I see he says something about protecting the Fisheries. What is that argument worth? If there never had been a Treaty of Washington, the Dominion Government would have been bound to protect the Fisheries. As we have been so often euchred by our Republican neighbours, we hardly expected to receive anything in the shape of compensation for the concessions made to them, and that is, perhaps, the real reason why so little was said about our claim to a share of the Award. Now, suppose no amount had been awarded to the Dominion, or that the Award had been the other way, would not the Fisheries have to be protected at the expense of the Dominion Exchequer. Suppose that Western Canada were subjected to another Fenian raid, would not the Province of Prince Edward Island, in common with the other Provinces of the Dominion, have to contribute her quota to the cost of defending the country. Among the various duties and responsibilities assumed by the Dominion, when the Provinces of British North America were confederated, was the protection of the Fisheries; and that, too, when there was no expectation of ever receiving a cent from the United States in shape of compensation for the enjoyment of our Fisheries. Here is another answer to the protection and defence argument of my right hon. friend. Suppose, when the term for which the Treaty was made has expired, that the American Government should decline to renew the Treaty, and that we shall have fallen back on the old state of things as they existed before the Treaty, the Fisheries will then have to be protected at the cost of the Dominion; and, Mr. Speaker, that protection, to be at all efficient, will involve more than one or two small steamers such as the Druid and the Newfield. It will require a small navy to make the protection of any substantial benefit to Dominion fishermen. The cost must necessarily be heavy. I can well imagine what dissatisfaction this expenditure would cause to the people of Ontario and the Great North-West, who have practically no interest in these Fisheries and care very little about them. A strong feeling would soon arise, and the hon. members from the west would object to the expenditure of their taxes to protect an industry in which practically they had no interest. In all probability a pressure would be brought on the Government of the day, the protection would be minimised, and, in effect, American fishermen would fish in our water free of cost. With reference to the National Policy: I made some remarks to the effect that it did not benefit Prince Edward Island as it did other parts of the Dominion. My remarks have been misrepresented. I did not say or argue that, because that Policy was not advantageous to us, that, therefore, we had a right to a share of the Fishery Award. I brought it in, not as an argument, but to show to this House that if we had any claim to a share of the Award, the fact of our not sharing in the benefits of the National Policy strengthened the equity of our case. If we have a substantial, equitable claim, we do not want to be thrown over by the cast-iron rules of International Law. All the attendant circumstances should be considered. Every dollar spent in Prince Edward Island brings good results. We do not throw away money into the sea, on canals, Fort Frances locks, and a variety of works of that kind. I think we will receive the fairest consideration at the hands of the Government, and then we will be quiet. We are charged with being grumblers. Unless we are continually grumbling and pressing our claims we shall get nothing. I can well imagine some of the difficulties that the Government has to encounter in disposing of the Award, but I press strongly upon them the exceptional claims of Prince Edward Island. Look at our insular position; think of the millions of dollars that have been spent on the Pacific Railway—millions that have irretrievably been lost and sunk, and for which the Dominion will never receive a cent's worth of benefit. If Prince Edward Island were to receive 5 per cent. on the large amounts that have been uselessly squandered in the North-West, we would be satisfied and quiet for the next twelve years to come. As I said, when I addressed this House on a former occasion, the Lower Provinces do not object to the construction of the Pacific Railway. We look up to it as a great work necessary for the development of the now Great Lone Land; but at this time hon. members scarcely realise the difficulties that Prince Edward Islanders have to undergo and how we are in want of the expenditure of public money. Look at our mail communication at this season of the year. I am now ten days without having heard from my home. I heard the hon. the Finance Minister, the other day, say that the result of the Government Railway policy would be that, in a few years, we shall have hundreds of thousands of people in the vast territory of the North-West. I believe his prediction will prove true. Well, Sir, we are helping to bring this about; Prince Edward Island is one-fortieth of the Dominion in population, and more than that in impotence. Let us then have our fair proportion in the advantages of being first of the Dominion. I could occupy the time of the House for hours on this subject, but it would not be wise in me to do so. I feel very warmly on it; I hope the Government will take our claim into their grave consideration, and not overlook what is due to that smiling little Island—the most beautiful, the most fertile, and the most densely populated portion of the Dominion of Canada.

MR. MUTTART: My object in rising, Mr. Speaker, is not for the purpose of making a speech, but merely to say that Prince Edward Island's claims to a separate and distinct share of the Fishery Award have not been abandoned, notwithstanding the decision of the Sub-Committee of the Privy Council. I, therefore, give notice that, when the House goes into Committee, I will take the opportunity of moving the following:—

That after the word "Confederation" at the end of the last paragraph, in the original resolution, the following be added:—"That, while admitting the principle that the injury done to the Fisheries being of a local character, the compensation awarded should be distributed among the various Provinces in the proportion of the disadvantages and losses suffered. That it is, nevertheless, the opinion of this House that the Province of Prince Edward Island is entitled to a separate share of the Fishery Award on the following special grounds, namely: 1st. That before July 1st, 1873, the Treaty of Washington was in full force and effect as respects Prince Edward Island. 2nd. That there was no express or implied surrender of the interests of the Island in the Fishery Award at the time of the Island's entering Confederation. 3rd. That the British North America Act does not apply to a case where an interest in the Fisheries had been sold and conveyed away, and the right to the purchase money had accrued to the Island before Confederation, and such Act does not authorise the General Government to appropriate the proceeds of the sale of the Island Fisheries for the general purposes of the Dominion."

MR. ROBERTSON (Shelburne): After the able address delivered by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Richey), I do not intend to occupy the attention of the House at any length, as I have given expression to my views on the rights and privileges pertaining to the Maritime Provinces on this question on a previous occasion. Besides, after the speech of the right hon. the leader of the Government, it is useless for me, representing a Nova Scotian constituency, to speak in favour of the apportionment of this Award in the interests of the Maritime Provinces. Speeches may be made and strong arguments may be advanced, but the power and influence of that hon. gentleman is of sufficient strength in this House to carry any amendment and destroy any chance the Maritime Provinces may have had to secure a portion of this money. I do not see why I should have been the subject of attack by the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Ogden), because I certainly have said nothing to call down upon me his wrath. I occupy a different position to that hon. gentleman. He is a warm and enthusiastic supporter of the present Government, and an ardent friend of the hon. Ministers. No man can be more constant in his attendance on the Government than the hon. member for Guysborough, and therefore he has every opportunity for obtaining information which I am denied. He has seen fit to attack me, because I presented a petition from his county; and also, because I have taken advantage of my rights and privileges, as a member of Parliament, to ask a certain question in reference to the expenditure of public moneys among the fishermen of the county he represents. The petition that I presented, was signed by a large number of the electors of West Guysborough, and it was the unanimous wish of the petitioners that it should be presented by myself, and not by the hon. member for Guysborough; and I can tell the hon. gentlemen that a resolution was passed at that meeting, strongly condemning him for his conduct in Parliament.

MR. OGDEN: Does the hon. gentleman say that a resolution was passed to that effect?

MR. ROBERTSON: Yes; and a petition is being prepared, calling upon the hon. gentleman to resign. The hon. gentleman attacked me, also, because I asked for certain other information from the Government; my defence is not to him, but to the people I represent. The only means open for me to obtain information in connection with public matters is by motion or question in Parliament; and by any other course I would receive but little satisfaction. On one occasion, I asked the hon. the Minister of Public Works for a copy of a report in connection with public works in my county, which might have been given me without the necessity of a motion, but I was requested to pursue the proper course, as he then would have no objection to the papers being brought down. The hon. gentleman tells us there are no starving fishermen in the county of Guysborough. In contradiction of that statement, I may refer him to his hon. colleague in the representation of that county in the Local House. What is more, the starvation of these fishermen is the result of legislation by this Government supported by the hon. gentleman for the advancement of his own personal interest, irrespective of the interests of the county he represents. I think that, in giving a sum of money towards the support of the fishermen of Guysborough, it should have been given without any conditions, and not as an advance to be refunded by a certain time. When the people of Ireland were starving, the Parliament of Canada generously voted $100,000 towards their support; and we were told by cablegram, the other day, that a portion of the vote was set aside to buy boats and nets for fishermen on the west coast of that Island, but no condition was made, at that time, that the money so expended should be refunded; and I do not see why, especially as the Government receives large sums of money from the fishermen in the Lower Provinces, that any portion of the amount given to them should be awarded on condition of its return. I think we have an equitable claim to a portion of the Award. The Province is in an unfortunate position, financially; and the result is that, during the present year, large numbers of its people have been compelled to leave and find a home in the United States. Unless the Government awards us a portion of the money its action will be most unpopular, and its course will be condemned not only by its opponents but by many of its strongest supporters.

MR. MACDONALD (King's, P.E.I.) : It seems to me that one of the main points to determine in the discussion of this question is: When did the Treaty of Washington come into effect, as respects Prince Edward Island? We are told, over and over again, that it was the 1st of July, 1873; and in the report of the Sub-Committee of the Privy Council this fact is pointed out as the only reason why the claims of the Island are put on a level with those of the other Provinces. Is it true that the Fishery clauses of the Treaty did not come into effect until 1st July? We find that Article 33 of the Washington Treaty provides that the clause relating to the Fisheries should take effect as soon as the laws required were passed by the agreeing parties. The Province of Prince Edward Island passed the required legislation on the 29th July, 1872, and the Congress of the United States passed the necessary legislation on 1st March, 1873. Let us consider the condition we were in before the Treaty came into force, and the passing of the Acts referred to. When is an Act said to be in force? As I understand it, when it is passed by the House, and the Governor or the President has given it his sanction. A time may be appointed by the Act for its going into force, but that is an independent consideration, and does not apply to the Acts I have mentioned. At that time Prince Edward Island and the United States stood in the position of intending contracting parties. The one had sold rights, and the other had bought them. Section 5 of the Act passed by the United States Congress, on 1st March, 1873, is as follows:—

“That this Act shall not take effect until the 1st day of July, 1873, and shall not apply to any article of merchandise therein mentioned which shall be held in bond on that day by the Customs officers of the United States.”

We also find in Section I of the same Act:

“That whenever the President of the United States shall receive satisfactory evidence that the Imperial Parliament of Great Britain, the Parliament of Canada and the Legislature of Prince Edward Island have passed laws on their part, to give full effect to the provisions of the Treaty between the United States and Great Britain, signed at Washington on the 8th day of May, 1871, etc., etc., he is hereby authorised to issue his proclamation declaring that he has such evidence, and thereupon from the date of such proclamation, etc., etc. According to the terms and conditions of Article 33 of said Treaty, all fish-oil, and fish of all kinds (except fish of the inland lakes and fish preserved in oil) being the produce of the Fisheries of the Dominion of Canada or of Prince Edward Island, shall be admitted into the United States free of duty.”

We find that this could have taken effect any time between the 1st March and 1st July. I would like to call the attention of hon. members, who assert that the Act of Congress passed on the 1st March, 1873, only came into effect on 1st July, 1873, to the peculiar wording of the Act itself. Section I authorises the President to declare, by proclamation, that fish and fish oil of the Island shall be admitted free of duty, as soon as he shall have received satisfactory evidence that the legislation contemplated by Article 33 of the Washington Treaty had been passed. This means that the most important provision of the Act could have come into force long before 1st July, 1873, and shall not apply to any article of merchandise held in bond by the United States Customs officers on that day. This section does not seem to apply to the whole Act, but merely to mark the time beyond which the Customs officers could not collect duties. Then it was possible for the main provisions of the Treaty to go into effect, in regard to Prince Edward Island, even under the strictest interpretation of the Act, before 1st July, 1873. Section 5, which I have just read, is not a general, but a special, provision; and it was inserted chiefly with the object of enabling Custom-house officers of the United States to deal with the articles in bond at that date. What was the effect of this mutual legislation between Prince Edward Island and the United States? It was to vest in the Americans the right to fish in the territorial waters of the Island for the term of twelve years. The obligation to pay, secured by the Treaty, was held by the Island before the time of Confederation, and was a part of the separate property of the State, the same as the money in its Local Treasury. It also had the same effect as a solemn agreement would have between the contracting parties. It makes no difference whether the amount of payment was settled or not, or whether it was settled by the Award, and the Island held the right to that sum as part of its present assets, just as much as if it were bonds and promissory notes. Suppose I give a legal document to another party, conveying certain property to him for a consideration. That deed vests the right or claim to that property in the person to whom I give it, while it would vest in me the right to receive the consideration to be paid. Therefore, the question is: Whether the rights surrendered by the Island to the Dominion under Confederation took away her rights in the agreement between her and the United States? Did she surrender any bonds at the time of Confederation? No, she did not. Neither did she surrender any money that was in her Treasury at the time. Then how can it be said that the Island yielded up assets of a similar nature. There is no evidence of it. Besides, the burden of proof is in the Dominion, and if they fail to establish it it must be held that no surrender of the rights referred to was made. It is important to bear this in mind, because, if the Fishery interests were really changed before Confederation into a bond or obligation to receive money, then that is an end to the argument, for no one has ventured to assert that the Island transferred to the Dominion any such bond or obligation or any personal property of that character. At any rate, in this state of the argument, if any one is bold enough to assert it, the burden is thrown upon him to prove the transfer of these particular moneys, and why the transfer was made, and all the circumstances of the transaction. Has this been done? Has it been attempted? No, and it cannot be done; and it follows conclusively from this course of reasoning that whatever property it cannot be shown was handed over to the general Government, that property was retained by the Island for its own use. The Dominion did not go into this matter blindly. It knew of the existence of the Washington Treaty. It knew of the Legislation that had been passed. It knew, or ought to have known, the nature of the obligation we held of the Americans. It did not stipulate with us respecting our share of the Fishery Award. It left that in our hands untouched. They may have made a bad bargain, or an oversight, but that is not our fault. This property was ours before Confederation and is ours still. It should have been handed over to us direct by the Imperial Government, and Canada has no right to retain the money after our claim has been properly preferred. No consideration was ever given or offered for this important part of the assets of the Island. There is no doubt that up to July, 1873, the Island had the right to make that bargain with the United States, with respect to her Fisheries. But there are important considerations to be borne in mind, one of which is that the power conferred upon the Dominion by the Act of Confederation, did not—and could not be construed to—extend to the interest in which the Fisheries had been already sold and conveyed. We must consider, for the moment, what was meant by the right to legislate, respecting the Fisheries. By Section 91 of the British North America Act, the Dominion has exclusive authority throughout, to legislate in all matters coming within the classes of subjects therein enumerated, and among these are the "Sea coast and inland Fisheries." The powers of the Dominion cannot extend further than these words mean. No doubt it would have the right to legislate respecting the protection or management of the Fisheries. Possibly also it has the power to sell or lease the Fisheries, but the Fisheries themselves are not by this enactment vested in the Dominion. It has no estate or interest in them; but its rights were only created by the Act from which the Dominion derives all its power. If the Dominion has the right to guard and encourage the Fisheries, it is for the benefit of the Fisheries and the Provinces especially interested. If it has power to lease them, it is only as an agent for those Provinces. It cannot do otherwise than to hold them for the special benefit of the different Provinces whose Fisheries are so dealt with. When the delegation from Prince Edward Island came here, in regard to the final terms before entering Confederation, and when the Terms of Union were still pending, the following Memorandum was drawn up:—

"Should the above be agreed upon as a basis of Union, the undersigned will beg to submit a further Memorandum with respect to the Fisheries."

This shows it was the intention of the Island to keep its share of the Fishery Award; or, if not, to receive some further equivalent for transferring it to the Dominion. There is nothing to show that the Island ever intended to transfer its Fisheries gratuitously. Before she entered the Union she passed the necessary legislation to give her an interest in the Award. The Treaty was not dependent on any proclamation of the President. The main provisions could have gone into effect at any time between 1st of March and 1st of July, 1873. It gave to the United States the right to fish in the territorial waters of Prince Edward Island for twelve years, the Island to receive a certain compensation therefor. The one did not surrender its right to a share of the Award by entering Confederation, though it surrendered to the Dominion the power to legislate respecting the Fisheries. But suppose, for the sake of argument, that even after July 1st, 1873, the Dominion had the exclusive right to legislate respecting the Fisheries—what does this mean? Does this right to legislate give the ownership to Canada? Not necessarily. I may have power to deal with or convey property that is not my own. I may be an agent merely, or trustee for another who is the real owner. And so it seems to me is the relation the Dominion stands in with respect to the Island Fisheries. If Canada ever becomes the owner, a direct transfer will have to be made. As the case now stands Canada is merely a trustee for the several Provinces, and any act it does is for the special benefit of the Provinces. It might have the power to sell or lease the Fisheries to the Americans, but it must apply the proceeds of the sale in the manner directed by the Provinces. It has no right and no authority, under the British North America Act, to take the moneys arising from the Fishery Award from the different Provinces, to which it essentially belongs, and appropriate it to the general purposes of the Dominion. I trust and hope, therefore, that the Government will make some special exception in favour of the special claims of Prince Edward Island and do justice to that Province.

Mr. KAULBACH: The subject now before the House is of very great importance to the fishermen of the Maritime Provinces. The right given to American citizens, under the Washington Treaty, to fish in our territorial waters was a sacrifice, to a very large extent, of the rights and privileges which our fishermen possessed, without their getting one solitary benefit in return. The Treaty conveys to said American citizens this right for twelve years, over a coast line of 3,160 miles, representing the dearest interests and rights which the poor fishermen of the Maritime Provinces enjoyed. And what do we get in return from our neighbours?—the exhausted fishing ground north of the 39° parallel of latitude, exhausted by the American fishermen long previous to the Treaty. It was not at all probable that our fishermen would leave their productive fields, giving them a comfortable living, and use at any time the exhausted fisheries on the American coast. True, we are told that we have full access to the American markets for the sale of our fish and oil, which, although correct, has been, and still is, of little service to our fishermen, as the Americans, ever alive to their own interests through our waters with their immense fishing fleets, better equipped in every way for fishing than our own fishermen, monopolise our waters and, with their enormous catches, supply their own markets, thus depriving us of the only benefit we anticipated deriving from this Treaty. Now, Mr. Speaker, had these Fisheries been exclusively our own, we could not only have had the American market but the West India market as well, the latter being, without doubt, very remunerating to us, now very largely supplied by the Americans from the catches they take in our territorial waters. Before the interests of our fishermen were interfered with by this Treaty, we were able to take fish in large quantities in the inshore waters of our coast; now our fishermen have to launch out into the deep waters of the broad and stormy Atlantic at the risk of their lives. Then they were able to use small boats at little cost; now they are compelled to use vessels and large boats, which are very expensive, and often beyond their scanty means to obtain. Then they were able to enjoy their quiet rest and sleep at night; now they are compelled to leave in the darkness of the morning, in consequence of the immense distances they have to go from the coast, and the desire to get back before the return of the next night. Then junior members of the family of the poor fishermen could assist in the catching, as the fishing was close at hand in the bays and harbours, and in smooth water, now only the heads of families can put to sea and prosecute this hazardous industry. Then it was that less clothing was required, as it was only by day and in smooth water that fish were sought for; now the heaviest clothing is needed, in consequence of night fishing and greater exposure. Then, in shallow water, less lines and twines were used, and they of a lighter texture, less cost and no loss; now the heaviest and most expensive have to be used, and then subject to be swept away by the first heavy storm in the ocean. Then they only toiled during the summer season at fishing; now the poor suffering creatures have to be exposed to the cold, icy blasts of winter as well, chilled to the very heart to procure a scanty living for their poor, needy and suffering families. In fact, many of our fishermen are now compelled, during parts of the year, in consequence of the sacrifice of the Fisheries and the exhausted state of the fishing grounds, to change their occupation and go as mariners on foreign voyages, and some of them to sacrifice fishing entirely and seek other employments. Now all these difficulties and privations, by the aid of the Fishery Award, could be averted, and the fishing grounds plentifully restored and supplied with the most valuable descriptions of fish, and many of the fishermen induced to return to their original calling. With the poor fisherman placed in this deplorable position, sacrificed and impoverished, I am not requiring too much when I ask for a share of the Fishery Award, rightly, as I believe, belonging to the Maritime Provinces, of which Nova Scotia claims the largest interest, she having, of the 3,160 miles of sea-coast as ceded to the Fisheries under the Treaty, 1,060 miles belonging to herself. Of the one thousand vessels engaged in the Fisheries belonging to the Dominion, upwards of seven hundred are claimed by Nova Scotia—I am speaking in round numbers. Nova Scotia claims 50 per cent. of all the boats engaged in fishing, or about eight thousand; upwards of 50 per cent. of all the fishermen, and upwards of 50 per cent. of all the nets, lines and twines,—that is by the latest returns. Last year's not being given in detail, are not available at present. The Dominion Fisheries, I observe by account, were valued for the year ending June 30th, 1878, $13,215,678.83. The proportionate value of each of the Provinces being as follows:—

Nova Scotia.....	$6,131,599 64
Quebec.....	2,664,045 30
New Brunswick.....	2,305,790 69
British Columbia.....	925,776 98
Prince Edward Island.....	840,344 22
Ontario.....	348,122 00

Making, as already stated, a grand total of $13,215,678.83, showing most conclusively that the value of the Nova Scotia Fisheries is one-half the entire value of all the Fisheries of the Dominion; consequently, according to the value of the Fisheries, Nova Scotia's portion of the Award would be $2,087,838.14. Now, dependent as Nova Scotia is upon the Fisheries as an auxiliary to her success, of which the above statement is a very evident proof, the $82,628 given her as an additional subsidy for the years having lapsed, together with the immense amounts spent in reckless extravagance by the late Local Administration in the subsidising of railways, etc., not yet completed—the latter, of course, the Dominion Government are not responsible for—I would ask, in view of these facts, how is it possible for her to succeed without means to ameliorate the unfortunate financial condition in which she is placed, not only that of debt, but without the means to carry on the ordinary requirements of the Province, which position the present Government very readily discovered on their advent to power, and which is rendered still more conclusive and apparent by the experience of the current year. I wish to be clearly understood, in this matter, that I do not wish any part of this Award to be applied to railways but for the express benefit of the Fisheries. The Maritime Provinces, in giving up these Fisheries to the Americans to be used in common with themselves from 1854 to 1866, secured the Reciprocity Treaty, which, whilst it was a great advantage to the commercial portion of Old Canada, merely secured to the Canadian fishermen the United States market for the sale of their fish and oil, now supplied by the Americans themselves from our municipal waters. We have no stronger proof of the correctness of our claim to this Award than the example and principle set by Great Britain in paying over to Newfoundland her portion without an enquiry. In making this request we are endeavouring to carry out the principle of the National Policy, and protecting one of the greatest industries that this Dominion possesses, and fostering, at the same time, a ready cash market for the flour and manufactured articles of the west, the Maritime Provinces being their best market and the fishermen their most extensive purchasers. We expect support at the hands of Ontario and British Columbia in this matter, in lieu of the many benefits they derive by the Act of Confederation, over and above the Maritime Provinces, the former in Canals, Railways and other Public Works, and the latter in the Pacific Railway and the enjoyment of the rich and abundant Fisheries of the Pacific waters on the other side of this continent without interruption. Considering, by this Treaty, the many deprivations the poor fishermen have been subjected to, and the immense amount saved to the Dominion by not being required to protect the coast territory, I feel that in supporting this resolution for the Award in behalf of the interest of the Maritime Provinces, and the fishermen, I claim to ask it not as a privilege, but as an incumbent right, namely, the $4,490,882.94 handed over by the Government of the United Kingdom to the Government of Canada, an amount as I hold due to us, be paid over to the Maritime Provinces proportionately—it having been awarded for the privileges and rights, we Maritimes surrendered under Articles 18 and 32 of the Treaty of Washington to our neighbours, over and above in value that received from them under Articles 19 and 21 of said Treaty. The views enunciated by some of the hon. members of this House, and the differences of opinion as expressed by others, respecting these territorial rights, excites a doubt in the minds of many as to the true position of the matter. I hold that we having exercised, used and enjoyed these privileges and rights, the same as Newfoundland enjoyed her rights on her coasts for so long a period, indefeasible as I consider, we reasonably now should claim to hold them upon the well-established, time-honoured, and in this instance, equitable principle, "That possession is nine points of the law." I believe that Great Britain, when paying over the referred-to amount, paid it for the interest of the Maritime Provinces, as an integral part of this Dominion, to be disposed of for the benefit of the fishermen. Our hon. friend from Inverness, the mover of this resolution, in the dramatic part of this exercise, has figured somewhat conspicuously, and for the information of this House, were he in his seat, I would ask him to explain his position. It is asserted that the Commission appointed under Articles 22 and 23 of the Treaty of Washington, and in conformity with the solemn declaration made and subscribed by them on the 15th June, 1877, met in

Halifax and awarded the sum as referred to. I would ask, under these circumstances, how can our hon. friend account for his lack of alacrity and zeal, and want of patriotism in not pressing this claim on behalf of the fishermen, before the present Administration came into power. The Award was made in 1877, and Parliament met, under the last régime, in 1878, of which he was a strong supporter; could he not have had interest enough at that time with the then Premier, now the hon. leader of the Opposition, to have pressed the claim with the same persistent vigour that he is now doing? Was it not the duty of our hon. friend, representing a fishing constituency, and was it not the right of the hon. leader of the Government of that day, to have advised the British Government, before their paying the money over to this Dominion, to make a special proviso, that the amount, when paid over, was to be expended for the benefit of the Fisheries of the Maritime Provinces? Certainly it was. Some appear to question the exact sincerity of the hon. member for Inverness in now pressing this claim, instead of in 1878, which is perhaps severe; but I do say that he certainly is open to censure for neglecting to press it in the Session of 1878, when the opportune moment offered, which, had he done, would probably have avoided the present lengthy discussion, and much disquietude. I claim, Mr. Speaker, that this Award is justly due to the Maritime Provinces, for the reasons I have already advanced, on the principles of equity and fair play, that is to say, that what comes from the Fisheries should be returned to the Fisheries. The fishermen are the bone and sinew of the Province I have the honour to represent, and one of the leading arteries to the wealth and success of this Dominion; and I would fail in my duty to them, whose interests I hold most dear, as well as to my county and Province, were I not to uphold their interests, and to advocate to the utmost of my ability, this, as I hold, so just a claim. I hope this House will see the necessity for complying with this just request and honourable demand for the Fishery Award, and in doing so, I would strongly advise that the money be expended in the erection of fish nurseries or fish-breeding establishments, along the coast, at certain intervals, under the supervision of the fish culturist, Mr. Wilmot; and the fishermen induced, by a compensation amply to reward them for their labour and time, to collect all the spawn, or ova, from the fish, and dispose of them to the fish culturist, which would not only be a nucleus for the recuperation of the now all but exhausted fishing grounds, but a great help to the fishermen whose return of fish, often, is not sufficient to pay their expensive supply bills. Wishing that words could more strongly express the sentiments I entertain on this important subject, on behalf of the interest of the fishermen, and hoping that this "Ship of State" will not leave the poor fishermen as a shipwrecked crew to weather the storms of adversity, but that she will come to their rescue and give them of that which they claim as their own, as the price of what they had to surrender to their Republican neighbours.

MR. WELDON moved the adjournment of the Debate.

Motion to adjourn the Debate negatived.

MR. HACKETT: The resolutions submitted by the hon. member for Inverness (Mr. MacDonnell), which we are now discussing, are, in my opinion, based upon a sound principle. They state that the Award under the Washington Treaty should be distributed amongst the fishermen of the Maritime Provinces who have suffered by the operation of that Treaty. I have much pleasure in supporting that proposition, as I believe that what came from the Fisheries should return to the Fisheries. This is a principle I have always contended for, and is the only basis upon which this question can now be satisfactorily settled. Any person who takes the trouble to read the report of the proceedings of the Halifax Commission, will see that the Award of $5,500,000 was based as much upon the losses and disadvantages suffered by the people of the Maritime Provinces, owing to allowing Americans the use of their inshore Fisheries, as it was to the benefits and advantages accruing to the citizens of the United States, on account of having the use of those Fisheries. We, who come from the Maritime Provinces, know something of the privations and hardships of the fishermen of those Provinces, who are compelled to go down to the sea in small boats to make a living for themselves and their families. And, when they find, as they have found during late years, after building and equipping their boats and preparing themselves to prosecute their precarious calling, that the citizens of a foreign country are on the fishing ground before them with their large vessels, fitted with all the modern appliances for catching fish, virtually depriving them of the means of making a living for themselves and their families; and when they further find that these foreigners, by the use of purse seines, are rapidly destroying this valuable industry, and that year by year the Fisheries are becoming less productive, they consider they are only contending for their just rights when they insist upon a distribution of the Fishery Award in their interests. Hon. gentlemen in this House, who are not acquainted with this question, would do well to inform themselves with regard to these facts; and, after doing so, I am sure they would come to the same conclusions as myself. The Fisheries of the Gulf of St. Lawrence are the heritage of the people of the Maritime Provinces; and when they find their birthright taken away from them, and sold to a foreign country, they only do their duty when they insist that the money accruing to Canada by virtue of this sale, should be divided amongst those who have suffered by the sale. True, it may be said, and it has been said, that the people of the Maritime Provinces have, under this Treaty, the right to sell their fish, free of duty, in the United States, and that such right is a great boon to them. Previous to the Treaty coming into force, there might have been something in this; but now such an argument is not worthy of consideration, as the fishermen know that the price of fish in the United States markets is regulated by the supply and demand. And as the Americans, on account of being allowed to fish in the waters of the Maritime Provinces, keep the market overstocked, our fishermen find that they must submit to a great reduction in price; and, instead of being able to control those markets, as they could do under different circumstances, they find that they have to compete with fish caught at their own doors by foreigners.

These remarks I have made apply to the case of the Maritime Provinces generally, and I hope they may be successful in their efforts to obtain a portion of this Award. But, while doing so, I contend that Prince Edward Island has a separate and distinct claim to a portion of this money; and, in doing so, I base my contention upon the grounds taken by my hon. friend from King's (Mr. Muttart), who will submit his amendments when the House goes into Committee on the main motion. His resolutions are as follows:—

“1st. That before July 1st, 1873, the Treaty of Washington was in full force and effect as respect: Prince Edward Island.

“2nd. That there was no express or implied surrender of the interests of the Island in the Fishery Award, and at the time of the Island entering Confederation.

“3rd. That the British North America Act does not apply to a case where an interest in the Fisheries had been sold and conveyed away, and the rights to the purchase money had accrued to the Island before Confederation, and such Act does not authorise the General Government to appropriate the proceeds of the sale of the Island Fisheries for the general purposes of the Dominion.”

These grounds are, I believe, well taken; and if hon. gentlemen would study them they must arrive at the conclusion that our claim is not only based upon principles of equity and justice, but is also sound from a legal and constitutional standpoint. We all know that, at the time this Treaty was entered into, Prince Edward Island was an independent Colony, having no connection whatever with the Dominion of Canada. We also know that, before this Treaty could be perfected, so as to make it binding in all its provisions, the Colony of Prince Edward Island was called upon to pass an Act ratifying the Treaty so far as she was concerned. The Government and Legislature of the Island very reluctantly passed this measure, as they were well aware that the people were making a great sacrifice when they were surrendering the valuable inshore Fisheries to a foreign country for the term of twelve years. We find, on looking over the despatches having reference to this question, a Minute of Council of the Prince Edward Island Government, dated the 24th July, 1871, from which I take the following paragraph:—

arrangement with the United States, in consideration of the use of the Fisheries, would have been most acceptable; but as the Royal High Commissioners were unable to induce the American Government to change its commercial policy, the people of the Island, being extremely loyal and devotedly attached to British Institutions, would be most unwilling to throw any obstacle in the way of an amicable settlement of all causes of difference between Great Britain and the United States, and would therefore willingly accept any reasonable money compensation in addition to the privileges granted as an equivalent, but under the Washington Treaty nothing of the kind is guaranteed them."

Lord Kimberley replies to this Minute of Council, in his Despatch No. 32, dated 3rd September, 1871, in the following manner:—

"I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your Despatch, No. 59, of the 25th July, communicating to me the consent of your Government to the admission of United States fishermen during the present season to the privileges granted by the Treaty of Washington so far as concerns the Colony under your Government.

"Her Majesty's Government have learnt with much satisfaction that the Prince Edward Island Government have so willingly acceded to their wishes in this respect. With regard to the observation contained in the Minute of Council which you have forwarded, to the effect that the Prince Edward Island Government would readily accept any reasonable money compensation in addition to the privileges granted as an equivalent, but that under the Treaty nothing of the kind is guaranteed, I do not understand why the Prince Edward Island Government should object to the reference of the question of the money compensation to arbitration, which seems to be the fairest way of determining such a point, more especially as the fact stated in the Minute that the rights of fishing conceded by the United States are comparatively worthless is, it must be presumed, capable of distinct proof."

It will thus be seen that Prince Edward Island surrendered the use of her Fisheries to the Americans at the urgent request of the Imperial Government, but with the distinct understanding that she was to receive a money compensation for the privileges thus surrendered. Having established this fact, it next remains to be seen whether or not the Island surrendered her right to this money when she came into Confederation. Now, I contend she did not. At the time of Confederation she stood precisely the same as Newfoundland with regard to this Treaty. All the legislation necessary, so far as she was concerned, had been gone through, and it only remained for the Commission to sit and make their Award, and their not having done so until after she came into the Union, cannot possibly affect her claim to a portion of the Award. Now, Sir, I am not a lawyer and do not undertake to discuss the legal aspect of this question, but I have always heard it laid down as a sound principle in law that what was not included in an agreement was excluded, and when we see that by the terms of Confederation no surrender was made by the Island of any right she held under the Washington Treaty, we must only come to the conclusion that legally and constitutionally she still holds that right. Undoubtedly the British North America Act gives to the Dominion the power to legislate with regard to the sea coast and inland Fisheries; it also gives the right to protect, but it cannot be shown that it gives to the Dominion vested rights held by a Province under Treaty with a foreign country before Confederation. The interest of Prince Edward Island to a portion of this Award, was a legitimate asset of the Province, and cannot be claimed by the Dominion, on any better grounds than the funds in the Local Treasury might be claimed by her at the time of Confederation. It is true, we have been told by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, that we have no claim to a portion of this Award, from the fact that the Island came into the Confederation on the 1st day of July, 1873, being the day on which the Washington Treaty came into operation. I cannot understand why the hon. gentlemen, who formed that Committee, should dismiss our case in so summary a manner and on so flimsy a pretext. It is a well-known fact that we had nothing to do with fixing the time at which the Treaty should come into operation; that was done by the Government of the United States, over which we had no possible control; and because they fixed upon that day, it cannot take away from us our rights in this matter. The Island Government and Legislature had done all that was necessary for them to do for the purpose of securing to the Island a portion of this Award long before the 1st July, 1873, and having done so no mere accident can deprive the Island of her fair share. These distinguished gentlemen will have to reconsider their decision on this question ; and after doing so, and after giving this subject all the consideration its importance demands, they must arrive at the conclusion that their former opinion was given without duly considering the question. The right hon. leader of the Government has stated in his speech this evening that this money should be applied to the building of lighthouses, improving of harbours, etc., in the Maritime Provinces, and that such appropriations are made in the interests of the fishermen of those Provinces. I have great respect for the opinions of the hon. gentleman, but I cannot agree with him in this instance. Under the Confederation Act the Dominion is bound to build lighthouses, construct breakwaters and improve harbours, which is done in the general interests of trade and commerce. We know that the mariners of Norway and Sweden, of France and the United States, derive as much benefit from the lighting of our coasts and the improving of our harbours, as the people of the Maritime Provinces. Then again, look at the large expenditures which take place yearly, for the building of lighthouses and the improving of navigable rivers on the Upper St. Lawrence ; and on the great inland waters of the Dominion this is done, and must be done quite irrespective of the Fishery Award. Keeping our share of this money must be defended on better grounds than these, and better reasons must be given before we will be satisfied. It has also been said that the Dominion has been called upon to expend large amounts of money in protecting the Fisheries of the Maritime Provinces, and as there is a probability of the Washington Treaty being abrogated, or, at all events, not renewed, that large amounts will be required for that purpose again, at an early day. The Dominion assumed the responsibility of protecting our Fisheries before this Award was made, and must continue to do so out of the general revenue, so long as protection is necessary. But who have defended and protected our Fisheries in the past ? Was it not the Mother Country ? We know that it is a matter of history, that, in the year 1870, when Canada was in a better position financially to protect the Fisheries than she is in to-day, that Admiral Wellesley was ordered to dispatch a sufficient force of British war-ships to Canadian waters, for the purpose of maintaining order and protecting the Fisheries ; and if this protection argument were correct, its logical sequence would be, that Great Britain, and not Canada, has the right to this money. But we know how the Imperial Government acted with regard to this matter ; they at once handed over to Canada the balance of the Award, after deducting Newfoundland's share, thinking that Canada would do justice to all the Provinces, particularly the Province of Prince Edward Island. They did not raise the cry of protection, and that they should be reimbursed out of this money, although they had expended millions of dollars in the protection of these Fisheries. They would scorn to keep the money that came out of the purchase and sale of these Fisheries, and showed, by handing over to Newfoundland her share, that the amount should be distributed amongst the Maritime Provinces. With regard to the special case of Prince Edward Island, I trust that the Government and the House will do us justice. I do not look upon the vote that is about being taken as in any way affecting the Island's interests. Our special case is not connected with the question now before the House. We intend that it shall rest on its own merits outside of the claims put forward by the other Provinces. We do not come here as suppliants looking for charity ; we appear here in the full possession of our constitutional rights and privileges as British freemen, advocating that justice be done our constituents. We appeal to the representatives of the great Province of Ontario, as well as those of the sister Province of Quebec, for justice, in this matter we know we have the sympathy of our friends from British Columbia and Manitoba. We would ask that great statesman the right hon. the leader of the Government, who was mainly instrumental in forming this great Dominion, and who laboured so ably and so well in reconciling the different elements and interests in this Confederation, to consider what may be the result of refusing us our rights. Our people are firmly of the opinion that they have a just and a legal claim to a portion of this money ; and should their just rights be denied them, I fear that a disturbing element will be introduced into this Dominion that will cause trouble and discontent for a long time to come. As a representative of the people of Prince Edward Island, I am determined to use every constitutional means in their behalf, and by earnest exertion and constant agitation on the floor of this House, to endeavour to obtain justice for them with regard to this important question.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou): Before the debate closes I desire to express, in a very few words, my views on a question so important to the Province I represent, and so important to myself, individually, as one of its representatives. Fully impressed with the gravity of the question we are discussing, and the possible results of that question, so far as it may affect public opinion in the country, I ask the indulgence of the House for a few moments while I reply to certain statements that have been made. There is no doubt that the discussion has been forced upon the House, not with a desire to ascertain the truth, or a desire to discuss it in the calm, deliberate, judicial manner which characterised the speech of the hon. member for Halifax, to ascertain whether on the confederation of the Provinces certain rights were reserved which they now claim, and to which the Dominion, under the advice of the hon. leader of the Government, seeks to establish its right, but with the manifest object of promoting dissatisfaction, and trying to impress upon the people the opinion that this House, this Parliament of Canada, not of right and justice, attempts to retain from the Provinces rights to which they are entitled under the law. Believing, as I do, that every man who loves his country, every man who respects the right and desires to support the Constitution, is bound, no matter at what personal consequence to himself, to ignore that view of the question, and do right, though the heavens fall. I shall endeavour to give my reasons to my constituents and the country at large, why I think the amendment of the hon. leader of the Government should be sustained. I approach the consideration of this question with a full sense of my responsibility, and with a knowledge of the feeling which obtains in Nova Scotia. Unfortunately, that Province, like other Provinces of the Dominion, who were not careful to husband the resources which became their inheritance on their entering Confederation, feels itself in the position of a man whose funds are exhausted, and who jumps in any direction where he thinks he may obtain relief. I can quite understand and sympathise with the people of Nova Scotia in the condition in which they find themselves; but I cannot shut my eyes to the fact, and it is well they should know it from a man whom they feel and believe—I care not what is said to the contrary—will speak fairly, truthfully and honestly of their position, that the position in which they stand was brought upon them by those to whom they entrusted the management of their affairs. This applies not only to Nova Scotia, but to other Provinces. In every instance in which the Terms of Union were either originally settled or subsequently modified in favour of the Provinces, such Province was in a position, if economy, prudence and care had been exercised by its statesmen, to meet all the reasonable responsibilities devolving upon it as a member of this Confederation. Until the recent election changed the political complexion of such Provinces, they had been ruled by men who seemed to ignore their responsibility to the country, and to think their mission was not to economise, but to dissipate and squander the limited funds which the Constitution placed in their hands. Hence we have this question, which originates with a people driven on by necessity, and who are not prepared to treat the question with that calm deliberation they would otherwise bring to bear upon it. But no matter what the excitement of the moment may be, I do not fear that reflection and deliberation, that the second sober thought of the people on this question, as upon all others, will justify the men who resist the pressure brought to bear upon them, and who desire to sustain what they believe to be the Constitution of the country. No one can regret more than I do that I have to put myself in opposition to the views of many hon. members from my own Province, for whom I have the greatest respect, and with whom I have hitherto acted in concert; and it is, therefore, with the greatest possible regret that I am obliged, on this occasion, not only as a member of Parliament, but as a member of the Government, to differ with them in the views they have given. I specially regret having to differ with my hon. friend from Halifax. Knowing him so long, knowing the calmness of his judgment, and the thorough sincerity with which he discusses every question; knowing the great labour and thought he has given this subject, and the anxiety he has displayed not to deal with it for party purposes, but with a single view, to reach the right and just conclusion, I will endeavour to show the hon. gentleman where, as a lawyer and a man read in the history of his country, he will be obliged to coincide with the views contained in the amendment of the right hon. leader of the Government. With regard to the observations of my hon. friend from King's, P.E.I., (Mr. Macdonald), it may be said that the claims of the representatives of that Island stand in a somewhat different position from those of the older Provinces, and it may be possible there is something in their view of the case. It is quite true that negotiations did take place between the Island and the United States, with the consent and knowledge, I believe—I was not in the Government at the time—of the Dominion Government, on which, and under which, perhaps, certain rights and considerations may be due to that Colony, which may not be due to the other Provinces. I can only say that, should that, on investigation, be found to be the case, should the Government find, on a full and intelligent apprehension of the facts that, under the Constitution and law, and under the terms under which this Island entered the Union, that any consideration that can be extended to it, the hon. representatives may be quite sure that the fullest and fairest consideration will be given to any claims they may establish. The hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I., (Mr. Brecken), in illustration of the validity of his claim, and of the construction of the Act on which the argument turns, said that, at the time of the negotiations for the Union with Canada, Mr. Laird, the delegate from the Island, placed among the Terms of Union proposed by him, the condition that, should any amount be given as compensation for the use of the Fisheries by the Americans, the Island should receive her share. Does my hon. friend not see how that argument turns against the user of it, and utterly destroys his pretensions? Because, if that were the true construction of the Treaty recognised by the Dominion, as existing between the Provinces and the Dominion, it would not be necessary to insert such a clause in the Treaty of Union with the Island, thereby making an exceptional Treaty as regards the Island and the other Provinces. On the other hand, the argument proves conclusively that, right or wrong, the hon. the leader of the Dominion Government and colleagues entertained on that occasion the same view of the Constitution, and the effect of the Treaty, that they take to-day; because, when the proposition was made by Mr. Laird, instead of adopting it and recognising the proposition of the Island, the Government declined to accede to the proposal, saying: "That is not the proper construction of the Treaty, and we cannot allow the Island an advantage not granted the other Provinces." That contention shows that Mr. Laird's view was untenable in fact, as well as in the opinion of those with whom he was dealing, as representing this Dominion. With regard to the observation of the hon. member for Lunenburg, as to the fishermen of Nova Scotia, I cannot patiently bear to see an hon. member representing a class so spirited, vigorous and intelligent, speak of them as the poor fishermen of Nova Scotia. I can assure my hon. friend from Lunenburg (Mr. Kaulback), that I do not think his own constituents would thank him for this classification. I know the south coast of Nova Scotia and its population well, and a more hard-working, resolute, enterprising and intrepid body of men does not exist in this wide Dominion. They do not live in huts, but in substantial, well-built, comfortable houses, as a general rule; and except in years when the failure of the Fisheries or crops create want or distress, there is no more hardy, healthy people on the face of the earth, nor any better fed than the fishermen of Nova Scotia. They are men not only able to take care of themselves, but to defend their country if need be. If there be exceptions, they are such as you see in every class of society, persons who, for want of economy and thrift, would starve in any position. I should be ashamed, as a Nova Scotian, to come here and ask the guardians of the Constitution to violate it, if such might be done, simply because hon. gentlemen choose to speak of Nova Scotians as the poor fishermen. I will not follow the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Richey), over the ground he has trodden so well, but in some respects I would go even further with reference to the claim and character of the right which pertained to Nova Scotia and the other Provinces before Confederation. He traced correctly the history of the Fishery rights of Nova Scotia to the time she obtained responsible Government, and the transfer to the people, by the Crown and Act of Parliament, of what was called the casual and territorial revenue, embracing the Crown lands, mines minerals and royalties. These were held by the Province as part of the public domain until they were freely transferred to Canada at Confederation. I might go further than the hon. leader of the Government, with reference to the territorial rights of the Colonies before Confederation. Before that time, the grant by Nova Scotia of the land under the water, three miles from the shore, would be held, in my humble opinion, a valid, legal grant. But my learned friend will not fail to see a wide distinction between a mere territorial right to the land covered by water, and a right to the dominion over the fish in the water covering and running over that land. That land is claimed because it is a right incident to every British subject. Therefore, my hon. friend will see that, while going even further than my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Richey), or than the right hon. the leader of the Government, and I still stand on firm ground with reference to the general public right in the Fisheries adjacent to the coast, within three miles of the sea-shore. My hon. friend appeared to forget that this is not the first occasion on which the Fisheries of Nova Scotia and the Lower Provinces were made the lever to obtain for the Provinces commercial and other advantages. In 1844, as the hon. member for Halifax informed the House, the Lower Provinces became possessed of these territorial rights. In 1854, by a Treaty made with the Crown, with the consent of Nova Scotia, these Fisheries, now considered so inalienable, in exchange for certain commercial privileges granted by the United States, were transferred, "given over and sold," to use the phraseology of some hon. gentlemen, to the United States, to the same people who possess the privileges so much complained of now. My hon. friend beside me said it was for value received. I doubt if the consideration was very much greater than the value we have received now. What is the value received? The body of fishermen in Nova Scotia, by virtue of the Treaty of Washington, obtained advantages over their fellow subjects of a very valuable character. Because, while all the other productions of Nova Scotia and of the whole Dominion were excluded by an almost prohibitory tariff from the markets of the United States, the fishermen of the Maritime Provinces had the immense privilege of entering those markets with their fish duty free. So we see that over and above the large pecuniary Award we have received, we have had the benefits resulting from the Reciprocity Treaty, as well as those now enjoyed under the Washington Treaty. But I pass on to ask the House to consider the nature of the vote it is asked to give to-night. It is the fact that, by the British North America Act the rights and privileges referred to, and particularly so far as the Fisheries were concerned, were transferred to this Dominion. That has never been denied.

Mr. WELDON: What part of the Act transfers the Fisheries?

Mr. McDONALD: I am astonished at that question from the hon. member for St. John. The 91st clause of the British North America Act provides that the Parliament of Canada shall make laws exclusively for the sea-coast and inland Fisheries, and my hon. friend will find nothing to contravene the power thus given this Parliament; and he will not deny that the power of legislation is the highest form of sovereignty known to the Constitution of England. Therefore, when the Act which constitutes the Constitution of this country gives to the Dominion Parliament the absolute control of legislation over the Fisheries of the sea-coast and the rivers, I ask him whether, under these circumstances, he could pretend that any power whatever, other than an Act of Parliament, could abrogate that control? But the Parliament of Canada lost no time in exercising the right thus conferred upon it, and in terms so clear that there could be no mistake as to the intention of Parliament, either in this House or in the Provinces. It is true there was no anticipation of $5,500,000 coming to us when this House was dealing in the most absolute manner with what is now called private territorial rights in the several Provinces. By the Fisheries Act passed by this Parliament in May, 1868, the laws relating to the Fisheries in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia were repealed, with the exception of certain provisions in the revised Statutes of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, and the words in which they were dealt with are significant indeed, and show that the right asserted by this Parliament is not denied by any local statesman, and has not been challenged up to this hour. It says:—

“ Provided always that such Fishery Officers as may be especially empowered in that behalf by the Governor-in-Council, shall also exercise the powers by the said recited Act and chapter of Acts vested in Revenue and other Officers, Sheriffs and Magistrates, and all penalties and forfeitures imposed under the same shall be paid over to the Receiver-General through the Department of Marine and Fisheries to be applied towards the Fisheries Protection Service, in like manner as other fines and confiscations under the present Act.”

So this Act not only abrogated the laws by which the Provinces had previously exercised their rights, with the exception I have named, but in retaining these sections they made an express provision that, all penalties or loss accruing from the Fisheries should be appropriated by the Dominion Government for the purpose of protecting the Fisheries. Now, I ask my hon. friend if those who governed the Provinces at that time, and who were hostile to Confederation, having had such a fair opportunity to challenge the action of this Parliament, I ask him if they would not have raised the question then which is raised to-day, if they believed there was any foundation for the argument we now hear? For twelve long years these Fisheries have been protected on land and on sea; fleets have been manned, fleets of the Dominion and fleets of the Mother Country, for their protection; and during all that time the Provinces claimed neither to share in the expense nor challenged the right of this Parliament to take the measures taken. Even this recognition would be quite a sufficient answer to the contention now set up. Let me say this to the country: the strength of a legal claim does not depend upon the value of the estate affected thereby; if we have a right to these Fisheries our claim is equally strong, whether it is worth a dollar or a million of dollars, and it is pertinent to enquire, would the present contention have been raised if this large sum had not been obtained as compensation? But irrespective of the arguments so clearly put by the hon. the leader of the Government, my hon. friend will not deny the dominant power of the Crown and its inherent right to transfer the territory of the Crown without the consent of the Legislature. Sir George Grey propounded this doctrine in the strongest possible manner. Writing in 1854 to the Governor of Nova Scotia with reference to the Treaty of Reciprocity, Sir George Grey said:

“ Article V. runs as follows:—‘ The present Treaty shall take effect as soon as the laws required to carry it into operation shall have been passed by the Imperial Parliament of Great Britain, and by the Provincial Parliaments of those of the British North American Colonies which are affected by this Treaty on the one hand, and by Congress of the United States on the other.’ ”

He makes this note on it:

“ This Article is, of course, not to be understood as if the assent of the Provincial Legislature, or even of the Imperial Legislature were necessary, in order to enable the Crown to execute a valid and binding Treaty with a foreign country. This is, in all countries, a prerogative of the Sovereign power, and in England the Sovereign power quoad hoc is vested in the Crown.

“ But the concurrence of the Legislature may, nevertheless, be required to abrogate existing laws, which may be, in any respect, inconsistent with the intended Treaty, and it is in this sense that I conceive the provision of Article V. is properly to be understood.”

Coming down to the Treaty of Washington in 1871, we find that the right and authority of the Dominion of Canada over the Fisheries is fully recognised in terms by the highest legal authority in the realm. In the 21st Section it is agreed:

“ It is agreed that, for the term of years mentioned in Article 33 of this Treaty, fish oil and fish of all kinds (except fish of the inland lakes, and of the rivers falling into them, and except fish preserved in oil), being the produce of the Fisheries of the United States, or of the Dominion of Canada, or of Prince Edward Island, shall be admitted into each country, respectively, free of duty."

We have, in the words of the Treaty, a recognition of the authority of the Dominion of Canada over the shores of the old Provinces. The right hon. the leader of the Government has shown beyond dispute that the territorial rights of the several Colonies were transferred under Confederation, and made part and parcel of the Dominion. It was recognised by the highest authority, the Imperial Parliament, declaring that when the necessary laws were passed the Treaty should come into force. If my hon. friend from St. John will venture to contend that the rights of domain now set up remain in the Provinces I shall be very much surprised. Let me ask the hon. gentleman why this right of the Provinces did not dawn upon him last year, and why, when one of his leaders (Sir Richard J. Cartwright) stood before him last Session and declared that, as a matter of constitutional right which no one should dispute, the Fishery Award was a legitimate asset of the Dominion, why did he not rise in his place and inform the hon. gentleman that he was calculating upon money which did not belong to him. The reason the hon. members for Inverness, Shelburne and Antigonish did not take that stand last year is, because it did not suggest itself to them then as a party cry. But if those gentlemen go back to their constituents now with such a cry on their lips, they would be referred to the position taken by the late Finance Minister when he said :

"It would have been alleged, from one end of Canada to the other, that we were about to bribe the electors, and I would have been censured then, as I was censured before, for borrowing money far in advance of my real wants, and that, too, when, as these worthy gentlemen would not have failed to point out, I had not only the Fishery Award, but $11,000,000 of guaranteed loan to fall back on in any event."

I undertake to say that the hon. gentleman will not recall those words to-day. Neither he nor the hon. leader of his party will venture to say that, when the late Finance Minister said the money belonged to the Treasury of Canada, he made a misstatement or a mistake. But they give leave to their followers to ignore the law and the facts, and to make a party cry out of this question. I have to apologise to the House for detaining them so long. I am afraid that in the attempt to be concise, I have not been so clear and explicit as I desired.

MR. MACKENZIE: We are satisfied.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou): I am glad the hon. gentleman understood me. I can assure him that I am no more anxious than himself on that score, for I want to be fairly and properly understood, and it is for that reason I have stated as a member of Parliament, bound and determined to protect and guard the rights and privileges of the county which I represent, and whose especial duty it is to guard the constitutional rights of this country, that I cannot give my consent to the proposition of the hon. member for Halifax.

MR. FLYNN: If I had any desire to address the House at length this evening, I certainly would have felt satisfied it would be useless to advance any further arguments in behalf of the claims of the Maritime Provinces after the statement made by the right hon. leader of the Government. It is clear to my mind that we are not to expect any share of this Award. I would have been satisfied with the remarks I made upon this subject on a former occasion, if it had not been for some statements made by the last speaker. It would have been quite sufficient, in my opinion, for that hon. gentleman to have endeavoured to advocate the legal view. He holds that the people of the Maritime Provinces are not entitled to their share of the Award, but that it is the exclusive property of the Dominion. Without introducing matter foreign to this discussion, the hon. gentleman referred to the financial position of the Local Government of Nova Scotia, and he has made most unfair statements with regard to their resources, and their want of care in husbanding them. Now, if the Local Government have not the resources to carry on the administration of affairs in the Province, it is due to the Act of Confederation. The hon. gentleman also stated that members on this side of the House were unduly bringing pressure to bear on this question for party purposes. I have not advocated the matter from a party standpoint. I did not wait until this year to make known my views on the subject, and the remarks of the hon. the Minister of Justice cannot have reference to me last Session, when the hon. member for Prince, P.E.I., made a motion in connection with this subject. I addressed the House at some length, and then advocated, as well as I could, the claims of the Maritime Provinces to the Fishery Award. I believed then, as I do now, that they have a legal right to it. The Minister of Justice drew a very flattering picture of the condition of the fishermen of Nova Scotia; he stated that they lived in fine, substantial houses and were well off. I wish, Sir, that this picture was true. I regret to say it is not. There are many of them very comfortable, but a large number do not enjoy the comfort he speaks of. They are, as a rule, poor, and find it difficult to procure the common necessaries of life. He says that the Fisheries were transferred to the Dominion by the Act of Confederation, which the people of Nova Scotia had learned to appreciate, and that the Act would be sustained in that Province tomorrow. I tell the hon. gentleman he knows little of the Province when he hazards that assertion. Never was there greater dissatisfaction existing against that measure than at present. After thirteen years experience of Confederation, I believe the feeling is stronger against it to-day than it was in 1867. The advantages predicted to follow the measure, and the bright prospects held out to the people in connection with it, have not yet been realised. The Province of Nova Scotia is far from being as prosperous now as it was then. If Nova Scotia is now financially embarrassed, it is due to Confederation and not to the action of the present Local Government or their predecessors. It is due to the hon. the Minister of Justice and his colleague, who are responsible for bringing us into it. I was astonished to hear him say, that the people transferred their rights to the Dominion with their own free will and consent. He knows, Sir, or ought to know, that they never consented to the transfer, that the overwhelming majority of the people of Nova Scotia were opposed to Confederation on any terms, and it was only by manipulating the Legislature and securing a majority there that the Act was carried. But, I would ask that hon. gentleman to contrast the financial condition of the Province now, with what it was in 1867. We had then, under a 10 per cent. Tariff, nearly completed 115 miles of railway east, as far as Pictou, tapping the Gulf of St. Lawrence, and over 130 miles west, as far as Annapolis. Since then, thirteen years, we have not been able to build more than forty miles east and about sixty miles west; the Provincial Government, is financially embarrassed, and unable to provide for the ordinary services of the Province; while its people, under the present grinding Tariff, are taxed on some description of goods—those used by the poorest classes—as high as 40 and 50 per cent., and still we are refused our share of the Fishery Award. The hon. the Minister of Justice stated that the Maritime Provinces surrendered their exclusive fishing rights in 1854. If we did, we got an equivalent in the free admission of our fish, coal and lumber, to the markets of the United States. That hon. gentleman has also endeavoured, while addressing the House, to create the impression that the Award was given, not for damage sustained by our fishermen, but for rights conferred on our American neighbours. This is not correct. Those entrusted with the management of the case, on behalf of Great Britain, clearly placed before the Commission that the loss sustained by our fishermen was an important element in the case for their consideration. They stated that, if the American fishermen were precluded from fishing in our inshore waters, they would be unable to supply their own extensive markets, and they would, to a great extent, be supplied by our fishermen and a better price realised for the fish they caught. There was abundant testimony to support this part of the case, and we may fairly assume that the Award would not have been so large if this fact had not been clearly proved. It has been contended by the Government that we have no legal right to this money. I think, Sir, a very strong case has been made out fully establishing our legal claim to it. But whatever doubts may exist as regards the legality of our claim, surely no one will contend that we have not an equitable one. Our fishermen, alone, have suffered by the equal privileges granted to American citizens to fish in our inshore waters. No other interests in this Dominion were affected by it; no other class suffered, and none but the fishermen should receive the benefit of this Award. But we are told by the hon. leader of the Government that we have no right to this money, that it is an asset of the Dominion, to be used for Dominion purposes. Having, as I know he has, a large majority to sustain his views, I feel it is useless that I should say anything further, particularly at this late hour of the night; but, Sir, I cannot allow this opportunity to pass without protesting against the views held by that hon. gentleman and his colleagues in reference to the Award. In advocating the claims of the Maritime Provinces on a former occasion, or in anything I have said to-night, I feel it due to myself to say that I have not been influenced by any feeling of hostility towards the Government or with any desire to embarrass them. I believed then, as I do now, that the Maritime Provinces, alone, have a right to this Award. The people of these Provinces with scarcely an exception, believe their claim to be a just one, and no special pleading or vote of this House will change that opinion.

MR. WELDON: I should have thought that a matter involving such a large amount of money, and involving the interests of the Maritime Provinces, was worthy of being discussed on its merits. We have heard a great deal about the North-West, but what we want to hear is something about the East, we want the rights of the Eastern Provinces protected. If we are going to be given away we want to know it. The hon. the Minister of Justice has called upon me, as a lawyer, to answer a proposition he has made in this House with regard to this question. In addressing myself to this question, I wish to confine myself to its legal aspects, with reference to the several Governments concerned. Previous to Confederation, Quebec, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, were independent and separate Governments, but owing allegiance to the Mother Country. With regard to foreign powers they had no power to make Treaties, or any regulations, except through the Imperial Government. Now, we want to find the position of these Provinces in regard to the Fisheries in our bays and on our shores. We all know that there has been a decision before the highest English Court, involving territorial rights, within the marine league, or the three miles beyond the coast, and that decision affirmed that this marine league was part of the territory of the country; therefore, the rights to the Fisheries within these three miles belong to the inland country. With regard to the peninsula of Nova Scotia, the whole of the Fisheries within the three-mile limit belonged, therefore, to that Province. I do not mean in an Imperial sense that it was the property of Nova Scotia, but it was the exclusive property of Great Britain, in trust for the Province. In 1877 a case was taken to the Privy Council from Newfoundland, with regard to rights of Newfoundland in Conception Bay. The judges of Great Britain recognised the rights of the Colony to legislate with regard to that. I do not view this question either as a party or a provincial question, but as a question of justice. If we have the right to that money we are entitled to it. When we went into Confederation it was by the voice of the people, and I abide by that decision; but if we have not deprived ourselves of rights of property, we claim them now. It has been said that so far as foreign countries are concerned, and so far as the rights of fishing are concerned, Great Britain was to represent us. Well, I find that in Newfoundland, in a case in the Privy Council, it is laid down as follows:—

“It does not appear to their Lordships that jurists and text writers are agreed what are the rules as to dimension and configuration which, apart from other consideration, would lead to the conclusion that a bay is, or is not, a part of the territory of the state possessing the adjoining coasts, and it has never, that they can find, been made the ground of any judicial determination. If it were necessary in this case to lay down a rule, the difficulty of the task would not deter their Lordships from attempting to fulfil it. But in their opinion it is not necessary so to do. It seems to them that, in point of fact, the British Government has, for a long period, exercised dominion over this bay, and that their claim has been acquired in by other nations, so as to show that the bay has been for a long time exclusively occupied by Great Britain, a circumstance which, in the tribunals of any country, would be very important. And moreover, (which in a British tribunal is conclusive,) the British Legislature has, by Acts of Parliament, declared it to be part of the British Territory and part of the country made subject to the Legislature of Newfoundland. To establish this proposition it is not necessary to go further back than to 59 Geo. 3, c. 33, passed in 1819, now nearly sixty years ago. There was a convention made in 1818 between the United States and Great Britain relating to the Fisheries of Labrador, Newfoundland and Her Majesty's other possessions in North America, by which it was agreed that the fishermen of the United States should have the right to fish on part of the coasts, (not including the part of the Island of Newfoundland on which Conception Bay lies,) and should not enter any 'bays' in any part of the coast except for the purposes of shelter and repairing damages, and purchasing wood and obtaining water, and no other purposes whatsoever. It seems impossible to doubt that this Convention applied to all bays, whether large or small, on that coast, and consequently to Conception Bay. It is true that the Convention would only bind the two nations who were parties to it, and consequently, though a strong assertion of ownership on the part of Great Britain, acquiesced in by so powerful a state as the United States, the Convention, though weighty, is not decisive. But the Act already referred to, 59 Geo. 3, c. 38, though passed chiefly for the purpose of giving effect to the Convention of 1818 goes further. It enacts not merely that subjects of the United States shall observe the restrictions agreed on by the Convention, but that all persons, not being natural born subjects of the King of Great Britain shall observe them under penalties. And in particular, by Section 4, it enacts that if 'any person,' upon being required by the Governor, or any other officer acting under such Governor, in the execution of any order or instructions from His Majesty in Council, shall inter alia refuse to depart from such bays he shall be subject to a penalty of £200. No stronger assertion of exclusive dominion over these bays could well be framed. As has been already observed, Conception Bay is in every sense of the word a bay within Newfoundland, though of considerable width; and as there is nothing to justify a construction of the Act limiting it to bays not exceeding any particular width, this in an unequivocal assertion of the British Legislature, of exclusive dominion over this bay as part of the British Territory. And as this assertion of dominion has not been questioned by any nation from 1819 down to 1872, when a fresh Convention was made, this would be very strong in the tribunals of any nation to show that this bay is by prescription part of the exclusive territory of Great Britain." By that decision these territories and the three miles from the coast belonged to Newfoundland, and Great Britain only held them in trust. To the Provinces of New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island apply that principle, and then these territories were held by Great Britain in trust for the Provinces. Viewing it in that sense, supposing the appropriation had taken place before Confederation, who was the creditor of the United States? Great Britain, but as trustee for the Provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island. In this case, the money was paid over to the Imperial Government, and the latter handed it over to the Dominion, and they stood in the same position as Great Britain as trustees for the several Provinces of Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick. Now, I ask the hon. the Minister of Justice to point out if anything within the four corners of the British North America Act gives these Fisheries to the Dominion of Canada. There is nothing of the sort in that Act. I regret I was not here when the hon. member for Halifax put forward his views, but I understand he put forward the same legal arguments as I would have done. My contention is, in brief, that prior to Confederation these Fisheries belonged to the Provinces, held in trust for them by Great Britain; that Great Britain and the Dominion in regard to the Fishery Award are trustees for these Provinces; that Newfoundland, being awarded a share of the Award, was a recognition of the right of each Province to a share of the Award. I asked the hon. the Minister of Justice to point out what part of the British North America Act conferred this power, and he stated that the 12th sub-section was so clear on the subject that anyone who runs may read it. I contend that that does not convey the property, but only the right of legislation with regard to it. If the Fisheries belonged to the Province, they were the public properties; and in the 117th section it is provided that "the several Provinces shall retain all their respective public property not otherwise disposed of in this Act." The public property is comprised of land, mines, minerals and fisheries.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou): In what section is it stated that the Fisheries are included in "lands, mines and minerals?"

MR. WELDON: I understood both the hon. gentleman and the hon. member for Halifax to state that the 109th section covered that.

MR. McDONALD: No, I did not say that; I referred to royalties.

MR. WELDON: The 108th section reads:

"The Public Works and property of each Province, enumerated in the third schedule of this Act, shall be the property of Canada."

And the 109th provides that:

"All lands, mines, minerals and royalties belonging to the several Provinces of Canada, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick at the Union * * * shall belong to the several Provinces of Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick in which the same are situate or arise."

I agree that, so far as that section is concerned, it merely refers to lands, mines, minerals and royalties, but I think the matter is made clear in the 117th section.

Mr. McDONALD (Pictou): The British North America Act is an exception to an ordinary statute, because everything that is not granted is reserved.

Mr. WELDON: The British North America Act is the same as an Act of the Parliament of this Dominion. When the School Case, from New Brunswick, went to the Privy Council, Lord Justice James treated it as any other Statute which they were as capable of construing as either Kent or Story. Taking the sections I have quoted into consideration, I think it is clear the Fisheries were not handed over to the Dominion Government. I am going to give the words of Lord Selborne, one of the ablest jurists in England, in delivering an opinion in the Privy Council, on the 91st Section, which the hon. Minister lays so much stress upon. It was urged by the counsel in that case, Mr. Benjamin, a very able lawyer, with regard to land on the sea coast, that no part of the land in the Province upon the sea coasts could be dealt with, because by possibility it might be required for a lighthouse. I wish now to show what view the Privy Council took of the 12th Section:—

"It was suggested, perhaps not very accurately, in the course of the argument, that upon the same principle no part of the land in the Province upon the sea coasts could be dealt with, because by possibility, it might be required for a lighthouse, and an Act might be passed by the Dominion Legislature to make a lighthouse there. That was not a happy illustration, because the whole of the sea coast is put within the exclusive cognisance of the Dominion Legislature by another article."

That is the decision which Lord Selborne arrived at, referring the words "sea coast" to the land and not to the fish. The 13th schedule of the 9th sub-Section puts the lighthouses under the charge of the Dominion of Canada; but the reply is that the whole of the sea coast is put within the cognisance of the Dominion Government.

Mr. WELDON.

Mr. McDONALD (Pictou): Not at all. He concurs exactly with me.

Mr. WELDON: If these Fisheries were the public property of the Province, can you take it away except in express words? These were a part of the terms on which we entered Confederation: that it would protect our coast and Fisheries and public lands; but Canada has no right to take our public lands, which are protected as much as the Fisheries would be by a navy. Would it be contended that, because these Islands are protected, that because Prince Edward Island is protected by the Dominion, that all this land could be taken. When I was a boy I saw Her Majesty's ships going up and down the coast protecting the Fisheries, and we should have them doing so to-day whether we belong to the Confederation or not. We do not want our Constitution surrendered. We never surrendered it. We have a right to these Fisheries, which, under the British North America Act, remains intact to us to-day. The money held by the Dominion was not paid over to it for its use, but the Dominion simply received it in trust for the Provinces. The people of the Lower Provinces depend upon these Fisheries for a living, just as much as the farmers of Ontario do upon their broad fields. We wish to claim our ocean crops in the same way as the Western men do their field crops.

Mr. DOMVILLE: The hon. gentleman who has just spoken, and who was elected for the city and county of St. John (Mr. Weldon), pretends, to-night, to represent the whole Province of New Brunswick, and by so doing he has taken away the laurels from the member for Queen's and other representatives of the Province. I would like to know who represents New Brunswick after that. I must, however, tell my hon. friend that his remarks are most illogical. No doubt he will plume himself in New Brunswick for the stand he has taken to-night, as he contends, in obtaining its rights in regard to the Fishery Award; and will seek also to obtain the credit for having sought for a portion of the said Award. He will see that the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. King) does not back him up. Had he, as a lawyer and advocate, proved his case, I would have voted with him, irrespective of party or consequences; but he has failed to do so. He proclaims that he will vote for justice and right, constituting himself sole judge and jury in the case. To gain the ear of the House and to convince the country that he is right in his decision, he started with the doctrine of the sovereign rights of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, and sought to establish his cause on a territorial basis; but he had not gone far before the real secret came out, namely, that he was sowing discontent, or trying to, amongst the Maritime people; because he tried to make his argument stronger and more conclusive by stating, as a ground to rest his cause on, that the North-West was being built up at the expense of the whole country, which was unfair, and that, consequently, New Brunswick should get a money concession also. I say that is illogical. If he had wished to gain his object legitimately, he would have based his argument on what was just and right in itself. He endeavours to carry his point by sending broadcast through the country what he must know is a false doctrine, and endeavours, in the most unpatriotic manner, to make discord in the various Maritime Provinces. If he was correct in his views, that the North-West was getting what was not her due, why should a second wrong be committed by giving New Brunswick what does not belong to her? I suppose it is a lawyer's view of "justice." The hon. gentleman said each Province owed separate allegiance to the Mother Country. As a constitutional lawyer, it was an insult to the intelligence of this House for him to tell them that. To prove his case, he asserted that we owed our existence somewhat as a corporation did, and derived our charter from the British Government, and could not go beyond the four points of that constitution. He cited the case of the Quebec Lieutenant-Governor as an illustration. We were, as he said, under the necessity of getting rid of him; thus showing that we had a right to interfere with the affairs of that Province, or any other Province. Because the Lieutenant-Governor held his office at the will and pleasure of the Governor-General-in-Council, he undertakes to tell us that each of the Provinces has territorial as well as sovereign rights. The hon. member knows better than that, and can give no authority for such a statement.

He says further, as conclusive evidence, that when he was a youth, a British man-of-war was in the habit of guarding the Fisheries, which went to prove that being the property of Britain she guarded them. If the British Government guarded these Fisheries it was because they owned them solely, without respect to the territorial rights he speaks of; and when they ceded them to Canada they withdrew their fleet and handed the whole thing over to her. It was evidence of the intention of the British Government that the Government of Canada, for the future, should own these Fisheries, and was henceforth to guard them at her own expense, which she has done since Confederation. Now this argument should have been based, in my judgment as a New Brunswicker, on our just rights, if we had any. My hon. friend has not proved to the House that we have suffered in any way by this arrangement. If Canada had not obtained that money for the Fishery claim from the British Government, would he have undertaken to have said we had a claim on the Dominion Government for it, and on what would he have based his claim? No, Sir. But because some of our assets, he claims, realised a value, he undertakes to tell us that we must have a second bargain with the Dominion. When we entered into the Dominion, we handed over our assets to the Dominion, and got what was considered at the time a quid pro quo, and now we must abide by the results. In giving my vote to-night, I do it with just as much regard to what is right and wrong as the hon. member does. I seek to make no political capital out of this as my hon. friend does. The intelligent county I represent will return me as long as I give an honest vote, even if I make a mistake, in giving it, from their point of view. They do not expect me to endorse or give any clap-trap vote to gain cheap popularity. I feel they will be better pleased with an honest vote, even if it should be in a direction that would prevent New Brunswick receiving a sum of money that she was not entitled to; and I hope always to vote on a broader basis than on a party or unpatriotic one, such as my hon. friend contends for to-night. When I moved my resolution against the hon. the Minister of Railways last year, in regard to his policy and management of the Intercolonial Railway in the interests of the Province of New Brunswick, did I get any support from gentlemen from New Brunswick, or hon. members on the other side of the House? No; not one of the Opposition members said a word in the cause, or stood up for our rights, although they pretended they were willing to back me up in the lobbies afterwards. The people of New Brunswick will view this feeble effort of the Opposition to cause trouble as it deserves. The hon. member for St. John (Mr. Weldon), has said to-night that he accepted Confederation with all its consequences, which is a candid admission coming from him, and in the same breath he said it had ruined and was ruining New Brunswick. Illogical again. Why should he accept a policy which was to ruin his Province? I intend to vote for the resolutions of the right hon. the leader of the Government; first, because we have entrusted to him the Government of the country and have confidence in his judgment as a constitutional lawyer; and, secondly, because I have heard nothing to refute the arguments brought forward by the right hon. gentleman and other members against the adoption of the resolution of the hon. member for Inverness (Mr. MacDonnell) and I am willing at any time to meet my hon. friend from St. John and other members from New Brunswick, either in my own county or theirs, and prove the soundness of the vote I am about to give to-night.

MR. FORTIN: Having moved in this matter last year, I desire to make a few remarks on the present occasion. The resolutions presented by me in the last Session of this House were not to the effect that individual Provinces had territorial rights to the Fisheries, and that the Maritime population had an absolute right to the Fishery Award; but they expressed the idea: "that it was equitable and right that the money which came from the Fisheries should be returned to the Fisheries." When we brought these resolutions, in reference to the disposal of this Award, before this House, when we defended our ideas on the subject, had we any personal or sectional motives in so doing? No; none, whatever; the resolutions are on the records of the House and speak for themselves. Our ideas were based on broad International grounds; because the Fisheries are an important element in the general resources of this country, because the fish taken by the fishermen are sold, some in this country, but the greatest part is exported to foreign countries, which brings in money that adds to the public revenue and which is otherwise expended in every part of the Dominion. In moving our resolutions on this matter, we were inspired by a national spirit. I believe in the National Policy, but believe, also, that it should be extended to the extremities of the Dominion, and not confined, in the practicable application of its benefits, to the centre only. There is no industry that requires the effective and friendly hand of the Government, more than the Fisheries, because it is generally carried on at great and peculiar disadvantages. The avocation of the fisherman has to be carried on in storms and against high winds, frequently at the peril of life and property. In this country, on account of the severity of the climate, our fishermen are compelled to suspend operations entirely for a considerable portion of the year, and even in the summer, sometimes, for weeks together. I hold under my hand a carefully prepared statement showing that the fishermen of Gaspé and of Labrador, for instance, cannot fish, on an average, more than 100 days out of the 365 days of the year. In the face of these facts, surely they are entitled to some measure of aid from the Government, in the way of ameliorating the hardships and disadvantages peculiar to their hazardous calling. When I proposed my resolutions last year, we did not pretend that we had exclusive rights to that money, or that we had territorial rights; I did not pretend, nor do I now pretend, that this is not Federal money. I have the honour to represent a county in which three-fourths of the population live directly by the Fisheries. I would be very sorry to see the Fisheries under the control of the Local Governments, because they would not have the power, perhaps not the will, which the Federal Government has to protect them. When I submitted these resolutions I said: Is it not right and equitable that this money should be expended in such a manner as to foster these Fisheries? If a proper policy were adopted in this matter, we would be enabled to renovate the fishing grounds, some of which have been exhausted during the last twenty-five years, and to further develop the present productiveness of now existing, and at present used, fishing grounds, so that their productions would become perpetual and a permanent source of support to the people for all time to come. If something is not done in this direction, the manufacturers will lose the support of the best customers they now have. What do the economists say? That the home market is the best for the tradesmen. The artisans of our towns and the farmers comprise our markets in the centre of the country; but is not the best, the largest, purchasing market, to be found in the Maritime Provinces, with their half a million of people who live by the Fisheries. It has been said that fishermen are, in general, an improvident class. Unfortunately, the majority of them do spend everything they earn; but they are, for all that, a fine, hardy, moral class of men who deserve, at least, as much consideration from the Government as any other class. They consume three times more dutiable and manufactured goods, than do the farmers, head for head, of their comparative population. I regret being unable, at this moment, to find some accounts sent me by fishery merchants of Gaspé, which go to show the amount of goods they consume. I voted for the National Policy, but under the expectation that its provisions would be extended to every class. At present, by that policy, the fishermen and mariners are, in some ways, taxed heavier than they were before its introduction. They should, therefore, receive some consideration from the Government in the way of protecting their interests, as a set-off to their somewhat increased burdens. In addressing the House last year, I endeavoured to prove—and trust that I made myself understood by the intelligence of this honorable House, because I used irrefutable arguments, adduced from the testimony given before the fishery Commission at Halifax—“That to admit the Americans to a participation in our Fisheries would be to lessen the productiveness of these Fisheries to our own people.” When one farmer alone cultivates a given area of ground, he has a chance of reaping from off the whole area, or at least so much of it as he chooses to sow;

but put two farmers upon this same area, and its produce has to be divided between them. It is precisely the same with our Fisheries. Before the Washington Treaty our fishermen had their Fisheries to themselves; but their chance of securing fish has, since then, been vastly reduced, by admitting the Americans to share in our grounds. I shall vote for the proposition of the right hon. the leader of the Government, because, if it is carried, it does not shut out the solution of the difficulty for which a great many hon. members from the Maritime Provinces, like myself, have been working patiently since this Parliament met. The hon. gentleman, the member for Inverness, who introduced the resolutions now before the House, tried to throw aspersions on my course of action. He wanted the country to believe that I brought in my resolutions late, and for some purpose. Well, I always have a purpose in what I do, but it is, as invariably, a straightforward purpose. My purpose then was to give a chance to all parties concerned to study the question, so that it might finally come before Parliament with a good chance of success in the right direction. If these resolutions of the hon. member for Inverness had not been introduced, I would have brought in my resolutions, not unaided, but with the consent and approval of all my friends; and would have endeavoured to lead the country to perceive that what we asked was equitable and just. But I was shut out by the resolutions now before the House, but next year I shall bring mine forward again, with the full belief that the House will accept them; and if this be so we will have no reason to regret the action then taken, as it will prove the direct means of increasing the protection, and, consequently, the production of the Fisheries. Considerable efforts are being made in that direction in the United States, because the Government of that country has become enlightened on the subject. There they now fairly perceive that the sea, equally with the choicest of the land, is capable of producing for the wants of consuming millions. This year they have tried an experiment which has already proved fruitful. If no protection is extended to our Fisheries, the cod and other fish on the banks will be destroyed by the Americans.

Many of our Fisheries are still fairly good. I demonstrated, last year, however, that many of our Fishery banks are already half ruined; and if the Americans are permitted to come for many years longer, and to employ their present means of fishing, the half of our present fish production will have disappeared in ten years. I hope, Sir, the Government will take these facts, and all their attendant circumstances, into serious consideration. Every hon. member representing a fishing constituency, who has addressed the House on this occasion, has testified to the great importance of this industry, to the whole country; and it is to be hoped that the Government will so weigh the matter, as they will be induced to protect our people against the greed of American fishermen, and against their destructive fishery appliances which have tended to making fortunes for them at the price of destroying our Fisheries. In addition to this we should also endeavor to recuperate or replenish the Fisheries, now exhausted on many of our banks and other fishing grounds. Acting under the full conviction of the soundness of these opinions, and with the knowledge of the defeat of the resolution now before the House, I intend to support, by my vote, the amendment of the right hon. the leader of the Government.

MR. CASGRAIN: This is a very important question, and ought to be treated not from a party point of view. I have read attentively the amendment to the amendment, and declared myself strongly in favour of it. It expresses exactly the Constitutional Law under which we live, and disposes entirely of the abstract question of the Constitution. But we must not confound two things that are very different, the abstract question of property in the Dominion as to the Award, and the particular use to be made of the sum awarded, so as to meet the justice due to the parties the most interested, and not only protecting the Maritime Fisheries, but also maintaining and developing their productiveness. Though this Award is a general compensation to the Dominion, doubtless a part of it has been designed for the Maritime Provinces as damages for expenses or injuries that have resulted to certain private individuals in the different Provinces. Part of it must be paid to the private sufferers. I do not mean that it shall go to any of the Local Governments, however. There are to-day on the Bay of Fundy and the Bay of Chaleurs, and on the St. Lawrence coasts, private grants of land and rights that date beyond 1763, which must be protected and maintained as they then existed. Special grants have been given to holders of Fisheries by the Crown of France, in the Bay of Fundy and in Quebec. I know one instance where we have a right in Kamouraska, in regard to a porpoise fishery granted by the King of France. I give this as one of the instances of the neglect to look at this matter historically. You speak of the three-mile range before 1763, while it did not exist quoad those private rights. I quote this fact in support of the position taken by the hon. the leader of the Government, because it shows the money must not go to the Local Legislatures, but must be divided between the Dominion Government and the private individuals who have suffered. I intend voting in favour of the amendment to the amendment, reserving my opinion as to what may be done afterwards to better the position of the different Provinces.

MR. KILLAM: After hearing, last year, for a whole afternoon, the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Fortin) expatiating on the Fisheries question, during which he enunciated so warmly the doctrine that an amount should be set apart for the benefit of the Fisheries, it is cruel to our feelings to see now the hon. gentleman come here and complain because the Government have not adopted his idea as to the disposition of the Award. As to his devotion, the hon. member for Gaspé deserves the sympathies of the House. Nobody could be better informed on the subject. But we have yet to learn from any speech made by either himself, or the member for Halifax (Mr. Richey), or any other member, what the Government intend to do with the Fishery Award, which is the great question before the House. I would like to call to the minds of hon. gentlemen the course that has been pursued on this question from the start. Last year we had the Saturday afternoon speech from the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Fortin). This year the subject was brought up by the hon. member for Inverness (Mr. MacDonnell), on the 22nd.

MR. FORTIN.

March. On that day the hon. the Minister of Finance said it was not advisable to discuss it because he had some papers to lay on the Table which would give us a more intelligent understanding of the question. We waited until the present occasion, when the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Richey), stated it was out of order. The policy of the Government on this question has been one of delay. They desired to do nothing but to stave the subject off. Of course the Government can impose any policy on this House they choose. They have got the money and they mean to keep it. They will not even execute the public works in Nova Scotia, that are absolutely required. Several applications have been made to them, and the applicants have scarcely received a civil answer. The fishermen deserve to have their works assisted and promoted, the harbours improved, the rivers dredged, so that they may carry on their business more successfully. The fishermen are patient, they do not make much noise, but they are waiting for the good time coming. The fishermen believe this Government has never done the first thing for them, except to increase their taxation; but they are waiting for an opportunity to help put in a new Government, which will have more consideration for their claims than the present one.

MR. ANGLIN: There are important questions raised by the amendment proposed by the hon. the Premier, and I would like to enter into their consideration at some length, but as the hour is late, I must content myself with simply expressing my dissent from some of those propositions. I am not prepared to accept the proposition that the Fisheries belong to the Dominion and not to the Provinces: to the Dominion in its own right and not as Trustee for the Provinces. Nor am I at all prepared to assent to the proposition put forward by the hon. the Premier, that the Dominion is justified in putting this money into the General Treasury, because, hereafter, some troubles may arise involving the Dominion in expense for the protection of those Fisheries. That would be a reason why, if this Treaty were renewed from time to time, the proceeds of the Fisheries should go into the Dominion Treasury for ever. The right hon. gentleman chose to assert that the persons living on the sea-coast and engaged in the Fisheries, have advantages greater than the people who live in the interior, because in addition to the lands they possess, they possess also the opportunity of fishing in our waters. Anyone knowing the position of the fishermen of this country must be aware that the right hon. gentleman has represented their position as more favourable than it actually is. Their lands are generally poor, and of those who live upon them few are farmers; they depend almost exclusively upon what they draw from the sea. It is true enough that the people of Ontario have a right to come down and share in those Fisheries, as have the people of any other part of the British dominions; but, as a matter of fact, they do not do so, and it is only from the fishermen themselves that anything given to the Americans has been taken away. It has been alleged that our fishermen suffer no injury by reason of the Treaty, and, therefore, have no claim for damages. The fishermen of the Bay des Chaleurs complain that the fishermen from the United States come in and spread their enormous nets, sweeping the whole bay, so that the fishermen have very little chance of doing as well as they would do were the Americans excluded. I do not allege that the Provinces, as Provinces, have a right to this money; but the people have an equitable right to ask that it be applied judiciously and carefully, for the advancement of the Fisheries and their protection, and in assisting the fishermen in their most arduous and dangerous occupation. Very much less has been done towards the promotion of the Fisheries than was promised, and very much is required to be done. If the Estimates when brought down showed that the Government intended to be more liberal than formerly in this respect, they would be in a much better position than they stand in now. They say in this Parliament we have a legal right to this money—a right to apply it as we please. They apply it all to the use of the North-West, and have none to spare for the Maritime Provinces. They stand upon the strict legal right to do as they please, and they please that very little of it shall be appropriated for the benefit of the fishermen of the Maritime Provinces.

MR. GILLMOR : I have listened to the arguments on this question very attentively. I have never had any doubt as to the equity of the claim of the Maritime Provinces to this money. I have listened to the speech of the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Richey), and his clear, lucid arguments, and I am sure that, whatever may be the result of this discussion, the Maritime Provinces are indebted to him for the able manner in which he has advocated their interests. He made out his case very clearly, not only as to the equity, but the legality of the claim. Although I am not free from party feelings, and am sometimes animated to a considerable extent by them, yet when I see the delicate position in which the Government are placed, I would not try to embarrass them. I think they are in a position to judge quite as disinterestedly on the merits of the case, as hon. members working against them. This question ought to be treated fairly, and I am inclined to treat it fairly. I was pleased with the arguments of the hon. the leader of the Government. His points were very strong, but I rather inclined to the conclusions arrived at by the hon. member for Halifax. Perhaps I may be somewhat influenced in my judgment. I agree with the remarks of the hon. the Minister of Justice in regard to the poor fishermen. There are a large number of this class in my riding, and, I say it with no desire to flatter, that there is no class of persons in the county of Charlotte who are in more comfortable circumstances than the fishermen. There is no reason why this money should be devoted to their special benefit on the ground of their poverty, because they are quite as able to sustain themselves as the other classes of the community. At the same time I do not agree with the stress laid upon the idea that the money should be expended for the protection of the Fisheries. We do not know where the Dominion might be invaded first; but I hope, whether it is divided among the Provinces or not, that something will be done for the fishermen. I do not consider that the lighthouses on the coast are of very great benefit to them; I do not know of any especially erected for their benefit. For the past few years I have been trying a fog-horn in a locality where a great many fishermen reside. A small appropriation of $2,500 was voted in 1878, for a pier and break-water at Grand Manan. This was a small amount, but it would have afforded protection for the small boats. That sum, however, was never expended. I think that the least that can be done for the fishermen is to build small breakwaters where boats can run in in stress of weather.

MR. GIROUARD (Kent): I should have allowed this question to pass, as I have done many others since I have had the honour of sitting in this House, without speaking, were it not that the interests of my constituents compel me to address the House. The question which has engaged our attention until this late hour of the night is one of the very greatest interest to the inhabitants of New Brunswick. It is to them a question of the greatest importance as well as to the people of Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island. And among the inhabitants of New Brunswick none are more affected by this Fishery question than those who reside along the north shore and that of the Strait of Northumberland. I have the honour to represent a county, a large number of the inhabitants of which subsist entirely, or partially, on the products of the Fisheries; and it is my duty to express to the House the opinion of those persons who are directly interested in that important industry. I say that this question is one of vital interest to the Maritime Provinces, and this is why I say so: The Fisheries furnish daily food to thousands of persons who devote themselves exclusively to that industry; they are also of great importance because they constitute one of the principal resources of the Lower Provinces, if not the most important of them. The value of our Fisheries, as shown by statistics, clearly proves that a considerable amount of labour and of capital is annually employed in that industry. It is in truth to us an unrivalled source of wealth. Last year statistics showed that the value of fish exported to foreign countries amounted to $3,499,516. The value of fish taken on the coast of New Brunswick amounted, according to the last report, to $2,305,790.69; on the coast of Nova Scotia to $6,131,599.64; and on the coast of Prince Edward Island to $840,344.22; giving a total of

$9,277,734.55. This does not include $3,937,944.28 for the other Provinces, which should be added to the latter amount, making the grand total for the whole Dominion, $13,215,678.83. Such, Mr. Speaker, is the value of our Fisheries; the amount is a large one. Further examination of the statistics shows us that there are engaged in this industry, in Nova Scotia, 11,367 vessels and boats, giving employment to 26,527 men; in the Province of New Brunswick, we have engaged in it 4,636 vessels and boats, providing work for 8,712 men; and in Prince Edward Island, 1,804 vessels and boats, giving employment to 51,296 men. This gives a total for the Maritime Provinces of 17,807 vessels and boats employed in the Fisheries, providing employment for 92,535 persons. Is not this, Sir, a productive industry, and an important source of revenue, especially to the Lower Provinces? An examination of the topographical features of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and Prince Edward Island will show that the population has settled almost exclusively along their shores and their rivers. Fish are found in greater or less abundance along all the shores of these three Provinces, and the French Canadian, English, Irish and Scotch inhabitants exact from the sea a part, and frequently the whole of their livelihood. Not only is fish an article of export, it is also an article of food, and the most valuable one which the inhabitants of the Maritime Provinces have. It forms a large part of their daily food, and often, in severe years, whole families, whole neighbourhoods, derive the subsistence from the products of the Fishery entirely. If to the amount exported to foreign countries and to the amount consumed in the Lower Provinces, we add the fish of all kinds distributed over the markets of Ontario and Quebec, we shall be still more forcibly brought to admit that, the Fishery question is not only not less important than any other which can be brought before this House, but that on the contrary it ought to command the most serious attention of the representatives of the people. I share the opinion of the mover, the hon. member for Inverness, so far as this, that the Provinces that have suffered must be first indemnified; but that must be done in a judicious manner, and without doing an injustice to the sister-Provinces. I may be mistaken, Mr. Speaker, but it did not appear to me that the hon. member acted sincerely in bringing this motion before the House. I surmised that his course was purely and simply a pretext for attacking the present Administration, and for embarrassing them. And did he not at once avail himself of the opportunity to vent his spleen? When we desire a thing, Sir, we take means to obtain the object aimed at. But what means has the hon. member taken to obtain his object? He attacked, he even insulted those to whom he is applying for a favour. Therefore, he holds but little to that favour. He claims to lay great stress upon his motion. If that be so, Mr. Speaker, it is more for his own sake than for that of his electors, who thus have a very maladroit representative. We have received an indemnity for our Fisheries, which means, in the first place, that our Fisheries have been injured; and next, that the party paying the indemnity has made restitution of a sum representing the value, or nearly so, of the damage done. The American Government paid that indemnity, but the question now before the House is: to decide what use the Government should make of this money, received as compensation for the injury done to our Fisheries by American fishermen. I am of opinion that a certain amount, the interest at least, should be applied to repairing the mischief which has been done. Now, there is a difference of opinion as to the manner of applying this money. My hon. friend from Inverness admits, as I do, that the Maritime Provinces have suffered considerably from the interference of Americans upon our fishing banks. Since he is desirous that that money should be made over to the Provinces which have suffered injury, he must therefore wish, as I do, that the Fisheries should receive the compensation which is their due. Now, as the Prime Minister has so well shown, there is but one Government which has the control and care of our Fisheries, that is the Government of the Dominion. It alone has the right of protecting and improving our Fisheries. The Provinces could in no way apply this money for the advantage of the Fisheries, which are entirely beyond their control. To distribute this sum of $4,500,000

among the Local Governments would be to deprive the Government of the Dominion of the means of protecting our Fisheries. We ought, therefore, to leave that considerable sum in the hands of the Federal Administration; but as its acquisition was brought about through the Fisheries, we naturally expect to be treated with liberality when our fishermen apply for assistance and protection, of which they certainly stand in need; and the Government of the day will permit me to offer them the following advice: Immediate steps should be taken for the improvement of our Fisheries, which have been hitherto too much neglected, for the question of our Fisheries is deserving of more than secondary consideration. The Fisheries have always been one of the principle resources of Canada. Before the conquest, ratified by the Treaty of 1763, the resources of Canada, and they were enormous, consisted of the Fisheries and the peltry trade. The peltry trade, the exportation of furs, is almost ruined, exhausted; but we still have the Fisheries. That industry should be protected by the creation of a fund, the interest of which should be devoted to the development of our Fisheries, and used to repair, in every possible way, the injury which they have suffered from the acts of American fishermen. In this way the products of our Fisheries would be considerably increased; our fishermen would derive from them, both for themselves and for the country, greater advantages, and their labour would become less severe and less dangerous. These few suggestions will, perhaps, not receive the approval of hon. members from the Western Provinces, because they represent constituencies which are much less interested, or are not interested at all, in the Fisheries. But if this line of reasoning is followed, may not representatives from the Maritime Provinces say: "Of what use is the Pacific Railway to us? Why should enormous sums of money be expended to promote emigration and colonisation?" Answer may be made to us that the fertility of the soil in the west, which furnishes, in part, the flour used by consumers in the Lower Provinces, decides, or rather justifies, the Government in the encouragement of colonisation, and the promotion of agriculture. New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, and Prince Edward Island, owing to the fact that they are all surrounded by bays and rivers, have advantages over Western Canada which compensate for the inferior quality of their soil. These advantages are the vast and rich Fisheries, which, if they were protected and encouraged, would be unrivalled in the world. Therefore, the principal resources of the Maritime Provinces are the Fisheries, just as the Western Provinces have their cereals. Now, if the National Policy means protection to all the industries of Canada, protection must not be confined to manufactures, mines, and agriculture; it must also be extended to the Fisheries. I am in favour of national protection, but I would have it complete. I do not wish for it only for manufactures and mineral products. I want it for all our sources of revenue, and especially for our Fisheries, which stand in great need of protection, exposed as they are to be exhausted. Hon. members from the Maritime Provinces made sacrifices last year, in order to come to an understanding with the hon. members from other Provinces, as to the question of Protection. It is now the turn of the latter to show good will towards us. As I am responsible to my constituents for my words, as well as my votes, I have to say, Mr. Speaker, that I shall vote in favour of the amendment moved by the right hon. leader of the Government, whose good inclinations, so well known in fact, lead me to anticipate protection for our Fisheries, which may be doubted by the mover of the resolution. In conclusion, I may state that we must not think only of protecting coal and flour, of protecting one Province to the detriment of the other, but that we must have especially, it may be above all, mutual and equitable protection.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

MR. KILLAM: I wish to say that I have not stated any opinion as to the merits of the question or as to how the Fishery Award should be disposed of. I have challenged the opinion of the Government in regard to its disposal. I regret that I have to vote with the Tory supporters of the right hon. gentleman opposite, but I have no other recourse on this occasion.

BILL WITHDRAWN.

MR. ROYAL moved :

That the Bill (No. 26) To incorporate the Emerson and Turtle Mountain Railway Company, be withdrawn, and the fees paid thereon refunded, less the cost of printing and translation.

MR. MACKENZIE said he did not think the motion went far enough. When the Government interfered and prevented a Bill being heard before a Committee, he thought the whole of the cost should be refunded.

MR. LANGEVIN said the promoters of the Bill had to run the risk, and the course taken was the ordinary one. He did not think the House should go further.

MR. ROYAL said in framing his motion he had to take the wording of the report of the Railway Committee, but there was a great deal in what the hon. member for Lambton had said, as the promoters had been compelled to come from Emerson to Ottawa, and had been put to great expense.

Motion agreed to.

(Mr. Abbott.)

FIRST AND SECOND READINGS.

MR. ABBOTT, in introducing a Bill (No. 97) To provide for the winding up of Insolvent Banks and Insurance Companies, said: This Bill has been rendered necessary by the repeal of the Insolvent Act. Under the system which prevailed while that Act was in force, there were separate Acts providing for the winding-up of these companies, which referred for their details and machinery principally to the Act of 1875 and its amendments. There is now no machinery in existence which would enable an insolvent bank or insurance company to wind up, and I think it is desirable that it should be provided. The principle of the Bill is a little different from that of the two Bills which have thus become practically useless. I have entertained the opinion that a bank or an insurance company was in a different position from an ordinary trading company. In banks, of course, there are usually a vast number of shareholders, and these shareholders, though they may have paid up their shares, are still liable to the double liability according to the Banking Act. In insurance companies, as a rule, there is an immense balance of the unpaid stock uncalled for generally, but always unpaid—and the imprudent, or useless, or reckless, calling in of this in the enforcement of the double liability would cause distress among a vast number of people. Besides that, the amounts which are dealt with through the banks and insurance companies are extremely large in comparison with the ordinary revenues arising from corporations. For these reasons, among others that will suggest themselves to every hon. gentleman, I think it expedient there should be more precaution adopted in the appointment of a liquidator of a bank or an insurance company than has been thought necessary in ordinary trading corporations and firms. The main principle of the Bill in such cases is the course which is suggested, and has been approved by the Banking and Commerce Committee in the case of the Consolidated Bank, that is to say, that the three parties who have the greatest interest in the proper winding-up of insolvent banks and insurance companies, should be represented on the liquidating board, that is to say, the public, the shareholders, and the creditors; and the Bill provides a mode by which the Government may name one liquidator, the shareholders one, and the creditors one, the Government and creditors' liquidator ceasing to hold office as soon as the creditors are paid off, as soon as it becomes a mere-domestic question, as it were, for the shareholders themselves to carry on the liquidation of the bank. I do not propose in this Bill to divest the corporation of its assets, or to vest them in these liquidators. I think that unnecessary, because we know its affairs depend entirely on those who manage it, and therefore, as the directors of these institutions afford every means of collecting their debts, for making their calls, and for doing all the other matters which are requisite, I simply substitute these liquidators for the directors of the bank. As these liquidators represent every interest themselves, it seems to me the plan affords reasonable probability that the bank or the insurance company will be wound up with the greatest possible care and attention. I do not know that any more explanation is needed by the House until the Bill is printed and circulated.

MR. IVES: I had the honour to introduce a Bill which has had its first reading and has been referred to the Committee on Banking and Commerce, having for its object to provide the machinery for winding up insolvent insurance companies. We had a meeting of the Banking and Commerce Committee several days ago, and I expected at that time that the Bill would be referred to a sub-committee, composed of several members whom I had named, one of whom was the hon. member for Argenteuil (Mr. Abbott), and others being leading lawyers of this House. But to my surprise the chairman of the Committee informed me that, at the request of the Government, the Bill was to stand. I was afterwards informed by the hon. the Minister of Justice that his desire was that my measure should stand until a Bill which was being prepared by the hon. member for Argenteuil should be introduced to the House, and have its second reading, and be referred to a Committee also. Now, it seems to me that, if that course is persisted in, unless the Government make these measures Government measures, in a certain sense, and give them precedence upon Government days, we shall have no legislation this Session upon this subject. The Bill of the hon. member for Argenteuil is introduced to-day; in the natural course of things it cannot reach a second reading, probably, during this Session. Now, it seems to me that it is not absolutely necessary that the measure of the hon. gentleman should be read a second time, and referred to a Committee, but that we proceed with my Bill, because, I suppose, the only object of the hon. member is to obtain the best possible legislation upon this subject. We have in his Bill, which I see is printed, his ideas on the subject. We propose to make him a member of this Select Committee, and it seems to me we might proceed with my measure, having the advantage of his ideas in the Bill he has drafted. If there is to be legislation on this subject this Session, it seems to me either that the hon. gentleman's measure should be read and referred immediately, or that I should be permitted to proceed with my measure. I do not suppose it matters very materially to the House—it certainly does not to me—whether my Bill or his Bill becomes law. Now, although the two Bills differ in some respects they are not so dissimilar as to render it impossible to incorporate his ideas in my Bill. He proposes to appoint three liquidators; I propose to appoint one receiver. He proposes that the stockholders, the shareholders, and the Government, should appoint each a liquidator; I propose the Court should appoint the receiver. The difference is not so great but that his proposition should be incorporated in my Bill, if the Committee should judge it well. At all events, unless we proceed with my measure we shall probably have no legislation at all. I notice to-day on the Order Paper we have a matter put down far above my Bill, that is, the motion of the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Rochester) for the consideration of his resolutions. That has been going all during the whole Session; discussions have been begun upon Notices of Motion, and, if not completed, have been given precedence over Public Bills and Orders. It seems to me if that practice is continued much longer, many important Public Bills on the Notice Paper will not reach a second reading at all.

MR. BLAKE: It will be recollected the Speech from the Throne stated that the subject of insolvency would receive consideration at a very early stage in the Session. The hon. the First Minister stated that the measure of the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Colby) embodied the Government policy upon that subject. The view of the House upon that measure has been already emphatically declared. I suggested that it really was of importance, in matters of such great moment as the administration of insolvent incorporated companies, that the Government should take the responsibility of these measures. The hon. Minister, at the time, took the responsibility of seeing that measures were placed on the Statute Book. I have repeated since that such measures should be carried through by the Government. Now, no person in this House, on the Ministerial Benches, or anywhere else, is better qualified to prepare such a Bill than the hon. member Argenteuil (Mr. Abbott); nor do I wish to say that the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives) is in the slightest degree unworthy to prepare such a Bill; but, in a matter of this kind, it should be brought forward on the responsibility of the Government; and, if not directly, then let it be by putting the measure on the Government Orders. The suggestions of the hon. member are worthy of consideration, and the questions raised by these suggestions will require very careful attention.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I would suggest that my hon. friend's Bill, which is now before the House, receive its first and second reading, and that then, by mutual consent, the Bill of the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives), should get its second reading, and that both Bills go to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce, and the Government will undertake the responsibility of aiding and assisting the legislation.

MR. MACKENZIE: You will not adopt the child.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD? We will adopt the child.

MR. MACKENZIE: Oh, you will.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Yes; everything but the rag baby.

MR. ANGLIN: Then the hon. the member for Argenteuil will be the putative father.

MR. KILLAM: I think that a great mistake was made, in repealing the Insolvent Act, by the hon. the leader of the Government, who generally agrees with me on commercial questions of this character. I think we ought to profit by the experience of other countries, that it is necessary to have some law to enable the honest debtor to get clear of liabilities incurred perhaps not on his own responsibility, and prevent him from being placed in a position in which he can do nothing in the future. I believe we will have to go back to the old state of things again before long; it will be necessary, it will be found, to have some sort of Insolvent Act. The great cause if all the difficulty has been the negligence of creditors. They say: We appoint Inspectors; let it go; we had better take ten cents and clear it off. The practical solution of the difficulty is for creditors to look after their rights. We will probably return before long to a new Insolvent Act embodying the provisions of those of 1869 and 1875.

Bill read the first and second times, and referred.

Bill (No. 6) To make provision for the winding up of insolvent incorporated banks and other companies (Mr. Ives) read the second time and referred.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bill (No. 99) Respecting the Reformatory for Juvenile Offenders in Prince Edward Island.—(Mr. MacDonald, Pictou).

WAYS AND MEANS—THE TARIFF.

ADJOURNED DEBATE.

House resumed the adjourned Debate on the proposed motion: "That Mr. Speaker now do

leave the Chair for the House to go again into Committee of Ways and Means."—(Sir Samuel L. Tilley.)

MR. KILLAM: Before the hon. gentleman moved the House into Committee of Ways and Means, on the 9th March, I hoped we would have some indication from him that he intended to abandon a part of the policy, which was adopted last year, in relation to the industries and productions of the country. I had hoped we would have had some information that would have been useful to the commercial men of this country in the direction of the remarks made by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), as to the duties upon agricultural products. I had hoped the shipping interest would have received the benefit of his kind consideration, and that we would have been informed that he was about to remove his absurd and useless duties upon breadstuffs and grains passing through this country. I believe that the policy of the hon. gentleman, in placing restrictions on the grain trade of the West going to Europe, by way of Montreal, is one of the most ridiculous policies that ever was submitted to an intelligent Parliament. I think the time has arrived when hon. gentlemen should come to this House and acknowledge their error, and express themselves willing to again restore to our ports the trade of which they have been deprived. I read the other day a petition presented by gentlemen connected with the barge trade through the Welland canal. They came here to ask the Government to reduce the tolls. They represented that if those tolls were reduced, the 7 per cent. of the grain shipments from the west that went by way of Montreal might be materially increased. I believe that would be a good thing for this country. These gentlemen further said that if the Welland canal tolls were reduced by one-half, Montreal could be made of much more importance as a shipping port. I desire, however, to say as little as possible upon this subject, because hon. gentlemen are too weak on this point to be attacked severely in reference to it. While every facility should be given for shipping the products of the North-West to Europe, we are confronted with the policy of the hon. the Finance Minister, and compelled to submit to all the restrictions that can be imposed to make business disagreeable to the trade without being profitable to the Government. I hoped that when the hon. gentleman on the 9th of March, rose to explain the policy by which he proposed by taking 5 per cent. off playing cards, and putting it on valentines and chromos, to place the finances of the Dominion on a sound basis, that he would have remedied the error of the grain duties. There were persons who had believed in him to some extent. In Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, I have met gentlemen who had an idea that while this was a new policy, the hon. the Finance Minister would readily change it for the better, if he found it did not work well. I hoped he would have remedied the defects which appear so prominently. We have submitted to the Tariff for twelve months. We have seen arbitrary diversions of trade in certain directions against the wishes of the people. The annoyance to everybody engaged in trade has been of an exasperating character. But what benefits have we received? We are told that an order came from Manitoba to Berlin, or some other western town, to supply 2,000 wagon wheels, and that was proof of the immense advantages of the National Policy in assisting the industries of the country, I cannot congratulate Manitoba on being compelled to send so far for such goods; but if the hon. the Finance Minister would only carry out his policy to its legitimate conclusion, he would compel every man in Manitoba not only to buy his wagon wheels, but everything else in Western Ontario, and a trade would spring up between the two sections which would astonish everybody. The best thing to do for the people, is to let them follow their own inclinations in matters of trade. Let them adopt trades which best suit their interests, and not compel those to manufacture who wish to engage in other pursuits. The best thing for Canada is to adopt the policy which will bring the greatest good to the greatest number, and enable the people to remain by their old homes to adopt the principles which the people of England have taught us, and make this a free country for everybody to settle in. The sugar question is a notable instance of the manner in which this National Policy is enriching manufacturers at the expense of the people. There is no use in my reciting the facts in this instance, they have been stated over and over again. The hon. the Finance Minister has never attempted to deny them in any of his speeches. He cannot show that any advantage, except to the manufacturers, has accrued by taxing the people 1c. too much a lb. on sugar for manufacturers' benefit, with a loss to the revenue of $600,000 a year. On this question the hon. gentleman stands on the narrowest ground that any Finance Minister ever stood upon. In fact, the hon. gentleman's assumed knowledge of the sugar trade only places him in the light of a walking compendium of financial ignorance. He knows nothing about it. He will be taught by experience just as the hon. the First Minister will be taught by experience about the Dominion lands as to the revenue he may expect from them. I regret to know that the Maritime Provinces have produced a man, so thoroughly incompetent to understand the subjects affecting their best interests, as the hon. the Finance Minister. What does his arbitrary division of trade amount to? Let me ask the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White). He has told us, repeatedly, in his speeches that the great misfortune of this country was the balance of trade against it. He has assailed us Session after Session from the gallery, in his paper and since in his seat, stating in effect that, all we had to do was to make the country so poor that we could not import foreign goods, and we should be perfectly prosperous. This hon. gentleman (Mr. White), and the hon. the Finance Minister consulted to propound a sugar policy and secure the West India trade. If there is anything in the balance of trade theory; if it be true that it is not for our interest to be able to buy in foreign countries; if it be best that we should not have any money to spend abroad, the hon. gentlemen are right. They may succeed, but I doubt, if under their policy, they will get many to settle on our waste lands. The people who are responsible for the balance of trade in a country, are, or ought to be those who produce and earn money. If Government devise arbitrary tariffs to destroy our industries and force trade into wrong channels for the purpose of making up an imaginary balance sheet in their ledgers, we shall see the country injured. The hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) the other night enlarged upon the enormous trade already existing between Canada and the West Indies. Vessel after vessel was carrying the products of Cuba, Jamaica, and Porto Rico to Halifax, and the enormous freights by the Intercolonial in consequence, were weighing down the wheels and axles of the cars and causing the accidents we have recently heard about. Only a short time before, he had told us that the balance of trade against us was reducing us to a ruinous condition of poverty. What is true in the larger sense must be true in the minor. The hon. gentleman must admit that, if the balance of trade against us is so destructive, then no possible good can be derived by increasing that balance against us in the trade with the West Indies. In former years the balance of trade with the West Indies was in our favour, and the hon. gentleman worked for the purpose of destroying that balance. If he is to be the Finance Minister who shall succeed the present one, we should expect something less contradictory in his theories. The balance of trade between the Dominion and the rest of the world is of variable quantity; may perhaps increase and decrease with our prosperity, but it is true that the balance of trade against a country is a sign of depression, and the balance in favour of that country is a sign of prosperity, then the hon. gentleman on the Treasury Benches have got the argument entirely against them. While the hon. member for Lambton was in power, the actual balance against this country decreased, but when the hon. gentlemen opposite were in power, they constantly increased the balance against us. They increased the adverse balance from sixteen millions in 1868, to thirty-eight millions in 1874, while under the Government of the hon. member for Lambton, the balance against us fell to fourteen millions. I believe that this country is largely dependent on others for its prosperity, and that it should not build a Chinese wall about itself, and shut itself up from all communication with its neighbours. The policy for Canada is to have as far as possible, perfect and absolute Free-trade with everybody, while it is a growing country, with a vast far west to open up and a railway to complete from the Atlantic to the Pacific. I would tell the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. DeComos), that if the Liberal Party receive a chance, they will build that railway more quickly and cheaply than it can otherwise be built under the exervating policy of the party now in power. Our best policy is to allow the people to do as they choose, to follow those industries they consider the best, and not to compel them to establish this or that trade or monopoly for the benefit of this or that party. The people of this country are too intelligent, they have too many common schools to accept such a doctrine as that of the National Policy. In the great contest in England lately neither party has attempted to revive the exploded theory of taxing one industry for the benefit of another. In referring to sugar the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) made a laboured statement the other night to the effect that in 1877 the price of sugar was so many cents a pound; in 1878 it was less; in 1879, still less; and in 1880 still less again. The hon. gentleman tried to convey to the House the idea that sugar had decreased in value during the last two or three years, on account of the National Policy. I want to ask him whether the first or the second years decrease was due to the National Policy or not? It may be that sugar is cheaper now than it was then. Suppose it is higher next year, shall we blame the National Policy for it? We intend to treat these facts logically, and we intend to deal properly with hon. gentlemen when they come here as demagogues and tell us that because they got up this great National Policy, therefore, the people of this country are prosperous. The hon. member for Cardwell might just as well have commenced to argue on the price of ships. He might have said that, because a ship cost less than five or six years ago, the National Policy was a great institution. Could not the hon. gentleman have also explained to the House that the price of ships, for seven years back, had decreased, and that decrease was owing to the change of Government in 1873? His argument would have been worth just as much as it was on the sugar question. I know myself the prices of ships have decreased. The cost of building ships has decreased since

1873, perhaps 17 or 18 per cent. I am fully aware of the actual decrease, where ships have been built by shipbuilders at their own expense, and not by contract; but I wish to call the attention of the hon. the Finance Minister to the fact that, that decrease is by no means due to the National Policy. Perhaps a ship can be built now for less money than before the new Tariff, but anyone who pretends that ships can be built for less money because an additional taxation has been imposed upon the materials entering into their construction, pretends something which he is hardly able to sustain. Everything the present Government has done in relation to the shipping interest is not to encourage but to destroy it. Let the hon. member for Cardwell remember this question of shipping when he comes as a newspaper man into Parliament. I was thinking of comparing the hon. gentleman to Cobbett, who tried so long to get into Parliament, and who, when he got in, was such an utter failure. Cobbett, however, was a man who had economic views worth something, and if he did not say anything to electrify Parliament he was, at all events, a man whose opinion was worth listening to, entirely unlike the hon. member for Cardwell, who is so utterly ignorant of the commercial affairs of this country that he mistook his vocation when he came here to enlighten this Parliament upon sugar duties and matters of that kind. The hon. the Finance Minister told us the revenue he expected to derive from the spirit duties had decreased, and he congratulated the House and the country on the fact that, although he had lost the revenue, the temperance cause had been the gainer. The hon. gentleman has made a great mistake. What are the facts with regard to the liquor traffic? Liquors are like all other luxuries. When the country is able to spend the money for luxuries it will have them. In England it has been observed that when the country was not prosperous and the people were not able to increase their wealth, the consumption of liquors did not increase. I know that though gentlemen opposite with their majority are likely to hold the benches they now occupy for some years, it is my duty to impress upon them some facts useful to them in framing their policy so they may do the least possible injury. I am willing, on all occasions, to give information to people who need it so much; but while I do this, I am bound to make the reservation that, I shall treat these gentlemen with the consideration which they deserve, and shall refer to the finances of this country in the way which I consider most calculated to make them go sooner to their political grave. I pretend to say that the consumption of liquors is the same as that of any other luxury. When a country is wealthy the people spend more money in every kind of luxury; they spend more in sugar and more in beer, and the English figures in my hand will prove it; but if I cannot get the attention of the hon. the Minister of Finance and the hon. member for Annapolis, who is occupying it, I shall have to go on without their distinguished consideration. These figures have been carefully collected principally from reports submitted to the English Parliament, and from the recent report of a Committee of the House of Lords upon the Temperance question. I will give these to the hon. the Minister of Finance as soon as he can give me his attention; and then he can deliver a good temperance lecture in St. John. The figures are these: the increase from 1861 to 1865 in the value of property, and profits assessed to income-tax in the United Kingdom, was £15,000,000 per annum, or at the rate of about five per cent; from 1866 to 1869, £8,000,000 per annum, or only 2 per cent; from 1870 to 1876, £25,000,000 per annum, or 5 per cent. In the first of these periods, the consumption of certain articles per head, increased as follows:—Wine, 33 per cent; spirits, 22 per cent; malt, 21 per cent; tea, 26 per cent; sugar, 15 per cent., and tobacco, 12 per cent. In the second of these periods, that from 1866 to 1869, the period of least progress, there was no increase in either of these articles except in tea, 12 per cent, and sugar 13 per cent. But in the last of the periods referred to the increase, was wine, 13; spirits, 26; malt, 10; tea, 18; sugar, 25; and tobacco, 9 per cent. That was the time when prosperity increased in the greatest ratio. Hon. gentlemen may claim that this is a calculation per head; that the population of the United Kingdom was increased at the same time. I say that when the earnings increased the consumption of luxuries increased also. Now, we have made less revenue from spirits here at all events; that is shown by the returns. The hon. the Minister of Finance said it was the spread of temperance principles. I admire my hon. friend; he is a good advocate of temperance out of Parliament, but I do not believe he understands the economic policy suited to this country. In what particular have the imports of this country increased? What sign of prosperity has been shown? I see in almost everything a decrease. I call the hon. gentleman's attention to the items of coffee, tea and tobacco, in which there has also been a decrease in the six months returns for 1878 and 1879, submitted to this House. The result of the hon. gentleman's policy is to prevent the people from enjoying the luxuries of life. He may say that he is an advocate of the cause of temperance. Now, I have shown him that when the people are poor they are able to buy less, and consume less. This policy is a policy of poverty that deprives the honest hard workingmen of this country of the benefit of those things that they would have been able to buy but for it. I do not mean to say we cannot stand this policy; we can bear a great deal of taxation. The hon. gentlemen on the Treasury Benches, took credit the other night for every prosperity which exists in this country in any branch of industry whatever. Now, the hon. the Minister of Finance knows at the bottom of his convictions—if he has any—that there is not one single foundation for the assumption he has taken that such prosperity is attributable to the National Policy.

AN HON. MEMBER: Tell him about shipping.

MR. KILLAM: I do not think it would be worth my while. The hon. gentleman told us it was the policy of his party to encourage ship-building. He told the House the Government was going to return all the duties paid on articles used in the construction of ships. We waited for about six months and then an Order in Council was promulgated, by which the Government undertook to pay back duties to the extent of half a dollar per ton. The hon. gentleman congratulates himself upon having done justice to the shipbuilders, but he has not done so. Those of St. John claim that $1.95 per ton is the drawback that should, in justice to them, be allowed them. The shipbuilder is taxed directly and indirectly at least $2 per ton, and that I maintain, is a moderate calculation. As I said in 1874, shipbuilders are willing to contribute their share towards the burdens of the country. I am quite willing that shipbuilders, and all others, should bear a fair share of the taxation, but they decline to be satisfied with the hon. gentleman when he tells them, "We will tax you so much, and then return it," but fails to do so. It will be necessary for the hon. gentleman to fulfil some of the pledges he has made to his constituents, or else he will be attended to at the next election. The hon. member for St. John (Mr. Burpee) will supply the figures to prove the amount of duties paid on ships and materials. In the calculation I have made, bar iron is included. We could not buy it in the Dominion. There was a time when we could have purchased it from the hon. member for King's (Mr. Domville); but, as my hon. friend from Westmoreland remarked, the National Policy has shut down his mills. The Coldbrook rolling mills were destroyed by the National Policy. Where are the 200 men who were employed in those works? The disastrous effects of the National Policy upon the private interests of the hon. member for King's are to be regretted, but it serves him right for supporting a Government whose policy is calculated, not to build up rolling mills, but to destroy them. If it is in the interests of the Dominion to put a tax upon sugar, for the benefit of Redpath, why should it not be in the interest of the country to put a tax upon bar iron for the benefit of Domville? Why is not Domville as deserving as Redpath? I desire, before bringing my remarks to a close, to ask again the hon. the Finance Minister what he has done for the the improvement of the shipping interest? I would like to know whether the hon. gentleman considers himself responsible for the rise in freights in New York. These things are not dependent on his financial policy or his financial speeches. Last July, grain freight in

New York for European ports were six shillings. To day they are about five shillings, and on the day the hon. the Finance Minister took credit in this House for the boom in the shipping trade, freights were about three shillings. I do not charge that the hon. gentleman is responsible for the fall from six to three shillings. Far from it. Nor do I intend to give him credit for the increase from three to five shillings. I want, instead, to impress upon the House the utter absurdity of the hon. the Minister of Finance getting up here and proclaiming to the people that he assisted the shipping interests by raising the price of freights in New York. I wish I could congratulate the hon. gentleman for his protection of the coal trade, but I do not think the increased duty will add very much to the production of coal. I think, however, that there will be a good trade in this article this year. The price of coal in the United States has risen 55 per cent. in five months. I maintain that the coal trade has never been benefitted by the policy of the hon. gentleman. From a return recently laid before the Nova Scotia Legislature, we find that the sales were less during the past year than during the previous year, the principal difference in the trade being that less was sent to the United States, by about the additional quantity which went up the St. Lawrence. In conclusion, I may say, that hon. gentlemen may amuse themselves by taxing this industry and that; by diverting the trade from one Province to another, and by telling the people of the Maritime Provinces that they pay less on their molasses if they do pay more on their corn-meal, but that will not convince the electors of the justice of their course. Certainly, this Tariff has advanced particular industries and injured others, and the people generally are suffering from its evil results. The policy is one which, while it scarcely excites the admiration of anyone, creates dissatisfaction and disgust among the many. The people, however, can bear for a while the increased taxation and submit to its annoyances, knowing as they do that the next general election will relegate its authors to the positions they deserve.

MR. RYAN (Montreal Centre): Mr. Speaker, this debate has been prolonged

to such an extent that the House is growing tired; and the country is sick of hearing a re-hash of the arguments of last Session against the National Policy. I do not think it is fair to judge of the effects of this policy, when it has only been one year in operation; but, judging from the results which have come under my own observation, I hold that it has been successful, and has realised the expectations of its most ardent advocates. It has restored confidence to the people of the Dominion; it has increased our commerce, both at home and abroad, given employment to the idle of past years, and has a tendency to develop the resources of the forests and mines. At the early part of the debate the hon. member for Centre Huron stated that, if the hon. the Finance Minister could show him that twelve industries had been started, giving employment to 1,200 people, he would be convinced that the policy was a success. I regret that the hon. gentleman is not in his place, for I could tell him that not only have 1,200 additional men been employed, but that in the city of Montreal there are to-day between 4,000 and 5,000 more operators employed than there were a year ago, and more than would have been employed had the National Policy not been in existence. As a proof, I will recite what has been the effect in that city. We have to-day a sugar refinery, which I must confess the people of this House and the country, from the frequency with which it has been referred to, think has become nauseous. That industry ran down under the policy of the late Administration, but it was restored under the National Policy. Not only has it been reopened, but it gives employment to several hundred operators. A similar industry, giving employment to 300 or 400 operators, has also been opened; and the effect of the policy has been that the Hudon Cotton Factory, which I am glad to say has been in successful operation in Montreal for years, has this year increased its capacity 100 per cent. Then the policy has had the effect of bringing into existence a woollen manufactory, and we have had a silk manufactory established within twelve months. But this is not the only effect. There is not an industry in the city—iron, brass, woollen, boot and shoe factories—that are not employing from 50 to 100 per cent. more than they did a year ago. Some eight or ten days ago I was very forcibly struck with the remarks of a manufacturing gentleman from Montreal. I happened to meet him casually at the Russell House, and he said it was a pity that so much time should be wasted in discussing the Tariff question, which, he remarked, every intelligent man must admit to be a success. "I cannot for the life of me," he said, "see why the members of the Opposition adopt the suicidal policy of trying to run a Tariff of which some of their warmest friends are its strongest supporters." "What effect had it on yourself?" I asked. "Well," was the reply, "not a year ago I was employing only 140 men, while to-day I am giving employment to 300." "Is it not possible your case is an exceptional one?" "I think not," was the response, "I have no hesitation in saying that there is no branch of industry in the city of Montreal that is not to-day employing more men, and is in a more prosperous state than before." Well, I hold that this beneficial effect is not confined to Montreal, but has been felt throughout the length and breadth of the land, wherever any manufacturing industry has been in existence. With the permission of the House I will read an extract from a journal commenting on the admissions of the St. John Telegraph, a paper which, I think, is certainly not favourable to the National Policy, or to the hon. gentlemen who sit upon the Treasury Benches. In regard to the effects of the National Policy that journal made a series of damaging admissions the other day. Speaking of a large furniture house in St. John, it said: "The National Policy had compelled them to stop importing from the States, and to manufacture at home; and that in consequence they are now selling home-made furniture as cheaply as it can be made in New York, and more cheaply by 35 per cent.—the amount of the Canadian duty—than it could be imported for." In other words, it admits that the National Policy has established an important industry in St. John, while the consumer is also benefitted by a reduction in price. Allow me to proceed a step further in that direction. I have already stated that the Hudon Cotton Factory had increased its capacity 100 per cent. I find in an authority, which I do not think hon. gentlemen opposite will dispute, the Toronto Globe, the following article:—

"It is reported that the Hudon Cotton Mills is shortly to enlarge its working capacity and staff of operatives, by building a new wing, adding 250 new looms, an extra engine of great power, and 200 more hands. They are to restrict themselves to the manufacturing of plain cotton. The Canada Cotton Company, reinforced with the addition of $10,000 bonus from the Cornwall Council, is also said to be on the eve of enlarging their staff. The new addition will be 200 feet long, the dyeing houses will be enlarged, 200 looms will be added to the 400 at present running, and the extra hands employed will number over 150. The Stormont Company, Cornwall, are also enlarging their mills 60 by 100 feet, adding about 200 looms, and bringing on 100 more hands."

That is testimony which cannot be doubted, and it is a corroboration of the statements I have made regarding the effect of the policy in Montreal, and in other parts of the country. Allow me to show what the effect has been on one of the most important industries in Canada. Hon. members are aware that the Grand Trunk Railway is a most extensive corporation, giving employment to thousands of operatives. Yet, while that corporation has been in existence, up to within the past year, they only manufactured thirty-five locomotives in Canada. Their locomotives were formerly imported from England and the United States, and, I regret to say, chiefly from the United States. The effect of the policy has been, that during the past year they have constructed twenty locomotives at their shops in Montreal, besides building a number of drawing-room cars, and an increased number of rolling-stock of every description, and giving employment to additional operatives, and full employment to their permanent staff, that were working half and three-quarter time before. It is utter nonsense to tell those men you are paying more for your sugar, which is not really the fact. The hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) put that matter so clearly before the House, that there is no possibility of disputing his statement. I hope the facts I have cited will give us an additional convert, in the person of the hon. member for Centre Huron. I have one more quotation from an independent source, the Post. There has been a great deal said about the exodus from Canada. I regret to say that there is an exodus. It is not of recent date, but has been going on for the past twenty years from all parts of the Dominion; but I am prepared to say it is less now than it was a year ago. Hon. gentlemen opposite wish to convey the impression that the people are going to the United States, when the truth is the great mass go to our great North-West for the purpose of settling there. But let me quote:

"The Liberal journals are full of emigration to the States, and are magnifying and multiplying the numbers as rapidly as they can. As a matter of course the whole blame is laid upon the National Policy. There is, no use in denying the fact that a number of people are leaving Canada for the United States and the North-West, though not in such proportions as the Globe would lead us to believe, and not certainly in numbers as great as at former periods. A season of prosperity in the States has always the tendency to attract people from Canada, some of whom stay there, but most of whom return with some means, and the present 'exodus' is due entirely to such natural causes. If the National Policy had not been inaugurated there would just now be a real exodus."

There is no question but what that would have been the case. But there is another quotation with which I will have to trouble the House. It has particular reference to the elections which have and are taking place in Great Britain, and is taken from the Free Press of this city:

"Toronto, April 1.—The Liberal gains in England are received with demonstrations of joy by the Canadian Reformers. Should Beaconsfield be defeated, a demonstration is being contemplated by the leading Reformers of this city. It is felt that a change of the Ministry in England will be fatal to the Canada Pacific Railway, and strengthen Mr. Blake's hands in his assaults upon the Government policy."

What is this demonstration for? What is this great rejoicing about? Is it because a change of Government is likely to take place in the immediate future? How is that going to help our friends opposite to regain their seats on this side of the House, or is it because they gloat over the hopes of a change there it would be more unfavourable to the Dominion than if the British Government remained as constituted at present? If such is the case I can only pity the hon. gentlemen. I believe if we could dive down into the innermost depths of their hearts we would find that that is the feeling which actuates them. I hope that all true patriots will unite in the support of this National Policy, which will have the effect of further extending our commerce both at home and abroad, in developing our manufacturing industries, and developing the resources of the Fisheries and Forests, and by that means creating a united, happy, and prosperous people.

MR. BURPEE (St. John): The introduction of the new resolution by the hon. the Minister of Finance on Tuesday last, and the speech made by that hon. gentleman, opened up the subject anew, and required an answer from some hon. member on this side of the House. The hon. gentleman went over a great deal of the ground he traversed in his Budget Speech, and he added much that was new and much that was local, that requires that I should at least say something on the subject. The hon. gentleman's speech was very lengthy, very fluent, and contained so many promises of prosperity for the future, that it reminded one very much of the speeches he made before Confederation. Those of us who followed that hon. gentleman through that campaign have been much disappointed in the results of his pledges at that time, and will not have much confidence as to the effect of his pledges for the future. Indeed, so utterly have the repeated promises made by the hon. the Minister of Finance to the Lower Provinces been falsified, that grave apprehensions exist in the minds of the members on this side of the House as to the sincerity of the assertions he now makes. The good results anticipated by Confederation will soon disappear if the present fiscal policy of the Government continues. The hon. gentleman went through the yearly Estimates since Confederation, comparing the increases from 1868 to 1874, and from 1875 to 1879, and by deducting several new expenditures, sought to show that our present estimates are not excessive. I do not intend to follow him through these Estimates, as, no doubt, the hon. member from Centre Huron will. No hon. member of this House can expect, considering the increased necessities of our extended territory, but that in many items our expenditure will increase, in others it certainly might be considered high enough and stop. For the first few years of Confederation the addition of new

Provinces added to our expenditure, and can easily be understood. The fixed charges, such as Interest and Subsidies, cannot be changed much. So long as we continue to borrow money, no great reduction can be made on the list, Charges on Revenue. But the items under ordinary controllable expenditure can be controlled, and very many of the items can be kept nearly stationary, if not reduced. Under this head these expenditures were increased, from 1868 to 1874, by $4,700,000. Under the late Government the increase stopped, and a reduction commenced, so that from 1874 to 1878 the items under controllable expenditure were reduced by $1,780,000. We now see by the Estimates submitted for the year 1881, an increase has again commenced. There is quite a large increase on the item Civil Government, which should not be; an increase on Legislation, Public Works chargeable to Income, Lighthouse Service, North-West Indians and Post Office. There is an increase in all these items of over $500,000. After deducting the additional interest for that year, of $698,000—and the estimated decreases for other services—the net increases on the controllable expenditure is over $500,000, to which should be added $300,000 for Dominion Lands, formerly charged to Income, now for the first time charged to Capital Account. This makes the total income, including interest, $1,500,000. I am satisfied that many of these items might have been reduced instead of increased. When we refer to our debt and the increased Interest Account against the Dominion, we are led to consider our public works, which the money was borrowed for, their paying capacity, and whether they pay running expenses, leaving out any interest on the cost of construction. The hon. the Minister of Finance referred in his speech to the cost of the Intercolonial Railway. He referred to its construction as a necessity, and an obligation under the Terms of Confederation; he also referred to the enormous expenditure of running the railway since its completion. Both of these statements are true; but, Mr. Speaker, this is just one of the large expenditures where not only a large amount of interest might have been saved annually, but a larger amount that is now paid every year to make good the running expenses. The Intercolonial Railway should have been built through that part of the Dominion where it would have been shorter and gone through a well settled country. It would then have cost eight or nine million dollars less, have been self-sustaining, and thereby saved from $400,000 to $450,000 a year in interest, and some $500,000 a year in running expenses, over and above the earnings, which is now taken out of the revenue of the Dominion. If the Intercolonial Railway had been built where it should have been, and when the people of New Brunswick were induced by the hon. the Finance Minister to believe it would be, so much of this enormous expense would have been saved. Mr. Speaker, considering the great mistakes in the past, on such works as the Intercolonial Railway, more care should be taken in future, with regard to our public works, in order, as much as possible, to avoid similar unproductive expenditures. There has been spent some $22,000,000 to $23,000,000 in building the Intercolonial Railway, on which the Revenue has had to pay a million and a half dollars a year. There has been spent a like amount on canals, etc., since Confederation, on which the Revenue is paying a million dollars a year. Since the year 1872 the receipts from Canals have been $3,230,000, and the working expenses in running them $3,205,000, leaving a surplus of only some $24,000 in seven years. Slides and Booms have done little better; during the same time the receipts from this source have been $738,300, and expenditure for working them, $589,000, leaving a surplus of $149,000 from 1872 to 1879. In later years, however, the receipts are being greatly reduced—from $98,000 in 1872, to $65,000 in 1879. The Prince Edward Island Railway, also, has been run at a loss to the Revenue of an average of $95,000 a year. Mr. Speaker, when we consider the unproductive nature of the public works of the Dominion, and the enormous tax they now are on the Dominion Revenue, we may well ask what will be the result of such taxation on our revenue when the Pacific Railway is open and running from Lake Superior to Winnipeg, and from thence to British Columbia. The expenses for running such a line will be something enormous after it is built. Mr. Speaker, the hon. the Finance Minister also referred to our increased debt, taking up the increase from 1867 to 1873, and asserting that the Macdonald Government had increased it about $24,000,000, and that the Mackenzie Government had increased it, from 1873 to 1878-9, to something like $55,000,000. He, Sir, surely should not fail to include in the responsibilities of himself and colleagues, the expenditure for 1874. If he had done that, the debt due to them would have been increased to $32,600,000. During the first four or five years after Confederation, however, very little money was spent by his Government on the public works of the Dominion, either out of the Consolidated Revenue, or on Capital Account. During that time they spent on Public Works chargeable to Capital, some $10,500,000 from Revenue, which, for comparison, should be added to their expenditure from 1867 to 1874, making in all the debt increased by his Government from 1867 to 1874, by $43,000,000, and by Mr. Mackenzie's Government, from 1874 to 1878, $32,000,000. Mr. Speaker, the hon. the Finance Minister again referred to the taxation of New Brunswick under the present Tariff, and the duties per head paid by that Province, as compared, stating that her dutiable consumption was $1.40 per head less for 1879 than 1878. The dutiable consumption is no criterion of the percentage of taxes paid. While New Brunswick, in 1879, fell off very largely of imports as compared with 1878; yet the rate per cent., under the present Tariff, on her imports was 4 per cent. higher than the Dominion taxation. The imports of New Brunswick in 1879 was only about half what it was in 1866. In 1866, the year before Confederation, New Brunswick imported $10,000,794 worth of goods, on which the Customs duty collected was $1,033,609. In the year 1879, it imported $5,337,958, on which the duty collected was $1,044,807, showing about half the quantity of imports, yet a larger duty collected.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: Everything that we brought from other parts of the Dominion were called imports in 1867; and under the Trade Returns in 1866-7 the imports from Ontario and Quebec were entered as imports from other Provinces.

MR. BURPEE: The comparison the hon. gentleman has made does not give the right way of looking at the taxation under the present Tariff. If the hon. the Finance Minister will compare the imports and duties paid by the several Provinces, as compared with New Brunswick, he will find that ever since Confederation, New Brunswick has paid 3 or 4 per cent. more than the general taxation of the Dominion. He remarked also upon the receipts and expenditures from the Dominion and from New Brunswick, respectively. I do not refer to this in a sectional spirit, but the hon. gentleman brought the subject up, and told us that New Brunswick's receipts from the Treasury of the Dominion were greater than her payments into it, leaving out of account Civil Government, Legislation and North-West expenditure, which he said New Brunswick had paid nothing towards, and that she has nothing to complain of as regards the financial arrangement made with the Dominion. Sir, I shall be prepared to show that New Brunswick does pay a great deal more into the Treasury than the hon. gentleman gave her credit for in his speech the other day, and which he has repeated several times.

After Recess.

MR. BURPEE (St. John, N.B.): Before you left the Chair, Sir, I was dealing with the statement made by the hon. the Finance Minister in his speech, on Tuesday last, with regard to the receipts and expenditures of New Brunswick in connection with the Dominion. I will submit the statement, showing receipts and expenditures, without the items for Civil Service, Legislation and the North-West Territories—as he said we paid nothing towards these—for the first ten years of Confederation:

Ten Years--and dividing the Receipts and Expenditures of the Intercolonial Railway among Provinces.

Then, if you add to the receipts and expenditures, as per population, the total expenditure of the North-West Territory, Civil Government, and Legislation, and other such items in the Public Accounts, as are not chargeable to the Provinces directly, which amounts to about $42,982,000. Divide that among the Provinces pro rata with these results:

This statement shows that Ontario and Quebec had largely contributed to the Dominion over and above their receipts from it, and that New Brunswick had paid into the Exchequer more also, than she withdrew from it, by $508,567, the first ten years after Confederation. For the first few years after the Intercolonial Railway was opened, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick were charged for all the working of the Intercolonial, and so placed in the above statement, that is, the receipts were credited to the Provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, and the expenditure charged to them. If we take out the Intercolonial receipts and expenditure, and charge and credit the same to the other Provinces per population, we have the following results. The population, on which I have estimated, is that of 1871:

This includes all the charges in the Public Accounts, taking out the items chargeable to the several Provinces, and every joint account, Legislation, and Civil Government, Pensions, Superannuation, and some other items chargeable to the whole Dominion, which are now divided among the whole of these Provinces per head of population. I think the result shows that New Brunswick does not stand badly towards the Finances of the Dominion. Then, Mr. Speaker, if we take up the twelve years' receipts and expenditures since Confederation up to June 30th, 1879, exclusive of Legislature, Civil Government, and North-West Territories, we have from :

Provinces.	Receipts.	Expenditure	Surplus.	Deficit
Ontario and Quebec.....	$186,709,732	$118,771,872	$67,937,860
Nova Scotia.....	20,957,698	21,079,616	$91,918
New Brunswick.....	19,747,544	17,130,874	2,616,670
Manitoba.....	1,646,811	2,410,429	763,618
British Columbia.....	3,769,887	4,886,559	1,116,672
Prince Edward Island.....	2,443,413	4,409,627	1,966,214

In this statement, the large receipts from New Brunswick in 1878, enable her to show a much larger surplus in the above account. If we add to the above the additional expenditure for the full twelve years on joint account, per Province, as per the ten years' statement—which amounts to a little over $55,000,000—we have a surplus of about $20,000,000 to the credit of Ontario and Quebec, while, in the Provinces of Nova Scotia, Manitoba, British Columbia, and Prince Edward Island, we have a deficit of about

$13,000,000. In the case of New Brunswick, if we deduct from the expenditure charged against that Province the $150,000 a year since 1874, for the giving up of her export duty on lumber, we will find, if any deficit, a very small one indeed, after paying her share of Legislation, Civil Government, North-West Territories, and all the joint accounts. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, the receipts from the several Provinces of the Dominion, since their entering Confederation, up to the year 1879, show a taxation on Ontario and Quebec of $186,709,000, or $65.80 per capita; on New Brunswick of $19,750,000, or $70 per capita; on Nova Scotia of $20,987,000, or $54.50 per capita; on Manitoba of $1,650,000, or $41.20 per capita; on British Columbia of $3,770,000, or $62.10 per capita; on Prince Edward Island of $2,443,000, or $26.84 per capita. This shows how largely New Brunswick pays into the Dominion Treasury as compared with Ontario, Quebec and Nova Scotia. It will be noticed how largely Ontario and Quebec have paid in more than they have drawn out. In 1877, a very careful and exhaustive enquiry was made by an expert in commerce, thoroughly acquainted with commercial matters, who not only had access to all Customs books in Montreal, but had the assistance of the mercantile men in Montreal, as well as to the amount of duties collected in that port on merchandise forwarded and consumed in Ontario. The result contained in a report to the Department was that a little over 50 per cent. of the collections in Montreal—which comprise nearly all the collections in the Province of Quebec—was for goods consumed in Ontario. Therefore, the Customs returns in Ontario show but little over half her payments into the Treasury from Customs collections. I venture to say, Mr. Speaker, that New Brunswick does not owe the Dominion one dollar. I think that these facts answer the statements of the hon. the Finance Minister, so far as regards New Brunswick. He referred also to Savings Banks in New Brunswick as a proof of prosperity. Now I find that the deposits last year in the Savings Bank of St. John amounted to about $22,000 more than the withdrawals. But I do not think that affords a true indication of the condition of the labouring classes in that city. No doubt many persons deposited their money there in order to have greater facility in withdrawing it when required, and for the purpose of getting the rate of interest allowed them until they can find better investments, men comparatively rich. The hon. gentleman spoke of the West India trade of New Brunswick as having been greatly revived, and there being no lack of demand for freights. I have not heard so good a report as that. I have not for years known freights to be so low as at present. It is true a large amount of shipping has visited St. John during the last few months, but it was caused by a great grain block in New York, where vessels remained for months without getting freights, and some of them came to St. John and took freights at a very low rate rather than wait any longer in New York. The hon. gentleman spoke of the flour trade, and of it being so much cheaper in Canada than in the United States. Larger flour dealers in St. John have told me that they could repeatedly buy flour in New York cheaper than in Montreal or Western Canada. I suppose his information came from the same parties who wired him last Session that the duty on cornmeal would be paid by the shippers in New York, a statement laughed at by the House. The hon. gentleman made some disparaging remarks regarding the petition presented to this House from the city and county of St. John against the Tariff. There were some 2,800 names on that petition and 230 since received, making over 3,000, and I venture to say there were not twenty of those names that were not those of voters. A number of them were supporters of the hon. gentleman in his last election. The petition was a bonâ fide one, representing large interests—among whom were many manufacturers—and did not deserve the sneering manner in which the hon. gentleman spoke of it. I do not believe the National Policy is by any means as popular in the Dominion to-day as it was when it was inaugurated. I do not believe, if the country could pronounce upon it to day, it would be sustained, but would be defeated by an overwhelming majority. With the exception of a few manufacturers, the feeling of the country is decidedly opposed to that policy. Many manufacturers are opposed to it in its present shape; and further, I believe there is a feeling among many hon. members in this House adverse to that policy, who, a year ago, supported it, and they would be glad to return to a revenue Tariff. There are many hon. members who are very reticent in respect to this policy, particularly from the Provinces of Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island. I think all the predictions made last year from this side of the House, respecting the effects of this Tariff, have been fulfilled. We said there would be a large increase of taxation; the returns for the last six months show this to be true. The increased duty upon raw materials has dissatisfied many manufacturers, and in many cases, defeated the object the Government had in view. It is, moreover, creating a feeling of dissatisfaction in some of the Provinces, which will increase. Before Confederation we were not led to suppose a Protective Tariff would be imposed on this Dominion. We were told otherwise. The present Finance Minister himself then told us no such taxation would exist, that the taxes would not be more than $2.75 per head for a quarter of a century. The policy of several members of the Government, before Confederation, was opposed to Protection. At a time when the Tariff ranged from 20 to 30 per cent. in old Canada, the present hon. leader of the Government declared that it must be reduced to meet the wishes of the people of the Maritime Provinces before they would enter the Union, and it was so reduced to a 15 per cent. Tariff. Sir A. T. Galt has been referred to by the Premier as the father of the present Tariff and the National Policy. In 1866, Sir A. T. Galt made a Budget Speech, which is interesting now in view of his connection with the present Government. He was then the present leader's Finance Minister, and was introducing a lower Tariff to meet the case I have just spoken of. As Sir Alexander Galt's position then and until a very recent period was so different from what it is now, it seems very fitting to bring forward his utterances and have them freshly recorded again. I quote:

“The Government proposes to make these articles free, and they believe that by doing so manufacturers of all these classes of goods, on which a rate of 20 per cent. is now imposed, and which will be reduced to 15 per cent., will be able to manufacture the same description of goods more economically than before, and offer them to the public at lower but remunerative rates. This advantage will therefore be gained by these changes, that while they will be able to supply our people with goods 5 per cent. cheaper than under the existing Tariff, the manufacturers will be placed in a more favourable position than now with regard to competition in foreign markets. (Hear, hear.) I think that so far from these changes injuring them, as some may perhaps fear at the start, their position will be greatly improved. (Hear, hear.)

"Hon. Mr. HOLTON: How? By higher protection?"

"Hon. Mr. GALT: No, but by cheapening every article that goes into consumption in the manufacture of their goods. I have no hesitation in expressing my individual wish, Sir, that we are in a position now to abolish Customs duties on all of them. (Cheers.) And I hope the day will come * * when we may be able to make a clean sweep of all Customs duties on manufactured goods. (Renewed cheers.)"

In 1876, Sir A. T. Galt made another speech in Toronto, quite as strong, and in the same sense, as the one which I have just read. His Tariff policy in 1866, and again reiterated in 1876, is very different from the Protective Policy of the present Government. His Tariff policy of 1866 was quite in accord with the policy of the Liberal party in New Brunswick at that time, lead then by the present hon. Minister of Finance. It is the policy of the Liberal party in New Brunswick to-day. The platform of the Confederate party in New Brunswick at that time was well defined in the columns of the St. John Telegraph, in large, bold type, mostly in capital letters, which read as follows:—

"Millions of money by the building of the Intercolonial and Western Extension. St. John must become the centre, the ocean terminus, the Liverpool of America! Free trade, an extended market, and emigration and settlement of our wild lands, and hundreds of other advantages for which our merchants, our mechanics, our lawyers, our physicians, our who'e people have for years been praying, hoping, working, will be guaranteed by this Union. With Union our mechanics and labourers will be certain of constant employment, summer and winter, all the year round, at good wages, while the cost of living will not be increased one per cent. Our merchants will be enabled to extend their trade to all parts of British North America. Our mechanics will then find a market in which they may sell all the goods which they can possibly manufacture, and soon will find it necessary to enlarge their factories and employ hundreds of men where they now employ only tens. Our shipbuilders will have the markets of France thrown open to them for the sale of New Brunswick ships—the finest, most substantial and the best sailers in the world. And our bankers will find that by the immense circulation of British capital and British gold, now guaranteed to us, their occupation will be gone. No longer will exacting money-brokers be enabled to keep the nose of the small trader to the grindstone and fleece him of one per cent. per month, as they have been doing for years past."

The Telegraph has continued and remains the advocate of the Liberal cause and the same commercial principles, while he who was its editor at that time—1866—is now the editor of a Tory paper and the advocate of a Protective Policy. This was the programme laid in the Province of New Brunswick for carrying Confederation. We may come further down still, and we find, in 1874, the hon. the Minister of Railways (Sir Charles Tupper) denouncing the hon member for Centre Huron (Sir Richard J. Cartwright) for putting a 2½ per cent. increase, saying he was entering the thin edge of the wedge of Protection; and we find, in 1878, the hon. the present Minister of Finance saying, in St. John, that no increased taxation should take place. We find him making the following statements, in speeches delivered by him at that time, during the 1878 election campaign. He said:

"It has been stated that Sir John A. Macdonald said that he would adopt the United States Tariff of 35 per cent. Now, when 12½ per cent. was sufficient for the five years, and for the last nine months 10½ per cent. Tariff was enough to meet the requirements of the country, can any one suppose him so insane, so mad as to ask or say he would put on an average of 35 per cent? or to say he would put on an average Tariff of 35 per cent. when 12½ or 13 per cent. is amply sufficient to meet the requirements of the country. There are but two public men that I know of in Canada who advocate a cent. per cent. Tariff. Neither of these gentlemen are now in Parliament.

Again he says:

"If I had been in Parliament last Session, I would not have voted for increasing the duty on unenumerated articles from 15 to 17½ per cent. I am now coming to the delicate question of flour and coal—the great question on which this election is to be run. I have no hesitation in saying that, if I had been in the House last Session, when supporters of the Government proposed a tax upon these articles, I would have voted against the motion."

We are also assured by the right hon. the leader of the Government, as to reduction of taxes, in a speech made at Sweet'sburg, and reported in the Montreal Gazette of 10th July, 1877, as follows:—

"We had made up our minds, as the whole people of Canada had done, that Confederation was necessary for the good of the country. We had to please the people of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, and their Tariff ran from 5 to 12 per cent., while ours ran up to 20 per cent., and the great cry raised against us in the Maritime Provinces was, that by coming into Canada, we would put excessive taxes upon them. We met them half way, and reduced the duties to 15 per cent."

So that we have, up to 1878, no announcement of this enormous Protective Tariff. I might allude, for one moment, to the taxation as it began in 1867, and as it is to-day. The Tariff, at Confederation, averaged 10 per cent. in New Brunswick; now it is 20 per cent. for the Dominion; it was, in 1867, 10½ per cent. for the Dominion generally, and in New Brunswick, 24 per cent., and will likely be larger, when the full year's returns are in, which will give full effect to the increased taxation. The hon. the Minister of Finance in his first speech on the Budget referred to the taxation between Great Britain and the United States, endeavouring to show that the present Tariff favoured Great Britain and dealt heavily against the United States, which is not the case. Now, the true way to test this, is to take taxable merchandise. There was a large reduction made in the list of free imports by the Tariff of last year, reducing the Free List from about \$25,000,000 to about \$10,000,000 from United States imports; and from \$6,500,000 to about \$4,000,000 from Great Britain. The Free List left from the United States, now comprises such imports as fish, under Treaty, say \$500,000; wool for manufacturing, over \$1,000,000; settlers' effects, \$700,000; hides, over \$1,000,000; raw cotton, nearly \$1,000,000, and a number of other items for manufacturing purposes, which it is to our advantage to admit free of duty, and, therefore, should not be admitted into a calculation to show the percentage of taxable imports as between one country and another. The six months' comparative statement laid before the House, on which the calculation is made, is what we have now to go by, although I do not admit the result of taxation under it is the same as will be shown when the full year's return will be compiled. By the six months' statement, the average of duty on imports from Great Britain, on goods dutiable and free, in 1878, was 19¼ per cent.; in 1879, 19¾ per cent. From the United States, 1878, 12 per cent., and 1879, 15 per cent. Taking the dutiable goods only, the average rate of duty on imports from Great Britain, in 1878, is 19½ per cent., and in 1879, 24 per cent., an increase of nearly 5 per cent.; while on imports, from the United States on dutiable goods alone, in 1878, was 22 per cent., in 1879, it was 23 per cent., an increase of only 1 per cent. This is the true way of getting at our taxable imports. The hon. the Minister of Finance also said, as comparing six months of 1878-9, the decrease of imports of dutiable and free goods for this period was, from Great Britain, only 7 per cent., while the decrease on dutiable and free goods from the United States was 33 per cent. To apply the same rule to the dutiable goods only, the decrease of imports from Great Britain was 15 per cent., and from the United States 18 per cent. This is the only fair comparison, as in the imports from the United States in 1878, in the free goods, there was a large amount of grain, etc., in transitu, more than was allowed by the statement referred to. We now come to the manufacturers, who, as a class are not benefitted by the Tariff, the enormous increased duty on materials for manufacturing purposes, has more than neutralised the advanced duty on the manufactured article. Besides the increased capital necessary under the present Tariff to do business, has, and will interfere with their progress. For example, take agricultural implements; manufacturers have complained of the disadvantages they are under by the present Tariff, while they get an increased protection on manufactured articles from 17½ per cent. to 25 per cent., the increased duty on materials and fuel is from 6½ per cent. to 16½ per cent. Take the iron foundry business; while increased duty on manufactured articles is from 17½ per cent. to 25 per cent., the increased duty on materials and fuel is from 4½ per cent. to 14½ per cent. Again, take the nail manufacturers; while the increased duty on nails is from 17½ per cent. to 25 per cent., at present prices, the increased duty on iron, materials and fuel is from 6¼ per cent. to 20 per cent. On nails and tacks combined, the increased duty on the manufactured is from 17½ per cent. to 25 per cent., and on the material and fuel from $5\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. to 17 per cent., making a discrimination against the one of $6\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., and the other of $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., as compared with the 1878 Tariff. On carriages, the duty on manufactured articles is increased from $17\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. to 30 per cent., while the duty on raw materials and fuel is increased from 13 per cent. to $23\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. On boots and shoes, the increased duty is from $17\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. to 25 per cent., while the increased duty on the materials, fuel, &c., for making them is from $10\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. to 19 per cent., or 1 per cent. worse off than before. Harness and saddlery manufacturers get an increase of $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. duty on the manufactured articles, and pay $12\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. to 15 per cent. additional on the mounting and materials for manufacturing. Materials for construction of ships have been increased from $4\frac{3}{4}$ per cent. to 13 per cent. Materials, provisions, &c., for lumbering, have been increased from $10\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. to 22 per cent.; and so on among nearly all the manufactures, except sugar refineries, cotton and woollen manufactures, and, perhaps, furniture. Other manufacturers do naturally ask why such special advantages should be given them as admitting their raw materials and machinery free. It has been said that prices of such goods have not increased. Mr. Speaker, we know better, as the several circulars distributed to the trade will corroborate; some things have advanced three or four times, and are still advancing, all of which the consumer has to pay. Now, the hon. the Finance Minister, last fall, visited several manufactories throughout the Dominion. I am satisfied that, in a great many cases, there was a great deal of dissatisfaction expressed, when he made his visits, that never came to light. What do we find on examination: that in Montreal, Toronto, Hamilton, Brantford, Oshawa, St. Catharines, Guelph, London, &c., we find him visiting a wealthy class of men, representing some \$32,000,000—some worth \$20,000, \$40,000, \$100,000, \$500,000, and from \$1,000,000 to \$3,000,000; all these immense fortunes were made under a revenue Tariff, and, considering the depression this country has been passing through, no class of our population has suffered less than our manufacturers.

Now, it would seem to me that these manufacturers visited by the hon. gentleman, were many of them desirous to obtain some advantages, and it was no wonder he was treated so well in his journeyings, besides it gave them an opportunity to gain a cheap and widespread advertisement, if nothing else. The manufacturers of St. John have not the same chance and advantages as those in Ontario, who have the best water power in the world, at a very low rate, and possessing direct railway and water communication to their mills, besides having a market at their doors. We, in New Brunswick, were once told that the Maritime Provinces after Confederation would do the manufacturing for all the west; and Sir, we find on the Welland canal alone there are some fifty manufactories and mills, and these Ontario manufacturers do now manufacture very largely for the Lower Provinces. I took some pains to find out from the banks in St. John, and by other means, about how much there was paid for purchases made in Ontario and Quebec annually. In two banks I found it was nearly $3,600,000. We may, therefore, take it that there are $4,000,000 or $5,000,000 worth imported from Ontario and Quebec into the Province of New Brunswick yearly, and a larger amount for Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island; certainly, the course of trade between the Provinces is directly the opposite of what we in the Maritime Provinces were led to expect as the result of Confederation. Ontario and Quebec have monopolised largely our trade, while we do very little more now in Ontario and Quebec than we did before Confederation. Our imports in New Brunswick from Canada in 1866 were $300,000, and our exports some $82,000; while now our imports from Ontario and Quebec into New Brunswick alone is between $4,000,000 and $5,000,000, and our exports are very little more than in 1866. I know one manufacturer in St. John, a supporter of the hon. the Finance Minister, who told me he considered the Tariff no good to him whatever, that he was no better in his business for it, in consequence of the large increase on raw materials and fuel. He is quite a large manufacturer of all kinds of iron goods, castings and so on. He said: in 1876 he employed thirty men; 1877 fifty-one men; 1878, forty-seven men;

1879, twenty-three men. In 1876 he paid for wages $10,000; 1877, $15,400; 1878, $14,300; 1879, $6,700. Also the carriage makers in St. John are complaining that they are employing but half the hands in 1879 they did in 1878, only working three-fourths time, and have large stocks on hand. We have also the harness makers complaining bitterly. The hon. the Minister of Finance will remember the remarks made by a Mr. Harris, when visiting his place, that he now employed about 60 men, when a few years ago he had 300. He will remember the complaints made by the manufacturers of boilers and locomotives, as to the large advance on iron, tubes, etc. The complaints of the nail manufacturers as to injury done them; and so on through the entire list, except the cotton factory. The hon. gentleman, last Session, reminded us of a glass factory in St. John that had started as soon as the National Policy was announced, and, strange to say, it has been shut down ever since. He also reminded us of a pottery in St. John that would be started afresh because of the National Policy; it has done nothing since. The Coldbrook Nail Works have been stopped ever since. The Coldbrook Rolling Mills have also been stopped; and of our saw mills, out of twenty one in St. John, last Session, only five or six were seen running. Our shipyards were nearly deserted. There were other industries which might be mentioned, but it is not necessary. I do not say this sad state of affairs is all due to the National Policy, but hon. gentlemen opposite have been asserting that great prosperity has been the result of the National Policy, and that at no time since Confederation has the country been so prosperous. This was said by the hon. the Minister of Finance at Sherbrooke, which is not true. I believe that these industries will come up again; that they will gather strength, more particularly in Ontario and Quebec; but the present policy of the Government will not be the cause, as it is not in the interest of the general manufacturers, much less of the general industrial classes of our country. Mr. Speaker, this protective policy of the Government is opposed to the interests of the Maritime Provinces, and, as it is now, will be more and more in future. It will draw from them their trade and commerce

to the West. We can have no better evidence of the effect of the Government policy than is set forth in the Toronto Mail, the Government organ, so late as December 24, 1879, as follows:—

“Montreal being the nearest great city in Canada, became after the Union the metropolis of a large section of the three Eastern Provinces, and even of Newfoundland. The eastern sections of Nova Scotia, the northern parts of New Brunswick, all dealt with Montreal in preference to Halifax or St. John. * * * Montreal became, consequently, very rich for a time. The railways continued to extend westward; western cities and towns began to dispute with Montreal the manufacturing monopoly she had apparently established. * * * Toronto and Hamilton, in particular, took up the business of supplying Ontario with manufactures, and it is in the west here that the great cities of the future must expand. Toronto holds the key of a great destiny. She may, and will, with proper energy and judicious aid, become the metropolis of a great region, ceasing only at the foot of the Rocky Mountains. It will be her own fault if the crown of commercial and trade supremacy is removed from her further westward still. All the forces of emigration, of agriculture, of railway building, of heavy public expenditure, are operating to develop the west. Toronto should be able to keep hold on the supply of the west. The tendency of the time has been for some years past, and accelerated by the National Policy, still is to bring the retail distributor, or even the consumer himself, into more direct relations with the producer. This seems to operate in two ways. It cuts off from many cities, such as Halifax, St. John, Quebec, and some western cities as well, a good deal of the trade formerly done with them, and it tends to destroy the usefulness of the specially mercantile classes—the middlemen. Two or three things seem to us to be inevitable in the future. The mercantile classes will have a hard time of it. * * * The larger cities, which by natural selection will survive, or which will grow gradually, will increase rapidly in population and wealth. The agricultural lands in the neighbourhood of the great cities will double or quadruple in value. The west will fill up with a population too adventurous and too excited to settle down at once to manufacturing industry. And thus, from Toronto westward, there will be an immense field for trade development, a great population calling out for clothing, boots and shoes, hardware, machinery for agricultural purposes, etc., and, in time, for the luxuries of household life. For some years, at least, the forces of the Government will be brought to bear on the development of the west, etc.”

That shows that the policy of the Government is to build up the west at the expense of the east. Mr. Speaker, I now come to the lumber interest, which is a very important interest in the Dominion, yet the Government have increased the taxes on this industry from 10½ percent. to 22 percent. The returns show that the value of the lumber exported from Canada during the twelve years from 1868 to 1879, was $261,614,178, while agricultural products were $202,404,000, and animals and their products, $150,975,000. This shows that the lumber interest, although it has had three or four years of great depression, yet, taking all the years since Confederation, has very largely overshadowed every other industry in our exports from the Dominion of Canada, reaching an export in 1873 of $28,586,816. To our people in the Province of New Brunswick this lumbering interest is by far the largest and most important, not only by giving employment to so large a portion of our population, but furnishing freights for our ships, as will be seen by the exports from that Province. Our total exports in 1868 was $4,125,000, of which $2,909,000 was lumber; in 1869, $4,815,000, of which $3,560,000 was lumber; in 1870, $4,363,000, of which $2,952,000 was lumber; in 1871, $4,541,000, of which $3,043,000 was lumber; in 1872, $4,740,000, of which $3,360,000 was lumber; in 1873, $5,650,000, of which $3,979,000 was lumber; in 1874, $6,142,000, of which $4,712,000 was lumber; in 1875, $6,050,000, of which $4,585,000 was lumber; in 1876, $5,950,000, of which $4,165,000 was lumber; in 1877, $5,574,000, of which $4,456,000 was lumber; in 1878, $6,268,000, of which $4,500,000 was lumber; in 1879, $5,372,000, of which $4,031,734 was lumber, and there is no doubt but the exports for 1880 will be very much larger in New Brunswick as well as over the Dominion. This statement shows the importance of that industry to New Brunswick; and notwithstanding the hon. the Minister of Finance had so often represented it as a waning industry, yet it has steadily increased in volume and importance ever since 1868. The hon. the Finance Minister alluded to the fact that, while the prices of lumber had advanced of late, hon. members on this side of the House did not increase the wages of their men. The taxes imposed by the present Tariff on this industry is a complete answer to such an assertion. While there is an advance in the price of lumber, the cost of getting it to market has in consequence also advanced; and while the labouring man does not at present get more than half the wages he did a few years ago, the cost of living to him has greatly increased by this National Policy. It is estimated, after careful enquiry, by persons who have spent a lifetime in the business, that the capital invested in the lumbering business in the Dominion is $100,000,000; that our average production for exports and consumption has, for a series of years, reached $30,000,000 annually. The same enquiry has shown that the cost of production has been 65 per cent. labour, namely, $19,500,000; farm produce 30 per cent. $9,000,000; the remaining 5 per cent. $1,500,000 for sundry other materials. The result shows that this large amount spent in this business for labour, will employ 83,900 able-bodied men all the year round, at an average wage of 75c. per day, which provides for 420,000 of our population of 4,000,000. In the Province of New Brunswick it gives employment to 17,000 men, and at the same wages provides for 85,000 of her population. Mr. Speaker, I mention these facts, to show the importance of this industry, to show the very large proportion of our population it supports, and that instead of taxing it by an increase of 11½ per cent., the Government should foster and encourage it in every possible way. It is a fact, Sir, that the increased tax on put on this industry now comes out of the labouring man, who is working for about half the wages formerly earned, and at the same time paying more for the clothing he wears and the food he consumes. Mr. Speaker, the shipping interest is similarly situated. I have heard it said by the hon. the Minister of Finance that the shipping interest has improved, and that the shipbuilding industry has improved under the National Policy. I do not, however, know of any place where this is the case, but the very reverse. In 1862, the Tariff upon materials used in the construction of ships was 52c. per ton; in 1865, 63c. per ton; in 1878, 80c. per ton; and in 1879, this tax on shipbuilding was increased from 80c. per ton to $1.95 and $2.00 per ton. The hon. the Minister of Finance, in the city of St. John, during the 1878 elections, spoke most distinctly against any Government taxing the shipping interest, and he condemned the late Finance Minister for, in 1874, putting a slight tax on some ship materials which increased the duty from 60c. to 80c. per ton. He, Sir, used that argument in every speech against the late Government during his canvas in the 1878 elections. I will read some remarks made by the hon. the Minister of Finance during that time. Referring to the shipbuilding industry, in his speech at the Mechanics' Institute, he said as follows:—

“Had I been in Parliament when these alterations in the Tariff were made, I would have taken exception to almost every change made by Mr. Cartwright. First, Mr. Cartwright proposed to place a duty on ships' materials of 2½ per cent., the railway impost. After the Union the duty on this class of goods was struck off. This was done because we thought that the shipping interest was one that required all the assistance which could be given to it. We all agreed that articles which entered into ships should be as free as possible. Mr. Cartwright proposed to change all that in 1874, but the shipping interest at that time was not in as good a condition to bear additional taxation as it was in 1867.”

Again in Carleton, St. John, he said :

“As to ship materials I said I would not have added a duty on them, for how is shipbuilding now? That industry is almost dead in the Maritime Provinces, etc.”

Now, the shipbuilding interest, in 1874, was in no more depressed condition than it was in 1879, when he imposed this additional taxation on shipbuilding material. We find that the hon. the Minister of Finance, during his visit to St. John, visited none of the shipbuilding yards, although he might have done so with advantage to himself. The drawback of 50c. a ton does not place the shipbuilder in as good a position as before the National Policy; nothing less than $1.15 a ton drawback will do that. There is another matter I would like to call the attention of the hon. the Minister of Finance to. It is an article published in the Monetary Times of February 27th, and speaks of Senator Fabre, thus :

“Senator Fabre, in a letter sent from Paris recently, complained that the Province of New Brunswick had, by sending inferior ships to Europe for sale, lowered the estimation in which our ships had been previously held there.”

This is a most slanderous and false assertion. That statement has not been contradicted. The hon. gentleman's expenses were paid—some $1,500—by Canada, for the purpose, it is said, of enabling him to negotiate some reasonable terms between France and Canada, for the entering of our ships there on the same terms as Great Britain; and we find, from this article, that apparently to let himself down easily, he condemns the ships of New Brunswick. I do not believe there are better ships in the world; some new ships are now classed fourteen years; and I think it due to New Brunswick shipbuilders to make this statement, and call the Government's attention to this article. The hon. the Finance Minister, speaking of the taxation on ship materials, gave the most distinct promises, that the drawback would be such as would place this industry in as good a position as it was before; indeed, he said, in a better position. His own words there uttered, which I will quote from Hansard, page 425, conclusively proves the statements I now make, as follows:—

“There would be a drawback on ship materials equal to the duty paid (except cordage)—10 per cent. All new vessels built, of any description, treated as exports.”

On page 722, I find him thus reported:

“The proposition is to protect the shipbuilders, and give them cheaper materials. We enable them to build cheaper than before,” etc., etc.

On page 738, he further says :

“The intention of the Government is, that everything that enters into shipbuilding, that has paid duty, will be refunded, whether the vessel went out of the country or not, except steamer machinery.”

And on page 1308, he states :

“Now, we come to a very important industry, on which you would suppose, from statements made, we were imposing increased taxation, instead of relieving it. Our drawback system must be a benefit to it,” etc.

These promises made by the hon. the Finance Minister in his Budget Speeches when introducing his Tariff a year ago, that the shipbuilding industry would certainly be placed in as good a position as before, has not been carried out. At a meeting of the shipping interest held a few days ago in St. John, strong resolutions were passed remonstrating against this unjust tax, and reminding the hon. the Finance Minister of his promises made last Session, also the promises he made to a deputation that waited on him at the Park Hotel in December last. The Order in Council granting a drawback of 50c. a ton contains only a few of the articles on which a drawback should be given, a list of some six items, as iron, iron bars, spikes, chains, paints and canvas, whereas there are some forty or fifty items on which shipbuilders are entitled to a return duty, and they will not be satisfied with the manner in which they are treated by the Government. There is over $10,000 now due parties in New Brunswick for duty paid on ship materials promised them by the hon. the Finance Minister, when he said they should be put in as good a position as before his Tariff passed, if not better. The sugar trade has been referred to a great many times, but I will give it a brief notice to show what the Tariff has done since it came into operation. We have been told that sugar has been sold as cheaply as under the old Tariff, and as it is in the United States market. The average price per pound of granulated sugar, comparing the year 1879 with the years 1878, 1877, and 1876, has been quoted by the hon. member for Cardwell as a proof of the fact, which is not fair. What we want to know is how have the prices been, since the new Tariff came in, under it, as compared with what it would have been under the Tariff of 1878; and if anyone has followed the New York rates in bond, also Montreal prices, once a week or once a month, since the new Tariff came in, they would soon see the difference between the prices of sugar under the old and new Tariff, and they will also find that the decrease in collections on the low-priced sugar, as compared with the higher grades, will be a loss to the revenue of at least $600,000 a year, and an increased taxation on the consumer of a cent a pound. I have kept a record of the sugar trade every week since the new Tariff came into operation; and for the eleven months, under the new Tariff, the prices have averaged 9½c. per pound, whereas, under the old Tariff, it could have been furnished at 8½c. per pound; and although the refineries in New York pay 80c., per 100lb., more duty on raw sugars, the prices of granulated in New York, for home consumption, has averaged 20c. per 100lb. less than the Canadian granulated is furnished to the Canadian consumers. The assertion made that the Tariff has benefited the sugar interest in St. John is untrue, as the six months' statement furnished this House will prove. It shows, that while the trade in Quebec and Nova Scotia has largely increased, in Ontario and New Brunswick it has largely decreased, as follows:—

	Imported for six months' ending December 31,
	1878.	1879.
Ontario.....	$32,617,040	$9,685,012
Quebec	19,820,932	46,048,911
Nova Scotia.....	5,817,637	14,239,716
New Brunswick....	3,945,552	2,228,719
Manitoba	378,603	16,979
Prince Edward Isl'd.	515,410	349,646

This shows that under the present arrangement Ontario and New Brunswick are suffering by the new Tariff on that industry, and the trade being diverted from them to Quebec and Nova Scotia. We have also been told that the prices of woollen and cotton goods have not been increased. Now, prices have increased, not only on account of rise in prices of the raw material, but owing to the increase in the Tariff, also other manufactures would like to know why such industries as cotton and wollen manufactories should be protected to the extent of letting machinery, raw material and dye stuffs free, in addition to from 17½ per cent. to 25 per cent on the manufactured article. The following figures will show the enormous taxation put upon those goods: for it is absurd to suppose that when the importers are obliged to pay these enormous additional duties, but what they have to charge it to the consumers. Some of these goods cannot be made in the Dominion, and those that can be made have been advanced in proportion to the additional taxation. I have taken a good deal of interest in ascertaining the increased taxation on such woollen and cotton goods as are very largely consumed by our people, and will mention an instance as an illustration of the increased taxation, etc. There was imported by one of our largest wholesale houses in St. John, a bale of woollen carpets, value $412; paid duty, under the National Policy, $157.10, or 38 per cent., whereas, under the former Tariff, 17½ per cent., it would have been $72.10. For those who could afford to buy tapestry, Brussels, Axminster, Kidderminster, etc., a duty of 20 per cent. is charged, discriminating in favour of the rich ware 20½ per cent. A case of cotton goods, value $171, paid 30 per cent. duty, or $51.30, while under the old Tariff, 17½ per cent., it would have been $29.92. A case of pilot cloth, for fishermen, value $494, paid 31½ per cent. duty, or $155.50, while under the former Tariff, 17½ per cent., it would have been $86.45. A case of president cloth, value $235, paid 40 per cent. duty, or $93.73, while under the former Tariff, 17½ per cent., it would have been $41.12; these goods are chiefly used for heavy overcoating, etc., for winter wear, and largely used. A bale of blankets, value $69, paid 44 per cent. duty, or $30.30, while under the old Tariff, 17½ per cent., it would have been $12.07. A case of brown duck, for men's overalls, valued at $403.61, paid 30½ per cent. duty, or $122.23, under the former Tariff, 17½ per cent., it would have been $70.52. A package of jeans, value $92.88, paid 37 per cent. duty, or $34.59, while under the former Tariff, 17½ per cent., it would be $16.27. A package of overcoating, for winter, value $427, paid 41½ per cent. duty, while under the old Tariff, 17½ per cent., it would be $74.72. A bale of blankets, value $223, paid 43 per cent. duty, or $95.75, while under the former Tariff, 17½ per cent., it would be $39.02. A bale of flannels, value $807, paid 30½ per cent. duty, or $244.27, while under the old 17½ per cent. Tariff, it would have been $141.22. A case of cloth tweeds, value $728, paid 32½ per cent. duty, or $234.63, while under the old Tariff, 17½ per cent., it would be $127.40. One case of Oxford shirting, value $409, paid a duty of 39 per cent., or $159.35, while under the old duty, 17½ per cent., it would be $71.57. Mr. Speaker, these are only a few of the hundreds of instances that go to show the enormous increased taxation under the National Policy on the staple dry goods that compose three-fourths of our consumption, and will also show the enormous duty charged on the consumption of the middle and labouring classes, nearly double what it is on the consumption of the wealthy, etc. When the hon. the Minister of Finance was in St. John last fall, he was informed by a friend of his of the amount of commercial depression, of suffering and distress that prevailed in the city, and was appealed to for help by his friend. The hon. gentleman replied: "Tell me what can I do to relieve you." The hon. the Minister of Finance promised that he would do all he could, and that he had a Government at his back who would carry it out, etc. I would advise the hon. the Minister of Finance, if he wishes to carry out that promise, to put the duties back to where they were before. Let him relieve the fishermen and ship-builders of taxes which bear heavily upon them; let him take the duty off breadstuffs and fuel, off dry goods and groceries; let him refund the $1.15 additional duty collected on ship materials since the National Policy came into force, as promised. These are some of the ways that his friend might have suggested, and if the hon. the Minister of Finance wished, he could have not only greatly relieved his constituents and his native Province, but the Dominion at large.

MR. GUNN: I rise to point out to the House the unpopularity of the coal tax in Ontario. It has pressed heavily on people of limited means and small incomes, and it has not benefitted Nova Scotia one iota. The trade of that Province must be done with nearer by-ports, for coal can be sent from the mines of Nova Scotia to Boston and Portland, and pay there a duty of 75c., besides freight, at a less cost than it can be shipped to Ontario. Protection appears to have been designed for the benefit of the few, and taxation for the many. There is a lead mine in my neighbourhood, which certainly deserves some Protection. It was carried on by English capital; and the company worked it four years, disbursing during that time $200,000; and they were granted a Protection of 10 per cent., and during the time it was in operation, the owners did not produce 10 per cent. of their gross outlay, and they were compelled to shut down the works, under the new Tariff, which increased their taxes, and gave them that insignificant and insufficient Protection of 10 per cent. Now, sugar is one of the articles that has been protected too much. I believe the figures given by my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Burpee) are as nearly accurate as they can be, and I find they agree with my own. The hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) gave 9c. as the price for granulated sugar last year. My own figures are 9½c., the average price from the time the refinery started last year, up to the end of that year, 1879, and the average price was 9½c., from the 1st April, 1879, to the 1st instant, one year. Under new Tariff, consumers, had to pay more for their supplies, and the Treasury received less duty; under prior Revenue Tariff, the Treasury would have received half a million dollars more revenue, and the people would have bought their sugar three-quarters of a million dollars lower than they did. During six months ending 31st December, 1878, and during six months ending 31st December, 1879, the former period under revenue Tariff, sixty-two million pounds paid a duty of $1,368,935; and during latter six months under our Tariff, sixty-four million pounds, paid only $1,125,034, a loss of $243,901, and but for twelve million pounds imported, over No. 14, by the trade, which paid $2.43 per cwt. duty—the revenue would have lost $100,000 more: in other words had all the sugar been imported by refiners, the revenue would have been reduced below $2,000,000 for the year. At the rate they paid, (refiners) take the entire quantity of raw sugar required in the Dominion at 120,000,000, it would have produced only $1,980,000 duty, and the new Tariff must drive all the trade into refiners hands. When the new refineries are opened in Halifax and Moncton, there will be more competition, but they may pool their earnings and keep up prices, as other rings have done before. Let us contract or compare, the duty paid by our refiners with the duty paid by American refiners during same time, and then compare the price at which each sold, duty paid; our refineries paid $1.65 per cwt., and the average price at which they sold granulated sugar for the year ending 31st March last, was $9.25 per cwt., and the American refineries paid $2.45 per cwt. duty, and sold during the same period, namely, from 1st of April, 1879, to 1st of April, 1880, at $9.00 per cwt., that is the latter paid 80c. per cwt. more duty on raw, and sold granulated 24c. per cwt. less, equal to, on 120,000,000 raw $960,000 more revenue on the quantity required by the Dominion; and the Americans sold lower on the outturn of refined, say 105,000,000 at 24c. equal to $252,0000, together a loss on our trade amounting to $1,212,000, and on the American trade equivalent to $18,180,000; apply our Tariff to the trade of England, and for this one item alone, the people of Great Britain would have an annual loss of $24,240,000. The difference given between the figures given by the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White), and mine, are ¼c., and ½c. on one year's consumption of refined, amounts to $131,250, but let us take his own figures, and thus estimate its cost to the country direct and indirect, with what we would have paid under the old Tariff; 105,000,000lb. at 9c., amounts to $9,450,000, and the average price in New York was 5.86, with 25 per cent and 1c., gives $246 duty; together 8.32., and amounting to $8,736,000; deduct this from the price paid under war tax, and you will find you have paid in excise of this Tariff, $714,000; and then count the loss of revenue on 105,000,000lb. refined, at 5.86, thus would have paid 2.46 duty per cwt. amounting to $2,583,000 against 120,000,000lbs. raw, at $1.65, $1,980,000, showing a loss of revenue amounting to $603,000, which add to increased price already stated, and together you have $1,318,000 loss to the country 1,317,000. If the hon. the Finance Minister looks into this matter, he must see that that is too much Protection. I asked him to investigate the matter last winter, but he never took any steps to do so, or at least he has not replied. I asked him why he did not take disinterested advice, and recommended him to get the best information from the United States and from Europe on the subject. This is an important and serious question, and there is plenty of information to be had which will tend to clear the mind of the hon. gentleman. From any standpoint under this Protective Tariff you may take, we see a large loss to the revenue and to the consuming taxpayers of this country, and the Government might very justly amend the Tariff without injuring the refiners. If sugar must be refined in this country, under the present Tariff, the Government might very well excise the refiners' excessive profits without hurting them. They, the Government, has seized the bulk of the banks' circulation, which did not belong to them. The Tariff is their own child. Let us get the profit ourselves on the refining of sugar as well as on the bank notes. I am sure they, the Government, will find sugar refining more profitable than grinding wheat at the Kingston Penitentiary. This reminds me of the remarks made by the hon. member for Montreal (Mr. Gault), about this prison, and I thought what a selfish, hard master Protection is; it wants all for itself. The hon. member would reduce the officers' salaries there. If he knew the long hours and arduous duty they have to perform there, he would not think of reducing their pay. They are not overpaid, and the prison is well managed—I think one of the best managed prisons in the world. With these remarks, I shall no longer detain the House.

MR. LONGLEY: I will not trouble the House with tiresome figures, as I think it has already had statistics to repletion, but will speak of the condition and circumstances of the country previous to the adoption of the National Policy. Everybody knows that, in respect to the Treasury, there had been alarming deficits extending over several years, and that the country had been brought into circumstances of great depression. This condition of things had been brought about, in the estimation of the people at large, through the obstinate adherence of the party in power to Free-trade notions, at the sacrifice of the industries of the country. Under some condition of things, this policy might have been well enough, but it proved ruinous when we had to compete with a powerful and remarkably enterprising neighbour right along our borders, wedded to a highly protective policy, and who had grown to greatness, in a very considerable degree, by the adoption of that policy many years ago. It was under such circumstances as these that the incoming Government was called upon to address itself to a readjustment of the Tariff, with the double purpose of improving our crippled finances and protecting our struggling industries. The hon. the Finance Minister, with his extensive knowledge of the affairs of the country, after the most painstaking calculation and enquiry, was able to submit to Parliament a fiscal policy which commanded itself to an overwhelming majority of the people's representatives, and thus was an entirely new departure taken.

We have had but a brief trial of this policy, but we have no reason to be dissatisfied with its fruits. A fair measure of success has been achieved in respect to the leading objects in view, namely, improvement of our industries and increase of revenue. It has been urged against the Tariff that it has not enabled us to free ourselves from the deficit legacy bequeathed to us by the late Government; but we can say in reply, that it is not so large by one-half as it would have been but for the adoption of the National Policy; and I may add, that in view of the very gratifying improvement in the receipts which has taken place since the first of January last, as compared with the corresponding period of last year, amounting, I believe, to about $600,000, we may cherish the hope that ere we assemble here again in 1881, the last remnant of deficits will have disappeared. I am of the opinion that, instead of overestimating the beneficial results of the Tariff during the year it has been in operation, as our opponents allege, we have underestimated them; and that substantially much greater good has been accomplished, both financially and industrially, than most of us have yet dreamed of. Lost ground, in whatever way brought about, is seldom regained in a day, or a month, or a year; but our retrogression having been stayed a year ago, we have since that time experienced a gentle propulsion forward, and soon we shall begin to acquire a fair momentum towards prosperity and national success. From the time the National Policy was first propounded, in 1871, or thereabouts, I have been in hearty sympathy with it, and regretted that circumstances so long delayed its adoption; but the set time came at last, and I am sure that, from that hour, thousands of hearts have expanded with the thought that our country was our own, in a sense that it was not before, and that room had been made and means supplied for national development. Commercial intercourse between nations and peoples should undoubtedly be encouraged upon fair terms, and where mutual advantages might reasonably be expected to follow, but not where the advantages greatly preponderate to one side. But while we have not been able to admire the liberality or friendliness of our neighbours, we could, and we hope have, profited by their example. We need go no further than the United States to witness the virtue of Protection to home industries, and if the system of Protection has been good for them, why will it not be good for us. Our circumstances are surely not greatly dissimilar from theirs, and they have flourished and so may we. Some laud the system of Free-trade and rejoice in a large volume of imports; but I can imagine nothing more derogatory to national success than the spirit of dependence, begotten under such a system as that which had obtained in this country for years past. I also believe that it is as necessary that we should seek to restore the equilibrium between the exports and imports of the country, as that we should square the account between expenditure and income. It seems to me that we can only accomplish these desired results by promoting in every possible way the various industries of the country, and thus largely supplying our own wants. Our country is rich in natural resources, and we have facilities in abundance for manufacturing purposes. I am not aware that our opponents have shown a single instance where the policy which we have adopted has operated injuriously. On the other hand, we have shown where factory after factory, enterprise after enterprise, have started up, and are flourishing, with more to follow. Attempts have been made to show that agriculturists, instead of being benefited, have been injured, because the products of the soil have been lowered instead of enhanced in value; but, as we were told at the same time that the lumbermen, the fisherman, the mechanic, in a word, all consumers had to pay more for supplies, we failed entirely to appreciate an argument so lame and contradictory. Ten, fifteen, and twenty per cent. were named as the advance upon supplies, since the advent of the National Policy. Well, if that were true, it would seem to indicate better times, and we offer no objection to the acceptance of it in that way. We wish to be obliging. The propositions which we have been considering cannot, however, both be correct, for it follows as an inevitable conclusion that, if our manufacturers of all kinds are stimulated, and hundreds and thousands are drawn to these centres of active industry, thus largely increasing the number of the non-producing classes, the tillers of the soil must reap the benefit of enhanced prices. And not only so, but a home market will be provided, and the costs and risks of transit to a distant market avoided. We were told a year ago that the adoption of a Protective policy would weaken the ties between the Mother Country and this Dominion, but we have seen no evidence as yet of such a calamity, nor have we the remotest expectation of the fulfilment of these gloomy predictions. On the contrary, we should experience no feeling of surprise at witnessing a very considerable modification of the fiscal policy of England herself, for she is scarcely holding her own in the world's competition, and with the tendency of the nations, in Europe as well as elsewhere, towards a system of Protection, the contest will become an unequal one, and her rigid notions of Free-trade will perforce undergo modifications. Twenty years ago England could sell her manufactured goods in the markets of the world, but that, we are sorry to say, is not the case to-day. During the last decade, the relative positions of England and other leading manufacturing nations have been greatly changed to her disadvantage, and if her position is now unpromising, an adherence to her present policy is likely to make it worse in ten years to come. Shut out from one-quarter or one-third of the markets, which she enjoyed in years gone by, by the sharpness of the competition waged with her by some of the highly-protected nations, who formerly purchased her goods in large supply, she will by-and-bye recognise the moral of the story, and feel herself compelled to deal less liberally with her neighbours and more justly with herself. Much as is won from the soil of England, by the adoption of the highest system of cultivation, she comes far short of feeding her own people; and we may say that there, to-day, we find the best markets for our own surplus products. The time will come, and is not so distant as many imagine, when Canada alone will be able largely to supply what England may lack in the way of bread. I hope I may be pardoned if I turn the attention of the House to a subject of some importance, which, if it does not now command the ear of Parliament, as it should, will, I am assured, at no distant day, be better received, and I hope be dealt with in a practical way. The Tariff has done something for us already, and bids fair to do much more; but our financial necessities are not likely to be met in this way alone. What we need now, to supplement the fiscal policy, auspiciously inaugurated, is the adoption of a fair, practical system of economic reform. I would not advocate sweeping and indiscriminate changes and reductions, as respects salaries and the number of officials, but doubtless scores of officials could be dispensed with altogether, and pretty general reductions effected, to the relief of the Treasury and the Civil Service, and the general administration of affairs remain substantially as efficient as they are now. One cares not to be too minute in one's enquiries into public abuses, but the vast number of doorkeepers, messengers, and employés of various kinds in and around the Parliament and Departmental Buildings, has long formed the subject of observation and comment. These public servants are doubtless faithful and true, and many of them capable, perchance, of filling better places, but they are at least one-third more in number than the Public Service demands. Then in respect to the expenditures of Parliament itself, in how many ways might the principle of economy be beneficially introduced. The reduction of the sum of $200 upon the indemnity of members of Parliament, and a like sum, or a larger sum, in respect of Senators, would in itself effect a large annual saving of about $56,600, to say nothing about the very considerable additional saving which could be effected by making corresponding reductions in the salaries of the officials of both Chambers. In view of the present strain upon our finances—a strain which is likely to be considerably increased in the near future—a vigorous effort should be made to effect a reduction of something like 20 per cent. all along the line and all down through the official ranks. I refrain from going further into particulars, owing to the delicacy of the subject, especially if pushed into what might be considered by some forbidden quarters; but I do not hesitate to affirm that, in general, officials are overpaid, and have very much better times than nine-tenths of the people, who are heavily taxed to pay them, and to provide the sinews of war for the thousand and one purposes of the Government. In the advocacy of propositions such as these, it is difficult to make oneself fully understood without descending to particulars, and still more difficult, perhaps, to guard oneself from misrepresentation, but one must take one's chances for that. I will, therefore, in dismissing this branch of my subject, simply repeat that I would not willingly or knowingly advocate any scheme or plan which would work injustice to any class or classes in the Commonwealth, and it is only because I think that more of equality would be secured under the plan proposed than under the existing state of things that I have been tempted to moot or advocate it at all. I believe our expenditures could in various ways be curtailed to the extent of $1,000,000 a year. During this debate a number of hon. members have represented the Lower Provinces as seriously infected with a spirit of discontent, largely growing out of Tariff exactions, but tinged with dissatisfaction with the fruits of Union. That there should be complaints made there as well as elsewhere, on the part of those who have always opposed the National Policy is quite natural, and the same may be said of those who have always opposed the Union; but that the number of either of these classes has recently been augmented is, I think, quite improbable. Our opponents are never tired of alleging that people are going in large numbers from the Maritime Provinces to the United States. Well, allowing this to be true in part, it is equally true that the people in those Provinces have been doing the same thing for the last thirty years, and during portions of that time in greater numbers than now, but most of them return at the end of each season, so that we do not permanently lose more than a small percentage of our people. There are even some advantages in this system, or practice, which nearly offset the evils attending it. New ideas and increased general information are thus imported back into the Provinces, temporarily and in limited degree deprived of their floating population, and in some instances temporary pecuniary profit is secured, although in general they return no better off than when they went away. Their taste for dress is usually visibly improved. In a few cases their views of things become decidedly liberalised; in the main, however, they return improved in a variety of ways. This exodus will, however, cease before long, and, as soon as proper facilities for getting into the North-West are furnished. Then, too, the popularity of the Government has been assailed, and a great reaction is said to have taken place to the prejudice of the Government, and in favour of the Opposition, since the 18th of September, 1878, but these must be pure delusions on the part of these who talk thus, for neither in Parliament nor outside of it, do we witness any evidences of the truth of what is thus affirmed. One of these hon. gentlemen after ably advocating a favourite resolution which he moved, was voted down a few nights ago by a majority of eighty, and this is not an unusual vote on party divisions. But let us see how matters stand in the constituencies. We have had two elections in the leading constituencies in Nova Scotia since the General Election in 1878, and, although in both instances there were circumstances of a local or incidental nature of a very exceptional character, the seats were handsomely won in the interest of the Government. The same favourable results have been achieved in other of the Provinces, where constituencies have been opened, and in that way has the Government not only held its own, but some seats have been wrested from the Opposition. I submit, then, whether these facts should not shut the mouths of all who have ventured to affirm that changes unfavourable to the Administration have taken place since 1878, either in or out of Parliament. But what can you say about the Ontario elections of 1879, exclaim our irrepressible opponents. Well, when headed off in all other quarters, our opponents fly to this their solitary refuge, and although we may feel a little amazed, I do not know as we should begrudge to them the crumbs of comfort which they derive from this source. Still, Ontario is but a barren waste to them, though they search it o'er and o'er, and in reality furnishes them with no higher cheer than Cape Breton or Halifax; for in the former place it was not the National Policy which was on its trial, but Premier Mowat's Government, and the people simply endorsed the Government; whereas, in respect to the elections in Nova Scotia, the changes were incessantly wrung against the National Policy. Ontario has had the best possible reason to be satisfied with the National Policy, and when again called upon to render her verdict upon that question, will probably give it, as emphatically as she did in 1878. The mistaken interference of the Dominion Cabinet in the contest furnishes just a shadow of foundation for the assumption referred to in this connection, and nothing more; and none know this better than those who put it forward so often. I have almost unbounded confidence in the ability and sagacity of the right hon. leader of the Administration; but I think he missed a figure there. He should have rested contented with his almost unexampled triumph of 1878, and been willing to allow his opponents to hold a piece of territory unopposed. I regret that the Government could not see its way clear to increase the duty on coal to 75c. per ton, as the small increase which would have raised the duty to that extent, would have been a source of relief both to a depressed industry and a depleted Treasury; still, in view of certain concessions, which may be hoped for in another direction, the Treasury may reap an equivalent in another form, and, if this is done, we shall have but little reason to complain. I also regret that, from necessity, the grants to various public objects of importance are greatly diminished, or cut off altogether; and this is all the more to be regretted from the fact that an impression extensively prevails in the Lower Provinces, that undue consideration is being extended to the middle and western parts of the Dominion. Another impression prevails, which is kindred to, and almost identical with, the one already referred to, namely: that the Maritime Provinces have, since the date of the Union, contributed more to the common fund than they have received from it; but all I will say about that is, that all who think thus had better post themselves, and not continue to cherish opinions which are known to be delusive. One of the most delicate questions to which the attention of the members from the Maritime Provinces has been invited, during the Session, has been connected with the subject of the Fishery Award ; and the position of the Nova Scotia members has been, perhaps, peculiarly embarrassing, derived from the circumstance that, in the event of a distribution of the Award taking place, in common fairness, Nova Scotia's proportion would be greatly in excess of that of any of the other Provinces. The motion for getting control of more than $2,000,000 was one not easily to be resisted, especially in view of the state of the Provincial Treasury ; but it was evident from the first, that there were constitutional objections to such a course, which could not well be overcome, not to mention considerations of other kinds, which rendered it a matter of doubtful policy for the Government to defer to the popular wish. If the money were distributed among the several claimants now, it is not improbable that in four years' time there would not be much to show for it ; and when the Terms of the Treaty had run out, with possible complications of a serious character surrounding us, growing out of the abrogation of the Treaty, we should find ourselves without the means of protecting and extending an interest of almost priceless value, not to the Provinces alone, but to the whole country. Our enterprising and somewhat aggressive neighbours across the border, have long looked with a covetous eye upon our fishing grounds, and although we flattered ourselves that, under the Washington Treaty, this bone of contention had been gotten rid of, we shall find at the end of four years more in our midst again. Among the many interesting and important questions demanding the attention of the Government and of Parliament, none can be regarded as so vast and absorbing as that involved in the project of opening up of the North-West. The subject presents itself to us in various aspects, but chiefly in respect to those which relate to matters of finance and colonisation. For a country with a population not greatly exceeding four millions to undertake the construction of public works, embracing a probable expenditure of from eighty to one hundred millions of dollars, would, at first thought, seem to be little short of sheer madness ; but careful reflection will present the matter to us in another light. The fact that there is in this vast region to be thus opened up for speedy settlement enough land of the best quality to pay for the work twice over, is in itself reassuring ; but the way in which the land will be enhanced in value, and the means thus furnished for speedy settlement form additional considerations not easily overestimated. And when we add to these the probable increase of population likely to take place during the progress of the work, we shall scarcely consider the prospect a gloomy one, but on the contrary one full of glowing possibilities. With double our present population, and greatly increased resources, we may reasonably hope to do well enough in the way of meeting our liabilities, great as they will inevitably become. After the Great North-West is opened up, and the iron horse shall take his way from the Atlantic to the Pacific, we shall not be so very far behind and beneath our neighbours, and shall then compete with them upon equal terms in some respects, at least. This vast project seems at first sight to involve the taxing of the east for the benefit of the west, but we may fairly hope that it will not be so ; but that the sale of the lands will fully meet the outlay. It would seem as though we were now committed to the scheme, and that the true policy is to push the work on as rapidly as our means will allow, trusting to the results to carry us triumphantly through. I will here turn aside, for a moment, to notice a gratuitous assertion made the other night by the hon. member from Antigonish (Mr. McIsaac). In few words the statement was this : "That Sir Charles Tupper had been the greatest enemy Nova Scotia ever had." I do not know that the statement is worth noticing, but the hon. member might be advised that he will not add much to his own fame by thus wantonly traducing the name of one of the cleverest public men the country has ever produced ; whose position at this hour a much more brilliant man than his accuser well might covet. I am sure I need not enumerate the services which he has rendered to his native Province, before being called to a wider sphere of action. In connection with the legislation and the public works of the country will be found abundant evidences of his zeal and ability in the Public Service. Whatever diversity of opinion may prevail in Nova Scotia in respect to the part he bore in promoting the Union of the Provinces, none have ever disputed his great industry and ability; and a vast majority of his fellow-countrymen have again and again emphatically endorsed his public conduct. True, he came to this Parliament alone in 1867, but before the end of the term the greater part of the members from Nova Scotia were acting in concert with him, and generally acknowledging him as their leader. Finally, with two-thirds of the Nova Scotia constituencies heartily supporting him to-day, having held his own constituency uninterruptedly for twenty-five years, neither his present comfort nor future prospects will be seriously affected by the missiles of any of his political enemies. Some might be uncharitable or critical enough to say that some of his enemies might have been easily converted into friends, but careless man that he was, he would not look after them. In respect to the prices of sugar—the refining business, now so satisfactorily established, and still to be greatly extended,—the tea trade, the cotton, woollen, and other manufactures, now prospering under the new Tariff, I will not occupy the time of the House by adding anything to what has been so well said about them all by the hon. the Minister of Finance, and the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White). I may be pardoned, however, if I advert to the part that the quality of the refined sugars now in use in Canada is much superior to what we got when we were dependent mainly upon the Americans for our supply, as has been clearly established by a number of samples tested by the Inland Revenue Department. Out of twenty-three samples analysed all were found to be pure. In conclusion, let me say that, while as a nation we may have great difficulties to surmount, we have great hope to cheer us on, and great expectations to fulfil. The energies and skill of our best statesmen will be, perchance, severely taxed, but a decade will not pass away before we shall witness such progress and development as will fill us all with glad surprise, and without distinction of party we shall all feel proud of our common country.

Mr. ROBERTSON (Shelburne): The hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat, has wandered over a variety of subjects, and told of the wonderful results that have been achieved under the National Policy in reference, I presume, to Nova Scotia. I thought, to-night, as I listened to the somewhat fulsome praise the hon. gentleman bestowed on the hon. member for Cumberland (Sir Charles Tupper), that he might have his eye upon a vacancy in another branch of this Legislature. If he has that in view, I am sure he will find, after the warm praise he has bestowed on the hon. member for Cumberland, that that hon. gentleman will be a supporter of his in any application he may make for that position. He has told us that the National Policy is popular, and that it has done a great deal for the Province of Nova Scotia. On the other hand I shall be able to show that it is not popular, and that in Nova Scotia its most uncompromising opponents are the men who voted for the Conservative candidate in 1878. The hon. gentleman tells us that the Dominion of Canada is somewhat similarly situated to the United States, being in possession of all the raw materials that enter into the manufacture of the goods required in this country. Take, for instance, the sugar refineries, the cotton mills and the woollen mills. We must go elsewhere for our raw sugar, for our cotton and our wools, while the people of the United States have all these within their own boundaries. A Protective Tariff has been more successful in the United States, because they have every variety of climate and soil, and virtual Free-trade with forty millions of people. The National Policy, as propounded in the resolution of the First Minister, prepared prior to the last General Election, was fully discussed in the Province of Nova Scotia; but no constituency was carried upon a Tariff such as we have now. We were assured, by telegrams from the hon. the First Minister, that no such thing as an increase of the Tariff was contemplated by the Conservative party on their return to power. One or two hon. gentlemen, representing Nova Scotia constituencies—the hon. member for Cumberland and one of the hon. members for Halifax—have stated that the Tariff is a benefit to Nova Scotia. The hon. member for Halifax said simply that old industries had been revived, and new ones had sprung up, under this Tariff; but the

hon. member for Cumberland goes further, he says: "that hundreds of thousands of persons have found employment in this country because of the introduction of the National Policy," and then he goes on to point to all the industries of the country as being in a much more flourishing condition than they were at the time of the introduction of the Tariff. Well, if this Tariff has found employment for thousands of people in the Dominion, it must be in some other place than Nova Scotia, for from the day hon. gentlemen came to the Treasury Benches, the people of Nova Scotia have been leaving it and finding homes elsewhere. Last year, over 1000 persons left by the Boston steamers for the United States from Halifax over the number returning to that Province by the same route, and over 500 more went from Yarmouth to the United States than returned; and every vessel, and every packet, that plies between the western ports of Nova Scotia and the United States, carried away large numbers of persons, searching for homes under the "Stars and Stripes." I find, from the Emigration Returns of the United States for last year, that over 4,000 persons from Nova Scotia settled in that country. In addition to that a large number of persons found their way to Manitoba and the Western States by rail. This year the number of persons leaving Nova Scotia is something enormous; something like 200 persons leave Halifax by every weekly steamer for the United States. This exodus is not only going on from the western, but from the middle and northern counties of the Province. The hon. member for Cumberland has also said that a variety of industries in Nova Scotia are prospering under this Tariff. I think I am in as good a position to speak of Nova Scotian interests as that hon. gentleman, being more intimate with the working of the Tariff and its effects upon those interests. In the first place, we are told that the shipping interest of the Province of Nova Scotia is in a more prosperous condition than it was a year ago. That statement is not correct. No better proof of this is required than to travel through the western counties of the Province, where a large amount of ship-building has been carried on, and observe the silent ship-yards from one end of the country to the other. If the hon. gentleman wants further proof, I will refer him to the returns brought down by the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, in which I find, according to those returns, that the registered tonnage at the close of 1879 was less than it was in the year 1878, the first time that such a thing has occurred since Confederation. I find also that the increased tonnage registered in 1878 amounted to 100,000 tons, while in 1879, the year in which the hon. gentleman tells us the shipping was prosperous, the amount of registered tonnage had fallen off 26,000 tons, and only amounted to about 74,000 tons registered in that year. The Nova Scotian who will rise in his place and tell us that the shipping interests of Nova Scotia in 1879 were more prosperous than in 1878, shows a lamentable ignorance of the subject. A large number of our vessels, in 1879, were obliged to lay up in American ports because of the low rate, and, in many instances, the entire absence of any freights, which, of course, was not the result of the National Policy. I have always said that, so far as the ship-owning interest is concerned, the legislation of hon. gentlemen could not benefit it, but could increase or diminish the cost of shipping by the amount of taxation placed upon it. Prior to the Election, the Tories asserted that the only thing necessary to bring about a restoration of our languishing industries was the readjustment of the Tariff and their return to power. Not one of the Conservative promises made at that time have been fulfilled, so far as Nova Scotia is concerned. The hon. the Minister of Finance might travel from one end of Nova Scotia to the other, and he would hear nothing but dissatisfaction with the Tariff expressed. If the hon. gentleman had visited that Province and placed himself under my care, I could have conducted him to country districts where he would have found that the most outspoken protest against this Tariff would have come from those that supported his election platform in 1878. It has been said that the coal industry has been largely benefitted by the Tariff. The hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Longley) said that as a result of the Tariff the electors of Cape Breton had expressed confidence in the present Administration; and my hon. friend behind me assured us that his opponent was also in favour of an increased duty on coal. Every one knows that the politics of the county of Cape Breton are decided by the coal trade. They do not care about the effect of the Tariff upon other industries. If the Mackenzie Administration were in power to-day, and proposed to put $1 a ton duty on coal, that county would support that Administration. From what those hon. gentlemen have said, it must have been a personal issue between the three candidates in that county. The hon. member for Cumberland has told us that the National Policy has largely benefitted the coal industry. By the Report of the Commissioner of Mines of Nova Scotia, I find that an increased quantity (50,000 tons) found its way to the Upper Provinces last year over that sent in 1878, and that the Tariff has kept 46,000 tons of coal from the United States market less than was sent to that county in 1878. Referring to the Trade and Navigation Returns, I find that, for the sake of diverting those 46,000 tons from a profitable channel of trade, the people of the country were called upon to pay over $400,000 into the Treasury as a tax upon coal. But to still further prove the injurious effects of this Tariff upon that industry, I shall use as an authority Mr. Lithgow, the Nova Scotia Phipps, and quote from a letter written by that gentleman, which was published in one of the Halifax papers last year. Speaking of the Tariff that gentleman said :

“Sir, when I think of how the National Policy proposed to foster our mining interests, of how Mr. Tilley proposed to impose such duties as would give to home industry the home market, and then think of what it and he have done for our coal mines. I will better not write my feelings lest the Philistines rejoice. My conviction is the Cape Breton collieries are much worse off under the new than under the old Tariff.”

There is one thing certain—the Tariff has not benefitted the fishing interest of Nova Scotia. On the contrary, it has done much to injure it, and to-day there is a vast amount of suffering in consequence of its disastrous operations. Last year, it is true, there was a large catch of fish, but the markets were in such a state that fair prices could not be obtained. Hon. gentlemen opposite, to add to the misfortunes of this class of our people, enforced the Order in Council, which affects the whole lobster-fishing industry, and has entailed much suffering in many sections of Nova Scotia. It has been stated that the West India trade has been largely improved by the readjusted duty on sugar. I contend that that trade would have been in no worse condition under the old Tariff than it is under the new. The Tariff has had the result of directing a very large quantity of raw sugar into Canada by Canadian ports. The gentlemen most interested in the trade, who are classed as strong Protectionists, are, however, carrying out the good Free-trade policy of buying sugars in the cheapest markets and shipping them in the cheapest way. Since the 1st October, 1879, the importers of Halifax have not sold above 300 hlds. to Montreal refiners. The sugar brought into that port now is sold to refiners in New York and Boston as heretofore. Since August 1st, 1879, there have been 316 clearances of vessels from Halifax and outports of Nova Scotia to the West India Islands. Ninety-five of those vessels were from outside of Halifax, and of all the sugar brought back only 300 hlds. found their way to the Redpath refinery. English, Norwegian and Swedish vessels, chartered by Redpath and Company, find their way up the St. Lawrence during the summer and to Halifax during the winter months, thus, depriving our own vessels of the trade we were promised under the National Policy. If the Government want to benefit Canadian shipowners, they should alter the Tariff to discriminate, not only in favour of Canadian ports, but extend that discrimination to sugar brought in Canadian bottoms. I pointed out the other night that it would be but right that machinery that cannot be manufactured in Canada should be allowed to come in under the same terms as machinery used in the manufacture of cottons and worsteds; and because I saw fit to do that, I was taunted by the hon. the Minister of Finance with being a convert to his particular views. I am not a convert, but I think if we are to have a Protective Tariff, the many should be protected and not the few. As Messrs. Redpath are making such large sums of money by reason of the Tariff, it is but fair that some portion of their profits should divert to Canadian shipowners. I challenge the hon. gentlemen opposite to point to any manufacturing industries that have sprung up since the inauguration of the Tariff. I challenge them to point to the fulfilment of any of the promises they made prior to the Election. Today, Nova Scotia is importing to the same extent as she did before, and the duty is largely increased. Take the imports in my own county, I find that for the six months ending September 30, 1878, the imports amounted to $113,738, upon which duty to the amount of $7,330.58 was paid; for a similar period, in 1879, the imports were only $63,083, while the duties amounted to $8,686.07. These last importations being under a Tariff which the Tories say is not increased, but simply readjusted. The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Richey), took occasion, the other night, to point out to what extent the National Policy had benefitted the city he represents. I can tell the hon. gentleman that, with very few exceptions, the business men of Halifax are dissatisfied with the policy. In proof of this, I will quote from the proceedings of the last meeting of the Chamber of Commerce, when the Tariff was under discussion. First, let me make an extract from the Annual Report of the Chamber of Commerce of Halifax, signed by John Doull, a strong Conservative, and one of the leading business men of that city:

“Your Committee regret to report that the Tariff, as arranged last year, does not appear to have given the general satisfaction anticipated, but trust that the General Government will so modify the Tariff as to remove further dissatisfaction.”

These hopes were expressed prior to the delivery of the Budget Speech, so it is fair to presume that the changes made by the hon. the Finance Minister were not such as to allay this dissatisfaction. Mr. Adam Burns, of the firm of Burns and Murray, another strong Conservative—and to satisfy hon. gentlemen opposite upon this point, I will refer to the opening portion of his speech, in which he said: “He did not criticise the Tariff in any spirit of hostility to the present Government, whom he looked upon as the persons, best suited to administer the affairs of this Dominion.” This hon. gentleman denounced “The Tariff, generally, as unnecessarily high, tending to impoverish the revenue, to stop healthy competition with outsiders, encourage smuggling, and offer a premium generally to dishonesty. He could say nothing in favour of the Tariff as it now was.” Mr. Wood, another merchant, said: “His business had been utterly ruined and in his ruin the poorer classes of the population suffered.” These are the views of two merchants on the subject, at a meeting composed of the supporters of both parties. The outspoken protest of those gentlemen is but a reflex of the protest coming from every man in the Province, Liberal or Conservative, when they speak what they believe and think in connection with this Tariff.

Mr. OGDEN: The hon. member for Shelburne has made a statement which I think it is my duty to correct. He stated that the Government had passed an Order in Council which seriously injured a very valuable industry in Nova Scotia—that is the lobster fishery—and that it had caused a great deal of suffering and starvation in the Province. I believe the Government were actuated by the best motives in passing that Order, and I believe that it has not caused any starvation or suffering. We read of suffering among the fishermen of Newfoundland where there is only a close season of one month. Certainly the Order in Council does not affect that Colony. In February, 1879, coming on the cars from Halifax to Ottawa to take my seat in this House, an hon. member came to me and very affectionately put his arm around my neck and said, he understood it was my intention to advocate a close season for the protection of lobsters; he also said that he had talked with men engaged in the business on both sides of politics in Halifax, who were all anxious that the close season should be over the whole coast from 1st August to 1st November or later, and requested me to go with him to the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries and get him to pass such an Order. I replied, that when we reached Ottawa I would consider the matter and talk to the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries about it; which I did. He said he would discuss the matter with the gentlemen from the Maritime Provinces who were interested. I told this hon. gentleman that the hon.

the Minister wished to meet some hon. members from the Maritime Provinces in regard to this subject. "Well," said he, "when you go to him I want you to take me with you. This is a matter in regard to which I am independent. I defeated a Cabinet Minister and can be perfectly independent in regard to a movement of that kind, and I want you to take me with you." The next thing that the hon. gentleman knew, was an Order in Council making this close season as desired, which appeared in the Canada Gazette. The hon. gentleman I refer to is the hon. member for Shelburne (Mr. Robertson), who has so many times spoken against the Order in Council, and which he wished to be so instrumental in framing. Had the hon. the Minister of Marine taken him into his confidence in the matter, there would have been no necessity for me to have come here to-night and let another pig out of the bag. The hon. gentleman was strongly in favour of this close season up to the time the Order in Council was passed, and for him to be charging the Government with injustice because he was not consulted, was in very bad taste.

MR. ROBERTSON (Shelburne): I am in favour of a close season. I can also say that during the present Session I have not asked for any more lengthy period for the fishermen than the present one of four months. The present regulations have seriously affected the lobster fishermen on the south coast of Nova Scotia. I have asked this year that the Government, in justice to the fishermen, and especially to those of my own county, instead of having the months of April, May, June and July fixed for this object, should make the period May and June and September and October. My reason is, that in the month of April it is utterly impossible to carry on lobster-fishing; and even if the fishermen wished, there is no bait. I have it from the best authorities, notwithstanding the statement of the hon. member for Guysborough, that the month of July is when the spawning of the fish begins. The result is that, under the present regulations, the fishermen have only the months of May and June. In connection with what the hon. gentleman (Mr. Ogden) has said about my first trip to Ottawa, and my views, I may say that I am favourable to a close season that would protect the Fishery. I told him at Halifax—and the man that owns him, Isaac H. Mathers—that I would favour a close season that would equally protect the interests of the fishermen, the packers, and the Fishery. I did my best to obtain information upon this question, for the simple reason that I would like to see a close season that would protect the fishermen in their business. I made no application to the hon. gentleman, and he never asked me to accompany him to the Department of Marine and Fisheries for consultation with the Minister upon this subject.

MR. OGDEN: No, but you asked me to take you with me.

MR. ROBERTSON: The hon. gentleman did not ask me, but if he had I would have gone with him to the hon. Minister, because this is an industry in which my constituents are largely interested. But as I said before, I am prepared to go before any section of the people interested in that industry and defend my course. I simply ask for justice for that class of our fishing population.

AN HON. MEMBER having raised a point of order,

MR. SPEAKER decided that the hon. gentleman had no right to resume the discussion again on the general question.

MR. ANGLIN moved the adjournment of the Debate.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I have no objection, if it be understood that we close the Debate to-morrow. The Session is advancing and we should make progress with the business.

MR. MACKENZIE: We are all desirous of ending the Debate as soon as possible, but two or three hon. gentlemen on this side have not had an opportunity of speaking, and if the adjournment be now agreed to we shall assist the hon. the First Minister in terminating the Debate to-morrow.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I have no objection to the proposal.

MR. KILLAM: I would like to know if the hon. the Minister of Finance is going to answer the question I put to him as to what rate of drawback he will allow on materials to be used in shipping in St. John.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: I will answer that question another time.

Motion agreed to and Debate adjourned.

House adjourned at Twenty-five minutes after Eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Friday, 9th April, 1889.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD in moving:

That for the rest of the Session, after to-day, Government business shall on Mondays have precedence over all other business after Routine Proceedings,

Said: The reason why I ask the House to select Monday is that on Wednesday we proceed with Public Bills and Orders, while on Monday there are simply Bills and Notices. I, therefore, ask the House to give us Monday, after to-day, for the rest of the Session.

MR. HAGGART: I would ask, as there is an important Private Bill, the Credit Valley Railway Bill, and all the parties interested are in town, that the Government might allow, if we do not get through with it in the first hour this evening, that it shall have precedence till we do, or give us time for it on Monday.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: With the unanimous consent of the House, Private Bills can come up on Monday, and those ready shall be taken.

MR. MACKENZIE: Is it proposed that the House should consent to an indefinite time to-night for this Bill? I understood that to-night we were to dispose of the Tariff question.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: We will go on with the Tariff, and give the hon. gentleman an opportunity to move a reference to this Bill, and also an opportunity on Monday.

MR. BLAKE: It would be convenient if we could run through the Notices of Motion. There are a number which must be unopposed and undebatable; there is a large arrear, and they could be disposed of in half an hour; but I understand this Credit Valley Railway Bill may take a considerable time.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I quite agree with the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), that we should go through the Notices of Motion. There has not been an opportunity of working them out—of cleaning the stable, I may say.

MR. BLAKE: I do not think the stable is on this side of the House.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Perhaps not; I am quite willing to admit that we are a stable Government on this side.

MR. MACKENZIE: There are about thirty Public Bills and Orders in the hands of private members. The only time at which they can be taken up now will be Wednesday afternoon, and it would be much better for the Government to say which Bill they are willing to consider, and give some reasonable accommodation to the hon. members in charge of them. There are a number of Bills that the Government do not favour, and it is time the Government should declare its mind about them.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I think that on Wednesday we can commence to slaughter these.

MR. MACKENZIE: And we will do the slaughtering on the other days.

Motion agreed to.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE TARIFF.

ADJOURNED DEBATE.

House resumed the adjourned debate on the proposed motion: "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go again into Committee of Ways and Means."—(Sir Samuel L. Tilley.)

MR. ANGLIN: Before commencing my remarks, I have to ask the hon. the Finance Minister to inform me what the gross revenue receipts for March would be. I presume he has that information by this time.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: I have not the information for March separately. I have it here for January, February and March altogether. The Customs receipts for these three months amount to $3,524,534, or $760,000 more than for the same period last year.

MR. ANGLIN: I ask for the gross revenue receipts from all sources.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: I have not that.

MR. ANGLIN: Mr. Speaker, the duty which hon. members on this side of the House have been called upon to discharge is not so pleasant and agreeable as hon. gentlemen on the other side appear to suppose. It would be much more pleasant, much more gratifying to us if we could agree with much of what has been said on the other side; if we could believe that the National Policy has produced the beneficial effects which they contend it has produced, we should only be too happy to join in their congratulations and expressions of thankfulness and delight. For although we have been repeatedly charged with being unpatriotic, I can hardly imagine that, on this side of the House, there is anyone capable of rejoicing in the miseries or misfortunes of any class of our people, or to delight in such misfortunes, because they afford a more speedy means of returning to power. Such charges have been made and insinuated; and yet I cannot imagine that those who indulged in those insinuations can be sincere, or can believe us capable of entertaining or conceiving ideas or wishes of so wicked a character. But other matter has found its way into the debate. Much personal and much that we conceived to be a gross misrepresentation of facts in regard to the state of the country. And not only that. Attacks have been made on hon. gentlemen on this side of the House who lately conducted the affairs of the country, and those who supported them; and we believe that in those attacks the conduct of the late Administration has been misrepresented, and facts grossly distorted. I must confess that I cannot charge the hon. the Minister of Finance with having done very much to provoke those personalities, but I do not think that in the half playful, half sarcastic remarks which the hon. member for Centre Huron made with respect to Sir Alexander T. Galt having much to do with the framing of the National Policy and controlling the financial policy of the Government, there was sufficient cause to excite the tempest of wrath which immediately followed. The hon. the Minister of Railways must, indeed, be held mainly responsible for having mingled personalities so largely with facts and arguments in this debate. I remember that the hon. the Minister of Finance, in his financial statement, complained that some one had sneered at his temperance principles, and some friend sitting near me at the time believed the hon. gentleman had made that charge against myself. If he did so, I will only say that I have never sneered at the temperance principles of anybody, at any time of my life, or under any circumstances. I respect and admire the man who, if he is a victim of the frightful weakness of intemperance, will put such control over his passions as to take a pledge of total abstinence and observe it. I admire still more a man who, not feeling any necessity of that kind, and merely for the purpose of setting a good example to others, abstains from that which he may use with moderation and without injury to himself. I have always been an opponent of prohibition. I believe that a prohibitory law is the greatest possible injury that could be inflicted on the temperance cause, and I have stated that conviction whenever I have found it necessary. But I have never sneered at temperance principles, and certainly not at the temperance principles of the hon. the Minister of Finance, of whom I am always willing and ready to say that I believe him to be a consistent total abstainer, and, so far as I know, a consistent advocate of a prohibitory law, if not a very earnest worker in the cause of prohibition. I think the hon. Minister complained that attacks were made upon the National Policy with a view to "hunting" him down. I think that was the expression used. If that was intended for me, I beg to assure the hon. gentleman that I never was actuated by so mean and unworthy a motive. I have looked at the question entirely on public grounds, and have sought only to do what I thought was for the public interest. The mere fact of the hon. gentleman's becoming so unexpectedly an advocate of the National Policy did not influence my opinion in regard to it in the slightest degree. In assuming, if he did so, that I was actuated by such motives, he paid entirely too great a compliment to himself. I do not think that any hon. member on this side of the House is actuated in his opposition to the policy by feelings of political ill-will, or personal malice towards any hon. gentleman on the other side. We look at this question independently of party considerations. We pride ourselves on the fact that we were willing, in the cause of principle, to make the enormous sacrifice that we did. Some of our friends taunted us with our folly in not having given way to public prejudice and public folly in this matter. Very many have said that if we had given way so far as to propose an additional $2\frac{1}{2}$ or 3 per cent. duty, for purposes of protection, the Liberal party might still have been in power, and might have continued in power for many years. Perhaps there were some amongst us who shared that opinion, but not one of us ever, either in public or in private, advocated such a course. We stood upon our principles; we took the consequences; and we are proud to stand here in the position we now hold as advocates of sound principles, and victims, if hon. gentleman opposite chose to say so, of adherence to principle. So much for the personal matters; as far as they relate to myself, I would ask the hon. gentleman and his friends, if they imagine that I am actuated by personal motives, to discard that idea at once. He and I have been repeatedly in opposition, frequently in conflict, but I have never yet permitted myself to entertain the slightest personal ill-feeling towards him; and the worst things I have ever said of him I have said in public and to his face. But the hon. the Minister of Railways, not satisfied with speaking of the National Policy and its results, chose to repeat his old assertions that the hon. member for Centre Huron was a King of Deficits—that he had rolled up deficits, while the previous Government had rolled up surpluses; and he again claimed that the Administration, in existence from 1867 to 1873, deserved credit for having, by some act of their own, by some policy of their own, rendered Canada the most prosperous country the world had ever seen. He spoke of the prosperity of the country during that period, as being absolutely unprecedented, and attributed it to the ability of himself and his colleagues. He claimed that they had secured to the people a great amount of content and happiness, and that the evidence of it all was to be found in the fact that they had rolled up a great surplus. I do not want to weary the House with many figures, for I think hon. members are wearied of figures by this time.

MR. PLUMB: Hear, hear; figures of speech.

MR. ANGLIN.

MR. ANGLIN: I am satisfied that the hon. gentleman who made that remark has, for once, expressed the feelings of the House. In quoting figures I will simply use round numbers, which I think will enable us to dispose of those extravagant claims of the hon. gentlemen to having made this a happy and contented country. It is well known that we began this Confederation, in 1867, at a time of considerable financial depression. Hon. gentlemen must remember that when we assembled here we found Mr. Rose, who had just assumed the portfolio of Finance, exceedingly embarrassed by the prospect before him. We found him determined, as much as possible, to cut down the expenditure. He repeatedly declared that it was of the utmost importance, in the first days of Confederation, that the expenditure should not exceed the income. The year before the passing of the British North America Act the public were assured that the expenditure would be $11,500,000, or something in that neighbourhood, and the Government were bound to cut down the expenditure as much as possible, in order to fulfil the promises which had been made. They were obliged also to adopt an economical course for the purpose of meeting what were supposed to be the expectations of the representatives of the Lower Provinces, whose endeavours to deal with small things were believed to be exceedingly economical. In the first year of Confederation we had a 15 per cent. Tariff, and a very large number of articles upon our Free List. We found in that year that our receipts from all sources were $13,687,000, and the expenditure was kept down to $13,486,000. The next year we found the expenditure increased to a little over $14,000,000 in round numbers. That did not exceed the revenue for the revenue had grown also, but not by reason of any increase of business or by any natural growth. It had grown because hon. gentlemen opposite, in the very first year of Confederation, had found it necessary to increase the taxation of the country. We had one Tariff passed in the winter of 1867, when we first met here. Then we adjourned, and when we met again, some months afterwards, it was found necessary to introduce another Tariff in which a total change was made in the mode of collecting the duties upon sugar. Even in those days the sugar question was a source of much trouble. Under the first Tariff, sugars were distinguished as brown, Muscovado, and so on; and in the second, the Dutch Standard for estimating quality was introduced. In addition to the duties imposed on sugar and molasses it was resolved that a duty should be borne also by the packages. These paid an ad valorem duty of 15 per cent. which, in the case of molasses, was a very considerable addition to the duties. I think the duties on sugar were very considerably increased, and as a consequence of this and other changes, we had a somewhat larger revenue. It was $14,570,000. It is worthy of notice that from that time hon. gentlemen were very diligent, year after year, in bringing their expenditure up to the revenue. That year they spent $14,346,000. Next year the revenue was $15,500,000, and their expenditure grew also. Still the revenue went on increasing, and the rate of taxation having been again increased, and became $19,000,000 the next year, while the expenditure increased to $17,500,000. They did not, however, yet reach the expenditure. So they continued in stern chase after their surpluses until they reached the famous year of 1873, when the expenditure suddenly jumped from $19,174,000 to $23,316,000. Where, in all this is the ground for the claim made by the hon. the Minister of Railways on behalf of his Government? Does he pretend to say that this increase of revenue was the result of anything done by the Government, except the imposition of additional taxation? In what was their policy shown to be a means promoting the welfare or the interests of the country? The tendency since Confederation has been in the direction of increased taxation. The first year after Confederation two Tariffs were brought down, and in 1870 another Tariff was submitted for the purpose of obtaining more revenue. In that year the demijohn and brandy bottle figured conspicuously in the Tariff, and were fully taxed. A duty of 5c. was also placed upon hops. Not satisfied with that, and still in want of money, they introduced a further provision that 5 per cent. must be placed upon all duties collected under all other rates of taxation. So a man paying $100 duty would have to pay an additional $5 to make up the revenue required by hon. gentlemen opposite; and other changes were made for the purpose of increasing the Revenue. Yet to hear the hon. member for Cumberland speak one would suppose that the Government of which he was then a supporter and afterwards a member, were continually reducing the taxation. Once they abolished the duty on tea because it had been abolished in the United States. It had become a matter of absolute necessity that it should be abolished, in order to prevent an extraordinary amount of smuggling. For that the hon. the Minister of Railways has never ceased up to this day to claim an extraordinary amount of credit, as if, forsooth, the Government he belonged to had thereby, without its being necessary, conferred an extraordinary boon on the people of this country. There is another way of looking at all that. In those days the population of the four old Provinces was nearly as large as it is to-day. We had only a 15 per cent. Tariff, but that was nearly as productive as the high Tariff of to-day; and with all those additions made from time to time, with the increase on packages, and the 5 per cent., it did yield a very large amount. What had the hon. gentleman opposite to do with the increase of business which caused that large increase of Revenue? Had they then as much to pay as their successors? Why is it that any credit is to be given or claimed for the fact that a Government having a large revenue and, at the time, a comparatively small uncontrollable expenditure, happened to have a surplus? The expenditure was increased, from 1868 to 1873-4, from $13,406,000 all the way to $23,316,000, an increase of about $10,000,000. For that increase they are responsible. For much of the increase they can fairly account, and the hon. the Finance Minister lately did so account for it. But you will probably remember that during the late Elections, and for two or three years before, the whole country was told, and very many people believed, that the late Government was responsible for this increased expenditure, from $19,000,000 in 1872-3, to $23,000,000 in 1873-4. Continually were the late Ministers denounced and condemned for their extraordinary extravagance, in having increased the expenditure $4,000,000 in one year. Nemesis does follow crime and overtake criminals. Last year it was gratifying to hon. members on this side of the House to find the hon. the Minister of Railways, when announcing his Railway policy, directly and openly, in some instances, impliedly in others, accept, approve, maintain and defend the policy of his predecessor precisely in those matters and things which he himself had for years most persistently, loudly and vehemently denounced. This year we find the hon. the Finance Minister compelled to play pretty much the same rôle—compelled, in vindicating his own conduct, to vindicate in the most conclusive and satisfactory way, to us at all events, the conduct of his predecessor, exonerating him from just those charges most loudly made, and for which he was most violently condemned—not by the present hon. Finance Minister himself—but by almost every one of the hon. gentlemen who sit around and behind him. Those hon. gentlemen repeatedly asserted that the Mackenzie Government was extravagant beyond all precedent, in having increased the expenditure by over $4,000,000 in that year. I remember hearing the hon. the Finance Minister, after he had become a candidate for St. John, in 1878, make a speech in which he referred to this matter. He partially did justice to his predecessor; he admitted certain increases were inevitable, but he did this in such a way as to leave on many the impression that his predecessor might have been, could have been, and should have been more economical. There were many things, according to him, in which the expenditure might have been reduced. But here we have it fairly admitted that for 1873, if the arguments adopted by the hon. the Finance Minister, in his last speech, are to be applied to the facts as they should be, that for the bulk of this increase no Government is to be held blameable, some parties are to be held accountable; and for the accountability it would give very little trouble to prove that to the hon. gentleman himself and his colleagues it properly belongs. His statement was that the late Government made this extraordinary increase, and was of such a character that their successors could not reduce it. The increases were nearly all statutory—liabilities fastened permanently on the Dominion; and no matter how much their successors determined to reduce them, they could not, unless they had chosen to break faith with the Provinces and with individuals, unless they could find a majority of the people to sustain them in that course. The increase arose, as the hon. the Finance Minister said, some months ago, from the augmentation of the Provincial Subsidies; the increase of Interest; the $150,000 given New Brunswick for the abolition of her Export Duty, and other expenditures—all, put together, making the total increase of over $4,000,000, which was caused by hon. gentlemen opposite and Parliament under their guidance, but for which, most unfairly and foully, hon. gentlemen on this side of the House were declared responsible. Where is the extraordinary merit of having, in the years preceding 1874, a surplus? The revenue grew rapidly, and the country became for a time comparatively prosperous. A variety of causes contributed to this result. Good crops did a part; the people of the United States had to come into this country, for some years after their war, to buy up all the surplus products of our people, including manufactures, to replenish their shops and barns, and these enormous purchases contributed materially towards our prosperity. I do not know, if the hon. the Finance Minister settled down seriously and calmly to the discussion of this question, that he would claim credit to the late Conservative Government for having prolonged the American war, and so inflated prices in Canada for a few years. I might mention other causes of the increase of revenue. There is no doubt about the fact mentioned by the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White), lately, that during those years, smuggling went on extensively; a considerable quantity of goods that paid the highest duties here, finding their way into the United States. That has ceased entirely. Greater than all other causes was the extraordinary fact that the values or prices of the bulk of the commodities imported rose rapidly to a very extraordinary degree; the people having to pay much more for a bale of cotton or a ton of metal. Even though they imported but the same quantity of goods, the prices were so much higher, that the revenue raised by an ad valorem duty necessarily became very much larger. Will the hon. the Minister of Railways presume to tell the House or country that to the policy of himself and associates, or to anything done or omitted by the Government, of which he was a member, was due that rise of prices, and, consequently, the fact that the revenue was swelled, and that they were able to lay by a little of it, notwithstanding their extraordinary efforts to make the expenditure overtake the revenue? Surely, even he would scarcely venture upon saying that, however, much he might insinuate it, because he never hesitates by implication, if not otherwise, to claim credit for himself and his associates for everything that has tended to put a single dollar into the pockets of the people of Canada, or to save them from expending a single cent. In regard to the deficits, that is a very important point that is seldom dwelt upon. It is a fact that the returns do not at all sustain the claims of the hon. member (Sir Charles Tupper), when he asserts that, during the Administration of himself and his associates in former years, the prosperity of Canada was so unbounded and unprecedented. How are we to judge of the prosperity of the country? Is it by its trade returns, and if so, is it by the amount of its imports or of its exports, or the amount of both combined? In this country we are told that we are not much of a manufacturing people. We have certainly hitherto not manufactured for exportation, except to a very small extent, and, therefore, it will scarcely be necessary, in a matter of this kind, to enquire how far our manufactures increased during these five years. I believe they did grow. I believe they have continued to grow for many years, and up to the present time; although there have been vicissitudes in this country as in other countries, and the people have had reason to complain of hard times occasionally, but take it all in all the manufactures of Canada grew under the 15 per cent. Tariff relatively as fast and even faster, I believe, than the manufactures of the United States. When we come to the manufactures of the United States the volume is much larger, and we sometimes forget to multiply everything Canadian by twelve, in order to have a fair comparison between the manufactures of our country and those of the United States. For millions there, we have hundreds of thousands here; nevertheless, except in such articles as cannot be profitably manufactured in small communities, we have outrivalled and surpassed the people of the United States in the growth of our manufactures. Putting manufactures out of view for a moment, let us look at the imports and exports. I find, in adding up the figures that, during the five years of the Mackenzie Administration, the exports from Canada from the four old Provinces exceeded the exports for the first five years of the Administration, of the hon gentlemen on the other side of the House by no less a sum than $33,000,000. Some years ago, when hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House talked of the United States, they alleged that the prosperity of that country was to be measured by the amount of its exports. Those exports were large, and although they carefully kept out of view that they consisted almost exclusively of agricultural production, and of animals and their products, yet they dwelt upon the amount of the exports as proof of the extraordinary prosperity of the United States. But the hon. the Finance Minister, in his opening speech on the Budget, was glad to announce to this House that, for the first time almost in the history of Canada, for many years at all events, the exports have been brought down within the limit of the imports. Now, if it is a proof of the beneficent policy of a Government, that its imports are reduced, let us see what the state of things is here. Here we have had a growth of population, which one would suppose ought necessarily to have led to a growth of imports: a growth of 10 per cent. or thereabouts. There is always a continuous growth of wealth in all new countries, which tends very much to affect the course of trade, notwithstanding seasons of severe depression. But if you compare the amount of imports entered for consumption for the first five years, during which the hon. gentlemen on the other side were in power, with the five years of the Mackenzie Administration, you will find that the imports of these years scarcely exceeded the imports of the other—having been, indeed, almost exactly the same. So that, if a decrease of imports is proof of a wise policy, we can claim credit for having wisely controlled the commerce of this country during that period. It is strange also to remark in these returns, that while the exports grew under the Administration of the hon. gentlemen opposite, from $57,000,000 to $87,000,000, or only about 22 per cent., the imports grew from $71,000,000 to $121,000,000 in the same period. The hon. member for Cumberland (Sir Charles Tupper), is in a dilemma upon this point, but he does not mind dilemmas much; he rattles over them. He has frequently asserted that the increase of revenue during the first five years is conclusive evidence of an increase in the prosperity of this country, but the figures show that the increased revenue was almost entirely due to the extraordinary increase of imports. It will be found that during three years, 1871, 1872, and 1873, the imports were enormously in excess of the exports, and that when he alleges we were exceedingly prosperous there was merely a show of prosperity, and we were in reality fast incurring the debts which, a year or two afterwards, added so enormously to the distress which prevailed throughout this Dominion. It may be well to direct attention also to the amount expended on public works, and the amount expended on controllable expenditure during these same years. During the first and second years of Confederation, Sir John Rose made most strenuous efforts to keep the expenditures down, and they did not grow rapidly for some time. The expenditures on public works of any kind were for a great part of those years a mere bagatelle compared to expenditures twice made. During all those years the expenditures on public works, up to 1873-4, were so inconsiderable that the amount of interest that had to be paid by the Dominion was not materially increased. The amount of interest paid on the Public Debt, during the five years the hon. member for Lambton was Premier of this Dominion, exceeds the total amount of interest paid, during the five years of the Administration of the hon. gentlemen opposite, by about $8,000,000. Where was that amount to be got? Could not, and should not, the Government, that had quite as large a Revenue for some years and had so much less to pay, have had a surplus to show at the end of their term? What could they have done with the money? They expended the money, it is true, on various works, but the fact that, under such circumstances, it accumulated in their hands, is not much to their credit. During the Administration of the hon. member for Lambton, over $25,000,000 were expended on Public Works, charge to Capital. Sometimes it is insinuated that a great deal of that expenditure might have been avoided; that, under the circumstances of the country, it was not only avoidable, but should have been avoided. But to a great deal of that expenditure the late Government found themselves committed. They found themselves committed to the task of carrying on the Pacific Railway as rapidly as the means of the country could afford, and also to the work of enlarging the canals which had been commenced under their predecessors. The hon. the Minister of Finance assumed that this item of growth of interest must be taken into account, but I never heard the hon. the Minister of Railways and Canals, that I can recollect, once admit that any credit should have been given to the Mackenzie Administration for this particular increase. What was called the controllable expenditure largely increased while hon. gentlemen opposite were in office, but it was largely reduced by their successors. When the Liberal Administration came into office in 1873, they had to be guided in their expenditure, to some extent, by the Estimates of their predecessors. They found that there was danger of a decrease in the Revenue; because the business of the country was decreasing. The hon. the Minister of Finance, who was then Minister of Finance also, in his Budget Speech of 1873, anticipated that in 1874 he would find it necessary to call for increased taxation. He hoped the receipts for 1873, under the Tariff as it then existed, would be sufficient to enable him to meet all the liabilities he had then incurred, but he did then plainly intimate to the House that in the year following he would find it necessary to propose an increase of taxation in order to meet this increase of expenditure. The Liberal party came into power, and they found that prediction likely to be fulfilled. The depression had then actually commenced ; it was manifest in the amount of exports rather than in the amount of imports, and they found it necessary, in the first instance, to economise as much as possible. They did so effectually economise in that year that they kept the expenditure largely within the income. In that year they had a surplus of $880,000. The hon. the Minister of Railways, in many of his speeches at that time, complained that they charged in that year to Revenue Account the expenditure upon Railways which should properly have been charged to Capital Account; and he said that this was done in order to make the case of himself and his colleagues appear as unfavourable as possible to the country—that it was done for a malicious purpose. We will agree with him for a moment. Besides that half million, the Liberal Government actually saved that year $880,000. It was obvious, however, that many obligations, permanently imposed on the Dominion by hon. gentlemen opposite, must accrue subsequently, and that economise as they may, the Liberal Government could not hope to keep the expenditure within the Revenue as it then stood. They found it necessary, therefore, to propose an increase of taxation. Prince Edward Island had come in, and a very large expenditure was necessary there. It was entirely out of the question that the Intercolonial Railway should be allowed to remain unfinished, and many millions were required to finish that, as well as to carry out other obligations imposed on the country by hon. gentlemen opposite. An increase of taxation became, therefore, absolutely necessary. It was assumed that the imports which had then declined considerably had reached almost their lowest point, and the calculations of the Government were based upon the amount of imports of that year. The imports continued to decline. The depression all over the world continued to grow deeper. The hon. the Minister of Railways, I know, has again and again chosen to speak of that time and those circumstances, as if the Government of this country could by some process or other have controlled, if not the business of the world, at all events the business of Canada ; as if by some process they could have secured to the people of Canada

higher prices for their agricultural produce, for their ships and for their lumber. It was, according to him, entirely the fault of the Government that business had declined, and that the Revenue had fallen off. The hon. the Finance Minister's calculations were scouted, laughed at, mocked and reviled, because he had not anticipated that the prices of goods would fall to a point they had never reached in the memory of man. The first year after the change of Government, in 1875, believing that they had a fair revenue secured, the hon. gentleman, not only did proceed to carry out several works, chargeable to Revenue, which were bequeathed to them by their predecessors and which required a large amount of money to complete, but they also, for the first time, did justice to several counties in the Maritime Provinces and other parts of the Dominion. They undertook, on behalf of the fishermen, a considerable amount of public works, which were completed. They did, in that year, bring in a large Estimate, and make a large expenditure, but they kept the expenditure within bounds, and it was nearly a million dollars less than the Revenue. If the depression had not continued, if it could have been removed by any Act of Parliament, if the prices of commodities imported had not continued to decline, if the means of the people had not necessarily declined, because of the fall of prices of our staple articles of export, then, indeed, the calculations of the hon. the Finance Minister, in all probability, would have been realised. Pains were taken, some time ago, to ascertain what the decline in the prices of goods imported into this Dominion during those years was, and it was found that in 1875-6 there was a decline of 10 per cent., in 1876-7, they declined 15 per cent., and in 1877-8, 20 per cent., and it is calculated that, applying these figures to the actual imports, increasing their value by that amount, and then applying the rate of taxation, it would be found that the Revenue would have been ample to have met all the purposes of Government, and there would have been no deficit. Any one who chooses to push this enquiry farther, will find, moreover, that notwithstanding the decline in the purchasing power of the people, they were, because of the decrease in the price of these articles, able to buy as much food and clothing, as much of the necessaries and luxuries of life as they were able to purchase in what are called better times. The measure of the prosperity of a country is to be found in the amount of comforts and luxuries the people are able to purchase. It will be found that, during these five years, the people of Canada were as comfortable and as happy, take them all in all, as they were during any period under the régime of hon. gentlemen opposite. True, there was great commercial distress, and a great many people suffered great anxiety, trouble and annoyance in consequence. Then the business of many declined in consequence of the shrinkage in values. But, taking the masses of the people, there was no want of food or clothing. To-day we find that prices have advanced, and notwithstanding that, our imports are not as large as they were a few years ago. To-day, looking at the account imports, we find that the people are in a worse condition than they were two, three or four years ago. Much has been said about the deficit created during the Administration of the late Government. I think I have shown that, if the Revenue was not equal to the expenditure it was not the fault of the Government unless, indeed, it be a fault that they did not deliberately increase the rate of taxation. They preferred to wait for better times. Nobody imagined that the commercial depression would exist as long as it did. Everybody expected that that depression would have ceased some three or four years ago. Hon. gentlemen opposite, however, assert that good harvests, high prices, and a revival of business should not have been expected until they were restored to power, and they make the blasphemous assertion that Providence is their ally, and works on their side. The hon. member for Cumberland asserted that our deficits amounted to $8,000,000. How that was made up I never yet thoroughly understood. I find by looking at the Public Accounts, that in 1874 there was a surplus and not a deficit; and that in the year 1875, notwithstanding the large expenditures, there was a surplus and not a deficit, and that there were deficits only in three years, 1876, 1877 and 1878. The hon. member for Lambton replied to the hon. member's assertion on this point, and I think admitted entirely too much. He admitted, although under protest, that the late Government were responsible for the deficit in the year just passed. When the late Government were charged with having increased the expenditure of 1873, it is true, they properly deemed their responsibility for what their predecessors had committed the country to; but for the Administration of that year, they were unquestionably responsible. They entered upon power some four months after the commencement of the financial year. They controlled the expenditure for eight months of that year, and they controlled it well and wisely, keeping it largely within the Estimates. Hon. gentlemen opposite controlled the expenditure of last year for a longer time. They entered into office in October; they controlled the expenditure of the country for about eight months and a-half, and they did not keep the expenditure within the Revenue, for we see that the expenditure exceeds the Revenue by $1,960,000. We find that their expenditure exceeded the Estimate by $880,000. There was, however, we are told, a mistake of $200,000 in the calculation of interest, but, deducting this amount, their expenditure actually exceeded the Estimates by some $560,000. Without taking into consideration the Revenue, for the Revenue might have fallen much short, and really did fall much short of what the late hon. Finance Minister calculated, I ask why did not the hon. gentleman keep the expenditure below the Estimates? What justification is there for that? They have exceeded the Estimates, and they seek to hold their predecessors responsible for that whole expenditure. I repudiate that responsibility. I say it is theirs, and not ours. If we take up the figures in the Public Accounts, beginning in the year 1873-4, we find that there was a surplus, instead of a deficit, of $880,775; in the following year there was a surplus of $905,000, making a total of $1,824,419. The deficits for the three following years, taking no account of Sinking Fund, amount altogether to $4,188,559. Subtracting, as we ought to do in all justice, the surpluses from the deficits, we find the total deficits amount to $2,364,540, and not $8,250,000, or thereabouts, as the hon. the Minister of Railways asserts.

If we take from that the $500,000 which the hon. gentleman asserts ought to have been charged to Capital Account in 1874, we have a total deficit for the whole five years of $1,864,540, or nearly $100,000 less than the deficit the men now in office have incurred in one year. And they talk to us of being responsible for deficits; they who have resorted to taxation such as Canada never knew before; they who are grinding the masses to the dust by the weight of taxation. But let us look a little further. How stands the account for the current year? The hon. the Minister of Finance last year, when he knew exactly how much had been paid into the Revenue, in anticipation of the increase of duties, calculated that $500,000 of what was paid as Customs duties ought fairly to be credited to the revenues of this current year, and that of the amount paid in excess as Excise duty, $300,000, ought also to be credited to this current year; that makes $800,000 altogether. He knew then, just as well as he knows now, how much had been paid in excess; but we now find him claiming that $1,300,000 of that amount ought to be taken out of the Revenue of last year and transferred to the credit of this year. By jumbling figures and transferring items he tries to make it appear that, instead of there being a deficit of nearly $2,000,000 this year, there is but a deficit of $500,000. But $500,000 added to $1,300,000, he admits, will make $1,800,000, and if we add to that $300,000, which ought to be charged to Revenue, but which are charged to Capital, for surveying the lands of the North-West, there will be, according to his own showing, a deficit of $2,000,000. I asked the hon. member, before I began, if he would be kind enough to give us an account of the amount he received from all sources of revenue for the month of March. This he was not prepared to give. As the whole receipts for eight months, to the 1st of March, from all sources, have been $14,000,000, then for the remaining four months it would require an additional receipt of $10,000,000 to make his Estimates harmonise with facts. I wonder if the hon. the Minister of Railways expects such an amount as that from all sources. I would like to believe, if I could, that such a sum will be received; it would indeed be some evidence of a returning prosperity; it would be one of the many evidences we require, and give us a degree of confidence, that next year we might see Income and Expenditure equalised. The hon. gentleman told us, last year, that if there was one thing above another, that the people of this country had firmly resolved upon, and which they had enjoined upon their representatives in this House, it was that there should, henceforth, be no deficits. Why then has he allowed a deficit this year? Why has he not imposed additional taxation, and so made Income harmonise with Expenditure? He denounced his predecessors for having calculated upon an improvement in business which would make the Revenue equal to expenditure, and his denunciations were loud and thunder-like against us for having dared to roll up deficits year after year. But in this, too, the hon. the Minister of Finance is following the example of his illustrious predecessor in calculating upon, and depending upon, a possible improvement in the business of the country. I am not prepared to say that he is doing wrong. But from his own position, applying his own rules and principles to his conduct, we must say that he is acting most unwarrantably and unjustifiably. The deficit this year, by his own showing, is $500,000, but it will be found to be in reality close upon $2,000,000. Now there is another feature of these Estimates worthy of remark. The hon. the Minister of Finance proceeds to add to the expenditure of last year some $1,500,000; he is not content with the expenditure which has already involved such a deficit. Some $200,000 of this additional expenditure, he says, is mere matter of book-keeping. Take out that $200,000, and we still have $1,300,000 additional expenditure, to meet which, I suppose, he expects that the increase of duties will be sufficient.

MR. ANGLIN: The Estimates look very like it, if I can read the figures.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: You will have to look at the figures again.

MR. ANGLIN: Oh, I see. The hon. member for Centre Huron points out to me that the original Estimates of this year do not exceed the original and Supplementary Estimates of last year by so large an amount, but there will be Supplementary Estimates this year also. We do not know how large they will be, it is true. But when they are brought down we shall have a fair idea of how this matter stands. Now, Sir, the new Tariff, the readjustment and the imposition of taxes, proposed by the hon. gentleman last year, and adopted by this House, has not realised the hon. gentleman's expectations in a pecuniary point of view. Not only is he found to acknowledge these great deficits, but his estimates of receipts were, in some respects, very much astray. Last year he estimated that the receipts from the coal duty would be some $200,000. However, he has received a large amount, nearly $300,000, in excess of what he estimated from that duty, which did not produce the effects on the coal trade that some expected. So with regard to breadstuffs, I think we have received $200,000 on breadstuffs of all kinds.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: A great deal of that is made up of Indian corn and meal.

MR. ANGLIN: At all events it is largely in excess of what he estimated; it is some $100,000 in excess of what he expected. Yet his receipts fall far below his estimate. We like to deal with facts, and to confine ourselves strictly within the limits of truth. Some would say that if you would vanquish a certain hon. gentleman you must fight him with his own weapons. I do not believe in that doctrine. I do not mean to act on any such principle. I prefer the simple ways of truth and justice and fair play, and, therefore, Sir, I must say that I do not blame the hon. the Finance Minister for having gone so far astray in his estimate. I know it is an exceedingly difficult thing in this country, when trade is changing all over the Dominion, to estimate the amount of imports and exports, or the amount of revenue to be derived from imports, and I am not disposed to say that he made a very serious mistake. The hon. member for St. John (Mr. Burpee) said last year that, if our imports in this current year were as large as the imports of the previous year, the additional duties would have added nearly $7,000,000 to the burdens of the people.

MR. ANGLIN.

The hon. the Finance Minister calculated that the increased duties would bring him $2,250,000 increase of Revenue. They have not yielded so much. They have, however, in reality added much more to the burdens of the people; they have largely increased the cost of the prime necessities of life, but the greater part of the taxation thus imposed has gone not into the Treasury, but into the pockets of speculators and monopolists. The Tariff has not been productive of the effects anticipated by the hon. the Finance Minister not of such effects as the country were led to expect from it. We admitted last year that much would be done for certain industries by the Tariff, that it would do much for the sugar refineries, for the manufacturers of cheap cottons, that it might do much for those engaged in the manufacture of coarser woollens; but we said that the numbers thus to be benefited, assuming the most sanguine expectations to be realised, would be small as compared with the enormous burden to be imposed on the people. We said, moreover, with regard to some industries, that there was very little room for anything to be done by means of a Protective Tariff, because they had already a monopoly of our markets, and for many others it would be impossible to do anything to render their business more remunerative; but we objected, that it was unjust, that for the benefit of a small portion of the people, all the other people were to be heavily burdened, hampered and oppressed. Well, what has it done for these industries? We have had some discussion on the sugar question. I cannot help remarking that, while the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White), insisted that the price of sugar has not been increased by the change in the Tariff, the hon. the Finance Minister did not so insist. The hon. member for Cardwell, it was evident, had carefully prepared the calculations respecting the prices of sugar in Canada and New York, which he submitted. He chose a period when prices were jumping, as it were, from point to point, and he selected a particular day, when the prices quoted in Montreal happened to be comparatively lower than the prices in New York; and he asked the House to conclude therefrom that the price of sugar is not dearer, but cheaper, because of the change of Tariff. The hon.

the Finance Minister went further than that last year. I remember with what exultation he announced to the House a decline in the price of sugar, which took place after the National Policy had gone into operation, and attributed that decline to the National Policy. The decline of prices in sugar was a decline in the markets of the whole world, and was entirely independent of anything we could do in Canada. The hon. member for Kingston, I remember, had circulars which he produced to that effect. Then came the astounding remark of the hon. the Minister of Railways: "That is a proof that our change of policy has influenced the markets of the world." And so far as I could judge, he spoke in solemn earnest. He said this with all the earnestness he can so well assume, and he was cheered to the echo by his friends and supporters. Many hon. gentlemen on the opposite side have assumed that the prices of the staple products of the civilised world can be affected by Canadian legislation, and that the prices have been affected, not only in our markets but in foreign markets, by the Tariff of last year. I do not know how many in this House believe anything so preposterous as that, but I am inclined to think there are not many in the country now who believe anything of the kind. The price of sugar is regulated by various causes, chiefly by the abundance or scarcity of supply, and before the time of this particular decline, sugar had frequently declined in price. The price about that time fluctuated. Sugar had frequently declined in price long before the National Policy had been thought of, and the first decline of last year was due to similar causes. But what we allege is that, whether the price in the markets of the world is high or low, the price to the people of Canada of refined sugar has been increased from $\frac{3}{4}$ c. to $1\frac{1}{4}$ c. a pound in all parts of the Dominion by the operation of the Tariff; and we assert that the additional money paid over the grocers' counters does not go into the Treasury, but into the pockets of the monopolists of Montreal. We assert, moreover, that not only do they receive in this way an extraordinary amount in addition to the reasonable profits of their business, but that they also receive a large additional amount because of the lower rates of duties now paid for coarse sugars bought for the refinery. These are our allegations. I think some hon. gentleman has kept a record, week by week, or day by day, of the prices in New York and Montreal, and the facts I have referred to can be demonstrated by any one prepared to look at the matter intelligently and accept the truth. But the hon. the Minister of Finance this year did not exactly take that ground. If he had consulted any leading grocer in his own city of St. John, he would have told the hon. gentleman that, no matter how the Government figured, sugars bought in this country are higher to-day than they would be under the old Tariff. But the hon. gentleman took another course. He brought in a sample of No. 14, Dutch standard, and said: "Here is a raw sugar, good enough for any gentleman's table, and if the people do not want to pay the tax on refined sugar, all they have to do is to use this and avoid paying the tax." Perhaps the use of that sugar may be more economical than the use of our refined sugars, but I do not think that any Finance Minister, accused of overburdening the people with taxation, has a right to say to the people: "If you do not like to pay the tax use this quality and avoid taxation."

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: Oh.

MR. ANGLIN: The hon. gentleman may laugh. He feels that, because he has a majority at his back, he can crush and grind the people at his pleasure. An old friend of the hon. Minister, a warm supporter of his at the last election, is owner of the Ashburton Mills, near St. John, at which he chiefly grinds corn into meal. He alleges that he was assured more than once by the hon. gentleman that, although a duty would be imposed on Indian meal, no duty would be imposed on Indian corn; and he was quite ready to go in for a little share of the plunder. Why not? He had as much right to a little share as the Redpaths to a big share. When this gentleman found a duty imposed on Indian corn, he became very indignant, and the story goes that he wrote several letters to the hon. Minister remonstrating and complaining, and finally he received an answer very much like that which was given to-day to the persons who complained about sugar. The hon. gentleman, so the rumour goes, replied: "If the people of New Brunswick would only use peameal or barleymeal they need not pay a duty on cornmeal."

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: I saw that stated in the newspapers of New Brunswick. There is not a word of truth in it. My answer to the gentleman was that he was in a better position than he was before, because there was a 12½ per cent. per barrel difference between corn and cornmeal. The simple truth the hon. gentleman says he adheres to is best.

MR. ANGLIN: I have stated this as a rumour, and I have given the hon. gentleman an opportunity of making a denial; but I ask him if he said anything in that letter about peameal or barleymeal.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: Not a word. It is another of the fabrications of the enemy. If you can produce the letter you can answer the question yourself.

MR. ANGLIN: I am not in the gentleman's confidence, but I know he was very angry. Whether he misunderstood the letter or not I am not prepared to state, but I believe he so understood it. However, it sounded like the other remark the hon. gentleman made with reference to sugar, which shows that he little appreciates the rights of the people who do not choose to use that sugar, but want refined sugar. The people have a right to demand that the hon. gentleman should consult their wishes and inclinations. He is not their master, if he could only understand his position; he is their servant, to carry out their behests, and not their master to make them buy coarse sugar if they want refined.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: I did not make that statement. I called the attention of the House to the fact that there was a sugar that paid half a cent. of duty less than it was under the old Tariff. Hon. gentlemen opposite said that it was not a refined sugar, and I replied: No, but it was one that could be used on any gentleman's table in the country. That, and the sugar below it, is cheaper for the poor man to-day than it was a year ago.

MR. ANGLIN: It so happens that scarcely a tenth of that sugar is used in this country by the poor man.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: Nearly

all the tables of the country had that sugar last year.

MR. ANGLIN: The fact is that that sugar is not bought by the people and they do not want to buy it; and it is an act of tyranny on the part of the hon. gentleman to attempt to force the people to take what they do not want. We are told that while the price of sugar is not increased by the change, a very large increase has taken place in the amount of the trade. To hear the hon. the Minister of Railways, who on some occasions runs wild upon this as upon other matters, talk about the extraordinary amount of employment given to shippers, steamboats, carters, etc., by the transhipment of sugar from place to place, one would really suppose that until the National Policy came into operation, a grain of sugar had never come into Canada. Why, we used just as much sugar before the National Policy went into operation as we do now, and that policy, instead of being calculated to increase the consumption, is, because of the additional price, calculated to reduce it. If it did not come into Montreal in such large quantities, it came to other ports. The hon. the Minister of Finance talked of the growth of the West India trade, and said that four new vessels, designed for that trade, were on the stocks at Carleton. St. John, that we were doing a large business, and it was on the increase. If the hon. gentleman would look at his own returns, brought down a few days ago, he would see that the importations of sugar to St. John have fallen off 40 per cent., and that our trade to the West Indies has not improved in the slightest degree. An hon. member recently pointed out that, although in the months of February and March, of former years, a large number of vessels cleared from St. John to the West Indies, but one vessel cleared from St. John to the West Indies this year, in those months, and there was not a single vessel bound from the West Indies to St. John. So far from the sugar trade of that city having been increased, it has been almost annihilated. We find that a larger number of vessels laden with sugar, arrived at Halifax, from the West Indies, than for some years past. I moved for a return, which might have been brought down in a few days, and might have been useful for this debate, but I was met with amendments, which so encumbered the motion, that I am afraid we will not get it down this Session. I wanted to ascertain how much of the 13,000,000lb. coming to the port of Halifax, was landed there, and went into the trade of the port, and how many sugar-carrying vessels came there simply as to a port of call. The newspapers have informed us of the fact, that a large quantity of the sugar which came to Halifax was sent in the same small vessels to Montreal. We heard the hon. the Minister of Railways, the other night, make one of his astounding assertions on that point. He said he had the assurance of the Harbour Master of Montreal that the increase of harbour dues on vessels laden with sugar and coal amounted, last season, to $40,000. The hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White), chose to inform us that the entire increase in harbour dues at Montreal was $40,000, and as this is the more reasonable statement, I feel bound to accept it. No doubt the increase from vessels laden with coal and sugar was considerable, but it was nothing like what the hon. Minister wished us to suppose. But what has the sugar Tariff done for the carrying trade of the country? The hon. member for Shelburne (Mr. Robertson), suggested that if the shipping trade of Canada were to derive any benefit, the Government should so arrange matters that the sugar and molasses should be brought here in Canadian bottoms, in order to be exempt from the duty as packages. Previously, a large portion of the West India trade was done through Canadian vessels; but now, Canadian shipowners are not even left to do the best they can in the contest for the trade of the world; they are considerably handicapped by the increased duties on ships' materials. I believe it is a fact, beyond question, that a considerable quantity of sugar was brought from the West Indies to Montreal last year in foreign bottoms. Looking at the sugar question in any way, I think you must come to the conclusion that the Tariff confers no real benefit on the ship owners; that it does nothing to add to the trade and commerce of the country, and that, under the pretence of affording employment to some 300 or 400 persons in Montreal, the people of the whole Dominion are taxed at least $1,000,000, probably $1,500,000, a year for the benefit of a few monopolists. It seems incredible that any Government, having time to reflect on the effects of such a policy, could persist in it. A more heartless, cruel, blind, unjustifiable monopoly never existed in any part of the country. Never did any Tudor or Stuart, in the worst times of the English monarchy, create a more cruel and unjustifiable monopoly. Never were individuals so empowered to plunge their hands into the pockets of the people, rich and poor, drag from them so much of the juice of the sweat and labour of the people, and transfer it to their own. We are told that we ought to look at the fact that those monopolists grow rich, build fine houses, and spend their money lavishly, and that the people are all the better for that. The people would like much better to have that money to spend themselves, to add to their comforts, conveniences and luxuries, than to be compelled to contribute millions to a few monopolists, to whom the Government, no doubt, look for help and assistance when their day of trial shall come. We were told, and we admitted, that the cotton interest would be greatly benefited by this Tariff; and I find from the returns brought down by the hon. the Finance Minister that the anticipations of both parties in this respect have been largely realised. The importation of all the cheaper kinds, grey coarse cotton jeans and denims, has greatly declined. This is not entirely due to the fact that the market is now supplied by our manufacturers, but largely to the impoverishment of the people, who have to buy less of cottons, as well as of other necessaries of life. I have no doubt our factories have supplied a very large part of the demand for those articles. We all know that, last year, or the year before, the Hudon Cotton Factory, of Montreal, declared a dividend of 27 per cent. Was not that sufficient to encourage the creation and growth of factories to supply the demands of this country? Must the people be taxed in order that the owners of those factories shall realise larger dividends than 27 per cent.? It may be said that some factories do not pay so much, and that some pay hardly anything. But why should a factory at Montreal pay 27 per cent., and another, 100 miles away, pay little or nothing? The only reason must be that one is well, and the other badly, managed. But is the House to be told that the country must be taxed to make up for the want of skill and ability on the part of the unsuccessful manufacturers, and to enable those who have made 27 per cent. dividends to increase them to 30, 40, or 50 per cent.? In all these factories how many hands have been employed? We have heard of the increase in the Hudon Factory, in the St. John Cotton Factory, and in some others; but nobody has yet condescended to tell us how many additional hands are employed in all the factories, or how much additional wages the operatives receive under the National Policy. Those cotton factories employ, at the most, a few hundred hands.

MR. GAULT: They employ 3,000, of whom 1,000 are additional hands, engaged within the last twelve months.

MR. ANGLIN: Exactly. I thought so. All the comparisons made by these hon. gentlemen lie within the last twelve months.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: Why not?

MR. ANGLIN: Because for six months before the last twelve the Conservative party was in power, and the country was withering under their Government—business being almost ruined.

MR. GAULT: There would not have been a factory in operation to-day but for the National Policy.

MR. ANGLIN: I believe the hon. gentleman (Mr. Gault) is a large shareholder in the Hudon Cotton Factory; but he was not content with the 27 per cent. dividend—he wanted more.

MR. MACKENZIE: How much does he get now?

MR. ANGLIN: The Montreal Sugar Refinery, which is not a new establishment, but an old one resuscitated, employs 300 hands, and the cotton factories 1,000 more hands, let us admit, and for that are all the people of the country, and particularly the poorer classes, who chiefly use the cheaper cottons—who hardly ever enjoy the luxury of linens—to be heavily taxed in order that those gentlemen, who divide large dividends among themselves, may be able to make them still larger?

MR. GAULT: I would like to inform the hon. gentleman that cotton is cheaper to-day than twelve months ago.

MR. ANGLIN: What is the duty on cottons? I have consulted many importers in the city in which I live, and they tell me that the duty ranges from 30 to 40 per cent. on the poorer kinds, which pay a higher duty than the better qualities. A very poor sort pays 60 per cent., and those inferior descriptions are still imported in very large quantities. If the owners of those mills could produce enough for the wants of the country, and supply the market at a reasonable price, not a single yard would be imported—nobody would import and pay high duties on cotton that could be bought more cheaply in Canada, and thus incur a loss. The fact that some millions of yards of cottons of this poorer class, not to speak of prints, are imported, is proof conclusive that the owners of those factories charge all they can for the cottons they produce. With regard to the manufacture of coarse woollens, we do not find that any additional number of operatives is employed. Nor have I heard of any new woollen mills, or of the enlargement of any of the old. I think there are very few more now than a year ago, and few more hands employed; and, therefore, the effect of the Tariff is not so much to increase production and employment in this branch, as to put additional profits into the pockets of those who own and manage those mills, by enabling them to charge higher prices. Can there be any doubt that higher prices are charged? Look at the mode in which woollens are dealt with under the Tariff. The light broad cloths come in at a comparatively low duty, while the heavy cloths, used chiefly by the working classes, labourers and mariners, are taxed from 40 to 60 per cent. I speak from the examination of actual invoices; and in one case, which may be an extraordinary one, I was assured that a quantity of heavy material, intended to make sacks for the poorest girls—stuff filled chiefly with shoddy, and bought at 1s. 8d. sterling in Great Britain—paid, in St. John, 80 per cent. duty.

MR. MACKENZIE: That is grinding the poor.

MR. ANGLIN: It is. The whole Tariff is framed to assist the rich and grind the poor; to help the monopolists to grow richer, and increase the burdens of the masses. This abominable Tariff imposes 30, 40 and 50 per cent. on those woollens, to which must be added the importer's profits on the amount he pays as duty. It is the capitalists and not the working classes who have benefitted by the duties on sugar, cottons and woollens. The coal trade was also to have benefitted from the 50c. per ton imposed, and Nova Scotia coal was to have found its way as far as Toronto and Hamilton. The fact that another 10c. is to be imposed on bituminous coal is a confession that the Tariff has failed to give the markets of this country to the coal owners of Nova Scotia; and coal has been dearer than it should have been. We may be told that it was cheaper last summer than ever before. I paid less for it in St. John, N.B., but the 50c. per ton was included in the price I paid, making the article that much dearer. The member for Cumberland insisted it would be cheaper under the present Tariff, because there would be a much larger output. But the people of the United States, for some reason, furnished our markets with their anthracite coal at a low price, notwithstanding the duty, and the Nova Scotia coal did not go beyond Montreal in any considerable quantity. Having heard of the vast quantity of Nova Scotia coal that went up the St. Lawrence, notwithstanding the failure in the Cape Breton output, I was astonished, on looking at the Trade Returns, to find that the total quantity of bituminous coal sent by the United States to the Province of Quebec, last year, was only 37,000 tons; and that, if any larger quantity of Nova Scotia coal was sold in that Province, it must have displaced English coal. The pretence that the port of Montreal may be supplied with cheaper shipping, on account of the carriage to it of larger quantities of that coal by Nova Scotia vessels, is, therefore, one of the delusions which hon. gentlemen opposite love to spread. The small vessels that carry coal from Nova Scotia up the St. Lawrence, are not, as a rule, of the class employed in the grain trade. But the vessels that come out from Great Britain often bring coal as ballast, very cheaply, at rates just sufficient to pay port charges, and they can take cargoes back at lower rates than would be otherwise possible; and so the commerce of Montreal, instead of being benefitted by the National Policy, has, in this direction, been greatly damaged. What about all the other industries of the country? How far have they been benefitted? How many will say they have derived any material advantage from that policy? The whole amount of our manufactures, exclusive of those to which I have referred, is not very considerable. The people were told, during the late political agitation, that our consumption of manufactures was so great that, if we could make all our own goods ourselves, large home industries and markets would be built up. New towns and villages were to spring up everywhere; new factories were to be reared on every stream, and our farmers were to have a great home market. Let us see how the Tariff affected farm produce. I have no doubt many believed, from having been so often told it, that, in the first place, it was very grievous that our farm products should be so heavily taxed in the United States, while there was no taxation on United States farm produce in Canada. But more than that, which was merely sentimental, they were led to believe that the imposition of duties would increase the price of flour and barley, and other agricultural products. A few evenings ago, an hon. gentleman, who professes to have a special regard for the farmers' interests, contended that the additional price obtainable for wheat was due to the National Policy, and not to the scarcity of wheat in Europe. He did not proceed to explain why the price of barley was lower; why the policy increased the price of wheat and diminished the price of barley? But I think the farmers of Ontario, who know that their surplus wheat all finds its way to the English, and their barley to the American, market, have learned by this time that the imposition of 15 cents per bushel upon American barley, that never came into the country, has not added to the price of barley in this country. If I am correctly informed, the price of the six million bushels of barley, sold by Ontario to the United States, was, on an average, 25 cents per bushel less this year than last year. The people in Great Britain and Europe have not yet learned to live upon barleymeal; and so the people of Ontario have to depend upon the American brewer for the sale of their barley. The hon. member from Annapolis (Mr. Longley), spoke to us last evening about the price of agricultural products as being higher now. He did not assert positively, that this is due to the National Policy, but he would like to know what else caused it. Last year he talked feelingly about the cheese raised in Annapolis, and said the people would like to get a higher price for their cheese. I would ask him if he ever knew the price of cheese to be so low as it was all last summer? I think the best cheese was quoted at 6½ cents in the Montreal market. Hon. gentlemen asserted last year, and the year before, that by an Act of Parliament, they could increase the price of cheese all over the world, and if they did not believe it themselves, unfortunately they caused a large number of the people of Canada to think so. Butter was never so low in the memory of man, in this country, as it was during the last year, in those months when the farmer had most to sell. Then, when the farmers had parted with nearly all they had to dispose of, and the people of England were able to use a little more butter, the price of butter rose, and thus we see that prices are regulated by the law of supply and demand, and not by legislative enactment. Now, let us talk a little about wool. The Annapolis valley is not remarkable for its production of wool, but Ontario produces a great deal. Wool was not meddled with last year, it was left just where it was, on the Free List, but that must have been because the hon. gentleman believed it was sufficiently protected. Some rather calumnious cities say it was left without Protection because there was nothing more to be gained from the farmers, and much was to be gained, perhaps, from the woollen manufacturers, and they wanted the price of wool kept down. Wool was neglected, and the price fell and continued to fall until a few months ago, when, owing again to the same laws of supply and demand, the price of wool suddenly rose. I heard hon. gentlemen on the other side deliberately assert that the price of wool had been enhanced by the operation of the National Policy, because the National Policy had created a great home demand, and this home demand had led to an advance in the price. The facts, however, that this home-grown wool is not used in the country at all, but is nearly all exported; but even if it had been used in the local market, and not exported, this would not have enhanced its price by 1c. per pound. Where and how have the farmers been benefitted? A kind Providence—not for the purpose of aiding the Tories in their struggle for the retention of power, but out of His beneficent regard for the welfare of the human family—blessed this country, last year, with an abundant harvest. Because of this abundant harvest, and of the failure of the harvest in Europe, we had not only a large quantity of wheat to sell, but we were able to get a high price for what we sold; but in everything for which we depended on the local market, the price declined. As compared with the price in former years, the amount lost by the farmers in Ontario, on the sale of their butter, cheese and wool, is something enormous. This is one of the reasons why we hear, to-day, complaints about the falling off in business in Ontario, which some attribute to the state of the roads. The true reason is that the farmers in Ontario have not received as much money this year for all their produce as people imagined they had received. But where was the promised home market? There is not a city or town in this country to-day, where the home market is as good as it was two years ago. In what city are there so many people to consume the products of the farm as there were two years ago? The home market has been as great a delusion as all the rest of the benefits that were promised by the hon. gentlemen on the other side. If prices have advanced in some articles it is solely because of a foreign demand. It is simply impossible that the farmers could have any considerable enlargement of the home market by reason of the increase in the manufactures of the country. It has been frequently demonstrated that if everything we import was manufactured in this country, the number of additional hands to be employed would not be as large as the population of an ordinary second class city. Hundreds, nay thousands, of our people have left this country, and the home market is consequently smaller to-day than it was many years ago. There has been a considerable increase in the exportation of live stock at, perhaps, remunerative prices. It is a business which should be encouraged as much as possible, but it is a business to the future increase of which the National Policy presents serious obstacles. In the Lower Provinces, too, we have entered into that business. I have made it my business to make some enquiries respecting that business, and I was surprised to find that a considerable number of cattle were obtained in the Lower Provinces for shipment. Let me tell you why. In former years the butchers of St. John found it exceedingly difficult to supply the market of that city with meat of a proper quality. They bought up, not only all the prime beef cattle they could find in that Province, but they went largely into Nova Scotia and bought up all the cattle the county of Cumberland had to spare, and all the cattle Annapolis and Cornwall had to spare. They also went into Prince Edward Island and bought all the cattle and sheep they could find, and, after all that, they frequently had to go into Ontario and buy cattle, and sometimes they were even forced to go into the United States for beef. So large was the consumption of beef in St. John, in our better days, that all the cattle we could find in the Lower Provinces were barely sufficient for our market. To-day the demand has fallen so much that some thousands of heads of cattle have been shipped this season from the Lower Provinces. I made particular enquiries amongst the butchers in our market, and found that there was a very considerable diminution in the amount of the sales of beef and mutton in that city.

CREDIT VALLEY RAILWAY COMPANY

(Mr. Haggart)

BILL RECOMMITTED.

Order for the House to go into Committee of the Whole on the said Bill, read.

MR. MACKENZIE: I desire to ask the hon. the Minister of Public Works, as Chairman of the Railway Committee, if he thinks it consistent with public practice that a Bill like this, which is a compromise Bill, agreed upon before a Sub-Committee, and afterwards brought before the General Railway Committee, and universally agreed to, should again be brought up to undergo complete and radical changes in Committee of the Whole. It is a thing I never saw done, and I think it an exceedingly objectionable practice. I ask my hon. friend to say whether, as Chairman of the Committee, he is disposed to support such a proceeding as that.

MR. HAGGART: There are no radical changes to be made in this Bill. The changes proposed are merely verbal.

MR. MACDONELL (North Lanark): I think, as said by the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie), that the changing of the Bill, after it has been reported to the House by the Committee on Railways, is a very bad practice. I believe the proper practice would be to discuss the Bill as reported, and without amendment.

MR. LANGEVIN: My attention was called to-day to these amendments to the Credit Valley Railway Bill, and I was asked how I felt in regard to them. My answer was, that the proper course would be to move the reference of the Bill back to the Railway Committee for reconsideration. With reference to the amendment, regarding the control of the Northern Railway Company, it will be remembered that the Committee insisted very strongly on these words: "Under the control of the Northern Railway Company;" for this reason: We heard evidence before that Committee—especially the evidence of a distinguished American engineer, who said that it was the general and universal practice of the United States, that wherever the trains of another company came through the yard of another company, from that moment those trains were necessarily under the control of the second company. That being the case, we, as a Committee, and it appeared the Committee were unanimous, thought that practice should be followed. I would, therefore, ask my hon. friend either not to insist on these amendments, or move that the Bill be recommitted for amendment.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH: I concur with everything said by the hon. the Minister of Public Works. It seems to me that the only way of amending the Bill is to relegate it back to the Committee.

MR. BOULTBEE: A point was taken in the Committee of so great importance that I should like for one, and I think other hon. members would also like, to have an expression of opinion from the Government on the subject. It seemed to myself, and other hon. members of the Committee, that it was rather dangerous legislation, on the application of a company chartered by the Provincial Parliament, to legislate against railways like the Grand Trunk, Great Western, and Northern Railways, under the jurisdiction of this Parliament, and in favour of one not under its jurisdiction, because the result would apparently be this: The Credit Valley road, or any road similarly constituted, could come to this House and ask for legislation, such as this, affecting other roads under our jurisdiction; and it would be found, perhaps, within the next twelve months, that every one of these roads would be coming to this House for some kind of legislation or to make some alteration of what we have done. Then it was thought, and I think myself, that the Credit Valley might say: "You cannot legislate affecting us, because we are not under your jurisdiction." If that be the case then it must be unfair that we should pass legislation affecting the interests of those roads under Dominion jurisdiction. This road refused, in Committee, to allow a clause to be inserted bringing it under the jurisdiction of this House. If they would consent to the insertion of that clause then we might pass this legislation.

MR. MACDOUGALL: The point raised by my hon. friend who has just taken his seat, was considered in the Committee, and, I think, decided against him; and I fancy it will not require very much argument to satisfy this House that it has authority to deal with the question involved in this Bill. I think the House can be speedily seized of the whole matter. If they will compare the Bill before us with the amendments proposed, they will see there is nothing in these amendments that need be referred back to the Railway Committee. It may be demonstrated, when we come to that stage, that the alterations are necessary, in order to make the Bill more clear, and to avoid difficulty hereafter. It will, perhaps, be well to explain to this House, briefly, the object of this Bill. This is a

Bill to enable a Railway extending from Toronto to St. Thomas, through the western part of Canada, to make its eastern terminus in the harbour of Toronto Bay. It is a local railway, chartered by the Local Legislature, heavily bonussed by Township, Town, and County Councils. It was inaugurated for the purpose of supplying an additional, and, as regards existing railways, an independent means of access by rail from the west. At St. Thomas it will unite with the Canada Southern. The people of Toronto, as a great commercial centre, are interested in this road, and they have given $350,000 towards its construction, upon the express condition that it shall be an independent line. The people of Toronto were anxious to secure another line of railway, because the existing lines have established rates at such a point as to cause great disadvantage to the trade of Toronto. Now, as we approach the waters of the bay at Toronto, what do we find? We find the Northern Railway, in conjunction with the Grand Trunk, in possession of a piece of public land, part of the Ordnance Land of the Dominion, which blocks the way. They hold possession of this land without having paid anything for it. The Ordnance Officers who had charge of the Ordnance Lands at that time, protested against it, and they continued to protest until these lands, by an Act of the Imperial Parliament, came under the jurisdiction of the Canadian Government. They have remained in possession down to this time. Although they laid off a strip 100 feet wide, which is ample to provide for seven tracks, the moment they found the Credit Valley was about to apply to the Dominion Government for a license to occupy a small portion of this strip of public lands, they proceeded, by process of the Court of Chancery, to prevent them. They also appeared before the Railway Committee of the Privy Council, for two days, with their lawyers and engineers, and argued at great length, and with great vigour, to persuade the Committee that no such permission should be given. But a license from the Crown was given to the Credit Valley Company; and upon that Company attempting to act upon their license, the Northern and Grand Trunk interfered again, and invoked the aid of the Court of Chancery. The Court, taking into consideration the long occupancy of the other lines, and the apparent acquiescence of the Government, decided that the Credit Valley had no right to run over the land in question; as far as I understand the rules and doctrines of the Court of Chancery, they did perfectly right. No remedy was left but to come to this Parliament and ask its interference, for the purpose of cutting the Gordian knot, which prevented this Railway from getting access into the city. Practically, it was a physical impossibility to carry this line into the city of Toronto, without passing through a portion of the property so taken up by these railways. It was contended, on behalf of the Credit Valley Railway, that it would be proper to apply to Parliament, to exercise its jurisdiction and assist this important railway enterprise to reach the waters of the bay, and facilitate the commerce of the country. The Railway Committee has, by reporting this Bill, recognised that right and the power of Parliament to do what I have stated. The Committee has interfered, to the slightest extent that it was possible to interfere, with the lines and property of existing companies, to secure the object desired. But we find the Northern Railway managers have taken this Bill out of the hands of the Committee as well as the petitioners. This is not the Bill referred to the Committee. It is a Bill prepared by the Northern Railway manager and his legal advisers. I am surprised to find so much sympathy for the Northern Railway expressed by the hon. leader of the Opposition. I am sure his personal friends and fellow-citizens of Toronto will not sympathise much with the position he takes in this matter. This Bill is prepared by the Northern Railway Company, with all sorts of restrictions and limitations, by which they will obtain control of the Credit Valley Company's traffic. While we compel the Northern Railway to give the Credit Valley the use of a few rods of its track within the city of Toronto, for which the Credit Valley is to pay adequate compensation, we are made to say that this shall be for a particular kind of traffic only—legitimate traffic. I ask, what is legitimate traffic? I deny that there is any illegitimate traffic. Everything you can put in a railway car, if destined for Toronto or Montreal, ought to be allowed to pass freely over the line. They have no right, on the grounds of public policy, to restrain or interfere with any traffic whatever which, coming from the east or the west, may pass over this Railway. I appeal to the members of this House, and to the members of the Committee, to come to the aid of this struggle for freedom, because this Credit Valley Railway will be a link in the chain between the cities of the east and the Railway system of the Great West. When the link between Ottawa and Toronto is completed, you will have an independent pair of rails from Halifax to the Detroit River, putting an end to the control of railway traffic at Toronto by the Northern and Grand Trunk. This line, with the Credit Valley and its connections, will give us another Grand Trunk from east to west of the old Provinces of the Dominion, and yet we are asked to give the Northern Railway the power to choke this traffic at Toronto by putting a rope round the neck of the Credit Valley at that point. Amendments must be made in this Bill. Some of its provisions are perfectly absurd. The Railway Committee, with all its wisdom, have allowed a provision by which the Company, not the property of the Company, but the Company may be leased or sold. If the Bill passes as it has been reported, I fear the Company will be sold. I trust the House will go into Committee on the Bill and hear the arguments in favour of amendments.

MR. MACKENZIE: The hon. member for Halton (Mr. Macdougall) has shown a great deal of interest in this Bill, and has thought proper to lecture me for the course I pursued with reference to the Bill. I never was the paid counsel of either company, and I was never in the position of being paid for services rendered to either, but merely had to enforce the claims of the nation against the Company.

MR. MACDOUGALL: Since the hon. gentleman has chosen to make a reflection it may be that he thinks he has done some injustice for which he wishes to make amends.

MR. MACKENZIE: I did not do anything unjust; but whenever I do, I will be the first to acknowledge it. This Bill was prepared by the sub-Committee. I have as much confidence in the hon. members of that Committee as I have in the hon. member for Halton. I had no time to look at the effect that the amendments proposed would have on the Bill. The Committee represents, practically, more than the half of the House, and the Chairman of the Committee refused changes made by interested parties in this case. I do not know whether the Northern Railway are prepared to assent to these changes. It has come before us as a Compromise Bill agreed to by both companies before a sub-Committee; and we cannot at the instance of one of the parties, properly undertake to interfere again, after having adjudicated between the parties in a judicial sense. The hon. gentleman is eloquent; but he wastes his eloquence; no one denies that the Railway should be allowed to come into the city. There are cases where the control in a similar sense has been given to what I may call the superior company. When the Canada Southern wanted to obtain access to the bridge at Niagara the Great Western resisted that claim, and the matter came before the Committee if the Privy Council; an order was made that access should be given to the bridge, but that did not take the control out of the hands of the Great Western Company. In order to preserve order in a railway yard, and for the avoidance of accidents, one company or other must have the control of the track in that particular place. How can it be shown that the Credit Valley Company is the one to control the track though obligated to the other Company, and the other Company being the proprietor of the line? I have not had time to consider those amendments, and some of them, no doubt, require to be considered by legal gentlemen, to know the precise weight of the language used. That cannot be done here. Sometimes, as the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Macdougall) has pointed out in this case, grammatical inaccuracies will creep into the construction of Bills. We had an amusing instance of this the other night. When the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue brought forward his Bill, there was one clause which we discovered was not grammatically constructed: it provided that every license should be open at all times to the public, and that the Revenue Officer should be allowed to enter occasionally to see if everything was right inside. Of course it was never intended that the party himself, who took out a license, should be open at all hours; and if, in the present instance of the Credit Valley Railway Bill, the word "Company" should be left out, a matter of that sort may be corrected; but to endeavour to effect a radical change in the Bill, at the instance of one of the parties to a compromise, is a most extraordinary proceeding.

MR. MACDOUGALL: I will promise to make no radical change.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH: The Credit Valley Railway Company applied to this Parliament, by a petition, for power to run into Toronto. On being referred to a Committee, all parties seemed to acknowledge that they should have the right to enter into Toronto. A distinguished engineer from the United States showed distinctly that running powers should be given, not only over the Northern, but over the Grand Trunk Railway. The Committee then felt that the Northern Railway Company should be dealt with; they felt it wrong to force a line over the Grand Trunk. The matter was referred to a sub-Committee; we heard evidence, and it was understood that all parties had come to an arrangement, this Bill being the result of the compromise. The Bill gives power to the Credit Valley Railway of running over the tracks of another railway entering Toronto. The engineer referred to said it would be absolutely necessary that, for the protection of life and property, this portion of the track should be under the control of the Northern Railway Company.

MR. MACDOUGALL: No one proposes to alter that.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH: It is not proposed to alter that. What then?

MR. MACDOUGALL: It is to be run under the regulations of the Northern Railway Company.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH: The promoters of this Bill seek, by Act of Parliament, to compel the Northern Railway to submit to such terms as the Credit Valley Railway Company, in connection with other railways to be built, may impose in reference to the traffic to be sent over the Northern line. The Northern Railway Company should have some voice. However, the Credit Valley Company finally consented, with the Northern Company, to certain terms on that point. It was discussed before the sub-Committee, and I understood that the Credit Valley Company had abandoned that point, and the Bill was agreed to by the parties.

MR. MACDOUGALL: No, no.

SIR RICHARD. J. CARTWRIGHT: I think if they did not agree, they ought to have agreed. I am satisfied this House would not give them the powers they ask for. It is proposed to make a change in the second clause of the Bill. I am not prepared to say how material that proposed change is. This is a matter that requires to be looked into, as a matter of evidence before the Committee. I do not wish the House to adopt the changes, because they have not been considered properly. I do not see how anything of the sort can be done without a reference back to the Committee.

MR. CASEY: I think the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie) is inclined to push the rules of practice of Parliament to an extreme extent. The question is, whether the Bill should be modified in any considerable degree as it has come from the Committee of Railways. It would be extreme to hold that it should not. In fact, I believe that the average attendance in the Committee of the Whole House is not larger than the attendance at the Committee of Railways when so interesting a Bill as this comes up. Therefore, in point of numbers we are quite as competent to discuss the matter here as before the Committee. It is true that a Bill was sent to a sub-Committee, but this Bill is considerably modified from that one. The question is, whether the proposed amendments are such as should properly be considered in Committee of the Whole, or whether they require the Bill to be re-committed. I do not think we could properly discuss that in regard to the junction of the railways here, but I do not think there is any difficulty in the way of our discussing the other points. The question is, whether we should accept the dictum of the Committee. Looking at all the points involved, I do not think there is any valid reason why we should not go into Committee on the Bill.

MR. OLIVER: I think the Chairman of the Railway Committee has stated that the proposed amendments must be considered in the Railway Committee. It would be better for the promoters of the Bill to have it referred to the Committee forthwith, so that it may be considered as soon as possible. I, therefore move in amendment, that this Bill, No. 53, and the amendments proposed thereto, be referred to the Railway Committee, forthwith.

MR. LANGEVIN: Notice has been given of the amendments, but they have not yet been read before the House. If the hon. member for South Lanark (Mr. Haggart), would add to his motion, that the Committee of the Whole be instructed to consider those amendments, I would then move to discharge the order, and re-commit the Bill to the Railway Committee, with instructions to consider the amendments submitted to the House. The Committee has given a great deal of time to the consideration of this measure. We thought it was a Compromise Bill, but there appears to be now some difficulty about it. The Bill can be re-committed, and the Committee will report it back as soon as possible.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH: It appears to me, it would be better to make the reference at once, because some conclusion may be arrived at by the parties interested.

MR. BOULTBEE: I think if the Credit Valley is allowed to make amendments, the other Railway ought to be allowed the same privilege.

MR. OLIVER: The Northern Railway Company are perfectly satisfied with the Bill now before the House, but those representing the Credit Valley Railway did not agree to it when before the Committee. There is not the slightest danger of the Northern Railway desiring any new amendments.

MR. HAGGART: I move that the Order be discharged, and the Bill be referred back to the Select Standing Committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines, with instructions to consider the amendments.

MR. KIRKPATRICK: I think it would be improper to refer the Bill back with instructions to consider the amendments. It must be referred back generally or not at all. I think it is contrary to Parliamentary practice, that when a Bill has been considered before the Railway Committee, and especially in the manner in which this Bill has been considered, for the Committee of the Whole to consider a lot of amendments such as has been proposed to this measure. Those amendments involve questions of facts upon which evidence should be taken, and it would not be proper to test the sense of the House upon them in the manner proposed.

MR. MACKENZIE: It we give instructions to the Committee to consider those amendments they cannot consider anything else, and we could not give a Committee of the Whole House the power those gentlemen expect. In my opinion it is absolutely foolish to press the motion as it stands.

Motion (Mr. Haggart) agreed to.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE TARIFF.

ADJOURNED DEBATE RESUMED.

House resumed the adjourned Debate on the proposed motion to go again into Committee of Ways and Means.—(Sir Samuel L. Tilley.)

MR. ANGLIN: My attention has been called to the fact that, in adding up the amount of the deficit for the last and current year, I improperly included in the amount the sum of $300,000 placed in the Estimates for the year commencing the 1st July next, to cover the cost of surveying lands in the North-West. That deducted from the amount I made the deficit to be, would leave the deficit for the two years $3,700,000. I find, also, that I omitted, when comparing the amounts of imports and exports for the two periods of five years each, to direct attention to the fact that from the winter of 1867 to the time we met here, in 1868, there was a duty of 25c. a barrel on flour, which might, more from the mode of keeping accounts than anything else, have apparently affected the amount of imports and exports. Then, again, in 1870, duties were imposed on flour and grain, and I presume the same effect must have been produced by the mode of keeping the accounts. This would, apparently, decrease the imports and exports in those particular years to some extent, but to what extent I am not prepared to say. Before recess, I was considering the effect of the Tariff on the farming interests of the country. To the statement I made in regard to the reduction in the price of farm produce, I might have added, that the price of hay is lower than it has been for many years, and that, taking it all in all, the intelligent farmer has little to thank the hon. gentleman opposite for, in respect of the National Policy. It was stated that the price of rye has been higher during the past season than in some previous seasons; but, in fair play and justice, it ought to have been added, that the price of rye in Chicago was sometimes actually higher than it was in Toronto. At all events, it would be very easy to demonstrate that the imposition of the duty has not, in the slightest degree, tended to increase the price of rye. I have spoken of cattle feeding, and the exportation of cattle, as a growing trade, and one which ought to be encouraged; but that trade is seriously discouraged by the National Policy, because it almost prohibits the farmers of Ontario and other parts of the Dominion from buying cattle in the United States for the purposes of feeding, and it imposes a duty of 7½c. on corn, which is necessary for the feeding of the cattle. The United States shippers are exporting more cattle than we are. The farmers have the advantage of having a free market in which to buy their animals for purposes of feeding, and they are able to buy their grain at cheaper rates than our farmers. More than that, I am informed and believe, that the freight for cattle from Boston has been on an average $5 a head less than the freight from Halifax, although the sea voyage from the latter port is shorter than from Boston. Then all the goods which the farmer buys have been increased in price; and although he may not be absolutely compelled to pay more for his sugar, he has the consolation of knowing that 1 cent per pound of the duty he does pay does not go into the Treasury but into the pockets of the monopolists. I should, perhaps, have spoken of the tea trade when I spoke of sugar. We were told that under the present Tariff an important direct trade with China and Japan would be created, but this promise also is unfulfilled, and the only effect of the change is to harass the grocers of all the Provinces, and somewhat increase the price of tea without increasing the Revenue.

MR. KIRKPATRICK.

On the whole quantity of tea imported into the Dominion, the amount of duty paid, as compared with the amount paid under the old Tariff, shows a reduction of just one-half of one per cent.

MR. DOMVILLE: No.

MR. ANGLIN: My accuracy can be easily tested by an honest use of arithmetic. If we consider that some millions of pounds of tea are now imported nominally from China and Japan, that these only pay the lower rates of duty, while the consumers have to pay to the importers something very near the 10 per cent. differential duty, it will be found that although the Treasury loses one-half of one per cent. on all the tea imported, the public pay quite as much as before on black teas, and more on green teas. The average duty on green teas, bought in the United States, was over 7 cents per pound. I think the hon. the Finance Minister will find that we do not gain anything on tea, by reason of the change of duties. What effect has this Tariff had on the general trade of the country? An hon. gentleman, speaking here one or two evenings ago, pointed to the fact that the price of bank stocks are, to-day, somewhat higher than they were a short time ago. Immediately before the fall of the late Government and the accession of the present, the stock of the Bank of Montreal stood at 171. What is it to-day? The price has been very much lower than it is to-day. Scarcely had the present Ministers warmed their seats before the price of bank stocks began to tumble. One of their promises was that, after they were returned to office, bank stocks would advance immediately. The hon. Premier, addressing a public meeting in Ottawa, some months after his return to power, had the courage to assert that the prices of bank stocks had advanced as a consequence of their victory, when in reality they had tumbled down, so that at that moment they were worth many millions less than when Mr. Mackenzie's Government fell. Montreal Bank stock now varies from 140 to 141, there being to-day a decrease in the value of the whole stock, since this Government was formed, of \$3,600,000. Other stocks have fallen in like proportion, and three banks have failed since the late Government was defeated. We are asked: Was the failure caused by the National Policy? We answer: If all the promises of hon. gentlemen opposite had been fulfilled, or had any foundation in reason, common sense, or truth, those banks would not have failed, and stocks would not have declined. We do say that the accession of the present Government to office, has had a material influence in bringing about this disastrous state of things. If we enquire how this Tariff affects the business of importers, we find, from one end of the country to the other, one uniform complaint with regard to it. I think the hon. the Minister of Finance says, that even the importers, of late, have become reconciled to the National Policy. I would like to know in what town or city they are reconciled to it. In St. John I have heard nothing but complaints. One reason is, that it requires a great deal more capital than formerly to carry on business to the old extent, the duties being so much higher, and having to be paid in cash the moment the merchant wants his goods. That cash he often finds it hard to procure, even at large interest; thus, in proportion to his stock and sales, he requires a much larger capital than formerly. The increased price of the goods, in consequence of the higher duties, contributes much to the diminution of his sales. The hon. the Minister of Finance delights in the fact that importations have been greatly reduced. Now the import trade is a valuable one. Importers all over the country complain loudly that they are embarrassed by the additional burdens, in the first place, and by being compelled to use a large capital for no larger amount of business. Besides, the Tariff is so framed as to be as vexatious as possible to every importer. Nothing could exceed the trouble and annoyance it is calculated to produce to this interest. In a letter I received from St. John since I came to Ottawa, a complaint, often made, is renewed: that the importer of a bale of cotton was treated by the Customs authorities as if something was wrong. The ordinary entry was rejected and the ordinary oath proffered by a most respectable house was deemed insufficient, because some of the officers chose to think there was something doubtful in the transaction; so the whole bale had to be measured piece by piece to see what duty ought to be paid. The question as to the way in which the goods should be rated is raised continually. We heard, last year, that persons were brought from various parts of the country, and some from the United States, and engaged in the rough work of framing a Tariff under the supervision of the hon. the Minister of Finance; also, that a gentleman of high standing in the community was brought in to assist in the work of revision; and we thought we had a complete Tariff after going through the form of passing the law. But after all one of their Board had to be appointed to say how the law should be interpreted, and what regulations should be framed, and to their most extraordinary regulations the trade was compelled to submit; so that an importer now hardly knows how his entry ought to be made out, and under what rating he should put certain classes of goods. The hon. member for Shelburne (Mr. Robertson), last evening, read some extracts from a report made to the Board of Trade, Halifax, presided over by a most respectable importer, brother, I think, of the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. McDonald). That report condemned the Tariff in strong language, in which the President warmly concurred. Mr. Burns, one of the most respectable merchants of Halifax, a strong supporter and admirer of the hon. the Minister of Railways—a man thoroughly attached, as a rule, to the party now in power—one of the mildest of men—denounced the Tariff as infamous, calling it a diabolical Tariff. The whole trading community, if they spoke their honest feelings, would join in that expression. It is a Tariff which not only oppresses the poor and favours the wealthy, but imposes on the traders all the trouble and annoyance possible. With regard to the effect of the Tariff on imports from the United States and Great Britain, the hon. the Finance Minister asserts that it is more favourable to British than American trade. He, last year, made the very indiscreet declaration, that this Tariff was framed for the purpose of excluding American merchants and of bringing the Americans to their senses with regard to trade matters. He said it would favour British trade. What has been the result? During the last year a great revolution has taken place in the trade of Great Britain and the United States, which the hon. gentleman could not have anticipated, but which has entirely favoured his theory. We were told two or three years ago that, because the Americans were able to send into Canada large quantities of cotton and other goods, that was a proof of the prosperity of that country and of the success of Protection, and a proof that under Protection manufacturers could, in time, produce goods at a cheaper rate than under Free-trade; that thus the Americans were becoming the rivals of the British manufacturers, whose goods they were driving out of the markets of the world. Some of us, on this side, ventured to say that, instead of that being a proof of the prosperity of the manufactures of the Republic, it was a proof of their distressed condition; that there was a worse market for their goods at home; that labour had become cheap, and that they were compelled, in many instances, to sell to raise money. What has since happened, thoroughly proves the entire inaccuracy of the statements made by hon. gentlemen opposite, and the entire accuracy of our views of the situation. Prosperity has returned to the United States—not suddenly, as some suppose; because, for three or four years past, they have been exporting enormous quantities of their produce to Europe, and importing considerably less—because they could not afford to buy more, being comparatively poor then, and largely indebted. But, in the course of time, they succeeded in paying off a great deal of their indebtedness, and accumulating some capital, and suddenly, when everything was ripe for a change, a change took place, and we heard of a return of great prosperity to the United States. That prosperity of nearly 50,000,000 of people, consuming more of the necessaries and luxuries of life, than any other people on the face of the globe, reacted in Great Britain, and we find the entire course of trade in some articles changed. The Americans, instead of exporting cotton goods largely, as before, to compete with those of Great Britain, began to import enormous quantities. The price of iron, previously so low, suddenly rose, because with prosperity came a demand for new railroads, for the repairing of old roads, and other improvements. The price of woollens went up in the United States. To those ready to jump to conclusions, and say that because sugar and flour are cheaper we pay no additional duty, it would seem that, because those changes followed the National Policy, they were an effect of it. But, notwithstanding the operation of all those causes and the National Policy, we find that British trade with Canada has been very much more seriously affected by the Tariff than the trade of the United States. The hon. the Finance Minister contends that you must combine free and dutiable goods in making this calculation. Well, under the present Tariff, we do not admit cereals as we formerly did—they are no longer taken into account as part of our imports—they go through in bond, and out of the country, and to that extent the reduction in imports from the United States is merely a matter of account-keeping. I think that every Canadian, who regards the character of this country before the world, must have felt ashamed when he read that a gentleman, commissioned by the Government, deputed to appear before the assembled representatives of the Boards of Trade of Great Britain and Ireland, at Belfast, in describing the character of our trade, included among the imports the cereals that passed through the country from the United States to Europe. He could not have made that statement through error or mistake. It reflects neither credit nor honour on Canada that such a statement was made. It was pointed out by the hon. member for Centre Huron (Sir Richard J. Cartwright), more than once, that we receive from the United States large quantities of raw materials, not the product of the Republic—including nearly all the wool used by the manufacturers of this country; large quantities of hides and of many other articles which merely pass through the United States to Canada, because that is the most convenient way of importing them from the countries in which they are produced. But when we come to look at our trade with Great Britain, we find she supplied us with nearly all the woollens we imported, and we find they are burthened more heavily than any other importations. The duties on these are increased to 25, 50 or even 70 per cent.; therefore, we succeed in excluding, to a great extent, woollen importations from Great Britain. Cottons are also heavily burthened. We would have continued to receive them in large quantities from Great Britain but for the National Policy. But the coarse cottons formerly received, partly from the United States and partly from Great Britain, are excluded to a great extent by the operation of this policy. So, all the imports of iron, steel, tin, and those articles imported from Great Britain, which came in either free or at low rates of duty, have all been heavily taxed. If we turn to the United States, we find that none of the great staples received from that country are taxed so heavily. The average duty on British goods has increased $4\frac{3}{4}$ per cent., while on those imported from the United States, the average has increased only 1 per cent. If we take the whole goods now imported, both free and dutiable, we will still find that the average rate imposed on importations from Great Britain is higher than the average rate on importations from the United States. We are told that this has produced no feeling of irritation in Great Britain. Because the hon. the Finance Minister was able to effect a good loan there when money was a drug in the market, he concludes that the people of Great Britain do not feel indignant at a policy calculated to exclude their manufactures from our markets. Last summer the hon. the Finance Minister proceeded on a semi-royal tour through the Dominion, to ascertain how this wonderful Tariff of his was working, and learn if any material changes were required in it. This, we were told, was a wonderful act of policy on his part. He was, in this way, to learn more than any other Finance Minister ever knew. He himself gave us, when he made his last speech, an account of his progress through Ontario, which resembled very much what we saw in newspapers at the time. He said that, in London, he visited nineteen factories in one day. It was in the month of December, and you can fancy what any hon. gentleman, no matter how acute he might be and however ready to be crammed, could ascertain of the condition of nineteen factories in one short winter's day, travelling from one to the other, rushing into a factory, shaking hands with the principle proprietors, and one or two others, and exclaiming: How do you do? How do you like the Tariff? Is it working well? I am in a great hurry; show me as quickly as you can what you are doing. We are told that in many instances the workmen are suddenly transferred from one room to another, so as to make the numbers appear larger; it was a great opportunity for the proprietors to advertise themselves, and many availed themselves of it. It would be a very extraordinary thing if these gentlemen, instead of saying that they were doing a prosperous business, that they had no difficulties to encounter, should have said: Well, Sir, instead of being as well off as people generally suppose, we find ourselves in great difficulties, we are not selling our goods as well as formerly. We have to pay more duty on this, and more duty on that, and we do not like your policy. There were some, it seems, who had grievances and who stated them. The hon. gentleman told us that in one place he went to a factory and found the owner had gone away. Some one questioned the proprietor about this, and he answered: O, well, he was a Liberal, and he did not want to be there and to be forced to acknowledge he was doing so well, and he thought he would keep out of the way. We heard of many other instances, however, in which the hon. the Finance Minister took care to pass by on the other side of the street, and so to avoid factories that were not in a flourishing condition, or in which he knew he would not be welcomed. The hon. gentleman tells us that one large manufacturer of agricultural implements told him that he was paying at the present time some \$6,000 or \$7,000 in additional duties upon his raw material, and yet he asserts that that man is prospering under the Tariff. Why? Because he makes such large sales that, although it costs him so much more for his material, and owing to the competition from the United States, he cannot obtain higher prices for his implements, nevertheless his profits are on the whole greater than before. These must seem extraordinary statements when we remember that before this Tariff was adopted agricultural implements were not imported into Ontario except for patterns, and the manufacturers had the whole trade of the country to themselves. How the increase was to be accounted for, and why this particular manufacturer was able to sell so many more than before, I think would be a subject for an enquiry that would not lead to results very satisfactory for the hon. gentleman opposite. But the newspapers said the hon. gentleman did not visit all the factories in those towns, and that some he carefully shunned, acting under the instructions of the gentlemen who accompanied him on his rounds. I do not remember that it was reported to us that he ever conversed with the workingmen, or made any enquiries of them as to their position under the National Policy. The hon. gentleman, however, did tell us that in one place, where the proprietor was a Liberal, the workingmen wanted to give him a cheer, and did give him a cheer. How much or how little information that conveys to us I am not prepared to say. He got his cheer, and, let me say, he wanted a cheer from the workingmen badly. That is the only one I heard of his getting. In another place, the manufacturer informed him that he was compelled to pay higher wages to his workmen, and why? The hon. gentleman was kind enough, or indiscreet enough, to tell us. This manufacturer did not say: "I pay higher wages to my workmen because I get a higher price for my goods and can afford to pay higher wages; but I must pay higher wages, because if I do not my workmen will go to the United States, where their labour is now in demand." So where there has been any increase of wages, it, is due, not to the National Policy, but to the fact that wages are higher in the United States than they have been. He told us of a case in Almonte where, while visiting one of the mills, an increase of 10 per cent. in the wages was announced. I happen to know a little about that case. I had the pleasure last year of paying a visit to Almonte, and of visiting this same woollen factory of which Mr. Rosamond is the proprietor. That factory seemed to be managed with great skill and ability. Mr. Rosamond conducted me over the establishment, and permitted me to witness the various operations which were going on. I can quite understand that the hon. Minister would feel a deep interest in visiting a factory of this kind, but what he could learn there that would assist him in framing a Tariff was more than I discovered during my visit. Some weeks after my visit to Almonte, I was speaking to the hon. gentleman who represented the district at that time, and whose loss, I am sure, we all deeply deplore. I asked him how my friends at Almonte were getting on. "Oh!" he said, "I forgot to tell you; a week or two after you were up there the workmen in the woollen factories were informed that they must work each an hour a day more or submit to a reduction of 10 per cent. on their wages." And that reduction was made—not while Mr. Mackenzie was in power, not while those terrible Grits were ruining the country, but a month after the National Policy had gone into operation. We heard during the summer that business was actually suspended in all the woollen mills throughout the country, for two whole months. People did say that the suspension was for the purpose of enabling the proprietors to work off their surplus stock, and they alleged themselves, it was to enable them to clean their machinery and put it in order; but whatever the cause, the workmen in these establishments were for two whole months on the streets without wages and without employment, while the National Policy was in full force. The story is that, when the hon. gentleman was visiting that establishment in Almonte, the men were assembled, and on a door was written in large letters: "An increase of 10 per cent. will be made in the wages in this mill after the 1st of December." This only brought the wages up to the point they had been at during the time of the Mackenzie Administration. A gentleman told me that to this day only part of the men had received that increase of wages, and that never, in his recollection, was the village of Almonte in such a distressed condition as it is at this very day. The hon. gentleman then took us down to Montreal. He spoke of a large additional number of men being employed there. He talked of the sugar refinery; he talked of the Hudon factory, but we did not hear much about his visit to Montreal. He was challenged with not having visited his own poor city of St. John, and after that he did go to St. John, and he went through some of the factories there. His own account of those visits, even taking it as it stands, was rather a lugubrious account of a city once flourishing. He admits that the door and sash factories were not doing a large business. He says that was because of the fire. This seems to be his mode of accounting for everything that has gone wrong in St. John for some years past. But he did not venture to say they were doing as much business to-day as they did before the fire. When I said a few words with regard to St. John, on a former evening, the hon. the Minister of Finance misapprehended what I said. I endeavoured to point out that I was not comparing the present state of things in St. John with what existed immediately after the fire, but with the state of the city before the fire took place. The hon. gentleman, however, seemed to say that I was comparing the state of things at present with the state of things when there was a great rush of business of some kinds, immediately after the fire. If St. John were a prosperous city to-day, its door and sash factories should be doing almost as much business as they did four or five years ago. He did not visit the Colebrook rolling-mill and nail factory, about which something has been said, from time to time, in this House. The Colebrook nail factory was in existence twenty-five years ago, and then doing a prosperous business. Fifteen years ago, the Colebrook rolling-mills were established, and they continued to do a prosperous business. Under the management of a gentleman, now a member of this House, these mills were enlarged, and did a larger business. That gentleman himself told me that the amount of wages paid in the rolling-mills and nail factory amounted to \$12,000 a month, they used up some 4,000 or 5,000 tons of iron in a year, and some 6,000 or 7,000 tons of coal, and they did, ostensibly, a flourishing business. The rolling-mills were in operation the day the National Policy came into force, and so was the nail factory. Both those factories are silent to-day. Nothing has been done in them for some time past. It may be said the work done in those establishments is done somewhere else. That is not the case. The hon. Minister did visit a comparatively small rolling-mill belonging to Mr. Harris, and a still smaller establishment owned by Mr. Chesley, and both stated that they were then fully employed.

But the rolling-mill of Mr. Harris was in operation while the Colebrook mills were in existence. Mr. Chesley's mill or factory is a small one, and I hope it will be successful; but putting all together there is not in that class of business one-half the business done in the city of St. John that was done before the fire. There was another rolling-mill back on what we call the Shore, where a large business was done for some years, and I think it was in operation when the National Policy became law, but it has been idle for some time. We had a safe factory doing a large business for some years, but it is to-day idle. We have machinists' shops, that formerly did a large business, which are now comparatively idle and have only a few men employed. The hon. gentleman went to the establishment of Messrs. Fleming and Son, and there he was met with complaints that the duty on the raw material was so large, that it interfered very much, indeed, with their business, and even there, much less business is done than was done in years gone by. So, if you go from establishment to establishment, you find the same result. He went to Mr. Moore's nail factory, and, I believe, he did not like all that was told him there. The horse-shoe nail manufacturers also made numerous complaints. He visited our carriage factory, and was told that the number of hands employed was not half of the number employed the year previous, and yet the stock was accumulating. He visited another, and was shown where ten fires were going a year before, and only two were going then. He told us much of the success of Mr. Levi Young's nut and bolt factory. Now I come to Mr. Young, who is a very enterprising man, a man who has had a great many difficulties to encounter, and who is of a very sanguine disposition. That gentleman started, a great many years ago, a nut and bolt factory, and the factory he had in operation then was very much larger than the factory in existence to-day. The hon. the Minister of Finance told us that gentleman had six months' orders in advance, and that the company he has formed are about to build a larger factory. I am told that he has induced some persons to take stock in the company, and that a larger establishment is to go up. But with regard to the six months' orders in advance, those orders, it is said, have been received almost entirely through the instrumentality of the hon. the Finance Minister himself, for railway and other work. I do not complain of that gentleman receiving a share of the Government work, but of the misleading statement of the hon. Finance Minister. Knowing Mr. Young, and how sanguine he is, I said to the hon. Finance Minister, whom I met opposite Mr. Young's establishment: "If you find the hum anywhere you will find it here." He seemed to misunderstand my meaning, for he replied: "I do not know about that;" and I returned: "I do not mean that you will find it all through St. John, but you will find the hum here if you find it anywhere in the city." The hon. gentleman visited some boot and shoe factories, and subsequently, at a meeting held at Fredericton, he stated that he found the boot and shoe business in St. John in a very flourishing and prosperous condition. Now, how much good could the boot and shoe trade of St. John owe directly to the hon. gentleman's policy? I looked into the returns when the hon. gentleman repeated that statement here, and I found that the whole quantity of boots and shoes imported into the Province of New Brunswick, in 1879, amounted to a few dollars over $20,000. If the National Policy excluded every boot and shoe formerly imported from Great Britain, France, and the United States, it would afford but little additional employment to the boot-makers of St. John. Just at the time he arrived in the city, the winter trade had brought about a temporary revival in this business. Some of the establishments were running full time, but if he had enquired he would have found that, during the summer and fall, they had been running on half, and two-thirds, or three-quarters time, and he would have found that in none of them was employed the number of hands employed four or five years ago. If he had questioned the workmen he would have found that they were only earning from 50 to 75 per cent. of the wages they were earning five years ago. Some of the establishments he visited closed down a few weeks afterwards. I think he will recollect that a very particular friend of his own told him that the boot and shoe trade was suffering, because the market was flooded with bankrupt stocks from Montreal, and not because of a competition with Americans. I received from many of the workmen in the establishments he visited, information that the hon. gentleman had gone in and out without condescending to speak to them, or to ask them how they were getting on. He would not have ignored them, if he expected them to say to him: "We are very much obliged to you and delighted with the National Policy. Since it was adopted we have had ample employment and we are not merely earning as good, but better wages than before." If he thought that they would have replied in that strain, he would not have passed them by. But he never once asked them what they thought of the National Policy. An establishment the hon. gentleman did not visit, was that of Mr. Adam Young. For years and years Mr. Adam Young employed from thirty to forty men, at high wages, manufacturing stoves and castings of various kinds. Mr. Young told me, just before I left St. John, that he had had to suspend operations for two or three months, and he added, that he never felt so humbled as when, a few days previously, he saw one of the men who had worked for him, earning $2.50 to $3 a day, working as a scavenger at 50c. a day. The hon. gentleman might have visited a new industry established in the city of St. John. In order to save a number of the poorest of the poor from actual starvation, the corporation of the city employed them this winter to break stones, at rates that enabled them to earn about $2.50 a week. The hon. gentleman might have heard the click of their hammers as he passed, and he might have congratulated himself upon having found the "hum" at last. Such was the condition of St. John when he visited it. Worse was its condition a very short time afterwards. The hon. gentleman, it has been said, did not visit the shipyards. Shipbuilding is one of the great industries of St. John, and here I desire to say, with reference to the attack that has been made upon the character of the vessels registered in New Brunswick, that a more foul calumny on a great interest was never uttered. There was a time last fall when there was not a vessel of any size on the stocks in the St. John district. The hon. gentleman referred to a fleet of vessels coming to St. John this fall, and he seemed to regard it as a sign of returning prosperity. It was a fortunate accident for the city of St. John. Longshoremen were suffering because they had had very little employment during the fall. Hundreds were on the verge of starvation, when a large number of vessels, unable to obtain grain freights at New York, came to St. John, shipped lumber at low freights, and thereby afforded employment to many of our men for a few weeks. A large amount of good was done in this way; but will the hon. member pretend to say that the coming down of those ships from New York, in consequence of the blockade in the grain trade, was due to the National Policy? But let me return. There was a dearth of grain in Europe. We had large crops on this continent, and we forwarded a large amount of grain to Europe. That stimulated the rates of freight. It also, to a slight extent, stimulated the shipbuilding trade in St. John, and a few vessels were on the stocks when the hon. gentleman visited the city. Had he visited the yards and spoken to the artisans employed in them, he would have found that where, in the past, they had been paid from $1.50 to $2.25 a day, they were then paid from 75c. to 90c. a day, and in one yard they were compelled to take a part of their pay in orders upon a store. That is the report I heard, and I am afraid matters are not in a very much better condition in that respect yet. I do not think that anyone hearing my statement will believe that the National Policy has done much, at all events, for St. John. There were not employed in skilled labour, in St. John, two-thirds as many then as were employed two years before and down to the time of the fire, and scarcely one-half the wages paid formerly have been paid during the last year. I am sorry that very much the same state of things exists in other parts of the Dominion. We had a statement of Mr. Everett, the chairman of an association of mechanics and manufacturers, laid before us last year, showing what number of skilled labourers were employed in St. John. The hon. the Minister of Finance attacked the hon. member for Queen's for presuming to analyse the statements put forward, because he, forsooth, had meddled in the affairs of St. John, and showed that a very large number were men employed in the lumber mills. I wish we had a few men like the hon. member for Queen's to help to build up our city. He has a large interest in the city of St. John, and, apart from that, as a member of this House, he had a right to enquire into the statements of the hon. gentleman. I met that same Mr. Everett, and spoke to him on this subject, last fall. I said: "Mr. Tilley (he then was) has used your name in the House of Commons in connection with some figures. Will you be kind enough to give me the number of skilled labourers employed in the city to day, so that I may judge how the National Policy is working?" He promised he would, and after pressing him one day for this information he said: "You may, in a rough way, say, let me see—you say Mr. Tilley said they were reduced one-half in 1878—well, you may state that the number has again been reduced one-half. I employed last year just twice as many men as I employ now. I am doing as well as anyone else in the foundry business, but I have been compelled to reduce my men's wages 25 per cent. within a week. I told them if they could do better anywhere else, they could go. I would, of course, be sorry to part with them, but what could I do? However, they would not leave; there was then little employment in the United States, so they were compelled to remain." This, Sir, is the wonderful prosperity conferred upon us by the National Policy. As the result of those enquiries, those visits to factories and cities and towns, what have we got? Great things. We expected, when a Finance Minister condescended in person to go and make such enquiries, that great results must follow. Well, we have before the House resolutions to amend the resolutions of last year. What do they amount to? We have the duty on artificial flowers and feathers changed, the duties on books increased, 10c. added to the duty on coal, a few articles added to the Free List, the meaning of some passages in the resolutions of last year defined, and that is about all. The hon. gentleman referred with great gusto to a new factory erected in St. John; but he should have told us the result of his visits to the leading factories. Had he found them in a flourishing condition, in a great state of prosperity? The hon. gentleman presents the position of an odd few in roseate hues, and quoted an editorial puff about a new furniture factory. Why did he not tell us how he found the old, long-established furniture factories doing? Were these flourishing or depressed? Of course, it is exceedingly delicate—

An Hon. MEMBER: You have not shown any great delicacy to-night.

MR. ANGLIN: Exceedingly delicate to make statements publicly about firms that are in a depressed condition. Why does he not call upon the hon. member for Toronto to state how many additional men he has been able to employ in furniture making, and what higher rate of wages he can afford to pay since the Tariff came into operation. He has visited the factories, and now he comes the down and proposes that a certain class of mattresses should take rank with some other kind; and he has proposed the imposition of a tax upon wool not used to any extent in Canada, but grown in Canada, and exported; and he has made a few unimportant changes, all in the direction of greater protection. He has also made a few changes to render the work of the Collectors of Customs more easy. He has provided that gloves made of cloth shall be regarded as gloves. He does not touch the great questions which chiefly interest the importers of dry goods; but he provides that demijohns, containing vinegar, shall be subject to duty. Such are the wonderful changes resulting from those important visits to the factories. I think, Sir, the despondent people of Cape Breton, and many others who imagined that their grievances would find redress during this Session, will be disappointed. Let us see what effect on the various classes of this country this National Policy has had. In Cape Breton we find that the miners are heavily taxed, the output of coal being very much smaller than formerly, and the wages less. There is a great amount of suffering there. We are asked to look at the late elections there as evidence of their approval of the National Policy. Those who so argue seem to forget that anybody has ever heard of what has transpired in that county. There are a great many men who are popular independently of their political proclivities, and the popularity of the candidate has very much to do with the result of nearly every election. Sometimes, too, there are influences that hon. gentlemen do not care to discuss which operate in these elections; but this can truly be said of all the elections that have taken place in every county since 1878, with one or two exceptions, in which the hon. gentlemen opposite were successful. They were also successful after the Pacific Scandal was exposed. The county that was not carried away from its attachment to the Tory party by that scandal, could not, we may well suppose, be carried away from them by the National Policy. At the Cape Breton election we know that such Protection was promised to the coal interest as would force Nova Scotian coal into the markets of the Upper Provinces, and it was plainly stated that if Mr. McKay were elected no such increase of duty need be expected. We know, moreover, what influence was exercised in most constituencies by the Government: that three or four years of the time of the present Parliament are yet to run. While they are willing to point to those elections, they deny that the result of the Ontario Elections is any evidence of a change of opinion in that Province. Mr. Mowat, at the late elections, protested that it was wrong to introduce any such issue into what should have been a local contest, to be fought out on local questions. That was the proper ground; but he was unable to hold that ground. The National Policy was forced into the contest, and the people then gave their decision immediately against it. But the subject is not confined to the miners of Cape Breton. The Government has been compelled to send food to keep the fishermen from starving. We have heard of a petition, sent from Richmond and other counties of Nova Scotia, signed by a large number there, showing that the people in that district also are suffering from want of food. If a fair calculation were made of the additional duty imposed, it would be found that the fishermen of Guysborough paid, in such increased duty, more than the cost of the provisions now doled out to them to keep them from starving. What is the report from Halifax? We hear a most harassing tale of suffering, bordering on starvation, from the fishing districts, and of the city. It is stated that, as many as 100 to 150 houses are empty in Water street, once a busy quarter. Let us go from city to city. In my own city of St. John, stores and dwellings are unoccupied. On Prince William street, once the chief business street of the city, half the stores are unoccupied; and those that are let pay rent which scarcely covers interest on the cost of the buildings. In every corner bankrupt and forced sales are announced from month to month. Everywhere we turn we find the same story of desolation and suffering. Look at the harbour. Formerly it was crowded with vessels from all parts of the world, but for month after month, last summer, scarcely a square-rigged vessel was to be seen. Our mills are shut down and idle, and shopkeepers and merchants complain bitterly of the dullness of business. True the fire has done much to impoverish the people, but it is not because of the fire, that the city is in its present condition—desolate, dull and despairing. The returns show that the imports into New Brunswick are scarcely half what they were fourteen years ago; and if we make ever so liberal an allowance for flour and other articles that formerly appeared in the returns, and now do not so appear, our imports are not two-thirds what they were some years ago. Formerly, St. John was the centre of distribution for the whole Province, and for a great part of Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island, but she has now lost much of the trade even of her own Province. The hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) was right, though his mode of expression was strange, when he said that the decline of business in St. John is owing to a change in its geographical position. Should better times come and business improve, St. John will do better than she is doing now but it will never again become the great centre of distribution that it was a few years ago. Our manufacturers, also, have found competition with the upper Provinces too much for them, on account of the larger capital and larger income received by the Montreal manufacturers combined. But how does Montreal stand? We have been told of the additional number of men in employment, but this increase is, after all, but small, and it is only in part owing to the National Policy. The sugar factory undoubtedly employs a larger number of hands; the rubber factory employs a few more; but take it all in all, it will be found that wherever there is additional employment it is an increase on the amount of employment afforded a few months ago, and not upon the amount of employment of two or three years ago. The hon. member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Ryan) said, that the Grand Trunk built a large number of locomotives in Montreal this year, and that formerly locomotives were imported. Does the hon. gentleman not know that, some years ago, the Grand Trunk got nearly all its locomotives built at the Kingston locomotive works, which then employed 300 hands, and which now employ only eighty or ninety? Moreover, that Railway is now enjoying a period of prosperity, the demand for grain in Europe raising freights and keeping up a pressure of business. But the Tariff imposes only an additional duty of $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. on locomotives, and it puts $12\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. on the materials which enter into their construction. Several members of Parliament went to Montreal a few weeks ago. In driving from the Mile End station, they noticed that almost every other shop and house they passed was closed, or to let, and they were told that in some streets there were eighty or ninety houses unoccupied.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: Was it not a fast day?

MR. ANGLIN: Oh, no; the places were unoccupied. A gentleman we spoke to told us that all over the city things were as bad, if not worse. I have seen it stated, and I have no doubt accurately, that the assessed value of real estate in Montreal is considerably lower this year than it was last, and much lower than it was a few years ago. We hear from Hamilton, that there are about 570 houses untenanted. The hon. member who asserted that Hamilton was more prosperous than ever, had to admit that fact. He stated that the unoccupied houses were small boxes, and he said that their being empty could be accounted for in part, at least, by the fact that a great many mansions with modern improvements have been built, of late. The hon. gentleman would have us imagine that the mechanics, who formerly occupied the little boxes, suddenly became able to occupy those mansions. If that was really the case, it would be delightful. In Toronto there are a great many unoccupied places; and when we come to Ottawa, to the seat of Government, a city that ought to be the centre of life of this whole country, what do we find? We find 750 houses unoccupied, a large number of stores closed, and the whole city in a state of desolation. It has been said that the number of workmen who visited the Buildings this year demanding employment, was not so large as the number who came here two or three years ago, when the late Government was in power. To this a satisfactory answer may easily be made. The truth is, that Ottawa has managed to get rid of these poor people. They have been forced or induced to leave the city, and, perhaps, that in part accounts for the large number of unoccupied houses. "They have made a solitude, and they call it peace." So we may go from city to city, and town to town, and everywhere we find that the National Policy, except in a few favoured spots, and in the estimation of a few favoured individuals, has been a deplorable failure. We find that wages have not advanced in accordance with the promises of hon. gentlemen opposite. We find everywhere trouble and distress. The question then arises: How is this state of things to be remedied? We have only the responsibility of presenting the case of the people. More than that is beyond our power. Hon. gentlemen opposite, who have the responsibility of controlling Parliament and serving the country, prove themselves utterly callous and indifferent to the welfare of the nation. They have behind them a majority to sustain them on any question that may be raised. They feel perfectly safe for three or four years, and I suppose they think that if any of them seek re-election, even after that time has elapsed, they will find the people as gullible as before. They rest upon monopolies; they are begirt with rings; they have prejudice and ignorance sustaining and surrounding them; and they feel perfectly safe for the present, and, perhaps, for the future. We present the case of the people. Having done that, we have discharged our duty, and the only thing left for us is to supplicate a Divine and Gracious Providence, a Providence merciful as well as just, that He will not continue to punish this people much longer for their folly, but that, in His mercy, He will do what we are powerless to do—save the people and save the country.

MR. GAULT: As the hon. gentleman has taken the trouble to mention the financial condition of Montreal, I beg to say that that city to-day is on a sounder basis than ever, its revenue being more than equal to its indebtedness—last year the excess of income over expenditure being $556,000. If any other city in the Dominion can show an equally satisfactory position, I am willing to admit that the hon. gentleman is right in his conclusion. The hon. gentleman was very careful not to omit an allusion to the cotton factories in that city. I can inform him that, in those establishments, to-day, 3,000 hands are employed, and the competition among the nine factories in operation is sufficient to keep down prices. In July, 1879, the price of cotton in New York was 6c., while in Montreal, during the same month, it was 7c.; in 1880, the price was 8c. in the former and 7½c. in the latter city. That should be sufficient to show that the price has been reduced, owing to the number of mills in operation. About fifty-three woollen factories are in operation in the Dominion. It is certainly a fact that, had not the National Policy come into existence, not one of those woollen factories would to-day be in operation. It certainly must be an advantage to the farmer to have a home market for his wool. It was well known that the value of wool had increased. In Montreal, three silk factories—one of which weaves ribbons and other articles for ladies' dresses; another, which both winds silk and weaves; and a third, which only winds silk—have been brought into operation by the National Policy. A sewing machine factory which employs 400 hands, and which, before another year shall have passed, will have doubled its capacity, and a manufactory of plated goods, employing 3,500 hands, and which also owes its existence to the National Policy, are also in operation. There is also a manufactory of fancy woollen goods, employing 7,500 hands. A factory is about to be started in that city for the manufacture of pins, and its proprietor has gone to London to engage a number of men. As to the import trade in Montreal, it is to my knowledge that one house has done a larger business this year than ever before, having worked day and night for the past six weeks. Some very large importers in Montreal have told me lately that this has been the best year they have had since 1874. I know the hardware men and the leather merchants are now doing a very large business in Montreal. I also know that business in Toronto has been exceedingly good, the merchants there being quite as largely occupied as in Montreal. I saw in the papers, a day or two ago, that over a thousand tons of paper had been sold to a Chicago house by a Montreal manufactory. This indicates that the National Policy has been beneficial to all parts alike. Previous to the introduction of the new policy, we had a very large number of warehouses vacant. The circular of the late Finance Minister, calling in all the moneys of the Government then in the banks, made a sad day of trouble, the saddest we have ever known in Montreal. It was a financial Waterloo for disaster and failures. But, I am happy to say, that state of things has passed away. To-day, the banks are doing a good business; industries of every kind are advancing. I can say the same thing with regard to the operations of the Grand Trunk Railway, which employs, to-day, a very large number of men at Point St. Charles. It is to my knowledge, that the nail factories and the rolling-mills are all doing a large business, their hands being fully employed. Redpath's sugar refinery has certainly been actively engaged, and has made a large amount of money, less, however, in consequence of the National Policy than of the increase in the value of sugar. We have reason to be proud of that establishment. Mr. Redpath deserves well of his country, for he has given the magnificent sum of $50,000 towards McGill College. Had it not been for the National Policy, the number of men employed to-day in Montreal would not, I believe, have equalled half the number that are actually employed.

MR. MILLS: Mr. Speaker, Hon.

gentlemen opposite have undertaken to show that their policy of commercial restriction was not put in issue at the Ontario elections in June last. One hon. member undertakes to prove that it could not have been the issue, because he regards it as a foolish, an irrelevant one. He says the Reformers under Mr. Mowat refused to accept it as such, that they insisted upon being judged by their past record in the Provincial Legislature. I agree with the hon. member for Hamilton in calling it an irrelevant, if not a foolish issue; I go further, and say that, on the part of the Local Opposition, it was a most dishonest one. But this does not disprove the fact, that so far as it was in the power of the leaders of the Tory party to make it the issue, it was so made. In the Provincial Legislature resolutions were formulated upon the subject by the Opposition. It was the issue upon which they took their stand, and at every nomination of which we have any report, the programme laid down in those resolutions was faithfully adhered to. I have no doubt but the local leaders of the Tory party acted under instructions from the Premier here as the generalissimo of the party. The resolutions proposed in the Legislature at Toronto were dictated from here. The attack was made all along the line upon the same plan. Let us, Sir, glance at some of the facts. On the 28th of May last the hon. member for Niagara spoke at Grimsby on behalf of the Tory candidate, and demanded his return as of right, on account of the eminent services rendered to the country at Ottawa by the adoption of this fraud and folly, miscalled a National Policy. A day or two later, the hon. member, who is lavish of his oratorical and poetical services, spoke at Hamilton, and both he and the members for that city confidently put forward this policy of commercial restriction as the issue. At that time hon. gentlemen opposite did not regard the issue as a foolish one. They had as much confidence in its power as the Chinaman has in the sound of his gong as he marches to the battlefield. It was only after the leader of the Government here found his Ontario contingent routed that the gifted young gentleman from Hamilton discovered the issue presented by his friends to be a foolish, an irrelevant one. The hon. member for

Toronto West and the hon. member for Toronto East also declared this to be the issue. The hon. member for Toronto East, at the nomination of Mr. Morris, said that one great reason why he opposed the Mowat Government was that it was opposed to the National Policy. The seconder of Mr. Morris's nomination said: "The National Policy would give an impetus to manufactures. It would give work to the unemployed, and would keep our money in our own country. For this reason it was necessary that Mr. Morris should be returned." Mr. Morris, in his speech at the nomination, is reported to have said:

"There were two parties in this country—one of them opposed to our National interests and the other friendly to them, and one of these parties was represented by the Governments of Mr. Mowat and Mr. Mackenzie. The supporters of the present Government in Ontario believe that this Province is the citadel of the Dominion, and they think that if they can hold it, the National Policy can be overthrown. The issue in all these contests was so pronounced, that it was clear beyond all peradventure that the battle must necessarily be fought on the same line that it was fought on the 17th of September."

Mr. Morris, the second in command, then made the National Policy the issue, and upon it he was elected. About thirty others were elected upon this same foolish, irrelevant issue. What is the opinion of the hon. member for Hamilton of their case? Does he hold that they are sitting in the Provincial Legislature under false pretences? Does he think that as they failed to secure a majority in the country, they should go over to their opponents, and follow Mr. Mowat? The hon. member reviles us who were elected in opposition to this misnamed elixir of National prosperity, because we refuse to betray our trust and support it. It is true, Sir, that while the Tory party elected thirty candidates for the Local Legislature upon this issue, they had more than fifty defeated upon it, and the hon. member is quite ready to sacrifice these thirty survivors in order to conceal his own humiliation, and to escape from the embarrassing position in which he finds himself placed, by offering himself as an unnecessary sacrifice when he felt confident of success. The hon. member's efforts were rewarded by defeat, instead of victory, and he refuses to make the sacrifice promised. He insists upon the electors of Hamilton resting content with the sacrifice of the doves of the party, and letting the unblemished he-goat still remain in the Government fold at Ottawa. But, Sir, gentlemen on the Treasury Benches were not idle spectators of that contest. The hon. the Minister of Finance and the hon. the Minister of Railways, citizens of other Provinces, foreigners to Ontario in all that concerns her local affairs, joined in the fray. The right hon. gentleman, the Premier of Canada, on the 3rd of June last, when addressing the electors of Toronto, in the Tory Coliseum, where he and his friends contended with imaginary beasts, after the manner of Don Quixote, told them how Mr. Mowat had improperly altered the Election Law; how he had used the patronage of the Local Government to help his friends; and the right hon. gentleman warned the friends of commercial restriction, whether they were Reformers or Tories, that the power of the Local Government would be used in thwarting and defeating this restrictive prosperity policy. What issue did the Premier present to the country in that speech, and what verdict did the electors of Ontario render? Was it the one which he hoped for or expected? We all know that it was not. The hon. the Minister of Finance was one of the chief warriors in that contest. It is true he belongs to another Province; but he was not present simply as a soldier of fortune. He knew the fight was being carried on by his friends and allies with weapons from his armory. The thunder that was everywhere heard from the battle-line of his party was his thunder. He eulogised his pet policy, and his own public services. He spoke of the great blessings they would confer upon the people. He spoke of the great honor they had, through the Sovereign, conferred upon himself. The hon. the Minister of Finance, in short, said: "Gentleman look at me. I have been made a shining knight. My Sovereign has honoured me with these marks of Her confidence because of the eminent services which I have rendered to my country. Do honour to yourselves by listening to our words of wisdom, and by acting upon them. I ask these favours, not on my own account, but on yours. We are strong in our superior wisdom and statesmanship. Speaking for myself, I may say that like the friends of young Mr. Weller, I am emblazoned on bosom and breeches with public honours. You can add nothing to my glory; but, gentlemen, you can add to your own prosperity by upholding with your votes the great National fabric which my colleagues and myself have reared for your protection." Such was in effect the language of the hon. the Minister of Finance. It is too late for the hon. member for Hamilton to repudiate the issue which brought him here, and which, had he kept his word, would have sent him away—the issue, which was dishonestly, and, as the results proved, foolishly raised in June last. Whatever may be the rule in the court in which the hon. member practices, it is a fact that in the political arena a party and its platform stand and fall together. It is true too that a matter may be put in issue without issue being joined. In this case, those who made the so-called National Policy their instrument of warfare, cannot say it was not involved in the struggle when those who fought with it fell. How is it in England? Lord Beaconsfield is seeking to make the elections turn, not upon the wisdom of the policy he pursued, and is still pursuing, but upon vague forebodings of impending calamities, which he professes he alone is able to avert. He has misrepresented the policy of the great majority of the Home Rulers in Ireland, and of the Reformers in England and Scotland. Upon that battle field he has marshalled his forces. Thither he has striven to draw his opponents. He has failed. My ardent desire was that he might fail. But whether in that field few or many fight; whether he won, or whether he lost, so far as he is concerned and so far as his party are concerned, the issue which he submitted is the one upon which the electors of the United Kingdom have passed judgment for him and for them. So, too, was it at the last Ontario Elections with the Conservative party and their pet policy or policy for pets.

Mr. McCALLUM: What has the Local Legislature or Local Government to do with the National Policy or with the collection of the revenues of the Dominion?

MR. MILLS: The hon. gentleman should put the question to his leader.

Upon it they took their stand, and fought, and were defeated. The hon. member for Hamilton says the issue of the National Policy was never raised in that city. The reports of the political meetings of the period are conclusive against him. He says that he has by his speech effectually buried the statement; and that, if we, on this side, have a spark of manliness or honour left, we will not drag it from its grave after he has, in so handsome a manner, performed its funeral obsequies. Although, Sir, the language of the hon. member was worthy the funeral of Buck Fanshaw, he must not be either surprised or disappointed if we are not awed into silence by his threatened maledictions. Nothing that we can do can give the hon. member for Hamilton a worse opinion of us than the one he has expressed. He has accused us of "malignity," of "atrocious falsehoods," of "degrading the country in the interests of party," with being "overshadowed with gloom at the revival of prosperity." A distinguished lawyer once said, ironically, of an able but irritable Judge, that his excessive politeness atoned for his ignorance of law. I shall not speak ironically of the hon. member. I cannot say that his excessive politeness atones for his want of information. His memory is treacherous. His statement as to the actual condition of Hamilton is as wide of the mark as his account of the issues at the last election, or of the condition of the country under our régime. It is true that his errors of fact and his inconsequential arguments are not atoned for by his great respect for those who may differ from him. After the hon. member has shown his profound regard for the amenities of parliamentary discussion, by pronouncing the Reform members of this House a dishonest, dishonourable, vindictive, treacherous pack, he asks us if we have a spark of honour or patriotism left, to say nothing further, but good of this prosperity-producing policy. Why did the hon. member for Hamilton make this appeal to us? Is it because of the fair, the generous manner in which he has spoken of us, he feels that any appeal from him is entitled to special consideration from the Reform members? Or is it because the hon. member has mistaken the place? There may be places where very inaccurate statements, made in a very loud voice, may count for something; this House, however, is not one of them. As to what was said at the June elections in Hamilton, it is unfortunate for the hon. member that facts as they appear in the press are wholly against him. The hon. member, his colleague, Mr. Adam Brown, Mr. Murray, the member for Niagara, and the hon. the Minister of Railways, all spoke in favour of a restrictive Tariff in the Local contest. I have already shown that the Premier and his embroidered colleague did the same thing. Sir, had the press made no record of the course taken by the hon. member, we should not have been left in the dark as to the course taken by him. We know him too well not to know that he would be the last of the flock to deviate from the path in which his old, wary, experienced, and not over-scrupulous shepherd had so plainly indicated that it was the duty of all his sheep to walk. The hon. gentleman began his speech as the youthful member, the white-headed boy of the House. I do not think he was at all happy in the part he played. Members are usually prepossessed in favour of young men, especially when youth is accompanied by diffidence, and the part played modestly is played well. But while the hon. member came into the arena of discussion as a youth, he did not bring with him those qualities which win a high regard for one so young. He wandered too far from the ground with which he is familiar. He halloed too loudly. He substituted abuse for argument. He called us hard names, in his own dialect. He filled his speech with sound and fury when we had a right to expect calm discussion. He accuse us with being without eyes, because we do not see that the blush of dawn which he says appeared on the 17th September, 1878, has already ushered in the full day; of being without ears to hear the hum of industry and the songs of rejoicing which additional fiscal burdens have called into life. The hon. member misstates and misrepresents the state of the country under the late Administration. He misstates and misrepresents the state of the country at the present time. No one who took the trouble to compare the condition of this country from 1873 to 1878, with the condition of the adjoining Republic, could fail to be convinced that the depression of the trade was very much greater there than here. Although the people of Canada were as prosperous as any in the world, yet hon. gentlemen opposite laboured most sedulously to depreciate the condition of the country, to promote the interests and to improve the prospects of the leaders of the Tory party. They told the people that we were responsible for the misfortunes that flowed from the droughts of spring and the rains of summer. There was no market for our lumber abroad, during one year we had a short harvest, and we were denounced because of the poverty of those with whom we trade and for the changes of the seasons. We were also told that our negligence, our incapacity, were depopulating the country. After the elections were won by persistent misrepresentations, it is proposed that the advantage shall be retained by means equally dishonest. I decline to assist in the success of such a policy. Hon. gentlemen have shown that if to cry down the country were necessary to their success, they were ready to make themselves heard. They decried the country persistently. They acted upon the maxim that it is

I purpose to give some facts by which the hon. member for Hamilton, and other hon. members equally candid, will profit. I trust, Sir, when they describe to others and picture to themselves the people fleeing from the country, like Pilgrim from the city of Destruction, they will recollect these facts, which will prove a most effectual antidote for ravings of this kind. I find by the immigration returns of the United States, that the number of persons who left this country to settle in that is as follows:—

“ 1870-1....47,082	“ 1876-7....22,039

For those years which we were in power the emigration from the country was yearly 24,000. For the five years previous, under the régime of hon. gentlemen opposite, the emigration from the country was, in round numbers, 42,000 a year.

When the First Minister and his followers proposed to retain our population in the country by a system of exorbitant and unjust taxation; when they spoke of “our fellow-countrymen now obliged to expatriate themselves in search of employment denied them at home,” had they looked to see what the facts were? I ask them how is it that under your Administration the country lost 18,000 a year more of its population than under ours? How is it that the moment you return to power the expatriated class was increased by 10,000, and now, when your remedy has full play, the excess promises to reach more than 40,000 for the year? We said that in so far as any distress existed, what you proposed to do would aggravate, but could not relieve it. Time has vindicated our opinions; it has condemned yours. The wisdom of your fiscal policy is the wisdom of the necromancer. It has raised you to a footing of equality with the Rain Doctors of Natal. Hon. gentlemen on the Treasury Benches cried out against us for the loss of our population, when we were losing less than 22,000 a year, and they call upon us to be silent when the numbers are swelling beyond 60,000. Why has this wailing ceased, and the eyes become dry? Hon. gentlemen have sighed and sobbed themselves into repose, and they can now bear a larger loss without the same heartrending distress. But if this is to be taken as a test of the prosperity of the country, from year to year, it is wholly against the conduct of public affairs by hon. gentlemen and in favour of the late Administration. Is it, Sir, reasonable to suppose that with this state of things it has been better for Hamilton, just as it was worse for the country—that as the country became distressed Hamilton prospered? I have said enough to show that the pugnacious young member for Hamilton is neither a safe guide nor a reliable witness. The Hamilton Times, an enterprising, well-informed and most reliable journal, says that there are now 528 vacant dwellings in the city as against 327 in 1878. It is true the hon. member denies this. But his denial was very peculiar. He said he did not believe the Times. He went on to give the reasons for so many houses being vacant, and he admitted he did not know anything about the matter.

The Times says the actual population of the city is less now than in 1878. It points not only to the increased number of vacant houses, but to the diminished number of names in the city directory. What is the answer of the hon. member and his friends? Why, that trade has revived; that there has been a large influx of skilled labourers; that all are employed. But the testimony of the Department of Immigration is against him on these points. The new arrivals are not mechanics and artisans; the Department during the year has discouraged and dissuaded them from coming to the country. It is true, Sir, that people were told—"you will not require a foreign market. We will find you a market at home. We will cause towns and villages to spring up. The smoke ascending from the workshops and factories will be in sight of every farm house in the land. The waste places will be turned into wheat fields and the wheat fields into gardens." This good time has not yet begun to appear; and the empty shops, the untenanted dwellings, the lengthened lists of insolvents, the increased and increasing emigration all testify against the assertions of the hon. member for Hamilton. The hon. gentleman told us about a hub and spoke factory recently started in the city. I am informed that it is not a new establishment. It existed before, a few miles away from the city. It was transferred to Hamilton as a more convenient place for shipment. Its existence is in no way connected with the present Tariff. He says this establishment pays $15,000 yearly for wages and $20,000 for oak blocks. These sums, with a fair allowance for wear and tear and dividends upon capital, would necessitate sales of $50,000 or more a year. This establishment is but one of many, and alleged the production of this one is of nearly twice the value of the entire imports of hubs and spokes into the country under the old Tariff. Does the hon. gentleman then think that he can convince the House that this industry was greatly hurt by foreign competition before and that it is greatly helped by taxation now, the more especially as the importation of waggons and carriages has been augmented? The hon. member told us about an American emigration agent at Hamilton, who remained there while we were in power, but who has since closed his office and retired. Well, Sir, if such are the facts, they admit of easy explanation. It is clear this agency was not closed because Canadians have ceased to cross the border. The stream of emigration has swollen to enormous proportions. The agency is no longer necessary. The Government of Canada has undertaken to get rid of a population who, because they had been deceived, were likely to prove troublesome. They have conducted this business with a success that has not usually attended their public undertakings. Had the hon. gentleman been anxious to know why the office was closed, he would, no doubt, have been told that the Ministry whom he supports are carrying forward the work of expatriation with an energy, a zeal, that renders local agents from the United States wholly unnecessary. I was amused, Sir, by the line of argument pursued upon this subject by the hon. member for Cardwell. The hon. member was compelled to vindicate the conduct of the late Administration from the attacks which he and others had been in the habit of making. The hon. member admitted that emigration from Canada to the United States still goes forward. He admits that the causes which operated in 1878 still operate. He refers to facts which I had the honour to bring to the attention of the House four years ago. But for Ministers the defence of the hon. member is no defence—it is the severest condemnation. They said that this emigration from Canada was due to Ministerial incapacity, Ministerial neglect. No matter what might be the motive of the emigrant for going, the Government was unfit for its work that could not present a stronger one for remaining. When we then asked the hon. gentlemen who are now on the Treasury Benches to present their panacea, that we might discuss it, they declined to do so. They said "we shall not disclose our policy until we are entrusted with the administration of the affairs of the country. But when we are entrusted, we shall not be 'flies-on-the-wheel,' but statesmen discharging the high duties of statesmanship." Well, Sir, the opportunity has come, and what do we find? That emigration to the United States has increased, enormously increased. The hon. member for Cardwell comes forward, and pronounces a glowing eulogy upon the United States. He points out its rapid progress. He declares, with such an attractive land, stretching away to the south and the west of us, that his friends can do nothing to keep Canadians at home; that we are a migratory population, incapable of local attachments, impoverishing the lands which we cultivate, and when they are no longer productive we are ready, like a swarm of locusts, to move onward to exhaust some other locality. And this, Sir, is the confession of this parent Government, that obtained power by false pretensions, and now admit that what they promised they cannot perform, and that we have no right to expect such impossible tasks from them. This, Sir, is the confession of men who said we had taken our people into captivity to strangers; that we had made them hewers of wood and drawers of water to their neighbours; and the right hon. gentleman was to be to the people something more than Moses, Joshua, and Nehemiah combined. Now, Sir, all is changed. While the hon. member for Cardwell admits the inability, the incapacity of the Government to prevent emigration to the United States, he has quite overlooked the fact that the emigration which averaged, during our five years of office, 24,000, averaged during the five preceding years 42,000; that on the return of the Tories to power, the emigration from this country was increased by upwards of 10,000, and this year it promises to exceed the emigration for the last three years of our Administration put together. The tremendous excess of this year is no doubt in part due to the unwearied diligence of the hon. the Minister of Agriculture, to that broad cosmopolitan spirit which has recently characterised his administrative efforts, and which he, on a memorable occasion, with so much diffidence laboured to conceal. But other causes have been at work. It would be easy to point them out. It is now unnecessary. The simple statement of the facts carries on its face the censure of Ministers. This one is as notorious as it is indisputable, that what they regarded and what they declared to be an evil within the remedial powers of Parliament, and for the existence of which the Government ought to be held responsible, existed and now exists under their regime to a much greater extent than under ours. Before, Sir, I examine the subject of the Tariff, I propose to notice some of the statements which the hon. the Minister of Railway and Canals addressed to the House. The hon. gentleman assumed an attitude of defiance; but he was not inviting any one on this side of the House to a dialectical combat with himself. He invited us to a contest with two or more of his colleagues. He pronounced a glowing eulogy upon the hon. the Minister of Finance for having called in Sir A. T. Galt to help him over his difficulties. He told us it was a highly commendable thing to do; that he envied the hon. the Finance Minister because he was thus able to vindicate his position before the country. Now, we all know what this means. We know that the hon. gentleman aimed a blow at the financial capacity of his colleague. The defence of the hon. the Minister of Railways must have been more offensive to the hon. the Finance Minister than anything said from this side of the House. On this side, we have no special interest in the fortunes of the Tory party, but we cannot fail to notice the struggles between contending Chieftains that are carried on before us. The hon. the First Minister, assuming that the party were unable or incapable of choosing a successor, named three years ago, at Kingston, the hon. member for Cumberland as the warrior to come. He predicted there his own early political death. He promised soon to join the band of heroes who, in bygone years, had fought long and fiercely against responsible Government, against municipal Government, against disestablishment, and who were beaten, who had laid down their weapons and put off their antiquated armour forever. Herod and Pilot are again friends. The hon. member for Cumberland has been disappointed. The promise, as he understood it, has not been kept. The hon. the Minister of Finance who, during the days of party adversity, retired to his own Province with his leader here out of health, and the work of the party mainly devolving upon the hon. member for Cumberland, comes back into office and is interposed between the hon. the Minister of Railways and the reversion promised him. We are not surprised that the hon. the Minister of Railways avenges himself upon the leader who has disappointed him, and the colleague who has supplanted him. He drags ostentatiously before the House the subject of the Pacific Scandal. He eulogises that act. He commends to the grateful consideration of the country all who had any part in the matter. I give the hon. member credit for sense, and I say that no one who is not wanting in sense and sensibility would, as a matter of conviction, defend that transaction. While I give the hon. gentleman credit for sense, I do not give him credit for sincerity. He does not defend it because he thinks it defensible. Why then does he parade this transaction before the House? Why, but to worry and annoy some of his colleagues; why, but to remind them and their supporters and the party that he is the man with the clean slate, under whom the party can begin a new record, and take a new departure. The hon. Minister said:

“Sir, the hon. gentleman forgets that the people of the country have not forgotten that after seven years of the most successful Administration that ever crowned the efforts of any Government in this country, my hon. friend, the leader of the Government, went to the people of Canada and obtained the support of the country, returned supported by a good working majority to enable him still to carry on the administration of public affairs. He forgets that it is known to himself, and every other intelligent man in Canada, that the party which had thus been beaten in their struggle for power, trampled on the principles they had maintained in Opposition, and by the most corrupt procedure succeeded in drawing together a coalition, which they had long denounced, and gaining sufficient strength to seize power, and having seized power, sprung the midnight attack upon the people of Canada, without notice that any such thing was intended, at a time when great excitement was created with reference to a matter which, when it came to be properly understood, was regarded by the people as covering with no obliquity the parties connected with it. After the people had had five years' discussion of that matter, which had been thus suddenly sprung upon them, and enabled hon. gentlemen opposite to snatch a hasty verdict from the country before the subject was properly understood; when it was found that the very man who was author of that attempt, by the most corrupt procedure had succeeded in creating this public excitement, shrank from the challenge to come forward and under his oath state what he believed, the people sent back his right hon. friend and colleagues to power by an overwhelming majority.”

We all know that what the hon. gentleman desired was to stimulate his party to make the promised change. He knows what the facts are. He knows that the $393,000 which Sir Hugh Allan says he paid, were paid to obtain a charter, accompanied with a subsidy of $30,000,000 in money and a grant of 50,000,000 acres of land. That which he expected to receive was to come from the public; that which he gave or paid was not given or paid to the public. So far the hon. gentleman has denied all knowledge of the transaction. He has laboured to keep himself aloof. He has shown no anxiety to share in this transaction, for which he praises some of his colleagues. Why does the hon. gentleman show so much anxiety to avoid any share of the glory which he thinks it sheds on all concerned in it. The hon. member for Selkirk informed us how anxious the hon. the Minister of Railways was to be First Minister. We know that he is not indifferent to public honour. He is not without ambition. He does not wear his honours like Duncan. Why then does he insist upon his colleagues proclaiming the glory of a transaction in which he is so anxious to be considered as having no share? The reason is all too plain. It is to remind some of them of his advantage. His defence is not intended to please but to disturb. Why else should the hon. gentleman try to provoke discussion upon a settled question—one upon which the public verdict was given when the question was before the country? The hon. the Minister of Railways will find that the subject of the railway itself is still before the country, that the people are becoming awake to the perils of the enterprise, and that the interests of to-day are more than sufficient to occupy his attention. The hon. member for Cumberland alluded to a letter which I received from Sir A. T. Galt which related to certain extracts which I read from the Budget speeches of that gentleman, but which were not well reported at the time. He said:

“When the late Minister of the Interior undertook to quote his language as supporting their policy he was met by a bold disavowal of the truth of the statement the hon. gentleman had made in the House. The hon. member cannot have forgotten the fact that he sat here trembling for three days with a letter in his pocket, but never mustered sufficient courage or candour to read it, although it contained a refutation of the sentiments put into Sir Alexander Galt's mouth.”

Sir, I have not forgotten the facts, nor have I forgotten the impression I long since formed of the hon. gentleman, that he is, intellectually incapable of accurately stating the facts in any case. The statement which I have just read is one of those proverbial Tupperisms which are wholly at variance with the facts. In that debate I had spoken at some length. When I read extracts from the Budget speeches of 1862 and 1866, and when the hon. member himself called out that Sir Alexander Galt had since changed his views, I reminded him that Sir Alexander Galt had since reiterated in Parliament the same opinion, and that he was, at all events, no higher authority upon the one side than upon the other, if it could be shown by the advocates of a Protective policy that he agreed with them. The letter to which the hon. gentleman refers did not prove that I erred far in this particular, for while it showed that Sir Alexander Galt wished to break away from the very definite opinions which he had expressed, he declined to commit himself to a policy of Protection, as the hon. the Minister of Railways, and the Hon. T. N. Gibbs, sought to make it appear. I told Sir Alexander Galt, if the House permitted me, that I would, upon a fitting opportunity, read the letter. In that discussion a large number spoke after I had received the letter. The very night when the discussion, was continued until morning dawn I waited until the opportunity came, and the present hon. Minister of Customs objected. So, too, did the Hon. Mr. Holton, who informed me that Sir Alexander Galt told him he had written me, and he replied to Sir Alexander Galt that he should object to the letter being read; that if he wanted to be heard on the floor of Parliament he must come in by the suffrages of the people. Had the letter sought simply to correct any mistake, I would have asked the indulgence of the House to have read it at once, but it did not do so. It stated the author's views of public policy, in opposition to that of the Government, and it also showed that the hon. gentleman had, at least in part, forgotten what he had before said on the subject, and I would have been unjust to myself and to the Government to have read that letter without a word of comment upon it. I replied to that letter, and sent both it and my reply to the newspapers. Both appeared in the Reform papers, but Sir Alexander Galt's letter alone appeared in the newspapers that supported our opponents. If it is any comfort to the hon. member for Cumberland to know the fact, I can assure him that whether sitting or standing I did not tremble for three days or one day or one moment. I was content to state the facts, and there was nothing in them to give me any anxiety or to cause me any fear. It is rather a noticeable feature of this discussion that the hon. member for Cardwell has become the expositor and commentator of the speeches of the hon. the Minister of Railways, and one cannot well help noticing the striking similarity of the exposition to the text. The hon. member for Cardwell has long enjoyed the credit of cramming the hon. Minister for these annual exhibitions, and the performances of the two hon. gentlemen go a long way to establish the rumour. Agreement in truth is compatible with independent investigation, but a consensus of error implies prior understanding. The hon. the Minister of Railways and Canals said in criticising the speech of my hon. friend from Centre Huron, that :

"The hon. gentlemen has ventured to talk of the increased cost of the Government of the country, brought about by the Administration of the present leader of the Government during the time he was in power before. He forgot to tell the House that while the largest and most lavish expenditure of the Government which preceded his advent to office was $22,800,000, he, himself, after the professions of his party to economise, brought down as his first estimate a proposed expenditure of between twenty-six and twenty-seven millions of dollars. There is the proposal of 1874 on the Statute book. There is the proof that this gentleman, who now charges my hon. friend the Minister of Finance with wild extravagance, because his estimate is twenty four millions, out of which there is one million of interest additional, and $600,000 of sinking fund additional, came down here in 1874 with an estimate of $26,163,000."

It was a puzzle to me, as I am sure it was to many others, to know how the hon. gentleman obtained an amount so wide of the truth. The speech of the hon. member for Cardwell solved the problem. He was not quite satisfied with the manner in which the hon. the Minister of Railways acquitted himself. He appealed to the law and to the testimony. He came down to the House armed with two volumes of the Statutes, and read to the House the sums total mentioned in the Supply Bills for two years—the Supply Bills from which are omitted all that part of the estimates which are a permanent charge upon the revenues of the country, but in which are included the contemplated expenditure upon capital account. We seldom have such an exhibition of superior fitness for the work to that shown by the hon. Minister and mentor in the case in question. These are the gentlemen who sit in judgment upon the hon. member for Centre Huron, and who delight to exhibit the dependent helplessness of the present Minister of Finance. These gentlemen owe it to themselves and to the House, to show that the mistake arose from ignorance of the subject and not from bad faith. The hon. member for Cardwell showed his sincerity by coming armed with the Statutes of 1875 and 1876, and the hon. the Minister of Railways seems to have taken the Estimates of 1873 from a similar source. The hon. the Minister of Railways has tried hard to explain away the untenable position which he took in reference to the effect of the coal duties. The hon. gentleman said :

“Does the hon. gentleman know the whole duty on flour and coal in New Brunswick would not be 3c. per annum per head on the population? And the same might be said of Nova Scotia. Did he not know that the duty on coal lowered the price in St. John.

“MR. MACKENZIE: How?

“SIR CHARLES TUPPER: If the hon. gentlemen have not mastered that question they have not commenced the study of the question. If you give a mine a market that will enable it to work to a capacity of 100,000 tons, it can sell that coal cheaper, at a larger profit and a smaller price, than if it had but a market for half that amount. (Hear, hear.) The sale of coal from the Maritime Provinces has largely increased during the past year. The duty of 50c. would have accomplished the object of giving to the mines of Nova Scotia the markets of Ontario, and, so far as the city of Toronto and Hamilton was concerned, the coal was sold profitably there, but everybody knows that while there was a duty of 50c. the price of coal during the past year fell to an abnormally low amount, and therefore the Tariff had not as much effect as it otherwise would, and as it will have when the increased prosperity in the United States causes a rise in prices.”

Why does the hon. member say that St. John got her coal cheaper? Because he says the duty secured a larger market; the Nova Scotia miners sold more coal in Canada, because the duty kept English and American coal out, and, selling more, they were enabled to sell it at a lower price. Unfortunately for this hon. gentleman's theory, it is at variance with the facts. The output of Nova Scotia coal last year was not greater, but less than the year before, and his reason for the reduction of the price of coal in St. John is left without a fact to support it. But a case like this does not in the least disconcert the hon. the Minister of Railways. He is a political economist who differs from all the world, and who is ready to charge everyone who may dissent from his opinions with ignorance, with not having mastered the rudiments of his science. The hon. member admits that the price of coal had fallen in the United States, and that the improvement of the price there would advance the price here. So it has come to this, that after all the confident promises of the hon. gentleman to secure good prices and a ready market for every Canadian product, he is compelled to admit that we had our price of coal in Canada regulated by the price in the United States, and that, were it not for this tax, the people of Canada would have got cheaper coal. The hon. gentleman had, a few moments before, pointed out what he regarded as the humiliating position of England, in consequence of her Free-trade policy; that Lord Derby had told the people that there was nothing for them but to emigrate; that Lord Salisbury had replied to a deputation of sugar refiners, that “England could bring no pressure to bear upon France or America, because they had nothing to offer.” He intimated that he and his colleagues were possessed of more sagacity than Cobden and Peel. He was going to retain the power of coercing the United States. He was going to protect the people of Canada against the calamity of getting too much for their money; and after soaring over all Western Europe and North America to exhibit the superior wisdom of the course taken, he suddenly terminated this tremendous flight by assuring us that our neighbours—whose superior wisdom he commended, whose system of exclusion he pronounced the perfection of wisdom, which we ought to copy, whose system of exclusion he pronounced unneighbourly, and which he promised to punish by a system of retaliation, should he reach the Treasury Benches—have not been very prosperous for sometime. The hon. gentleman assures us that their commercial health is improving, and that we must depend upon their improvement for our own; so that now when the hon. member is in the Government he has shrunk from being the master of Providence to the condition of a helpless “fly-on-the-wheel,” revolving with it but utterly powerless to control its revolutions. The hon. member for Cardwell here also pursues the hon. the Minister of Railways, amplifies, revises, and explains his statements. He says it is quite true that last year the output of coal is less than it was the year before, but that in British Columbia it was greater; so that in the whole of Canada it was a few thousand tons more than it was the previous year; and for this slight increase the National Policy receives due credit. But let me ask, in what way could the National Policy help coal-mining in British Columbia? Those mines supply the coal to the steamers upon the Pacific coast. In so far as coal may be required for domestic purposes, duty or no duty, the mines of Vancouver must furnish it. The quantity of coal consumed from year to year depends wholly upon the demand for the year. With the Nova Scotia mines it is quite different. They have competitors in England and the United States; so that if the National Policy had any influence anywhere upon the output of coal it must have been in Nova Scotia, and the output there is less than the year before. The hon. the Minister of Railways must, therefore, find some other reason for the reduction of the price of coal at St. John than the one he has given, for the output is less, and if it had been greater it would not have shown that anyone did a larger business than before. The argument that the percentage of gain may be reduced as the quantity is increased does not apply to aggregate quantities, for the increased quantity may be due to the fact that more may be engaged in the business. The hon. gentleman said of the late Minister of Finance that:

“From the hour he was clothed with power to deal with the financial interests of Canada, Canada, step by step, steadily sank in public estimation, until he was hurled from power by an indignant public. I have said that he should regard with consideration the difficulties which surrounded the task of any man who was not called, as he was, into power when there was an overflowing Treasury, and the country was prosperous, but who took office when the prosperity of the country had sunk, step by step, under the hon. gentlemen opposite, until we were objects of pity to many and of contempt to some.”

Now, in so far as the speech of the hon. Minister of Railways relates to the conduct of my hon. friend as a member of the late Government I shall say nothing. He is fully equal to the task of defending himself. I quote the hon. Minister's words for another purpose. I deny the statement of the hon. Minister of Railways. It is at variance with the facts in almost every particular. It is true that the hon. member for Cumberland, and others on that side, zealously, unscrupulously and unintermittingly laboured to damage the credit of the country abroad and to sink it in public estimation. They made a few dissatisfied, but did they succeed in lowering the public credit? No; not for an hour. All the noise and clamour of the hon. member had no more effect upon the credit of the country than the whistling of the mariner has upon the wind. He says when they were expelled from office, they left behind them an overflowing Treasury, and that the country was prosperous. He has often said this before. Let me remind him that in this, as in many other matters, he is not consistent with himself. What was the burden of the hon. gentleman's complaint against us at the last election? Upon what platform does he now stand? He complained that our importations were too great and ought to be diminished, and that we had taken no steps to check them; that we were permitting our consumers to buy abroad when they ought to be compelled to buy at home. The Government have dealt with the fiscal policy of the country from this standpoint, and they have deliberately set to work to diminish our foreign trade and to cut down our importations. This is the principle upon which hon. gentlemen now are proceeding, and if it is sound, the policy of hon. gentlemen when in office before was essentially unsound. Then the hon. the Minister of Finance said there was no inflation, that the increase of imports was a normal, a healthy increase, which was to go on increasing from year to year, and upon which the Government could confidently rely to meet the growing burdens of the country. Well, Sir, if the welfare of the country requires that Parliament should legislate so as to equalise the value of the imports and exports as they appear in the Trade and Navigation Returns, then Canada was never so badly off, was never so badly served, as it was from 1872 to 1874 inclusive. What are the facts? From the establishment of the Union to the close of last year, our imports have exceeded in value our exports by $259,977,295, our imports being $1,173,092,314 and, our exports $913,115,019. Many gentlemen opposite believe we have gone in debt to the extent of the difference. They regard it as an evil, and they have set themselves to repair the mischief, and to prevent its recurrence. Let me direct the attention of the hon. the Minister of Railways to that saturnine age to which he so frequently refers—to that period when Canada was made by him and his colleagues a garden of Hesperides, when the people knew no want, when there was neither mildew nor blight, and when the power and wisdom of the Government to bless were greater than the power of Providence to punish. Under the Mosaic Code, which the hon. member for South Leeds would like to see us adhere to, every member of the Government would suffer death for the arrogant impiety of his pretensions. But this by the way. The amount entered for consumption for the three years which I have named was, for 1872, $107,709,116; for 1873, $127,514,594; for 1874, $127,404,169; making a total for the three years of $362,627,879. The excess of imports for consumption over Canadian exports for the same period was, for 1872, $41,534,989; for 1873, $47,627,269; for 1874, $49,475,750; making a total excess for these years of $138,638,008. If the views of the Government at the present time are sound, these were not years of good fortune but of folly. I have no doubt but these years were years of inflation. I have no doubt but the hon. gentleman collected taxes upon goods which were imported beyond the actual requirements of the market. I have no doubt but that the goods in these years imported, were not consumed until subsequent years, and that the revenues collected upon them belonged to succeeding years. If the hon. gentleman is right, they collected Customs duties upon $139,000,000 worth of goods for which the country was in debt. If he is right, the period to which he refers was one in which the people had not only spent all their income, but had consumed a large portion of their capital, and yet he would have us regard these years as years of unexampled prosperity. What would be thought of a man who mortgaged his estate for a considerable sum, and who counted the money he so raised a part of his income? He would be regarded as a fitter subject for St. Luke's than for Parliament. But I do not agree with the hon. Minister in his censure of the former fiscal policy of himself and his colleagues. I do not go with him in the way upon which he argues the country should now travel. Taking a number of years together, what is purchased is paid for, and the elements of which these payments are composed are easily calculated. The causes which have hitherto influenced the volume of our imports vary at different periods, besides the spirit of speculation at a period of inflation, I shall presently point out; but before doing so, let me advert to some considerations which the hon. the Minister of Railways had overlooked. The last three years we were in office our Customs revenue averaged about $12,700,000, while during the three years to which I have already referred it averaged $13,500,000, under a somewhat lower Tariff. If, during these years, goods were bought on credit, and in excess of the requirements of the market, the revenue collected upon them should be credited to the years in which they were consumed. Since large importations are regarded as an evil, and large exportations a good, let us look at the exportations. During our régime the export of Canadian productions ranged from $68,000,000 to $79,000,000 a year. During the régime of hon. gentlemen opposite it varied from $53,000,000 to $80,000,000. But the average value of the exports while we were in office was $71,000,000, and during the period when hon. gentlemen opposite were in office it was $7,000,000 less. If we look at the moneyed institutions of the country, we have similar evidences of the growing wealth of the country under our Administration; so, then, it is not true that the country was wealthy and prosperous under Tory rule, or that it was impoverished and ruined while Reformers were in office. I do not subscribe to the policy of hon. gentlemen on the Treasury Benches, that commerce can be wisely controlled by fiscal legislation. Nor do I subscribe to the opinion that our mercantile indebtedness is measured by the apparent difference between the values of the imports and exports of the country. No theory could be more absurd. Every cargo of exports that may be lost at sea, or which in any way fails to reach a foreign market, and for which nothing is received in return, swells the exports, but adds nothing to the imports, and yet no one would feel the country was helped by such an adjustment of our foreign commercial transactions. Now, I do not say that the great disparity between the two sides is adjusted by the gains on the exports sold in a foreign market. Our mercantile marine earn large sums in the carrying trade of the world. A part of this goes to increase the available capital of the country, a part is consumed in the purchase of domestic products, and a part is consumed in the use of goods brought from abroad. But there are other elements in the adjustment of our mercantile accounts. We have, since Confederation, increased our public debt by about $91,000,000, or, leaving out of view the debts of the Provinces, which have been assumed, about $74,000,000. A part of this sum has been paid out abroad to purchase material for Government works, and a part as wages earned, which have gone to pay for tea, sugar, and other groceries, for dry goods, and imported articles, and by so much as is so paid you may diminish the import side of the National Commerce. Then, too, you have important enterprises undertaken by private corporations. See how many miles of railway have been built by private companies, in nearly all the Provinces, since July, 1867. I speak without doing more than to hastily glance at these expenditures, but from this hasty examination I find that the Provinces and the Municipalities have contributed upwards of $21,000,000, and foreign capitalists eighty, or it may be a

a hundred millions more. Now, this money, like that borrowed by the Government, has been at once, or after being earned as wages, sent abroad to purchase material for the road or articles of consumption for the labourer; so that we have in these ways an addition made to the purchasing power of perhaps $15,000,000 a year. I say, then, we have no reason to believe that there has been over-importation of late years, or that this country is now largely indebted for goods of foreign manufacture. I do not think that there was any impending calamity in the foreign business relations of her merchants that required Government interference. Nor will I say that the purchasing power of the country would be diminished very much if Government loans were to cease, and gigantic enterprises were for a time discontinued. The men who now labor and earn wages on these works could do as much on new homesteads, or in labouring on land for others. But some works have made great and substantial additions to the wealth of the country. Let me name the Canada Southern Railway as an instance. I think that I am much within the mark when I say that it has added 25 per cent. to the value of the land for five miles on each side along the entire length of the road; and in all discussions of the balance of trade, considerations of this kind are wholly overlooked. But there are many expenditures without such a result. Private companies spend their money at times on profitless enterprises, but mistakes of that kind need not particularly concern us here. In these, if there should be loss, that loss will fall, not upon this country, but upon the wealthy capitalists abroad who have in these undertakings made unwise investments of their money. But when money is spent by the Government in profitless enterprises, the case is wholly different. The faith of the country is pledged for the repayment, and the loss upon the investment falls upon the country. Since the Union began we have paid as interest upon our indebtedness the sum of $69,844,350 and we have paid for the management of the debt $3,155,163 more. That is in round numbers $73,000,000. At the present time the interest and the cost of management amount annually to $7,500,000—a larger sum than our annual average expenditure on capital account. What then is the obvious inference from these facts? Is it not this, that the sum which we now are obliged to pay as interest upon our Public Debt would, were we out of debt, build the public works required by the country without the necessity of effecting loans. We would not forever be paying interest upon the price of a "dead horse." I have indicated rather than discussed what our financial aim should be. Since 1867 we have doubled our Public Debt. Since then our neighbours have paid off 30 per cent. of their debt. The interest upon our debt is as large in proportion to our numbers as theirs, and in proportion to our wealth, much larger. The advantage of which we boasted at the time of Confederation is gone. The traditional policy of the United States has been from the beginning to keep out of debt, and, if by war, debt is incurred, to get out as soon as possible. They have never incurred any debt during a period of peace. To their traditional policy they have most faithfully adhered.

MR. PLUMB: Let me ask the hon. member what about the eighty or ninety millions of debt incurred on behalf of the Union Pacific Railway?

MR. MILLS: Whatever the sum, it was not an expenditure by the Government, but a loan to the company, for the payment of which the company are responsible to Congress.

MR. PLUMB: The company have never paid a dollar of interest yet.

MR. MILLS: This in no way affects the accuracy of my statement. This policy has prevented public extravagance. It has favoured economy in the conduct of public affairs. It has prevented the Government from engaging in visionary, expensive and profitless enterprises. Our present position establishes to my mind, beyond all question, how salutary such a line of conduct would have been since Confederation to us. Ever since this Union was formed, we have been drawing too largely upon the future. We have incurred great burdens which we are seeking to shift from our own shoulders to the shoulders of those who cannot punish us for our dishonesty, who will never meet us who will not come into the world before we have left it, and whose only means of protecting themselves against our misconduct will be to repudiate what we have done on their behalf. I agree with the Re-Sidney Smith, that those who are rotting in the church-yards have no right to control those who are sitting in the pews. While we are masters of the public ship and keep on deck and at the helm we may direct its course; and when we are no longer able to stay there we are at liberty to leave any amount of good advice; but we have no right to give commands and to impose obligations. The hon. the Minister of Finance requires for the Public Service a tax of $30 annually from every family in Canada. But he has devised a system of taxation which takes not far from $45 per family from the people. Capitalise the first of these sums and what have you got? Why, a central Government which requires the interest on $600,000,000 to support it. Look at the wealth of the country as shown by your last Census returns and then at this sum, and tell me what chance there is for rapid improvement with this tremendous burden upon the shoulders of the country—a burden that is mainly born of the statesmanship of hon. gentlemen opposite. I am, Sir, in favour of economy, and the first important step in the way to economy is to give up your scheme for a forced loan, keep away from the London money market, and put an end to expenditures upon profitless enterprises. At present the tax which the people pay, which never finds its way into the public Treasury, represents a capitalised sum of not far from $300,000,000. This is the value of the property which you have in effect seized, and have said to the owners "we want 5 per cent. on this sum to go towards aiding certain industrial pursuits," and you assume that there is no discouragement in all this. The injury is certain, the benefit is very uncertain. A single new appliance neutralises the Protection which you attempt to give, and when this is not done, the aid you give takes away the stimulus to improvement, and in the end does more harm to the recipient than good. Let me, Sir, ask the attention of the House to a few facts which I have gleaned from the Scientific American. There were, in the State of Massachusetts, boots and shoes:

1875..		48,900	59,762,865
1878..	1,500	51,280	102,000,000

Now, we have within thirteen years such improvement in the appliances of labour that each man in 1878 did as much work as three and one-half men did in 1865. Let me take the cotton manufactories of Massachusetts in 1865, and in 1875. For these years the facts may be thus tabulated :

	Hands.	Yards.	Yard per Hand.
1875..	60,170	874,780,000	11,213

Here is an improvement equal to 55 per cent. and which would require a customs tax of that amount to overcome. Then there is a still more marked progress in the production of woollens. In the same two years the number of persons employed, and the value of the product was as follows :—

	Hands.	Value.
1875.....	19,030.....	90,208,280

Here the production per yard was increased by 96½ per cent. Now, altogether, apart from the inherent viciousness of the system, a Government is in this day of invention utterly unequal to the task of affording general Protection, so rapid has been the progress of late years, that the waste of capital by discovery and invention is often as great as by ordinary wear. The inventions of genius set your Protective Tariffs at defiance, and you must adjust them year by year to counteract what, from the Protective point of view, are their injurious effects. I want to see all classes of our population stand upon a footing of perfect equality in the struggle for life. I want to see the country prosper. I want to see our waste lands occupied: but to this end we can only successfully succeed by getting out of debt and greatly reducing the cost of governing the country. These considerations clearly show that financial and fiscal reforms are the necessities of the hour.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT: It is with some regret that I cast myself on the indulgence of the House at this late hour, but I think that the hon. Finance Minister would feel himself slighted if I paid no attention to his address before the close of this debate. He was good enough to express regret that I was not present when, a few nights ago, he devoted himself at some length to a review of my remarks. He could not have regretted my absence more than I did myself. But, if he had been specially desirous of making those observations in my presence, he could have taken up the Estimates, and deferred this discussion. It is pleasant for me to know, however, that in my case the lines applied—

“Though lost to sight,
To memory dear.”

And, though not here in person, the hon. gentleman took occasion to review everything I said tolerably exhaustively. It would be very difficult to form a correct opinion of all he did say from the reports I have seen, as many links of his argument seem to have been omitted. I, therefore, shall confine myself rather to dealing with two or three prominent assertions which I judge, from the context, he must have made, than attempt to follow him in minute detail through all the complicated figures he addressed to the House. If I understand correctly his remarks—and, if not, I shall be obliged for correction—he took four positions. First, he declared that the portion of the expenditure which he estimates will be required for 1880-1, for which he is properly responsible, is less than that of any year since 1873, and especially is less than the portion of expenditure for 1875-6, for which we, or the late Government, were responsible. Is that a correct statement of the hon. gentleman's remarks?

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: Yes, taking into account the additions necessary, the increase of the interest on the Debt and Sinking Fund, and the extra Subsidies paid. These three items, with the expenditure on the Pacific and Intercolonial Railways, and the Prince Edward Island Railway—expenditures in 1873-4—and the proportion expended subsequently, if deducted, showed a smaller Estimate for 1881 than was spent since 1873-4.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT: That was what I understood the hon. gentleman stated—that the estimate of the expenditure, for which he holds himself responsible, now represents a smaller sum than has been expended since 1873. Next, he committed himself to the proposition that the increase of $11,000,000 in the expenditure since Confederation is easily accounted for, and that the present Government, including himself as Finance Minister, are nowise blameworthy for that great increase.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY : I spoke of the increase of the debt. I spoke of 1873, when I said that the estimated expenditure for the future was $60,000,000 : $10,000,000 for the Intercolonial, $10,000,000 for the Canals, $10,000,000 for other Public Works, and $30,000,000 for the Pacific Railway ; and I said that hon. gentlemen opposite had increased that amount by $55,000,000 between 1873-4 and the end of last year.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT : The hon. gentleman does not comprehend my position. I referred to the annual increase since 1868. There has been an increase since Confederation of $11,000,000—from an annual expenditure of $13,500,000 to $24,500,000 ; for that the Finance Minister explicitly denied responsibility, and the context, in the report, shows this representation of his remarks is correct—he claimed that he and the Government were not blameable in the matter.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY : I did not say who were blameable or unblameable. I said it was very much to be regretted that the hon. gentleman was not in his place ; it is exceedingly difficult for him to understand my meaning from brief reports. What I said was this : It having been stated the expenditure increased from $13,500,000 in 1867 to $24,000,000 in 1878-9, I proceeded to explain this increase and how far the expenditures were absolutely necessary, or many of them, while there might be some question as to others. The necessary outlays were for engagements under Confederation.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT : What I had said was, that I believed and yet believe, that the hon. the Finance Minister and colleagues were blameable to an enormous extent for the addition of $10,000,000 or $11,000,000 since Confederation. The hon. gentleman has been merely quibbling in this matter.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY : I call the hon. gentleman to order ; there has been no quibbling in my explanations.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT

I see the hon. gentleman repeated his previous statement, that the late Government were largely responsible for heavy additions to the country's engagements. I give that statement a most explicit denial, and shall prove the contrary. He assumed the late Government were responsible for the expenditure of 1874-5, and in so doing ignored three most material facts :—First, that a large portion of this expenditure was caused by the enormous additional interest incurred for works undertaken by the Government that preceded ours, of which the present hon. Finance Minister was a member ; next, that when we took office, we found the whole of the Government Railways in the Maritime Provinces, had been so mismanaged—had run down to such an extent—that during the whole term of the Mackenzie Government, a large sum was required annually to put them in a proper condition ; and hon. gentlemen who remember the extraordinary revelations made of the corruption and malfeasance which distinguished the Administration which preceded ours—who recollect the evidence in the case of the Crown vs. Howes, a brother-in-law of a member of that Government ; and the facts in the case of Fraser, Reynolds and Company, will be at no loss to understand how those railroads had deteriorated, and why the Mackenzie Government had to expend $300,000 to $400,000 a year, for several years, to put them in a barely decent condition. Last of all the hon. gentleman ignored or forgot that, during 1875, 1876 and 1877, an enormous annual expenditure had to be incurred for the completion of that vast mass of Minor Public Works, chargeable to Income, which the present Finance Minister and colleagues had most improperly, most foolishly, most extravagantly, inflicted on the country at a time when the commonest perception of the position of the country should have forbidden them to go out of office leaving a single one of those obligations undischarged. The hon. gentleman is reported to have said that, if you deduct those items of expenditure which he mentioned, and compare the remainder of the expenditure for 1881 with that for 1874-5, there is a balance of $700,000 in his favour. Now, of the outlay for 1874-5, $1,116,000 was incurred for Minor Public Works which had been put under contract in the time of the Government to which hon. gentleman belonged; deduct this and you convert his imaginary surplus of $700,000 into a real deficit of $416,000, for 1881, as compared with 1874-5. In 1876, a further sum of $1,106,787 was required to complete this enormous mass of Public Works, which should be deducted from the ordinary annual expenditure by us, for that year. Nor was it till 1877 that we finally got rid of this branch of expenditure, at a further cost of $587,000, for works which the hon. gentleman and his colleagues left us as a legacy. This is of moment, because some attention, in the House and elsewhere, has been attracted by the fact that, during 1875 and 1876, our expenditure was larger than that of our last two years. The reason is this: When we entered office, we found the late Government had left behind them an indebtedness in Public Works, chargeable to Income, over and above the whole expenditure of 1874, amounting to the sum of $2,810,000, which we had to meet, for works properly chargeable to them, put under contract by them—and this in addition to the ordinary expenses of the Government for 1875, 1876, 1877. I may add, that it was largely owing to that error of judgment that there were deficits to any considerable extent during the years 1876 and 1877. Now I come to my second proposition, which is, that these hon. gentlemen, and particularly the hon. the Minister of Finance, were largely blameable, because the expenditure of this country, under their Administration, rose, in the space of something like six years, from $13,500,000 to nearly $23,500,000, being an addition of nearly $10,000,000 a year to our annual expenditure. That hon. gentleman, as his own Budget Speech in 1873 shows, left behind him a great mass of engagements amounting, according to his own statement, to $60,000,000 to be added to our Capital Account, involving an addition for interest alone, according to his own statement in that same speech, of $3,367,000, wholly independent of a great variety of other expenditures for which he and he only was responsible. Now, I will take a very simple test for showing how the difference between the expenditure of 1873 and the estimated expenditure for 1881 is made up. I will call the attention of the House to the items which compose that difference; I will show the House when and by whom these were incurred, and I will leave it then to the House to say whether or not I am correct in saying that the added expenditure was mainly the hon. gentleman's, and that a very large part of it was unnecessary and blameworthy. Our annual expenditure in 1873 amounted, in round numbers, to $19,174,000. For 1881, the hon. gentleman estimates, according to his first estimate, which I will take on the present occasion, the sum of $25,070,000, leaving out, however, a sum of $300,000 which he charges, in my judgment, improperly to Capital Account, which, if included, would make $25,300,000. First, I will take the difference between his annual expenditure in 1873, and his estimated expenditure in 1881, which is $5,832,000. That difference is made up in the first place by the difference between the interest on the Sinking Fund of $3,265,000, by a difference on the expenditure for the Indians of $586,000; for Mounted Police, $290,000; for Provincial Debt and Subsidies, $820,000; cost of the admission of Prince Edward Island, $820,000; cost of certain increases in the Post Office Department, $300,000; cost of certain Statutory increases, $358,000; and the difference between the sum then demanded or spent, and the sum now demanded for the Civil Service of $150,000, which sums, together, make up a total of $6,931,000. Now, I ask by whom were these expenditures incurred, and when were they incurred? Without one exception the sum required for Interest and Sinking Fund, was caused by the necessity laid upon the late Government of providing funds for carrying out the engagements to which that hon. gentleman himself, and his colleagues had committed this country, irremediably before we came into office. It was caused in the second place by the necessity of providing for the extinguishment of the Indian title and the maintenance of the Mounted Police which was created by that hon. gentleman, by Statute passed in 1873, to which force we did not add, to the best of my recollection, one single man or one single officer more than were provided for by the Order in Council, passed by the hon. gentleman's colleagues before they went out of office.

Not even himself will deny that he, and he alone, is responsible for the assumption of the Provincial Debts, and for the Terms on which Prince Edward Island was admitted into the Union. Nor can he deny that he is responsible for the additional expenditure required for the maintenance of our railway system. Now, I state that for several of these things which I will more particularly enumerate a little later on, I hold the hon. gentleman himself, in a very special sense responsible, because he was Finance Minister at the time they were incurred, and, because, had he exercised common prudence there would not have been the slightest occasion for the difficulties with which I had to contend, and with which he has to contend himself to-day. But I pause to notice one argument used either by himself or by some of his friends, with respect to the assumption of the Provincial Debt. That hon. gentleman, or his friends, have stated in this House that they do not consider that the measure which added $800,000 in all to the annual expenditure of the Dominion of Canada, and for which we have to raise taxes from the people of Canada, to levy new burdens on the people, because, forsooth, the Local Governments get the benefit of it. I say that that argument is doubly fallacious. I say, in the first place, that the Dominion of Canada has to put additional taxes on the people to supply that $820,000. I say, in the next place, that, so far as the Local Governments were concerned, so far from being of the least advantage to them, it was the greatest injury that any statesman could have done them, because it offered a premium on their extravagance. I say that the Province of Quebec, and all the other Provinces, would have been far richer to-day had the hon. gentleman refused to grant their petition. I say that had he had the manhood, and the honesty, to tell them that they must provide, out of their own funds, for their necessities, instead of allowing them to put their hands into the Dominion Treasury, they would not now have found themselves in the difficulties into which their own folly has plunged them. Now, I deal with the other ascertainment that the late Government were responsible for a large part of the present engagements of this country. I take issue with that statement altogether. I say that as regards Canals, my hon. friend did not expend one-farthing on one single canal to which the previous Government did not commit the country, and for which they had not previously taken votes as the Estimates I have here show. I say that as regards Railways, there is but one small grant, a grant of one and a-half million of dollars made to the Canada Central Railway, for which my hon. friend's Administration can be held responsible, in any manner or shape, and I say that there never was a greater absurdity, a more palpable evasion of responsibility, than to attempt to saddle hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, with one farthing of the expenditure for the Pacific Railway itself. What do these hon. gentlemen tell us? That they, in 1871, made an insane and foolish bargain with the people of British Columbia, a bargain so absurd, that when I was in London, in 1874, I was asked by English officials of high rank were the people of Canada mad to enter into such an engagement. I say that these gentlemen, of all other men, should be the last to attempt to throw the slightest responsibility on the gentleman on this side of the House, and particularly on the men who composed the late Administration; because, when they had committed Canada to the absurd engagement to build a railway of 3,000 miles in length over a totally unknown and unexplored country in ten years, when we doubled the time in which that obligation was to be discharged, when we reduced its length by one-third, now we are told that we are responsible for the Pacific Railway. It may well be—I fear it is the case—that not merely the original bargain, but even the modified terms which we obtained, may prove to be impossible of execution by the people of Canada; but on that point I refrain from offering further observations, because, within a few days that subject is to be discussed at length, and I intend then to give the House my reasons for believing that it will be an act of unpardonable folly for us in the present position of Canada to proceed to expend ten, fifteen, or twenty millions in constructing a line which can be of no possible use until the main line is taken across the continent. But I can say, for my own part, that when I was Finance Minister I lost no opportunity, in my place in the House, of warning the people of British Columbia that they must distinctly understand that, although we would do what we could to redeem the pledge which Canada had given, still that that promise was necessarily to be bounded by the ability of the people of Canada to redeem it without inflicting—for the sake of benefitting some 14,000 people—unendurable taxation on 4,000,000 of people on this side of the Rocky Mountains. Now, a word or two to say as to the extent of the burdens which that hon. gentleman had placed on people of Canada in the year 1873. His own estimate, as the House knows, is some $60,000,000. That estimate, I regret to say, was far below what I subsequently discovered to be the true state of the case when, with the aid of my hon. friend from Lambton, I began, in 1874, and also in 1875, carefully to investigate the full extent of the obligations which that hon. gentleman had made. I found that far from $60,000,000 being sufficient to carry out the engagement he had made, we would have required an expenditure of $96,000,000. I found the canals which the Government of that day had undertaken to construct, were they constructed on the scales and grading of the plans which they had advised, would have required some $43,000,000 in all. For the Intercolonial Railway, $10,000,000. For the Pacific, $30,000,000. Besides that, they had left us the necessity of putting the Nova Scotia and New Brunswick Railways in repair at a cost of $2,000,000, and we had to expend $2,500,000 for the Prince Edward Island Railway. They had left behind them a whole mass of minor public works, amounting to $4,500,000 in all. We were obliged to make certain improvements on the St. Lawrence, amounting to $2,500,000 to which they committed us. Now, I do not pretend to say all those undertakings were in themselves bad. I have never said that, but I do pretend to say this, that it was the height of imprudence at a time when such enormous engagements were being undertaken to select that particular period to make these enormous additions to the Annual Expenditure of Canada which that hon. gentleman chose to incur at that particular period. I say that the

hon. the Finance Minister was specially blameworthy in these four points; first of all, I say, the terms on which he negotiated the admission of Prince Edward Island into the Union, involved an absolute charge over and above all the amounts that we now receive, or can for many years receive, from Prince Edward Island of at least $400,000 per year. I say that by the assumption of the debts and the subsidy of New Brunswick, a further addition of nearly $820,000 was made; that by the Statutory increase proposed and carried through by him, an addition of at least $300,000 a year was made to our Annual Expenditure. Now, if you add these sums together, you will find that at the moment that—according to his own statement—he knew that he was incurring an expenditure for Capital Account of at least $60,000,000, which would add $3,250,000 to our annual charge for Interest, he chose deliberately to select that period to increase our Annual Expenditure by a million and a-half, and to leave behind a legacy of Minor Public Works, involving an expenditure of three or four millions more. Seven years have elapsed between 1873 and 1880, and during all which time we have spent $1,500,000 every year for these four items above, and you will, therefore, see that I am well within the mark in saying that these special expenditures for which the hon. gentleman was responsible, fully represent an annual charge upon us of two million dollars per year, in other words, are fully equal to the whole of the largest deficit which Canada has had to meet since Confederation. Now, as to the Tariff, there is one point which I desire specially to deal with. As I said, the hon. gentleman or his supporters, insist that there has been no serious increase in [the taxation of the people of Canada since Confederation. Now, in the first place, this assumption entirely ignores one of the most material points. Those hon. gentleman have not yet grasped the full meaning of their own Protective Tariff. They must remember that of the taxation they have lately imposed, a large amount will not come into the Treasury at all, but, Sir, it will come out of the pockets of the people of Canada. However, deducting that for arguments sake, taking them even on their own showing, we find that according to the statement which the reporters put into the mouth of the hon. gentleman, our taxation, per capita, amounted to about $3.50 in 1873, and that it now amounts to at least $4.50. If the Revenue which we hoped to attain from the new taxation was attained, it would amount next year to fully $5 per head, in other words, our total taxation—if the hon. gentleman got his expected revenue—would have increased by fully one-third from the figure at which it stood in 1868. The hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Anglin), informed me that he heard nothing whatever, during the speech of the hon. gentleman, as to the calculations on which he had based the expectation that our Revenue was about to be largely increased within the current three or four months. I have looked over the arguments advanced as to the expected increase of Revenue as detailed by the hon. member in his Budget Speech. I found that the hon. gentleman declared that he had good ground for expecting that the Revenue will fully equal his expectations, because, up to the 1st March, 1880, that was to say, during the month of January and February of that year, the Revenue had increased about $200,000 per month beyond the figure in the corresponding period up to 1st March, 1880. But in making that calculation, the hon. gentleman has not chosen to tell the House that, whereas the total Revenue, according to the published statement in the Gazette, up to 1st March, 1880, was just barely $14,000,000; the Revenue up to the corresponding period, 1st March, 1878, was $1,000,000 more, having amounted to $15,003,000. It was tolerably clear that, if the hon. gentleman was correct in expecting an increase of Revenue at the rate of $200,000 per month, in 1880 over the amount that had been received in 1878, the total result for the following four months would be that we would barely equal the Revenue obtained in 1878, inasmuch as he had still to make up a million, being the difference between the actual receipts to the 1st March, 1880, and the 1st March, 1878. But I observed in a statement which the hon. gentleman has furnished to the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr Anglin), that the increase for Customs

Revenue for the month of March just past, appeared to have been about $212,000, which certainly did not indicate up to the present any very great ground for expecting that our total receipts for the current year would be larger than those for 1878, or those for the year that has just passed. I had not observed that the hon. gentleman or any of his friends had attempted to deal with the important question as to the real incidence of taxation on the great bulk of the working classes of this country; and I take this opportunity of saying that, the calculations I had submitted a few weeks ago were based on an actual analysis showing the actual number of pounds of sugar, and pounds of tea, and barrels of flour, the actual amount of money expended in dry goods and clothes by the several persons whose accounts I had caused to be examined with a view to ascertain what was the true incidence of taxation on the working classes of this country. Nor has the hon. the Finance Minister or any of his friends attempted to answer the challenge I then gave, to name throughout the whole of Ontario, so much as twelve factories employing 100 hands or over, which had sprung into existence since January 1st, 1879. I expressly stated then, that, with the exception of the sugar refineries and the cotton manufactories, I had been totally unable to discover even a dozen factories throughout the Dominion, not to speak of Ontario, employing that number of hands. No hon. gentleman on the other side, so far as I have heard or read, and none of their newspapers have attempted to produce any evidence, that I was incorrect in my statement that with the exception of these two classes of manufacturers, the National Policy so called, has, up to the present time, utterly and absolutely failed to give employment to any considerable number of persons in this country. Instead of giving us the proofs and telling us where the factories were situated, and how many hands they employed, they give nothing but vague and wild assertions that 4,000 or 5,000 hands are employed in Montreal, that 10,000 additional men are employed under the policy, or as the hon. the Minister of Railways (Sir Charles Tupper) has it, that hundreds of thousands of people have been employed since the policy came into operation. I would now glance at another argument advanced by hon. gentlemen opposite—the argument that he brought forward as to the extent of Revenue anticipated last year. It is remarkable that if the Revenue, as the Finance Minister stated, had been anticipated in so great a degree, that, according to his own Trade and Navigation Returns, the total imports for the year 1879 should be fully $11,000,000 less than those of 1878, and that whereas, in 1878 we had imported $91,190,000 worth of goods, in 1879, according to the trade returns, the amount was only $80,341,000, while if we take the articles of cotton and woollen goods and hardware which, as every hon. gentleman knows, formed the great bulk of our duty-paying imports, they found that whereas, in 1878 we had imported $22,577,000 worth, in 1879 we had imported barely $19,774,000 worth. These facts show conclusively that the hon. gentleman was wrong in supposing that there was any great anticipation. He sheltered himself, it is true, under the statement I made in 1874, that there was then a very considerable anticipation and over exportation; but the hon. gentleman totally forgot this important fact, that he had practically four months before the termination of the year, whereas in 1874 I had only two months and a half, and the further fact that the total volume of imports in 1874 was enormously in excess of the volume in 1879. Making allowance for the much greater length of time in one case, and for the much greater volume of goods imported at that time, it evidently appears that the hon. gentleman is wrong in supposing there was any great anticipation. In truth, in view of the Trade and Navigation Returns, I very much doubt if there has been any actual anticipation at all affecting 1879-80. But I would like to know on what the hon. gentleman bases his hope of increased Revenue. Was it on increased imports? Why, the policy he has deliberately adopted was devised for the very purpose of stopping this horrible influx of imports into this country, and to give our people the opportunity of manufacturing these goods. Now, he tells us that the imports will increase, but he must make his election. If the imports increase we could not give increased employment to our people in new factories. I do not contend, and I have never contended, that the hon. gentleman would necessarily fail to obtain increased Revenue by the enormous taxation he has imposed. I simply claimed that he could not do both. He could not at once receive increased imports, and at the same time give the people increased employment. I dared to say that the hon. gentleman would fail in both. Both the hon. gentleman and his colleague, the hon. the Minister of Railways have made a very severe attack on me on the ground of the over estimates which, at various times, I have submitted to the House. I would like to know if the hon. gentlemen or their followers had any clear idea of the circumstances under which every Finance Minister must bring down his Estimates. These Estimates as submitted necessarily cover a period nearly eighteen months in advance of the date at which they are brought down. No Canadian Finance Minister could pretend to say more than this—that if the condition of things which at the time existed was not materially changed, if there was no great commercial revulsion, if there was no great alteration in values, the Estimates were reasonably likely to be fulfilled. Let them consider how far the late Government and myself, as Finance Minister, were blameworthy for the difference which undoubtedly did exist between the Estimates submitted by me as Minister in 1875, and the receipts realised in 1876, or as regards those of 1877 and 1878. There were some circumstances under which I frankly admit that the Minister of the day might be blameable for such a failure in his calculations. For instance, he would be wrong if he undertook to estimate for a sum largely in excess of the sum received up to the same date in the previous year, unless he had good ground for knowing that there would be a great increase in the trade of the country. But I think no man of good sense will say that the hon. the Finance Minister would be to blame because he could not see eighteen months ahead that there would suddenly arise a state of commercial depression extending over the whole world, that it would be of unexampled duration, and that it would be accompanied with the greatest shrinkage of values, known within the memory of man.

Mr. LANDRY: Hear, hear.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT: Let me hope that the hon. gentleman will listen earnestly and that he will profit by what I have to say. Few persons, beyond those who have been obliged to examine the matter minutely, are aware of the difference in values which this depression caused. From the work of Mr. Brassey—one of the best authorities on the subject, and from the Economist, a well-known English commercial newspaper—I find that, within the last four or five years, the price of Scotch pig-iron fell from 127 shillings to 43 shillings per ton. Cotton fell from tenpence to fivepence three-farthings per pound, and wool from £21 to £13 per bale. I might go on multiplying such instances indefinitely. Now, in estimating for 1876, I would have been justly censurable, had I estimated largely in advance of what had been received in the previous years, namely, \$15,351,000. But, I was not blameable in February, 1875, for stating that, unless there was some serious commercial revolution, I was likely to obtain a similar Revenue for the succeeding year. From all the circumstances by which one could judge I was perfectly justified in expecting such a revenue. Before the eighteen months the tremendous convulsion I had spoken of took place. But it was well known and has been very fully proved by my hon. friend the then Minister of Customs (Mr. Burnee), that I had made no serious mistake as to the quantities of goods required for consumption in the country. We failed, however, in not being able to estimate, so far ahead, the shrinkage which would take place in the value of the goods imported. We had, in fact, been mistaken in common with all the extensive manufacturers and business men, not only in Canada, but in England and the United States as well. Subsequent evidence went to show that the goods made in 1877 were sold for bare cost, and those made in 1878 below the cost of production, and I say again, under such circumstances as these, that the Finance Minister of the day was not responsible, because he could not forecast an unexampled depression, which swept over the whole civilised world. I find that the hon. gentleman, and the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White), contended that no such serious loss had resulted from the operation of the Tariff on sugar, as we alleged. I propose to devote a few moments to the consideration of this point. There are two or three facts which everybody must admit. In the first place, the Minister cannot deny that he has added a very considerable tax to that formerly imposed, nor is he in a position to deny that one result thereof has been to inflict a very heavy loss on the Revenue of this country; so that while the taxes are increased the Revenue has fallen off 25 per cent. from what it was under our comparatively low Tariff. These hon. gentlemen dispute our mode of measuring the loss of the people and the extent of that loss; but the real test of the loss is very simple. What we have to do is to take the average prices—not occasional prices—of sugar, free in bond, in the port of New York; we have then to ascertain the average prices of sugar sold in this country to the grocers. I say that the difference between these two prices gives the exact measure of the tax upon the people of Canada. Now, a large part of this difference does not go into the Treasury, and it must, therefore, be a dead loss to the people of Canada. What is the allegation of the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White), copied by the hon. the Minister of Finance? His statement is that the difference between the prices free in bond, and the prices to the trade, averaged $2\frac{1}{2}$ cents per pound, and he gave certain quotations in the month of November, proving his case to that effect. The allegation of my hon. friend from Kingston, than whom there is not a better authority on the point in all Canada, is that the average difference varies from 3c. to $3\frac{1}{2}$ c., and $3\frac{3}{4}$ c. per pound. In the one case, and giving the hon. member for Cardwell the benefit of his own computation, the loss of the people of Canada is \$750,000 per annum, assuming the consumption to be one hundred and ten million of pounds per annum. In the other case the loss would be one and one-half millions per annum. I propose to take the respective proofs advanced by these two hon. gentlemen. The hon. member for Cardwell took two or three days in the month of November, and shows that the prices in New York were only $2\frac{1}{2}$ c. per pound lower than Redpaths' prices. I take, not one or two of these days, not a casual transaction, but the average of the year; I take the price of the whole of the month of September, and I find that Messrs. Redpaths demanded for granulated sugar \$8.29 per cwt.; while in New York the prices of granulated sugar were from \$5.41 to \$5.85 per cwt., so that this sugar could be bought in New York at from \$3.44 to \$3.88 per cwt. less than Redpaths demanded. In the month of December, the average prices in New York were from \$5.97 to \$7.10 per cwt., while Redpaths' amounted to \$10.12½ per cwt., so that Redpaths' prices in December varied from \$4.15 down to \$3.02½ per cwt. more than New York prices. Now, the fact of the matter is, as my hon. friend from Kingston put it, if you take an isolated transaction, which may or may not have occurred bonâ fide, it is very easy to make a certain market price for a certain occasion. But take the average, as given for a whole period of considerable length, and we find the additional price amounts to from 3¼c. to 3½c. per pound. That is the actual tax upon the people of Canada, which amounts to about \$3,500,000 per annum, while we see, by the Returns on the Table of the House, the total Revenue likely to be received is barely \$2,000,000 per annum, and that is likely to be further reduced when the capacity of the refineries is enlarged. Now, this is a plain statement of fact. In any case, a very few weeks or months will settle the question. The hon. gentleman should be very cautious in assailing the estimates of any man. If the hon. gentleman chooses to look through the several years, beginning with Sir John Rose and Sir Francis Hincks, during the whole of that period scarcely a single estimate was correct; they varied from 37 to 25 per cent. though, of course, in some cases the estimates were in excess, and in others, largely below the actual returns. Now, the hon. gentleman was himself mistaken in 1873; he was mistaken as to amount of taxation necessary to inflict on the people of this country to carry out those great works which we had undertaken; and I may add, to go no further back than last year, we find then he was mistaken seriously, as to the Public Revenue he would derive—as to its probable extent, and as to the time to be allowed for the development of those new industries and factories. Hon. gentlemen on the opposite side have advanced two or three strange arguments: One says, that the National Policy cannot advance, because the Opposition will not help that policy forward—that is an extraordinary reason to advance. How are the mighty fallen! They cannot make that ricketty infant walk, unless we guide with leading strings. There is this one grain of truth in that—they know that, although few in number, we represent a very strong and powerful body in this country; and, since the result of the Ontario elections, they are not quite certain that this minority does not represent the true feelings of the Dominion, as they certainly have been shown by those elections to represent these of Ontario. As to our prospects for the future, like hon. gentlemen on the other side, I am inclined to believe that they really did centre to a great extent on our policy in settling and developing the North-West, but the possibility of their doing any good for ourselves was being doubly menaced by the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite. Now, in the first place, there is very great danger that, if the proposition now before the House become law, the funds which are absolutely necessary to develop that country may be uselessly and fruitlessly diverted to an expenditure in British Columbia. In the second place, because the National Policy is specially mischievous because it has added enormously to the expenditure of every settler going into that country, because there—where it is to the last degree important that the hardy pioneers who are going to the North-West should be allowed to purchase those articles they require in the cheapest market which the necessities of the Revenue will allow—they find themselves hampered at every turn in every single thing they have to buy by the vexatious and unreasonable impositions which the hon. gentleman has placed upon them. It may be that the great natural advantages of that country will neutralise the evil effects of this policy to some extent. As to hon. gentlemen on this side, they are anxious and desirous to do all they can to forward the development of the North-West. At a time of great difficulty and depression my hon. friend the member for Lambton, in the teeth of considerable opposition, pushed forward, to the utmost of his power, a plan for opening up and developing that great territory. We are disposed to adhere to that policy, and we will do all we can to aid those hon. gentlemen. But I repeat that all that we can do on both sides of the House will be little compared with the evil effects of this fiscal policy on every settler in that country. I understood that the hon. the Minister of Railways had specially desired to be present during these remarks. I do not see him in his place in the House, and I would be glad to know if he has retired.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: He has.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT: In that case I will say little as to two or three matters to which I intended to allude. As the hon. the Minister of Railways is absent, I will merely take this opportunity of here publicly giving a contradiction to a certain injurious statement affecting myself which that hon. gentleman had been ill-advised enough to make. His line of argument was peculiar. When I charged that the Tariff was unjust to the workingmen, the hon. the Minister of Railways had replied that I was jealous of the appointment of Sir Francis Hicks, ten years ago, to the office of Minister of Finance. When I charged that the Estimates were extravagant, the hon. gentleman had replied that I was a renegade Tory. When I charged that the sugar duty was an imposition, the hon. gentleman was pleased to say that I had hidden my head in my hat as an ostrich did in the sand. That might be correct, but I fail to see what particular connection it has with the argument. I have to say this, however, that, as the hon. gentleman is not in his place, I will take the opportunity when he is in the House of explaining who the renegades were. For the present I will content myself with simply disproving the assertion he was foolish enough to make as to the reasons why I had withdrawn my support, in 1869, from the former Administration of the present First Minister. The hon. the Minister of Railways has stated, in express terms, that I had stated on the floor of the House that I objected to Sir Francis Hincks' introduction to the Cabinet, because I expected to fill his place. Now, for this assertion, there was not the very slightest foundation. I have this to say, that, in 1870, at the first opportunity I had after the introduction of Sir Francis Hincks, I had risen in my place and made a statement, withdrawing all connection with hon. gentlemen opposite. The reasons I gave for so withdrawing were two. First of all, I said that, in my judgment, the antecedents of Sir Francis Hincks were such as to disqualify him from again becoming a Canadian Minister; and secondly, that I could not recognise that gentleman as a representative of the Reform party; and when I made that statement the present First Minister sat in the seat now occupied by the Minister of Public Works. He heard the statement, and he did not dare to deny it, and I say here—because I have a right to hold him responsible for the language of his colleague—that the reason he did not dare to deny that statement was that he held then and holds now the hon. gentleman's own letter, a letter of six pages, filled from first to last with one long argument to prove that he was mistaken in thinking that Sir Francis Hincks would not obtain the support and confidence of the Reform party. I challenge the hon. Minister and his colleague to dispute these statements, as I am prepared, by the most indubitable evidence, to prove their correctness. I regret that the hon. the Minister of Railways is not in his place, as I wished to refer to some personal remarks made by that hon. gentleman regarding myself. As it is, and having regard to the lateness of the hour and the extreme weariness of the House, I will postpone what I have to say on that subject to another and more fitting opportunity.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: When addressing the House, a few days since, the hon. member who has just resumed his seat was not present, and I now desire to make some reference to what I consider an unfair attack and unjustifiable insinuations that he made with reference to myself. That hon. gentleman was reprov'd or rebuked promptly by my colleague, and therefore I might be satisfied, perhaps, with what was said by him; but at the same time I feel bound to say that, if the hon. gentleman had attained a position in this country as a statesman, that would warrant or justify him, in the opinion of the House and the country, to speak in the sneering terms he did; and if I had failed as complete in everything I had attempted in my life as the hon. gentleman has, I might have submitted to his remarks with patience, and accepted the castigation he undertook to give me. But if my hon. colleague's reproof had been less complete, I would have had sufficient satisfaction in what took place on that occasion. On my first visit to Montreal, after accepting my present position, I remember meeting a gentleman of the same shade of politics as the hon. gentleman opposite, and he declared, in the most emphatic terms, that the defeat of the late Administration on 17th September, 1878, was mainly attributable to the hon. member for Centre Huron (Sir Richard J. Cartwright). The same statement was frequently made to me in Ontario. I do not think that, under the circumstances, it is wise on the part of any hon. members on this side of the House to speak of that hon. gentleman as being a renegade Tory, because I have been told that the strength of this Government today, in a great measure, arises from the fact that that hon. gentleman looked forward to being again the Finance Minister, in case his party should be successful. My satisfaction the other night was, in knowing that, when the hon. the Finance Minister of Railways was replying to the hon. gentleman, and using, in many cases, very strong language, censuring and reflecting on him, there was as much satisfaction on the other side of the House as there was on this. I should not wonder, however, if the hon. gentlemen who cheered the hon. Minister, should rise and censure him and myself, in order to put themselves right on this matter. If the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard J. Cartwright), had been present when I made my last address, he would not have made some of the statements that he has made to-night. In that speech, I endeavoured to avoid bringing in anything of party or personal matters. I entered upon the discussion with two special objects in view. There is a very general impression in the country, that the increase of our expenditure from 1867 to the end of last year has been very large, and I took the statement from the Public Accounts to show that the taxation in 1867 and 1868 was $3.50 per head, and when we took into account the increased population and the admission of several of the Provinces into the Dominion, it had only increased by one dollar per head. I made this statement without reference to one party or the other. In fact, I defended both Governments with reference to it. I showed that the expenditure in regard to the maintenance of the Intercolonial had resulted in loss in working that road, but I do not reflect upon one Government more than another in reference to that deficit, but I wanted to show it to the House and the country for the purpose of removing the erroneous impression that the taxation had been unnecessarily increased. I went on to show just how that increase had taken place and the items of expenditure constituting them. It was scarcely necessary to do this in the House, because hon. members were acquainted with the facts, but I think it was necessary that the country should have correct information regarding the increase that had taken place in the expenditure from $13,000,000 to $24,000,000. I went on to show as well how the debt had been increased, and stated that $14,000,000 of that was caused by the assumption of the debts of the Provinces, and afterwards to show that the additional $14,000,000 of what had already been expended on the Intercolonial Railway was caused by circumstances over which neither Government had control. I did not enter into the consideration as to who were responsible for that expenditure, but I discussed the matter in general terms. In 1871, when we took up the consideration of the question of the canals, it was considered judicious to appoint a Commission to ascertain which canals should be constructed to complete the Canadian system, and that Commission reported a system which would cost, when completed, $20,000,000. Some of the tenders for these Canals had been asked for before the Government of 1873 had resigned, but the hon. gentlemen opposite did not accept those tenders. They called for others. We were warned then by some hon. gentlemen opposite that we were entering upon large and dangerous expenditures, which should not be entered upon at that time. We had a large surplus at the time, and, as demands came in for those works, we went on to construct them, because they were desirable and necessary. If, as I said at the time, we found the Revenue fell off, that was one of the items of expenditure we could decrease. What did the hon. gentlemen do? They came down with an increased taxation of $3,000,000, representing the financial condition of the Dominion as unsatisfactory. The matter was sufficiently in their own hands. We did not bind them to spend $20,000,000 of the amount disbursed. The Intercolonial Railway we were bound to build as part of the Terms of Confederation, but the condition with reference to the canals was that they should be enlarged only so soon as the financial circumstances of the country would justify; and it was quite open to those hon. gentlemen to say that they would defer such expenditure if necessary. But they went on to incur an enormous expenditure and liability, and when their conduct was questioned, they claimed it was influenced by the poverty of the country, asserting that it was a good time to construct those public works, labour being very cheap, not that they were bound to spend that amount within a given period, which they were not. What were our obligations in addition? Thirty millions for the building of the Pacific Railway. I do not pretend to say the hon. gentlemen opposite were answerable for this obligation; or, as I might say, they changed our whole policy for the construction of that Railway by which it was to be built for $30,000,000 and a quantity of public lands. The late Government changed the plan, saying the road should be built as a Government works whatever it might cost. They assumed additional engagements, including $1,500,000 for a branch railroad, and $750,000 in lieu of a railroad on Vancouver Island. I have mentioned these facts to show why it was necessary for us to ask $10,000,000 this year, and $10,000,000 next year, to complete the railroad from Lake Superior to Red River. It was simply for the purpose of leading the House to consider the expenditure for the period from 1867 to the present year, and showing why it was necessary that taxation should be increased, and why, in the interest of the country, we had to ask for $10,000,000 for the Pacific Railway—because the works in progress had to be completed, to make the contracts the hon. gentlemen opposite had entered into available for the opening up and the development of the country. One thing the late Finance Minister cannot forget; in every speech he has delivered since he left office, he has discussed the expenditure of 1873-4. He repeats the same remarks, no matter how often you answer him, and, as history repeats itself, we might in the future recognise him as the historical member of this House. The hon. gentleman's opinions on this subject appear like first impressions, permanent, and ineradicable. He says he was censured by the hon. the Minister of Railways for making erroneous estimates, and he coupled with that hon. gentleman the Finance Minister. Of course the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard J. Cartwright), on assuming office, did not affect the receipts from Customs and Excise for 1873-4, or my Estimates for 1874-5, for which I was responsible; but he changed the whole character of my Estimates, by adding $3,000,000 of taxes; and, therefore, whatever change has taken place with reference to the receipts from Customs and Excise, he cannot hold me responsible. But he says, there were several of my Estimates entirely erroneous, — for instance, $2,250,000 receipts from Public Works, which yielded only $1,500,000. Now, if my memory serves me, and I think I have not forgotten the circumstance, when the Rivière du Loup section of the Intercolonial Railway was opened, it was managed by the Grand Trunk Railway Company, who took the receipts and paid the expenditures, so that they did not appear, in the year previous, in the Accounts. Afterwards, it was thought best to make an Estimate for this road—because it was thought we should work it ourselves, take the receipts, and provide for the expenditure. It was not known then how much of the Intercolonial Railway would be opened, and, therefore, the Estimates of receipts and expenditures for Public Works, including Railways, for 1873-4, were much larger than necessary, as the road continued to be managed by the Grand Trunk Railway; and still the hon. gentleman points to this as one of the cases in which there was great exaggeration in our Estimates of the receipts and expenditure from Public Works.

The late Finance Minister stated to-night that a large portion of the taxes levied by this Government would not be received, and that they would amount to \$7,000,000 or \$8,000,000, while the Treasury would receive but \$2,500,000. The hon. member for St. John (Mr. Burpee) has cited an array of figures to establish the same view. Let us see what the experience of the last six months has been. It shows the increased percentage of duty collected on the imports is $4\frac{1}{4}$, which, applied to \$75,599,992, the value of the imports for consumption last year, would give \$3,212,996 instead of \$7,000,000 or \$8,000,000.

MR. ANGLIN: Where is the sugar money?

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: That total includes everything. The Returns show the increase over the year previous is $4\frac{1}{4}$ per cent., which gives that result; so we expect to receive \$2,400,000 additional duties the present year. As I estimated, the first six months were largely anticipated, by \$500,000 or \$700,000 being collected in February and March last year, which properly belong to this. For January, February and March last we received \$750,000 more than for the same period of 1878, and for the first six months of 1878 the receipts were \$500,000 more than for the same period of 1879. That shows that the Revenue for the six months from the 1st of January to July 1880, will exceed my calculations.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH: Then you will have no deficit?

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: There will be a deficiency, but I want to establish one important point: To-night I have been told that if our policy succeeds, we will obtain no Revenue, and if it does not, we will. I appeal to the House to say whether there has not been a large increase of our manufactures within the last six months. In the face of the fact that there is so much evidence of such an improvement, and that our Revenue for the first three months of this year is $750,000 more from Customs than in January, February and March, 1878, we are told the Tariff is a failure. From the Protection on agricultural implements, for example, as I have already shown, we derive benefit in various ways, when there is increased production; have we

the increased duty on the iron used, and the increased revenue from the consumption of dutiable goods by the increased number of men employed, the number of implements manufactured in one establishment having increased from 1,800 to 4,000. We shall thus have as much Revenue from this source as before, the purchasers and users of those implements getting them at the same price. With reference to sugar, I have already explained that under the new duties a very good grocery sugar, No. 14, the duty is $\frac{1}{2}$ c. per pound less than formerly, and competition in refining is already growing up. With reference to the point made by the hon. member for Westmoreland (Sir Albert J. Smith), what I did say was, that in connection with the sugar trade there would be a direct trade between the Maritime Provinces and the West Indies, which would lead to a larger number of vessels, sailing from St. John and other ports, to engage in that West India trade. I stated that the demand for vessels for the coasting trade of the Maritime Provinces, and the trade between them and the West Indies was certain to secure them higher freights. Rome was not built in a day; and though this policy has been a greater success than we expected, it will yet produce still larger results. Down to the present, all the sugar refining has been done in Montreal, and, therefore, though vessels have returned to Halifax with sugar and been sent sometimes to Montreal, much of the sugar has gone westward by rail; but when there will be sugar refineries at Halifax and Moncton, vessels will come to those ports with their cargoes, which will increase the carrying trade and employ even more than our present large number of vessels. I may repeat that we have been obtaining lately all the sugar between numbers 9 and 14 from $\frac{1}{2}$ to $\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. less duty than before, the Americans being shut out. The hon. member for Centre Huron says that the duty on American sugar is enormous; practically exclusive. Just so long as they give a bounty on that sugar beyond the duty on the raw, we shall maintain our present duties; but the moment that bounty is swept away our markets will be opened to them. Our duty is intended to meet that bounty in excess of the duty on the raw material. We have all the competition of refiners in Great Britain in this sugar refinery business, with its cheaper labor, and more abundant and cheap capital; and, suppose it be true that the refineries now charge more than is reasonable for their sugar, we shall ere long, have two, three or more refineries, creating sharp competition, and securing, like the competition in the cotton and woollen trades, sales at as low prices as possible, no matter what the protection may be. I took the liberty a few days since of calling attention to the fact that the hon. member for Centre Huron, had referred to Sir Alexander Galt, stating that when I was in Washington, he was there; when I floated the last loan in London, he was there. When the last loan was floated, Sir A. T. Galt was in Canada. When I was in Washington, he was not there. He was in New York, and I did not know that he was there.

MR. ANGLIN: Does the hon. gentleman mean to say he did not see nor meet him there?

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: I did not meet him there, nor did I know he was in New York at that time, until I met him in Montreal three or four weeks afterwards. Some hon. gentlemen said he had something to do with framing the Tariff. I state now, what I have not stated before, that he had nothing to do with it. He was in England when it was being prepared; that he never saw or knew one of its provisions until he came here a few days after he arrived from England. We had an interview with respect to the wine duty, which was left an open question, until I could learn from him the result of his communications with the authorities in France and Spain, with reference to that question. We discussed that and the duty was arranged. At that time he asked me my provisions with reference to certain articles, and I am not quite sure he agreed with me on those points. But I assert that, with the exception of the wine question, no communication, direct or indirect, passed between us with reference to the preparation of this Tariff. It is a part of the policy of the Opposition to reproach me with having been guided by that gentleman in the preparation of this Tariff. I do not object to it, because, as I said the other day, I feel honoured by the fact that anything I had to do in the preparation of this measure should be accounted worthy to emanate from so great a statesman. Ever since I submitted these resolutions to this House, a year ago, ever since this Tariff has been shown to be a success, and especially since I visited the manufacturers throughout the Dominion, there have been sneers and insinuations against me, everything that could be said or written, and somethings that ought not to be said, have been uttered in an endeavour to weaken my influence and disparage me in reference to this matter. I have not said this before but I say it now. I care not what they may say in this respect. I do not claim any patent for this Tariff. I said at the outset that my colleagues and myself would be glad to receive information from anyone, no matter what party he belonged to, or what interest he represented; because we did not claim, although my predecessor is said to have claimed it for himself, that we knew everything and no one else knew anything. Then something has been said, to-night, about emigrants and about workmen. The hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Anglin) has delivered a very long speech here to-day, and I will venture to say that in the history of this country you will find a speech, four hours in length, delivered by no public man that contains so much that is disparaging to the character and credit of the country. From beginning to end it was a picture of suffering, poverty, wretchedness and wrong.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH: Something was said about the "hum."

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: The great trouble is that there is too much of the "hum." It has been said by the hon. gentleman opposite that I was not a prophet.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH: I said you were a prophet, but a false one.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: Well, I can take that from my hon. friend, but I will ask the House if the question of the success of the National Policy depended upon his statement or my statement, what the verdict would be? If there can be nothing more said against it than has been said by the hon. member for Westmoreland, then the matter is settled. The hon. member for Yarmouth (Mr. Killam) called attention to the great boon that was to be given to the shipping interest, and the hon. member for Gloucester said: That not one vessel was building at St. John last autumn. I can inform him that a good many vessels are on the stocks there now. We did not expect this National Policy was going to lead to the construction of a large number of ships all at once. It has been alleged that the policy of the Government has had the effect of taxing ships instead of relieving them. I hold in my hand the claims that were made down to the middle of March from the owners and builders of vessels, and the sums that were paid. I think the hon. member for Yarmouth stated we only allowed return duties on iron, copper, paints, canvass, lead and other materials entering into the construction of the hull of the ship. Cordage was not included, because the duty was increased from 5 to 10 per cent. The late Minister of Customs made a reference to the ship-builders of St. John. But what did they claim? They claimed that even the furniture of the ship, that is, all articles that do not enter into the hull of the vessel, should be relieved from taxation and from duty. That was not done before. I answered them that the object of Parliament was this: That if the ship was to be rigged and sold by a builder, everything that entered into the construction of the hull should be entitled to a drawback of the amount of duty paid. For instance, they calculated a duty on the iron tanks, built for holding water, for the caboose, the furniture, and for many other articles, none of which were imported, but all of which were made in that city. The list of claims I hold in my hand, covers all that enters into the construction of the hull of the ship, or the ship delivered at the wharf. The following is the list of claims:—

Tons.	Am't Claimed.	Am't Paid.
627.....	319.....	291
1,223.....	553.....	349
1,182.....	147.....	147
680.....	340.....	340
1,070.....	546.....	540
1,500.....	884.....	750
998.....	173.....	173
144.....	45.....	45
1,045.....	154.....	154
1,661.....	177.....	177
1,281.....	258.....	248

The total amount of claims were $4,360, and the amount returned was $3,705; that includes everything except cordage. I have before me an extract from a speech, made by a gentleman in another place, who is largely engaged in shipbuilding. He says: He has built one or more vessels every year, for several years, and he is prepared to establish, that the refund paid by Government places the builder of ships in a better position than they were under the old Tariff. That hon. gentleman is Senator McClellan. It is not necessary to enlarge upon this subject; I could understand hon. gentlemen's criticisms if we were on the eve of a General Election and expected to produce some effect on the electors by their statements here. But judging from the entire confidence manifested, so far, by the people in this policy, if a General Election did take place, it would result disastrously to hon. gentlemen opposite. Experience will still further vindicate our policy and will give us increased Revenue and increased population. The large emigration it has been alleged as taking place, is in a great part only apparent, 20,000 of those alleged as leaving Canada are emigrants from the Old Country passing through Canada to the Western States. The hon. member for Gloucester states that a manufacturer told me that if he did not increase the wages of his workmen they would leave for the United States, as a proof that better wages were paid in that country. That is one case, but there are many other cases where an increase of wages has taken place, because it was promised as soon as the business of the country would warrant it. The hon. gentleman stated there was last autumn a reduction made in the wages paid in the woollen mills at Almonte. The products of woollen mills last spring were sold at a lower figure than was ever known in Canada, and it was only in September last, after having disposed of their surplus stock, that they put on the full number of their employes, and were in a position to grant an increase of wages. We have been told that a large house in Montreal has not done as large a business since 1874, as at this time. They are working night and day, and you may go throughout the length and breadth of the country, and wherever you go you will find this increased business. We have no doubt that the Revenue will be increased, and we feel perfectly satisfied, with reference to this policy, that it will be politically, as well as generally, successful.

Mr. BURPEE (St. John) : I wish to make an explanation. I wish to point out that the percentage of taxation on the total imports of 1878 was $19\frac{3}{4}$ per cent., while the returns for the first six months of the present fiscal year indicated that it would be $19\frac{5}{8}$ per cent. These figures show that there was a difference in the taxation of the two years of \$6,500,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE : The hon. gentleman said, in reply to an hon. gentleman on this side of the House, that he made no party speech the other night, nor any attempt to influence the House or the country in favour of the present Administration, farther, than merely to state a series of facts. I take exception to that; the hon. gentleman went on to contrast the year 1873-4 with the year 1880-1, and in his calculations in that respect, I maintain he was entirely astray, and very unfair. Anyone can see, by applying his own figures to other years, how inaccurate he was, and how unfair was his comparison. The hon. gentleman says, that hon. members on this side of the House were laughing at the offensive language used towards my hon. friend, beside me, by the hon. gentleman himself and his hon. colleague. If he thinks there is an hon. member on this side of the House, who appreciates the application of such language to the hon. member for Centre Huron, he was never more mistaken in his life. It was also stated that the late hon. Finance Minister had rendered himself unpopular, but his unpopularity, if it existed, was due to his refusal to accede to the demands of avaricious monopolists. It was laid upon him to communicate the decisions of the Government to all such parties. The hon. the Finance Minister said, he did not attach any blame to the late Government, in regard to the engagements in respect to Public Works. In his first speech, however, he conveyed distinctly the impression, that the present Administration was not responsible for the great Public Works that had been carried on during their absence. The hon. gentleman does not seem to know that the Welland Canal was in actual process of construction when he left office. He seems to forget that a very large portion of the Lachine works were done by that time. The lower basins, and the lower locks were far on in construction, and we had to proceed with these works. We did not spend anything like the amount the hon. gentleman became responsible for, with regard to the canals. In the Estimates the hon. gentleman left prepared, there was an item for the Bay Verte Canal, which Mr. Page said would cost $8,500,000. The entire cost of the Canals proposed by hon. gentlemen, was about $43,000,000; the Intercolonial, about $10,000,000; the Pacific Railway, $30,000,000. With regard to the Pacific Railway, I do not intend to enter upon that matter to-night; but I intend to vindicate myself upon that subject when it comes up for discussion. The hon. gentleman said we ought to admit that there was a vast amount of prosperity in the country. I declare upon my honour as a man, I do not see any prosperity whatever resulting from his Tariff; but I believe it had the very opposite effect. The entire balance against us in reapers and mowers, spades, hoes, and every kind of implement connected with agricultural purposes, amounts to the value of $160,000. But, says the hon. gentleman, the North-West can be supplied by our people. Why should we tax the people going there to develop that country? This is a very doubtful kind of benefit, and the benefit to the implement-makers is of the smallest kind. Several manufacturing firms say that the amount imposed made it impossible for them to pay a dividend, which, but for the burdens imposed upon them by the National Policy, they would have been able to do. Very much was said about furniture, and the great benefit the National Policy was to the furniture manufacturers. I am sorry my old friend from Centre Toronto (Mr. Hay) is not here. He comes to the point. A gentleman, speaking to him on the subject, said : "I am surprised that you support such a policy." "Glod bless you, Sir," was his honest answer, "every man for himself in this world." The entire amount of household furniture, introduced into Canada, of every kind, was $247,000 worth. Many kinds will still have to be introduced, on account of the high prices, because it is impossible for manufacturers here to compete in many articles with the large concerns established in New York and Philadelphia, just as it is impossible for small villages in our own country to compete with Toronto or Montreal, and we cannot obtain many classes of goods that are wanted in the furniture line. We cannot obtain, then, such articles as my hon. friend from Montreal will want in that gorgeous palace he is building there.

MR. GAULT: It is my brother's, and he has not brought one piece from New York. It is all made by cabinet-makers in Montreal. I own a better house than that, too.

MR. MACKENZIE: I shall be delighted to call some day, and examine the furniture, and see where it came from, if he will invite me. The exports of furniture were nearly $100,000 worth, so that is the wonderful Protection given. With boots and shoes it is even worse, or better; and with respect to sugar and cottons and woollens, and other similar interests, it is only to the great manufacturers, to a few rich men, that any benefit is given, while it bears heavily against those who are burdened with the taxes imposed.

MR. GAULT: You should get up a joint stock company on that side of the House; it would be a capital speculation.

MR. MACKENZIE: Our only objection to that is that we have no faith in its continuance, and we are not so foolish as the hon. gentleman thinks we are. The hon. the Finance Minister claims no patent for this Policy, because he announced in New Brunswick that there was not to be a Protective Policy.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: No, no; quite the opposite.

MR. MACKENZIE: I cannot forget those famous telegrams. My hon. friend says it is most unfair to endeavour to weaken his influence, but the hon. gentleman knows it is his political influence we are attempting to weaken, and we have a right to so endeavour to weaken it; in other respects we will not endeavour to weaken his influence, and it is only because of our patriotic feelings and influences that we endeavour to weaken his influence in any respect. He said, in reference to manufactures, that we were going down the hill of adversity for five years. He knows, if he knows anything about manufacturing in this country, that there is no material increase (except in the two or three instances mentioned) on account of his Protective Tariff, that there is not one single manufactory started because of his Protective Tariff. I see that he gave them a Protection on iron, at Hamilton, of 35 per cent., and they shut down; he gave Protection to the screw makers, and they shut down, in Dundas; and so I might go on over a great many places. I say that, at this moment, there is no increase in the manufacturing power of this country, except in two or three instances, where they require a large amount of capital, and have secured a monopoly of business by enormous Protection. The hon. gentleman, the other night, gave the percentage of indebtedness, or rather taxation, in 1868, as $3.55 per head; and he has given the present rate of taxation, per head, as $4.05. If he apportions 3,500,000 to $13,000,000, I do not see how he gets $3.55; and if he apportions 4,000,000 to $25,000,000, I do not see where he gets $4.05.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: That is percentages are only on Customs and Excise. What you get out of your Railroads or out of your Post Office is not taxation.

MR. MACKENZIE: The hon. gentleman is mistaken, for everything that comes out of these is a taxation of the public.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: You have Public Works and Canals.

MR. MACKENZIE: But we have to pay interest upon the capital. He knows that the Welland Canal did not pay more than 2½ per cent. interest, and that at present it will not pay any interest at all.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: The interest on expenditure is a tax.

MR. MACKENZIE: The interest is against the loss to the country and against the expenditure, and there is no doubt whatever that what we pay into the Revenue is taxation. As my hon. friend beside me has gone into the Provincial Debt matter, I will not trouble the House further on that matter.

Motion (Sir Samuel L. Tilley) agreed to.

House resolved itself into Committee of Ways and Means.

(In the Committee.)

MR. KILLAM: I would like to know whether the hon. the Finance Minister has given his final answer. I understood that the hon. gentleman had promised to meet a gentleman interested in this matter, and that he would reconsider the Order in Council as to the drawback to be given. I can state, on the best of authority, that the hon. gentleman promised that another Order in Council should be passed which would give, at least, $1 drawback per ton.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: The arrangement was not the difference between the old and the new Tariffs. The controversy between the gentleman at St. John and myself was whether there should be a reduction of 80 per cent. on the furniture of the ship, and I stated that that could not be considered at all. Any change that is made would apply to the whole of the ship.

MR. KILLAM: The hon. gentleman must not leave us in the position of standing waiting for his decision. We expect that the promise he made will be carried out.

HOUSE OF COMMONS ACCOUNTS AUDIT.

REPORT CONCURRED IN.

MR. KIRKPATRICK moved that the Second Report of the Select Standing Committee on Public Accounts be concurred in.

MR. SPEAKER: I would like the opinion of the House as to whether I should allow the Accounts of the House to be submitted to the Auditor General.

MR. KILLAM.

MR. KIRKPATRICK: With regard to the Accounts of the House of Commons, the House has already agreed to the suggestion that they should be audited by the Auditor-General, and this report suggests that the Audit Act should be amended so as to make it clear and distinct that it is in accordance with the law.

MR. MACKENZIE: There can be no possible objection to that course. It will relieve ourselves of some of the officers of the House of Commons anxiety.

Motion agreed to.

BILL INTRODUCED.

The following Bill was introduced, and read the first time:—

Bill (No. 101) To provide for the distribution of the assets of insolvent traders.—(Mr. Abbott.)

WAYS AND MEANS—THE TARIFF.

Order for the second Reading of resolutions reported from the Committee of Ways and Means (April 9th) read.

MR. PATERSON (South Brant): Some few days ago I spoke to the hon. the Finance Minister in reference to a matter in which I felt a great interest, namely, the taxing of books for the blind. The hon. gentleman said the matter was under the consideration of the Government, and I hoped that, in introducing his last Resolutions, he would have acceded to my wish. As the hon. gentleman has not done so, I would ask the House to listen to me a moment or two, while I explain the condition in which the blind are in regard to literature in this country. We have a great many blind people in the country, and benevolent people are doing much to better their condition. We have three institutions for the blind in Canada. The Ontario Institute for the blind at Brantford, a benevolent Catholic institution in the Province of Quebec, in the city of Montreal, and another at Halifax. Some of these institutions are maintained by the Government, and some by private benevolence. A common shilling English primer, costs $3.50 when embossed, and the House will readily understand what a hardship this duty is upon the blind people. No harm can be done to any Canadian publisher by the abolition of this duty. These embossed books are supplied by one firm in the United States, in which country the education of the blind is carefully and kindly looked after. Last year, the United States Senate passed a resolution, by a vote of 43 to 7, to invest $250,000, in 4 per cent. bonds, the annual interest of which, $10,000, is to be devoted to the institution for the blind in Louisville, Kentucky, which is engaged in the printing of embossed books for the blind, and who sell to our blind at the actual cost of production. The United States Bible Society do even better, they give to the Protestant blind an embossed copy of the Bible at the actual cost of binding alone, but it costs the people $20, even on favourable terms; and I think the good sense of the House will agree with me, when I ask that the tax be remitted on embossed books for the blind. I do not desire to enlarge upon this matter. I have endeavoured to show the position in which the unfortunate blind are placed, and I hope the hon. Minister of Finance and his colleagues will accede to my request, and not press their motion, to receive the Report concurring in these Resolutions, but agree to my motion, which I place in your hands. Therefore I move:

“That the Resolution be not read a second time and concurred in, but be referred back to the Committee, with instructions that they have power to place embossed books for the blind on the Free List.”

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: Under the law, as it at present stands, Bibles, Testaments, or other portions of Scripture, come in at 5 per cent. The Government have taken the present proposition into consideration, and they think it rather difficult to submit to the proposition to place books used by the blind on a different footing than books used by the poor generally. The tax on the latter is 15 per cent., and as Bibles and other portions of Scripture come in at 5 per cent., it would be unadvisable to make a still further difference in favour of these as against books generally used by the poor.

MR. BLAKE: In order that the poor may be able to read, they must have the primers, and the practical operation of the Tariff is to impose, relatively, a very much smaller duty on the ordinary primers than on embossed books for the blind. You are, practically, taking away from the unfortunate blind the means of learning to read, which, to them, is more important than to us who can see. I think the Government ought to concede this to the blind. I shall vote in favour of it if they do not concede it.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT: I would only add that I do not think there is any possible risk, in granting this concession in favour of embossed books for the blind; there is no chance of these being used for other purposes.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I may say my hon. friend has no objection, except the possible delay in obtaining concurrence now.

MR. BLAKE: Well, we could put this through the Committee at once, formally, by unanimous consent.

Amendment, agreed to.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole.

(In the Committee.)

Resolutions amended and ordered to be reported.

House resumed.

Resolutions, as amended, reported.

Motion made and question proposed:

That the said resolutions be now read the second time and concurred in.—(Sir Samuel L. Tilley.)

MR. ANGLIN: I do not intend to move any amendment, but I once more ask the hon. the Minister of Finance, on behalf of dealers in books, to readjust the item in his schedule on books, which, as at present framed, taxes both muscle and brain alike. I would also suggest that the hon. the Finance Minister should relieve the importers from the extraordinary inconvenience and trouble they now experience from the mode in which duties are levied on woolsens and cottons. I simply appeal for justice to those who have written me on this subject, and the trade in general, which I deem it my duty again to urge should be granted without delay.

MR. DOMVILLE: If the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Anglin) would add to his list the petition I presented the other day to remove the duty from cocks and hens, I would go with him.

MR. BLAKE: Including bantams.

MR. DOMVILLE: Yes, and shanghais.

MR. MACKENZIE: And peacocks.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: A change was made last Session from an ad valorem to a specific duty. After a general discussion, the proposition that we made, to impose the duty by weight instead of ad valorem, was opposed very strenuously by the hon. gentleman opposite (Mr. Anglin). We thought, at that time, that that would be a more judicious and equitable mode of levying the duty. After a year's experience, the hon. gentleman asks us to comply with the wishes of the trade. Some time since a deputation came to Ottawa, representing, apparently, the whole book-trade of the Dominion, with whom I went into a very careful examination of the operation of the Resolutions adopted last Session, and arrived at the conclusion that the same amount of duty should be raised by an ad valorem instead of a specific duty. Those gentlemen pointed out how the specific duty operated injuriously, in some respects. On balancing the operation of the systems, the Government decided to return to the ad valorem proposition, as recommended by the representatives of the trade, and it was accepted by the House. Therefore, I cannot understand how the hon. member for Gloucester can represent the trade, as he pretends, in his present recommendations. The Government will lose no Revenue by the change.

MR. CHARLTON: Before the Resolution passes, I desire to call the attention of the Government to a matter not immediately in connection with it, but with the lumber trade—I refer to the export duty on saw logs. I have found in my own experience that this duty, so far as Western Ontario is concerned, has worked injuriously to the interests of Canada. How the matter may stand in Quebec I am unable to say; but at present the trade in round timber in Western Ontario, in which there would otherwise be a large amount of capital invested, cannot, owing to this export duty, be prosecuted to advantage. To my own knowledge, a number of Canadian firms, with hundreds of thousands of dollars invested in lumbering operations, who would, but for the duty, carry on operations from the Georgian Bay pineries, have either retired from business or have transferred their operations to Michigan, owing to the obstacles put in their way by this export duty. There is a large trade in the Western States towing rafts from Michigan to ports in Ohio and New York, a considerable portion of the round timber sent to Buffalo and Tonawanda, being shipped eastward down the Erie canal, a trade which does not in the slightest degree interfere with the sawn lumber trade of the country. One American firm undertook to embark in this business on the Georgian Bay last season. They got out two rafts; one of them was seized, the export duty was collected upon it, and the parties abandoned the business. I wish the hon. the Finance Minister to enquire whether the duty which yields, I think, some $300 or $400 a year, and drives from Canada a large and profitable business and centres it in a foreign country—which prevents the holders of timber along the shores of our navigable waters from realising larger prices than they now obtain—operates in the interest of this country. I am quite sure it drives away from us to Michigan a very large and profitable trade. I assure the hon. gentleman that those engaged in producing sawn lumber in Michigan have no jealousy of this round timber trade, because their trade and this, do not, in the slightest degree, come into collision. This duty debars the owners of timber in Canada from participating in a profitable trade; and I call the attention of the Government to the evil in the hope of an immediate remedy being provided.

MR. CURRIER: I do not understand how this does not, as the hon. gentleman says, interfere with sawn lumber in any way, when it allows round timber to be taken into the United States free of duty, to be manufactured in that country. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Charlton), says it does not interfere with the sawn lumber business; the charge is $2 per thousand on sawn lumber, and he proposes a way whereby the Americans could get our lumber without paying that duty. If the present export duty were taken off our round timber, the loss to Revenue would not matter much, but the quantity exported would be greatly increased, and as large quantities of building timber, cut from this class of round timber, now goes to the United States, our mills would lose the benefits of manufacturing it, and the Americans would have that advantage. I shall be glad to see the law remain as it now stands.

MR. WHITE (North Renfrew): I concur in the remarks of the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Currier). Not only is there a demand from the United States for that class of timber; but, during the past winter, several orders have been received from English houses, for the same class of timber, known as bill-timber. It seems it would be unwise to withdraw the export duty on unmanufactured timber going from this country. Such action would withdraw from our mills a large portion of the trade and profits that legitimately belong to them, from the manufacture of the raw material into lumber, in the shape in which it is used in the United States and England.

MR. MCCALLUM: In this question I am opposed, on principle, to the export duty. We used to have an export duty in former years on oak timber, and, I believe, the late Government had taken it off. We have in this country a very small quantity of oak timber, and any quantity of pine timber. But how is it that the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) has made this discovery all at once? The same export duty was on timber during the whole of the Administration of the late Government, which that hon. gentleman supported, and yet he never seems to have discovered it. Before the change of Tariff he knew nothing about it. Of course, as far as I am concerned, I do not know whether the late Government was put under much pressure to remove the duty. But I am opposed to the duty on principle, believing that if a man has timber to sell he ought to be allowed to sell it wherever he can get the best price for it, without paying export duty.

MR. COLBY: I hardly think the hon. member for North Norfolk is chargeable with inconsistency in this matter. He has consistently advocated, for many years, the proposition he now advances; and, if I recollect rightly, at one time he moved for a Committee on the subject. I think those are his settled views, but I do not think my hon. friend is justified, in the peculiar circumstances under which that duty has been imposed, in characterising it as an absurd duty. It arises clearly out of the exceptional character of the legislation of our neighbours, who imposed a duty upon sawed lumber, for the benefit of their own manufacturers, but permit logs to go into the United States duty free. That involved a duty on the part of the Government of protecting our own manufacturing industries, and justifies the exception to the general rule. Now I know many localities in which mills have been erected at great expense, and which are of very great utility to those localities, but they would be entirely blotted out of existence were this duty to be repealed. The total supply of logs upon which they depend, would float along the waters a little further into the United States, to be manufactured by the mills of that country. There are other sections of this Dominion where this law works injuriously; there are sections like those referred to by the hon. member for North Norfolk, where no advantage can be obtained by the local mill owner. If it were possible, under the exceptional circumstances of this case, to give the Government power of remitting the duty in those localities, where it is clearly no protection whatever to any vested interest, and where the imposition of the duty is taking just that much out of the owner of logs, that, I think, might be so applied as to produce excellent results. We would then have protection to existing mills and manufacturing establishments where that protection would be beneficial, and, on the other hand, we would relieve the owners of timber from an onerous burden where no compensating advantage would be obtained. It is simply a question as to whether that class of legislation would be, under the circumstances, permissible. If so, I think it would be beneficial to the country at large, and I would suggest that view of the case to the hon. the Minister of Finance.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: I may say that far from any pressure having been made upon the Government to remove those duties, the pressure has been in the direction of increasing the export duties which the Government then thought it advisable to submit to the House. That law has been in operation since 1871, and, so far as I know, no application has reached the Government for its removal, and no complaint has been made. I take it for granted that the law has been satisfactory to that section of the country where this timber is produced since no serious objection has been made to it.

SIR RICHARD. J. CARTWRIGHT: I must say that a good many protests were made in former days; and, if I recollect aright, some modification was made on two or three grades. At the same time I feel bound to say, that the difficulty presented by the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Colby), was such that we were not able to meet his wishes. There is a serious hardship in certain sections of the country, that, notably in which he resides, and some others. There is no doubt that reasonable evidence was given that much of the timber grown was so perfectly useless that it had to be destroyed. However, I cannot pretend to advise the hon. gentleman to do what we did not dare to do ourselves.

MR. CURRIER: I understand the condition of things no longer exists in the locality where my hon. friend wanted them remedied four or five years ago. It is only on Lake Huron and on the large waters where this timber can be taken now. But as regards the Ottawa country we saw more feet of building timber of the class my hon. friend speaks of than any other locality furnishes.

MR. CHARLTON: There is a difference between the circumstances of the Georgian Bay and Ottawa districts. There is no timber belt in the United States, corresponding in location to that here, to come into competition with that of the Ottawa Valley. The Ottawa Valley has a great advantage in point of transportation over the American timber belts further west, but the Georgian Bay region comes into direct competition with the Michigan region, where the distance and the cost of transportation are nearly the same. That being the case, an export duty of $1 per thousand operates simply to annihilate the trade in the Georgian Bay region. It is true that there are difficulties in the way of abolishing this duty. I may say that the only favour we were able to get from the late Government, was to get the export duty taken off oak logs, and the duty was left as it is upon pine. The reason no pressure was brought to bear upon the present Government was, because the impression prevailed that, when the Tariff Resolutions were brought in, the export duty had been abolished. Such was not the case, but those interested in the round timber trade were not aware of their mistake until the duty was exacted upon the rafts that I mentioned as passing from the Georgian Bay to Lake Huron. So far as the interests of the section of the country referred to by my hon. friend from Stanstead (Mr. Colby) are concerned, I must confess I am in some degree of ignorance. There are, however, no sufficient reasons for the imposition of these duties, as far as the west is concerned. It is to be regretted that the owners of the fine timber on the Georgian Bay are unable to compete with their Michigan rivals in a business which is a very profitable one. If it were possible for the Government to make some regulations by which the law would operate in one section and not in another, the trade from the Georgian Bay and the Upper Lakes would be promoted, and a great boon would be conferred upon other sections of the country. I urge upon the Government a full and fair consideration of this matter.

MR. BOWELL: The adoption of permissive regulations would lead to a great deal of trouble and dissatisfaction. The imposition, some time ago, by the American Government, of $2 per 1,000 on manufactured lumber, resulted in many lumbermen, who had large and extensive limits, exporting logs unmanufactured. The refuse, which is thrown away in this country, more than pays the expense of towage in the American market. A large number of shingle mills were pulled down and the machinery taken to the United States, and the shingle bolts being taken there and manufactured into shingles. It is, therefore, very much better, in the interest of the country, that there should be no relaxation whatever on this point; he desire was, last year, to extend it to a number of other qualities of timber. The Government, however, thought it better to allow the law to remain as it had been for a number of years.

(Sir Samuel L. Tilley.)

FIRST READING.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY introduced a Bill (No. 102) To amend the Act 42 Vic., cap. 15, intituled an Act to alter the duties of Customs and Excise.

Bill read the first time.

SUPPLY.

VIII.—ARTS, AGRICULTURE AND STATISTICS.

House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

53 To meet expenses in connection with care and collection of Public Archives $5,000

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT: Will the hon. the Minister of Agriculture inform us what has been done with respect to the Public Archives. Why is an increase of $2,000 required? What progress has been made in obtaining copies of those documents relating to our early history.

MR. POPE (Compton): During the past year the appropriation was expended in copying the Haldimand papers. The number of these books which have been copied will be found in my report upon the Archives. There are now thirty-five volumes of that valuable collection deposited in the vaults, and there are seventy volumes more in England, ready for shipment. There are 233 volumes in all of these, but they will not be copied in full, parts being omitted to save expense. We hope the work of copying that collection will be completed this year. The United States, it might be mentioned, had, within the last year or two, obtained complete copies of this collection. There are many other documents referring to the early history of this country, and we thought it right to ask for a larger vote for this purpose, the last vote being insufficient.

MR. ANGLIN: Can you give any idea of what the entire cost of procuring these documents is likely to be.

MR. POPE (Compton): It is quite impossible to tell. If my hon. friend will look at the report of 1873 he can give as good an estimate as I can.

54 To meet expenses in connection with Patent Record..... $7,200

MR. VALLÉE: The Patent Record is printed in English. A law passed in 1873 enacts that they should be published in French as well as English. I desire, therefore, to call the attention of the Government to this.

MR. POPE (Compton): The patents are printed in the language in which they are taken out.

MR. VALLÉE: There is only, in the case of a French patent, the name of the patent printed in French.

Vote agreed to.

55 To meet expenses in connection with preparation of Criminal Statistics.....$ 5,000

56 To meet expenses in connection with the Census..... 200,000

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT asked for some explanation of how this was to be applied.

MR. POPE (Compton) said that the Census must be taken during the next fiscal year; that, as we had no regular statistical staff, as in England, the Commissioners and Enumerators had to be educated to the work; and that some considerable amount of money must necessarily be spent for that purpose.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT asked if the hon. gentleman was prepared to send a circular to the members of the House, with a view to obtaining suggestions.

MR. POPE (Compton) said it had escaped his memory, that he had promised to lay details before the members. He was only prepared to state generally what the schedules would contain; and would be glad, as in every other case, to obtain suggestions from members of the House. He would, if possible, lay a synopsis of the schedule before the House, in a rough form. It would be quite impossible to give the schedules as they would be in the end, as there were continual suggestions made, some of which might be adopted up to the time for commencing the work.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT said that it should be submitted before concurrence. He would suggest, also, that in taking the Census, pains should be taken to ascertain statistics showing the nature of buildings, the qualities of houses inhabited by the people, the description of house, whether of wood, brick, stone, or rough cast, and also the number of rooms. He thought such information would be valuable in giving an idea of the progress of the people.

MR. POPE (Compton) said the hon. gentleman's suggestion would have due consideration.

MR. ROSS (West Middlesex) hoped the schedule would be brought down early, so that members' suggestions could be given, and any that were of practical value, adopted; for, as the Census was only taken every ten years, it was important to have it taken in as complete and efficient a manner as possible. He called attention to the fact that we had only thirty-six columns under the head of Agriculture, while the United States schedule had seventy-two columns under that head. This information, therefore, took a wider range than ours, and their Census gave minute details. In the United States a Committee was appointed, decennially, to prepare these schedules, and the most experienced men composed that Committee. He thought that, with regard to statistics relating to the lumbering interests, the particulars might be better obtained from other sources than through the Census Enumerators; there were certain licenses to be taken out, and the lumbermen had to make certain returns, from which the statistics could be obtained. It was essential, too, that the statistics, when obtained, should be published without delay. He (Mr. Ross) understood that one of the volumes of the Census of 1871 was not yet distributed.

MR. CURRIER said he thought that, with regard to the lumbering interest, the statistics could not be obtained in the way suggested by the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross), because there were large quantities of lumber cut on private lands.

MR. MACKENZIE asked if it was intended to include information as to the value of property, as the Municipal Statistics, in this respect, were notoriously deficient, especially in Ontario, the values being suspected to be, in most instances—and especially in regard to real estate—stated considerably below their actual value to avoid the taxes.

MR. POPE (Compton) said this had not been done before. If there was any way of obtaining the value of property it would be desirable to do so; but he was afraid we should not get the correct values. Owners would put in their own values. He (Mr. Pope) thought, with regard to the manner of taking the Census, he would be able to give a general idea to hon. members before the Session closed, and receive and consider any suggestion that might be made. He thought, too, with the cooperation of the Provinces, we could arrange for a yearly collection of statistics, or, at any rate, for a collection at less intervals than ten years.

Vote agreed to.

IX. IMMIGRATION AND QUARANTINE.

57 Immigration.....$159,750

In answer to Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT,

MR. POPE (Compton) said, as to the grouping of all these items, it was done at the suggestion of the Auditor-General, because it was quite impossible to fix the exact amount to be paid for any one of these services.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT: I would like to know what our contract is with the Mennonites—whether any return has been made for the loan or not?

MR. POPE: There has been no return as yet. The time is nearly up, but every dollar will be returned.

MR. ROSS (West Middlesex): Will the hon. gentleman explain to what extent free passes have been given from one part of the country to another.

MR. POPE: The Government have given no free passes to anyone, except to absolutely indigent emigrants. I explained that assistance was rendered emigrants under an arrangement between the Dominion and the Ontario Governments; emigrants to Ontario, no matter of what kind, were to go there free.

MR. MACKENZIE: It is about the tenant farmers the hon. gentleman is speaking.

MR. POPE: No matter who the emigrants are, if bound for Ontario, they must go there free, if the Ontario Government desire it. We are bound to carry out the arrangement made in 1872, which was that we give free passes in the first place, the Ontario Government refunding two-thirds.

MR. MACKENZIE: No.

MR. POPE: Yes; if Ontario insists, we must perform our agreement. Our emigration is already larger than in former years, and will be considerably larger from the influx of the British tenant farmers. Up to this time, it is double that of last year. The Opposition have largely dilated upon the emigration of Canadians to the United States, asserting constantly that our country is being denuded of its population. One hon. gentleman stated that 31,000 persons had lately left Canada. As one here who knows as much about it as he does, he included 20,000 emigrants from Europe, who intended going to the Western States and passed through Canada for the purpose. The last Census of the United States showed that Maine and New Hampshire, two of the New England States, lost population between 1861 and 1881, and the increase of the whole of the New England States in that time was only 10 per cent. against 12½ per cent. for Canada, and that it lost as much by emigration as Canada. People go to the west because land is cheaper in that region. It is, of course, right that we should direct our emigrants to our own North-West.

MR. TROW: To whom does the hon. gentleman refer as knowing about as much in regard to this question as any one else?

MR. POPE (Compton): It was the hon. member for Bothwell who made the assertion referred to.

MR. TROW: I can prove from the United States returns that 31,000 Canadians left the Dominion and settled in the United States in 1879.

MR. POPE: Yes, including the 20,000 I mentioned.

MR. TROW: No.

MR. MACKENZIE: Does that apply to the previous year also?

MR. POPE: Largely.

MR. MACKENZIE: Then, relatively, the figures are correct. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) gave from the Census of the United States the figures for six or seven years, showing that all the time we were in office the number of emigrants from Canada was small, and the moment the present Government was formed it began to increase.

MR. POPE: In 1878, 11,000 emigrants from Great Britain passed through Canada to the United States, only 18,000 coming to settle in Canada; while in 1879, 20,000 went through Canada to the United States, and 30,000 settled among us. So the relative proportion is about the same.

MR. ROSS (West Middlesex): The

hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) showed from official reports of the United States that for the first five years of Confederation there went from the Dominion to the United States an average of 42,000 Canadians a year.

MR. POPE (Compton): He gathered those figures from United States returns.

MR. ROSS: The hon. member for Bothwell stated that he wrote to the Bureau of Statistics, in Washington, and got the correct number of emigrants from Canada for the years mentioned. He thus ascertained that the yearly average of emigration from Canada, for the five years during which the late Government held office, was but 32,000. Those figures can be corroborated by evidence within reach of any hon. member in a few minutes. Those numbers do not include a single emigrant from Europe. The difference between the emigration from Canada and that from the New England States referred to is, that the Americans simply went from one portion of the Republic to another, while Canadians have been going to the United States. Under the policy of this Government there is a systematic attempt not to transfer our people from one part of Canada to another, but, by systematic efforts, including advertisements in Government pamphlets, to transfer them to the Republic. Every document issued from the Department of Agriculture, during the incumbency of the hon. member for Compton, contained advertisements favourable to the settlement of the lands of the United States. He paid, last year, for the transport of emigrants, $74,335, issuing free passes to 8,871; and I fail to find in his report any guarantee that those emigrants, whose passages were paid from Halifax westwards, remained, or were supposed to remain, in the Dominion. There does not seem to be sufficient care taken that the money spent for emigration purposes accomplishes the object in view.

MR. PLUMB: Hon. gentlemen opposite find it necessary for their sinister purposes to show that Canada is being depopulated. They are willing to accept the reports of the Statistical Bureau, or of irresponsible anonymous newspaper writers in the United States, while they reject the statements of Canadian Ministers and officials, in respect to the character and amount of the emigration from Canada to the United States, if not in conformity to our official statistics. The United States officials have no means of knowing whether the emigrants who cross from our territory to theirs come from Canada or Europe; but our friends in Opposition are very anxious to show that Canada is being ruined by the present Government, and that the people are leaving it by thousands. It is necessary for those hon. gentlemen to strain and distort the statements of the Public Records, in order to support their case. I may suggest to the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Anglin) that the emigration to the Canadian North-West need not necessarily be confined to the agriculturists. Some of the most prosperous farmers in Ontario, to-day, were formerly of such crafts as those of blacksmiths and weavers, which he has mentioned as unfit to produce farmers. I presume my hon. friend from West Middlesex (Mr. Ross) has not read the reports of the English gentlemen and delegates who visited the North-West last year; they do not look on emigration to our prairies in the restricted light in which he views it. They bear testimony to the facilities for visiting and learning the character of the country, furnished by the hon. the Minister of Agriculture and describe the Canadian as far superior to the American North-West. All the visitors unite in saying, that there is no finer country under the sun than our vast prairie region, which far excels Montana and Dakota, and they recommend their friends at home to give it the preference. I do not hear any such recommendations from the hon. gentlemen opposite, who are doing their best to recommend Dakota and Montana to emigrants, very much as my hon. friend from Lambton, on a former occasion, advertised Texas as a preferable field for emigration to Manitoba or the country beyond that Province. As regards the recommendation of Texas by the hon. member for Lambton, my hon. friend said, in stating the disadvantages of the North-West, that the climate was a terrible one, that transportation was difficult, that there was no timber, that there was sparse settlement, that these were heavy discouragements to the emigrant, who would not go there and buy land, even for the small price asked for it, because he could get better land elsewhere. When asked where, he replied: In Texas. We hear constantly hon. gentlemen on the opposite side endeavouring to persuade the public that there is a constant stream of emigration towards Montana, rather than Manitoba and our North-West. It would not suit the hon. gentlemen to have it understood that there are advantages, for the settler in Manitoba or the North-West, at least equal to those of the States along the border. I happen to know that in Montana there is a very limited amount of arable land: it is said not over three or four million acres. It is said, also, that the whole of Canada is filled with touters and land agents, who are endeavouring to turn the tide of emigration from this country to the United States. I understand there are a dozen agents of this class in Toronto alone, who are greatly aided in their business by the speeches and newspaper organs of the Opposition. I think it would be a good plan to put a tax upon those agents, and compel them to pay for a license. There is not a gentleman who has spoken on the opposite side yet, who has not decried in some way the prosperity of Canada. The testimony of these hon. gentlemen respecting the advantages of Manitoba and the North-West, as compared with those of the American Territory on the border, is directly contradicted by the testimony of the delegates from the tenant farmers of England, who state that our own Territory is immeasurably superior to that south of it, along its borders. Why should our hon. friends labour so earnestly to disparage our own resources, and to eulogise those of our neighbours across the lines.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT: The House would do well to remember that this emigration from Canada to the United States, has been long a great evil. In 1871, the Census of the United States showed that there were then 489,000 persons in that country who had been in the British North American Provinces. Of these much the largest proportion came to the United States between the years 1861 and 1872. Doubtless, there has been a counter emigration from the United States to Canada, but certainly vastly inferior from that which went hence to that country. I would like to have from the hon. the Minister of Agriculture a somewhat more definite statement of what has been done by the tenant farmers who came over here from England, and what results have accrued from their visit.

MR. POPE (Compton): I learn from those agents themselves, as well as from English newspapers, that they have addressed public meetings in various large towns in England. I am informed that, in consequence of their reports of the advantages offered by Canada, we may expect a large emigration from that country to this. Without any exception these gentlemen were pleased with what they saw in Canada. They looked upon the North-West as second to none on this continent, and they highly recommended it in their addresses to the English people. They were asked to visit several counties at home, where they met with a hearty reception from hundreds of tenant farmers and land owners. A few of the emigrants have already arrived, and, I am informed, others will sail on the 15th of this month, and others on the 1st of June. The Government have not yet considered the subject of procuring delegates from other parts of Great Britain. I have, however, been in correspondence with some parties in Hertfordshire, Lincolnshire and some other counties, from which farmers had emigrated to Texas and returned home again. These parties have enquired about sending delegates out to Canada. The Government, without making any definite arrangements with them, have replied that we should be glad to see them and hoped that they would come.

MR. ANGLIN: The hon. gentleman from Niagara (Mr. Plumb), while indulging in a rhetorical flourish, has accused hon. gentlemen on this side with a want of patriotism, with a desire to decry and injure the country. We bring certain facts to the notice of the House, in order that certain faults, of which we complain, may be remedied as soon as possible. Hon. gentlemen opposite seem to think it patriotic to deny certain notorious facts; they think it patriotic to deny that large numbers of people are now leaving the country, although we all know it to be a fact. The emigration from Canada during the last four or five months has been unprecedented in its volume and character. I hear every day from the Lower Provinces that this large emigration still continues. I saw it stated, in a St. John newspaper lately, that in one steamer 350 emigrants left at one time for the United States, a large number being from Nova Scotia. Some persons go there with the intention of remaining permanently, others with the hope of returning to this country, but nearly all because they could not obtain employment at home. It is a positive duty, under these circumstances, to state these facts, and bring them frequently before the attention of the House and the Government, with a view of devising some means of remedying the evil.

MR. PLUMB: In reply to the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Huntington), I beg to say that I have never made any statements with reference to the unfortunate connection of the late Prime Minister with emigration to Texas, that were not amply justified and proved. I took pains to ascertain from Washington and Texas exactly what was the position of that State in respect to the system of free grant lands, before I ventured to say anything on the subject. The hon. gentleman's statement with regard to Texas, is as follows:—It was in the course of his speech, last Session, on the Pacific Railway Resolutions:

“MR. MACKENZIE: Does the hon. gentleman imagine that settlers will go to the North-West to take up land at $2 an acre when there are millions of acres to be had for nothing in the United States.”

I venture to ask where the millions of acres in the United States were situated, that could be had on such easy terms. The hon. gentleman, who is noted for the promptness if not the accuracy of his replies, when challenged, immediately said, in his very courteous way:

“My hon. friend may be very wise, but if he will examine the conditions upon which land is settled upon in Texas, he will find that that State will furnish any quantity of land free.”

The hon. gentleman stated that emigrants would go to the United States, where superior advantages were given to emigrants, and where they could get land for nothing; and when I asked him where, he answered: “Texas.” Now, there are no free grant lands in Texas. Lands are held at a high price in Texas, except between the 101st and 103rd parallel, where lands can be bought at a minimum price of 50c. per acre, but this in unorganized districts, where there are vast tracts of arid, sandy desert, destitute of tree, shrub, grass, or water, and utterly valueless for emigrant settlement. I think hon. gentlemen make a great mistake in provoking me to reiterate this statement, but I shall reiterate it as often as I am accused of misstating or wearing threadbare a story which will bear a good deal of repetition, especially while its accuracy is disputed.

MR. HUNTINGTON: I desire to call the attention of the hon. member for Niagara to the injustice of attributing to hon. gentlemen on this side of the House unpatriotic motives. When he sat upon this side of the House it was his privilege, in common with the privilege of each of his political friends, to criticise the policy of the Administration. I will not ask him what sort of a Legislature this would be if hon. gentlemen were only to criticise the acts of the Government without finding fault with its policy. It is the duty of a Government to confine themselves somewhere near the facts, and I think they wander from the facts when they seek to tell us there is no emigration going from this country. There is no doubt that there is a large exodus from the Province from which I come, and when hon. gentlemen seek to misrepresent the condition of things, such conduct is criminal.

After Recess.

MR. HUNTINGTON: The hon. member for Niagara, in referring to bonanza farms, spoke of great landed proprietors as large employers of labour, and he pictured the great benefit to be derived by these large proprietors holding vast tracts of land. In order to point out what a careful American observer, within the jurisdiction of his own country, found to be the state of things growing out of the system of bonanza farming, I will read a few extracts from the January number of the Atlantic Monthly. This Land Commissioner said:

"He spoke enthusiastically of the country, and particularly of the rare opportunities they presented for the investment of capital in agriculture as a first-class financial operation; also of the general and particular attention that great capitalists were giving to the matter, especially on the line of that road, and mentioned a large number who had already embarked in the business."

Hitherto the farming population has been supposed to be the safeguard of the nation. He speaks of various farms—Thompson and Kendall's farm, and Rock county farm, one of which, along the Red River, occupying, I think, four miles, 40,000 acres—cultivated with great success. He says he had placed in his hands a circular, in which it is endeavoured to be proven that investments made in the lands of that road, at current prices, and cultivated in wheat and other crops, will pay 20 per cent. upon the whole investment the first year, and 55 per cent. the second. The article abounds in tables, which would be interesting, but I will not trouble the House with them all. The Rock County Farming Company, he alludes to, as having a farm containing 20,000 acres, of which 4,625 are under cultivation—3,251 acres in wheat, 312 acres in barley, 550 acres in oats, 312 acres in peas, and 200 acres in corn. They have $15,000 worth of farming implements. The number of men employed was 20 for the month of March; 56 for April and May; 40 from June to July 20th; from July 20th to the 20th of August, 115; from August 20th to 15th November, 70; and from November 15th to the end of February, 12. The average wages are $18 per month. In looking over the farm he found that there were magnificent crops, and he was able to tell where the culture was scientific and where not. By the failure of Jay Cooke and Company, in 1873, large tracts of land were thrown open, and large quantities of land held by that unfortunate firm, belonging to the Northern Pacific Railway, were thrown into the hands of those who had an interest in its securities. Among them was Mr. Dalrymple, who owned the farm of 40,000 acres already mentioned, who entered into an arrangement with some of the holders by which he was to undertake the management of their lands in the growing of wheat and other products, upon condition that when the products of the farms had repaid all the expenditure, with an agreed interest, he was to receive a clear title of one-half of each farm, with its stock and improvements. In the spring of 1876 he commenced his operations and carried them on until he obtained the 40,000 acres, as mentioned. Then he gives another farm of 28,000 acres on the Red River. I will read some of the details, skipping over most of those that might be interesting if time allowed. The number of men employed in the place are, from April 1st to May 1st, 150; from May 1st to July 15th, 20; but if breaking new ground, 50; from July 15th to July 30th, 100; from August 1st, to September 15th, 250; from September 15th to November 1st, 75; from November 1st to April 1st, 10 men. The wages are, from November 1st to April 1st, $15 per month; from April 1st to May 1st, $18; from May 1st to August 1st, $16; from August 1st to August 15th, $2 per day; from August 16th to September 15th, $1.50 per day; from September 15th to November 1st, $18 per month. The tools, machinery and animals employed are, 67 plows, 64 harrows, 32 seeders, 6 mowers, 34 self-binding harvesters, 7 steam engines and threshers, adapted to burning straw for fuel, 50 wagons, and 125 head of horses and mules. Every facility was afforded for the fullest observation, and it would be difficult to find a finer sight than was presented by those magnificent fields of grain standing breast-high, and taking in the golden yellow that precedes the harvest, and so on. Some portions, the writer continues, would, it is said, give more than thirty bushels to the acre. The small farmers and their families, he says, in that region, were not numerous; but, so far as he could learn, their condition was not relatively better nor worse than in other sections. He goes on to say that the system of monopoly prevailing on these farms is such as prevails anywhere where capital is combined with machinery. These capitalists have advantages in every way over small men; even their railway rates being 50 per cent. lower. The two great facts, he continues, shown by these observations are, that those who have gone into wheat-growing upon a large scale, making use of the most improved machinery and cheap labour, are making colossal fortunes at 70c. per bushel for wheat, limited only by the number of acres cultivated and the skill with which the work is done, and that wheat may be grown at large profit; on the other hand the small farmers, depending mainly on their own labour, with limited capital and less machinery, are not making a comfortable subsistence, but are running behindhand, and must go under. The development of the large farm interest is by no means confined to Kansas, Minnesota, and Dakota. It has extended largely to other States. Even Texas is mentioned by him. He says in the North-Western States, between 1860 and 1870, the number of great farms had nearly doubled, and in the north-eastern section, the very oldest portion of the agricultural region of our country, the increase had been 19 per cent. Before the present great division of labour, the farmer and his family, when not employed in planting and reaping, were engaged in spinning and weaving; they had local industries from which they could make up little loads of their own production, and take them to the little towns and villages adjoining; but the advance of the railway, and the facilities afforded for transportation, all this had been changed. Against the unlimited use of this combination of capital, machinery and cheap labour, the individual farmer, either singly or in communities, cannot successfully contend, and must go under. It is a combination of the most powerful, social, and economic forces known to man, and all efforts for competition must and will fail so long as the three remain united. The development of the large farm interest has the direct and immediate effect of impoverishing the sections in which the farms exist, and skinning the lands without any compensating benefits. Not one dollar of the gross amount, or net profit received from the product of the soil, is returned, and placed upon the land from which it is taken, except in the construction of the fewest buildings necessary to shelter and protect the labourers in the working season, and for the care of the work, stock and the tools. On the whole 5,300 cultivated acres of the Grandin Farm there was not one family finding a permanent home, by virtue of title, in the soil, where there should have been, at least, one to every fifty acres of plow-land, or 106 families. This would give 106 houses in place of the five there at present, and 106 barns in place of three with other buildings in like proportion, and a population of at least 500, where there is not now one fixed inhabitant, with all the accessories of household comforts and home improvements that do not now exist in the smallest degree. The large development of the tenant system of farming is an evil of the greatest magnitude. It threatens to overwhelm the country. And the writer then goes on, eloquently, to describe the dangers. I thought the hon. gentleman would forgive me for calling his attention to the great enterprise which is being sprung on the emigrant to the North-West, and for pointing out that municipal taxation will not prevent the evil. I thought this subject well worthy of attention. To provide an efficient check would be a start to the goal to which we are all looking forward, in the opening of our vast North-West Territory. I do not care to enter upon the merits of this question, but merely wished to call the attention of my hon. friend to it. It did appear to me that the hon. member for Niagara (Mr. Plumb), who is usually very intelligent, seemed to favour the great farms. It did not appear to me, however, that the hon. the Minister of Agriculture, no matter what his colleagues may think, was impressed with this idea. The hon. member for Niagara, however, has favoured us with that Texas story again; he threatens us with it every little while. What does he suppose will be his position in history, when he is doing nothing else but rising in his place, to be continually pointing out and trying to prove that the ex-Premier was merely a Texas Land Agent. He might be pardoned for using it occasionally, but when he does it deliberately, after taking his meals, his meat and his drink, and his sleep and his exercise, does he expect to occupy a high position in the history of this country? I would recommend him seriously to consider the advice intended to be conveyed the other day by the Mail, which said that, of course, nobody thought it of any consequence, but the Opposition leader should not be so restive about it. In short, I think it is about time the hon. member for Niagara should let us have a rest about this Texas business. I believe the hon. gentleman will admit that, so far as emigration is concerned, this country is not without competition, and that if our terms are made less favourable than those of the United States, we cannot expect to be successful in our competition. We must admit that the machinery of the American system is very powerful, and, perhaps, more favourable than our own, although we all desire our own system to be such that it may populate that vast territory in our North-West. The emigration into the United States has been so extensive and so successful, in point of numbers, that it has alarmed and astonished the world. We need not attempt to deny or belittle these things, any more than the Esquimaux could truthfully assert that his position is better than that of his richer neighbour. Hon. gentlemen opposite did not seem to suppose there would be competition, and my hon. friend only spoke of the fascinations the neighbouring Republic had for emigrants, a fascination heralded all over the world. That Republic has had the reputation of giving equality to the people, and a life free from the oppressor. Men leave their native land to seek freedom from oppression, as well as for food. I know our country is not one whit less favourable to the emigrant, whether seeking food or seeking freedom, but the world does not know it yet. The course of history has not made it known. The crime my hon. friend has committed, and for which the hon. member for Niagara is continually reproaching him, is that he has simply pointed to that successful country on our borders and said: "Do not fancy you have no competition; be alive to the fact that the American system may outstrip you." We have not the means of obtaining a system of emigration so complete as that of the United States, and for my part I do not regret it. I believe that it will be better for us, if we are longer in populating our country with foreign elements, which might too soon absorb our citizenship and endanger our British laws and institutions. I am glad that the tide of emigration is not so boisterous, and I would rather see this tide flow from Great Britain; I would rather see that vast fertile territory in our North-West populated by the men to whom the institutions we cherish have been made sacred by their associations. I would like to see those lands peopled by the English, Irish, Scotch and French, from the Old Provinces and the Old World, who know how to work them. They are far more likely to hold them for our glorious future, than those who simply go for food, who are without any knowledge of the means by which our institutions are to be perpetuated. None of us are so unpatriotic as the hon. gentleman, to decry the country, as he did. We do not decry the country, but we try occasionally to point out the real weaknesses and the dangers to avoid.

MR. PLUMB: My hon. friend from Shefford (Mr. Huntington) has wasted a great deal of eloquence and elocution on this matter. I did not intend for a moment to insinuate that the hon. member for Lambton was a Texas Land Agent; but I did say that the tendency of that hon. gentleman's speech, last year, was to draw attention to Texas as a favourable place for emigration, compared with the North-West. My hon. friend read an article from the Atlantic Monthly, in support of his views. I will also quote, but from another publication, as follows:—

“From geographical positions and its peculiar characteristics, Manitoba may be regarded as the keystone of that mighty arch of sister Provinces, which spans the continent from the Atlantic to the Pacific. It was here that Canada, emerging from her woods and forests, first gazed upon her rolling prairies and unexplored North-West, and learned as by an unexpected revelation that her historical territories of the Canadas; her eastern seaboard of New Brunswick, Labrador, and Nova Scotia; her Laurentian lakes and valleys, corn lands, and pastures, though themselves more extensive than half-a-dozen European Kingdoms, were but the vestibules and ante-chambers to that, till then, undreamt-of Dominion, whose illimitable dimensions alike confound the arithmetic of the surveyor and the verification of the explorer.”

“Such is the opinion expressed by the late Governor-General on the occasion of his visit to Winnipeg, in 1877, of a country which, until a few years ago, was the hunting ground of the Indian and the pasture field of the buffalo. The traveller's first idea on gazing across the vast prairie lands is that it deserves the name applied to it, or rather to the whole North-West, by Lord Beaconsfield, when he called it ‘that illimitable wilderness.’ But upon a closer examination he sees that beneath that surface of dried grass or ashes, consequent from the frequent fires, there lies hidden a treasure in fertility of soil which, when developed, will sustain millions of the human race. * * * Chemical analyses of this soil have been made, and the results establish that the soil in Manitoba is among the richest in the world. But the best analysis of the quality of the soil is when we find that under such indifferent farming such excellent crops are grown. Near to the Portage-la-Prairie, about sixty miles west of Winnipeg. I saw a field which had grown thirty crops of wheat in succession, without any manure, the last crop having yielded thirty-five bushels per acre; the owner was ploughing this field for the thirty-first time, and still did not consider it necessary to plough more than five inches deep, although he had quite two feet of soil to work upon.

* * * Three-fourths of the great wheat producing belt of the Continent lay north of the boundary line of the United States. There the future bread supply of America, and of the Old World, too, would be raised. The beef raised in this northern district was found superior to that produced farther south.

* * * Along the river banks and up on the bluffs, timber abounds, oak and poplar being the prevailing kinds, and amongst the brushwood we noticed the raspberry, dogrose, and a thorn very much resembling the white thorn of England and Scotland.

* * * That there are millions of acres of land in Canada of the finest quality, and within a few days' journey from this country, and which can be purchased for less per acre than the yearly rent of land here—in a healthy climate, and under the same Government as our own—(applause)—and where, at least, all the necessaries and many of the luxuries and comforts of this life are fully insured.”

Here is a word for my exigent and critical friend the hon. member for Gloucester, who seems so anxious to prove that artisans should have no part in our great inheritance, because they are incapable, he argues, of turning from the loom or the anvil to the plough. It may be true that their agricultural work may not be “high farming,” but it seems to have attained a tolerably satisfactory result:

“It was not to be expected that good farming would be witnessed throughout Canada, because many of those holding farms were weavers, miners, tinkers, or tailors, who had landed with scarcely a penny a piece, but who had, by perseverance and industry, carved out for themselves happy homes. These men had to clear the land before they could get a crop. The Canadians loved their country; many old men who came over to England with the intention of ending their days went back again. They like the climate of Ontario better than that of England.

* * * There is no doubt that the climate of Canada is more to the extreme than ours in England. I have not had sufficient experience to speak feelingly on the subject; but from what I could learn, the people look forward to the winter more as a time for pleasure rather than dread, as we in England are lead to suppose. From my own experience it is much superior to ours—instead of the heavy, damp, foggy atmosphere, they have the bright, clear refreshing breeze, and altogether the air seems much purer and lighter."

These are not the statements of a sensational magazine writer, whose ware are written in such a strain to bring the best price in the market for which they are designed, and are purchased and paid for by the page, but the candid statements of clear-headed, practical English and Scotch farmers, who came to see for themselves, and whose reports cannot be suspected of bias towards us. They are fittingly prepared by the eloquent words of our honoured and beloved ex-Governor-General. My hon. friend from Shefford, in the height of his polysyllabled magniloquence—to borrow his peculiar style for a moment—speaks of the yearly exodus of the habitants to the United States for summer employment as a "multitudinous expatriation." Multitudinous expatriation is good, but it is only a rhetorical flourish and may pass as such. But, Sir, I do not share in the gloomy views of my hon. friends of the Opposition in respect to the depopulation of the Dominion. I believe exactly the contrary, and, as to the peopling of the far west, I do not doubt that the very fact that the British emigrants know that coming here they would teamong a people possessing English laws, traditions and culture, would prove a powerful inducement to them to prefer the northern side of the boundary. It is not right for hon. gentlemen opposite to insist that the system of the United States is more favourable to the emigrant and the settler than ours. I have shown that it is only within a short time that the United States have enlarged their free and preemption grants from 80 to 160 acres for each settler, and they compel him, at the outset, to declare that he will become a citizen of the Republic, a condition offensive to the patriotic feelings of many, and in which Canada does not, to her credit be it said, imitate that country. The hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Huntington), has referred to the lands thrown upon the hands of the formerly bankrupt Northern Pacific Railway Company. They have a land grant, I believe, of forty millions of acres, only 13,000,000 or 14,000,000 of which are supposed to be arable; that road, therefore, is to pass through a country much less cultivable than ours; large tracts upon its line are unfit for settlement. Why cannot hon. gentlemen opposite see that the Dominion Government, with its excellent credit and enormous resources, may easily build our Pacific Railway, when one private company has built that through the United States, and the embarrassed Northern Pacific Company are likely soon to complete theirs? The late Government accepted the Carnarvon Terms, divested of the condition laid down by their predecessors, that the road should be built only as fast as our means should warrant. In reply to the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross), who declared that settlement should precede railway construction, I hold that the conditions must be reversed; the settler needs and looks for the means of communication before making his home in the wilderness. I hold that the hon. member for Shefford has proved my case, and not his own, in his argument just concluded. In conclusion, I defy any hon. gentleman to controvert a statement I have made. I always intend to speak from undeniable facts and figures. I have been called a partisan; I acknowledge and glory in the character; but I hope the time is far distant when, from partisanship, I shall seek to betray the honour or injure the interests or retard the progress of the country.

MR. ROSS (West Middlesex): I wish to correct the misapprehension of the hon. the Minister of Agriculture, that in the 25,000 or 30,000 emigrants reported by the Washington Bureau of Statistics as having gone from Canada to the Republic, were included many emigrants from Britain passing through the Dominion. In no case does the Bureau report the emigrants merely passing through Canada to the United States; but in every case does it directly credit the nation from which the emigrants come. Thus I can prove that the statements of the hon. member for Bothwell are substantiated by the Bureau of Statistics, and that the number of emigrants from Canada does not include any from Britain. The hon. the Minister of Agriculture and confreeres, when in Opposition, asserted that it was owing to our policy that the people were expatriated, they being unable to find employment at home. But the evil exists now in an aggravated form, a greater number than ever leaving the country at present. The Government are not taking the proper method of preventing the exodus. The policy of the Agricultural Department, in circulating literature, like the pamphlet of Mr. Peter Mitchell, praising the United States at the expense of Canada, is highly detrimental to the interests of the country. In addition to the Mitchell Pamphlet, came a pamphlet, printed in the Montreal Gazette Office, eulogising Dakota and Turtle Mountain, at the expense of our North-West.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell): On enquiry in Montreal, I found that that pamphlet was written by the Rev. Mr. Armstrong, a gentleman who has manifested great interest in emigration to the North-West, and that he ordered the pamphlet on his own account. The copies ordered by the Department at Ottawa had not the advertisements objected to, although the others, ordered by himself, had, and he had a right to print them.

Mr. ROSS (West Middlesex): It is remarkable how readily an explanation can be found by hon. gentlemen opposite. This Turtle Mountain pamphlet I hold in my hands, I got from the Department two days ago. On page 49, speaking about Dakota, it says settlers pay $1 an acre, get twenty years to pay for the land, and so forth, and that this is a more liberal policy than that of the Dominion is apparent. That is the description of Manitoba, as contained in this pamphlet, which hon. gentlemen opposite will circulate, in order to induce emigrants to settle in that country. I do not know in what climate it will be suitable to circulate a pamphlet like this—certainly not in the temperate climate of England and Scotland, but rather in Iceland and Spitzbergen, or some other frozen region. We object to the policy of the hon. gentlemen opposite, not that they are unwilling to secure the settlement of our North-West, but that they are blundering in every attempt they make to settle those lands, and doing it in such a way as to repel settlers instead of attracting them. Anyone reading that pamphlet would certainly not risk his life and that of his family, in such a cold and inhospitable climate as Manitoba is there represented to be. The other pamphlet from which I have quoted, also contains disparaging references to our own lands as compared with lands in the United States. I am surprised that the hon. member for Niagara does not rebuke the Minister of Agriculture for circulating pamphlets which speak in such disparaging terms of this country. But this policy of expatriation still goes on. Have hon. gentlemen showed that it does not go on? In to-night's Free Press I read:

“A party of masons and bricklayers leave for Chicago to-night, there being no work in this locality for them.”

It is all very well for hon. gentlemen to charge us with disloyalty, because we make a plain statement of facts which are published in the papers, and which the hon. the Minister of Agriculture dare not deny. Now, the policy of the Opposition is to prevent the Minister of Agriculture from carrying on his system of expatriation. It is because we exposed his pamphlets that the advertisements were cut out, and from the same cause the objectionable advertisement was cut out of his Turtle Mountain pamphlet. I hope the Opposition will never forget their function of preventing the Government, as far as possible, from making mistakes, which would be fatal to the interests of the country. I hope also that, in the future, my hon. friend will be more careful in the circulation of his emigration literature, and that he will no longer encourage the hon. member for Niagara to rise in the House and shout: “Texas.” We have heard a good deal about Texas, but so long as we have evidence of this kind in our hands, we are willing the hon. member for Niagara may say all about Texas he chooses.

Mr. POPE (Compton): I had hoped this question would continue to be discussed fairly and honestly, on its merits, as it was by the hon. leader of the Opposition and the late Finance Minister; but when the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross) declares that this Turtle Mountain pamphlet came from the Department of Agriculture, I tell him the statement is false. There is not one word of truth in it. Not a single copy of that pamphlet has ever gone out with that advertisement in it. The attention of the publisher was called to it, and there was never but that one copy came into the Department with the advertisement in it. The hon. member for Bothwell stated, the other day—and his statement has been reiterated by the hon. member for West Middlesex—that 30,000 emigrants went from Canada last year. That is by no means the truth. Every emigrant passing through Canada from Europe is put down as an emigrant from Canada, even when these European emigrants had bought through tickets to the Western States before leaving their homes. I told the hon. gentleman that the emigration from Canada included emigrants passing through it, but he still goes on repeating his misstatements. Let us see whether more persons went from Canada last year than in the years preceding. I have here a table showing the number of emigrants that went through Canada to the United States, and those that remained in Canada, which is as follows:—

Year	Passed through Canada to the U. S.	Returned to Canada.
1874.....	40,000.....	25,000
1875.....	9 000.....	19,000
1876.....	11,000.....	14,000
1877.....	7,000.....	15,000
1878.....	11,000.....	18,000
1879.....	20,000.....	30,000

The number of emigrants that remained in Canada last year was larger than in any other year since 1873, and the proportion of those who merely passed through was less than the average of those years. But I do not bring that as a charge against hon. gentlemen on that side of the House. Undoubtedly the hard times had something to do with the smaller number of emigrants remaining here during those years. When I spoke before Recess, I said that, comparing the Eastern States with Canada, we would find that Canada had increased more in the last ten years than had the New England States, while several of those states had actually diminished in population. This fact shows that the population is moving west, not only in Canada, but also in the United States; and when we had no West of our own, it was but natural and inevitable that our people should go to the Western United States. This emigration began long before 1861. I remember, well, in my own neighbourhood, in 1836 and 1837, that a large emigration took place to the west, and it has been going on ever since. I do not think it is fair for hon. gentlemen opposite to hold up this country before the people of Great Britain, as being in a state of distress and poverty, so that our own people are compelled to leave us and go to the United States rather than to our own North-West. Every word they utter here will be used against Canada and against our North-West. My hon. friend (Mr. Huntington) says that farming has become a speculation, that large farmers are not to be encouraged, but only men of small means. Now, I do not agree with him; I would induce every farmer, large and small, I could, to go on to our prairie lands. In Great Britain, where land is dear and labour is cheap, perhaps the hon. gentleman's theory might be correct, but here we have a boundless territory and railways to reach it, and our only difficulty is to get men to settle it. I think these monopolists, the hon. gentleman speaks of, would become the employers of labour, and induce the poorer settlers to go out and work for them, and they would in time become themselves proprietors. I think that both these classes of people should be induced to go into that country. The hon. gentleman says the great danger is in putting too much land into the hands of one man, and he says we should adopt the United States system. But the Government of the United States have nothing whatever to do with emigration. They grant large quantities of land to railway companies; they place a large part of their territory in the hands of these very speculators, whom the hon. gentleman denounces. These railway companies become emigration agents. They employ such means to attract emigration as we cannot employ; they expend larger sums in circulating emigration literature than we can do, and, consequently, they succeed in attracting immense numbers of emigrants. The hon. gentleman says the extension of the franchise in England has endangered their institutions. I cannot agree with that view. It has generally been thought the greater share you give people in the Government of a country, the more they are brought to feel that they have an interest in the country, and, consequently, the better citizens they become. To guard against all danger, the masses must be educated, as it would be dangerous to confine education to the few. The hon. gentleman seems to think that it may be unsafe for us to have too large an emigration to this country. I think the danger is chimerical. If we bring them into this country and send them to our North-West to cultivate our land, they will become, in a very short time, taxpayers and producers of wealth. Let us not hesitate before any of these imaginary dangers, but go on in the way we have commenced.

MR. BOULTBEE: I have read the Turtle Mountain pamphlet to which the hon. member from Middlesex (Mr. Ross) referred, but its contents and purpose are widely different from those asserted by the hon. member for West Middlesex, and I consider that it is highly eulogistic of Manitoba in every sense, and by no means calculated to deter emigration. There is nothing in it to suggest the idea he would convey to the House, and the promulgation of the assertion of the hon. gentleman, in respect to the alleged emigration from Canada to the United States, as arising from our alleged miserable condition, must be highly detrimental to the interests of this country. This debate, however, has not been without satisfactory fruit, for we have at length had one prominent member on the Opposition side of the House come forward and state that he does not believe these things are true, and that he believes Canada to be as good a country as there is on the face of the earth to settle in, and that our institutions are surpassed by none. I allude to the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Huntington). Unfortunately, however, he said the resources and advantages of Canada are not known throughout the world, and this is, in a great degree, due to the fact that hon. gentlemen on the opposite side of the House rise day after day, and night after night, and assert that a different state of things exists. It is a consolation for us to know, however, that during the last year there was an enormous emigration into our land, and that we have information to the effect that there are prospects that during the coming year that emigration will be doubled if not trebled. It is also a source of consolation to know that the affairs of the country are in the hands of men who have given the people what they demanded, but which the late Government refused—a National Policy. We may now hope, as years roll by, especially if we have a patriotic action on the part of the Opposition, to see this Canada of ours grow into the proud position indicated by the hon. member for Shefford.

MR. HESSON: I desire to call the attention of the hon. the Minister of Agriculture to the question of the emigration of Germans to this country. It is a matter worthy of consideration, whether the obstacles which have stopped this class of emigration cannot be removed. The number of German emigrants coming to this country has fallen from 16,453, in 1867, to 349 last year. I think it very desirable that this House should do something in the direction of encouraging and promoting this very valuable class of emigrants to come to Canada. It will not do, Sir, to say, that the German Government are opposed to our efforts in that direction, seeing as we do that the Americans have been most successful in obtaining a very large emigration from that country through some well devised scheme, such as employing their resident Consuls, Hamburg ship-agents, and by the most liberal distribution of information published in their own language, both by press and pamphlet, giving a glowing picture of the resources of their country. I would suggest to the hon. the Minister of Agriculture that a sufficient sum be placed in the Estimates, even at the expense of some of the other usual items in the Emigration expenditure, for the purpose of publishing in the German language, in a similar way, full and reliable information of the great resources of our own country, and which has been liberally supplied both to our English and French-speaking citizens. I fear, Sir, however, that the real objection arises from our very unsatisfactory alien laws, and which I am sorry to say, operates in a very unfair way against our foreign population, affording them no protection, even after taking the Oath of Allegiance to our Queen and country, if found travelling outside British territory. I am glad to see an enquiry placed upon the Notice Paper by an hon. member of this House, asking hon. Ministers what they have done or intend to do in regard to this very objectionable law. I hope it will be found possible to remove this stigma from the country.

MR. TROW: I have received a package containing similar pamphlets to the one referred to by the hon. member for West

Middlesex, from the Department of Agriculture, and I have received not only one, but fifty or one hundred. Until I knew the nature of their contents I was anxious to distribute them among my constituents, and other parties applying for information respecting the great North-West. On examination I found the greater portion of the information could not possibly be of any service to intending emigrants; nor does it offer any special inducement to settlement in the North-West. Instead of inducing parties to emigrate it would have a tendency to keep them away. The pamphlet I have reference to contains many useless advertisements, totally unconnected with the subject of emigration. Why, the first page is taken up with advertising the "Cook's Friend," for making pan-cakes, griddle-cakes, and dough-nuts, etc.; then we find a map descriptive of the line of the projected Emerson and Turtle Mountain Railway, sketched purposely in the interest of speculators. The writer then describes his mode of travelling and his stay in a house 12ft. by 7ft., made of boards tongued and grooved, lined with felt-paper inside, in which was a cooking stove. After partaking of the hospitality of a poor Mennonite, he describes the house as a bad-smelling tenement, and before leaving lectures the proprietor on ventilation. The following night the party was not as comfortable as they were in the bad-smelling Mennonite house, for the writer says the thermometer was 25 degrees below zero, and the wind blowing fifty miles an hour. Little streams of water were running down their necks; they lay under snow two feet in thickness; the poor horses had eaten the trunks, teapot, cups and saucers. Finally, the party let the horses loose, depending upon their natural instinct to take them back to the settlement. Such gloomy descriptions are not the most encouraging to emigrants. We find other very objectionable features to these pamphlets—glaring advertisements of private individuals, companies, etc. I notice one John Schultz advertises 20,000 acres of land for sale in Manitoba, and village lots in various parts of the Province. I cannot conceive why the Government should advertise lands for Dr. Schultz, a member of this House. Let the Government advertise only Dominion lands, surveyed and open for colonisation. We find the Americans are lavish in regard to advertisements. Tons of fancy coloured advertisements are plastered in every conceivable place over the whole Dominion; even this city of Ottawa is liberally covered with advertisements of lands for sale in the United States. I deny the charge against hon. members on this side of the House of unpatriotism, made by the hon. member for Niagara. I have not heard one word from my hon. friends but what has been in the interest of Manitoba and the North-West. Every hon. gentleman must be aware that in passing to Manitoba, emigrants must, until the railway is constructed through our own country, pass through the United States, through large tracts of arable land in Minnesota and Dakota, the latter state alone being twenty-five times as large as Manitoba, and it is only natural to expect that they will, in numerous cases, be entrapped into staying in those states, unless we can offer greater inducements. Tens of thousands are yearly leaving this Dominion and going into the States. Mr. Young, a gentleman in whom the hon. the Minister of Finance places implicit confidence, values every able-bodied emigrant at $800, and if we lose, as the hon. member for Middlesex (Mr. Ross) says, 20,000, as we did last year, the proper policy is not being adopted to keep them within our limits. We find, since 1872, that 228,415 emigrants have left different parts of the Dominion and settled in the United States. I know that the hon. the Minister of Agriculture desires, and has endeavoured, to do right, but he has overlooked some gross carelessness which I am afraid exists in his Department, in reference to advertising and circulation of pamphlets. It is high time to put a check on this worthless literature; it does a great deal of harm.

MR. WHITE (North Renfrew): Hon. gentlemen opposite endeavoured at first to account for this exodus by attributing it to the bad effects of the National Policy; but, finding that it was absurd to contend that emigrants were going from here on account of Protection, and flying to a country where there is more Protection still, they fall back on these pamphlets as the cause. The proper solution of the problem would be found by looking to the policy of the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie), and the delay he allowed to take place in the construction of the Pembina branch of the Pacific Railway. The success of the emigration system in the United States is due to the facilities afforded by the railways; and I venture to say that the policy now adopted of pushing the Pacific Railway into the fertile prairies west of Red River, will cause people to seek homes in our own territory.

MR. WHITE (Cardwell): It seems, Mr. Speaker, as if we were never to end the discussion about these unfortunate pamphlets. I think the statement of the hon. the Minister of Agriculture, made upon his responsibility, on the floor of this House, in reference to them, ought to have been accepted. Referring to the Mitchell pamphlet he stated that he neither bought, nor ordered, nor distributed them, and was in no way responsible for them, and we find that statement confirmed by the Montreal Herald, at the office of which the pamphlets were printed, in the interests of the St. Paul and Manitoba Railway, owned in part by the hon. member for Selkirk. The statement of the Herald is to the effect that:

"The pamphlet being circulated gratuitously, a number of them were sent to the Canadian Department of Agriculture by the printers, on the instructions of the parties at whose instance the edition was issued."

That certainly confirms the statement of the hon. Minister. It is from an authority which hon. gentlemen of the Opposition do not usually question, and it ought to end the discussion in relation to this matter. The other pamphlet to which reference has been made by the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross), deserves a word of explanation. The hon. gentleman read from it a passage describing a camping-out in a snow storm in Manitoba, with the view of proving that the pamphlet was calculated to deter emigrants from going to the North-West. Now, everyone knows that there are snow storms in the North-West, as everyone knows that there are snow storms in Minnesota and Dakota, so much so that the railways in the latter states were last winter detained eight or ten days in consequence of the storms. But surely that does not prevent people from settling there, nor should it prevent them from settling in our own North-West. The passage quoted occurs in a pleasant description of three weeks' travel in winter through Southern Manitoba, and instead of injuring the usefulness of the pamphlet, its very candour will tend to inspire confidence in the statements made in it. If the hon. gentleman had desired to deal fairly by his country, instead of selecting this passage which, wrested from its context, seemed to tell against the Province, he would have read other extracts. Let me supply the omission, and take two or three sentences at random. Here is a passage:

"Next morning we walked over some of the farms in this district, which is called the 'Mountain.' The scenery is very pretty, and in places quite grand. The settlers have raised good crops and are in good spirits."

That surely might have been quoted. Again:

"We are struck here, as everywhere else in our journey, with the strangeness of the phenomenon that, even in the newest districts, we find society as quiet, orderly, and honest as in any old-settled district of Canada. To one who has travelled a good deal in new settlements in the United States, the contrast is delightful indeed."

He might have read that in favour of his country. Here is another passage:

"We are much delighted with all this country from leaving Emerson until we reach Pembina Crossing, on the Pembina River, seventy-five miles from Emerson. We have not crossed a single tract of bad country. We feel that we are travelling in the richest agricultural country that we have ever set foot upon. The weather has been delightful during these three days."

Again:

"It seems to take less fuel to heat a house in Manitoba than in Quebec or Ontario. We slept in several very comfortable houses of a good size that were heated by a small cooking stove only. The same sized house in Quebec would have a box stove besides the cooking stove."

Then, again, continuing the description, we have the following:

"Mr. McLaren is now engaged in putting up a house for a stopping-place. Here, too, is wanted immediately a good general store, post-office, blacksmith shop, etc. There are around Clearwater Village, 150 square miles of the best land in the world to support these things, besides a great travelling public. The village is situated in the midst of the Paisley colony. This colony made an arrangement with Government that only actual settlers should take up the land in the four townships which were reserved for it, and, as a consequence, all the land has been taken up by actual settlers, who will be out in the spring. This, of itself, will make it a most desirable locality."

Then here is another passage :

"We could not have chosen a better time to see the country. From Range 16 to Range 19, and during the following days to Range 22, we pass over a magnificent country in which there is no waste land. Occasionally, we find a gravelly or stony knoll, but the gravel and stone are all on the surface even there, and below it are two feet of splendid loam, with a rich clay subsoil below that."

Then, again, we have this statement :

"We were fortunate enough here to meet the surveyors, who had just finished their survey. They told us (I attach certificate) that there are here 150 square miles of merchantable timber, the best water in the country in abundance in all directions, and good soil everywhere. Wood, water, and soil—a settler's paradise. Every man can secure 320 acres of land, and twenty acres of wood. There is enough for 5,000 settlers in this block alone."

Still again, let me quote :

"We meet several old Red River settlers here, who tell us that a farmer's life is much more pleasant here than in the Red River Valley. They prefer the soil, although it is not so strong. They have splendid home markets, and will have, with new settlers coming in for years to come. They have wood, coal, and good water. They say that it is too level in the Minnesota and Dakota prairies, and in the Red River Valley."

MR. TROW : Read a little on pages 23 and 24.

MR. WHITE : I shall come to that in due time. Again, the writer says :

"In the very last day's explorations, and when we had reached our farthest westward point, we met Mr. Norton, mining engineer (whose certificate I attach for publication), who is now engaged in mining coal at the Souris River, about 300 miles due west from Emerson. He told us that the country he had traversed for 200 miles west of where we were, was as good as the country we had come over. He had gone over it both in winter and summer. He predicts that one of the big cities of the future will be 300 miles west of Emerson, at some point on the Souris River. We find him as enthusiastic about the country as all the other Englishmen we meet, which means that he was very enthusiastic."

I might go on quoting, but it is unnecessary. We have, in addition to this description, an extract from Consul-General Taylor's speech, in which he bore testimony to the superiority of the Canadian North-West, as a grain growing region.

MR. WHITE.

We have some excellent directions for reaching Manitoba. We have eight solid reasons why men should settle in the wheat fields of the Dominion of Canada rather than anywhere else. We have a description of winter in Manitoba which tends largely to neutralise the effect of the statements which have been too common on that subject. Then we have the testimony in favour of the Dominion wheat lands from the Philadelphia Press, an American newspaper. The hon. gentleman asks me to read from pages 22 and 23. These pages are not in the book. They contained the advertisement of Kansas lands, which has been complained of, and it seems strange that the absence of that advertisement should cause anxiety to the hon. member. But it is complained that there are other advertisements in the pamphlet. This is quite true. The pamphlet was written by the Rev. Mr. Armstrong, a Church of England missionary, who has had large experience in the Eastern Townships, who during recent years has been doing mission work in Manitoba. On two or three visits which he made to different parts of the Province of Quebec, he has lectured upon the advantages of Manitoba, and has been a practical emigration agent. Recently, under medical advice, he has been compelled to give up his ministerial labours, for two years, and he has resolved to devote himself to emigration work. This pamphlet was printed at his own risk. The advertisements complained of were obtained by him to help pay the cost. They may do no good, but they certainly can do no harm, for it cannot be a disadvantage to the people who read them to know that they can, in this new country, obtain in the business houses of Manitoba, all the ordinary articles which they have been accustomed to obtain in the Old World. The railway lands advertisement was obtained in the same way. Mr. Armstrong induced the Department to take some copies of this pamphlet, but under instructions from the hon. Minister this particular advertisement was removed from all the copies taken by the Department. These are the simple facts in relation to this pamphlet. There is no doubt that there has been, and that there is still, a large emigration going on from Canada during the present season. The circumstances in the manufacturing districts of the United States have been such as to attract people from this country, but many will find themselves disappointed, and the return stream of Canadians will be heavier than it has been before. One way to remedy this is to afford this class of people the same kind of labour in manufactories in Canada that they go to the United States to obtain. With regard to emigration from Europe, I may say that I have never entirely agreed with the system of assisted passages. I believe it is not an overstatement when I say that upwards of $100,000 a year of our money has gone towards bringing people from the Old Country through Canada to the United States. I am quite satisfied, however, that the means taken by the hon. the Minister of Agriculture to induce the tenant farmers to come here will have a good result. There will be a large emigration from the Old Country during the next few years, and we will do well to secure that class of settlers. The hon. gentleman complained that advertisements for United States lands were to be found all over Canada. That is true. We have seen this evening a sample of those advertisements printed in the Toronto Globe office. I do not complain of that, because the Globe has a printing office in which anything may be printed that is not immoral or indecent, if it is paid for. But those advertisements are issued, not by the United States Government, but by land and railway companies. Those parties are very enterprising. When I had the honour of being in England for the Ontario Government, in 1869, I found agents of Kansas land companies lecturing, with a view to inducing people to go to that state. We find to-day, however, that there is a great emigration from Kansas, because people have found out that the representations of those agents were incorrect, that the "golden belt" was but leaden after all. I am sorry that such speeches as we have listened to are made, because we give American agents the opportunity of taking up the Official Debates and extracting statements which are, unfortunately, better for their purposes than anything which appears in their pamphlets. If hon. gentlemen will consent to hold their peace, if they cannot speak favourably of their country, I venture to think that we will have nothing to regret in connection with emigration to the North-West in future.

MR. VALLÉE: This question of immigration and emigration is too important, more especially for the Province of Quebec, the population of which serves as the basis of Parliamentary representation, to be allowed to pass in silence by the representatives of that Province. It may seem contradictory that we should make enormous sacrifices to attract a foreign population to this country, when we see, day by day, a portion of our own population deserting it. It is undeniable, and we witness it with regret, that every year a considerable part of our population set out for the United States; and I must admit that this year, more than in previous years, an extraordinary large emigration has taken place from certain districts in the Province of Quebec to the United States. What are the causes of this? It was said, a moment ago, by an hon. gentleman on the other side of the House, that it was not well to reveal the weak points of our country, that we should not dwell too much on the evils by which we are afflicted, lest we frighten away foreign emigrants, whom we desire to attract. Now, in my opinion, we too often incline to hide our weaknesses, through fear of injuring the general population of the country; we are afraid to probe the wound in order to apply a salutary remedy. This is a mistake. It is better that we should know the extent of any evil that may exist, if we desire to adopt the means of removing it. It is no use attempting to throw dust in the eyes of other countries, and trying to make them think they will find extraordinary advantages here, when they are in a position to see for themselves that our own population is leaving the country. This question must not be looked upon in the light of a party question; for if we were to deal with it in that way we should be led to false and erroneous conclusions. We must consider it from a national and patriotic stand point, and place the subject on a higher sphere than that of our ordinary discussions, banishing from our minds that spirit of animosity which too often excites strife between political parties in dealing with questions which require, for the general good, to be discussed in union and harmony. What then are the causes which result in a portion of our population leaving the country, in order to go and settle in the United States? There are many of them. It has been stated, this evening, that our people are going away in order to look for employment; but, I can mention districts from which the tide of emigration is considerable and where, nevertheless, there is work for every one who wants to do it. The principle cause of the emigration in our rural districts is a taste for luxury, a disgust for agriculture, induced by extravagant living, the result for the most part of the facility with which farmers can borrow money. Another cause which helps, indirectly, to induce our population to leave the Province, is the fact that farmers, when once they have lost their property, are ashamed to become workingmen or mechanics among their companions; they go away to the United States to work in factories or to engage in labour which they refuse to do here. They prefer to leave the country and enter the service of foreign masters rather than remain at home and adopt more frugal habits. Such are the causes of the evil we lament. What remedies can be applied to this state of things? I have already pointed out some of them. We must, in the first place, give our emigrating population the means of reaching the North-West Territories—that Great North-West so highly praised by many writers. It would, perhaps, be proper to offer to the children of the soil, who desire to emigrate, the same advantages as are offered to foreign emigrants. I remember that, last year, I wanted to send a family to Manitoba. The family were themselves extremely anxious to emigrate to the United States. It consisted of seven persons. I went to the emigration agent at Quebec, and asked him to give that family the same advantages he gave to foreign families entering the country. He made answer that those advantages were given only to those who came from foreign countries. I was shown the regulations, and found that in truth they did not permit the granting of the aid I applied for. The family left the country for the United States. It seems to me to be but a short-sighted policy to confine ourselves solely to promoting foreign emigration, when our own people are going away to the United States, in place of emigrating to our North-West Territories. Can we not give another direction to the current of emigration of the sons of the soil, by offering to the latter the same inducements that we offer to foreigners? It is time the attention of the Government was called to this matter; and I trust the hon. Ministers who represent the Province of Quebec, at all events, will take it in hands. We all remember the astonishment occasioned in the Province of Quebec by the publication of the Census of 1870. Everyone was surprised to learn that the population had scarcely increased during the decade. I very much fear that our next Census will show that our population, instead of increasing, has fallen off. Our population serves as the basis of the representation. Its increase or diminution may have serious consequences. It is evident, at a glance, how important it is for us, in the Province of Quebec, to retain our population, and to adopt, without delay, such measures as will keep our people in the country. But it will be said that we are unable to prevent our farmers from going away to the United States. That may be true to a certain extent, but I believe we can offer obstacles to this lamentable exodus. Can we not prevent American agents from offering tempting baits to our Canadians in order to induce them to emigrate to the United States? Allusion was made a moment ago to the advertisements scattered broadcast everywhere, to the placards affixed in public offices, and even in the waiting rooms of our railway stations, setting forth the inducements offered to Canadian emigrants by the United States. It is easy to pass a law prohibiting the circulation of such advertisements and the posting up of such placards. These placards are to be seen in railway stations belonging to the Government. Could not the Government prohibit the posting up of placards of this kind? The Local Government of Quebec might adopt that course also, and forbid the exhibiting, in public places, under its control, of advertisements inviting and soliciting our people to go abroad. There is another means of inducing a portion of our agricultural class, who are ashamed to remain in our old parishes, of inducing them, I say to cling to their native land. In the Province of Quebec we have the territory of the Valley of Lake St. John, a fertile district, but difficult of access, which we might place at the disposal of those who are fully determined to remove. If the Government were to return to the old policy—a policy so grand, so noble, so patriotic—the policy of repatriation; if the Government would continue to place each year in the Estimates a certain sum, to be used in promoting the repatriation of our Canadians now in the United States, we could then send Canadian agents to that country in order to induce our people who are there to emigrate to Manitoba, or to the Valley of Lake St. John. Large sums of money have been expended in sending agents to England, in order to attract emigrants to this country. Up to the present time we have seen no great results from this policy; but if the $50,000 spent for that purpose were used in preventing our own people from leaving their country for the United States, and in inducing them to turn their steps towards Manitoba and Lake St. John, an immense benefit would be conferred on our country and on our own people. If that amount were expended in keeping our population in the country, we could send hundreds of families to Lake St. John and to Manitoba, and in this way the most satisfactory results would be secured for the future prospects of our country. It will be said that, in so far as the settlement of the Valley of Lake St. John is concerned, the Local Government should take the matter in hand. But it seems to me that it is rather the duty of the Dominion Government to promote the settlement of that district, inasmuch as this Government has charge of the matter of Emigration. For it is the interest of the Dominion Government that our population should not diminish, because our revenue would diminish in like proportion. It is the interest of that Government to retain our population in the Old Provinces, in order to enable us to settle our Territories in the North-West with our surplus population hereafter, when those territories shall have been opened up. If our Eastern Provinces become depopulated, from whence shall we derive our resources to meet, for long years to come, the expenditure we shall be compelled to provide for in the North-West? This shows how very important it is that this question of population should be well considered by the Government; and I trust that next year we shall have a new law in relation to Emigration, based on the principle that we must, as far as possible, keep the children of the soil in the country.

MR. MERNER: While so much encouragement was being given to emigrants of other nationalities, the Germans should not be overlooked. It was only fair that they should be helped and encouraged to settle in the Canadian North-West. There were millions of Germans in the United States, and while thousands had been spent on English and other pamphlets to encourage emigration to the Dominion, not $10 had been spent on anything in German. I believe much good could be done by sending delegates to Europe to give all information respecting Canada. I do not believe in the usefulness of emigration agents in the Old World. I think the Opposition are wrong in running down this country, which presents many advantages to the emigrant. It is a mistake, also, to disparage our manufactures, as behind those of the United States. I also believe that the late Government was wrong in making large reservations of land for Mennonites and Icelanders, and favouring such large colonies. Those foreigners have not the same privileges as British subjects till they take the Oath of Allegiance. The Government should discourage such settlements.

MR. CASEY: There have been many attempts to raise side issues, and cast on this side of the House the imputation of lack of patriotism, because we have called attention to the blunders made by the Government in their emigration policy. Nothing more was needed than the speech of the hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. Vallée) to destroy the arguments of hon. gentlemen opposite. He stated that the emigration of the inhabitants of Quebec to the United States has been, and continues, very large, despite Conservative Government and the National Policy. The speech of this hon. gentleman, who is a friend of the Government, exonerates the Opposition from blame, and confirms our view that steps should be taken to retain the present population in the country. I have heard that the clergy of Quebec have been compelled to use their influence in the pulpit to stay this emigration, which threatens to depopulate the Province. The Government should strive to make the North-West attractive to the French-Canadians as well as other emigrants. One evil described by the hon. member for Portneuf ought to be stopped—the posting of advertisements of United States Territories and other attractions, at Intercolonial Railway Stations, for the enticement of French-Canadians to the Republic.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: That is the first I have heard of it, and I am glad the hon. gentlemen have called my attention to the matter.

MR. CASEY: The hon. member for Cardwell said that the proper remedy was to foster manufactures and afford home employment. Yet in face of the statements of hon. gentlemen on the Ministerial side, that thousands of fresh hands have been employed in Montreal and other places, by the National Policy, we have these startling confessions of our enormous emigration from the Lower Provinces. The Government should give the people more encouragement, by more liberal land regulations, to go to the Canadian North-West. If it gives away half the land to large railway companies, and then circulates, at its own expense, their pamphlets by thousands, it adopts a costly way of advertising the half it retains. The Government, besides, has been circulating pamphlets, written for a railway company, advising emigrants to go to the Turtle Mountain country, as the best in the North-West, thus giving the preference to the interests of a company over those of the country. I agree with many of the remarks of the hon. member for South Waterloo (Mr. Merner) as to the propriety of encouraging German emigration to our North-West. No better settlers could be found. I regret to learn that the efficient and promising scheme of German emigration, matured by the late Government, has been dropped by the present hon. Ministers. Madame de Koerber had established favourable relations with the Berlin Government with the view of obtaining our share of emigration. It is only through the agency of such parties as Madame de Koerber, who have a standing and position, that we can ever get our share of German emigration, as the Government is suspicious of strangers. I am sorry to hear that the hon. the Minister of Agriculture has put a stop to the negotiations in progress. I am informed, however, that there is a prospect that a large wave of emigration from Germany is about to set in to this country. Emigration from that country appears to move in periodical waves, and it seems that, at the present time, large numbers of young Germans are ready to leave their country for this continent. I would recommend this matter to the hon. member for South Waterloo, to see if he cannot get some person to conduct this emigration from Germany to Canada.

MR. FISET: I have listened with pleasure, Mr. Speaker, to the well-timed remarks of the hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. Vallée), respecting the emigration of our population to the United States; and he is, almost, the only member on the other side who has admitted the fact, although evident to all. In the Province of Quebec, the emigration this year has reached such grave proportions as to become almost a calamity. So much so, that in several places our worthy pastors have thought it their duty to interfere and to advise their faithful flocks, from the pulpit, not to leave their firesides in order to go to foreign parts. The hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) likewise admits that there is a sort of emigration to the United States, but it is only of young people who will come back to us this autumn. Such is not the case, in my opinion. At the present time this emigration appears to have assumed a new character. It is no longer only the young people who emigrate, but whole families; and we know that the latter, even though they might wish to do so, cannot return so easily, and, in the greatest number of cases, do not come back at all. I cannot share the opinion advanced by the hon. member for Portneuf, that a taste for luxury is the principle cause of the emigration of our fellow-citizens. No; those who leave our Province for the United States, especially those in my section, are unacquainted with luxury, and have never known it. I admit that there are a few exceptions, but the greater part consists of poor farmers who cannot procure from their lands, still in an unimproved condition, means of subsistence for themselves and their families; and finding no labour, no work by which they might obtain what is wanting for their support, they sell the little property they have, and go to seek, in a foreign country, work which will provide them with bread. It is painful to confess it, but it must be admitted that it is misery which compels our fellow-countrymen to emigrate. We expend considerable sums of money in enticing hitherward foreign emigration, and this year we are going to pay away more than $150,000 towards this object, and yet we do nothing to keep our fellow-citizens in the country. At least, rather than see them emigrate to the United States, it would be much better to give them the same advantages which we give to foreigners, and, in this way, to provide them with the means of establishing themselves in Manitoba or the North-West. To this end we ought to do as is done in the United States, that is to say, keep agents in the great centres who would watch the arrival of the railway trains, and would endeavour to engage our countrymen to go and settle in the North-West, by giving them the necessary instructions, and, if needs be, furnishing them with the means of transport, etc., as is done by certain American agents; for there is no concealing the fact that emigration from our own country is such as not to encourage foreign emigration to direct itself towards us. A stranger, seeing our country in this way abandoned by its own children, has every reason for enquiring into the cause of this abandonment, and then he asks himself whether the advantages offered to him are real, and we all know that doubt under similar circumstances may often have the effect of altering the route of the emigrant. I have not made these few remarks, Mr. Speaker, in a party spirit, and I think that in a question such as this there should be no party spirit. Although I have not forgotten the speeches of several hon. gentlemen on the opposite side of this House, who have promised us that Protection would bring back to the country thousands of families who now live in a foreign home, and that it was going to provide work for everybody, and to retain in our midst our unfortunate countrymen, however it may turn out, I hope that this very year, and not next year, as the hon. member for Portneuf desires, the Government will seriously concern themselves with the important question of French-Canadian emigration, and prevent its continuance on the present disastrous scale—disastrous for the whole Dominion and the Province of Quebec in particular.

MR. McQUADE: I recollect that, in 1876, a number of emigrants came from France. Five thousand dollars was expended in bringing them here; but when they were brought here there was nothing for them to do, and they had to be taken back again at a very large expense. I recollect one time, when we were passing the Estimates, an item of $10,000 was passed, under the late Government, for emigration purposes, but as I never heard of it afterwards, I supposed it was spent in election purposes. I think the hon. gentlemen of the Opposition should allow the Estimates on the head of emigration to be passed in a more gentlemanly manner.

MR. WRIGHT: In the city of Jerusalem there is a street called the place of wailing. By the Opposition, this House has been turned into a place of wailing. Their literature is that of Lamentations. Like the Englishman of Froissart, they take their pleasure sadly, and amuse themselves by weeping and wailing, and gnashing of teeth. When the Jews remember the departed glories of Israel, the destruction of the temple, and the incidents of the Babylonian captivity, they retire to the street of wailing and indulge in a protracted wail. And so with our friends of the Opposition. When they think of the departed glories of the political Israel, of the lost shekels of the treasury, and of the flesh-pots of their political Egypt, they betake themselves to the predictions of their favourite Jeremiah, and relieve their minds with a protracted wail, "Like the wolf's long howl on Onolaska's shore." Well, every man to his taste, but I prefer a more cheerful and pleasant mode of expression. It is the old, old story, the operation of the universal law—

“ Then let the stricken deer go weep,
The hart ungalled play,
For some must watch and some must sleep,
So wears the world away.”

I must confess that, while bowing to the inevitable, my sympathies are with the laughing instead of the weeping philosopher. I do not care for studies of morbid anatomy. Some of our friends have drawn pictures of our condition, which excelled in all their loathsome details, the awful description of the plague at Florence, or the still more ecologist picture of the lepers of Tracadie. We do not wish to investigate the secrets of the lazar house; nor do I think such studies to be of a profitable character. If the statements of the speakers of the Opposition be correct, this is a country to emigrate from, and not to ask people to settle in. I am satisfied that there is a silver lining to the cloud—that things are improving; that the storm has spent its fury, and the reaction has taken place, and that a bright day has dawned. All the accounts which reach us announce that every kind of business is improving. Much has been made of the famous statement that Ministers can do nothing to promote the prosperity of the country, and that they are literally “flies on the wheel.” Well, there are many kinds of flies. In the summer season their name is legion. The present Minister of Finance may be called the little busy, busy bee, who goes humming around, and hears the pleasant sound of all those mechanical devices which promote the development of our industrial resources. To borrow the suggestive language of Dr. Watts:

“ How doth the little busy bee
Improve each shining hour,
And gather honey every day,
From every opening flower.”

The late Finance Minister (Sir Richard J. Cartwright) may be compared to an active and energetic wasp, who flies about like a Median knight, striking his lance or his scing into his opponents, and gathering anything but honey. I was much pained to hear from the hon. member for Portneuf as to the exodus of the inhabitants from the Province of Quebec. The way to cure this evil is to build up manufactures in our midst, give them work, and keep our own people at home. We have in the Province of Quebec all the elements of national greatness and material prosperity. We have unlimited water power, and vast mineral resources—great facilities for developing our manufactures. We have an active, industrious, and intelligent population, who should be kept at home to aid in the development of our own resources. It is for these reasons that I gave in my adhesion to the National Policy, the protection, as far as possible, of Canadian industries. We all know what the economic arguments are. To buy in the cheapest and sell in the dearest market has been held as the true economical evangel. If this economic law be of universal application; if absolute Free trade between all nations can exist, there can be no doubt of the soundness of the system. But, unhappily, these laws are not of universal application. The United States have a highly protective system. They tax our productions and make our country a slaughter-market for their surplus goods. Under these circumstances, I was most reluctantly compelled to modify my Free-trade opinions, and give my support to the policy of protecting our Canadian industries; and I am satisfied that, with some modification, this policy will prove successful and satisfactory. Now, I hope that the Minister of Agriculture will direct his attention to the solution of the great problem of settling the waste lands of this Dominion. The future of the Dominion depends on the satisfactory solution of this problem. If the surplus population of the Empire can be induced to settle on our waste lands, our future will be assured. Why could not some scheme be devised by which the gallant and generous Irish, the sturdy German, and hardy Scot could be induced to make the Dominion their home. The visit of the representatives of the tenant farmers was a most satisfactory arrangement, and will, no doubt, produce desirable results. I hope that the hon. Minister will not lessen his efforts in this direction. The Russian Government appear to understand the exigencies of the hour. When there is a surplus of population in Finland those who are willing to go are committed in war ships to the Amoor. Why cannot the English transports be employed in a similar manner. During the last ten years five millions of British subjects have settled in the United States, taking so many from England and adding them to a foreign country. If the people had been settled in Canada they would have added to the wealth and strength and power of the Dominion. I hope that the energies of the Ministry will be devoted to settling Englishmen, Irishmen and Scotchmen on the waste lands of the Dominion. I believe that the Mennonites and Icelanders will prove good settlers, but I prefer the natives of the British Isles. I would like to see the inhabitants of the older Provinces aided, if they desire to settle in the western portions of the Dominion. If wise counsels prevail, if settlement is carefully and energetically carried out, the grave problem of the future will be successfully solved. I have no sympathy with those who systematically decry and disparage the resources of the Dominion. I have no sympathy with those who give their attention to studies of morbid anatomy. Philip of Spain was in the habit of descending into the vaults of the Escorial, and gazing on the features of the dead queen, whom he loved so well. Is this Canada of ours dead or is she living. Do we look on the dead queen lying in state, with all her jewels upon her, in all her still and solemn and stately beauty, or is she the blooming and beautiful and blushing bride, who springs to our warm embrace. Sir, our country is still full of life, energy and vitality. It has a grand future before it, and it is better to have a future than a past.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT asked what was the condition of the Icelandic settlement, and whether it was proposed to bring any more settlers from Iceland.

MR. POPE (Compton): I am sorry to say that the settlement has not been as successful as I had hoped it would have been. It seems that some interference on the part of a certain clergyman has caused a good many of these people to leave, and I am informed that others are going. Those that remain, however, are doing very well. We have no hopes of any more coming out this year.

MR. KRANZ: The emigration from Canada to the United States, which has been commented on so unfavourably by hon. members of the Opposition, is mainly due to the fact that, in former years, Canadians had emigrated to the Western States, attracted by their rich and easily cultivated prairie lands, and numbers of others now follow them on that account. At that time, however, our Great North-West was not opened up, but as soon as this event took place, the tide of emigration commenced to flow in that direction. The emigration to Kansas from the county which I have the honour to represent, was brought about by the instrumentality of land speculators, who used every effort to settle tracts of land which they had bought in that state. In my opinion the Government should use every effort, and not spare expense, to make known to German emigrants the resources and fertility of the lands of our North-West Territories. If this was done, I think a large number of German emigrants could be secured for Canada, and no doubt German capitalists might be induced to invest in the purchase and the development of our mineral lands. A report brought down lately, giving the imports during six months ending 31st December, 1879, shows that a large amount of duty has been paid on farm produce imported from the United States for consumption in Canada. Now, if the Tariff has really not increased the price of these articles in Canada, then there can be no doubt of the fact that the American producer has contributed the amount of the duties into our Treasury. The German Tariff, being much higher than the Canadian, I do not think that the fear of heavy taxation would keep German emigrants from coming to Canada, and I wish to recommend them to the serious consideration of the hon. the Minister of Agriculture.

MR. GILLMOR: I do not rise for the purpose of criticising the emigration policy of the hon. the Minister of Agriculture. He has had a good deal of experience in that Department, and is doing the best he can to make this branch of his Department a success. I approve of bringing the tenant farmers to this country, and I approve of furnishing information to the different countries in Europe from which we may expect emigrants, giving them both the lights and shadows they may expect to find in Canada; but I am entirely opposed to paying out our money to bring any emigrants from Europe. We have purchased the North-West, said to be so fertile, and lauded, I think, above its deserts. We give free grants to settlers, and are building a railway to enable settlers to get into that country, and emigrants not satisfied to come, under these circumstances, at their own expense had better remain at home. We have taxed our people quite too much already to bring emigrants from Europe, many of whom have gone to the United States. This discussion has been prolonged by hon. gentlemen on the Government Benches, charging the Opposition with a lack of patriotism, and by denying that there are any very considerable number of people leaving this Dominion for the United States. As regards patriotism, it is simply silly to allude to it as it has been alluded to. I presume there is about as much on one side as the other, man for man. Hon. gentlemen are now forced to admit, what ought not to have been denied, for it is a fact that more people are leaving Canada for the United States this year than on any former year in my remembrance. No hon. member on this side of the House has charged the Government with having been the cause of this; but, we do say that all the loud-mouthed professions that the National Policy would find work and bread for all, and keep our people at home, have proved a melancholy failure, and the National Policy has only made it harder for the working-man to get a living in this country.

MR. ARKELL: There appears to be a desire on the opposite side of the House not to people the North-West. There are a number going to Dakota, but they are going there because there is a railway to bring them to the parts they want to go to; and I am satisfied, if the railway we are building is opened, these people will go to our North-West Territory. If hon. gentlemen opposite had pushed on the railway west of Winnipeg, we should have a very large population in that Territory now. We shall now, under the present Administration, do this.

MR. LANGEVIN: Mr. Speaker, I cannot allow this Resolution to pass without addressing a few words to this hon. House, and more especially without showing to my hon. friend the member for Portneuf that I have listened to his remarks, and making it evident to him that I regret, as he does, the departure of our fellow-countrymen. The Government deplore the emigration of the Canadians, and more especially when that emigration goes to the United States. But the fact itself is nothing new. Our fellow-countrymen, or, at all events, very many of them, have at all times loved a life of adventure. They have traversed nearly the whole of America, and settled in a large number of the states of the American Union. Moreover, this mania for emigration is not confined to our French-Canadian fellow-countrymen. It seems to prevail in every part of this continent. Look at the eastern states of the American Union, and you see whole populations, almost, leaving for the west. Why is this? Because the west, by its immensity and its natural wealth, attracts them. They hope to better their position there, and they go there to settle. The hon. member says: But why have you not done for the people of the country—for our own people—what you have done for aliens? The hon. member is mistaken; the Government does not pay the fare for the sea voyage; it only pays the fare from Halifax or Quebec to Toronto, and the Ontario Government repays us two thirds of that expenditure for those who remain at Toronto. Now, as regards Canadians who desire to emigrate, the Department of Agriculture does its best to secure from the railway and steamboat companies the most favourable terms possible for our emigrants, who wish to leave the older Provinces for Manitoba. These advantages are offered to all our fellow-citizens, without distinction of creed or origin. If they hope to better their position by leaving Ontario or Quebec, or the Maritime Provinces, and going to Manitoba, why prevent them from doing so? But, I am asked, why not pay their fare? If we paid the passage of those persons, must we not, in like manner, pay the fares of those who leave Manitoba in order to return to Quebec or to Ontario? The latter would clearly have as good a right as the former. Where should we stop? The Government might quite as reasonably be asked to pay the passage of those who desire to go from one Province to another for any and every reason. But one thing is certain, namely, that if emigration, on a large scale, is now taking place from certain counties, it is because there has not hitherto been any emigration from those counties. There are many other counties, from which Canadians have emigrated, in order to settle in other Provinces. It is the surplus population that is leaving those counties which are now losing their inhabitants by emigration. They have employment, their farms are well tilled, and, in fact, better tilled than they were before. Those who have left have gone to settle in Manitoba, or in the North-West, and, I regret to say, a large number have gone to the United States. But how can you prevent them going away to settle in the United States? The other day the Rev. Father Lacombe, from the North-West, came to Quebec, and there made preparations for the removal of a certain number of families to Manitoba. He had completed all his arrangements, and the families were all ready to start; but what happened? One half of those emigrants left him, and went away to the United States. How can you restrain such people, if they are absolutely bent on going to a foreign country? It cannot be done. They are attracted there, as the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) said, by their friends who have gone there before them. You cannot prevent this. You may adopt any measures you like, and yet, after all, large numbers of our fellow-countrymen will continue to go to the United States. For these nothing can be done. But we are asked, why do you not strive to bring back to our country from the United States those who are already there? Well, something is being done in that direction. This very day, if I am not mistaken, an emigration agent, Mr. Lalime, leaves Chicago with 400 Canadian emigrants for Manitoba. So you can see that an emigration of that nature already exists; and there are other persons in the United States engaged in inducing Canadian emigrants to go to Manitoba. The other day, I saw a Winnipeg newspaper which announced the arrival of three families from Manitoba; the names and the number of members of each family were also given. We must not be alarmed then at the number of persons who emigrate from one Province to another. It is in the nature of things. We see the Germans, the Irish, the French, the Swiss, and the Italians leaving their own countries, in order to better their condition by going elsewhere. Why do the Germans, for instance, leave their country and come to Canada? It is because they are not satisfied at home; they have laws which do not suit them; they have enormous taxes to pay. The hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Kranz) alluded to his fellow-countrymen on the other side of the Atlantic, and asked why the Department of Agriculture had not published a pamphlet in German in order to invite German emigration. I am in a position to tell him that the hon. the Minister of Agriculture is now publishing a pamphlet in the German language in Germany, where it will be circulated. That pamphlet will help to diffuse a knowledge of our country amongst the inhabitants of the German Empire, who desire to emigrate. The hon. member for Portneuf remarked just now, that much might be done towards inducing Canadians to remain in the country, by selecting tracts of land in the Province of Quebec, in the Saguenay district for instance, in order to get them to locate themselves there. To this I reply, that the Government of Quebec provides great facilities in that respect. It must be borne in mind that the two Governments have their respective and separate attributes. The lands in the Province of Quebec belong to the Local Government and, consequently, we cannot interfere there. The Quebec Government is thoroughly well disposed to encourage the colonisation of those lands, but if our fellow-countrymen do not choose to remain there, if they prefer going to a foreign country, we cannot retain them against their will. The hon. member indicated, as causes of the emigration, a dislike to farm-life—a desire for enjoyment, etc. He might have specified much more weighty reason than those, and that is the apathy of the wealthy class, who have capital, and who neglect to invest it in manufactories, thus failing to avail themselves of the advantages afforded to them by the magnificent water power which the Province possesses. We see such manufactories established elsewhere, but unfortunately it must be said, that in the district from which the hon. member comes, and to which I, myself, belong, capitalists have not as yet done their duty. They invest their capital in banks from which they derive six or seven per cent., so that that capital in no way benefits the population. Let our capitalists act as those of Montreal and elsewhere have done, and we shall see manufactories and industries established, at which the population will find work. That has already begun elsewhere. The National Policy was adopted but a few months ago; time must be allowed for that policy to produce all the good results which are to be expected from it. I am satisfied that next Session we shall see much greater results than those which we to-day behold. For my part I rejoice over the increase of prosperity which has manifested itself in the country since last Session. There can be no doubt but that the financial as well as the industrial condition of Canada has greatly improved. There can be no doubt but that we have now in the country a much greater demand for labour than was the case a year ago, and that a much larger number of the industrial class have found employment. The hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. Fiset) put me a question just now. He was deploring the departure of a large number of our fellow-countrymen for the United States, and he asked: why do these people go to the United States? Why do they not remain in the country, if the National Policy is so fine a thing? I will tell him why. They go to the United States because the National Policy has been in operation in that country for a longer time than it has been in ours, and has, therefore, had time to produce a much greater abundance of fruit. Numerous manufactories and industries of all kinds have been established and give employment to hundreds of thousands of workmen, and that is why our fellow-countrymen go to the United States. Let us, therefore, give our National Policy time to produce its effect, and we shall see that very soon, not only will our fellow-countrymen in want of work remain in the country, but further, those who are already in the United States will return to reside permanently among us. It must not be supposed that our fellow-country men go willingly to seek for work in the United States. They would a hundred times sooner remain in the country. Many of them who have had experience of the United States, would be willing to return but have not the means of doing so; they are there, and there they are tied by necessity. If they had but devoted to the cultivation of their land in Canada the same energy and the same labour which they have expended and displayed in the United States, and if they had not suffered themselves to be led away by the delusive prospect which that country presents, they would now have been prosperous; they would have followed in the steps of many others who, at the commencement, struggled with adversity, but at last, by dint of labour, attained an enviable competence and bequeathed a rich patrimony to their children. But to make our fellow-countrymen understand that they ought to remain in the country, it is necessary that we should show them an example. We must not disparage our country; we must make our fellow-countrymen understand that when they have a home in the country it is better for them to remain there than go abroad. But if we hint or say to the country population, who, in many instances, have but little education, that our country is not a good one, that our institutions are bad, we must expect these people to bend their steps in the direction indicated to them and go abroad. I shall not pursue the subject further. I wished only to convey to hon. members who have spoken on the subject, that the Government regrets all emigration which is a loss to the country, and that it is their intention to do all that lies in their power to prevent that emigration. And in reply to the hon. member for Portneuf, I may tell him that, until to-night, the Government were not aware that posters had been put up in the cars of the Intercolonial Railway, tending to attract emigration to the United States. The Minister of Railways assures me that he will see that nothing of the kind occurs in future.

In reply to Mr. HUNTINGTON,

Mr. POPE (Compton): said, Sir Alexander Galt was to take charge of the emigration business on the other side of the Atlantic, under the direction, of course, of the Department here ; and that Mr. Annand was to still occupy a position.

MR. HUNTINGTON asked, further, what were the relations of Sir Alexander Galt to the Government? Did he express their views? Were they and he "two hearts with but a single thought?" Were the Government responsible for that gentleman's utterances, and especially for the sentiments put forth by him at the recent Montreal banquet? If so, where were we drifting to? Sir Alexander Galt had, at that banquet, stated that the construction of the Pacific Railway was beyond our ability without Imperial aid. He would like to know if the Government expected to get that aid, or whether it is intended to wait until that aid is given. Sir Alexander Galt had almost stated that we could, under the Confederation Act, make treaties with foreign States independently of the Imperial Government, except the employment of her diplomatic machinery. This was rather startling. We were told that the treaty-making power was ceded to us, and that Great Britain could not make any treaty affecting us without our consent. Were these statements such as expressed the views of the Government? He (Mr. Huntington) supposed that since the whole diplomatic machinery of the Empire was at our command, then, if we wished to make a treaty the British army is to be placed at our disposal, in order to inflict punishment on those who treat us improperly. Would the Government give the House some definite information as to the relations in which Sir Alexander Galt stood to them? He (Mr. Huntington) thought it very important to have his questions answered, and he would give them two days' notice; but they would hear more about it as they drifted towards that terrible desolation which the "Jingoes" have experienced. In that speech of his, Sir Alexander Galt—with two Ministers sitting beside him—spoke of a British Zollverein, which would bring us back to the old state of things, when we should have our Tariff regulated for us by the Empire. Was this one of the schemes intended to be carried out by our High Commissioner on his present mission? He (Mr. Huntington) did not want to embarrass the Government, he thought this matter would embarrass them of itself; but he had a secret which he would tell the Government. It was this: The Conservatives saw that this gentleman, whom they had sent to England as High Commissioner, was a dangerous man, that is, that he was a great man, who must be got out of the way, no matter what expense it entailed upon the country. Sir Alexander Galt was a dangerous man, he was a popular man, who might trample the party's National Policy under foot, if he liked, or he might defy it if he chose. The hon. the Minister of Finance ought to rise at once and explain the discrepancy between himself and the hon. gentleman who represented him in England, and whether there were certain sky-rockets of which we were to have the benefit. If Lord Beaconsfield had been left undisturbed we might have had a Naval Reserve, and all sorts of grand things in Canada; but though such a change had occurred, though the mighty Jingoes have fallen, and the vulgar Radicals have taken their place, all these things were still open for the hon. gentlemen opposite to explain.

MR. LARUE: I cannot allow the circumstance before us to pass without drawing attention to the conclusions arrived at by the hon. Minister of Public Works, in relation to the emigration of the French-Canadians to the United States. We have just heard one of the Conservative Ministers officially admit the fact that, it is impossible to prevent the French-Canadians from emigrating to the United States. I have often heard that evil deplored, but this is the first occasion on which I have heard a Minister declare that no remedy could be found for that state of things. We all know that the Conservative party, when the General Elections were going on, extolled Protection as the panacea for all our ills, and as tending especially to prevent the emigration of French-Canadians to the United States. And now the hon. Minister has just acknowledged to us that his great remedy has failed, and that there is no way of preventing the emigration which we all deplore. The hon. Minister and his friends told us at the time, and proclaimed from the hustings, everywhere, that the emigration of the French-Canadians to the United States would cease as soon as Protection came into force. Protection has been in force for fourteen months and the emigration is greater now than it ever was before. I thank the hon. Minister for having furnished us with an argument which we can use with such effect in the Province of Quebec, in the fact that he told us in the name of the Government that it is impossible to prevent the French-Canadians from emigrating to the United States. The hon. Minister stated further that a desire not to remain in the country is a characteristic of the French-Canadian. That remark appears to me to be of such importance that I cannot refrain from expatiating upon it, to the end that the country may know what to expect under the circumstances. I am glad to be aware that the hon. the Minister of Public Works has, to-day, officially declared that it is a characteristic of the French-Canadian to emigrate to the United States. When he was sitting at the left of the Speaker's chair, under the late Government, he several times declared that a remedy might be found for that great moral evil. How does it happen that, with all his talent, and with all his vast experience, he has not yet discovered that remedy? How is it that the Conservative Government, which rose to power by means of Protection, has been unable to discover that moral remedy which was to prevent French-Canadians from expatriating themselves? While the General Elections were going on, we were told: Wait, wait; we have found Protection; we shall enrich the country; we shall teach farmers how to live in Canada without going to the United States; we shall provide the father of the family with an opportunity of finding employment for his children in the factories; we shall provide him with the money necessary for the purchase, in new parishes, of farms upon which his children may settle. What do we see to-day? We have had experience of the National Policy; and the hon. the Minister of Public Works tells us, officially, that the National Policy has not yet had time to produce its effect. How soon then will this Protection, this wonderful National Policy, provide us with an opportunity of preventing French-Canadians from emigrating to the United States? It is probable that we shall have to wait for new General Elections. Now, I am satisfied that the only remedy for this state of things is the infliction upon our Conservative friends of as crushing a defeat as that to which they subjected us at the last General Elections. A good reason given by the hon. Minister to the House to prove that it is impossible to prevent French-Canadian emigration to the United States, is the following:—"If we give the Canadians money to assist them to go and settle in Manitoba, we must also give the inhabitants of Manitoba the money necessary to enable them to return to the Province of Quebec." I considered that reason a very good one, but especially a very original and a very ingenious one. The hon. Minister knows perfectly well that Manitoba is a new Province, and that the tide of emigration sets from the old Provinces towards the new, and not from the new towards the old. I shall say no more; I did not, intend, expect to speak upon this question, but I could not refrain from making the remarks which I have done to the end that the electors of Quebec might know what to expect from the present policy of the Government, especially in so far as relates to emigration, that incurable evil, which threatens to depopulate Lower Canada for the benefit of the United States.

MR. LANDRY: The hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. LaRue) has good reason for saying that he dwells in the cold regions of Opposition. The speech which he has just made proves this incontestably, inasmuch as it bears the stamp of the place which witnessed its birth, and the spirit which brought it to light. The House, as I do, asks what does the hon. member mean, and what is the meaning of this curious mode of reasoning, and of replying to the arguments of his adversaries. The method adopted by my hon. friend is very easy, its recipe is very simple, and the feeblest of orators can always make use of it. It consists solely in rising, and, without any consideration, without knowing anything of the question under discussion, opening his mouth, and shrieking out that his adversary is not serious, that he wishes to make an ill-timed joke, that he is childish in his statements, comical in his ideas, and, if he has the talent of spinning off for ten minutes arguments of this character, he may take his seat, innocently believing that he has convincingly answered the arguments of his adversaries. But then the House always reserves the right, as in the present instance, of smiling in pity at these fruitless efforts. This is all which results this evening from the speech which the hon. member for Bellechasse has just made. It is not my intention to refute the arguments brought forward by the hon. member, for the very good reason that he has not advanced a single one, and he has simply talked for talking's sake. Such is the opinion of this House, and such will certainly be that of the country when it is apprised of my hon. friend's extraordinary arguments.

MR. MACKENZIE: Can the hon. gentleman tell me how much of this money he expects to expend in promoting emigration to the North-West.

MR. POPE: A very large portion of it will be expended for that purpose.

63 Salaries of Military Branch and District Staff..... $23,800
 64 Salaries of Brigade Majors..... 17,400

MR. STRANGE pointed out the inadequacy of the vote for Militia purposes, and for placing the forces in a proper and efficient condition. The whole force for several years had been languishing, not from lack of martial spirit in the young men of Canada, but because it was impossible for them to give their time unless adequately remunerated, or at least unless they received more encouragement from the Government than they had done. Since 1875 no Brigade Camp had been held in Canada, and it was necessary for efficiency to have a Brigade Camp in every district every other year, or every year if possible. Some changes begun by the late Minister of Militia had been for the better. For instance, gunpowder, which formerly had to be obtained from England, was now supplied by the manufacturers of Canada, and it was as good in quality as that formerly supplied by the Imperial Government, and at a less expense of 5 or 10 per cent. In addition to this reform in the service, the late Minister of Militia also put into motion the idea of converting our own ordnance into rifled cannon. That is a great step in the interest of the Militia service. He also commenced the manufacture of 7-inch Palliser guns. I believe two are being manufactured in Canada, as shells and projectiles might be were there funds. Ammunition, that we used to import from England, also is being made in Canada. I extremely regret the hon Minister cannot increase the vote for Militia purposes this year. I believe that, if this vote cannot be increased for some years, our only alternative is to reduce the standing force. At present, it consists of a total force of officers and men of 36,211, including forty-two troops of cavalry, eighteen companies of artillery, four troops of garrison artillery, five companies of engineers, and eighty-three battalions of infantry, together with eleven provisional battalions. Our Canadian force has two objects: first, being a citizen soldiery, the quelling of internal dissensions, which, in the past, it has admirably effected, though I hope the next occasion for its employment in this manner is far distant. Still, considering the extent of our territory and circumstances, we need such a force, with a view to such contingencies. No means could be more suitable for putting down internal disturbance, than by the use of the Militia force; its presence, without the use of arms, being likely, by the moral effect alone on an unruly multitude, to prove sufficient, in many cases, for this purpose. Our Militia force has, for its second object, the guarding of our country from the inroads of external foes. As in the past, so in the future, it would be able to hold its own with any foreign enemy till assistance arrived from the Imperial authorities. I look upon foreign molestation as a visionary contingency; I do not think there is anything to fear in that respect. But still our motto always has been: "In pace paratus." I think the force for both these purposes should be kept up to moderate strength. Having shown that the vote is not adequate to give the present force twelve days' drill, I think our only alternative is to reduce it. I think that a well-drilled and efficient force of 20,000 men would be ample for the two objects of the force—the quelling of internal disturbance and the protection of our shores from a foreign enemy. That number would give us thirty regiments of rifles and infantry of the full strength of ten companies each, or a total of 14,500 officers and men. Then to the scientific branch, and to the engineers, artillery and cavalry would be allotted the remainder, or 5,500 men, I believe, that would constitute a force perfectly adequate for the purposes for which a Militia is maintained. The remaining 16,000 men might be placed on the Reserved Force. In making those arrangements, the strong battalions, which have kept up their strength and efficiency, should receive the preference and be kept on the Active Force, the mere skeleton regiments being placed on the Reserve. The District Staff, besides, might be reduced with advantage, the Brigade Majors being dispensed with, and their duties discharged by the Deputy Adjutant Generals; the saving thus practicable would be $17,400, and without detriment to the efficiency of the service. Then the drill allowance to many of the corps is virtually a waste of money at present. At present, I regret to say, the drill allowance, in many cases, goes into the pockets of the captains and is not expended on the regiment. I believe if you reduce the force to 20,000 men that you might certainly reduce drill allowance by 50 per cent, thus saving $20,000 a year. Then you might reduce the vote on ammunition 50 per cent., saving $12,500; the vote for clothing might be reduced 50 per cent., saving $25,000; the vote on military stores might be reduced 50 per cent., saving $20,000; the vote on public armouries might be reduced 25 per cent., saving $13,000; the vote on contingencies might be reduced 25 per cent., saving $11,500; making a total saving of $119,400. Now, as against this saving, I believe it is imperative that the drill pay should be increased; that is one item on which I think the Government ought to bestow a generous expenditure. The present vote for drill pay is $175,000. I would suggest that it be increased to $250,000 a year. By this means you will be able every year to drill the whole force in Brigade Camps, and be able to pay them a $1 a day for the men, and the officers according to their respective rank. It seems to me, by this means we could have a force which could be depended upon at any moment. If this vote is increased by $75,000, and you subtract this increase from $119,400, which might be saved in other branches, you would effect a saving to the country of $44,400 a year, and, at the same time, have an efficient force in the country. I have heard much said about the Head Quarters Staff. I must say that I am not in favour of making any reduction in that staff; I believe it is a thoroughly good staff, and that every member of it has his hands pretty full. If the forces were reduced by one half, possibly a few clerks might be dismissed, but I think the vote for the maintenance of the Department should be, at all events, not decreased by any great amount. I have not made this proposition out of any spirit of hostility to the present Government, but I felt it my duty, as an officer of militia, as a citizen of Canada, and as a member of this House, to bring this matter before the House. I trust that hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House will give the matter serious consideration. I can vouch that a large amount of this sum, now voted every year, is money thrown away. If such a scheme as this, or some modification of it, were to be entertained, this sum would be thoroughly well spent, and the country would save each year the large amount I have indicated.

MR. MASSON: I am thankful to the hon. gentleman for his kind appreciation of the efforts I have made to put the Militia force of the country on a good footing; I have tried to do so without incurring a larger expenditure than has been incurred in the past. I was rather disappointed in hearing the hon. gentleman speak of the actual condition of the force. My opinion was that the force, to-day, was perhaps on a better footing than it has been for several years past. If I were to refer to the regiment of which the hon. gentleman himself is so distinguished an officer—the Queen's Own of Toronto—as an example, I should be satisfied that it was very far from going down. I admit that the condition of the force is owing more to the generous efforts of the officers and men themselves than to the grant given by the Government. The funds at the disposal of the country at the present moment are necessarily limited, and it is necessary to limit the funds for Militia purposes, in so far as is consistent with its efficiency. The hon. gentleman's suggestion that the force should be reduced is an easy one to make, but difficult to carry out. In order to reduce the force, we must discriminate between the different corps. I have heard many people say that we should only maintain the city corps, and dispense with the rural corps, but that, in my opinion, would be a grievous mistake. The force, as it exists to-day, does not cost too much for the services which it renders to the country. It would be a mistake to disband the rural corps. I know that the city corps, by their dash, their activity, and their tidiness, are the pride of the Dominion; but you must remember that the strength and solidity of the volunteer force, depends mainly on the rural corps. The country does not regret the amount spent on its volunteers, and it would be a great difficulty for the Minister of Militia to make any reduction. I am satisfied that the volunteers, and the people generally, are content with the present condition of the forces. The hon. gentleman has spoken of the District Staff. What can be said of the staff can be said of the whole of the forces. People do not see the advantages of that staff until its services are required. But whatever argument can be made against the staff, can be made against the rank and file. When the emergency arises and the volunteers are called out anywhere, then the public will be quite willing to admit that it is better to pay these men well. If the troops were called out to quell a riot in either of the large cities, the people would very soon forget the amount of money that had been expended for Militia purposes. The Government last year, at my recommendation, made some reduction in the staff. We have reduced that vote by $6,000, and I think that that is as far as we can go at the present time. The hon. gentleman has paid a deserved compliment to the Head Quarter's Staff. I agree with him, and I take this occasion to recognise the eminent abilities, and the kind and courteous disposition of the officer who has been acting as Adjutant-General of these forces for so many years.

MR. BUNSTER said this was a very important subject. The Pacific coast was of considerable extent, and greater means of defence were necessary. The subject was one which, he thought, was one worthy of the grave consideration of the hon. the Minister of Militia.

MR. DOMVILLE: I was very sorry to hear my hon. friend from North York speak of the Militia service of the country as he has done to-day. When he spoke of the reduction of the number of Brigade-Majors, I wondered how we were to get on in the event of such trouble arising as that referred to by the hon. the Minister of Militia. I should be very sorry to see the number of these necessary and capable officers reduced. I do not think the amount appropriated for instruction pay is too great, and I certainly cannot support the hon. gentleman's assertion that there is too much spent for clothing. If any reduction is to be made in the Militia, I would suggest that the pruning-knife should be applied to the city corps, which are of a less permanent character than the rural corps.

MR. BOULTBEE: There is a very strong conviction through the country, in order to render our Militia force efficient, the attention of the Department must be directed largely to the keeping up of the corps. If any reduction is to be made, make it in the expenses of the staff. The staff in the local centres are much too extensive, and something should be done in direction of reducing the expense.

MR. WILLIAMS said that he disagreed with the hon. member for North York in so many of his suggestions that he felt compelled to trespass upon the attention of the House. He understood the hon. gentleman to recommend a reduction in the numerical strength of the force; in his opinion such would be most prejudicial to the welfare of the Dominion. In Great Britain the party, whose anti-colonial policy was so marked, is again about to assume the reins of office, and probably such a course as has been suggested would only be readily construed into an intimation that we were unwilling to bear a share of the defence of the Empire, and the tendency would be to weaken those ties which we hold so dear; and, if the reduction were made, the result would have a large proportionate reduction in the forces of the rural districts. I had every confidence in the corps—the Queen's Own—of which the hon. member was so talented and ornamental a member; it was a corps that would do honor to any regular army in the world; he felt that the hon. member had no desire that that corps should suffer in the suggested reduction of the force. We were well aware that the rural corps, as a rule, did not understand the art of dressing themselves with that neatness that so marked the city corps, but he felt satisfied that when endurance and pluck were required that those from the country would be found to be quite equal in efficiency to those corps that the hon. gentleman seemed to prize so highly. He would not take up the attention of the House by following the hon. gentleman in his suggestions in detail, many of which he thought most objectionable, must not lose sight of the fact that it was necessary that the valuable stores of arms, clothing, etc., which were scattered throughout the country, had to be frequently inspected, or a serious loss would be entailed upon the Government. He thought then that it would be false economy to make any reduction in the staff.

MR. KIRKPATRICK said no vote was so important as this; it was an expenditure all over the country, and was understood by the people thoroughly.

MR. MACKENZIE: Except the Wimbledon expenses.

MR. KIRKPATRICK said the Wimbledon expenses, although spent in another place, did much good, and were the means of making Canada better known. The hon. member for Centre Huron (Sir Richard J. Cartwright) did commence a military career; he went through the goose step; but I never heard that he went any further. It was quite unnecessary to reduce the staff; it was better to drill the force even once in three years, than to disband them, for, in case of emergency, they could be got together. He thought it a good plan to move the District Staff about to different locations every five years. He did not see why one Gunnery School should not be sufficient, and he suggested that it should be kept at Quebec. If there was another school necessary let it be a school for cavalry and infantry. The artillery got too much attention, when compared with the cavalry. The artillery get a dollar a day and fodder for their horses, whilst cavalymen get only 75c. a day, and have to find their own fodder, and the artillery had no harder work than the cavalry.

MR. WRIGHT said he thought the statement respecting the rural battalions was most unfair. He had three companies, perhaps the first soldiers in the world. He ventured to say every member in the House would say the same. He had great pleasure whenever they drilled; and he could state most emphatically that they did not spend their money at the taverns, they belong to the Tilley and Tupper wing of the great Conservative party. He thought his friend who had gone to Wimbledon had illustrated Canadian military tactics. He had a grave charge to make against the Department in not encouraging the organising of a company offered in his county; they maintained three companies and two of the men had been selected for Wimbledon this year. He thought the subject should be treated gravely, and he hoped the application, with regard to the organisation of a regiment in his county, would receive consideration.

MR. MASSON said that any company formed in that district would be acceptable, but No. 5 district had 1,500 men which was above its quota. It was proposed to reduce the city corps, and the rural corps would be found to be better.

MR. THOMPSON (Haldimand) said, in reference to the amount appropriated for drill, the money was almost wasted. When the battalions were called out they had only four actual working days. There was the day on which they came into camp, and the return day, on which little or nothing was done; they came on Monday and left on Saturday; and, therefore there were only four actual days given to drill; that was all that was done for the money received. It was a great farce. We agreed with the idea of drilling at head quarters. In the cities, he said, the corps were mostly officered by gentlemen of means, but they were not by any means, with this exception, as safe or reliable as the rural corps, which really formed the bone and sinew of the country, and it was upon them that the country must depend when hard work was to be done. We have had instances already in our Canadian history. Everyone must remember the unfortunate affair at Ridgway, in which the city battalions were the first on the retreat.

MR. HUNTINGTON: I am glad to hear that there is to be no discrimination against the rural districts. The words of the hon. gentleman will be a comfort to the volunteers of the country.

MR. STRANGE: I was not present at Ridgway, but, from what I heard, several valuable lives were saved, and the city battalions went to the front in good style.

In reply to MR. DESJARDINS,

MR. MASSON said in relation to the formation of a new regiment at Montreal, I may state that before leaving the Militia Department, in view of the fact that District No. 6, and the French district of Montreal, had not a number of volunteers proportionate to that in the other districts, I gave instructions to the Department that, in the event of its being desired to form new companies, such might be done to the extent of 700 men. I know that three or four companies were formed before I left the Department. I do not know the position of affairs since then, but I will enquire of the hon. the Minister of Militia, and will give the hon. member the explanations when concurrence in the vote is before the House.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT: I have a small grievance to which I should like to call the attention of the hon. Minister. Last autumn a number of Snider rifles were imported for the 33rd Battalion Rifle Association, on which a Customs duty of $30 was levied. I think it was the custom, in former years, to admit arms for such purposes free.

MR. MASSON: I think that in the case the hon. gentleman refers to, the rifles were imported by individual members of the association.

MR. MACKENZIE: I observed in a newspaper a statement that the Government were going to uniform a body of schoolboys, who are forming a rifle association in a western town.

MR. MASSON: That statement is not correct. All those associations have to provide uniforms at their own cost. The Government had got clothing for the Militia better and cheaper in Canada, of late, than the clothing formerly purchased abroad, inclusive of a duty of 17½ per cent.

MR. MACKENZIE asked would it not have been possible to have got this clothing made in the Penitentiaries?

MR. MASSON said that he was informed the experiment was never tried.

MR. MACKENZIE said it was tried, and that there was no reason why that clothing should not be made in those prisons, as it would supply labour of a most legitimate kind.

MR. MASSON said the Government had made one step in the right direction, and it would consider whether it could not have the clothing made more cheaply by convict labour. It was determined that the great coats should be delivered complete in store, the same as from England. That was why Ministers thought proper to adopt this system instead of purchasing the cloth ourselves and having it made up as was done once in the past.

In reply to Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT,

MR. MASSON said those great coats are supposed to last five years; but those made here this year, being of greatly superior quality, will be expected to last longer.

MR. CARON said he did not agree with the views of the hon. member for Lambton in using convict labour in the manufacture of this clothing. He thought that this labour should not thus be brought into competition with the work of the respectable artisans.

MR. MACKENZIE asked how would the hon. gentleman employ the convicts.

MR. CARON said he would set them at such work as stone breaking and road making.

MR. MACKENZIE said this would be competition with a still poorer class of labourers than tailors—with the men who broke stone and mended roads. They surely had as much right to Protection as the workmen above them.

MR. CARON said there was a distinction between the two kinds of labour. In England, where the subject of convict labour had been much studied, those prisoners were kept at such work as stone-breaking and oakum-picking. He would oppose their competing with our tradesmen, for whom we had not, at present, enough skilled labour, and were striving to create more. He would, if he must speak plainly, prefer to see convicts idle than decent men, who had to maintain themselves and families. We were doing all we could to start new factories, and it seemed altogether opposed to this policy to allow convicts to manufacture the goods required by the State, thus preventing free labour from being encouraged and developed.

MR. MACKENZIE,

In reply to Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT,

MR. MASSON said tenders for the furnishing of the clothes were not asked for, but enquiries have been made from several manufacturers in Montreal and elsewhere. The average price of a suit would be about $7, including tunics, trowsers and forage cap.

In reply to MR. GALT,

MR. MASSON: Information has been asked for in regard to the military clothing from several establishments in Montreal, and it is admitted that they cannot, at present, get the clothing at anything like the prices we pay for it. I do not like to give names, but we have taken means to fully ascertain the facts.

In reply to Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT,

MR. MASSON: We have determined to purchase our powder in this country, and have done so the present year. We have purchased 20,000lb. or 25,000lb. from the Hamilton Powder Company, in the Province of Quebec. The powder was submitted to a severe test, which it underwent with success, and I am informed, on good authority, will suit our purpose as well as any powder we can get, besides we get it 4c. or 5c. cheaper than we were paying for English powder, on account of freight, and especially of insurance, which is very heavy. I think we are paying the Hamilton Company 16½c. a pound, whereas we paid 19c. a pound in England for powder delivered here. As to the question of small arms ammunition the vote of the past year has not been all expended. The Government thought proper to take part of that vote and this year's and purchase, in England, the machinery necessary to manufacture our own small arms ammunition in Canada. I have recommended that these factories should be placed at Quebec, and be under the charge of B Battery, as I thought it could be managed more economically, making use of the staff there, and availing ourselves of the cheaper labour of the men whenever we want their services. The machinery, delivered in this country, will cost about $35,000. By this arrangement we shall manufacture our own small arms ammunition in Quebec. We had intended to place the machinery for the making of the shell of the cartridges and the bullets at the Artillery Barracks in Quebec, but on account of the danger to property in that city, we have decided that the ammunition should undergo the final process of manufacture outside the walls. We thought it best to have the manufacture at Quebec, because we have there the necessary buildings, and the cost would be less than elsewhere. The Government have decided to send an officer to Woolwich, England, to learn the manufacture of cartridges; and he will superintend, on his return, the manufacture at Quebec. He will also see to the purchase of the machinery. Our reserve to-day is about seven millions of rounds, but we shall reduce it to about five millions, as when we have the machinery on hand it will not be necessary for us to keep such a heavy stock in reserve. As to the question of the use of the Boxer cartridge, we have sent an officer to England on purpose to investigate the question. The Government will act on this advice as to the kind of cartridge we shall use in this country.

MR. CARON: I take this opportunity of congratulating the Government upon the establishment of a cartridge factory in Canada. Its importance must strike every one, more especially in the event if we should, at any time, require to protect ourselves against a foreign foe. It is obviously a prudent measure to manufacture our own cartridges in this country. As to the locality where it is proposed to establish it, I must say that there is a feeling in Quebec against its being established in the old Artillery Barracks. All Quebecers remember the frightful explosion which took place some years ago, before the regular troops were removed from Quebec. It took place exactly in these barracks where the Government propose now to establish this factory. I consider that, for the safety of the city it should be removed outside the walls, as was done immediately after the explosion I referred to took place in Quebec. There are a number of lots outside where these works can be carried on without endangering the safety of the city.

MR. MASSON: It is the intention of the Government to manufacture only the shell of the cartridge in the Artillery Barracks, and then the shells and the bullets will be transported outside the city, where they will be filled, so that there will be no danger to the city.

MR. CARON: This is perfectly satisfactory. I merely wished to get from the Government a positive statement that the safety of the city would not, in any way, be endangered by the factory in question.

MR. MASSON: I think that, in a month or two, we can make all the cartridges we shall need for the use of the force, under ordinary circumstances, during the year.

MR. JONES: There is always more or less change going on in the arms and ammunition of a country, and that must be taken into consideration. If we intend to make changes in our arms and ammunition, it will be a useless expenditure to get machinery which may not serve, if a change should be adopted in the ammunition. I think $30,000 for machinery is too great an expenditure. I fear, moreover, that the expenses connected with the manufacture of cannon will be greater than the Government expect. I am very glad that we are going to have within ourselves, in case of necessity, a means of furnishing our own arms and ammunition. I fear, however, that unless we enter upon this innovation with due consideration, we shall become involved in a very great expenditure.

MR. MASSON: The cartridge used, which is generally made in England, is the Martini-Henry cartridge. We are getting out machinery to make the Snider cartridge, but the alteration of the machinery necessary for the manufacture of either cartridge is exceedingly trifling, and can be effected without great expense. The manufacture of these cartridges has been attached to one of our enrolled batteries in order to avoid any extraordinary expenditure.

MR. DESJARDINS asked whether any agreement had been arrived at with the corporation of Montreal in reference to the drill shed.

MR. MASSON: No arrangements have been made up to the present moment. The Council, some time ago, requested an interview with me, and I told them that the Government would consider favourably the submitting to Parliament of a proposal to help the city to re-roof and re-fit their drill shed, provided the plans of the proposed repairs were submitted to the Government for their approval, and he regretted having yet received no intimation of any action from the city corporation on the subject.

71 Care and maintenance of Military Properties transferred from the Ordnance and Imperial Government, including rents,	$ 8,000
72 Royal Military College.....	59,000

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT: I perceive by the Gazette that the Government propose to add $100 a year to the charge for cadets entering this College in the future. I can say nothing against the proposition in the one sense. The sum demanded is small, looking at it as are compensate for the education given; but it will, I fear, have the effect, to a very considerable extent, of preventing the sons of our not wealthy yeomen competing with those who are better off. I would suggest the advisability of offering on the present bonus eight or ten openings which might be called scholarships.

MR. MASSON said that these cadets were under no obligation to the State, as were the cadets in most military schools in other parts of the world, and the Government thought that, by this increase—which they regarded as a reasonable and equitable one—they would be able to reduce the expenditure of the country by about $10,000 a year, which was a very serious consideration.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT: I understand that twenty-four of these cadets will come out this year. The British Government will place four Commissions at their disposal. But how are these to be distributed? It is a matter of great moment to know what the Government intend to do, as to a reasonable proportion of the remaining twenty, whether provision will be made for them in some Department of the Public Service, where they might, in virtue of their particular training, be made useful.

MR. MASSON: The matter is of great importance, and has for some time engaged the earnest attention of the Government, and they will consider it their duty to take some action in the matter.

MR. MACKENZIE: I felt, personally, very much that it was essential for the efficiency of the volunteer force to keep these young men in the country, and that, as far as possible, we should employ them in the Public Service. In the Public Works, typographical engineering—which they are taught in the College—and other field work necessary to be done in connection with the Railways, might be done by them. I do not go so far as to absolutely say that this should be done, but I certainly think something should be done in that direction, and I am very glad to learn that the Government have taken the matter up.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT said he did not want it to be understood that everybody going there should be provided for by the Government, but that a proportion should be looked after, and the rest would lose nothing, as they would have the benefit of a good education.

MR. MASSON said, to this, as to all other matters, the Government would give due attention.

MR. BLAKE said he thought it was of the utmost consequence to preserve, in this country, persons who have been educated at so very great an expense in this institution. He thought that we might better dispose of our best men of this class than by sending them into the British Army. He could not see that the four Commissions offered to Canada were such a boon after all, for that, after educating these young men at an enormous expense to the country, they would be practically lost to us. He thought, however, that not many would take advantage of this so-called boon, for he understood that a line Commission in the British army required the person accepting it to be worth some $1,200 or $1,500 a year, in order to support his position. It would not be a very advantageous thing to incur this large expenditure for educating these young men in order to fit them for another service in some other country, either British or foreign. He thought it would be desirable, however, that on perfecting their education, in this institution, they should be put to some use in the Public Service.

MR. MASSON said he thought the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) did not fully appreciate the Imperial act, which accorded to Canada four Commissions in the British army. It was, however, considered, generally, by the country, as a very great boon for our young men to be thus enabled to perfect their education in service under the Imperial Government, and he thought, moreover, that if we could offer a better position for these young men here, they would, of course, remain. The sentiment expressed by the hon. member for West Durham did not seem to be in accord with the general opinion of the public, as appeared by the press.

MR. BLAKE said he was quite aware that he was not in accord with some newspapers; but nothing that had been said had shaken his convictions.

MR. KIRKPATRICK said he thought that the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) did not appreciate the boon accorded to us by the Imperial Government. He considered the benefit to be thus derived by these young men would be invaluable, not only to themselves, but to Canada. It would enable them to perfect their education, and in case of an emergency they would be the first to return to Canada to give us their services.

In reply to MR. KIRKPATRICK,

MR. MASSON said some extension of the College was intended to be made for the better accommodation of the cadets and officers.

MR. LANGEVIN said it was not intended to make a separate building but to make an addition.

73 Military Schools and Drill Instructors in Colleges $14,000

In reply to MR. MACKENZIE,

MR. MASSON said that this vote was intended to provide for the drilling of pupils in the use of arms, and what is generally requisite to render young men efficient in military bearing, and to inspire in them a military spirit, and was entirely independent of the school for cadets provided for under the preceding vote.

Vote agreed to.

MR. MASSON said this guard was a sergeant's guard taken from the regiment by rotation. It consisted of one sergeant, one corporal and six privates. The whole of the money might not be spent.

Telegraphs.

106 For Land and Cable Telegraph Lines for the Sea Coasts and Islands of the Lower River and Gulf of St. Lawrence, etc., etc $200,000

MR. MACKENZIE said the hon. gentleman had promised to make some changes in the management of Telegraph lines belonging to the Dominion. A Mr. Gisborne, he understood, had been appointed Superintendent of Telegraphs, and he would like to know if the latter was an efficient telegraph operator and manager, and where were his headquarters; and also, whether or not it was time he was going to England to purchase a cable.

MR. LANGEVIN said Mr. Gisborne was a good telegraph operator and manager, and had made the telegraph system a study for many years. Mr. Gisborne had been appointed Superintendent of Telegraph Lines, and his head-quarters were in Ottawa. He was not aware that any one would have to go to England in reference to a cable. That was the first he had heard in reference to purchasing the cable referred to. Before sending to purchase any cable, there would need to be a vote, and there would be no necessity in any case to send any one from this side of the Atlantic in order to make a purchase. It would be remembered that, last year, Parliament voted an annual sum of $15,000 for a period of thirty years or more for a Telegraph system for the Maritime Provinces. Tenders were called for by the hon. the Minister of Railways for the laying of the cables, but the tenderers stated that the Government would have to work them afterwards. After full consideration of the matter, the Government thought that it would be a more economical plan to obtain a vote of a capital sum of $200,000, in order to purchase the cable and lay it down, so that the cost would only be the interest on $200,000; and as this interest would amount to only about $9,000 or $10,000 a year, this would make $5,000 or $6,000 a year less than the $15,000 per annum granted by last year's vote, and this yearly surplus of $5,000 or $6,000 would be more than sufficient to work the lines. Of course the Act of last year, granting the annual sum, would not be repealed.

XV. PUBLIC WORKS AND BUILDINGS—

Public Buildings.

107 Ontario $71,542 06

MR. HESSON said he believed the Government should promptly take advantage of the offer, by the town of Stratford, of a site for a post-office, worth $7,000, with the view to the erection of such a building on it as early as might be convenient. If the work could not at present be entered upon, the foundations might be laid, or some step taken to secure the site, which the town might otherwise decide to retain, or devote to a different object. Stratford had every right to a new post-office.

MR. LANGEVIN said the proper course would be for the hon. gentleman to submit the matter to the consideration of the Postmaster-General.

MR. MACKENZIE asked if there was proposed a vote to pay the balance on the Ottawa Post-office site.

MR. LANGEVIN said that the amount paid by the Government, in the first instance, for the lot on which the post-office was built, was the basis upon which it determined the amount to be paid for the twenty-five feet bought from the heirs, Egan.

Vote agreed to.

In reply to Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT,

MR. LANGEVIN: The item of $5,000 for Durham Terrace extension is in addition to the $15,000 already voted, and which sum was not sufficient to complete the work: The $35,000 asked for securing the cliff under the Citadel, is for the purpose of preventing the cliff from falling down on the houses below and crushing them. Unless some precautions are taken, the giving away of the cliff will lead to the falling of the wall of the Citadel. It will be necessary to purchase some of the houses below. After the proposed repairs are completed, it is expected the work will last one hundred years.

MR. DESJARDINS asked if any money had been asked for for the purchase of lands with which to furnish labour for the convicts at St. Vincent de Paul Penitentiary.

MR. LANGEVIN said that the Government did not think it desirable to ask Parliament this year for an appropriation for this purpose.

109 New Brunswick $151,500

MR. ANGLIN enquired why it was considered necessary to purchase a site for the Woodstock Post-office and Custom-house, when it was not intended to proceed immediately with the building.

MR. LANGEVIN: We want to secure a site in order to go on with the building next year.

MR. MACKENZIE: Will the hon. gentleman inform us why it is considered necessary to erect a building at this small town. I am satisfied that there are twenty or thirty towns of a much more important character, in point of revenue, which should receive prior consideration.

MR. LANGEVIN: We desire here, as we have done elsewhere, to concentrate the Government business into one building. It is a great inconvenience to have these offices scattered through the town. By bringing them together the public convenience will be consulted, and the business will be so facilitated that it is thought a reduction in the number of officers would be rendered possible.

MR. BUNSTER said he would like to draw attention to the claims of Nanaimo for a post-office and Custom-house. More revenue was derived from that city than from some others which had been favoured by the Government. He must urge upon the Government the duty of doing justice to Nanaimo, by erecting in it a post-office. The town was thriving and important, and the Premier, who had been honoured by election by a British Columbia constituency, should compel the Minister of Public Works to do it justice.

MR. LANGEVIN said all the improvements wanted could not be accomplished at once; this one, like others, would receive practical attention as early as the public finances permitted.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said that the hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. Bunster), should be patient. There was a good time coming and he must wait a little longer for this post-office, which should be granted as soon as public circumstances warranted.

Vote agreed to.

115 Public Buildings generally.....	$ 15,000
116 Rents, Repairs, etc.....	260,800

MR. LANGEVIN said it was not the intention of the Government to ask for an increase of this estimate for 1880-81, as it intended to close the workshop. His experience justified the belief that Government could get its work done for a great deal less than it cost by its workshop.

MR. MACKENZIE said that was his opinion also.

MR. LANGEVIN said he thought they would be able to save 33 per cent. on the public works by the change.

In reply to MR. BROWN,

MR. LANGEVIN said the $2,000 asked for for the River Trent, was for the purpose of excavating rock, and constructing a coffer-dam. All these works belong to the Dominion Government. The Order in Council transferring them to the Ontario Government had been cancelled.

MR. BROWN asked that the importance of improving the port of Belleville would be taken into consideration, and that a sum might be provided in the Supplementary Estimates for that purpose.

MR. LANGEVIN said that a sum was voted for, and expended on the improvement of Belleville Harbour last year, and it had been deemed desirable to wait for another year, before making any further appropriation, for the purpose of ascertaining what new works were required. If any dredging were found necessary it might be found possible to take something out of the General Fund, and have one of the dredges sent on. The Government would carefully consider any representation, as to works that are absolutely necessary.

MR. SMITH (Selkirk): Is it the intention of the Government to spend anything for the improvement of the Assiniboine river which, last year, was navigated as far as Fort Ellice. Tenders should be given out for the improvement of that river, by the removal of boulders and other obstructions. A few thousands could not be better spent as regards developing the country, and bringing in emigrants.

MR. LANGEVIN: My attention has been called to those improvements, but I have not yet decided anything in regard to them. I cannot now say whether we will submit any vote for the purpose. It will be considered in connection with the Supplementary Estimates.

In reply to MR. RYAN (Marquette),

MR. LANGEVIN: The grant of last year for this work has been all expended.

MR. SCHULTZ: It is intended, I believe, to improve the navigation of the mouth of the channel of the Red River, to the harbour. To make it useful, to any great extent, it will be necessary to cut a very narrow bar at the mouth of the stream. I hope, in view of its very great usefulness, and in the likelihood of a larger craft being put on the lake, the Government will put in the Estimates a small item for the purpose of dredging the bar at the mouth of that channel.

MR. LANGEVIN: I think $5,000 would do the work, amply, or possibly less.

MR. SMITH (Selkirk): I believe that a comparatively small sum spent on the improvement of the Saskatchewan would enable vessels to navigate it a large part of the season. At one place the removal of twenty or twenty-five boulders would greatly help navigation. Other improvements are required about the Grand Rapids. If obstructions from the Sturgeon Lake upwards were removed, a great impetus would be given navigation. The improvement of the Saskatchewan and Assiniboine would give you a great highway into the country, for a very considerable portion of the year.

In reply to Mr. KING,

MR. LANGEVIN said that the item of $42,000 for dredges in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, was for works continued last summer in those Provinces, at the special request of the Lieut.-Governor of New Brunswick. This year the Government was not in a position to say how much work would be done the coming season. Several applications for the dredges had been made, but no decision came to yet.

PRAYERS.

RAILWAYS—PROTECTION TO BRAKEMEN.

QUESTION.

MR. HESSON enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government, either in the construction of new freight cars, or in the alteration of those now in use, to carry out the valuable suggestions recently made by men of long experience in the running of railway trains, and so make better provision for and afford greater protection to the persons and lives of brakemen and other employes on railways under their management.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: This matter is now engaging the serious attention of the hon. the Minister of Railways. He has a great many suggestions and applications which are under the consideration of the professional staff in his Department.

SANDFORD FLEMING.

QUESTION.

MR. CHARLTON enquired, Has it been determined by the Government to send Mr. Sandford Fleming to British Columbia; and, if so, for what purpose?

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: The Government have come to no determination in the matter.

MARINE AND FISHERIES—COST OF REPORT.

QUESTION.

MR. TASSÉ enquired, What was the expenditure incurred for the publication of the Report of the Department of Marine and Fisheries for the years 1877 and 1878, respectively? What amount of saving, if any, has the Government effected in the publication of the Report for 1879?

MR. POPE (Queen's, P.E.I.): This information is procurable at the office of the accountant of the House of Commons. Application for it has been made, but I have not yet received the return. I may, if asked for it, be able to give the information to-morrow. As to the account for the present year, it is not made up, but a very large saving has been effected, the expenditure being much less than for the two preceding years.

MR. MACKENZIE: Perhaps the hon. gentleman will state the number of pages in the Report for each year. There were not so many pages, perhaps, last year.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: If there were not so many pages, we have turned over a new leaf.

NATURALISATION LAWS.

QUESTION.

MR. KRANZ enquired, Whether there has been any recent correspondence with Her Majesty's Government on the subject of the Naturalisation Laws?

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: There has been no recent correspondence on this subject; but it is the intention of the Government to renew correspondence with Her Majesty's Government on the subject.

ST. JOHN RIVER—BRIDGE ACROSS.

QUESTION.

MR. CONNELL enquired, What steps the Government have taken, or what steps they propose to take, to remedy the grievance complained of by the inhabitants of Carleton County, N.B., both last and this year, by several largely signed petitions, stating that a certain Railway Company, incorporated under an Act of the General Assembly of the Province of New Brunswick, has constructed a bridge across the River St. John, at the town of Woodstock, with a draw so placed as not to allow sufficient accommodation for steamers to pass up and down the river with safety in prosecuting their business, thus impeding the navigation of the said river, contrary to law.

MR. MACKENZIE: It is not in order to put a long argument in a question. In this there are a number of assertions taken for granted.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: No doubt this question involves an argument which no person ought to put in a question. The question ought to be strictly limited to the enquiry, whether the Government have taken, or propose taking any steps, under this petition that has been presented. With respect to this portion of the question, the Government are enquiring into the matter, and will, of course, as is their duty, endeavour to remove any obstructions to the navigation found to exist.

HARBOUR COMMISSIONS.

QUESTION.

MR. VANASSE enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to revoke, this year, the Harbour Commissions of the Dominion, and to place the several harbours under the direction and care of the Department of Public Works.

MR. LANGEVIN: It is not the intention of the Government to do so.

QUESTION.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT enquired, 1. Whether it is the intention of the Government to levy a differential duty on teas imported from the place of growth, when ordered under letters of credit, part by "overland," part by Suez Canal, and the balance, with dust of the whole, via United States, by sailing vessels round the Cape of Good Hope; 2. In the case of teas bought at the same time and imported by two or three routes, as above, and their arriving at different dates, will the Government consider such division as breaking bulk; 3. Will the whole purchase be held by the Customs until completed by the arrival of the dust; 4. In the event of part of the said teas being unsaleable in Canada, will importers be allowed to dispose of such teas at New York, without prejudice to rates of duty levied on balance.

MR. BOWELL: 1st. It is not the intention of the Government to levy any such duty. The question of route is not considered, other than that the teas shall be a direct importation from the countries of growth. 2nd. The Government does not recognise an importation of tea, as direct, when bulk has been broken in a foreign port; but in the case of a consignment of tea to Canada from the place of growth, the Government does not insist upon the whole consignment being brought to Canada in one vessel, or by any particular route, but the Customs dues require that all the teas or dust, referred to the original novice, be entered for duty. If part of such consignments only had arrived, the balance might be entered to arrive, or the tea which had arrived, might remain in sufferance warehouse until the whole consignment shall have been received. 3rd. The third question is covered by the answer to the second question. 4th.

After teas, whether of a direct or indirect importation into Canada, have had the duties required by law, paid thereon, the owner thereof is at liberty to dispose of the same in whatever market he pleases, without interference on the part of the Government. The teas may, however, be entered for warehouse, and afterwards entered ex-warehouse, for duty or export, at the option of the owner.

FORT FRANCES LOCK.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

MR. PLUMB, in moving for copies of all correspondence, papers, vouchers, and reports, connected with the construction of Fort Frances Lock, said: In moving the Resolution which I am about to submit to the consideration of the House, I beg leave to remark that, when the hon. leader of the late Government propounded his Pacific Railway policy, he undertook to utilise the famous water stretches between Fort William and Selkirk, including the navigation of Rainy Lake and Rainy River, to which he proposed to gain access from Port Savanne, by means of several small lakes and seven or eight intervening portages, varying in length from a few rods to three or four miles. Over the portages we were to have tramways, and the scheme involved the construction of the far-famed Fort Frances Lock, at the foot of Rainy Lake, which was to be built by day labour, under the careful and economical supervision of a faithful ally of the hon. gentleman. The policy referred to was a fruitful theme of discussion during the political campaign which preceded the downfall of the late Government. My hon. friend from Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie), in addressing, during that campaign, large audiences in Ontario, would expatiate eloquently on the subject of the advantages which would accrue to the country from the opening of that chain of navigation west of Fort William, by the construction of the Fort Frances Lock, which, he said, would, with other improvements, overcome the ascent and descent of the 400 feet between Port Savanne and Rainy Lake, and permit of the navigation of swift rivers of little depth, for the accommodation of the vast traffic of the North-West, while they were completing, for the purposes of feeding this valuable line, the two ends of the Railway from

MR. BOWELL.

Fort William to Selkirk, at a cost of $10,000,000. The hon. gentleman stated that those two ends would be built for half the cost of the Intercolonial; that he had entered into the necessary contracts which would secure that economy that all Governments aimed at, but which it was reserved for the Reform Government, of which he was the head, alone to succeed in achieving. He assured us that more elaborate surveys had been made of the most difficult parts of the route of this portion of the Canadian Pacific Railway, than of the Intercolonial, and that he would accomplish the great engineering feat of constructing it for $24,500 a mile, and to furnish it with the means of accommodating through traffic, he proposed to construct the Fort Frances Lock. In the first place the scheme was on a very large scale, but there was no definite working plan adopted, and the hon. gentleman discovered very soon that there were serious obstructions in the way of it, and that while he intended to have seven feet depth on the mitre sills of his double lock, there were obstructions in the lake and river adjacent, which made him at length recede from his proposition, and he at last, as we understand, authorised a change to four feet depth of mitre sills. He made these remarks in his speech to the electors at Forest, at a great public demonstration, on the 29th of June, 1877:

“You have seen the accusation that I have been spending a great deal of money on the Fort Frances Locks. Those not acquainted with the geographical description of the country from Fort William to Selkirk will not understand my plan, as developed in my election speech at Sarnia, and my plan now in regard to the Pacific Railway was that it was impossible to carry out the bargain which the late Government had improvidently and improperly made with British Columbia—made apparently with no other object than to be in a position to let enormous contracts, and get enormous sums from the contractors, wherewith to corrupt the public of this country. (Hear, hear, and cheers.)”

One may wonder whether Sefton, Ward and Co., Purcell and Ryan, Oliver Davidson and Co., the excellent but brittle Mr. Glass, and others of that stamp, were among the hearers and cheerers of the last sentence. He goes on to say:

“One object was to keep that promise as far as it could be kept consistently with our means, but we had determined on no account to tax the bulk of this Dominion for the mere benefit of 10,000 or 15,000 people on the Pacific coast."

The hon. gentleman did not then say anything about having accepted the Carnarvon terms without any proviso against increased taxation.

"At the same time we admitted that we were under moral obligations to the people of British Columbia to carry out, as far as possible, the promise that our predecessors had made. They were the trustees of the public as we were, and my idea was this: that we should begin at Fort William, at which point there is excellent water navigation during seven or eight months in the year, as soon as possible, without waiting for the completion of the surveys west; that from there we should build in as straight a line as possible to the crossing point of the Winnipeg River at Keewatin; that we should build as much of the west end as would bring us from Selkirk to the waters of the Lake of the Woods at Keewatin; and on the east end as much as would take us to Shebandowan Lake. We have found that we can build the road between Selkirk and Fort William, the distance supposed to be 432 miles but is not more than 408 by the surveyed line. We have contracts going on which will enable us to have the road from Selkirk to Winnipeg River, 110 miles by the end of next season; and we have contracts to English River 114 miles from Fort William westward."

It is very interesting to note here that the line from Selkirk to Keewatin, embraced in contracts 14 and 15, were to be finished at the end of 1878, and that nothing is hinted about having utterly failed to carry the line to Shebandowan Lake, which was well known to the hon. member long before. He then continues:

"At the distance of about 70 miles (from Fort William) we reach the waters of Lake Mille Lac. When we reach there two points west and east, we have only a few portages. I think six in all, the longest three miles, and others very short, which we can overcome by cheap tramways for some years, and then we get into Rainy Lake. From the east end of that lake to where the railway touches the Lake of the Woods, at Keewatin, we have well on to 200 miles of clear navigation, with one lock at Fort Frances. We therefore took a vote of Parliament, and proceeded to build one large, deep lock with a lift of 23 feet, to overcome the obstacles. We ask where is the charged impropriety? Did we give the contract improperly to any person. The whole wrong about it is, according to these gentlemen, that we did the work by days' labour instead of by contract. * * * It was a shocking thing for one to employ men by the day, and put the work in charge of a skillful engineer and fireman, to execute a work which, when completed, will give us a highway through our own territory, which we can use for a number of years until we

The hon. gentleman has often said he never intended to delay the construction of that central portion of the road for any great length of time; but in that speech he indicated very clearly that he intended, for some years, to utilise the water stretches by way of Fort Frances, as has already been shown by the extract from the speech that I have quoted, and has been proved time after time by his utterances here and elsewhere, but the hon. gentleman's memory is a most accommodating one. It was then the intention of the late Premier to make connection by way of several portages through Rainy Lake, Fort Frances Locks, Rainy River, and the Lake of the Woods, which would carry the traffic of the west from the point where the railway from Red River terminates, to the point connecting with the railway again at Port Savanne on Lake Mille Lac, or at Lake Shebandowan, as he still asserted in 1877, although that route had been abandoned and the contract cancelled in 1876. That contract was entered into for the railway construction from Fort William to Lake Shebandowan, forty-five miles, with Sefton, Ward and Company, on 5th April, 1875. At that moment the late Government had no knowledge whatever of the route, although the hon. member for Lambton gave us to understand there had been sufficient surveys, and that the agreement was based on specific quantities of work to be done. But the quantities, which it has been found were mere guesses, were made up in his Department in Ottawa, and had no relation whatever to this work. It was found, after much of the work had been done, that a practicable line could not be found to Lake Shebandowan. The Government then carried the route, for some reason I cannot understand, except to give an opportunity of settling with Sefton, Ward and Company, forty-two miles beyond the point of departure at Port Savanne, on Lac des Milles Lacs. The mistake made was precisely the same at the other end, where a contract for specified quantities was given for the work without the slightest knowledge of the route, and in fact, as we now know, before any engineer had ever been on the line. The Engineer (Mr. Carre) had examined but ten miles of the eastern end, when he was called away to Winnipeg to make up quantities for the contract, and the remaining sixty-six miles had never been seen. The engineers actually went up with the contractors to find the line on which to base the construction. That was a specimen of the exhaustive and elaborate surveys and the improved economical plan of letting contracts by which the hon. member for Lambton used to boast he would proceed with his railway construction, and on which he attempted to delude the people of Ontario, at the last election, into giving his Government a renewal of their confidence, which they wisely declined. A worse state of things, though not involving so large an outlay, followed the next movement, showing the reckless blundering which characterised the whole of the construction of the works from Fort William to Red River. The hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick) was one of the first to discover the mistake, to call it by no harsher name, which the late hon. Premier was committing in regard to the Fort Frances Lock, and the utter folly of attempting to carry traffic by their route. But, with his characteristic firmness, which might be called something else, he refused to listen to the information offered, and continued the work so long as he was in power, it being only stopped, and with it the useless drain on our impoverished resources it occasioned, when the present Government was formed. I never could obtain from the late Government the papers in regard to this, to the Kaministiquia terminus, and other similar matters. We have some information, through papers that I obtained by order of the Public Accounts Committee, in regard to the Locks, but it is confined to the last fiscal year. I find that the works have been a gold mine, almost as rich as Cariboo, to certain gentlemen, who have worked the vein with great assiduity. The work, as we have seen, was done by day labour. After it had been undoubtedly impressed on the mind of the late Premier that it was an utter failure, and he had discovered from the report of the Superintendent that the route could only be expected to have the capacity of five railway car loads a day, or about 1,560 bushels of wheat, and that from the 1st

September to the 25th October, the only period in which wheat was likely to move eastwards to market—that there could be at the utmost only about 80,000 bushels carried over it, or scarcely two vessel loads—that from the opening to the close of navigation its full capacity would amount to only 280,000 bushels, still there was an attempt made by the Superintendent to carry out, by the completion of the work, this enormous piece of blundering. Besides, the hon. gentleman in the Senate, who is at the head of the great organ that sustains the member for Lambton, then voted for the further prosecution of that work, and the leader of the late Government in the Upper House supported it also after it had been proven, beyond doubt, that it was an impracticable, foolish, futile scheme. I had the curiosity, lately, to look into the accounts and to ascertain if anything was discoverable there which would explain why there was such perversity on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite in pushing forward this work by days' labour, or in fact in continuing it at all. I do not know that I have got the key to the whole matter. It may be well for the House to know, however, that there was a staff of employés there which was equal to the construction of a work involving millions. I will give an idea of the economical manner in which my hon. friend succeeded in obtaining a result which all preceding Governments, he said, had vainly endeavoured to secure, but which it was finally reserved for his Government to accomplish. Mr. J. R. Sutherland was book-keeper; he was brother of Mr. Hugh Sutherland, who was Superintendent. Mr. Hugh Sutherland drew, not long ago, five years pay as Superintendent of that work, amounting to the round sum of $12,000. His brother was employed at a salary of $1,000 a year. The captain of the steamer was employed at a salary of $600 a year; a forwarding agent at $780; an engineer at $480; a foreman at $1,200; a paymaster at $1,000; a physician at $800; a clerk at $480; another clerk at $600; several carpenters at $480 each; a timekeeper at $480; and several blacksmiths at from $480 to $600 each. The salaries of this overworked staff, whose entire disbursements averaged about $65,000 a year, were some $13,000 a year, besides their board—altogether say about $20,000 a year, or 30 per cent. of the whole outlay, and I may say here that the paymaster's office seems to have been at first wholly a sinecure, as must have been many of the others. It was a case where Jack did nothing and Tom helped Jack. I do not think they went so far as to employ a chaplain, but, I presume, the Superintendent might have read prayers.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: The Superintendent contented himself with preying upon the Government.

MR. PLUMB: I have glanced at some of the accounts, and I find that $102.88 was paid for telegraphing from the month of December, 1877, to the month of March, 1878, and I commend the investigation of the items of this little bill to the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) who has shown great acuteness in that direction. There were also in the employ of this model establishment fifty-five Indians, besides a great number of labourers and artisans of all kinds. The supplies for feeding this army, who were boarded at the Government boarding-house, were bought, not in Canada, but mainly from a shopkeeper living in Grand Rapids. Large sums were paid the Superintendent for travelling expenses; $372.50 was paid him for board allowances, whatever that may mean. The disbursement on this flagrant folly, up to the last dates in the Public Accounts, were $253,622.29. We have ascertained that the cost of the construction of the two ends of the road, with which it was to have been connected, will be about $10,000,000. At 5 per cent., that would involve an annual charge upon the country of $511,000 for interest alone. Assuming that they could utilise this Fort Frances detour at all—which is denied by Mr. Fleming—at its utmost capacity it would have been so entirely unprofitable that if the whole amount of wheat that passed over it had paid $1 per bushel, it would have been cheaper for the Government to have bought the wheat and have burned it up and allowed the road to be idle, than to have been at the expense of working the route for the purpose of transporting it. This is the great work of which we heard so much boasting in days gone by, before, as the hon. gentleman said, we understood geography. Everybody knows that the hon. member for Lambton does not like to hear the story of his achievements in connection with this work. We all remember that when he was in power, every allusion of an unfavourable character to any of his projects was met with a storm of indignation. It was the servile manner in which he was always sustained, by the unreasoning majority that stood at his back, that contributed to his irretrievable downfall. There is such a thing as being too powerful; and when my hon. friend found a mechanical majority behind him, ready to support any measure he brought forward, the hon. gentleman was carried away by the idea that his power would last for ever. I have no doubt he sincerely regrets now many things he did in the flush of his success, but his repentance comes too late. We, on this side, who were in the forlorn hope of 1874-78, have been treated, from time to time, with tirades of abuse from that hon. gentleman and his backers, here and elsewhere, because we ventured to question anything he did while in power. Not long ago that hon. gentleman rose in his place in the Committee of Public Accounts, when he was omnipotent there, and openly charged me with having made, behind the backs of my political opponents, charges which I dare not utter before their faces. He said, I was perambulating the country and slandering the hon. gentlemen who were then in power. I told him then, that it was not my habit to say anything in the absence of a political opponent that I would not say in his presence. I told him I was doing what I had a perfect right to do in criticising the political acts and political motives of those with whom I was in Opposition. My offence at that particular moment was, that I discovered an entry in some papers that I had asked for, which proved that a certain favourite of the hon. gentleman had been employed as a solicitor for the Government Valuers of the Fort William Town Plot, who was himself largely interested in the town lots to be valued. My hon. friend naturally was riled; his temper is not always saintly. But, Sir, from the time I entered public life until this day, I have never descended to make a personal attack upon any man, although I have been sorely provoked by the hon. gentleman himself. I disdain to take that kind of advantage, although I believe I might be justified if I did take it, and that I might be able to reply to that hon. gentleman in quite as good terms as he has used towards me on numberless occasions. The hon. gentleman has called me a partisan. What is he? What are his supporters? Are they not, many of them, most violent and unscrupulous partisans? Have we forgotten the tyrannous use those gentlemen made of their power when they had it? Did they not taunt us with being in a beggarly minority, with being but a baker's dozen, shrinking and trembling behind the dishonoured member for Kingston? Those courteous and kindly terms were often used by the hon. member for West Durham himself, and we can fancy the licence that he gave to his less fastidious followers. We have not forgotten that, neither have we retaliated. We have used the greatest forbearance, in permitting hon. gentlemen in Opposition to go on from day to day, in discussing subjects which have been long ago exhausted. I would like to know, in the old days of 1875, how long an hon. gentleman sitting where they sit now, and are likely to sit for many years to come, would have been tolerated if he had conducted himself as hon. gentlemen in the Opposition now conduct themselves? How long would it have been before the Ross's and the Goudge's and the Chevals, and gentlemen of that intelligent kind, whose places now know them no more for ever, would have risen and howled down the offender? I believe the Conservative party disdain to take advantage of their strength. They are willing hon. gentlemen shall have their say, and they console themselves with the reflection that if they give them rope enough that thing will happen to them which usually occurs.

TORONTO CUSTOM-HOUSE EMPLOYÉS.

MOTION FOR STATEMENT.

MR. LITTLE, in moving for an Order of the House, for a statement from the Customs Department, showing the class and salary of all parties engaged in the Customs, Toronto, the date of their respective appointments and prefer-

ments, if any, as well as the duty or duties each such official is called upon to perform, said: The object I have in asking for this return I will briefly state. Some time ago I was informed that certain irregularities existed in the Customs Department at Toronto. In the year 1873, a party was appointed as landing-waiter in Her Majesty's Customs at Toronto, and so well, so efficiently did he perform the duties of that office, that he was called upon to serve in the higher grade or position of searcher, as well; but, strange to say, though performing the duties of the position, his pay still remained the same, $600 per annum, as when he first entered the service. But this is not all the injustice. Two or three parties who were appointed by the late Government to similar positions, have received, and still receive, $100 or $200 a year more, though not even performing the duties of the higher superior class, that the person I have reference to is still undertaking. A year ago I called the attention of the Minister of Customs to this strange anomaly. Since that time several letters have passed between us on this subject, but to no effect; and again, at the commencement of this Session, I ventured to remonstrate with the Minister of Customs at the injustice still remaining, and the hon. Minister told me that he was powerless to act in the matter. He acknowledged the case to be unjust, but said that the late Government was to blame, that it inaugurated the evil. Mr. Speaker, I felt humiliated at such a statement. That because the late Government committed an error was that any reason why the Minister of Customs of the present Government should not endeavour to remove it; it was a bad plea, a wretched argument. What was the present Government here for? Entrusted with the affairs of Canada, is it not to endeavour to do better than their predecessors, or otherwise. If the present Minister of Customs cannot endeavour to remove the complaint, it would be better for the ex-Minister of Customs to come back to his former old position, for who knows that if attention had been drawn to him to rectify the error that he would have removed it. And again, the hon. the Minister of Customs informed me that there were no funds at his disposal. Sir, where there is a will there is always a way. Look at the high offices in his Department, so lucrative, that directly there is a vacancy, lawgivers, legislators, ex-M.P.'s and members of both Chambers are very anxious to obtain and fill the position. There is a general scramble for such. Why not apply the pruning knife to these fat offices and make some reduction; or if this cannot be done, at least the Minister of Customs could apply the pruning knife to his own office, and find means then to cause justice to be done. Sir, I have waited more than a year for action to be taken, but the hon. the Minister of Customs is still in dream-land; I am afraid he will never wake up. I do not like to be continually taunted with the incapacity and lack of ability of any one member of the Government. I, as an independent member, generally support it; and I must admit I see vitality and activity in all the Departments, saving in that under the supervision of the hon. the Minister of Customs. I ask for this return so that the public may judge for themselves, and I respectfully request that the Government, as a Government, will counsel their honourable yet erring colleague, to act more wisely, more ably and more justly in the future.

MR. BOWELL: My hon. friend has scarcely represented the facts as they exist. With reference to the statement that some officers receive larger salaries than others in similar positions is correct. The late Government made appointments of landing-waiters, lockers, etc., at salaries from $100 to $200 per annum more than others received, who had been there a number of years. In regard to the officer my hon. friend refers to, and my statement that I had no money with which to increase his salary, I said further: that if I increased his salary it would necessitate, also, the increasing of the salary of some twenty or thirty other officials, who had been in the employ of the Government a longer period than the gentleman in question, who have the larger salaries. I do not now see my way clear, and I told him so, to recommend to my colleagues or the House, considering the financial condition of the country, a general increase of salary which would have to be done, if the question were opened. If equality in salaries were desired, either a general rise in salaries would have to be made, which at the present time could not be justified, or the salaries, or those who receive the larger salaries, would have to be reduced, which, after all, would perhaps be the best course to pursue. It is all very well to demand increases of salaries, and then cry out for retrenchment and economy. To meet the views and wishes of all those who have asked for an increase of salary would require some $20,000 or $30,000 added to the Customs Estimates, a request I do not believe the House would agree to.

MR. BURPEE (St. John): Referring to the complaints made by the hon. member opposite, regarding the discrimination as to salaries of officers in the Customs, Toronto, I may say that, a few years ago, the Customs Department at Toronto was thoroughly reorganized upon the Inspector's report, and it was thought that if there was any part in the Dominion where the salaries seemed to be equally distributed, it seemed to be Toronto. The hon. Minister of Customs states that favours were granted to certain officers. I do not remember any particular cases, but that may be so, because it has been so ever since Confederation, and these may be old appointments, etc.; but in Toronto, particularly, I maintain that the salaries were more equally arranged than in any other city. It is possible that some of the officers having combined duties, such as lockers and landing-waiters, may get a little more than lockers alone or landing-waiters alone. I know that great care was taken to assimilate the salaries as near as possible, and I believe such will be found to be the case.

MR. JONES: I think the case under consideration is one of peculiar hardship, and my hon. friend has presented the facts connected with it in a clear and concise manner; and I am of opinion that when new men are placed over the heads of other men, without reason, that these cases should be taken into consideration, and the old officers restored to the position to which they are entitled.

Motion agreed to.

MONTREAL CUSTOMS' HARDWARE
VALUATOR.

MOTION FOR CORRESPONDENCE.

MR. COURSOL, in moving for an Order of the House for copies of Correspondence between the Minister of Customs and the Collector of Customs at the Port of Montreal, in relation to the appointment of a successor to the late Mr. Bryson, valuator of hardware at that Port, said: My object in making this motion is this: The late Mr. Bryson was a most valuable officer, and one who had been appointed at the suggestion of the late Mr. Holton. Shortly after Mr. Bryson's demise, as a member of the city, I received a notification by letter to suggest the name of a successor. I enquired into the facts, and got them from Mr. Simpson, the Collector of the Port. I found that the deputy had been appointed eleven or twelve years ago, and had performed his duties without any complaint in writing against him. I recommended that if the officer or assistant was able to perform the duties of chief, he should be appointed. I submitted the name of the deputy, and, to my surprise, a few days after, I was informed that the deputy had been set aside, and another party appointed to be the valuator of hardware. I had to keep silent until now, when I could make my voice heard in this House. A few weeks ago, I placed a motion on the paper to enquire whether a successor had been appointed to Mr. Bryson, and whether the appointment, if made, was temporary or permanent. The answer that came from the Minister of Customs was that the appointment made was temporary, so as to give the appointee a trial before making his appointment permanent. Now, Sir, why was not the deputy so appointed, temporarily, so as to test his ability to perform the duties of the office? I think it only fair-play that he should be tried. Why should he be passed over? I should be sorry to recommend anyone not qualified or undeserving, but, if not unqualified, whether he be a French-Canadian, or of any other nationality, the next man in position to that made vacant, as in this case, by death, should be promoted to the position. On the instigation of men who were jealous, and those who had something to gain by it, influence has been brought to bear against the deputy in this case. Whether the new man has been since appointed permanently, I know not; but I think it very wrong that a good officer, who has performed his duties efficiently for eleven or twelve years, should be set aside, and another put over his head, for there are no grounds of complaint. If there were any they should have been placed on record; they should not be merely put forward by mere verbal assertions of a few parties who may have been interested.

MR. BOWELL: Very little correspondence has taken place in connection with this appointment, between the Collector of Customs and the Department; and such portions as are proper to bring down shall be brought down. My hon. friend for Montreal East (Mr. Coursol), will excuse me for saying that he has scarcely told the House all he knows in connection with this appointment. It has been my desire, since I have had the honour of occupying the position of Minister of Customs, to make appointments to any vacancies by promotion. In all cases in the Montreal Customs Department, in which where it was possible this has been done. There has not been a vacancy in the Customs house at Montreal, during my term of office, to which I have not promoted some one in the Department. I may say here that in any appointment made since the present Government came into power, this course has been followed where practicable. In the present instance, I found it necessary to depart from this theory, and make enquiry as to the fitness of the assistant to fill the position of hardware appraiser, and I found that he was not fit to be the head of the hardware department in so important a port as that of Montreal. My hon. friend says, that I refused to appoint him temporarily, so as to test his qualifications. Now the hon. gentleman admits that the deputy has been in office eleven or twelve years; if after that the Collector reported to me that he was not fit to fill properly and efficiently the position of Chief Appraiser, though he might be competent to perform the duties of assistant under another, I am satisfied that the House and the country will admit that further trial was unnecessary, and will justify his not being promoted to the office for which he had been reported as not qualified. As my hon. predecessor—who has had more experience than I have—knows, one of the greatest difficulties of a Minister of Customs has been in the appointment of appraisers. Many have been appointed who were not qualified, and who have allowed invoices to pass improperly, because of not having a knowledge of the goods, and who have allowed other invoices to pass which had upon their face an under valuation of the goods; all which has caused constant complaints from merchants who presented correct invoices. Before the late appraiser, Mr. Bryson, died, he called upon me to ask for superannuation, on account of ill-health. After agreeing to represent his claim to superannuation to my colleagues, I took the opportunity to question him regarding his assistant. I said: "Mr. Bryson, is your assistant qualified for the position you hold?" Mr. Simpson was present at the time. I added, "You know that in no case have I made an appointment in Montreal, except by promoting the next man in order, and I intend to carry out the same principle in this case, provided your assistant is fit for the position." Mr. Bryson then told me, distinctly and positively, that his assistant was not fit for the position of Chief Appraiser. Mr. Simpson, who, as I have said, was present, went further, and said that they had taken steps, years before, to obtain an assistant better qualified than the person then filling that position, by asking for the appointment of another assistant. Mr. Bryson had wanted an assistant long previously, of superior qualities, one on whom he could rely when he was obliged to be absent, as he was on many occasions, through ill-health. I wish the hon. gentleman and this House to understand that I have no other object than to secure the appointment of a well-qualified person as Chief Appraiser, one in whom the trade and the Government could have the most implicit confidence. I have no desire, and the Government have no desire, to say one word against the faithfulness, in the performance of the duties of the present appraiser or against his qualifications for the position he now holds; but as the House will see, from my explanation, he is not fit for the position of Chief Appraiser. If I had any evidence whatever of his being qualified, my hon.

friend would have had no cause to complain, or to bring this motion before the House. As I have before said, when an appraiser is to be appointed, he should be one of unqualified business habits. A clerk could learn the duties of his office in a short time, so could a locker; but in the case of an appraiser he should have long experience and special qualifications and knowledge of business to fill the position of Chief Appraiser. After this statement my hon. friend from Montreal East will not suppose, for a moment, that the Government had any other reasons for seeking another man other than the assistant, for this chief position as hardware appraiser than the desire to have an efficient officer. My hon. friend must see that three or four month's test of this assistant's qualifications would be of no use, after he had been in the position of assistant for eleven or twelve years, without giving any evidence of having the necessary qualifications. I am sorry my hon. friend has imputed to the Collector of Montreal, motives of an improper character. I have no knowledge of anything of the kind, and I do not think that if any of his officers were qualified for the position in question, he would object; nor do I see any reason why Mr. Bryson himself should make the same representations as the Collector had done against the assistant, if the latter were really qualified. I say, in justice to his memory, that he very unwillingly made the representation he did. He declined at first expressing an opinion, and not until I impressed upon him that it was his duty to inform me, he gave me the information very reluctantly. I was told that in important matters, when Mr. Bryson was ill, the assistant had to carry the invoices to his sick-bed for instructions. I trust I may never have any greater sin to answer for than my endeavour, on behalf of the Government, to strictly adhere to the principle of appointing no man to a position unless he is fully qualified to perform the duties of that position.

MR. COURSOL: Notwithstanding the explanation given by the hon. the Minister of Customs, his fiery and unreasoning language as Minister, I must persist in saying that I sincerely believe that a gross injustice has been done to the deputy-appraiser in Montreal. It is all very well now, after Mr. Bryson's death, to cite words that he may have said before he died. Has the hon. gentleman any letter of Mr. Bryson's, or any writing whatever, of his charging the deputy with incapacity or with any dereliction of duty during his eleven years' service? If he did not perform his duties efficiently and properly, surely Mr. Bryson would have reported against him. As to his taking invoices to Mr. Bryson's bedside when the latter was sick, it is the duty of every deputy, however competent and well qualified, to ask and submit to the advice of his superior. This only proves him to have been a diligent and obedient and most efficient deputy. If the latter's duties were improperly performed, where are the proofs? or, are they only the result of conversations of parties? I know I have the assurance of a great many persons in Montreal that Mr. Fauteux performed his duties very efficiently. The Collector of Customs at Montreal is not a judge of what should be a valuator of hardware. He had it from ipse dixit. I defy the Minister of Customs to show that he has one single letter to prove that Mr. Fauteux is not qualified. If I speak and feel warmly in the matter it is because I know there has been an injustice done, and that it cannot be remedied now, except the right hon. the leader of the Government takes it up. Mr. Hilton, I understand, has not been permanently appointed, therefore, I hope something will be done by giving Mr. Fauteux a fair trial. It is not in a spirit of fanaticism that I move in this matter. I did not know, when this case was first brought under my notice, of an outsider having been temporarily appointed to the position. I do not wish to make any such matters a question of nationality; those officers should be appointed by their merits. Mr. Fauteux went to Mr. Simpson, who refused him in the most rude manner, and then Mr. Fauteux told him if he had not been a French-Canadian he would have been appointed. In so doing Mr. Fauteux may have acted in an imprudent manner; but he felt warmly on the subject, and the events have proved that he had struck the right note.

MR. BOWELL: I desire to say in reference to the insinuation of improper feeling on account of nationality, that there are some seven or nine appraisers in the Montreal Customs-house, four French-Canadians, one Chief appraiser and three assistants. I repudiate, in the strongest possible language, that a feeling of nationality ever entered my mind in this matter. I know that in one of the town-hips I promoted a French-Canadian to a position which had been held by an Englishman; and I did it because he was next in order for promotion and was fit for the position. I have a petition, from nearly all the hardware merchants of all political creeds, recommending Mr. Hilton. He has not been appointed permanently, but if he continues as he has been doing, I shall recommend him for the position. I have generally been found fault with in Lower Canada, for having appointed French-Canadians in place of Englishmen; and now, because I refuse one who, by all the information put before me, is shown to be unfit for this particular position, I am blamed by the hon. gentleman who makes this motion. The hon. gentleman seems to insinuate that, because I have no letter from Mr. Bryson, I have taken advantage of the fact that that gentleman is dead, and cannot, therefore, be called as a witness to misrepresent what was said by him or to state what was not true in reference to his assistant. If he means to say that, I hurl it back with the contempt it deserves.

MR. COURSOL: I maintain all I have said so far as the Montreal Customs-house is concerned, and when the matter comes up, I shall charge the hon. gentleman with not doing his duty to French-Canadians in the matter of appointments at the port of Montreal.

PRIVATE BILLS.

THIRD READINGS.

The following Bills were severally considered in Committee of the Whole, reported, read th: third time and passed:—

Bill (No. 16) To authorise and provide for the winding up of the Stadacona Bank.—(Mr. Vallee.)

Bill (No. 50) To amend the Act to incorporate the Ontario and Pacific Junction Railway Company.—(Mr. Williams.)

Port Whitby Harbour Company.—(Mr. Kirkpatrick.)

Bill (No. 78) Respecting the President, Directors and Company of the Bank of New Brunswick.—(Mr. Burpee, St. John.)

MARRIAGE WITH A DECEASED WIFE'S SISTER LEGALISATION BILL.

(Mr. Girouard, Jacques Cartier.)

THIRD READING.

MR. GIROUARD (Jacques Cartier) :

It will not be out of interest at the present stage of the debate on this Bill, to review its history before this House and answer a few of the objections which have been made against it; and in doing so I intend to be as brief as the importance of the subject will permit. On the 16th February last I had the honour of introducing the following Bill :

"1. Marriage is permitted between a man and the sister of his deceased wife, or the widow of his deceased brother, provided there be no impediment by reason of affinity between them, according to the rules and customs of the church, congregation, priest, minister or officer celebrating such marriage.

"2. All such marriages thus contracted in the past are hereby declared valid, cases (if any) pending in Courts of Justice alone excepted."

It was objected that under this enactment, the members of the Church of England would be in a worse position than under the existing laws, which, at least in Ontario and the Maritime Provinces, declare marriage contracted between brothers and sisters-in-law only voidable during the lifetime of the parties. It was contended, and it must be confessed not without reason, that the marriage in question, being contrary to the Confession of Faith of that Church, would be absolutely prohibited under that Bill. At the request, therefore, of some Protestant members, and more particularly of those belonging to the Church of England, the Bill was withdrawn, with the intention of introducing in its stead another Bill where no reservation as to Church discipline or regulations would be made, except in favour of the Catholic Church, and the Bill which was introduced subsequently, to wit, on the 27th of February, read as follows :—

"1. Marriage between a man and the sister of his deceased wife, or the widow of his deceased brother, shall be legal and valid. Provided always, that if in any church or religious body, whose ministers are authorised to celebrate marriages, any previous dispensation, by reason of such affinity between the parties, be required to give validity to such marriage, the said dispensation shall be first obtained according to the rules and customs of the said church or religious body. Provided also, that it shall not be compulsory for any officiating minister to celebrate such marriage.

"2. All such marriages heretofore contracted as aforesaid, are hereby declared valid, cases (if any) pending in Courts of Justice alone excepted."

During the debate, both the hon. members for West Durham (Mr. Blake), and for Argenteuil (Mr. Abbott), expressed it to be their clear opinion that this Federal Parliament had no power to pass the proviso as to any dispensation to be obtained according to the rules of the Catholic Church. These learned jurists stated that the subject matter belongs to the solemnization of marriage, and consequently comes within the exclusive jurisdiction of Local Legislatures. It must be borne in mind that the Federal Parliament and Provincial Legislatures have not a concurrent jurisdiction over the subject of marriage, or in fact any other subject; the jurisdiction of the one is exclusive of the other, and what can be done by the one cannot be done by the other. The British North America Act of 1867, declares at section 91, par. 26, "That the jurisdiction of the Parliament of Canada shall extend to the following classes of subjects," that is to say: "Marriage and Divorce," and at section 92, par. 12, that the Provincial Legislature "may exclusively make laws in relation to matters coming within the classes of subjects" following, and among others "the solemnization of marriage in the Province." Under these enactments of our Canadian Constitution, it is plain, it seems to me, that this Parliament has alone jurisdiction—of course I am speaking from a legal and not ecclesiastical point of view—over the whole subject of marriage, solemnization of marriage only being excepted, and that Local Legislatures have no jurisdiction whatever beyond anything not pertaining to the solemnization of marriage. This Parliament alone, therefore, can declare who shall or who shall not contract marriage in the eyes of the civil law, and for this reason there cannot be any doubt, and there is but one opinion in this House, that the Parliament of Canada and not the Provincial Legislatures can enact that marriage shall or shall not be permitted between brothers and sisters-in-law; of course, I am always arguing from a legal point of view and in the eyes of the constitutional law of this country. I have already expressed the opinion that the "dispensation" clause of the Marriage Bill was constitutional, that it had reference, not to the celebration of marriage, but to a legal impediment which can be removed only by this Parliament. However, as I have already remarked, a contrary view was entertained and strongly expressed by the two learned jurists above named, and that view was shared by what we all consider the best authority on any constitutional question, the right hon. leader of the Government (Sir John A. Macdonald). Prominent members of this House, well-known for their devotion to the rights and interests of the Province of Quebec, both religious and civil, and among others the hon. the Minister of Public Works, and member for Three Rivers (Mr. Langevin), likewise raised the constitutionality of the "dispensation" proviso; and at their special instance and request, it was struck out in Committee of the Whole, and the Bill, as reported by that Committee, and, as it now stands, reads as follows:—

"1. Marriage between a man and a sister of his deceased wife, or the widow of his deceased brother shall be legal.

"2. All such marriages heretofore contracted, the parties whereof are living as husband and wife at the time of the passing of this Act, shall be held to have been lawfully contracted."

Now, what are the objections against the Bill? First, as far as the Province of Quebec is concerned, a single newspaper has written editorially against it. I refer to the Journal des Trois Rivières, a paper generally well-informed on ecclesiastical matters, but not, perhaps, so accurate on constitutional questions. In its issue of the 5th instant, it denounced the Bill, deprived as it is of its "dispensation" proviso, as simply "immoral." The Hon. T. J. J. Loranger, the pensioned but not retired Judge of Sorel, has also lately assailed the Marriage Bill, with all the learning, energy and great talent at his command, in several communications published in La Minerve. Finally, the high position of His Lordship Mgr. Lafleche, Bishop of Three Rivers, as one of the most distinguished dignitaries of the Catholic Church in Canada, and one of its ablest theologians, forces me to mention the fact that in a letter addressed to me, His Lordship formally withdraws his former adhesion to the Bill and protests against its passing, unless the "dispensation" clause be restored. Both His Lordship and ex-Judge Loranger fear that, under the Bill, Catholics will be allowed to marry their sisters-in-law without first obtaining the previous dispensation from the Pope. I would understand this objection if the Bill intended to do away with Church discipline and regulations. But there was no such intention, I am sure, on the part of the hon. members who demanded the striking out of the "dispensation" clause, and such is not and cannot be the effect of the Bill. In the first place, it is well-known that in the Province of Quebec, at least, Catholics must be married before their priest or curate, leur propre curé; this point is not susceptible of controversy, and it has been recognised by law writers and courts of justice. Of course the Curé will not proceed to celebrate the marriage without the required dispensation, and it must be borne in mind that in the Province of Quebec, at least, no priest or minister can be forced to celebrate a marriage against his conscience. Article 129 of the Civil Code, says:

"All priests, rectors, ministers and other officers authorised by law to keep registers of acts of civil status are competent to solemnise marriage.

"But none of the officers thus authorised can be compelled to solemnise a marriage to which any impediment exists according to the doctrines and belief of his religion, and the discipline of the Church to which he belongs."

But there is more. I respectfully submit that Article 125 of the Code being amended, as it will be, by this Bill, the "dispensation" power will be sufficiently recognised by Article 127; but even if it is not, it will indeed be easy to define it more expressly by an Act of the Quebec Legislature. Article 125 says:

After the passing of the Bill, it will read as follows:—

"125. In the collateral line, marriage is prohibited between brother and sister, legitimate or natural; but it is permitted between a man and the sister of his deceased wife, or the widow of his brother."

The following articles need only be quoted:—

"127. Marriage is also prohibited between uncle and niece, aunt and nephew.

"127. The other impediments recognised according to the different religious persuasions, as resulting from relationship or affinity, or from other causes, remain subject to the rules hitherto followed in the different Churches and religious communities. The right, likewise, of granting dispensations from such impediments appertains, as heretofore, to those who have hitherto enjoyed it."

Such was the opinion of His Lordship the Bishop of Three Rivers, himself, and of all the Catholic Bishops of the Province of Quebec, a fact which the following letters already published will show beyond doubt:—

MONTREAL, 28th February, 1880.

MY LORD,—The discussion on the Bill to render legal marriages between brothers-in-law and sisters-in-law began last night, as your Lordship will have seen from to-day's newspapers. The point meeting with most opposition is the recognition by the State of the right to give dispensations in the case of the impediment resulting from affinity.

Would your Lordship be content to see Article 125 of the Code repealed in order to legalize such a marriage without further ado? Do you think that in that case the right of giving dispensations would be sufficiently protected by Article 127?

An answer addressed to me at Ottawa will oblige

BISHOPRIC OF THREE RIVERS,

D. GIROUARD, Esq., M.P.

MY DEAR SIR,—I regret that your Bill for the legal recognition of marriages between brothers-in-law and sisters-in-law cannot pass as it was brought forward. Nevertheless, the repeal of that prohibition in Article 125 of the C. C. being favourable to the liberty of the Church, I have no objection to its simple repeal, leaving the dispensation of that impediment, as well of the other impediments, to the authorities designated in Article 127.

I remain, etc.,

†L. F., Bishop of Three Rivers.

Letter received this morning. What you propose will suffice and satisfies me.

SHERBROOKE, 1st March, 1880.

D. GIROUARD, Esq., M.P., Ottawa.

SIR,—I think it is sufficient to repeal Article 125 of the Code in order to legalize the marriage now before Parliament. I am also of opinion that the right to grant dispensations is sufficiently safe-guarded by Article 127.

But would it not also be apropos to repeal at the same time Article 126, which prohibits marriage between uncle and niece, aunt and nephew?

I am, Sir,

Your obedient servant,

†ANTOINE, Bishop of Sherbrooke.

MONTREAL, 29th February, 1880.

MY DEAR SIR,—I certainly think that Article 127 sufficiently establishes the right to grant dispensations, and that your plan to legalize the marriages in question by amending Article 125, will be for the best.

I wish you every success.

Yours faithfully,

†EDOUARD CHS., Bishop of Montreal.

ST. HYACINTHE, February 23, 1880.

D. GIROUARD, Esq., M.P., Ottawa.

SIR,—I have the honour to inform you, in answer to your yesterday's letter, that I would be content to see disappear from our Code, not only Article 125, but also Article 126, which, in many cases, are very embarrassing for us Catholics. Bishops and priests oppose with all their might, as is imposed upon them by the Church, marriages contracted by such close relations, but there are circumstances when, for the welfare of the parties interested, and the honour of families as well as the safeguard of public morals, they are obliged to solemnise such marriages, after having obtained from the Pope all the dispensations required in a similar case. A real service would thus be done us, were those two Articles, which, in my opinion, should never have been introduced into it, eliminated therefrom.

Article 127 might be retained, but worded as follows:—"The impediments to the marriage being admitted according to, etc." The rules of the Catholic Church concerning our impediments to marriages and our right to grant dispensation thereof, are therein sufficiently recognised and safeguarded. I do not, therefore, see any reason for not maintaining that Article after making in it the slight change suggested by me. Wishing you success,

I remain most sincerely,

Your obedient servant,

†L. Z. Bp. of St. Hyacinthe.

ARCHBISHOPRIC OF QUEBEC,
 QUEBEC, March 1, 1880.

D. GIROUARD, Esq., M.P., Ottawa.

SIR,—Replying to your letter of 28th February: 1. It is most desirable that the Bill concerning the marriage of brothers-in-law and sisters-in-law should pass, such as amended by you, for it would be of service not only to the Province of Quebec, but to the whole of Canada as well. 2. By contenting yourself with repealing the second part of Art. 125 of the Civil Code of Lower Canada, you will no doubt provide in a satisfactory manner for the legalisation of these marriages in our Province, but not in the other Provinces, and each one of them will in turn ask for the passing of a law more or less contrary to the rules of the Catholic ecclesiastical discipline. With us, Article 127 maintains the impediment until removed by a dispensation, but will the same be the case in the other Provinces?

I have the honour to be, Sir,
 Your obedient servant,
 † E. A., Archbp. of Quebec.

QUEBEC, April 1st, 1880.

C. RINFREIT, Esq., M.P., Ottawa.

SIR,—In reply to your letter of yesterday, I profoundly regret that Mr. Girouard's Bill has no chance of passing with the clauses which I suggested to that gentleman and to Mr. Vallée in various letters which I have written them on this subject. However, in default of a better, I think there would be still less inconvenience in adopting the Bill, as amended in Committee of the Whole than to leave this delicate question in the state of uncertainty in which Articles 125 and 127 of our Civil Code of Lower Canada place it.

I have the honour to be, Sir,
 Your very obedient servant,
 (Signed,) E. A.,
 Archbishop of Quebec.

The Bill has also the support of the Roman Catholic clergy of the Province of Ontario, as the following correspondence, which has likewise appeared in the public press, will show:—

OTTAWA, 2nd March, 1880.

MY LORD,—Your Lordship has undoubtedly noticed by the reports of the debates on my Bill to legalise the marriage with a deceased wife's sister, that the opposition to the same is principally confined to that proviso which acknowledges the right of the Catholic Church to grant previous dispensation from the Pope. Without that proviso, the Bill has a fair chance of being carried. Several Catholic members of your Province desire to know whether they should vote or not for the legalisation of such marriages pure and simple, without insisting on any reservation as to Church discipline or regulations.

An answer will oblige,
 My Lord,
 Your obedient servant,
 D. GIROUARD.

MR. GIROUARD.

D. GIROUARD, Esq., M.P.

DEAR SIR,—Although the marriage of a man with his deceased wife's sister is prohibited in the Catholic Church as a general rule, still we are sometimes under the necessity of applying to the Holy See for a dispensation for such marriages. So I consider that it will be a satisfaction to know that the State recognises the validity of such unions. I highly approve of the tenor of your Bill. I hope that it will pass such as it is. But if the first proviso cannot pass, try to have the second.

I have the honour to be,
 Your obedient servant,
 † JOHN FRANCIS JAMOT,
 Bishop of Sarepta.
 Vicar Apostolic of Northern Canada.

TORONTO, March 4, 1880.

D. GIROUARD, Esq., M. P., Ottawa:

DEAR SIR,—I think that a Catholic can vote for the Bill in question, inasmuch as the Catholic Church grants, for grave reasons, a dispensation to marry a deceased wife's sister, &c.

The inconvenience is very serious in the case when a dispensation is granted by the Church and not by the State. The State looks upon, as invalid, a marriage which the Church holds as valid, on account of the dispensation, and the State holds as illegitimate the children, and that they are disqualified to inherit the property of their parents.

Respecting the clause about the dispensation I think in a Parliament like yours, at Ottawa, the Catholic members might overlook that, as it is supposed that a Catholic will always obtain such a dispensation when necessary from his Bishop or from the Pope.

The proviso may be retained that no clergyman is to be compelled to officiate at a marriage against the rules of his Church. If a Catholic member has a scruple to vote for this Bill, he may abstain from voting.

I have the honour to be,
 Your devoted servant,
 † JOHN JOSEPH LYNCH,
 Archbishop of Toronto.

(Translation.)

OTTAWA, 16th March, 1880.

D. GIROUARD, Esq., M. P.

SIR,—As the Catholic Church permits, under special circumstances, for grave reasons, marriages between brothers-in-law and sisters-in-law, your Bill, as amended by Committee of the whole House, to legalise these marriages meets my views, in the absence of something better.

I have the honour to be, Sir,
 Your humble servant,
 † J. THOMAS, Bishop of Ottawa.

Now, let us see what is the state of public opinion among the Protestants of this country. Is it against the Bill or in favour of it? Where are the petitioners for the same, said some of the opponents of the Bill. The hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Jones), said the other evening, that the Bill "was brought forward in the interest of individuals, the endeavour being made to push it hurriedly through the House." Allow me, Mr. Speaker, to tell him that as far as I am personally concerned, I have no interest whatever in the Bill; I will even tell my hon. friend if this information will tend to remove his opposition or quiet his mind, that I have no sister-in-law to marry; I may confess that I cannot conceive how a man can have for his sister-in-law that love and affection which are necessary to make marriage happy. But, Sir, what we do not feel ourselves, others might, and as a matter of fact, do. Hundreds of these prohibited marriages have been contracted during the last fifteen or twenty years. If the necessary dispensation be obtained, the Catholic priest does not hesitate to perform the ceremony, and if among Protestants, no minister can be found willing to do the same, the parties cross the line, where they are always certain of finding relief. This Bill is brought solely in the interest of the people of this country, more as a beneficial measure in the future than a relief for the past, inasmuch as the marriage where one of the parties have died, are not to be affected by its provisions. I exceedingly regret that the hard case of the unfortunate lady, which I referred when I introduced the Bill, and deserved so much attention and sympathy from the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Wright), is not covered by the Bill as amended and reported by the Committee. The hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Jones), promised us some four or five weeks ago that if an opportunity was given, the Church of England would protest. That opportunity has been given and what have we seen? An agitation against the Bill? No, Sir, on the contrary, an agitation in favour of it. Hardly one newspaper can be cited against it, and it was, indeed, pleasing to see all the leading journals of the Dominion, both French and English, Catholic and Protestant, pronounce in most unequivocal terms in favour of the measure. I challenge the hon. members opposing it to quote one single editorial from any of the independent papers in favour of the ungenerous course they are pursuing. However, this failure of sympathy was not for want of proper exertions and efforts. Lengthy and learned pamphlets and papers have been written by most eminent dignitaries of the Church, and, no doubt, the pamphlet of His Lordship Bishop Binney, of Nova Scotia, showing, in the strongest language possible, the "reasons for rejecting the proposed alterations in the marriage law of the Dominion," was calculated to produce a great effect. Sheets were also printed and circulated by the thousand, containing a very convincing report of the speeches delivered at a meeting, one would suppose, expressly called to influence the proceedings of this Parliament, and held in London, England, on the 26th of February last, to oppose "the Bill to legalise marriage (not with a deceased brother's wife, but only) with a deceased wife's sister." Petitions were also carefully prepared, printed, and distributed for signatures, by the various congregations spread all over the country. And what has been the result of this great canvassing? Petitions came, not from towns and cities, but from thirty-one small and obscure parishes of the Church of England, in Nova Scotia; one from St. Paul's Church, Chatham, New Brunswick; three from Prince Edward Island, that is from Milton, Summerside, and Crapaud. One came from some of the clergy and laymen of the Church of England, in Kingston, Ontario. We are still waiting for one from Gananoque, the important town where the hon. leader of the opposition to this Bill resides, and also from all the other towns and cities of Ontario and of the Dominion. None came from Quebec, or any other Province, except from the Church of England. It must be observed that these "parish" petitions are alike, in printed, or rather circular form; they do not emanate from the parishes or congregations as bodies, but only from a few individuals, in some cases five or six altogether in number, whose occupation, or position, is not given, who often cannot read nor write, and who, finally, are not always headed by their incumbent. To do, however, ample justice to these petitioners, it is, perhaps, better to lay the full text of their protest before the House:

To the Honourable the House of Commons of the Dominion of Canada :

The petition of the undersigned members of the Church of England, in the Parish (or Mission) of

HUMBLY SHEWETH,

That your petitioners have been much alarmed by the introduction into your Honourable House of a Bill to effect serious changes in the Marriage Laws legalising the marriage of a man with his deceased wife's sister, and of a woman with her deceased husband's brother.
That your petitioners are persuaded that any such interference with the table of prohibited degrees will materially affect the welfare of the community and the comfort and happiness of many households in which persons connected together by affinity have been accustomed to regard each other in the same light as though they were connected by the ties of consanguinity, and enjoy the same happy intercourse as brothers and sisters without suspicion or thought of evil.

Your petitioners believe that one of the marriages to be legalised is expressly forbidden by Holy Scripture, and that the prohibition of the other is implied, and they cannot admit that any authority, ecclesiastical or civil, is empowered to dispense with such such a prohibition.

That your petitioners especially object to the proviso of the Bill making a distinction between marriages where the parties are members of one religious body, and other cases, as introducing an element of confusion and uncertainty, and they hold that all such marriages ought either to be legal or illegal in every case, without reference to the peculiarities of any Branch of the Church.

That on behalf of the children who may be deprived of their mother, your petitioners pray that the present position of the surviving sister with relation to the widower may not be altered, as such alteration must necessarily deprive the motherless children of the loving care of the aunt at the time when it would be most especially beneficial, and under the present law is commonly enjoyed.

Finally, your petitioners submit that before any alteration is made in the Marriage Laws, ample opportunity should be afforded for the full consideration of a subject in which all persons are more or less interested, and for the presentation of their objections by those who are opposed to any change; that no such opportunity has been afforded with respect to the Bill now before your Honourable House, and that for this as well as the other reasons herein set forth it should be rejected.

Now, Mr. Speaker, let us show to this House how the Protestant clergy stands.
On the one side we find the Bishops of the Church of England being almost unanimously against the Bill. Their joint petition is in these terms:—

That your petitioners have heard with surprise and alarm that a Bill has been introduced into your Honourable House to legalise marriage with the sister of a deceased wife, and also to legalise the marriage of a woman with the brother of her deceased husband.

Your petitioners submit, that many serious evils would arise from thus tampering with the fundamental law of marriage, which has declared that the two become by marriage one flesh, and with the immemorial custom founded upon this law, that the prohibited degrees of affinity and consanguinity should be identical.

Your petitioners further submit that there is no more fruitful source of corruption of morals in a State than laxity on the subject of marriage; and they have great reason to fear that if the proposed Bill should pass into an Act, other cases of unlawful union will speedily arise, which it will be difficult, if not impossible, to reject; and that general immorality will be promoted. For these and other grave reasons which your petitioners forbear to urge, your petitioners earnestly pray your Honourable House not to consent that the proposed Bill should become law, and your petitioners will ever pray, etc.

JOHN FREDERICTON, Metropolitan of Canada;
H. Nova Scotia, J. T. Ontario, J. W.
Quebec, T. B. Niagara, W. B. Montreal,
A. Toronto.

These Bishops have further sent in their respective petitions, in which the same grounds are set forth more fully. The Bishop of Huron has also forwarded his individual protest. But against these representations, not from the whole clergy or laity of the Church of England, not from this important branch of Christianity as a body, but from the Episcopate of that Church only a large number of favourable testimonials came from all shades of the Protestant faith. It must not be forgotten that the Presbytery of London, Ontario, was sitting at the time of the introduction of the Bill, and had this religious body been against its provisions, it would, no doubt, have petitioned against it. True, the Presbytery of Montreal has just asked Parliament to delay its proceedings until the next annual meeting of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church of Canada, in June next, but from the wording of the petition one would suppose that the cause of their action seems to be that portion of the Bill which legalises marriage with the widow of a brother. On the other hand, we do not know who formed this Presbytery of Montreal; who were present at the meeting where this petition was decided upon; when the meeting was held; and finally, we are not even told that the petition was duly authorised.
We also find that the Ministerial Protestant Association of Montreal, open to all Protestant ministers, at a meeting where several Presbyterian ministers were present, unanimsly pronounced in favour of the Bill. The Methodist clergy of Toronto have made a similar declaration. One of its first advocates was the Rev. Gavin Lang, minister of St. Andrew's Church (Church of Scotland), Montreal. His letter to the hon. member for Montreal West (Mr. Gault), as well as other similar letters from other Protestant clergymen, will, no doubt, be read with interest. Only yesterday a petition was presented to this Parliament, signed by all or nearly all the Protestant ministers of Montreal belonging to the Church of England, thirty-two in number, praying that the Bill do pass and become law. These favourable testimonials should be preserved, and I hope I will be excused for inserting them here for future reference :

The Rev. Gavin Lang (Church of Scotland) writes :

MONTREAL, February 27th, 1880.

DEAR MR. GAULT,—I thank you very much for sending me a copy of Mr. Girouard's Bill for legalising marriages with a deceased wife's sister, etc. For one, I heartily approve of its principle, and hope it will pass and become law.

It occurred to me that I would mention to you that, to the astonishment of most people, the United Presbyterian Body of Dissenters in Scotland declared, last year, that they could no longer regard such marriages as Mr. Girouard's Bill contemplated as un-Christian. Their ministers are permitted to solemnise these, and to admit the parties to them to the privileges of their communion. The importance and significance of this action on the part of a severely Evangelical body cannot be exaggerated.

The attitude of your own Church and of mine, both national Churches and the only State Churches of the Empire, must necessarily be determined by the position taken up by the law makers. When Parliament sanctions marriages with deceased wives' sisters, so must we. I speak for the Church of Scotland, to which I belong, when I say that we are quite ripe for the ready performance of these marriages. In my first parish in Scotland, I had a couple who took that step in (ecclesiastically viewed) an irregular way "furth of the kingdom" and came back to live in the parish. I had no hesitation in regarding them as parishioners of mine in good standing.

The Church of Rome, of course, takes up a different position in this matter, but Mr. Girouard fully provides against any infringement of its rules and rights; and it is entitled to hold and assert its own opinions and views.

I would be very glad if you offered our mutual friend, Mr. Girouard, my warm and sincere wishes for the success of his measure. Its adoption and enactment by the Parliament of Canada will give wider and greater relief than any of us imagine, and would not in any wise conflict with the teachings of the Word of God as interpreted by either Roman Catholics or Protestants.

With repeated thanks for your courtesy in sending me a copy of this important Bill, and with kind regards, as also deep sympathy with you in your recent heavy affliction,

Believe me,

Yours very sincerely,

GAVIN LANG.

M. H. GAULT, Esq., M. P.

DEAR SIR,—I thank you for copy of Bill to "legalise marriage with, etc." In my judgment it would be in the interest of good morals and sound public policy to pass such a measure. I would omit the two provisos, however, as likely to lead to complications. But rather than have the measure fail I would accept them.

Very truly yours,

J. CORDNER.

The Montreal Ministerial Association endorse the Bill, in the following letter :—

MONTREAL, 922 Dorchester street, }
March 22nd, 1880. }

DEAR SIR,—There is a society in this city called the "Montreal Ministerial Association," open to all the Protestant Ministers of Montreal, to which, moreover, a large number of them testify good will by attending its meetings. The Association met this morning, and discussed the subject of the lawfulness of marriage with a sister of a deceased wife. After an interesting conversation, it was resolved that those present could see no Scriptural inhibition against such marriages, and further, that the approved of the Bill now before Parliament for rendering them legal. This view was taken quite unanimously, as to those present at our meeting this morning, and the subject had been duly announced beforehand. Had the meeting been larger than it was, I have no doubt a result substantially similar would have followed, although in that case there might have been one or two dissentients.

Among those present at the meeting and fully concurring in the view I have given, were the following clergymen :—Rev. Gavin Lang, St. Andrew's Church (Church of Scotland); Rev. J. S. Black, Erskine Church (Presbyterian); Rev. J. H. Wells, American Presbyterian Church; Rev. J. Roy, Wesley Church (Congregational); Rev. J. Nichols, St. Mark's (Presbyterian), and myself.

I am permitted and authorised to communicate this result to you.

One would think from the opposition raised to the proposal, that it was one to compel marriage with a former wife's sister. It is wonderful that people should be unwilling to leave a question on which the highest exegetical and ecclesiastical authorities are so divided, to the judgment and conscience of individuals who may be interested, and to the laws of the several Churches.

I am, dear Sir,

Very truly yours,

MY DEAR SIR,—I have to thank you for a copy of the Ottawa Citizen, of Wednesday last, and for the printed letters enclosed.

The testimony of Dr. de Sala is very valuable. I hope you will be successful in removing from Canada all such obstacles to marriage with a deceased wife's sister, as those aimed at by Mr. Girouard's Bill.

I am, my dear Sir,

The following is the Petition of the Methodist Ministers of Toronto :

To the Honourable the House of Commons of the Dominion of Canada :

The petition of the undersigned clergymen of the Methodist Church of Canada, resident in the city of Toronto, humbly sheweth :—That, whereas a Bill for the purpose of legalising marriage with a deceased wife's sister, has been presented for the consideration and legislative sanction of both Houses of the Dominion Parliament; your petitioners are satisfied of the wisdom and expediency of such a measure, and the invalidity of the objections which are urged against it, and therefore respectfully request your honourable House to enact the principle of the Bill in a Statute, so as to give the formal authority and protection of the law to the marriage of a widower with the sister of his deceased wife.

In presenting this request to your honourable House, your petitioners may be permitted briefly to state some of the reasons by which they have been compelled to take a position so different from that which has been taken by petitioners belonging to some other Christian denominations in respect to the said Bill.

There are no ties of blood or relationship, which would make such marriages immoral or improper. There are numerous cases where they are eminently expedient, and, beyond doubt, promote the best interests of all the parties concerned.

Hitherto, there has been no law upon our Canadian Statute-book against such marriages; although we are aware they are regarded as illegal in Britain. Under these circumstances, believing that they were acting in a legal and proper manner, some of our worthiest and most respected Canadian citizens have formed such marriages. It would be a cruel and ill-advised thing for our highest legislative courts to take any course that would appear to place these excellent persons in a position of inferiority and outlawry. There is no good reason why such marriages should not have the formal sanction of law. No interest of social order, property, or morality would be injuriously affected by the enactment of such a law; while, in many cases, the legal denial of this privilege would be a very great hardship to innocent and worthy persons, whose interests should not be disregarded by those to whom the making of our laws is committed.

Apart from ecclesiastical law, which creates an artificial morality that has no general Christian obligation, the only feasible ground of objection to the proposed measure is obtained by a strained and unwarrantable interpretation of a passage in the 18th chapter of the Book of Leviticus; which says nothing about marrying, or not marrying, a deceased wife's sister.

The passage in dispute seems simply to forbid the taking of a wife's sister, as an additional wife, during the lifetime of the first wife. The fact that the Mosaic law made it the duty of a man, in certain cases, to marry his deceased brother's wife, is wholly inconsistent with the interpretation which some have put upon this passage. So is the fact that such marriages were customary among the Jews; which is unaccountable, if they understood this passage to forbid what they practised. Mr. Hirschfelder, the learned Professor of Hebrew and Oriental Literature, in University College, Toronto, has shown in his pamphlet, "A Wife to her Sister, that both the Septuagint version and the Chaldee paraphrase render the passage in Leviticus in such a manner as to leave no doubt that such marriages were allowed; also, that there is no evidence that, while Hebrew was a living language, this text was understood to prohibit such marriages; and that the Mishna and the writings of the learned Philo show that no such meaning, as modern writers attach to this passage, was formerly given to it by Hebrew scholars.

It seems to your petitioners somewhat singular, therefore, to see the representatives of Christian Churches, on the strength of such a forced interpretation of what is admittedly not a plain prohibition, attempting to prevent the enactment of a law that commends itself to reason; which has repeatedly received the sanction of the House of Commons of England, and which would now be the law of the Mother Country, only for the opposition of the House of Lords, mainly caused by the powerful ecclesiastical influence in that body. The idea of building a prohibition for whole communities on so doubtful a foundation is a remarkable illustration of the tenacity with which people cling to the side of a question that has the prestige of ecclesiastical authority and prejudice in its favour.

In view of the considerations herein named, and other weighty reasons, your petitioners earnestly request your honourable House to accede to the prayer of this memorial, and enact a measure that shall duly legalise a marriage contracted between a widower and his deceased wife's sister.

Mr. T. M. Hirschfelder, Professor of Hebrew in the University of Toronto, writes the following letter to the Globe—

To the Editor of the Globe:

SIR,—I perceived in yesterday's Globe a letter from the Rev. Provost Whitaker on the subject of "Marriage with a Deceased Wife's Sister," in which the rev. gentleman moralises on the consequences that may result from the abrogation of that law, it being presumably based on the Mosaic marriage-law recorded in Lev. xviii., 18.

Now, Mr. Editor, it appears to me that it would have been more in accordance with sound criticism to have first proved that such a law actually has a place among the Mosaic marriage laws. Of course, the Legislature of any country has a perfect right to establish any law that may be conducive to morality, but it is quite another matter to maintain that such a law is founded upon the Divine teaching of the Scriptures.

In my treatise on this subject, I carefully traced this question from the very first institution of marriage, Gen. ii., 24, and afterwards fully examined the passage in Lev. xviii., 18, on which the law in question is supposed to be founded, and have, I think, shown beyond a shadow of doubt that it is utterly impossible to construe that passage as prohibiting such a marriage. There are many who feel very deeply on this subject, and I think that they have a right to look to those who profess to be well informed on the subject to prove distinctly to them that they have transgressed, even if unknowingly, such an important law.

Would Mr. Provost Whitaker, therefore, kindly answer the following questions:—

1. How are the words, "to cause jealousy

(or enmity) * * beside her," (the above is a literal translation) to be understood? What do these words mean if the first sister is in her grave?

2. What do the words "in her lifetime" mean, and why are they in the text at all if they do not intend to imply that such a marriage was only prohibited during the life of the first wife?

3. Why should the sacred writer have couched a command which was necessary to be understood by the ignorant as well as by the learned, in such ambiguous language if he intended positively to forbid "the marriage with a deceased wife's sister"? Experience has proved that 99 out of 100 critics interpreted the passage that such a marriage is only forbidden during the life of the first wife.

4. Why did the sacred writer not express it in the same simple manner as he expressed the law forbidding the marriage with a deceased brother's wife? There is no mistaking that language. See Lev. xviii, 16.

5. How is it that not the least trace of any such law can be discovered among the ancient Jews, but that, on the contrary, special provisions are made in respect to such laws in the Mishna, which contains the oral laws of the Jews, and which are by most Jews regarded of equal importance as the Mosaic laws? I will here subjoin, for the benefit of your readers, two of the many provisions laid down in the Mishna. The following is a literal translation, made by myself from the work in the University library:—"If a man whose wife is gone to a country beyond the sea, is informed that his wife is dead, and he marries her sister, and after that his wife comes back, she may return to him. . . . After the death of the first wife he may, however, marry again the second wife." And again:—"If, on being told of the death of his wife, he had married her sister, but being afterwards informed that she had been alive at the time (he had married the sister), but is dead now, then any child born before the death of the first wife is illegitimate, but not those born after her death." (See Babylonian Talmud Treatise Zebamoth, Tam. v., p. 94, Amsterdam Ed.)

In this treatise, which chiefly treats on questions of marriage, there are found even passages where such marriages are encouraged, as for example, cap. iv., sec. 13, p. 49.

As this subject is now attracting a great deal of attention both here and in England, you will oblige me by inserting the above remarks in your widely circulated journal.

I am, Sir,

Yours truly,

J. M. HIRSCHFELDER.

Toronto, April 10, 1880.

But what must be astonishing to those Christians who advocated that the Bill in question is against the Old Testament will be found in the fact that the Jews believe in it and act in accordance with its principles. This is established in a most remarkable letter addressed by the learned Rabbi of the Jews of Montreal, Rev. Mr.

de Sola, and also Professor of Hebrew in McGill University. He writes:

DEAR MR. GIROUARD,

I reply to your favour of yesterday, I have much pleasure in stating that your Bill, intended to legalise marriage with the sister of a deceased wife, or the widow of a deceased brother, has my most decided approval. As regards Jewish authoritative opinion, this, unquestionably, has always been in favour of such marriages, because the Synagogue (the ecclesia docens of Judaism) from the time of Moses to our own day, has always regarded them as in accordance with the will of God, and as instituted in the law which he commanded Moses, his servant. The propriety of such marriages has, therefore, never been questioned by Jewish teachers, ancient or modern. The marriage with the widow of a deceased brother was childless, has always been authoritatively declared obligatory, except when exemption acquired by the means indicated in the Levitical Law, and more fully explained in the Talmud Treatise "Yebamoth." I shall, therefore, add nothing in respect to this kind of marriage. As regards marriage with a deceased wife's sister, this has always been permitted by the Jewish Church and practised by the Jewish people. The passage in Leviticus xviii., 18 sometimes appealed to as prohibiting such marriages, according to received Jewish interpretation, and also in accordance with strict grammatical analysis, should read thus: "And a wife to her sister shalt thou not take to vex her, by uncovering her nakedness beside her, during her life time." Putting aside Jewish interpretation for the nounce, and bearing in mind that polygamy, although not originating in, or recommended by, the law of Moses, was yet tolerated by it, we may legitimately infer that the words "during her life time" are used simply to limit the period during which such a marriage might not take place, and at the same time, to indicate when it might; to wit, after the wife's death. In this sense has the passage been rendered in the Chaldaic Targumim (translations or paraphrases of the biblical text), in that of Onkelos, written before the commencement of the Christian era, and in that of Jonathan, for which even a greater antiquity is claimed. The Talmud, as old as the Gospel and which contains not merely the orally received laws and precepts regarded as obligatory by the Hebrew people, but also their system of jurisprudence and traditional, or historical, exposition of the Hebrew Scriptures, while prohibiting (Treatise Yebamoth iv. 13) the marriage with a wife's sister, even "though he may have divorced his wife," most explicitly states, at the same time, that there is no prohibition of such a marriage, no objection thereto, after the death of his wife, but that it may then be celebrated. Throughout all the writings of the later Casuists, the same doctrine is taught, and, as a consequence, marriage with a deceased wife's sister has ever been, and is yet, practised by the Jewish people everywhere.

The Hebrew commentators all unite in giving

glosses in accordance with the teachings of the Synagogue. They point out to us that the expression "during her life time" limits the prohibition of such a marriage to the wife's life time only, but does not extend beyond it. They also point out to us (inter alia Rashi) that the term "Litsror" (to vex her) is a word, the primary acceptation of which is to trouble, to annoy, and, in a secondary sense, means to create or produce trouble or vexation through jealousy—so in the kindred dialects also,—and they add that the limitation to these marriages was instituted because it is neither natural nor proper that sisters, who ought to love each other, should be placed in a position where jealousy or enmity would probably be excited. And, in this connection, I may note that the Mishna (the text of the Talmud), applies a word derived from the very same root, to the polygamist's additional wives, which it styles "tsaroth," or troubles. As a résumé of the Hebrew exposition of this text, I will quote from the eloquent and philosophical Don Isaac Abarbanel. He aptly remarks: "The reason assigned for the prohibition is the 'vexation' which the first wife would suffer, but there can be no such vexation in the case of her death, and, therefore, is the marriage with the sister then allowed. It is not allowed, however, if he divorce his wife, because, as she still lived, her vexation would be the same. From the use of the expression, 'during her life time,' we see that all the other prohibited kinds of intercourse are of a permanent and unconditional character, but not the marriage with a wife's sister, respecting which, according to the analogy of the language employed in the other prohibited unions, the expression here should be: 'The nakedness of the sister of thy wife shalt thou not uncover,' which is not used, but in exceptional form employed. But the truth is that the design of the text is merely to prohibit the 'vexing' or afflicting his wife by exhibiting a preference for her sister, and hence again is marriage allowed after the wife's decease."

With this quotation, I think enough has been now written to show what are the views and practice of the Jewish Church in respect to the marriages you desire to legalise in Canada. My best wishes are for the success of your Bill, which I regard as calculated to subserve the cause of civil and religious liberty, which underlies it, and of morality, which it is calculated to promote. When a similar measure of relief, for many worthy and pious persons under the ban of illegal union, was brought forward by Mr. Stuart Wortley, in the Imperial Parliament, during the year 1850, the measure was denounced by an opponent as "scandalous, immoral, and mischievous." But I believe that you will find but few inclined to go thus far in opposing your Bill, especially in view of the fact that many dignitaries of the Christian Church, Protestant as well as Roman Catholic, have pronounced in its favor.

You are fully at liberty to publish this, as you request.

Very truly yours,
ABRAHAM DE SOLA.

D GIROUARD, Esq., M.P.

I believe that, under the circumstances, I can affirm with certainty that the prohibition to marry the sister of a deceased wife, or the widow of a brother, is not against the Scriptures, as the majority of Christians understand them. There is no doubt, moreover, that the Law of Moses is not always a safe guide for Christians. Polygamy, or plurality of wives, was admitted, or at least tolerated, among the Jews. We are assured that Solomon was allowed seven hundred legitimate wives.

MR. BOULTBEE: And he was called Solomon the Wise.

MR. GIROUARD: Mormonism can be defended upon the Leviticus, as well as the prohibition to marry a deceased wife's sister and even better. No one, not even the gallant member for Leeds (Mr. Jones), would dream of introducing Mormonism into our Christian community, because it is to be found in the Old Testament. Finally, it cannot be contended that the restriction in question, which the opponents of the Bill desire to perpetuate and make permanent, is not based upon reason, morality or natural law; there is no blood relationship or consanguinity between the parties. And if the Bill were to make these marriages obligatory as it was sometimes the case under the laws of Moses, one would account for the opposition of the Church of England. But hereafter no more than in the past, do we intend to interfere with the liberty civil or religious of the subject, and the members of the Church of England, whose conscience and faith would forbid those unions, will not in the least be prevented from abstaining from the same. It has been observed that the Bill in its present form introduces into this country civil marriage. It has no such effect, I always understood that the character of the marriage law always depends from the character of the celebrating officer, and so long as this officer shall be the priest or minister of the parties, there cannot exist any reasonable fear that that the marriage shall be civil and not religious. This was the reason which induced the fathers of our Federal constitution to place the solemnization of marriage under the exclusive control of Provincial Legislatures. This great concession was made to quiet the mind of the Catholic population of the Province of Quebec, who,

as a consequence have not much to fear from the marriage laws of the Dominion Parliament, the law of divorce excepted; but it is to be hoped that this Parliament will never follow the example of the British Parliament which, to use the language of an eminent Protestant legal writer (Dr. Redfield) "has degraded the solemnisation of that sacred relation to the level of a mere civil contract, allowing its solemnisation before the civil magistrate, and practically abandoning the former claim of its indissolubility." Now, one word with regard to the social objections raised by the opponents of the Bill. It is said that it will upset happy social relations and would destroy the relations between brothers and sisters-in-law, the free, truthful and pure feelings with which a man regards the sister of his wife. This objection exists to-day under the prohibitory laws, for these marriages are almost daily contracted; public feeling is decidedly in their favour and they are socially recognised. Why then maintain a restriction which has only the effect of branding the issue of such marriages with the mark of illegitimacy before the law of the land. One of the leading journals of London, England, (the Telegraph, 7th May, 1879) answers the objection in this spirited manner:—"A man's feelings in such matters are wholly unaffected by Statutes, for as yet no human legislature has ever discovered how to modify or control the domestic affections by Acts of Parliament. The Bishop of London's reasoning seems to rest on the assumption, which is really as insulting as it is gratuitous, that but for the law which prohibits a man marrying his deceased wife's sister, everybody would try to taint with impurity this now spotless relationship. The way of dealing with such a question is to treat it in the spirit of those whose solvent for all social and political difficulties is liberty." Lastly, Mr. Speaker, and I conclude with this point, an effort was made to bring the great influence of the fair sex against the Bill. But what a failure! One or two women only from the isolated sea coast of Cape Breton, acting, no doubt, under the pressure and restraint of unmerciful husbands, appended their names to the petitions already alluded to. On the other side what have we seen? A lady under the non de guerre "Gunhilda" in the columns of the leading journal of Ottawa (the Citizen), rushing into the melée and displaying such an amount of learning and ingenuity that she forced her antagonist, the valiant Bishop of Ontario, to withdraw from the contest. The brilliant success is not surprising; we all know that the ladies have a style of putting their arguments, which is simply irresistible. The following language of the Countess of Charlemont is a fair sample of it:—"There is one argument," and Lady Charlemont considers it a strong one, in favour of such marriages, which is, "that now the foolish opponents thereof say that a woman would never feel safe in admitting her sister to her house as a resident, if after the wife's death, a marriage between the widower and the sister were possible. This is sheer folly," continues this noble lady, "Why such a degrading idea would prevent a woman of having a cousin, often as dear as a sister, or a friend to stay with her. Now, if a kind girl goes to nurse and comfort her dead sister's children, for whom she must have a natural affection, old gossips shake their heads and malign her, though as the law stands (not, we hope, for long) she is in her brother's house. Who would cherish the motherless things like her? A stranger? Well, the kind aunt would be thrust aside for some giddy girl, who would have no love for them, perhaps, even a feeling of repulsion."

Mr. JONES: I must congratulate the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Girouard), on the very able legal manner in which he has brought this matter before the House. We all know the ability and the energy of that hon. gentleman when he takes anything in hand. I think ever since the 16th of February, when he first brought this matter before the House, he has been sleeping over it and thinking over it, and he has made up a brief, which might be placed before any Court in this Dominion. It is a regular legal brief. But I do not look at this matter from either a legal or civil point of view. I take a different ground. It is contrary to the law of God; it will cause disturbance, trouble, and jealousies in many a household, when otherwise all would be peace and quiet. The hon. gentleman has said that numerous petitions have been presented in favour of this Bill. Now, how have these petitions been got up? Have they not been written for? Have they not been sought for? Has not the hon. gentleman written to almost every clergyman in his Church; written to every Bishop, to get up these petitions in favour of his Bill? Were there any petitions presented to this House before the 16th of February, in its favour? The hon. gentleman has stated that he had no interest whatever in it. Who are his friends, then, in whose behalf he has brought up this Bill? He must have many friends, many sympathisers, in different parts of the country, for whom he has taken all this trouble, and yet he coolly tells the House that he has done it from purely sympathetic and philanthropic motives, and that it is for the general welfare of the world. The hon. gentleman says that only the Church of England opposes it. As regards the Church of England, were that the only body which oppose it, is a very large and influential body in this country. And when we see all the Bishops of the Church of England in this Dominion, with the exception of those in Manitoba and British Columbia, who had not sufficient time to send petitions, have petitioned against the Bill, I think it is only reasonable that the delay that is asked for should be accorded. The hon. gentleman says the Presbyterian body are in favour of it. But on the 3rd of March last, a large meeting of Presbyterians was held in England, opposed to a Bill of this kind. We have also seen ministers of the Presbyterian Church in Montreal holding a meeting opposed to this Bill; and when we see other bodies in the country opposed to the Bill, I think it only right that some delay should be granted, and not rush the Bill; through the House in this manner. I think the Conservatives in this House, and on the Treasury Benches, should grant the delay asked for. I am very sorry to see that there is a disposition in this House to pass this Bill. We were taken by surprise in regard to it, and by some hon. members the Bill has been regarded with great levity. I protest against the measure as a member of the Church of England, because I think the Synods, which will meet during the summer, should have an opportunity of considering it. There is no difference of opinion amongst the Bishops of the Church of England on the subject. I beg to move:

“That the Bill be read a third time this day six months.”

MR. GAULT: I have seen no reason to change my view in regard to this measure, and I see no reason whatever why this Bill should not become law.

MR. CAMERON (North Victoria): The hon. member for South Leeds (Mr. Jones) has ventured to speak on behalf of the Church of England, as being opposed to this Bill. As a member of the Church of England, I deny that that Church, as a body, is opposed to this Bill. It is true that those bishops who have thought fit to petition this House on the subject, are opposed to the Bill, but there are some English bishops who have voted in favour of this measure on one or two occasions. The basis of the objections to this measure is only to be found in the Prayer-book, and I do not coincide with the party who considers that the Prayer book is superior in point of sanctity and obligation to the Bible. I was surprised to hear the hon. member for Leeds speak of the measure as having been regarded as a huge joke. I do not think that we can consider a Bill of this importance as a joke, in view of the past history of the question in England. There is only an unsupported assertion that the law of God is against the Bill, and there is no social reason against it, and, therefore, I venture to think that the third reading of this Bill ought to be carried.

MR. CHARLTON: I think there is a good deal of force in the observation made by my hon. friend from Leeds, that there was no agitation in favour of this Bill. It is certainly a very radical change, and if we pass the Bill this Session, I am of opinion that we will be guilty of precipitancy. It is a matter of great importance, and one in regard to which we should ascertain more fully the feeling of the religious bodies in the country. Therefore, I hope the further consideration of the measure will be deferred until another Session.

MR. PLUMB: I was pained to hear the manner in which the hon. member for Victoria spoke of the Prayer-book, which is not at all under discussion here. I do not think this is the place to bring up questions of that kind, and it does not seem to me to be the proper way of advocating the passage of this Bill. I avow myself in favour of the amendment of the hon. member for Leeds.

MR. WELDON: As one of the few who are opposed to this Bill, I am not willing to give a silent vote. I understood my hon. friend from Jacques Cartier, on the second reading of the Bill, to state that this was a similar measure to the one introduced into the House of Commons, England, with the exception of the provisos which he added. I have, however, been unable to find in that Bill any provision legalizing marriage with a deceased husband's brother, and Sir Thomas Chambers, who was the introducer of the Bill in the House of Commons, never introduced such a proposition in his Bill. We look for light in legislation, to the Mother Country, where we find the question agitated in that country, that petitions were presented, that an association was formed and cases of hardship brought forward. But in this instance here, not one instance of hardship, not a single petition, not even the slightest agitation, until the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Girouard), brought his Bill forward. I regret that he has brought it forward. As to the religious phase of the matter, that is a question which men should settle by their own consciences. The unanimous voice of Christendom has been against such marriages. We know that, until 1550, no dispensation by the Popes was granted. I will read an extract from a speech of Lord O'Hagan on the subject, delivered by him in the House of Lords. He says:

"This principle has unquestionably been maintained at all times since the earliest days of Christianity. It was proclaimed in the Apostolic Constitution before the Nicene Council. It became a part of that great system of jurisprudence which was generated when the Christian civilisation rose on the ruins of the effete and corrupt Imperialism of Rome, basing the hope of the world on the strictness and continency of the family relations, and raising up woman from her low estate to soften and purify the rude society round her. The Theodosian code condemned the practice which we are asked to approve, and declared marriage with a deceased wife's sister to be unlawful, and thenceforth, for many a century, down even to our time, the doctrine of that code has been held intact by famous theologians and solemn councils. It was the doctrine of Basil and Ambrose and Augustine. It was the doctrine equally of the East and West. It was affirmed by ecclesiastical assemblages in the various countries of Christendom, as they were successively comprehended within the fold of the Church, and it commanded the assent of all them. The dispensing power claimed by the Popes was at first resisted and denied, on the ground that the prohibition was absolute and mandatory by the law of God. The Greek Church, whatever may have been its decadence and shortcomings, is a venerable witness to the discipline of Christian antiquity, and we find that the unlawfulness of such a marriage was asserted equally by the Lutherans and Calvinists in Scotland, Geneva and in France."

That is the opinion of an Irish Lord who stood very high in legal circles and who was a Roman Catholic.

Some HON. MEMBERS: Question question.

MR. CASEY: I rise to order. This is something, Sir, that I am sure you will not allow.

MR. SPEAKER: Order.

MR. WELDON: The cause which relies upon disturbance and uproar to put down opposition must be a poor cause indeed. I think it is well for us, in such a great social and religious question as this, that we should consider the opinion of the religious bodies, and particularly the expression of opinion expressed by the Church of England. That Church should be listened to, and other religious bodies have requested that the matter should stand over, and I do not not see why such an important matter, both in its religious and social aspect, should not stand over another Session to give time for fuller discussion and deliberation, and ascertain fully the public opinion. I shall feel it my duty to support the amendment of the hon. member for Leeds.

MR. THOMPSON (Haldimand): The petition that I had the honour to present was forwarded by the Bishop of Nova Scotia, and was, so far as I know, voluntary on his part. There have been other petitions besides this indicating that more time should be given; there have been no petitions from the people asking for this Bill, and I think it premature to pass it. Other denominations wish to obtain time in order to present their views fully to this House, because it will involve a great change. The Presbytery of Toronto passed a resolution, resolving:

MR. PLUMB.

"That the Moderator, Dr. Reid, Principal Caven, Dr. Gregg (convener), and Prof. McLaren, be appointed a Committee to prepare petitions to the Governor-General and both Houses of Parliament, deprecating their giving assent to the Bill now before Parliament, which proposes to give legal sanction to marriage between a man and his deceased wife's sister or his deceased brother's wife. The petition to be submitted for approval at next meeting of Presbytery."

And they ask for delay, and I think it right to give them time to fully present their views to this House. I would ask the hon. gentleman who has introduced this Bill, to be content with it, and withdraw further proceedings upon it, so that the House may be able to pass upon it another year.

MR. HOUDE: I understand that a certain portion of the public would prefer to see this Bill undergo a slight change in its wording, so as to make it read that laws prohibiting such marriage are repealed, instead of saying that these marriages will be legal. Some hon. members will, perhaps, remark that there is not much difference between the two expressions; but persons whose opinion deserves deference, even eminent jurists, pretend that, so far the Province of Quebec is concerned, especially, there exists a difference worthy of notice. My object is to leave no doubt as to the possibility of applying the 127th clause of the Civil Code of the Province of Quebec to marriage between a man and the sister of his deceased wife or the widow of his deceased brother, as it applies, for instance, to marriage between a man and his cousin. By the amendment I am going to move, if it were adopted, the 125th clause would read as if marriage between a man and the sister of his deceased wife, or the widow of his deceased brother, had never existed any more than between a man and his cousin; whilst this Bill says that such marriage shall be legal. Therefore, I move in amendment to the amendment, seconded by Mr. Hurteau, that all the words "that" in the main motion be struck out and replaced by the following:

"The report of the Committee be not now concurred in, but that the Bill be referred again to the Committee of the Whole, with instruction to replace the first and the second clauses by the following:

1. All laws prohibiting marriage between a man and the sister of his deceased wife or the widow of his deceased brother, are hereby repealed.

2. This Act shall also apply, as if laws hereby repealed had never existed, to marriages hereafter contracted, the parties whereto are living as husband and wife at the time of the passing of this Act.

MR. MACKENZIE: What laws will be repealed? There are no such laws.

MR. HOUDE: In the Provinces other than that of Quebec, there is the Common Law of England.

MR. MACKENZIE: We have no power to deal with the Laws of England.

MR. HOUDE: I say the common law of England, which has become law in the Provinces of this Dominion, except that of Quebec. In the Province of Quebec there exists a statutory law positively prohibiting such marriages. In the other Provinces they are only voidable, but in ours they are absolutely void. It is these laws I propose to repeal. Where there is no such law, well, nothing will have to be repealed.

MR. CASEY: I do not intend to go into the question of the sentiments of His Lordship of Three Rivers, but I wish to call attention to the form of this resolution. I am in doubt whether the House can possibly entertain this motion. It is one in words to repeal the laws which make such marriages as these illegal. There are no laws in Canada which make them illegal, and I do not think we can undertake to repeal any laws except the laws of Canada. We cannot repeal any ecclesiastical law which makes these marriages illegal, neither can we repeal the Common Law of England in respect to such marriages.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: I wish to say a few words on this question before a vote is taken, so that if I am called to vote upon it next Session I may not be considered inconsistent. This is a very important question, but I do not think the country will suffer by its being delayed twelve months, in order that it may be more carefully considered than at present. If this Bill is not carried, and comes up next Session, I will feel bound to sustain the principles of the Bill.

Motion made:

That the Bill, as amended in Committee of the Whole, be now taken into consideration.—
(Mr. Girouard, Jacques Cartier.)

Motion in amendment made:

That the said Bill, as amended in Committee of the Whole, be not now considered, but that it be considered this day six months.—(Mr. Jones.)

Motion in amendment to the proposed amendment made and question proposed:

That all the words after "that" in the said motion be expunged, and the following inserted instead thereof:—"The Report be not now concurred in, but that the said Bill be re-committed to a Committee of the Whole with an instruction that they have power to insert, instead of Clauses 1 and 2, the following:

"1. All laws prohibiting marriage between a man and the sister of his deceased wife, or the widow of his deceased brother, are hereby repealed. 2. This Act shall also apply, as if the laws hereby repealed had not existed, to such marriages heretofore contracted, the parties whereof are living as husband and wife at the time of the passing of this Act."

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

SUPPLY—CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY.

Order for the Speaker to leave the Chair for the House to go again into Committee of Supply, read.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: I had intended to submit to the House the Resolutions respecting the Canadian Pacific Railway, required by the circumstances that have occurred between the period at which the Resolutions were carried, last Session, and the present time, but I do not intend to pursue that course because it might be thought more convenient, that, as arranged, the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), should have an opportunity upon the conclusion of my statement, of making the motion of which he has given notice, and which he would be precluded from doing, if I were to submit at this moment the Resolutions I shall, at a later period, ask the House to concur in. On rising to address the House, on one of the most important questions that can engage its attention, I propose, on the present, as on the last occasion on which I addressed the House on this subject last Session, to avoid, in the fair and candid criticism to which I shall be obliged to subject the proceedings and policy of the hon. gentleman opposite, the use of a single remark, in the least degree calculated to turn the current of this debate from the channel in which it is desirable it should run. I feel that if there is any question that could be brought under the consideration of the House, that it is requisite to deal with in the calmest, most dispassionate and judicial manner, it is the great question of the Canadian Pacific Railway. It will be, however, necessary, in the somewhat changed attitude of hon. gentlemen opposite, as foreshadowed by the promised Resolution of the hon. member for West Durham, that I should as briefly as is possible describe the position that, in my judgment, the two parties in this House occupy in relation to this question. The House will remember that when this Government was in power, in 1871, and British Columbia was brought into the Confederation, it was decided that we should grapple with the great question of the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, by which all the various Provinces would be brought into more rapid and easy communication. When in a position to submit a formal proposition to the House, in 1872, by which it was hoped to accomplish the construction of that work, the Government submitted a proposal to grant $30,000,000 and 50,000,000 acres of land in order to cover the expenditure connected with it. At the time that policy was resolved upon, a Resolution, in order to meet the apprehension which existed in and out of the House, as to the very serious responsibility the Government was about to incur, was proposed and carried, and it became substantially a part of the Terms of Union with British Columbia, that that work should be constructed, not by the Government, but by private enterprise, aided by a grant of lands and money to that extent. But even that was limited by the declaration placed before the House, that the progress of that work should not involve an increase in the then rate of taxation.

MR. BLAKE: Hear, hear.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: Now, I am a little surprised to find the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) taking exception to the statement I have made, that it formed a part of the Terms of Union with British Columbia, because the Government of which that hon. gentleman was a member, at a later date, found it convenient to fall back upon that Resolution, and embodied it in a Minute of Council which they offered to British Columbia, and to the Imperial Government as well, as a reason for qualifying the engagement that was entered into. I am safe, I think, in saying that there is no man in this House, there is no intelligent man in this country, that would not heartily concur in the accuracy of the statement, that it would be greatly in the interest of Canada if it had been possible to accomplish the construction of that work upon those terms. Hon. gentlemen opposite took exception, on many occasions, to the efficiency of the means that were thus provided for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway. I think the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie), when the leader of the Government, at a public meeting at Whitby, committed himself to the statement that we might as well have offered $10, as $30,000,000 and 50,000,000 acres of land for the purpose of securing the construction of that work, so strongly did he feel the entire inadequacy of the means proposed. Now, it will not be at all necessary for me to discuss the circumstances under which the Government found itself unable to accomplish the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway upon those terms. We are sufficiently familiar with that view of the question to render that entirely unnecessary. But we went out of office, and the duty and responsibility of dealing with this great question devolved upon the gentleman, who, during the subsequent five years, led the Government of this country. Now, I think, we must all admit that successive Governments must pay great deference to, and must hold themselves to a large extent responsible—for carrying out the policy of their predecessors. I am satisfied we all agree in the opinion that it is only under the gravest circumstances that a new Administration is in a position to repudiate, if I may so speak, the engagements in relation to a great public question, to which their predecessors have committed the country under the authority of Parliament. But I quite admit it was in the power of the hon. gentleman, who was then called upon to form an Administration, to say that since, in Parliament, he had opposed the policy of attempting to construct the Canadian Pacific Railway, that he believed this country could not engage in a work of such gigantic magnitude without seriously injuring the financial position of the country—that, under those circumstances, he must decline to hold himself responsible for the engagement into which his predecessors had entered. The hon. gentleman had that course open to him, because Parliament, having declared that the work should only be constructed, provided a company could be found, aided to the extent before stated, to accomplish it as a private undertaking, and the effort to obtain the construction of the work under the terms sanctioned by Parliament having failed, it was open to him, I say, frankly to state to the House, that he was unable to carry out the policy to which his predecessors had committed the country. The hon. gentleman did not adopt that course. Soon after his accession to power he visited his constituents for the purpose of declaring, as Prime Minister, what the policy of his Government was in relation to this great question. Well, Sir, the hon. gentleman, much to the surprise of many of his friends, and greatly to the astonishment of those with whom he had formerly been in controversy upon the question, committed himself in the most unqualified manner to the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway. He said, and I am quoting from the organ of his party in this city :

“ I have always thought that speedy means of communication across the continent were necessary for settlement, and for the purpose of opening up the district where we have great riches undeveloped in the bosom of the earth. Without that communication their development cannot take place, and emigration cannot be expected.”

Now, with the Great North-West in our possession to be peopled, and a declaration that the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway was essential to the development of the great resources of Canada—referring, undoubtedly, to the mineral resources of British Columbia—a declaration that emigration to this country could not be hoped for, unless that work was undertaken, committed, on the grounds of the broadest considerations of public policy, the hon. gentleman, to the construction of that work. But he went much further. He stated, in that address, that it was his intention to proceed with this great work in an entirely different manner from that which his predecessors had propounded, and which Parliament had authorised, and that was as a Government work. He gave, on that occasion, the very substantial reason that, if it was constructed as a Government work, the people would receive the profit instead of the contractors. The hon. gentleman, consistent with that declaration, came down to Parliament with a measure for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway. He has frequently referred to the fact that one of the first clauses of that Act provided that it must not increase the existing rate of taxation ; that he had adhered to the policy propounded by the previous Government and sanctioned by Parliament ; that there must be no increase of taxation connected with the undertaking. But he did not recount that which Parliament had committed itself to and sanctioned, and that was the declaration that it should not be done by the Government, a declaration that the hon. gentleman himself had voted for, and that his friends and supporters had supported, but that it must be done by a private company, aided by a grant of lands and money. That provision was swept away. It is true, however, that he provided in his Bill for the prosecution of the work in very much the same manner as that propounded by his predecessors, provided the parties could be found to take it up. I think those who have not recently read that Act, will be a little surprised to learn that he went further than his predecessors in the means which he provided from the public resources for the purpose of prosecuting the work. The hon. gentleman covered the whole ground in his Bill. He said :

“ 1. A railway, to be called the ‘ Canadian Pacific Railway,’ shall be made from some point near to and south of Lake Nipissing to some point in British Columbia, on the Pacific Ocean ; both the said points to be determined, and the course and line of the said railway to be approved of by the Governor-in-Council.”

Even the sanction of Parliament was not necessary to the adoption of a line, and that line was to extend from a point on Lake Nipissing to a point in British Columbia, on the Pacific Coast. The hon. gentleman then went on to provide what should be given to the Company undertaking it. He provided in section four :

“ 4. That a quantity of land, not exceeding twenty thousand acres for each mile of the section or sub-section contracted for, shall be appropriated in alternate sections of twenty square miles each, along the line of the said railway, or at a convenient distance therefrom, each section having a frontage of not less than three miles, nor more than six miles on the line of the said Railway, and that two-thirds of the quantity of land so appropriated shall be sold by the Government at such prices as may be from time to time agreed upon between the Governor-in-Council, and the contractors, and the proceeds thereof accounted for and paid half yearly to the contractors, free from any charge of administration or management; the remaining third to be conveyed to the contractors. The said lands to be of fair average quality, and not to include any land already granted or occupied under any patent, license of occupation or preemption right; and when a sufficient quantity cannot be found in the immediate vicinity of the railway, then the same quantity, or as much as may be required to complete such quantity, shall be appropriated at such other places as may be determined by the Governor-in-Council."

Now, I call the attention of the hon. member for North Norfolk to this act, to which, I think, he was kind enough to give his hearty support when it was submitted to Parliament. I call his attention to this as indicating that the hon. gentleman, at that time, had not the same abhorrence of a large section of land along the line of the Pacific Railway being in the hands of contractors. The late Government went further than the previous Government had gone, because while we proposed to give 50,000,000 acres of land and $30,000,000, we never proposed to assume the cost and responsibility of administering and selling two-thirds of the land, and relieving the contractors from that charge. So here is Parliament authorising hon. gentlemen to give 50,000,000 acres and $30,000,000 in money, and providing for the expenditure necessary to administer and sell two-thirds of the land owned, that was the property of the contractors. Then there was the question of the surveys, while, under our contract, the company with whom we made the contract for the work, were obliged to cover all cost incurred in connection with work up to that time. It is provided:

"7. That the cost of surveys, and of locating the line of the several sections and sub-sections of the said Railway, shall be part of the subsidy or consideration allowed to the contractors, or not, as may be determined by the Governor-in-Council, and agreed upon in the contract entered into with the contractors."

So the Government not only proposed to give all the land we proposed to give, but to bear the expense of the administration of two-thirds of the land, and to relieve the contractors of the cost of any surveys or location of any portion of this road. The hon. gentleman did not stop here. Having changed the position of Parliament altogether, in relation to the great obligation of constructing the Canadian Pacific Railway, by providing that the Government themselves should either have the power to give the contract to the company who would construct the road on the conditions contained in the measure, or take up that work, as a Government work, and carry it to completion, the hon. gentleman did not stop there. Great as had been the fears he had exhibited with reference to the enormous burden we were placing on the shoulders of the people, he sought to make the Government directly responsible for the expenditure of all this money in the construction of the line from Lake Nipissing to the shores of the Pacific. But the hon. gentleman, over and above the expenditure we proposed, committed the country to a vast extension of the liability of the previous Government. The previous Government assumed that, if they brought the Pacific Railway to Nipissing, it would be a sufficient inducement for the lines in Ontario and Quebec, running easterly to Quebec and southerly to Toronto, to make a connection at that point. At the same time, my hon. predecessor submitted to Parliament a measure providing for the construction of the Georgian Bay Branch, and to give a subsidy to the Canada Central Railway of $1,440,000. Although the Georgian Bay Branch was through a terra incognita, the line unsurveyed, and eminent engineers maintained it to be impracticable, without any survey or any location the hon. gentleman pledged himself, as the leader of the Government, and he committed the Government and the country to the construction of the line from the terminus of the Canada Central east of Lake Nipissing to the mouth of French River, at an expense moderately put at $2,560,000. That makes $4,000,000 of money, which he proposed to expend outside of, and over and above, the libil-

ity for the Canadian Pacific Railway before reaching the eastern terminus, where it had been fixed by Parliament on the south and east of Lake Nipissing. He may say, "but this is all subject to the limitation that is provided for in this Bill, with reference to not increasing the then rate of taxation." Unfortunately for him, and unfortunately for the hon. gentleman who sits behind him—and who now seems—I will not say ready to repudiate the policy of his own leader—but to take a prominent part in a proposal that, I fear, will be regarded in the light of a repudiation by them of their obligations, and which will have the effect of sweeping from under their feet any standing ground. The hon. the then Minister of Finance submitted to Parliament a declaration to the effect that, in order to meet the expenditure he would have to ask Parliament to impose an additional taxation of $3,000,000; and then and there the hon. gentleman did impose that additional taxation. When the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) made his famous speech in Ontario, at a subsequent date, he said that British Columbia had nothing to complain of, as Parliament had not only pledged itself to the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, but had provided $3,000,000, had levied $3,000,000 additional taxation to meet their obligations, and notably for the Canadian Pacific Railway. When the hon. gentleman imposed that additional taxation, this Bill was, at the same time, placed upon the Statute-book, saying that the undertaking should not involve an increase in the existing rate of taxation. The hon. gentleman, therefore, stands in this position: either he must give up that clause as not having any binding obligation or effect, or stand before Parliament and the country in the position of having violated the law in the expenditure of every dollar spent from the first hour that he began to expend any money on the Pacific Railway, because there is clear and undeniable evidence that the rate of taxation was then increased. Every single dollar of the $11,000,000 spent in the construction of the Railway so far had been spent by the hon. gentleman in the teeth of the Statute, and also the balance of the $28,000,000 of money required to complete the expenditure he had begun—for, without that completion, all the $11,000,000 would be wasted—had been expended contrary to the declaration of that Act. The hon. gentleman, when in Opposition, had exhibited such a spirit of antagonism—as hon. gentlemen opposite are, I am afraid, inclined to exhibit—to the policy proposed on this side of the House.

MR. BLAKE: Which hon. gentleman?

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: When I have the pleasure to look in the face at this moment of the hon. gentleman, and hold this friendly discussion on so very important a question, I am reminded that when he was before in Opposition; and when we then proposed a scheme for constructing the Pacific Railway, which we felt quite possible, and which we knew to be in the interest of the country to complete as quickly as possible, he and his colleagues derided that proposal or the advisability of going on with the work, but when brought into power, upon this side of the House they did not shrink back; they found that the dismal vista that they had seen before had vanished; and the hon. gentleman went to the extent of adding $4,000,000 to the amount we proposed for the construction of the Pacific Railway at the eastern end of the line. But what did he do on the other end of the line? He went into a deliberate negotiation with British Columbia and the Imperial Government, and for fear that the hon. gentlemen may forget these little inconsistencies, I will ask the indulgence of the House while I refer to one of the most important state papers, one of the most important documents that forms a portion of the Archives of Canada, I mean the treaty made between the Government of Canada and British Columbia, and the Imperial Government. Although I would like to condense the passage I am going to read, I am afraid I shall have to read it at length. What I am going to read now will be found at page 511, of the Hansard of 1875. On that page will be found a verbatim statement of the treaty, showing the obligations imposed by the then First Minister now sitting on the other side of the House. Lord Carnarvon said:

"Adhering then to the same order in which, on the 16th August, I stated the principle points on which it appears to me that a better understanding should be defined, I now proceed to announce the conclusions at which I have arrived. They are :

"1. That the Railway from Esquimaux to Nanaimo shall be commenced as soon as possible, and completed with all practicable despatch.

"2. That the surveys on the mainland shall be pushed on with the utmost vigour. On this point, after considering the representations of your Ministers, I feel that I have no alternative but to rely, as I do most fully and readily, upon their assurances that no legitimate effort or expense will be spared, first to determine the best route for the line, and secondly to proceed with the details of the engineering work. It would be distasteful to me, if indeed, it were not impossible to prescribe strictly any minimum of time or expenditure with regard to work of so uncertain a nature ; but, happily, it is equally impossible for me to doubt that your Government will loyally do its best in every way to accelerate the completion of a duty left freely to its sense of honour and justice.

"3. That the waggon road and telegraph line shall be immediately constructed. There seems here to be some difference of opinion as to the special value to the Province of the undertaking to complete these two works ; but, after considering what has been said, I am of opinion that they should both be proceeded with at once, as indeed is suggested by your Ministers.

"4. That $2,000,000 a year, and not $1,500,000, shall be the minimum expenditure on railway works within the Province from the date at which the surveys are sufficiently completed to enable that amount to be expended on construction. In naming this amount I understand that, it being alike the interest and the wish of the Dominion Government to urge on with all speed the completion of the works now to be undertaken, the annual expenditure will be as much in excess of the minimum of $2,000,000 as in any year may be found practicable.

"5. Lastly, that on or before the 31st of December, 1890, the Railway shall be completed and open for traffic on the Pacific seaboard to a point at the western end of Lake Superior at which it will fall into connection with existing lines of railway through a portion of the United States, and also with the navigation on Canadian waters."

This is Lord Carnarvon's decision, or the conclusions at which he had arrived as a mediator between British Columbia and the First Minister of that day. It will be seen that the late Government here pledged themselves to build the line from Esquimaux to Nanaimo without delay. What did that mean in the first place ? I am quite certain that my hon. predecessor will not question the calculation I have made when I say that, at the very lowest estimate, it would cost $4,000,000. It is simply adding $4,000,000 upon the Western end of the Canadian Pacific Railway, to the $4,000,000 he had already added to the eastern end. But that is by far the least grave portion of this matter. However much the hon. gentleman disregarded, in his own action, the clause of the Bill which provided that the work should not proceed so as to involve an increase in the taxation of the country, by this negotiation and engagement with Lord Carnarvon, he left himself entirely unprotected. I should like to ask what it would cost to construct a waggon road for 400 miles through the Rocky Mountains. Is not that an enormous addition to the contract to construct as rapidly as possible the Canadian Pacific Railway ? I trust that the hon. member for West Durham will read, mark, learn, and inwardly digest these statements, which received the ready and hearty concurrence and endorsement of the late Minister of Public Works. I am aware that the hon. member for West Durham was a little restive under those terms. At any rate, sitting upon this side of the House, he exhibited a little of that restiveness which characterises him when he is not in the Cabinet. The hon. member for West Durham put a question on the Notice Paper on this subject, and what was the answer of the hon. First Minister of that day ? Feeling strong in the integrity of his position and in the consciousness that he was grappling with the construction of a great national work, he said :

"With respect to the question raised by my hon. friend, the member for South Bruce, I may say I have nothing to ask from Parliament. We have no authority to obtain, but have merely to communicate this decision and rest upon the House supporting us in accepting the terms that have been made through the intervention or mediation of Lord Carnarvon, and that support I do not doubt will be cheerfully accorded."

Have we not a right to ask those gentlemen who were ready to accord support to the leader of the late Government, when he proposed, not only to pledge this country to build the Canadian Pacific Railway from end to end, but to add $8,000,000 to any expenditure which had ever been proposed by his predecessors, and add the cost of the waggon road and of the administration of two-thirds of the land these people were to receive, to consider fairly our position ? That hon. gentleman was prepared to rely on the gentlemen sustaining him for their assured support, because he believed he was acting in the interest of the country. Have we not a right with our much more modest proposition—with the burden hon. gentlemen opposite proposed to place on this country, rendered so much lighter by us—to ask for some of that assured support which the member for Lambton so confidently relied upon when standing where I now have the honour to stand? The hon. member for West Durham was not prepared to go so far as this proposition of the late Government. It is but just to him to say that he gave expression to his dissent in perhaps the most marked manner that an independent member could do so, when he refused his vote for the construction of the Esquimault and Nanaimo Railway. But though the faith and honour of the Government and country had been irrevocably pledged to this undertaking, when it was removed out of the way by the other branch of Parliament, the hon. gentleman himself assumed the responsibility of every word and act of that Government, by accepting a place in it. He did more. He not only entered the Cabinet, committed and bound as it was to this policy, beyond recall, and without qualification as to the resources of the country, without raising the question as to whether the Railway should be completed by 1890, from end to end, thus giving practical evidence of his being in accord with its views, but showed he was prepared to take out of the coffers of Canada $750,000 to compensate British Columbia for having generously relinquished the immediate expenditure of the $4,000,000 on the Nanaimo and Esquimault Railway. Under those circumstances, the last source from which this Government might have anticipated obstruction was from gentlemen opposite in adopting the present policy. The late Government committed itself to the construction of this great work regardless of the cost. At the end of five years the former Government came back to power. What did we find had been accomplished in the meantime? Hon. gentlemen may be surprised to learn that one of our first duties was to lay the rails upon the Pembina Branch Railway, the contract for which was given out among the first acts of the late Government. They also early undertook the construction of the Railway from Fort William to Shebandowan, and to develop the policy known as the use of the water stretches. There was, besides, to be a road in the west, from the Lake of the Woods to Winnipeg. To the credit of the hon. member for Lambton he is sometimes open for argument. After two or three years' discussion in this House, we were enabled finally to convince him of the folly of his course—that every dollar he expended on the road to Shebandowan on the east, and on the road beyond the Lake of the Woods on the west, would be wasted, while there was the Duluth Railway within a comparatively short distance to carry all the passengers and traffic westward, and prevent either one or the other ever going by the mixed rail and water-stretches route, the amphibious line, after it was constructed. I will credit him with practically admitting, at least, that he was wrong and we were right.

MR. MACKENZIE: No.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: I know he is unwilling to admit it, but history will establish the truth of my statements. I cannot absolve the hon. gentleman for the folly of having undertaken the construction of the through line by this route, and letting two contracts, one running to English River on the east, and the other to Rat Portage on the west, without previous surveys, without the slightest knowledge of those sections or what the road would cost, or whether he could connect the two ends at all. It can be proved those ends had never been connected by surveys, and that there was no means of knowing whether, at any reasonable cost, the road could be completed. The result has been an enormous expenditure, largely due to the precipitate commencement of the work, and without sufficient information as to the character of the country. On attaining office we found a large amount had been expended on those two sections of 227 miles; one running east from Red River 114 miles, and the other 113 miles running west from Lake Superior. We found that the money thus expended might as well be thrown into Lake Superior, and was utterly useless for any purpose of value, there being a gap of 185 miles between those sections. The hon. gentleman had become convinced of the uselessness of this expenditure, without the completion of the intervening section; and shortly previous to the General Elections he advertised for contracts for the road over those 185 miles. I am not going to find any fault with that step. I gave him credit for it before, but must withdraw it now, as he stated the other night that he had not at all decided to construct those 185 miles—had not decided whether he would allow the enormous expenditure to lie dead while he paid interest on it, without accomplishing anything by it. I can readily understand why the hon. gentleman did not let the contracts before the election. He had stated, in and out of the House, as a ground of his claim to public confidence, that he was building the Canadian Pacific Railway at a cost of $24,500 a mile, and he had learned that if the contracts for the intervening 185 miles were let, it would become apparent he had made an enormous miscalculation as to the cost of the road, the contracts for portions of which he had given out without any surveys or information to warrant that action; so the ground for his appeal for the public confidence in this matter would be swept from under his feet. On the Georgian Bay Branch, Canada Central, the Pembina Branch, and the line between Thunder Bay and Red River, we found, when we came into power, that over $11,000,000 had been spent; and to make that outlay of any practical value would involve the proper completion of those works, and I stated a year ago the expenditure involved could not be estimated at less than $28,000,000. I am now able to take something like a million off that estimate, as by pursuing a different policy from that of the late Government, in letting the contracts, and in their supervision after being let, we expect to effect a great reduction in the cost undertaken. Before I had been a week in the office which the hon. member for Lambton vacated, I called on Mr. Marcus Smith for a statement of the work done upon those 228 miles, an estimate upon which the contracts had been framed, and a statement of how much had been paid, and how much was required to complete the work. I was astounded to discover that the additional expense had to be counted, I may say, by millions. I called the attention of Mr. Fleming to the same matter as soon as he returned from England. Mr. Fleming said that, so far as Section 5 was concerned, it could be the difference accounted for as the character of the work had been changed; but with respect to the other portions that there had been no location surveys—no sufficiently accurate estimates made—no knowledge of details acquired when those contracts were let to enable a close estimate to be formed. He had no means of accounting for this great disproportion between what they supposed the cost of the work would be, and what it was now evident it would cost. Mr. Fleming sent for the engineers who had been in charge of the works, both east and west, and they were unable to give a satisfactory account of so much money having been spent, and, in consequence, a careful remeasurement has been made to ascertain where the discrepancy was. With regard to Section 15, Mr. Smith and Mr. Fleming said that we could account for the great disproportion between the cost and the estimate because the plan had been changed. The contract was originally invited for that section of the road, but the amount asked by the tenderers was so enormous that the moment the then First Minister saw them he discovered it would not do to let the contract on those figures, or he would have to add something like 50 per cent. to the cost which he had stated he was building the Pacific Railway at per mile. The contract was not let. It was subsequently let upon a system of trestle-work for embankments; and after the work had proceeded in that way for a length of time, a report was made by the Engineer in charge that the wood in that country was of a very inferior description, and that so soon as the road was completed it would probably be either all burnt up, and if not burned the wood was of such an inferior quality that we should have to commence rebuilding it at an early day, and he therefore advised that embankments should be substituted for trestle-work. That report was referred to Mr. Fleming, who was here on a brief visit from England. He entirely concurred in the proposition that the work should be changed from trestle-work to embankments, and he discussed that matter with the then Minister of Public Works, who also concurred in the propriety of the change of which he still approves. The hon. gentleman took that report to the Council, where it remained.

MR. MACKENZIE: The hon. gentleman is a little overstating the fact. I agreed that the road would be much better built that way than the former way; but I did not concur in the wisdom of making the change just then.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: The hon. gentleman ought to have done one thing or the other. The Chief Engineer having gone the next day to England, after discussing the matter with the hon. gentleman, and having left his report in favour of the change, with the assurance of that hon. gentleman that he agreed with it, he ought to have either obtained the decision of the Council for the proposition or against it, or, at all events, should have taken care to know that the change was not made under the assumption that that which the Chief Engineer had recommended, and which met with the approval of the hon. the Minister of Public Works—

MR. MACKENZIE: No.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: Was not to be pursued. That was the position in which I found the work. Notwithstanding the increased cost, I have no hesitation in saying that the change was a wise one; and I recommended it to the present Government, especially when I found that the contract had been carried on by the Engineer under the impression that the change had been adopted, and that the contractor had expended over $100,000 for plant that would not have been required if there had been no intention of a change. We were careful, under these circumstances, that no more contracts should be let in the loose, irregular, and improper manner prevailing up to that time. We required a full statement of all the work that was required on the sections of the Railway, before we would commit ourselves to their construction, and I postponed action twice upon the advertisement which the hon. member for Lambton had himself put into the papers for the 185 miles, because the Department was not ready with the careful calculations based upon surveys and examinations and cross-sections which had been prepared to enable us to know exactly what the amount of the work would be. I am happy to say that we have changed the mode of letting the contracts, instead of basing them on mere guess work, we based them on maximum quantities that cannot be exceeded; the contracts require the amount of work should be done, if required, but that it may be reduced to any extent. I am happy to be able to tell the hon. gentleman that I have already reduced the distance, or rather that Mr. Caddy, the Engineer in charge of Section 41, has been enabled, since that contract was let, to reduce the distance on forty-seven miles of it by three and three-fourths miles, a saving to the country of $319,000 by that reduction, and by lessening the amount of work to be done on that forty-seven miles. The same process is going on on Section 42, and these two contracts will be completed within the time stated in the contract—a great novelty—the hon. gentleman will admit, considering the inordinate time he has taken in similar cases. Under that system we shall not only be enabled to construct these works within the time stated in the contract, but by a reduction of the cost by over half a million dollars. I give this to the hon. gentleman as an evidence of the value of having a careful examination of the work before the contracts are let, instead of rushing into it blindly. That was our first duty; and finding that this expenditure had been made, we had no alternative but to go forward and carry it out. Moreover, we had the responsibility thrown upon us of dealing with the question of the construction of the Railway as a whole; we did not find it left a legacy to us as the hon. gentleman found it left to him. It was open to him, in the position in which we left the question, as I have already stated, to say he was not prepared to adopt the policy of the construction of the Railway, at all events, in the manner that was indicated. He adopted a different course; he not only provided for the construction of the work directly by the Government, but he entered into a binding treaty and obligation with Lord Carnarvon, on behalf of the Imperial Government and British Columbia, that this work should be completed by 1890 from the shores of Lake Superior to the Pacific Ocean. That was the legacy we inherited from the hon.

gentleman; and carrying out the pledge he had made to Lord Carnarvon, he caused these further surveys to be made with a view to the location of the line, and having satisfied himself that the best line that could be adopted was the line to Burrard Inlet, the hon. gentleman proceeded to put an advertisement in the papers calling for tenders for the construction of 125 miles from Kamloops to Yale. I heard with amazement, the other night, a statement from the hon. gentleman that he had not decided to do that work, that he had not fully made up his mind to do it. I am perfectly aware that it is legitimate for a Government going to the country, under the great discouragement which the hon. gentleman was compelled to go to the country—I am quite aware that it is legitimate for them to present a programme as attractive as they can for the consideration of the country; but I am astonished that the hon. the then First Minister of the Crown should deliberately, in his own Department, call for tenders involving the expenditure of large sums of money by intending contractors, for the construction of 125 miles of railway through the canyons of the Fraser, a most difficult and inaccessible locality, and afterwards state to this House that he did it deliberately, on the eve of an election, without the intention of carrying it on to completion. The hon. gentleman stated that he was upholding the honour and integrity of Canada; that this work should be carried on to completion as vigorously as possible, and that he had pledged himself to Lord Carnarvon that the surveys should be prosecuted as rapidly as possible, and that, as soon as they were completed, the road should be located, and not less than $2,000,000 per annum should be expended. With that pledge he asks for tenders for 125 miles of Railway. That was the hon. gentleman's obligation, from which there was no escape; and there was the additional pledge to British Columbia that that work was to be immediately undertaken. I ask the hon. gentleman to tell this House, if he had not finally made up his mind to proceed with the construction of the Railway from Yale to Kamloops, why he made the contract involving a payment of $32,400 to a contractor to carry rails from Victoria to Yale? Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that, not content with holding out to the people of British Columbia that he was going to build the Railway, he was absolutely going to take out of the public coffers $32,400 to remove those rails from Victoria to Yale, without having satisfied himself that he ever intended to strike a blow? That is a proposition, I am satisfied, the hon. gentleman, on reflection, will see is utterly untenable, and he will find himself in a position that no possible argument on his part could justify. Well, under these circumstances, the Government found themselves brought face to face with the great question of the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway forced upon them. The course which had been pursued by the late Government, and by the late Finance Minister, was that of holding up to the country the enormous and gigantic obligation that this work would involve, and the hon. gentleman felt it his duty to give the contractors all over the world, who might be invited to construct this line upon favourable terms, to understand that it was a work involving enormous expenditure, and that it would be disastrous to any contractor to touch it. We were under the necessity of dealing with this difficulty as a commercial undertaking, when it was in an entirely different position from that which it occupied when we were deprived of power. When we found ourselves brought face to face with this very serious question what did we do? We reverted back, as far as possible, under the changed circumstances to our former policy. Our policy was this: That the lands of the North-West ought to build the Canadian Pacific Railway. That was the principal plank in our platform. The late First Minister in his address at Sarnia, covered the whole ground when he said "that it was impossible ever to draw emigration into that great country and settle it without the construction of a Canadian Pacific Railway." We held that opinion, and we felt that, inasmuch as that great fertile North-West must remain a barren waste until the Railway was constructed, and that inasmuch as those lands were the most fair and fertile, and the richest to be found on the face of the globe, and that they must remain useless to Canada unless the Railway was constructed, we felt warranted in adopting the policy which we have adopted. But seeing that this great work ought to be and should be constructed by utilizing those lands to which the road itself is going to give such enormously increased value, we came down with that policy, and we supposed that these hon. gentlemen opposite, having committed the Government, having pledged the faith of Canada, as they pledged it in relation to this question, that they would have been the first men in this House to congratulate us upon the policy we had propounded, and give us their most hearty support, but we discovered that we were altogether mistaken. What was the language of the hon. leader of the Opposition last winter, when we propounded that policy. He said the land was good for nothing.

MR. MACKENZIE: I did not say so.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: The whole success of our scheme depended upon our being able to convince the world that these lands were fertile and of enormous value; that they would largely repay any person who undertook their settlement, that it was the most inviting field for emigrants that was to be found in the world. But how did the hon. gentleman meet us? He met us first with the declaration that it is a bad policy to lock up the land.

MR. MACKENZIE: Hear, hear.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: Hear, hear, he says? Yet I ask him what he said to the people of Sarnia when he told them that without the Canadian Pacific Railway these lands were valueless. I ask him how he reconciles that statement with the statement that it is a bad policy to utilise these lands for the purpose of constructing the Railway through them? What more did the hon. gentleman say when he knew that the whole success of our policy rested upon our success in convincing the world of the great value of these lands, and the safety of investing money in their purchase, in order to give us the means of constructing this Railway without imposing an enormous burden upon the people of the country. The hon. gentleman took upon himself the responsibility of endeavouring to defeat the success of this policy. The hon. gentleman told the people of England, from the floor of this House, that we could not give our lands away in Canada.

MR. MACKENZIE: I did not.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: I ask the hon. gentleman to read his speech. Turn up the Hansard, and the hon. gentleman will see that when we talked of building the Canadian Pacific Railway with these lands, and selling them to get the money, he said we could not get people to settle on the lands in Canada when we gave them away.

AN HON. MEMBER: Texas.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: I am not going to say anything about Texas, as the hon. gentleman has been pressed sufficiently on that point; for he was on the horns of a dilemma and ready to fly to Texas or anywhere else to escape from the difficulty. The hon. gentleman followed us to England. After the House had adopted the policy that gave us the authority to dispose of 100,000,000 acres of land for the purpose of constructing this great work, and had authorised the mission to England for the purpose of endeavouring to enlist capitalists abroad, and the Government of England to aid in the prosecution of this work, the hon. gentleman not only denounced the policy of using the lands, he not only declared that they were worthless—

MR. MACKENZIE: I said nothing of the kind.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: He said we could not settle them when we gave them away.

MR. MACKENZIE: I said nothing of the kind.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: If the hon. gentleman will read his speech in the Hansard, he will find it there; if not, I will acknowledge I misapprehended what he said. The hon. gentleman followed us to England, he followed that mission which this Government sent to England for the purpose of obtaining aid in the construction of this work. Immediately upon our arrival in England, a long article appeared in one of the leading journals, declaring that there was a reaction in this country, that the Government had lost their popularity; and so the hon. gentleman followed us, step by step, and used every argument that could be used in order to defeat and render abortive the mission in which we were engaged. The passage I was referring to in the hon. gentleman's speech of last year has been kindly turned up for me.

I will read from the speech of the hon. gentleman, on page 1,905 of the Hansard :

“If the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) is proceeding on the hypothesis that in Canada alone is there any land available, he will find himself greatly mistaken. We have found it very difficult indeed, in Canada, to promote settlement, even where the land was given away by the Government. It is still more difficult to send settlers to the far-off western country, where they have the initial difficulties of a new country to contend with, not less in amount though different in kind, than the settlers of our own wooded districts.”

MR. MACKENZIE : Where is the place I said the land was worth nothing?

SIR CHARLES TUPPER : I said the hon. gentleman undervalued the character of our lands.

MR. MACKENZIE : I have taken down the hon. gentleman's words ; he stated I said the lands were good for nothing. Read the passage.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER : I will tell him where I find it ; I find it in the statement that you cannot promote settlement where you give the lands away. If that does not sustain my assertion, then I know nothing about the meaning of the English language. But not content with saying that we could not promote settlement where the lands were given away, that in the North-West the difficulties are greater than in any other part of Canada, the hon. gentleman went on with this lugubrious account of our country :

“They have a long winter, absence of lumber and building materials, and difficulties of transportation. We must, therefore, make up our minds, if we are to settle that country, that it will be done only at the expenditure of a large amount of money to aid settlers in going in and in giving them land free after they get in. That is my conviction.”

You not only cannot get them to go and settle the lands when you give them away, but if you do you have to pay them for doing it. If we did that where was the $100,000,000 to come from on which we were asking the House to sustain us in the construction of a Canadian Pacific Railway? Suppose we had failed under these circumstances, would it have been very surprising? As has been already stated by the hon. the First Minister, the communications with the Imperial Government were confidential, but I may say this, that after the most friendly and frank discussion of the subject with the Imperial Government, and especially with the Colonial Minister, concerning the construction of a Canadian Pacific Railway—we found, and for reasons I think the hon. gentlemen opposite will quite appreciate, the time was not the most propitious for the purpose of pressing them for a definite answer—we came away with the impression that, at no distant day, we would be in a position to obtain from the Imperial Government the most favourable consideration of our proposals. That this is a question in which Lord Beaconsfield's Government felt the greatest interest, we can have no possible reason to doubt. If the hon. gentleman opposite was about making an appeal to the country he would not like to be handicapped any more heavily than was absolutely necessary for the time being ; but there is another reason why we did not think it necessary to press very strongly the Imperial Government in relation to that matter. It is this : after the discussion, not only with members of the Imperial Cabinet and with the Colonial Minister—after discussion with the first minds among the Opposition to the present Government in England—after having discussed this question exhaustively with the first capitalists in England, we found we were in a position, without any fear or doubt, to go steadily forward in the prosecution of this work—knowing that the funds required could be obtained on most favourable terms by my hon. friend the Minister of Finance, and would be forthcoming as fast as he would require them, independently of any guarantee. I may still add that our mission was not altogether fruitless from another point of view. If we were to go on with the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, it was not desirable that we should lose the opportunity of obtaining, at a reduced rate, a quantity of steel rails for that Railway ; and I am able to tell the hon. gentleman that we were more fortunate than himself—we had the good fortune to be there just at the time when iron and freights had fallen to their lowest point, and we were successful in making a purchase of 50,000 tons of steel rails, at a million and a-half dollars less than the hon. gentleman paid for them, and at a million and a-half less than what they could be purchased for since.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER.

Mr. ANGLIN: Why did you not purchase more?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER: I am afraid that hon. gentlemen are very hard to satisfy. All I can say is that if we had not been on the spot, and the negotiations had not been managed as they were, we would not have been able to have purchased a quarter of that quantity at the price. It was the last purchase made at that price, because when it was known that there was a contract for 50,000 tons of steel rails on the market, the price went up at a bound. I am afraid it will be a very long time before we, or our successors, will meet with the same good fortune in relation to this matter. I may say to some hon. gentleman, who seemed to think that owing to the defeat of the Beaconsfield Administration, all hope of this Government obtaining anything from England, is gone, that we have no reason to distrust a Liberal Administration any more than a Conservative Administration, and I would ask any person who knows anything of the political principles propounded by gentlemen on this side of the House, whether there is any Liberal party in England, or any man likely to be in a Liberal Cabinet in England—under Mr. Gladstone, Lord Granville, or Lord Hartington—who is more advanced in Liberal principles than the hon. gentlemen who sit on this side of the House. There has no doubt been a great change of parties in England, and if the Conservative party have lost power there, it has been the means of bringing into power an Administration who are no more committed to Liberal principles and a Liberal policy than the hon. gentlemen who sit on this side of the House.

Mr. RYMAL: I suppose you will hardly rejoice at the change.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER: I may tell the hon. gentleman who interposed, that I am not dismayed at the change. I believed the interests of Canada are just as safe in the hands of Lord Cardwell, as Colonial Minister, as they were in the hands of Sir Michael Hicks-Beach. Who was Mr. Cardwell? He was the man who took up and went heart and soul into the great question of the Confederation of British North America. He discharged that duty in the most able and energetic manner, and his successors had merely to carry out what had really been accomplished by the Liberal Administration. The Prime Minister of this Government, when in England had a highly satisfactory conversation with the gentleman who is not unlikely to hold the seals of the Colonial Office, Mr. Forster. That gentleman, the other day, in his speech delivered at the Colonial Institute, said:

“His friend, Sir John Macdonald, came over to this country not long ago to get a guarantee for the Pacific Railway, and he (Mr. Forster) was not at all sure that it would not be advisable if the Mother Country were to be very liberal in these matters.”

It will be seen, therefore, that notwithstanding the fall of the Beaconsfield Administration, there is every prospect of the Government of Canada being sustained and upheld in this great national enterprise. We have here evidence that in the great country to which we owe a loyal allegiance, there is in both political parties a keen appreciation of the importance of our obtaining the great national highway now under consideration. I ventured, last year, to express the belief that the Imperial Government would feel that, in the opening up of the great Canadian North-West to the settlement of inhabitants of the Mother Country, a policy would be propounded that would meet with the approval of Imperial statesmen. That idea was laughed to scorn by the hon. gentlemen opposite. It was to them a matter of derision, but subsequently Lord Beaconsfield came out in an elaborate eulogium on the great national resources of British North America, and he declared to the people of England the vital importance it was to the Empire that her sons, who were obliged to expatriate themselves for the purpose of bettering their condition, could seek a home in the fertile lands of British North America, under the same flag beneath which they had formerly lived. I must now turn the attention of the House, for a few moments, to the authority that was given to the Government at the last Session of Parliament, in relation to this great work, and the duty that was imposed on us. I think I will convince the House (and the hon. member for West Durham—I do not even despair of convincing him) that during the Recess of Parliament the Government were engaged in discharging the duty confided in them by Parliament, and which they directed them to carry out. The first Resolution reads as follows:

"1. Resolved,—That engagements have been entered into with British Columbia, as a condition of Union with Canada, that a line of railway to connect the Atlantic with the Pacific shall be constructed with all practicable speed."

"6. Resolved,—That in view of the importance of keeping good faith with British Columbia, and completing the consolidation of the Confederation of Provinces in British North America, and for the purpose of extending relief to the unemployed working classes of Great Britain, and affording them permanent homes on British soil; and in view of the national character of the undertaking, the Government of Canada is authorised and directed to use its best efforts to secure the co-operation of the Imperial Government in this great undertaking, and obtain further aid, by guarantee or otherwise, in the construction of this great national work."

This Resolution refers to the importance of securing the cooperation of the Imperial Government by guarantee or otherwise, and all I can say is that the Government did the best they could in that direction, and I think I have given the House some evidence that the seed sown is likely to bear fruit in due time. The seventh Resolution reads:

"7. That it is further expedient to provide:—That 100,000,000 acres of land, and all the minerals they contain be appropriated for the purposes of constructing the Canadian Pacific Railway."

This was appropriated, and I need say nothing further in relation to the matter, after the exhaustive argument of the member for North Norfolk, who attacked the policy of the Government as to the mode in which they proposed to appropriate and utilise that hundred millions of acres of land; and the able and exhaustive reply he received from the right hon. the First Minister, who, I believe, convinced this House, as he must have convinced this country, that we have every reason to believe that that policy will be eminently successful. I need not discuss the question further, but say, that before Parliament rises it will be necessary to submit a Resolution confirming the mode in which it is decided by the Government to administer these lands a little more concisely than these Resolutions provide. It is not proposed, however, to depart from the policy

we believe has been wisely adopted, and which will be found sufficient to thoroughly accomplish this work. The 10th Resolution reads:

"10. Resolved,—That the Government be authorised and directed to locate a portion of the Canadian Pacific Railway, from the Red River, westerly, running to the south of Lake Manitoba, with a branch to Winnipeg. And, if they deem it advisable, to enter into contract for expending a sum not exceeding $1,000,000 in constructing the said Railway without previously submitting the contracts to Parliament."

That power has been used, and before I sit down, I shall have occasion to explain to the House the position in which that matter stands. The 11th, 12th, 13th and 14th read:

"11. Resolved,—That it is expedient to make further explorations in the Peace and Pine River districts and other sections of the country not yet examined, in order to ascertain the feasibility of a line through the largest extent of fertile territory, before beginning the work of construction in British Columbia."

"12. Resolved,—That in the opinion of this House, the selection of the Burrard Inlet terminus was premature."

"13. Resolved,—That it is necessary to keep good faith with British Columbia, and commence the construction of the Railway in that Province as early as is practicable."

"14. Resolved—That the Government be authorised and directed to make such further explorations as they may deem necessary for the said purpose, and so soon as they have finally selected and located the line, to enter into contracts for constructing a portion of the same, not exceeding 125 miles, without the further sanction of Parliament, so that the work of construction may, at latest, be commenced during the present season, and thereafter be vigorously prosecuted."

I may say to the House that we fully appreciate the enormous expenditure involved in the construction of the line of railway to the Pacific coast by the Burrard Inlet route. All we asked was authority to make explorations with the view of seeing if we could not connect the Pacific shores with the fertile district of the North-West, by passing through a more hospitable country.

MR. BLAKE: Not inhospitable.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: I will recall that, as I have a vivid recollection of what the hon. gentleman has been made to suffer for having used that word before. The Government, acting in good faith, and believing that if they could facilitate the progress of the work in British Columbia, and find a shorter and easier line of communication with the fertile valleys of the North-West, it would largely assist in solving the great difficulty that lays in the way of constructing the Canadian Pacific Railway, directed itself as vigorously to that question as possible. They obtained the services of an active and energetic navigator to report on Port Simpson. After receiving his report, I have no hesitation in saying that, in my opinion, no such port is to be found on the Pacific coast as Port Simpson. It is easy of access, and well sheltered within, and all that can be desired in every respect. But we found, on having the three routes examined, from Port Simpson to Peace River, Pine River, and Fort George, that the route to Burrard Inlet was 150 miles shorter than that to Port Simpson, and we found that the country through British Columbia, via the Peace River or Pine River, was not more favourable for settlement, than the Burrard Inlet route, but that, in addition to its being 500 miles north of Victoria, we had to encounter a very unfavourable climate. The rain-fall was very incessant on the coast, and there was no extent of country fit for settlement between the coast and five or six hundred miles where we would strike the Peace River Pass. Mr. Fleming pointed out in his report the great advantages it possessed as a line easier of construction, but, after full deliberation, we come to the conclusion that we would not be acting in the interests of the country if we rejected the Burrard Inlet route, which had been adopted by the late Government. The fact that the hon. gentleman, after careful consideration, had adopted that route, was greatly in its favour, and we had no hesitation in adopting it. The Burrard Inlet route has this advantage: It has a good harbour, and only thirty miles across the Narrows are the valuable coal mines of Nanaimo. Within thirty miles you have great coal deposits, and in close proximity abundant quantities of iron ore, sufficient, I hope, to induce enterprising capitalists to undertake the manufacture of the iron rails required in British Columbia. You have a most valuable fishery on those coasts, and, as is well known, you have splendid forests of timber. You have, from Burrard Inlet up toward Yale from fifty to one hundred miles of land valuable for settlement. The width is large enough to provide homes for a large and thriving population. I fully acknowledged, last year, that Kamloops district was a superior one. Yale is at the head of the tide water, and you can reach it easily from the shores of the Pacific. Steamers go daily from Victoria to Yale, and by the construction of 125 miles of rail you can reach the Kamloops district, which gives us communication with the great central plateau of the Rocky Mountains, through which 150 miles of the line will run, extending 140 miles south to the United States, and 200 miles running northward, with a fine climate and luxurious vegetation. The country is the most important and the most suitable for settlers to be found in the whole of the Province of British Columbia. I am sorry to detain hon. gentlemen opposite, while I read a few words from the "Guide to British Columbia," in which this country is described.

MR. MACKENZIE: Who wrote the description?

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: I am not able to say who it was written by, because I do not find the name of the author given; but I am happy to tell hon. gentlemen opposite if they are at all sceptical as to the value of the authority, they will find a similar description in the able report of Mr. Dawson, of the Geological Survey of 1877, which affords abundant confirmation of what I shall here read. Speaking of the New Westminster district we find the following:—

"The Fraser River does not come from the Cascade range, but from the Rocky range. It is the only river in British Columbia (except in the far northwest of the Province) which has strength to cross the dry country between the Rocky and Cascade ranges, and get through the latter range to the sea. It is fed in its course by streams running from every point of the compass—a noble river, but navigable only for considerable stretches, owing to rapids. Yale is the head of steamboat navigation from the sea. After bursting through the mountain passes at Yale and Hope, the Fraser is a tranquil, steady, clay-coloured stream for the latter part of its course."

"This country, on the lower portion of the Fraser, is what I may call the New Westminster district. It is in general a wooded district, but has large tracts of open, arable, and grazing land, delicious atmosphere—no malaria or ague—water carriage, facilities for shipment. Snow begins in January, and is gone by March; not continuous; plenty of fish and game in the district; will raise anything Vancouver Island will raise, and more; three large saw mills, employing 600 people; a grist mill, distillery, Farmers' Society, etc. About 200 settlers located themselves in this district during 1874.

"The Mainland Guardian (New Westminster Journal) said, in March, 1872: A minimum yield of from thirty to forty bushels of wheat to the acre is the ordinary average yield in the districts of Kamloops, Okanagan, Nicola, Sumass, Chilliwack, and the Lower Fraser. Between the town of New Westminster and the mouth of the river, a yield very much exceeding this is often obtained, not because of better or more suitable soil, but solely due to more careful cultivation; 50 bushels of oats, and an equal yield of barley, per acre, are commonly reached. Indian corn yields per acre 60 or 70 bushels. The yield of roots and green crops is generally encouraging, being unsurpassed by any in the world.

"On one farm the yield of potatoes was seven tons, on another as high as fifteen tons per acre. Not a few specimens reached the enormous weight of 2½ and even 3lbs. Turnips give 25 tons to the acre. Onions from four to six tons; while carrots, cabbages, beets, cauliflowers, etc., grow to a size which may, without exaggeration, be described as enormous.

"Of fruits it may be enough to state, that the ordinary kinds (apples, pears, plums, cherries, currants, gooseberries, strawberries, etc.,) found in the eastern part of the Dominion and in England, grow luxuriantly and yield plentifully."

NEW WESTMINSTER DISTRICT.—SPECIAL DESCRIPTION.

"I will describe the New Westminster district, beginning at the mouth of the River Fraser:—

"We find there extensive, low, rich, 'tidelands or flats,' free from timber, with patches of willows, rose bushes, and, about the border of higher ground, crab-apples. A coarse grass called 'swamp hay' is plentiful. There are a good many salt water sloughs, which add to the difficulty of dyking.

"Farm after farm is being occupied in this section, and there is room for settlers. There are 29,000 acres of very good land in an island between the north and south arm of the Fraser.

"On the north arm, a small settlement of about twenty farmers; 500 acres cultivated; samples of white and red wheat, described as 5½ ft. high, yielding 50 bushels to the acre; average, of course, less. Two potatoes ('Breeley Prolific') yielded 67lbs. Timothy hay, barley, oats, peas, etc., good."

"A district exactly like the mouth of Fraser district, indeed part of it, within the United States territory, near the mouth of the Lummi, and back from Semiahmoo, is filling up with population rapidly.

"Ascending the Fraser, we in no long time come to forests on each side; giant pine; cedars, alders, maple, cottonwood; real agricultural value of land cannot be seen. Luxuriant vegetation in the forest—berry bushes of all kinds, also ferns, ground-creepers, moss

—the sweet scented white flowers of the wild apple tree shine among the green foliage of summer. Scenery and products altogether on a grand scale. But let the settler take heart; he is beside the sea here, no railway carriage to the seaboard? there is much good land requiring little clearing, plenty well worth the clearing. There are in parts extensive flats covered with wild hay, also fine prairies with fertile soil, excellent crops and dairy yield, thriving farms near the town of New Westminster, and settlements also at Pitt River, Keatsey, Langley, Matsqui, etc. For instance, at Pitt River 20,000 acres of good arable land, requiring no clearing—the part of it subject to freshets is good now for grazing."

"At Larg'ey, a newspaper correspondent (Daily Standard, Victoria, November, 1872) describes farms with 'several hundred acres of alluvial soil, black mould with clay bottom; at your feet several square miles of green meadow land, the gleaming river beyond, and across it the dark Cascade range; a stream, full of trout, meandering through the meadow.' Another farm of '100 acres, every part cultivated, drained, and laid off into large parks of thirty to forty acres each; the steading in the form of a square; a fine mansion house.' Another of '800 acres, 200 cultivated, fine black soil, all fit for the plough, drained by a stream which skirts it.' Again, '600 acre grass dairy farm; cows, Durham breed; farmer cures butter.' The next, '300 acres, the stock and crop owned by the blacksmith. Good public school; neat Presbyterian Church.' The writer ascribes an extraordinary production to these farms."

"Higher up the river still, where the rivers Sumass and Chilliwack join the Fraser, are rising settlements—Sumass Prairie, 25,000 acres. Prime beef, choice butter and cheese, fine cereals, wide-spreading fertile prairies and valleys here, thinly peopled yet; sixty to eighty farms; good dwellings, barns, stables, churches, schools, shops, grist-mill; 600 acres wheat raised last year, forty to fifty bushels an acre; 200 acres oats; also potatoes, peas, beans, hops, fruit and even tobacco; supply beef to Yale and Hope (Yale gets some beef also from Nicola); extent of prairies great; much good land also on the Chilliwack above the valley that would do well when cleared."

OKANAGAN COUNTRY.

"Very fine stock country, and will also produce grain; yield fall wheat only without irrigation; also profusely oats, barely, Indian corn, potatoes, tomatoes, musk-melons, water-melons, grape-vines, tobacco. Summer warm, has shown 93° in the shade, cold is sharp in winter, but weather clear and sunny, snow seldom deep, and never lies long, cattle, horses and sheep as a rule, unboxed in winter; moderate preparation, however, recommended.

"The lake, seventy miles long by one and a-half miles wide; country to the east of it a fair sample of the best districts between Rocky and Cascade ranges; open, grassy hills, dotted with trees like English parks, successive hills and dales; lakes, ponds, and streams full of fish; soil much the same general character as the Similkameen; rich sandy loam, substratum of clay in some valleys, stretches of 'bottom' land, some alkali patches; some settlers coming in fast, and taking up land, since Canadian Pacific Railway began. Those who would have 'soid out' a year ago are now tilling and improving their land. It is said that in Okanagan and adjoining districts there is room for a farming population of 10,000 souls (allowing 160 acres for nine persons.) Roman Catholic mission post (1,100 feet above sea level) on the east side of the lake; fine country behind it. On the west side of the lake, a little distance back, runs a low mountain range, from which detached spurs press upon the lake, and rise above the waters in precipitous bluffs; excellent pasture, particularly on small spits jutting into the lake. The Cherry Creek silver mine has been abandoned for the present.

"Near the north end of the lake is an Indian reserve of very choice land."

KAMLOOPS-SHUSWAP DISTRICT.

"Let us enter the district from the east. Columbia River is forty-four miles from Shuswap Lake, via Eagle Pass. Three Valley Lake (altitude 1,912 feet), is about thirty-four miles from Shuswap Lake. Directly south from Three Valley Lake is a long, wide, grassy valley, which leads across a low 'divide' to the head waters of the Shuswap or Spillimeechene River. This is a gentle river, flowing through a large valley, much of which has clay sub-soil; fine fall wheat without irrigation; very good and heavy crops here; large farm buildings; well fenced fields; Indians at work on farms; fine bunch grass on the high land, round which the river makes a southern bend.

"A farmer on the Shuswap Prairie thrashed out eighty tons of wheat in 1879; two other farmers forty tons each. Prices here of very superior extra flour, $12 (48s. English) per barrel of 19½ lbs.; choice bacon, 25 cents (1s. 0½d. English) per lb.; juicy beef, 10 cents (5d. English) per lb.

"Leaving the Shuswap or Spillimeechene River at a point, say beyond where Cherry Creek joins it, there is between that point and the head of the Okanagan Lake a district of open prairie and sparsely timbered land, abounding in rich pasturage and dotted with a few farming settlements.

"From the head of Okanagan Lake to the Thompson River (South branch) is about 45 miles northwest. Leaving the open, rolling, bunch-grass valleys of Okanagan, you first ascend for about twenty miles through timber land; reach Grand Prairie—fine soil; luxuriant bunch-grass, dotted with cattle; the prairie sixteen miles by two miles, bounded by hills; a river between; elevation (1,450 feet) causes some danger from night frost. Grand Prairie to Thompson River—glittering stream through valley, bordered by alders and willows, green meadows, clumps of trees, small lakes; good soil, ready for cultivation.

"There is an open, or lightly timbered bunch grass country along the banks of the North Thompson River, and north of Kamloops Lake for 130 miles.

"Several English gentlemen, from the American side, have taken a prairie of 2,000 acres on the North Thompson, a short distance from Kamloops, and are making a long ditch for irrigation.

"In 1871, the yield of grain on the Tranquil and north and south branches of the Thompson River, was a million and a-quarter pounds.

"The whole Kamloops-Shuswap district is a district of table land, with considerable depressions—abundant pasture, generally free from forests, and only interspersed with timber; summer climate dry, great heat; winter frequently very cold for a day or two, but on the whole not very sharp; snow generally lies a short time only; cattle are driven here to winter, in severe seasons; Hudson's Bay Company used to 'winter out' 500 horses here, including brood mares and young horses. This district will doubtless become known again as a mineral district. The first gold found in quantity by the natives was found in this district, and fair wages are still made on the Thompson River. The Thompson, near its mouth, is too full, rapid, and rocky for mining."

NICOLA COUNTRY.

"Directly south from Kamloops, 30 miles, is Nicola Lake. The road at present from Kamloops is a sort of natural trail over gently undulating but high open country, with fine grass. First few miles no herbage; many ravines. At the first height, turn and survey the magnificent scenery of the Thompson River valleys; will give some idea of the grazing resources of the Province. Can bring a waggon with light load across from Kamloops to Nicola Lake, if you take a guide, an axe and a spade."

LILLOET-CLINTON DISTRICT.

"This district includes Cache Creek, Bonaparte, also William Lake, and up to Quesnel Mouth.

"The whole district is a very fine one, and at present shows what can be done by applying capital to the soil. It is farther to the north, and generally more elevated than some sections already described. The risks of crops from summer night frosts may be said to be very considerable in the entire country on the waggon-road north to Pavillion Mountain, unless farms have a south aspect or are protected from north blasts. The remark applies more particularly to farms farther north than Alexandria.

"The surface in so large a section of country is, of course, varied. It embraces within its area fertile river-benches (terraces), table-lands, large open valleys, immense plains and great rolling hills.

"The country near the Thompson, Bonaparte, and Hat Rivers is very attractive to the eye; miles of green hills, crowning slopes, and level meadows; hardly a bush or a tree; fine grass almost to the hill-tops. The climate very healthful and enjoyable; rather a want of timber in parts, also of rain generally, but there are many streams.

"For grazing, the country cannot be surpassed, and its agricultural capabilities, so far as the soil is concerned, are in many parts very good. At Cache Creek and on the Bonaparte there is excellent arable land. The country through which the waggon-road passes to Williams Lake has some very good soil, with no more timber than is needed for farming purposes. The farming land is bounded by low hills, beyond which there are prairies and valleys. These hills are undulating and brightly green, and their grassy carpet is daisied over with countless wild flowers."

I have no doubt when my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works has completed his improvements, we shall get 100 to 150 miles of navigation, up into the mineral regions, that will become available.

MR. BLAKE: Will it yield as much as Vancouver Island?

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: He does not say anything about that.

MR. MACKENZIE: It ought to do that, I should think.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: I do not think that hon. gentlemen should abuse Vancouver Island after agreeing to expend $4,000,000 upon it. I may say that the horses owned by the Government are, in the Kamloops district, unhoused during the winter, and have been found to be in good condition in the spring. No part of British Columbia is better suited for settlement and cultivation than that of the Kamloops district.

MR. MACKENZIE: That is the best part of the country.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: There is no doubt of it; and that is one of the reasons for adopting it as the railway route. Hon. gentlemen opposite exercised a wise and sound discretion in committing the country to the construction of the 125 miles now put under contract, and which will bring us in communication with the navigation of the north and south Thompson, and render access to the rich mines of Cariboo comparatively easy. The gold and coal mines will be made accessible by easy and rapid communication, and promote, as the hon. gentleman said to his constituents at Sarnia, the opening up of the inaccessible parts where there are inexhaustible riches in the bosom of the earth. Well, Sir, we resolved not to waste time in surveys, but to make a rapid exploration of the route to Port Simpson, and undertake at once the construction in accordance with our pledge to Parliament. Upon determining that the line to Burrard Inlet was the best, we should have been false to ourselves and obliged to sacrifice the best interests of the country if we did not act promptly and carry it out. In putting this section under contract I am glad to be able to say that the contracts will not be found to be fraught with the danger that hon. gentlemen might suppose, unless they take the trouble to read them. They have been let in maximum quantities: after putting in everything that could possibly be required, $1,000,000 extra is added for any possible contingencies. The contracts themselves amount to $9,167,000; $1,000,000 of that is for contingencies. The contracts are let by the yard, but the Government have ascertained by proper evidence the very outside quantities possible required for the construction of a first-class road and the Government have reserved power to cut down the work to any extent that may be found practicable, and at the same time to construct a road of the cheapest description from Kamloops to Yale. By carefully laying out the work, by carefully watching its progress, by carefully reducing the work, by increasing the curvature and increasing the grades, if necessary and advisable, we may finish and equip the road below the actual amount, as stated in the contract; and we have also reserved the power to stop the work at any moment.

MR. BLAKE: Could you do it now?

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: I still hope to prove to the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) that it would not be in the interest of the country to bring this work to a stand, to tarnish the fair fame of Canada by declaring that we were ready to repudiate solemn engagements, simply because they were entered into by our predecessors. We do not bind ourselves to build the road by 1890, as they did; we limited our obligation to build that road by the greater obligations that we owe to Canada, not to do anything that will materially interfere with the interests of the Dominion. We will not hold ourselves bound—although the hon. gentleman has pledged us to do it—to spend $2,000,000 per annum. We do not expect to spend $1,000,000 this year; and if we stop the contractor at any time, if, through any disturbance of the hon. the Minister of Finance's calculations or otherwise, it may be found expedient to do so, we can stop the work without paying one dollar for loss, or for the profits the contractors might otherwise have made. If that stoppage is ordered for six months, we must make compensation by extending six months to the time allowed for the completion of the contract. I expect, with the utmost confidence, that that road will be finished and equipped with a moderate amount of rolling-stock in as cheap a manner as is compatible with safety in going over it, and that the whole of the cost will come within the $9,000,000. I will now refer to the objections to the Burrard Inlet route made a year ago. First that it was too near the American frontier—

MR. MACKENZIE: Have you not shifted the frontier?

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: We cannot prevent our line being exposed to having its traffic carried to a terminus in the United States; but there was a more important matter—that the Burrard Inlet could be commanded by guns on San Juan Island, and we considered how that difficulty could be met.

MR. BLAKE: It might be done by getting a big gun ourselves.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: The hon. gentleman says by getting a big gun ourselves; but we have another mode of meeting the difficulty, namely, by the construction, when required, of eight miles of railroad, from the harbour of Esquimault to Sanwich Inlet, which will enable us to get to Burrard Inlet, and thus avoid one of the principle objections that I raised last year. The hon. gentleman will not have the opportunity, I think, to throw the taunt across the House that I carried out a policy to which I was opposed. I had the candour to say, last year, in the light of all that was then known, that I would select Burrard Inlet, and all we asked the House to say was that the location of that line was premature. The subsequent exploration and examination confirmed us in the course we adopted, and having made this examination, I think we disposed of the word "premature." Having pronounced the policy of the construction of this road by the appropriation of 100,000,000 acres of lands, the Government felt it was necessary to put before the world the most authentic information we could get in relation to that land, and, notwithstanding that a large amount of money has been expended on surveys, I think it is not so large as we have been led to suppose. Some $900,000 charged for surveys, should have gone towards construction, because it was really in relation to the location and construction of the road. But, as the hon. First Minister of that day told the House, this was no ordinary survey. We were exploring a country running from Nipissing to St. James' Bay, running from Vancouver Island to Fort Simpson, and running from the fifty-first to the fifty-sixth parallel of latitude across the continent. The Report I laid upon the Table of the House last year, was accompanied by a map giving the best information in possession of the Government in relation to the lands in the North-West. In this map the portions of the country about which we had no definite information as to its value for settlement, were indicated; and I am happy to be able to say that, from the explorations of the past season, we are now able to say that from the foot of the Rocky Mountains to the western boundary of Manitoba, we can find 150,000,000 acres of good land, and only 30,000,000 acres of land unfit for settlement.

MR. MACKENZIE: That is not the Railway belt.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: Yes, it is. The hon. gentleman can see that for himself from the map.

MR. CHARLTON: Does it cover the Peace River district?

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: It does to some extent. I am happy to be able to state that the surveys will be completed on the first day of July this year, and that every dollar in the Estimates for the coming season will be expended in the construction of the road. Although, in connection with the diversion of the line south of Lake Manitoba, to run through a country valuable for settlement—the best country for the railroad to pass through and to promote colonisation as rapidly as possible—the length of the line was increased some twenty miles, nearly four miles were saved between Thunder Bay and the Red River. We have found a good line between Winnipeg and the Rocky Mountains, escaping the enormous gullies to the south of Edmonton Pass, which shortens the road by ten miles or more.

MR. MACKENZIE: This is not measured yet.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: No; we are obliged to deal with approximate measurements in order to discuss this question at all. I am also happy to be able to say that, so far from the second 100 miles being open to the criticisms of the hon. gentleman, we have not only got a good line, but we have just received tenders for the construction of probably as heavy a section of line as there is between Red River and the foot of the Rocky Mountains, under $500,000 for 100 miles. The grades will not exceed those of the Grand Trunk or Great Western Railways. If there is any part of the line which it is important should have the best possible grade, it is that between the country from the Red River to Lake Superior. No person who heard the elaborate statement of the hon. the Minister of the Interior, the other night, can doubt but that the population will increase in the country as rapidly as he depicted.

MR. BLAKE: Hear, hear.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: I will refer the hon. gentleman to the Grit Bible for evidence of the accuracy of those statements. I have here an extract from the Globe newspaper:

"It would not indicate extravagant hope to say that 1,000,000 people will be in the North-West Territories before the 1,400 miles already considered have been constructed. But let us say that only 500,000 people are then in the North-West. If they contribute to the Dominion Treasury in the same proportion as the people of the other Provinces, they will increase the Revenue by $3,000,000 a year. The 1,300 miles of Railway we treat of will certainly cost more than $30,000,000 when completed and equipped. That sum represents an annual payment of interest of $1,200,000, so that no less than $1,800,000 would remain to the good. Part of it would, of course, go in expenses of government and protection for the 500,000 people contributing the whole, but it is easy to see that the Dominion has nothing to lose by carrying the Pacific Railway to the Rocky Mountains at an early date."

This is a corroboration of the statement, that we will be able to build the whole road from the Customs duty alone of the 500,000 people that will shortly go into that country. Under the circumstances, I am astonished at hon. gentlemen opposite arraying themselves in an attitude of hostility to this work, on the ground that it is going to plunge us into financial difficulties. Although I am not prepared to admit the accuracy of everything that appears in the Globe, I believe that the editor never penned a wiser or more patriotic article than the one I have just quoted. No man has been more unjustly assailed by that newspaper than myself, but after reading that article I am prepared to forgive that paper everything. I feel that at last, actuated by patriotic sentiments in a crisis like this, the editor feels bound to come forward and cast his great influence in favour of this important work, demanded alike by good faith and the best interests of Canada. The same article continues:

"We now come to the Lake Superior section, which is certainly a political necessity, but not required till the prairie line has been completed and connected with Thunder Bay. It is, as we have shown, reasonable to suppose that at least half a million people will be on the plains when the Pacific Railway reaches the Rocky Mountains. Every family going in afterward will increase the quantity of produce available for export. The population of the United States doubled itself in twenty-five years; in several western territories the population has been doubled in ten years. The Canadian North-West will gain by emigration continually, and—as always happens where fertile land can be easily procured—births will be very numerous. By the time the line to the Rocky Mountains has been completed it will be wise to push on the road around Lake Superior, because before it can be built at a fair rate of speed a large traffic will await its opening. The Lake Superior section, from the eastern terminus of the main Pacific to Fort William, will be 620 miles long, and when completed will offer to the traffic of the Canadian and to a large part of the American North-West the shortest all-rail-route to the seaboard. It is not needed till the prairies have been opened up by the line to the Rocky Mountains. After that has been built it may be safely completed as a commercial road, one that will pay better year by year, and will ultimately be a very valuable property."

What is our present position? On the 31st December last we had expended $14,159,665. I will give the items: The expenditure on the lines from Lake Superior to Red River has been $4,866,861; on telegraphs, $505,039; Pembina Branch, exclusive of rails, $511,214; on rails, bolts, and spikes for the road altogether, up to the 31st December, $2,958,062.

MR. MACKENZIE: What has been done with the old rails?

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: Those are the old rails. I am not including any considerable amount of the rails purchased since, because the payments up to the 31st December have not been made to any large extent. On the Canada Central there was spent $563,715. I am glad to be able to say, in connection with the contract for the section west of Red River, that the contractor entertains no doubt of opening fifty miles by July, and of laying the track, and being able to carry passengers over the 100 miles by the end of the season. We also expect to be able to complete the first fifty miles of the second 100, west of Manitoba, by the July following, and the remainder during the year 1881. For engineering and miscellaneous expenditures in connection with construction, $993,000; payments not under contract, including such as for land at the Kaministiquia, and dredging at Thunder Bay, etc., $247,300. The total for construction, $1,709,257, to the 31st December last. Explorations, preliminary surveys, and general examination of the whole country from Nipissing to James' Bay in the east, and in British Columbia* on the west, from Victoria, to Fort Simpson, extending throughout from the 49th parallel to the 56th parallel, $3,119,618. Total expenditure upon the Canadian Pacific Railway, including the Pembina Branch, $13,848,876. There is another item of Pacific Railway accounts of $22,995, being a payment on the Dawson route in settlement with one of the contractors, and on the Fort Frances Locks, which cost $287,795, which, being one hundred miles away from the line, I do not think ought to be charged to the Canadian Pacific Railway account. But including this it reaches the total to the end of the year of $14,159,665.

After Recess.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: Before six o'clock, I was about taking up the question of the expenditure that will be required to complete the Canadian Pacific Railway. I will now submit a calculation I believe to be an outside one, or above the probable outlay. This estimate has been prepared by a gentleman who has had the widest and best opportunity of forming a deliberate and dispassionate judgment on the subject—a gentleman whose ability, in my opinion, is only exceeded by his caution—Mr. Sandford

Fleming, Engineer-in-Chief of the Canada Pacific Railway. However much this estimate of expenditure may be reduced, I am sure it cannot be exceeded. The distance from Lake Superior to Burrard Inlet is 1,956 miles; that is adding twenty miles for the diversion of the line to the south of Lake Manitoba, and deducting three and three-quarters miles for the reduction in the distance between Lake Superior and Red River, and the shortening by the change of route passing north of Edmonton instead of south as before. That total includes the Fort William and Selkirk section of 406 miles as now reduced; and for that I submit an estimate for completion in the manner intended as a first-class road, and with a thorough equipment for the large traffic expected, and including terminal stations, $17,000,000, or $1,000,000 less for the reasons stated than my estimate of last year. The 1,000 from Selkirk to Jasper Valley, the dividing point just beyond the foot of the Rocky Mountains, including a light equipment—all that will be required for some years—Mr. Fleming estimates at $13,000,000, that is $3,000,000 more than the average estimate for the 200 miles west of Red River, in order to be entirely safe. We have 100 miles actually under contract, and have received tenders for the other 100 miles, and I do not expect the average cost to exceed that of the 100 miles just let.

MR. BLAKE: What is the amount estimated for the equipment per mile?

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: A light equipment is all we shall require for some years.

MR. BLAKE: Will it be $1,000 or $2,000 per mile?

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: When the traffic demands a heavier equipment there will be means for providing it.

MR. BLAKE: I only want to know your estimate in dollars.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: It is $13,000 per mile, as against an estimate we should be justified in giving of $10,000 a mile, making $3,000,000 more than the average of the amount probably needed to complete and supply with a fair equipment the 200 miles we have under contract on the prairies. From Jasper Valley to Port Moody the distance is 550 miles. From Jasper to Kamloops, in British Columbia, to which the portion now under contract extends, is 335 miles, which can be constructed, I believe, for $40,000 a mile. But Mr. Fleming, more cautious, has given an outside estimate of $43,660 a mile. This is much heavier than the prairie district but is light compared to the section we have let in the canyons of the Fraser. That will give $15,500,000 for the section from Jasper House to Kamloops. From Kamloops to Yale is 125 miles, which Mr. Fleming estimates at $80,000 a mile, or $10,000,000 to complete the road, with a fair equipment for any traffic likely to be required. In my opinion we may set down, instead of $10,000,000, $9,000,000 for that work. From Yale to Port Moody, 90 miles, he estimates at about $38,888 a mile, or $3,500,000. Those 550 miles foot up to $29,000,000, to which, with his usual caution, Mr. Fleming adds $1,000,000; this makes, with the $17,000,000 for the road from Fort William to Red River, and $13,000,000 from Red River to Jasper Valley, $30,000,000 from that point to Burrard Inlet, a total of $60,000,000. To that, add for surveys and explorations, not included in the cost of engineering and locations, and other operations, $3,119,618. The House will be very much surprised to learn the lavish expenditure of the late Government in British Columbia, if, at the time, the then Premier did not intend to carry the work to completion. From June, 1871, to June, 1872, surveys in British Columbia cost $182,216; from 1872 to 1873, $315,000—the late Government, of course, not being responsible for that. From 1873 to 1874, $118,000; from 1874 to 1875, $191,241; from 1875 to 1876, $330,162; from 1876 to 1877, no less than $273,788, or $600,000 for those two years; from 1877 to 1878, $126,476; from 1878 to 1879, $50,112; and from July, 1879, to December, $25,000 more, making a total of $1,611,997 for surveys in British Columbia. To that, add the expenditure between Lakes Nipissing and Superior, and between Lake Superior and Red River and the Rocky Mountains, in all $1,507,621, making a total of $3,119,618 to be added to the $60,000,000, embracing all the other expenditures in connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway, except the Pembina Branch. The Pembina Branch is estimated to cost, when finished and equipped, $1,750,000, making in all, including the construction from Lake Superior to Burrard Inlet, and all the surveys, a sum of $64,869,618. That completes the Canadian Pacific Railway, with the exception of 600 miles from Fort William to Nipissing, the terminal point.

MR. MACKENZIE: It is more than 600 miles.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: After the Canada Central Company extend their line to the Sault on the line I expect they will follow, it will be considerably less than 600 miles, because we will strike the Canada Central some sixty or seventy miles west of the southeast bay of Lake Nipissing. Therefore, my estimate is more likely to be over the mark than under it. I am inclined to think, from the surveys that have been prosecuted during the past year, from Nipigon to Fort William, and a good easy line can be obtained, so much so as to make it doubtful whether it may not be desirable to go to Fort William rather than to strike the line from Lake Superior to Red River, some fifty or sixty miles outside the present terminus. I have also had a survey made from Nipigon eastward to Long Lake, and the line there is much more favourable than was before supposed. The line from Nipissing towards the head of Lake Superior is also found to be an extremely favourable line, running through an even country, well timbered; so that I am happy to be able to say that the completion of our national through line of railway from Ottawa to the waters of the Pacific—I may say from Halifax, on the Atlantic, to the waters of the Pacific—will be attended with much less difficulty and expense than we have been led to suppose down to the present time. I need not say we do not propose to grapple with the whole of this work at the present moment, but I believe that with the prospect of the development of the great North-West and the increase of population, at a comparatively early day, the pressure for the construction of the through line will ere long become so great as to warrant and compel that work being undertaken as essential in the interests of Canada. Now, I believe we may safely put the cost of that work at $30,000 a mile. In the first place, we will have easy access to it by the Canada Central, at or near Sturgeon River, sixty or seventy miles west of the present terminus at South East Bay. From the head of Lake Superior at Nipigon we will again strike the line by water communication, and at Fort William we will have a railway for the purpose of reaching it at that end. Striking at these three points, I believe we may safely put that work at $30,000 a mile, which would add $18,000,000 to complete this great national highway. If we were to put it at $30,000 a mile, an amount to which it may be safely reduced, we make a total of $82,869,618. Mr. Fleming estimates this 600 miles at $20,000,000, which would make $84,869,618. When I remind the House that the land alone, according to the authority of the right hon. Minister of the Interior, upon the calculation which he believes to be sound, within the next ten years will give us $38,000,000 in hand, and $32,000,000 to receive on mortgages within the following ten years, or a total sum of $70,000,000, it will be seen that we incur no risk. But suppose the land does not give us that, we have an authority with hon. gentlemen opposite will accept: that the Customs Revenue from the people, who will go into the country for the next ten years will furnish the interest on $60,000,000. I have no hesitation in saying that the whole sentiment of the country has changed on this question. I am not at all ashamed to say that my own opinions have completely changed in relation to the character of this great work. I remember well that when the then First Minister brought in his Act in 1874, for the construction of this as a Government work, I felt that we were incurring too great a responsibility. I believed, at that time, it was an unsafe and unsound policy for the Government of this country to undertake the construction of this great national work from end to end as a Government work, and I did not hesitate to express my opinions as freely and as forcibly as I could on the occasion of the passage of that measure. But the whole condition of Canada has changed since then. There is not an intelligent man in this country who does not look upon the prospect of the settlement and development of the North-West with entirely different feelings from those that were then entertained. Why, who could listen to the glowing statements of the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), when he pictured the enormous tide of emigration into the North Western States, and pointed out that a similar tide was only waiting for an opportunity to pour into our own North-West; who could listen to the evidence the hon. gentleman gave that the investment of $54,000,000 capitalised, would have given the United States all the money that had been received from those lands, and enable them to have disposed of them by free grants instead of by sale, without feeling that he was furnishing the strongest evidence of the safety of the course that this Government was adopting in grappling with this question. By our land regulations we present these fertile regions of our North-West Territory in a more attractive form for settlement than even the lands in the United States were offered, and, at the same time, held within our grasp, for sale, lands enough to more than recoup Canada for every dollar expended on this Railway. Let me again quote an opinion that is much stronger with hon. gentlemen opposite than anything I can utter, that is, an article in the great organ of their party, the Globe, which, after a most careful examination of this whole question, says:

“It is admitted by everyone that the plains of the North-West Territories are exceedingly fertile, and capable of sustaining, by agriculture, a population twice as numerous as the present population of the United States. It is also admitted that a railway from Selkirk to the Rocky Mountains will open up the country so rapidly that in a very few years the line will pay, as a commercial enterprise. There is nothing to be gained by constructing it much faster than a continuous westward settlement can be made on the adjacent belt of land. But no one can doubt that it will pay the Dominion well to build that piece of road. It will be 900 miles long, or over one-third of the whole Pacific Railway. * * * We find, then, that no less than 1,924 miles of the proposed Pacific Road may be fairly considered as a commercial enterprise. That it is also a national enterprise, is a very poor argument against the project. When the road has been carried from the eastern terminus to the Rocky Mountains, it is safe to say that the population of the North-West will be great enough to contribute to the Dominion Treasury a larger sum than will pay the interest on the loan, for which the older Provinces must first pledge their credit. We have taken no account of the land sales, which must, if well managed, put every year, a large and continually increasing sum into the hands of the Government. * * * But there is a political side to the question. British Columbia will feel aggrieved unless some attempt is made to keep faith with her. To develop the resources of the Province in advance of the completion of the Pacific road, is not an unreasonable wish. There is a considerable tract of good Territory along the lakes and rivers of the proposed Yale-Kamloops section. That piece of road will cost perhaps $12,000,000 when equipped, and it is proposed to finish it during the next five years. Canada is asked to spend $2,400,000 a year for the purpose of colonizing and contending British Columbia. The interest on the money will be $96,000 the first year, and and $480,000 in the last and each year thereafter. Now, it may be thought that this is not a large annual sum to pay for a piece of road, which, though not necessary to the older Provinces, must be built some time, and in the meantime will materially

INCREASE THE WEALTH AND POPULATION OF THE PACIFIC PROVINCE.

If 100,000 people settle in British Columbia during the construction of the road—and there is every reason why that number should go there in the course of a few years—the Dominion will receive from them a Revenue sufficient to pay the interest on the expenditure. It is no unimportant consideration that the people of the Pacific Province would rebel against the total abandonment of the line, and by clamoring for secession endanger the permanence of Confederation."

I trust these statements will relieve the hon. gentlemen opposite of any apprehension they may have as to the entire safety of at once undertaking the work, in the cautious manner the Government have adopted. Now, I must refer once more to that great authority in the estimation of the hon. gentlemen opposite. On the opening day of the Session, and long before that, at the time the Government were engaged in this exploration to Port Simpson, and investigating as to whether it were possible to find an easier line, what was the Globe telling British Columbia :

"If Mr. Mackenzie had not been deprived of power, that route, at this moment, would have been under construction, and being rapidly pushed to completion."

The Globe, no doubt, when it found the hon. gentleman not only advertising for tenders, but actually making an expenditure of $32,400 in hot haste during the progress of a General Election, to move the rails from Esquimault to Yale, concluded that he was just as serious as I concluded he was. I was not alone, for the organ of his party seems to have been labouring under the same misconception, as a reference to the Globe will show. Not only did the Globe say that, but it also stated, on the opening day of this Session, if I remember rightly, at the time the hon. leader of the Opposition was actually intimating that he was prepared to go back upon his own record, and abandon the keeping of good faith with British Columbia, to which he had pledged this country, it told the people that if he had not lost power the work would have been under construction at that moment. I need not say more than that to show how thoroughly the hon. gentleman had convinced every person of his intention to go forward with that work. I dare say I will be told by the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake): Granted that your figures are correct, assuming that you can build this Railway for even less money than you have estimated, you have only encountered the first difficulty; you have then to operate the line, and the cost of that will be so greatly beyond anything you can hope to obtain from it, that you will place an intolerable burthen upon the people of this country. I must address myself for a few moments to that question. I will first give the information I have just received from the Superintendent of the Pembina Branch :

"The 160 miles we have now opened in the North-West, shows that from the 1st day of March to the 12th day of April we have carried 5,236 passengers, and 1,248 loaded cars, containing 12,460 tons of freight. The gross receipts during that short period were $36,387, and working expenses $15,000, leaving a net profit of $21,387, and this during a more difficult and stormy period than has been known for many years."

By July, 1882, we will have about 700 miles of this road in operation; we will have 85 miles from Selkirk to Emerson or St. Vincent. We will have 200 miles in operation west of the Red River, which, with the branch of 16 miles to Winnipeg, will give us some 700 miles in operation, without reference at all to the section in British Columbia. I have every reason to believe that every mile of that road, from the day it is opened, will make an ample return for all the expenditure incurred in its operation. I think it is safe to say that in every succeeding year, as we extend gradually this road towards the

SIR CHARLES TUPPER.

Rocky Mountains, it will furnish such an additional volume of traffic from Red River to Thunder Bay, which will become the great entrepot of that country, as will prevent it from burthening the people, and give us some fair return for the interest on the money used in its construction. Hon. gentlemen must not forget, as I said before, that the whole aspect of affairs in this country has entirely changed within a brief period; that that which would have been properly regarded as highly imaginative in relation to the development of the Canadian North-West, must now be looked upon with very different eyes indeed. My hon. predecessor need only recall to his mind the fact that he publicly advertised, in 1876, offering $10,000 a mile and 20,000 acres of land for the construction of the road, and asking how much more capital tenderers would require, 4 per cent. upon for twenty-five years, to induce them to undertake this work. And what was the response? Not a tender. So completely had the hon. gentleman opposite succeeded in imbuing the minds of capitalists in this country and abroad with the hopelessness of this enterprise, that not one of them would undertake it as a commercial enterprise, on any terms. What is the condition of things to-day. Supposing this Government were to put an advertisement like that in the papers asking on what terms capitalists would come forward and construct the road from Red River, to Kamloops, and repay us all the expenditure we have made beyond Red River, and undertake to maintain and operate not only all that part of that road, but the rest of the road down to Yale or Burrard Inlet? Would there be no response? If such a proposal were made to-morrow, does he not know that the first capitalists of this country would come to the front and offer to construct and operate that road on terms that would for ever settle the question as to whether this undertaking would be a serious burden on the people of this country. I have good reason to state that such an offer as that would secure the construction and operation of the whole line from Red River to Kamloops, with the operation and maintenance of all the road to the Pacific, at a cost not exceeding $13,000, or $10,000 per mile, from Red River to Kamloops, and 26,000,000 acres of land. In that case we would be in this position, as the hon. gentleman would see, that the whole expenditure of an unknown quantity, proving a burden that could not be calculated, would be entirely removed, and we would be in a position of having this great national work accomplished within ten years, and on terms that would involve comparatively light expenditure from the people of this country, and that would be a thousand times recouped from the development of the North-West.

MR. MACKENZIE: Not a thousand times.

MR. BLAKE: Nor a hundred.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: While I say recouped, and when I said a thousand fold, I did not mean, as the hon. gentleman knows, that the actual amount would be returned a thousand times. I meant that there would be such a development of the magnificent North-West of this country as would lift Canada rapidly into the position of a nation. And I would ask the hon. gentleman whether, under these circumstances, the Government is not in a position to say that they feel entirely free from any apprehension as to the cost either of the construction or the operation of this road after its construction. Before I sit down, I must refer to the question of cancelling the contract of the Georgian Bay Branch. As the hon. gentlemen know, the Georgian Bay Branch was undertaken without the necessary information. As the hon. gentlemen know, the policy of the Government of that day had to be completely changed after they ascertained the difficulties they would encounter, and the uselessness of the work after it was done. Instead of going from Nipissing to the Georgia Bay, it was decided to stop the road at Cantin's Bay, and canalise the French River from that point. The Government satisfied themselves that, in the interest of Canada, all the money that was expended south of Lake Nipissing would be thrown away. Having satisfied themselves of that, they cancelled that contract. It is now evident that the attention of the whole of this country is turned to the question of obtaining the shortest line of communication to our Great North-West by Sault Ste. Marie. Hon. gentlemen opposite may remind me that, at one time, I entertained serious objection to going to Sault Ste. Marie, but the case is different to-day.

MR. MACKENZIE: Most other people are going to the States.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: There is nothing that makes one despair so much of the future of this country, as the determined, settled policy of hon. gentlemen opposite to decry and trample down their own country; but I tell hon. gentlemen they mistake the patriotism of our people if they imagine they will ever ride into power over the ruins of their country. What is wanted to give a rapid and decided impetus to the progress and prosperity of Canada is that patriotism in the hearts and minds of its sons, which will enable them to unite in taking up a great national question, free from the lowering and degrading tendency of party politics, which leads men to seek party and personal advantages at the cost of the country. When I opposed the construction of the line to the Sault, it was at a time when we had no line under construction from Thunder Bay to Red River; but the moment the Government was committed to the building of that line, it was our duty to look for means by which we could make it productive. What are those means? I have satisfied myself that the road, with its easy grade and cheap rate at which it will be able to bring down the products of the North-West, cannot possibly have a competitor. What would be the result of the extension of this road from Nipissing to the Sault Ste Marie? The distance from Montreal to Winnipeg via Chicago is 1,741 miles. But, suppose a road were built to the Sault, and a line was built to St. Paul along the south shore of Lake Superior, the distance by that route would be 1,563 miles. By Duluth, the shortest line to be obtained by way of the United States, would be 1,514 miles. From Montreal to Nipissing, and thence to Thunder Bay and on to Winnipeg, the distance would be 1,358 miles, while by the Sault Ste. Marie and water communication from Goulais Bay to Thunder Bay, it would be only 1,288 miles. I believe that with the character of our road, the cheapness with which we can bring the traffic of the North-West across it, there is no road, be it by way of Duluth or

St. Paul, that can compete with us. Therefore, I am glad that there is the prospect of seeing either the Canada Central or Pacific Junction carried through to the Sault, bringing our great North-West within sixty hours of Montreal, and Toronto 100 miles nearer, and that within a comparatively brief period. Those who will look at the Union Pacific Railway, and notice the enormous difficulties its builders had to contend with, will see ours is not a stupendous task. They had to go through a comparatively barren country compared with which ours is a garden. For more than a thousand miles they had to surmount heights of 4,500 feet above the level of the sea, while the passes through which we cross the Rocky Mountains are under 4,000. They have to go through a country where the snowfall in the passes reaches thirty feet, and where they have forty miles of snowsheds, to prevent trains from being buried. They have to pass through a country with steeper grades than we will have to encounter, and yet the road was built in the teeth of just such Parliamentary struggles as we are to-day obliged to endure. But, when constructed, the road silenced all opposition; and if, with a country which, according to a high American authority, embraces three-fourths of the remaining wheat zone on the American continent, if, with this advantage, and our other advantages, we hesitate in discharging our duty to the country, we should be unworthy of the position we occupy, either as statesmen or patriotic Canadians. No person can look abroad over the Dominion without feeling that the Great North-West Territory is the district to which we must look for our strength and development. Just as the older of the United States look to their Great North-West, with its rapidly increasing population, adding hundreds of thousands and millions to their strength, not only may we look for strength by reason of an additional Customs Revenue from the increased population of that Territory, but we must look upon that western country as a field for the manufacturing industries of the older and more settled parts of Canada. Every person acquainted with this country knows we have exhausted to some extent its bread-growing power, but under the National Policy that Canada has adopted, we must look forward not only to building up thriving centres of industries and enterprise all over this portion of the country, but to obtaining a market for those industries after they have been established; and I say where is there a greater market than that magnificent granary of the North-West, which, filled up with a thriving and prosperous population, will make its demands upon Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick for these manufacturing products that we, for many years, will be so well able to supply? I regret that hon. gentlemen opposite should have made this a battle ground of party. If there was a single question upon which the Government had a right to demand from hon. gentlemen opposite a hearty, cordial and unanimous support, it was on their endeavour to assume, and to deal with the responsibilities which they had placed upon the shoulders of the people of this country. I believe at the time they proposed their scheme they were doing an unwise and dangerous thing; but the improving times, the change that had come over the country, and the development of the North-West, had altered the position. At this moment the eyes of a large portion of the civilised world are centred upon the Great North-West of Canada, and hundreds of thousands of people in every foreign country, as well as the British Empire, are studying the question as to whether they shall come with their capital and industry and build up Canada into a great, prosperous and progressive country. Under these circumstances, hon. gentlemen opposite are unwise and unpatriotic in making this a battle ground of party. There was no necessity for it. I recognise, to the fullest extent, the advantage of having two great political parties grappling with each other, not on the low grounds of personal or party ambition, but on a great national question on which a broad line of demarcation can be made between them, and regarding which they can do battle for great principles on which they differ. We have such a question in the National Policy without dragging in the Pacific Railway. If we are defeated on that issue, hon. gentlemen opposite will take our places irrespective of the policy of the Pacific Railway. Having that line of demarcation between us, let us, on the great national question of the Canadian Pacific Railway, unite as a band of brothers, irrespective of old parties, show not that we are Liberals or Conservatives, but that we are Canadians, and that in every word that is uttered, whether we sit on the Treasury Benches or on the Opposition side of the House, we feel we owe it to Canada, to ourselves and to our children, to do all that men can do to strengthen the hands of those who are engaged in a great national enterprise, upon the success of which the rapid progress and prosperity of our common country depends.

MR. BLAKE: I shall endeavour to bring forward the amendment of which I have given notice, in the spirit which my hon. friend opposite indicated as correct in the opening portion of his remarks notwithstanding his failure to show that spirit in the course of his speech. I cannot agree with the hon. gentleman in the view that this question is to be degraded by its discussion as a party question. We hear a good deal of that sort of thing when one party takes a line of argument inconvenient to the other party. Those who adopt that position, in effect condemn the institution of party altogether. They seem to argue that legitimate party questions are such only as are inferior, or of small magnitude; and that great questions should be handled on some other and higher principles. If so, what is the justification for party at all? But they do not carry out their view to its legitimate result in any aspect; for a moment later the hon. gentleman himself said that there was a most important, a most vital question—the so-called National Policy—which he rejoiced was made the battle ground of party. I do not know any reason why we who claim to be as true Canadians as the hon. gentleman—we who have just as great a stake in Canada as he has, we who have our interests here, we who are just as proud and just as hopeful and trustful of the future of this country, if only prudence shall guide her destinies, as the hon. gentleman can be—why we, the Liberal party, should not be free to express our united opinion as to what the interests of our country demand; and it is because, in our opinion, it is desirable that a postponement of the Western

Section of the Pacific Railway should take place, that I propose to place my amendment in your hands. The line of address adopted by my hon. friend obliges me to go a little more minutely into what I may call the antiquities of this question than I had intended. I must now advert to these antiquities a little more in detail than I would have done, not so much to discuss them in their party aspect, or to ascertain the extent to which each party has become committed, one way or another, not so much to ascertain who was right and who was wrong in the past, not so much with a view to recrimination as to determine what, on the whole, has been the settled policy of Parliament on the subject of increasing the burdens of the people on account of the Pacific Railway. It was on the 1st of April (a fitting day), in the year 1871, that hon. gentlemen opposite, then as now controlling public affairs, carried an address of this House, praying that British Columbia might be united with Canada, on a stipulation to be included in the Terms of Union, that the Pacific Railway should be commenced within two years and finished in ten years. At that stipulation of the Terms of Union the Opposition, and other hon. members not in their ranks, expressed an honest, a genuine alarm. The Terms of Union were believed to be prodigal in all their aspects, and ruinous in particular, with reference to the Railway stipulation. The scheme met with earnest opposition on the part of many not belonging to the Liberal party. There were several divisions upon it, and in one of these it nearly met its fate, the majority which served it being only ten. My hon. friend from Dundas, a supporter of the Administration, moved that amendment which went to postpone the consideration of the question until the sense of the people could be taken upon it. The Government became alarmed lest they should not be able to carry the scheme, and they gave assurances that some resolutions would be brought forward, which might serve as a defence to their followers against the public indignation, which it was apprehended might be aroused by their assenting to the bargain. The Address then passed. This was on the 1st of April; and it was not until the 4th of April that there was a proposal made in the House for a definition of the liability for the construction of this Railway. The first proposal, made by Sir George Cartier in the absence of the then and now First Minister, and seconded by the present Finance Minister, was that the House would, on the following day, consider a resolution, "That the Railway should be constructed and worked as a private enterprise, and not by Government, and that the public aid to be given to the enterprise should consist of such liberal grants of land, and such subsidy in money or other aid not unduly pressing on the industry and resources of the Dominion, as the Parliament of Canada shall hereafter determine." This resolution was not satisfactory to the friends of the Government. It did not meet the exigencies of the case;—it was too elastic, too vague, it did not mean enough; and the consequence was that on the 11th of April, in substitution for that, a proposal was moved and seconded by the same hon. gentlemen in the same terms—with this exception, for the words "not unduly pressing upon the resources of Canada," the words "not increasing the present rate of taxation" were substituted. This was more precise. The alteration was made in order to satisfy the supporters of the Government, and if possible the people. The hon. the Minister of Railways asserts now, but I deny, that the Terms of Union were in form and fact modified by that resolution. During the debate, an hon. member of this House (Sir Antoine Dorion) moved an Address to Her Majesty praying her to incorporate the resolution into the Terms of Union. That motion was supported by the Liberal party, but was defeated by the votes of hon. gentlemen opposite, who insisted that no such resolution should be carried; that it would prevent the proposed Union, and deprive us of the inestimable blessings to flow from annexing British Columbia to this Dominion; and that the opportunity of so annexing that Province might be lost forever. The opportunity thus fairly offered to make that a condition of the Terms of Union was rejected by hon. gentlemen opposite. Well, I have always urged, and still urge, that the surrounding circumstances cannot be wholly ignored. Having regard to the fact that

delegates were here from British Columbia taking part in the discussion, having regard to the fact that the resolution was in a sense, though not officially, and as it is alleged without authority, recognised by them, I have always urged that British Columbia could not in equity and good conscience wholly ignore the resolution, but should remember that the Union was in fact obtained by means of the resolution; but I have been obliged to concede that she was not strictly and legally bound by the terms of that resolution, even if the work turned out to be such that its accomplishment would materially affect the interests of the Dominion, since the terms agreed to gave her, by the strict letter of the law, the right to insist that the work should be proceeded with, no matter what the consequences. She is entitled to say, "Here is my bond, I ask for my pound of flesh." There was then, subject to and not controlling the legal effect of the Terms of Union it is true, but still contemporaneous with them in 1871, a formal resolution declaratory of the desires and intentions of Parliament, that the work should not involve an increase in the taxation. The first Pacific Railway Act was passed in 1872, under the auspices of hon. gentlemen opposite. This Act recites the resolution against an increase in taxation and the propriety of carrying it out; and provides a limited quantity of land and money as the means. We were even then told that the remaining land would meet the money grant, which would cost us nothing. This was the second Parliamentary declaration against increased taxation for this object. The Government, in 1872, chartered a Company which deposited a million of money as security for the construction of the road. Subsequently the Company, which was dependent on the raising of foreign capital for its success, found that it could not obtain that capital without modified conditions, and asked for better terms, which the Government refused. It then proposed to surrender the charter, and receive back the million hard cash, which it had deposited in order to secure the fulfilment of its contract, and so sure were the Administration that they could make a better bargain with others, or so kindly disposed were they towards that particular Company, that they accepted the surrender of the charter, and returned the money that had been deposited. They met the House shortly after, in the fall of 1873, and they had already found that some other and different arrangements would have to be made to accomplish the construction of the Pacific Railway. The Government of that day acknowledged that their scheme, their plan, their act, their charter, under which the Company which they had favoured had been incorporated, were failures and they declared that a new plan, requiring new legislation, would be submitted to the House for providing means to carry out that great enterprise. The Speech from the Throne delivered in 1873, contains these words:

"The Canadian Pacific Company, to whom a Royal Charter was granted, have, I regret to say, been unable to make the financial arrangements necessary for the construction of that great undertaking. They have, therefore, executed a surrender of their charter, which has been accepted by me. You will, I trust, feel yourselves called upon to take steps to secure the early commencement and vigorous prosecution of that railway, and thus to carry out in good faith the arrangement made with the Province of British Columbia. A measure for that purpose will be submitted for your consideration."

What kind of measure? Circumstances to which, after the tone taken by the hon. gentleman, it would be ill-bred to allude, prevented the new proposition from being brought down. The reign of the gentlemen who promised that new scheme suddenly came to a termination. It is very well known, however, that the new idea was not in fact a new idea, that the idea of the First Minister, as he stated publicly in the county of Lennox in 1873, always had been the same, namely, that the work should be constructed as a Government work, and that it would, if he had been in Ottawa during the Session in which the arrangement had been made, have been so undertaken; but the pressure of the Opposition had been so great that his colleagues had yielded, and for their action he admitted he was responsible, though his own views remained the same, that the work should be constructed as a Government work. Then what was the new plan which has never seen the light? It must have been a measure for construction by the Government in accordance with the opinions of its chief. It was to be something different from the old plan. What other difference could there be? This proves that the cry of change of policy is not sincere. The new measure to be brought down must have been a change from construction by a company to construction by the Government. There is no other alternative. The Government resigned and the hon. member for Lambton assumed the position of First Minister. In his published address to the electors of Lambton, which stated the Ministerial policy on which the elections were held, my hon. friend declared that the bargain which had been made under the auspices of the late Government was one which could not be fulfilled. He stated that it would not do to commence the construction of the road until the country had been thoroughly surveyed, and that it would not do to prosecute the construction faster than the resources of the country would justify. He furthermore declared that application would be made to British Columbia for a relaxation of the terms which hon. gentlemen opposite had imposed upon the country; and for such an arrangement as would give a reasonable time for the commencement and performance of the work without too great a strain on our resources. The present First Minister denounced this as a breach of faith with British Columbia, entitling her to secede. So different were his views from those now advanced by the hon. Minister of Railways. Shortly after the elections, and after I had left the Government, a gentleman, formerly a member of this House (Mr. Edgar), was sent to British Columbia with a view of negotiating with that Province for a relaxation of the terms. The propositions were rejected or not accepted by the Government of British Columbia, and were withdrawn sometime in the month of June. Meantime the Session had been held, and a new Pacific Railway Act had been introduced. This second Act recited expressly all the previous resolutions against the increase of taxation. It recited that the taxation had been, to some extent increased in order to meet the obligations of the Dominion, and declared that it was proper to provide for the construction of the road as rapidly as the work could be accomplished without further raising the rate of taxation; and, the former scheme having failed and it being impossible now to assume that the road could be constructed by means of a company, power was given by the Government to build sections as a Government work; but the avowed and stated policy of the Administration was to use that power only for the purpose of doing some parts of the work in advance of the completion of the surveys for the through line; and it has been repeatedly explained, by my hon. friend, the member for Lambton, that his intention was, as soon as the surveys were completed, to submit the whole of the road to tender, on a land and money basis, the contractors taking over, as cash on account, the works meantime executed by the Government. It was a scheme devised to make progress where, and so far as progress could be made consistently with the resolution against increased taxation. The Minister has complained that there was no reiteration of the declaration that the road should be built only by a company, but there was contained in the Act a power to do the work by means of a company. At any rate it was unnecessary to reiterate that. My belief is that it would have been contrary to the policy which the present First Minister believed to be sound when he announced his views in Lennox, in 1873. I maintain that, by that Act, which repeated and re-enacted the old resolutions, and declared it was proper to proceed only consistently with the provision against increased taxation, there was a reiteration of the old Parliamentary policy, then reaffirmed for the third time, that the road was not to be constructed on any plan which would cause increased taxation. I well remember that the hon. member for Victoria, B.C., (Mr. DeCosmos) objected to the introduction of that provision into that Act, because he conceived it would be in derogation of the bond, the fulfilment of which he so much desired. In 1875, during the recess, British Columbia having appealed to England, Lord Carnarvon offered his good offices, and he suggested certain terms, to which, as far as they could, the Government agreed; the statement of the Government being that they would do their best to carry them out, as they were not contrary to the spirit of any Parliamentary resolution, or the letter of any enactment.

The Government subsequently declared that this expression was designed to indicate that they were not intending to attempt to transcend the taxation resolution. It is contended that they could do so, and that they did in fact so bind the country by their action, although Parliament never confirmed it. I altogether deny that the executive Government has any general or implied authority of a nature so extensive; but were it otherwise, no such authority could be implied in the face of a distinct determination by Parliament in an adverse sense; nor can any case be imagined in which there could be a more decisive declaration by Parliament of its policy that there should be no increase of taxation for the building of this Railway; and consequently a more clear limitation upon any such supposed implied executive powers as are suggested. The Minister says that under the Carnarvon terms there was an agreement to build the Island Railway, by which $4,000,000 were added to the cost of the whole; but he seems to have forgotten that his own Government in 1873 had come to the determination that the terminus of the Railway should be at Esquimalt, and this determination, if adhered to, necessarily involved the construction of the Island Railway, and indeed of other far more extensive and costly works. I had taken occasion in the fall of 1874 to declare my individual views on the subject of the Pacific Railway. I then stated that I thought the fulfilment of the agreement with British Columbia impossible; that unless she chose to be reasonable and to agree to a relaxation of the terms, I saw no hope of performing them; and that, if she insisted on secession, as the consequence of the non-fulfilment of the terms of Union, I, for one, was prepared to say, "let her go," rather than ruin the country in the attempt to perform the impossible. I have never changed that opinion, and each succeeding year has strengthened my view as to the wisdom and soundness of such a decision. During the Session of 1875, when the Carnarvon correspondence was brought down, I did, as the hon. gentleman says, ask the leader of the then Government whether he proposed to invite the sanction of Parliament to the arrangement. He replied that he did not propose to invite the action of Parliament directly, but that he would rely on Parliament to enable him to carry it out. Well, that answer of itself indicated that the assent of Parliament was essential. Will anyone seriously contend that the Executive Government of this country could, not merely without the authority of Parliament, but in spite of the anti-taxation resolution, make an agreement which would of itself bind the country to build the Island Railway, to expend not less than $2,000,000 a year on construction in the mainland, and to finish the road by 1890? It was, however, soon made apparent that the action of Parliament was necessary in order to carry out the Carnarvon terms. A Bill was of necessity brought in to authorise the construction of the Island Railway, one of the most important parts of those terms. I opposed that Bill because I believed that the Island Railway was not a judicious undertaking, and also, and chiefly because it was part of the Carnarvon Terms, which I did not believe were such as could be fully carried out consistently with the taxation resolution, to which I for one was determined to adhere. The Bill succeeded in this House, but it failed in the Senate, and the result was that the sanction of Parliament was refused to that essential part of the Carnarvon terms. At the close of that Session then the whole question was open. The arrangement had failed. Parliament had declined to authorise an essential part of the terms; fulfilment of the terms had thus become impossible, and it became necessary to reconsider the whole matter. I believe that everyone to-day concurs in this result; at any rate I do not observe that the Government now proposes to build the Island Railway. Shortly after the close of the Session I entered the Administration upon a distinct understanding in reference to the Pacific Railway. That understanding was that the Carnarvon terms having failed by reason of the action of Parliament, a moderate money compensation should be offered to the Province for past and future delays in the construction of the Pacific Railway; that it was always the understanding of the Government and that it should be distinctly stated, that any pledge for fixed expenditure, or for a time limit, was subject to the taxation resolution, in such sort that the work should not be necessarily proceeded with in case it would involve an increase of taxation; and, that any arrangement made with the Province should be expressly, as it must in fact be, subject to the sanction of this Parliament. This understanding was carried out by the Minute of Council of September, 1875. By that minute, referring to the former negotiations, the Government declared as follows:—

“It must be distinctly borne in mind that, every step in the negotiations was necessarily predicated on and subject to the conditions of the resolution of 1871, passed contemporaneously with the adoption of the terms of Union with British Columbia, subsequently enacted in the Act of 1872, and re-enacted (after a large addition had been made to the rate of taxation) in the Act of 1874, that the public aid should consist of such subsidy in money, not increasing the then existing rate of taxation, as Parliament should determine. This determination not to involve the country in a hopeless burden of debt is sustained by public opinion everywhere throughout the Dominion, and must necessarily control the action of the Government, and it cannot be too clearly understood that any agreements as to yearly expenditure, and as to completion by a fixed time, must be subject to the condition, thrice recorded in the Journals of Parliament, that no further increase in the rate of taxation shall be required in order to their fulfilment. The sanction of Parliament to the construction of the proposed railway from Esquimalt to Nanaimo was necessarily a condition precedent to the commencement of the work. The other important features of the arrangement, namely, the limitation of the time for the completion of a certain portion, and the specification of a yearly expenditure, were deemed to be within the meaning of the Act of 1874, subject, of course, to the condition already mentioned, which was referred to in the minute of December, 1874, when the Government expressed ‘a willingness to make these further concessions * * * as the concessions suggested might be made without involving the violation of the spirit of any Parliamentary resolution, or the letter of any enactment.’”

The Government added a proposal of $750,000 as compensation for delays. British Columbia rejected the proposal, and insisted on the fulfilment of the Carnarvon terms; she urged that the increase of taxation which had taken place in 1874, and the Railway Act of that year involved an abandonment of the resolution of 1871, by which she contended that she was never bound. On the 13th March, 1876, the Government rejoined by a minute in which they showed that the resolution of 1871 was not abandoned, but was re-enacted; in which they admitted that it was not part of the Terms of Union in form, as they would have desired, but argued that it could not be wholly left out of account. The minute added that “the people of Canada would not consent to enter unconditionally into arrangements which though less onerous than the Terms of Union would yet involve such a burden as might but for the condition plunge the country into ruin.” The Government made no further proposal, but ended the negotiations by stating that, British Columbia having refused their offer of September, 1875, “it remains only to endeavour to construct the Railway as rapidly as the resources of the country would permit.” These minutes were dispatched to the Secretary of State for the Colonies, and also to British Columbia. During the Session of 1876, a vote, hostile to the policy of the Government, and seeking to condemn it for delay in the work, was proposed by the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. DeCosmos). It was voted down with practical unanimity, the hon. member obtaining but six or seven supporters. I think all the present Ministers voted against it; and the present First Minister both spoke and voted against it, declaring that the conduct of the hon. member for Victoria in insisting as he did on the fulfilment of the terms gave very good colour and reason for the charge contained in the minute of the Government that the action of British Columbia seemed more influenced by the desire to see many millions expended in their midst, than by the wish that the enterprise should be carried on consistently with the interests, and according to the resources of the country. Later during the Session the correspondence to which I have referred was brought down, and the House became possessed through these minutes of the declaration of the policy of the Government, and of the whole statement of the case. The House was made aware of the decision of the executive not to make any further effort to obtain the authority of Parliament for the construction of the Island Railway, and of their solemn declaration that they had not intended in the former negotiations, did not then intend, and would not agree, to make any unconditional agreements, to make any agreements otherwise than subject to the taxation resolution. With this knowledge we came to the discussion of the vote in supply for the construction of the Pacific Railway, and to that vote it was proposed to add words declaring that the grant was made "with the view that the arrangements for the construction of the Railway shall be such as the resources of the country will permit without increasing the existing rates of taxation." That vote was moved after the occurrence of all the events to which the hon. the Minister of Railways has alluded as imposing such dreadful responsibilities upon him and his friends. He has not indeed spoken consistently upon this point, for after all these events, after the making of these terms by which he alleged we were more tightly bound than by those of the Union, he declared to-night in one part of his speech that, we were obliged by them to do what? to finish by 1890? No! he says he does not hold himself bound to do that. To spend $2,000,000 a year? No! he says he does not hold himself bound to do that. To build the Island Railway? No! he does not even propose to do that: so that while the hon. gentleman at one breath cries out: "I am bound!" "I am bound!" "I am bound!" like himself, he turns round the next moment and exclaims: "I am free!" "I am free!" "I am free!" But, Sir, after all these entangling negotiations, after all these chains and fetters had been wound round this unhappy country by the late unfortunate Administration, it had prior to the vote of 1876, fully declared its meaning; it had taken its stand, it had declared that it would not recede from or abandon the Parliamentary policy of the now increase of taxation. And the vote to which I have alluded, was, under these circumstances carried, not by a party majority, but by a united House. The vote was 149 to 10; among the majority were a large number of members and supporters of the present Government. I find in the majority four of the present Ministers, Messrs. Langevin, Masson, Bowell and Baby. I find there also, many active members of the party including you, Sir, Messrs. Cameron, of Victoria; Caron, Costigan, Desjardins, Haggart, Kirkpatrick, McCallum, Mousseau, Orton, Ouimet, Plumb, Robinson, Rochester, and White; besides many others; in all forty-two, out of the small contingent which, at that time represented the Tory party in this House. We were on that occasion nearly unanimous. In that year, 1876, long after the making and failure of the Carnarvon terms, and after the Government had fully declared its meaning and its policy, this House was almost unanimous in favour of the view that the country was entitled to say, and was bound to say, and we did in the name of the country say that the arrangements for the construction of the road should be such as the resources of the country would permit without increasing the existing rates of taxation. This is the fourth vote recorded by Parliament in the same sense. Now, I claim that I have proved that apart from the serious, the dreadful, I hope not the fatal error of 1871, in declining to engraft upon the terms of Union this limitation—an error for which the Liberal party is not responsible, because it did its best to avert it; that apart from that error the continuous and unvarying policy of Parliament was before, and after, and notwithstanding the Carnarvon Terms that this road should not be so constructed as to necessitate any increase of taxation. What happened after the Session of 1876? The surveys had been prosecuted; some contracts were let, some progress was made. The Session of 1877 arrived. Was there any proposal from the Opposition declaring that we should proceed faster with the work, anything to alter the view taken in 1876? Nothing! The Session of 1878 followed with the same result, nor did aught occur to shake the deliberate, solemn and repeatedly affirmed declaration of Parliament on this subject. But, meantime, further progress was made, and to some enquiries the Government answered that it hoped to be able shortly to advertise for tenders for the whole work on the land and money basis, subject to the approval of Parliament. It was the policy of the Government at the earliest moment at which the condition of the surveys would permit, to take that step, and so to give a fair trial to the plan, the only plan by which the road could be constructed in any short time without increasing the rate of taxation; and if that trial failed, it was obvious the whole question must be opened afresh for consideration, and that it would be the duty of the Government to consider of a new policy. Well, an advertisement was issued in May, 1878, I believe, for tenders for the whole line upon the land and money basis, and subsequently, I believe in August, for the construction of the middle part of the eastern link, I think in three sections, and also for the line from Yale to Kamloops. I had then long ceased to be a member of the Government, was not even in the country, and knew nothing about the matter until a few months ago. Of course, it follows that I am not able to say anything on the subject of my own knowledge. My hon. friend (Mr. Mackenzie) has already stated the circumstances under which that advertisement was issued, with a view, while yet the tenders were being asked for the construction of the whole line upon the land and money basis, to obtain all the information possible, on all alternative plans, so as to be able to present it to Parliament with such policy as the Government might ultimately determine upon. But it would have been a radical change in the policy of the Government as announced—as the people of this country, certainly as I understood it—had the Government, after the receipt of these tenders, proposed to Parliament the construction of the 125 miles in British Columbia as a Government work; and if they had proposed it, the hon. the Minister of Railways would have found me, as he complains I sometimes was, restive again. I would have declared it was impossible in my view to carry out any such policy consistently with the former resolutions, and I would have opposed it, with what effect I know not, but with what earnestness I could. I find then nothing proving an alteration of policy on the part of the Government or of Parliament on this question until the Session of 1879. Then, indeed, there was a change. The new Government having been formed in the meantime, the grand proposal of last Session was brought forward. The hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) says, he is going to give us another batch of resolutions, and he read us some of these high-flown resolutions he brought down last Session. They indicate the character of the work in the view of the hon. gentleman, the relations of this country as well as the relations of the Empire to the work, and the mode in which alone it can be successfully prosecuted. The first declares that an engagement was entered into with British Columbia, but it says nothing of any engagement with the Imperial Government or Lord Carnarvon, now so much talked about, to construct the road Not, however, by any specified time; on the contrary, I find the Government by this resolution declaring the contract to be, that the line should be constructed with all practicable speed. Next, there is a declaration that the Canada Pacific Railway will be a great Imperial highway, and so forth. Then there is a declaration about the unprecedented state of enforced idleness of the British working classes, and the possibility of a scheme of relief on a large scale being found indispensable to alleviate the destitution. The hon. gentleman, not content with taking charge of the suffering thousands of Canadians, and relieving by his legislation all the misfortunes under which our poor 4,000,000 are labouring, in the largeness of his heart, and the magnitude of his resources, took charge of the unemployed poor of England; and by his wit, and that of the Imperial Government together, this great scheme of outdoor relief—so far outdoors as the North-West—was to be carried out for the relief of the destitution of the suffering poor in Great Britain. Then the resolution introduced the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, which was to afford immediate employment to a vast number of workmen, open up vast tracts of fertile land for occupation, and thus form a ready outlet for the overpopulated districts of Great Britain and other European countries. And the Government is authorised and directed to procure the substantial assistance of the Imperial Government by guaranty or otherwise towards the execution of the project as a national work; and a hundred millions of acres of land are set apart for the purpose of supplying funds. Then there is a resolution to alter the route; an arrangement for building a short extension from Selkirk, and a proposition that it is expedient to make further explorations in the Peace and Pine River districts; then there is a declaration that in the opinion of the House the selection of the Burrard Inlet terminus was premature; upon which I shall say no more, than that if in the year 1878, with all the information that was then obtained, it was premature to decide that Burrard Inlet should be the terminus, how premature was it for hon. gentlemen opposite to decide that Esquimalt should be the terminus in 1873? That is the problem, the arithmetical calculation, which I shall desire the hon. gentleman to answer. The hon. gentleman laughs at it. We know that whenever the hon. First Minister hears an awkward question he turns it off with a laugh, but it will be admitted that the hon. member for Lambton, and the House and the country knew more in 1878 about what should be the terminus than any one could know in 1873. Therefore, if it was not premature to select Esquimalt in 1873, it could not be premature to select another terminus in 1878. Then there is a resolution that it is necessary to keep good faith with British Columbia; and then there is a provision, the sting of which is in the tail. The 14th resolution declares that the Government be authorised to make further explorations, and to enter into contracts for constructing a portion of the line in Columbia not exceeding 125 miles in length without the further sanction of Parliament. Here for the first time do we find the policy of building a railway in British Columbia as a Government work brought down by the Government for the consideration of Parliament and adopted by Parliament. Well, on what was it that this part of the Government policy was based? On what was it that the House was asked to hurry into an engagement to commence, as a Government work, 125 miles in British Columbia? Was it upon something old or upon something new? Was it upon something fresh? Yes. The hon. gentleman pointed out that there were hundreds of thousands of unemployed poor in England. He referred to their misery and destitution, he said it would be necessary for the English Government to provide some means for their relief. He pointed to what he was going to do in England. Both he and his colleagues declared that the scheme possessed certain elements of success. The first Minister declared it must and would succeed. He said that they would go home; that they would enlist the sympathies of the Imperial Government; that they would obtain the co-operation which they solicited, and which this House authorised them to obtain, the Imperial aid, by guarantee or otherwise, towards the construction of this line. They went home, and, like other people who have gone home, they came back again. But, Sir, although we heard a great deal of some matters they transacted, although the Finance Minister's loans, and the Minister of Railway's purchases of rails were told to us over and over again, until we got more tired than ever of discussing the rate of interest upon loans and the price of steel-rails—although, I say, these proofs of financial and commercial ability were discussed ad nauseam, not a word was heard upon the great mission—upon the principal point. What in the world is the difference whether we get one-half per cent. more or less on a loan of a few million dollars? What in the world is the difference whether we buy steel-rails at $24.40 or $25.40 compared with the other question? Very important things both; but what in the world do we care about these questions compared with that of obtaining a sound and solid basis of Imperial aid for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway? We have heard a great deal of the mint and the anise and the cumin, but of the weightier matters of the law very little indeed. Now, why this silence? We have endeavoured to elicit information on the subject. I, myself, ventured to put a question or two, I endeavoured to draw out the hon. gentleman on the Address, and subsequently by a question, but still there was silence. We authorised the Government to proceed to England to accomplish a most important work, but not a word is told of the result. Something, indeed, was told. Oh, yes. We asked whether any arrangement had been made, any promise had been given, and we were told there had not. Some person asked the same question in the Imperial Parliament, and the answer was the same. But, to-night, we are told that these Ministers at home are diplomatic, that there was in effect a secret understanding, that they were deeply interested—O, so deeply interested—in this matter. The Minister is now able to state this fact, perhaps—may I venture to suggest—with greater confidence than he would have done before the late elections. He says, indeed, that the British Government did not want to be handicapped at those elections by any promise. But, Sir, if this scheme for relieving unemployed Britons by sending them out to our North-West was to be an advantage for the British people, why should it be unpopular? Why not proclaim it on every hustings? Why not make it a battle cry in the elections? But, the hon. gentleman says that would not do; the people were not to know. It was like a certain arrangement which was agreed to in this part of the world, with reference to this same Pacific Railway, which "should be kept quiet until after the elections." It is now, however, alleged that there was a bargain. Well, it seems to me that the hon. gentleman's plans in England, under these circumstances, failed. It was because the hon. gentleman found that it would be useless for him to communicate officially that he has nothing to give us. It was because his informal and confidential communications resulted unfavourably, that as Sir Michael Hicks-Beach says, there was nothing put on paper, and the hon. gentlemen came back here with no more assurances than they had before they left Canada. This we know because the hon. gentleman has made a statement to us on the subject, he has told us what his expectations are. He has told us the resolutions he is going to bring down. There is to be a resolution modifying the plan for the sale of the lands. Instead of selling them at $2 an acre all round, they have adopted another plan, and want to modify this resolution accordingly. But we hear nothing about further resolutions touching Imperial aid. Still, the hon. gentleman says he had many conferences with politicians and capitalists, and the Finance Minister made complete arrangements for all the funds that may be required for the completion of the Pacific Railway from sea to sea, so that, as fast as he wants it, he can get the money, provided we give him authority to raise the taxes required to pay principal and interest. He says also that the prospect of an Imperial guarantee from Mr. Forster, if he is to be the new Colonial Secretary, are quite as good as were the prospects of a guarantee by the Beaconsfield Government. That may be so, and I dare say it is so; but the reason given by the hon. gentleman was a speech which Mr. Forster had delivered at the Colonial Institute. My hon. friend's memory is of that character of which memories often are. He remembered what was agreeable, and forgot what was painful. He remembered well Mr. Forster's diplomatic suggestion, that "he was not sure that it might not be advisable for the Government to be very liberal in these matters," and he turns that into a promise. But as to the quid pro quo, Free-trade with Britain, which Mr. Forster suggests the hon. gentleman utterly forgot all about that. Mr. Forster says that the liberality must not be all on one side; that it is not fair to ask the Mother Country for assistance, and then to throw obstacles, by means of Protection, in the way of their disposing of their manufactures in the Colonies. Well, I will say, frankly, that if the arrangement for aid from the Imperial Government should turn out to be one for a guarantee only, I am not at all certain it would be a blessing to this country that the guarantee should be obtained. It is true the guarantee would enable us to raise money at a lower rate than that at which we are raising it. It is true, also, that it might enable us to raise money which we could not raise at all without the guarantee. But it will not help us to pay the money we borrow; and I do not think it always a convenient thing to have facilities for borrowing money, unless we see also that there are commensurate facilities for repaying it. The explorations which the Government took authority to make, resulted in a report by the Chief Engineer, in which he suggested that they were so far favourable to the northerly route as to render it improper to commence at that time construction in British Columbia, and expedient to make further explorations. The Government, however, decided adversely to that view, and determined to finally adopt the route to Burrard Inlet. Now, even with all the haste that was used in reaching this decision, it had become impossible at that time to fulfil the arrangements, on the basis of which Parliament had been asked to authorise the letting of these contracts without its sanction. That basis was, that the work should be commenced in British Columbia, in 1879. But tenders were not called for till near the end of 1879. The first contracts were not let till December of that year, and the last was not let until the 10th February, 1880, two days before the meeting of this Parliament; so that, for several reasons, the grounds upon which the hon. gentleman had asked Parliament to give him special authority, had failed. They had failed in this, that the construction could not be commenced until after Parliament was in Session, and, therefore, there was no ground for the action; they had failed in this that no inconvenience or delay would be caused by waiting for the assent of Parliament. Another ground on which the authority given by Parliament ought not to have been exercised, is this: the House was led into the adoption of the series of resolutions in which this authority is contained on the statement made by the Government as to the certainty of their success in obtaining Imperial aid. They wholly failed in that; the basis for the authority disappeared, and, therefore, the course they pursued in using the authority was in this as well as the other particulars censurable. Again, the report of the Chief Engineer justified, and in fact rendered proper further investigation before fixing on the route. This contract which they have let without the sanction of Parliament will reach, according to the estimate, $9,100,000, and with the rolling-stock, rails, etc., the line will cost certainly not less than $10,000,000, according to the tenders. That is the estimate, I observe, from the hon. Minister's statement, which the Chief Engineer now makes with reference to the contract. The hon. Minister observed that he had adopted an entirely different practice from that of his predecessor with reference to the letting of contracts. He said the contracts on the eastern end had been let on imperfect surveys and inadequate information, which had resulted in great loss and in the disappointment of expectations which had been formed. He, however, undertook to pursue a different course, to secure complete investigation and absolute certainty, as far as certainty can be obtained in these matters, as a preliminary to the letting of his contracts, and I think the rule he laid down was an excellent one. I think the fullest information ought to be obtained in the interests of the country, with reference to the character of the work, and so forth, before the work is let. We know the reasons which induced such departure as was made from this custom in the earlier days of letting this work, when the hon. member for Cumberland, then in Opposition, cheered the then First Minister when he announced his intention of at once letting the contracts. If the principle which the hon. Minister so ostentatiously put forward as governing his action was specially applicable anywhere, that point was British Columbia. But how far the hon. gentleman's practice on this matter conformed with his pretensions is to be found in the memorandum to the schedules for the Columbia section, which were submitted for the information of intending tenderers. There will be found there a note in these words:

"Some of the quantities are estimated from preliminary location measurements, and may be considered roughly approximate. Other items are merely conjectural, and are placed herein for the purpose of obtaining rates."

This was the thorough, exhaustive, minute and detailed survey; this was the accurate information which the hon. gentleman got before he let the Yale-Kamloops contract! Some of the estimates are simply roughly approximate! Others are merely conjectural and are placed for the purpose of obtaining rates! As to the eastern contracts, if I am rightly informed, there was no information of any material consequence in the hon. gentleman's hands which was not in the hands of the hon. member for Lambton before he left office.

Mr. PLUMB: Section 15?

Mr. BLAKE: If my hon. friend will allow me to continue, he will soon have an opportunity to enliven the House with one of his short speeches. It may be permitted to a person who has not gone over the ground, who has not even made a preliminary location measurement, who has not even made a conjectural estimate of the items, to make a conjecture in the gross, based upon former experience, based on former reports, based upon what is known of other sections of the Railway, and from what has happened as to other roads, based on the general experience of the world in reference to estimates of this description; and my conjecture is that this road is as likely as not, instead of costing $10,000,000 to cost $12,000,000 or more. The contracts, however, provide, as the hon. gentleman as said, that the Government may suspend operations if the vote is expended at any time, or in case the public interest requires, a suspension of the work, and may in such case cancel the contract; and that in no case will the contractor be entitled to damages by reason of loss of profits, but only to expenses incurred in connection with the collection of material and work already done. The Georgian Bay branch contract was lately cancelled by the Government under similar provisions. The hon. gentleman has stated that he expects the expenditure next year on this work will not exceed $1,000,000, but, although possibly no more than $1,000,000 may be expended the first year, yet it is certain, according to the estimate formed of ten millions, and if the work is to be carried out according to the terms of the contract, which provides for its completion in five years, that an average of two millions a year will be required, and if we are going to expend only $1,000,000 next year, this means that there will be a larger amount expended relatively in the following years. Roughly, we are involved by this contract in an average expenditure of $2,000,000 a year for the next five years, and if the road costs $12,000,000, then $2,400,000 a year for the same time will be required. The hon. gentleman has said that the road, which is in the middle of British Columbia, will be a pretty good thing. It starts, it is true, at a point from which the ocean is accessible by light steamers; it runs a considerable distance into the interior, but, as far as I can observe, considering the condition of the country, its population, its capabilities for early settlement, this may be said of it, that it begins nowhere, ends nowhere, and will serve no earthly purpose. I quite agree that in the construction of the Pacific Railway as a through line, by the Burrard Inlet route, this might have been the best point to commence at, but I am speaking of it as it is. The hon. gentleman has prepared a map, which he laid on the Table in the course of his speech, as showing what recent explorations convince him is the state of the country, with reference to its capacity for settlement. Without turning at this time to that portion which affects the North-West, I would desire the particular attention of my hon. friend the member for Vancouver, to that portion of the map which represents the Province of British Columbia. The hon. member will observe that the parts which are marked brown are barren and unfit for anything. The parts left white embrace certain small tracts in which people may find a living. The hon. Minister, in the early part of the evening, insulted my hon. friend by calling his country inhospitable, and my hon. friend will see what a double insult is conveyed in his laying on the Table a map showing the bulk of the Province unfit for settlement.

MR. BUNSTER: I would like to ask my hon. friend if he did not have that map coloured on purpose.

MR. BLAKE: My hon. friend no doubt believes that I am the only person who would have ventured to produce such a map. But it is not my map. It is the map of the hon. Minister of Railways, who has done the hon. member for Vancouver "brown." It is not to be supposed, however, that all this white ground is available for white men. There is a large portion of the land even there, which the hon. the Minister of Railways, in the early portion of the evening, rightly called inhospitable. For example, the northern part of the tract left white is useless, in consequence of climatic influences. Although there are some portions of land in it, which are rich enough to be cultivated, yet the climate prevents their being settled, but in the lower portion there is a little land capable of settlement, as the hon. gentleman has said. At the delta of the Fraser River, there are some 400,000 acres of land capable of settlement, though I believe some of it requires dyking in order to make it useful. East of the Fraser River there are 640,000 acres, or 1,000 square miles, at the outside, according to the statement in the official report, of land capable of settlement; and west of the Fraser River there are 192,000 acres, if so small a quantity is worth mentioning. There is of arable land 1,200,000 acres, not altogether, but in three divisions, and each of these is broken by hills, valleys and rivers, so that the country can only become a few small detached settlements at best. Let me read you an extract from the report of Mr. Marcus Smith, your Assistant-Chief-Engineer, made in 1879, and brought down the other day; he says:

“From the River Pembina westward across the Rocky Mountains, and by a chain of valleys to Fort Hope the distance is 605 miles, of this only 92 miles traverse a country fit for settlement, being the central plateau, or bunch-grass belt between the Rocky and Cascade Mountains.

“A breadth of seventy miles on each side of the line would include Lac La Hache and the settlements of the Lilloet District on the west, those of Lakes Okanagan and Shuswam on the east, and embrace an area of about 12,000 square miles, on which it is estimated there are about 200 farms taken up, and the white population is about 1,000. About one-tenth of the arable land is under cultivation, but the grazing land is nearly occupied and supports 20,000 to 25,000 head of cattle, a considerable number of horses and sheep.

“If the whole of the arable land of this area were put under cultivation the total produce would probably not exceed that of an average county in Ontario. On the balance of the 605 miles the country would not support a white population of more than a few hundreds. The cost of constructing this division of the line would be heavy, probably not less than $50,000,000.”

MR. DECOSMOS: What is the exact size of an average county in Ontario?

MR. BLAKE: I do not know the exact size, but as the hon. gentleman interrupts me, I will read the hon. gentleman's own statement made in debate on the subject of this line. It gives some valuable information. The hon. gentleman says this—I read from the Official Debates for 1877:

“The First Minister had referred to the valuable land on Fraser River. As a fact, however, there were not perhaps over 400 square miles, or 256,000 acres of valuable arable land along the whole river, from Yale to the mouth of the Fraser. In farms and population there, they did not exceed the farming population in his own district, and were far behind that which existed in the district of his hon. friend from Vancouver (Mr. Bunster); but what was there from Yale to the mouth of Burrard Inlet to support a railway? There was nothing in the district to support a railway, so far as at present known; and when they reached the Yale canyon there were sixty odd miles of canyon to get through, which was nothing but a vast ditch, cut by the water coursing through for ages; there was nothing there, unless mineral wealth was found in the mountains, which were walled up on each side. Next, they had to go forty miles beyond before they found anything but some high grazing land, and away down in the bottom, along the Thompson, some patches of land that could only be cultivated by irrigation. After forty miles more, at the end of Kamloops Lake, they found a high, rolling, grazing country and a few farmers. The population of that country has not increased 50 per cent. within the last ten years. When they reached Kamloops they found a delightful point, from which open lands, but narrow, stretched along the north fork of the Thompson for twenty miles beyond; it was comparatively worthless and, unless mineral wealth were found from Tête Jeune Cache to that spot, it could not be considered as sufficient to invite the Government to construct a railway in that direction. If the Government was determined to bring a railway by Tête Jeune Cache and Kamloops to Burrard Inlet, he alleged, not only from a Dominion point of view, financially speaking, with respect to the cost and receipts of the railway, but in the interests of commerce, in the interests of the industry of their Province, that the line of railway could not be made a success by the best administration of the country. The sole and whole reason was that they could not make a way traffic. It was simply following a ditch or ditches through the country, and was not calculated to make a way traffic or aid in the gaining a large share of the trans-Pacific traffic.”

MR. DECOSMOS: What I ask is, what is the size of an average-size county in Ontario?

MR. BLAKE: As I have said before I am not able to state the exact size of an average county in Ontario.

MR. BUNSTER: Who made that statement the hon. gentleman has just read?

MR. BLAKE: It was the hon. member for Victoria. Well, Sir, we are to have this road for 125 miles lying in this ditch that the hon. member speaks of, with no means of placing there a population sufficient to create a traffic. The hon. the Minister of Railways talks of placing there within four or five years, a population of 100,000. Why, it could not be done, and if it was done they would starve.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: It was the Globe that said such a population could be put there.

MR. BLAKE: And does the hon. gentleman agree with that?

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: Yes.

MR. BLAKE: I tell the hon. gentleman that he could not do it. If such a population went there within the time he names they would stay there as bones, not as living men.

MR. McINNES: I would say here—

MR. BLAKE: To judge from the number of gentlemen who are continually interrupting, one would think there must be a great many men in British Columbia; the only one who at all observes the proprieties of debate is the senior member for Victoria (Sir John A. Macdonald). I have said, Sir, and in that I am happy to agree with my hon. friend from Victoria (Mr. DeCosmos), that I do not find that the resources of the country in question are likely to make the proposed work profitable. There is indeed some chance that the line will not be required to be kept open after it is built, and we shall thus save the running expenses. The running expenses depend upon the traffic. If the traffic is heavy, then, of course, we shall have adequate returns, but if it be light, we shall have heavy running expenses without returns, for there must be in that isolated region, machine shops; all arrangements for making, or at any rate for repairing locomotives and cars, a staff and so forth, if the road is to be run at all. The engineers, taking the Intercolonial Railway as a guide, have estimated the running expenses of working the 125 miles at $295,000. If there is hardly any traffic it will not cost so much. But we cannot hope to escape altogether from running expenses, which will, of course, include renewals and repairs, though I fancy the item of renewals to rails will not be a heavy one. Our annual payments therefore, in respect of that railway after construction, will be considerable. The interest on the cost of construction at $10,000,000 will be an annual burden of $500,000, or if the line costs $12,000,000, $600,000, to which may be added a loss in running expenses of perhaps $150,000 a year, or more, making a total annual charge of from $750,000 to $850,000 a year. But that is not all, nor the chief part of the burden, because this line is proposed to be constructed, not as an isolated transaction—not as a complete thing in itself—not as the end of the expenditure in British Columbia, but only as the commencement. It is but a pledge; it is but a hostage for the many other millions to be expended there. We hear, indeed, nothing now of an Island Railway, except the suggestion of the Minister of Railways to-night, that a line eight miles long might be necessary to get beyond the reach of the guns of St.

Juan. But apart from this we hear nothing, and I think the judgment of the country has so far condemned that project as to render its revival impossible. But for the mainland we are to deal with a proposal to build a long and very costly line. We have a new set of estimates brought down to-night. This is not the first or second set—it is at any rate the third set. Before I deal with them in the gross, I wish to refer to one fact which proves, plainly, that they are the second set brought down this Session. The other side had a sort of preliminary skirmish on this question on the motion of the hon. member for North Norfolk, on the land policy of the Government. The hon. First Minister then said it was inconvenient to discuss the Pacific Railway policy of the Government on that occasion; that this should be postponed, till the general debate now going on; but you will have noticed that he immediately proceeded to discuss and expound it. The hon. gentleman declared that the expenditure in connection with the Pacific Railway, up the 30th June next, would be about $15,000,000. We know that the expenditure up to December last, largely exceeded $14,000,000, and I think the estimate of $15,000,000, up to the 30th June, is perfectly fair. It will be in the memory of the House that he stated that from 30th June next, the expenditure would be $10,000,000 a year for the next two years, and $5,000,000 a year for the following eight years. This will make a total expenditure of $60,000,000 to be made after the thirtieth of June next, or of $75,000,000 adding the $15,000,000 already spent. This statement was not made recklessly. It was made after due deliberation, of set purpose, as a deliberate declaration of the policy of the Government, on the highest authority; and the hon. Finance Minister on the following day confirmed it, declaring that it was based on Mr. Fleming's figures. To-day, the hon. Minister of Railways states that the whole expenditure, including the past $15,000,000, will be under $65,000,000. He has seen the First Minister, or those behind him, and goes ten millions better. There is a change of over $10,000,000 between the deliberate estimate of last week and the final estimate of this week. I would like to know where this ten millions has gone. I would like to see the details of these varying estimates, because they are on the whole surprising to those who have been forming their opinions on the detailed statements made in published reports by responsible officials. There are 550 miles of a very difficult road to build, from Jasper House to Port Moody. For a part only of that road, for the 493 miles between the Divide and Port Moody, Mr. Fleming's estimate was about $36,000,000. The estimate of Mr. Smith was $36,500,000, and the estimate of Mr. Cambie was, I think, $31,000,000. But the average estimate of the Chief and Assistant Engineer may be said to be over $36,000,000 for this 493 miles, which would run up the 550 miles to $40,000,000; and now it is said that the 550 miles, composed of this 493 miles and of 57 additional miles of inexpensive road, can be built for $30,000,000, a difference of $10,000,000. You add more than one-sixth to the mileage, and you subtract more than one-sixth from the cost. If so, the part is greater than the whole. I may be permitted to doubt a little whether a large part of the $10,000,000 which has disappeared in a week from the cost of the Pacific Railway, has not been arbitrarily cut off from the British Columbia section. I cannot but believe that a very large part of that amount has been economised by taking an extravagant sum from that section, and I shall remain of the opinion, until I see some detailed statement, giving reasons why this immense saving is practicable, that the last estimate of the Chief Engineer is not so trustworthy, or based on such sound calculation as the former estimate of himself and his assistants. The House must not forget too that Port Moody is not the terminus of the Railway. The Engineers say that the terminus must be at Coal Harbour, or English Bay. You do, indeed, reach the Pacific seaboard at Port Moody, but not a satisfactory terminal harbour. You must go further, and spend another million of dollars to accomplish the other fourteen miles of distance before you see the end of your labours. But even supposing it to be our unhappy fate to get no further than Port Moody, and supposing the hon. gentleman's revised estimates to be realized, I call the attention of the House to the fact that he calculates, himself, on spending $30,000,000 for the western section, and $13,000,000 only, or less than one-half the former sum for the whole of the prairie line. The fatal burden is still in the west. The hon. gentleman was right in dealing with the British Columbia, or western section, of this Railway as really beginning at a point east of the Rocky Mountains. But he did not go far enough east. In order to decide what is the true point of commencement of the western or British Columbia section of the road, you have to decide what is in truth the western end of the prairie road. That point is the commencement of the British Columbia section. I go further than the hon. gentleman. At a point seventy miles west of the longitude of Edmonton, you get to the end of the prairie. It is not necessary, in order to early settlement, that even as far as that point the country should be traversed by the Railway. Beyond that point, the Railway simply becomes necessary in view of British Columbia interests, and as a through line; unless, indeed, the outlet of the western prairie country is to be the Pacific and not the Atlantic ocean. I take, therefore, the longitude of Edmonton, which is also the point of divergence in case a northerly route should hereafter be adopted, as, for present purposes, the point of separation between the prairie and the British Columbia sections, and my hon. friend from Lambton, upon all the information which the official documents and the Engineer's reports give, added to his own knowledge, (assuming the continuance of the same gradients and curves, and the same style of construction and equipment, which were always intended up to the time he resigned,) estimates that the 256 miles from Edmonton to the summit would cost $9,400,000, which added to Mr. Fleming's and Mr. Smith's estimates of over $36,500,000, for the road from the Summit to the Pacific would give a total of over $45,000,000, as the cost according to the old estimates and old style of construction of what may be described as the western section of the Railway. Of course when the hon. gentleman chooses to give us the information which will make it possible for us to judge what style of road he now proposes to build ; when he tells us what the curvature and gradients are to be, and the general character of the works and style of the road, we shall be better able to judge of the correctness of his revised estimates, but he would not even tell us a little while ago, what the estimated cost of equipment was ; he would merely say it was a light equipment, by which we can judge that this estimate is arrived at by cramping the road very much indeed. It would be very easy to tell, if only it were convenient to let us know, what the estimated cost of the equipment is. It is estimated upon the cost in dollars, of so many locomotives, so many freight and passenger cars at such a price. It is included for example in the estimate of $13,000 a mile for the prairie road. But the hon. Minister of Railways would not tell us how much he could squeeze out for equipment in dollars from the $13,000 a mile ; and I am not surprised, because, I dare say, he would have to go into decimals to give it to us. When you recollect that an adequate rolling-stock, according to the former estimates, costs $2,000 a mile ; that the steel rails, plates and fastenings cost many thousands more per mile, you will find how very little remains of the $13,000 a mile to construct the Railway. Then I say that the British Columbia end, taking the route adopted from the longitude of Edmonton at the old rates, and on the old style, would cost $45,000,000, on which the permanent interest charged would be $2,250,000, besides a large sum for running expenses. Now, the question for the House to determine is whether we ought or can afford here and now to take the initial step, pledging us to an absolute expenditure of at least $10,000,000 at once, and to an ultimate expenditure for the standard through line from Edmonton to the Pacific of $45,000,000, making an annual interest charge of $2,250,000, besides over $1,300,000 a year for the gross running expenses, subject, of course, to deduction of the gross receipts. Considering only what the railway works are which we are called upon to execute in the North-West to the eastward of Edmonton, and not considering at all our other engagements—the general financial engagements of the country ; the demand for various improvements, East, West, North and South, the Provincial demands for aid ; not taking a comprehensive view of these various calls, but confining ourselves for the moment to the demand upon us in order to develop the North-West, in order thence to get the money on which the hon. Minister depends for the construction of the road in British Columbia, in order thus to render the construction in British Columbia possible. Is it—I will not say the part of prudence, but the part of sane men to commence now an expenditure of $45,000,000 in that end of the Dominion ? The hon. gentleman has told us what, according to his present estimate, we have to do. According to his view we have to spend $15,000,000 to build the road from Selkirk to Jasper House, and nearly $5,000,000 on the Eastern works, making nearly $20,000,000 to be spent, besides the $15,000,000 already expended ; so that by the time we reach Jasper House, our total expenditure, exclusive of interest, will have been nearly $35,000,000. But except by most seriously degrading the road, by altogether lowering the style of construction, by changing it from a good through line to an inferior colonisation road, it will be necessary, according to the estimates of the hon. member for Lambton, if they be correct, to expend a very much larger sum than the hon. Minister calculates to reach this result. The Canada Central Railway subsidy reaches $1,440,000, the surveys, including those location surveys, which, after all, come out of the pockets of the people, whether called exploratory surveys or location surveys, amount to $4,000,000. The road from Fort William to Selkirk was estimated at $18,000,000 ; the Pembina Branch cost $1,500,000, and adding $100,000 for the Red River Bridge, we reach a little over $25,000,000. From Selkirk to Edmonton, according to the old grades and style of construction, the hon. member for Lambton estimates at $17,650,000, which, added to the $25,000,000, makes a total of over $42,500,000 as the amount, including what has been spent for surveys, which it will have cost the country, irrespective of interest and construction, to reach the point which I suggest as the reasonable terminus for the prairie section of the road. Of this amount we have paid $15,000,000, and must provide nearly

$28,000,000 more. I have no doubt the hon. gentleman can make a very large reduction in these figures by increasing the curvature, by raising the gradients, by degrading the road in every way from a first-class to cheap colonisation railway. I am not at present declaring that it may not be good policy for him to do so,—possibly it may be so; but I think the House cannot intelligently dispose of the hon. gentleman's suggestions on these points without having before it some more facts and figures than have been communicated. I do not think we can decide that $13,000,000 will pay for the work according to the present plans of construction, till we know what the curves and gradients and other works are to be, and we may be called upon to consider whether we are not sacrificing to a large extent the future to the present in the matter; whether we are not causing a very much larger ultimate expenditure by the proposed present economy at the expense of the condition and quality of the road. If the hon. Minister of Railways can find a plan by which he can construct the road with inferior curves and grades and in an inferior style to that heretofore contemplated, but reasonably good however, and the conversion of which to superior curves and grades and a first-class style can be ultimately secured, when needed, without much added cost, I think it may be a prudent thing to reduce for the present the expense in this way. On the other hand, we must look to the ultimate conversion of the road into a first-class road, a cheap carrying road for the North-West, without which it will be useless for that long stretch of country towards Battleford and beyond; for the grain will have to come down along the Pacific Railway a great many miles before it reaches Selkirk or the Red River. The House must remember that according to the theory on which the hon. Minister advocates the completion of the road, he is bound to give reasonable grades and curves to the prairies of the West. The Western settlers will at best be in an inferior position to those nearer Selkirk; and if you add to their disadvantages a heavy tax on the transport of their grain by reason of an inferior road to Edmonton, it will not compensate them, to say the grain can be moved cheaply from Selkirk eastward. What they want is to get it cheaply moved along the whole distance. Again, of course, the through traffic depends on the road being first-class, and we must remember that after we have spent all the hon. Minister proposes, we shall have not a Pacific, but a Colonisation road. According to the old system of construction that central section would cost, including the other items I have mentioned, altogether over $42,500,000, leaving out entirely both ends. What are the ends to cost? $45,000,000 is as I have stated the cost from Edmonton to Burrard Inlet on the West; and from Fort William to Nipissing on the East, the hon. member for Lambton, estimates at a length of about 650 miles, and a cost of $32,500,000. Thus the ends makes up together $77,000,000, the centre and the past expenditure $42,500,000, making a total of $120,000,000, and that wholly exclusive of the legitimate and necessary charge, which must be added in all cases, the charge for interest during construction. In all enterprises of this description every estimate with reference to expenditure includes a provision for interest on capital provided during construction, before the enterprise becomes productive, and this item is to be considered in the reckoning. The House may be surprised to learn that on our expenditure up to this time, and rating the interest at 4 per cent. only, as the money was raised partly on guarantee, that interest up to 30th June next will exceed $1,250,000. Taking the estimates of ten days ago, if $60,000,000 are expended in the next ten years, there will be a total of over $24,500,000 for interest, calculating interest on future loans at 5 per cent., the lowest rate, as I believe, at which the money can be raised. Of course, according to the hon. Minister of Railways, we have saved ten millions during the last week, and therefore the interest of that ten millions is to be taken off; but even deducting it, unless my hon. friend would be kind enough during the progress of this debate to save us another ten millions, we should still find over $22,500,000 of interest to be provided before the completion of the line, according to the reduced figures, before we are able to reap the benefits of that enormous through and way traffic, the profits of which are then to pour into the coffers of this country. We must not altogether forget the eastern connection. The hon. gentleman has not been altogether oblivious of that part of the through line. It was politic on his part to throw out some faint hopes of the construction of that link. Quebec has spent some $11,000,000, which she can ill afford, for the construction of a railway principally designed to tap the Pacific trade. Quebec has stretched her arms out towards the great west, as far as this city, and the question is, how soon is she to get further, how soon that great expenditure is to be productive of the benefits expected? I am glad to know her road is paying something as it is; but what Quebec expected was not simply that it should pay, while it is new and cheaply worked, some fraction of the interest on the cost of construction, but that it would pour a great tide of traffic into her principal cities, and bring prosperity into her midst. But unless and until an eastern connection of some kind is made, those expectations of the Province of Quebec, on the faith of which she proceeded to construct her railway, cannot be realised. My hon. friend felt that. I should not be surprised—I do not know anything about it—but I should not be surprised if my hon. friend had been told something of that sort in private. I should not be surprised if some hon. member from Quebec had forcibly expressed to him, in private, the same observations which I have now made in public. I should not be surprised if it had been indicated to him, in language as strong as was consistent with the politeness due to a powerful Minister, that it was essential that he should throw out, at any rate, some ray of hope, however faint, that at some early day the Quebec Railway should be connected with the through line; that he should say to the members from Quebec: "Gentlemen, at the present time we can only burn the candle in the middle, and at the western end, but the time will come sooner than you expect when we will be burning it in the middle and at both ends, when it will be alight in the east also." That is, in fact, what the hon. gentleman has vaguely suggested to us to-night. But my hon. friends from Quebec will consider how nearer they will be to the attainment of a connection with the Pacific Railway by engaging immediately to construct the western end, and to spend, according to the revised estimates, $30,000,000 in British Columbia. They will consider how much it is going to hasten the day in which our surplus cash will enable us to make the connection for which they long, to flog $30,000,000 into that "Brown Country," which is depicted in the hon. Minister's map. They will judge whether our purse is like the widow's cruise of oil, in which, however much you may draw from it, there will always remain enough. They will consider whether even out of our abundance, even out of our prosperity, even with our large capacity for raising loans and obtaining moneys, we will be all the better able to deal with the eastern end, because we are commencing now to build the western end. They will reflect upon the possibility, nay, I will say the strong probability, that the effort to build the western end, if so precipitately engaged in, may crush this country, destroy the whole scheme, and render impossible for all time, or, at any rate, for a very long time, to attempt an eastern connection. According to his fashion, the hon. gentleman was not quite consistent in this matter. He was at pains to point out, in order to soothe the anxious fears of his friends and supporters, that the Government was in a position to go slowly. This contract, he says, contains clauses which give an absolute power to stop the work at any time; and if we find the resources of this country are going to be too heavily weighed down by building this 125 miles in British Columbia, depend upon it we will stop. We are not going fast; we are going slow. We expect, however, within ten years, having saved that ten millions I have spoken of, to do this much, at any rate; but we will not engage to do it within ten years. We do not consider ourselves bound to British Columbia to do it by 1890, and we will not do it within ten years if it presses too heavily on our resources. So much was necessary in order to soothe the fears of those who dreaded that the taxation would be too great and the expenditure too rapid. But then the hon. gentleman had to draw back, and in order to show that even all that expenditure would not indefinitely postpone the work at the eastern end, had to show "the silver trimming"—I think the hon. Finance Minister calls it—he had to show the "silver trimming" of the cloud and he said in effect: "So confident am I of the success of my scheme that I will not name the day in which the blushing East shall be married to the rosy West, but it will be very much sooner than any of you expect." One moment he said: "I will go slowly in the West, because the work may be too heavy for us—don't be afraid," and the next moment he exclaimed: "I can get on so fast in the West that I shall be able to begin in the East quite soon—don't be afraid." Such were the hon. Minister's consistent statements. Well, I say that these suggestions are intended, no doubt, to be satisfactory and consolatory, and, perhaps, they will prove so; but to my mind, looking at this from a practical point of view, I believe that the suggestions of the hon. gentleman are impracticable of execution, and that it may be found out of the question to commence the eastern end until we have got through the centre and the western end, if the work is to be carried on according to his scheme and his views, which, I believe, as they stand, are beyond the resources of the country. Quebec may expect the eastern end to be commenced when the western road is finished—that is, that it will be begun in 1890, and may be finished in 1897, and I hope they will all be alive to enjoy it. Now, besides this enormous expense to which I have referred, besides this aggregate of I do not know how many millions of dollars, the interest of which, according to the old estimates, will be six millions a year, we have got to consider the running expenses. These expenses Mr. Fleming estimated, in former days, at $8,000,000 a year; but my hon. friend from Lambton estimates them at a gross sum of $6,750,000 a year for the whole line, or $4,500,000 a year from Fort William to the Pacific. Of course, against this sum are to be set the receipts, which will be considerable, and will, in some sections of the road, perhaps, meet the expenses; but in the early days, and for a long time, the road as a whole will, I believe, be run at a loss. Thus you have a charge for interest and expenses for this Pacific Railway, which, if you add the cost of interest during construction, places it, according to any estimate you may form, wholly beyond the resources of this country to do the work in the way, and at the rate that the hon. gentleman has suggested. Now, what must we do? What are we bound to do? What are those things which it is essential for us to do? I agree that we must finish the road to Selkirk; and I am glad to hear the hon. gentleman is going to save a million on it. I would prefer, if he would make it a million and a-half, which would be perhaps as easy. We ought to finish the road to Selkirk as rapidly as possible, consistently with due economy. The contracts are let, and I suppose that road will proceed. I agree, also, that we ought to proceed with the road through the western prairies as rapidly as we find the settlement and the development of that country requires us to advance. I believe that just as fast as we see that the flow of settlement presses for it and will be promoted by it, we ought to get on with the prairie road; and, therefore, to the suggestion of the hon. gentleman, that he has contracted for one hundred miles, and that he is about to contract for another hundred, I offer no dissent, but my hearty approbation. I believe that the true course is that which the hon. gentleman has adopted. That is, to proceed with the construction of these sections. He has told us in what time he expects to have them finished; but long before they are finished we may know at what time and at what rate it is necessary for us to proceed further in order to develop that country. We can be guided by circumstances, and construct the road, if necessary, even slightly in advance of the actual tide of settlement, but not so far in advance as to be expending our money before it can be of any use. To do that which I have suggested, to finish the road to Selkirk, to pay off the subsidy of the Canada Central, and to proceed with the construction through the prairie, will, in my opinion, drain the resources of this country, taxed and burdened as it is, to the utmost farthing. But to that we are committed. The die is cast. We must, whether our hopes be brighter or fainter, all agree to give a fair trial to the great experiment, on which we have risked so much, of endeavouring to settle, as rapidly as possible, that great North-West country, in the way and manner I have suggested. Burdened as this country is, that work will demand the most prudent management and the most careful economy, and will involve an elimination of every other expenditure which can be in the meanwhile avoided. According to the former figures of the hon. gentleman's Engineer, and to the view of the hon. member for Lambton, our interest charges will be about two millions a year when that road is completed as far as Edmonton. All that we can get from the lands in that country, for the next few years, during which we shall be engaged in the construction of the road, will not, I believe, do more than help to eke out that interest. I now proceed to state my views about the land question, but whatever we may decide about the land, I maintain that to attempt at this time more than is necessary, more than is essential, more than the cardinal thing upon which the success of the whole enterprise is to turn, is an act of folly and madness. I intend before I sit down to discuss what is the true financial condition of this country, and what is its rate of taxation as compared with the rates of taxation existing in 1871; and to consider how far, apart from the sale of the lands, it is possible for us to undergo the strain which the proposed work will inflict upon us. But before I touch that subject, it becomes necessary to deal with the question of the lands, because the allegations made the other day with reference to the sales of lands, were that these sales would relieve us almost immediately from the interest liability, and practically from the liability for principal. I quite agree that if the calculations of the hon. First Minister and of the hon. Minister of Railways, as to receipts from lands, and expenditure on construction are founded upon a reasonable basis, they remove all serious difficulty and we may fairly and reasonably launch out into the construction of the Central and Western, and also into the construction of the Eastern end of the Pacific Railway. I perfectly agree that if these matured conjectures, in which every doubt was given to the side of prudence—which represent minima instead of maxima; if these close and accurate calculations are fairly to be counted upon as the results of the immigration and the Railway construction; if business men, acting in their own concerns, or acting for others for whom they are trustees, ought to accept these figures as a basis for encountering for themselves or for others for whom they act enormous liabilities, then the results of these calculations do justify as in assuming the liabilities proposed to us. Now, let us see what these calculations are. They assume that the emigration will commence at 25,000 and increase yearly by 5,000, making, in the course of eleven years, 550,000 emigrants. Of these 68,500 are to become homesteaders and preemptors, at an average rate of $3 an acre for the preempted land; 34,200 are to become purchasers of and settlers upon railway lands, at an average rate of $3 an acre for the railway lands, making 102,700 owners of 32,640,000 acres to be settled in that country in the course of eleven years. The Government calculates not merely on this number of emigrants, not merely on this number of purchasers, not merely on these prices, not merely on this acreage, but with a sublime indifference to all the dictates of prudence, and to all the experience of all time, they calculate on the settlers on these lands paying their large instalments up to the day. They calculate on the receipt of $38,593,000 from land sales in eleven years, and, in addition, on a good debt of $32,750,000 more, bearing interest, making over $71,300,000 for lands, with a claim for interest on the debt at 6 per cent. They estimate the cost of survey and management for this vast undertaking at $2,400,000. I allege that the result of these several calculations is absurdly extravagant. I hope for a very large emigration to the North-West this year, and perhaps next year. I do not intend to be bound to an estimate for ten years by the results of one or two years. I call the attention of the House and the country to the consideration of the fact that we are dealing with an estimate, not for one or two years, but an estimate for ten years; not an estimate of $10,000,000, but an estimate of $60,000,000; therefore, I do not intend to be bound by the figures for the early years, attended as these are with many exceptional circumstances. Of course the whole thing is conjectural; but we have a right to refer to the experience of the United States, to which, indeed, the hon. gentleman referred as the nearest analogous experience to ours, and as furnishing with all due allowances the only available guide. I will take the settlement of the Western States and Territories, which have formed the scene of the most rapid development which the world has hitherto known. I deeply regret that we are engaged in this discussion without the advantage of the United States Census very shortly to be taken, because I agree that circumstances in reference to the Railway development of later years have sensibly affected the tide of settlement, therefore these figures are to be taken with a measure of allowance; still we must consider, whatever may be now the relative advantages of our own North-West, that these states and territories were at the time the choicest in the world open, and that they gave very great facilities for settlement. I take the group of Western and North-Western States and Territories, comprising Michigan, Indiana, Illinois, Wisconsin, Iowa, Minnesota, Kansas, Nebraska, Dakota, Montana, Wyoming and Colorado. The area of the group is 634,000,000 acres. They had a population, in 1850, of 2,740,000. The yearly increase between that year and 1860 was at the rate of 282,000 a year, and the population, in 1860, reached 5,600,000, so that at first sight hardly any calculation of increase would seem extravagant; but let us ascertain of what this population was composed. In the year 1860 there were of persons born in the group 2,530,000, or 44 per cent. of the whole population; of persons born in other parts of the United States, 2,015,000 or 37 per cent. of the whole, making an aggregate native population of 4,545,000, or 81 per cent. of the whole. Of foreign born emigrants 1,050,000, or only 19 per cent. of the total population; so that the extremely rapid increase which took place in those years is due mainly to the natural increase in the territory itself, and to migration from the Eastern to the Western States, and not to foreign immigration into the country. The annual increase to 1870 was still greater than in the prior decade. It averaged 300,000 a year. In 1870 the population was 8,640,000, thus composed; born in the group, 4,390,000, or over 50 per cent.; born in other parts of the states, 2,500,000, or over 29 per cent., making 79½ per cent. in all of natives; foreign born, 1,750,000, or 20½ per cent. of the whole population. These figures show that there were three great sources of increase, to which I wish to allude for a moment, in order that we may see how far we can expect similar results. First, there was a very rapid natural increase in the western country, as always happens when there is abundance of fertile land, producing plenty of food—consequently once there is a substantial nucleus of population, the natural increase is a most important factor. Second, that there was a very great migration from the Eastern to the Western States—a home migration, not an immigration from abroad. Lastly, that there was a large foreign immigration; now these figures, though demonstrative of the considerations to which I have alluded, are yet subject to observation, because, during a part of the last decade, native born Americans, from both East and West, were swelling the armies of the Union by hundreds of thousands; therefore, there was not in that rapidly growing country that relative increase of the population by natural causes and home migration, that would otherwise have occurred. The war had taken the men away from the soil; and at the same time there was a foreign immigration equal to, if not exceeding, what had previously occurred in the United States, so that while there was a very great foreign immigration during a portion of that decade, the domestic sources of supply were seriously diminished by the deadly struggle in which the life blood of the nation was being poured out like water. No doubt, however, the foreign immigration is in fact a larger factor than it appears to be in the settlement of the Western States. It was through the foreign immigration to the east that the east was able to send so many of its own sons to the west; therefore, the foreign immigration did play a very important indirect part, as well as its direct part in the settlement of that country. Now, in 1850, the population of the remainder of the States, exclusive of the group of states and territories to which I have referred, was no less than 20,000,000. In 1860, it was no less than 24,830,000. This shows that, notwithstanding the extent to which the population of the east migrated to the west, the population of the former was maintained and advanced, by virtue of the foreign immigration and natural increase. The total number of immigrants to the United States, in the decade from 1851 to 1860, was 2,600,000; from 1861 to 1870, 2,500,000, and from 1871 to 1880, making an estimate for the last eighteen months, 2,700,000. I repeat then, for we cannot dwell on it too much the three factors which produced this enormous increase of population in these splendid Western States. The first, a very rapid increase of their native population; the second, a large home migration from other States; and third and last, the foreign immigration, operating directly by the immediate advance into the west of immigrants, and indirectly by displacing a certain number of the native population who were so enabled to go west. It is said that the domestic transference of population has been even more rapid, and has, therefore, played a still more important part in the present decade than in former decades. Let us compare our circumstances with theirs in these particulars: First of all, we have at present no nucleus of population in the North-West worth mentioning. It is towards the end of the decade for which we are calculating that this factor will begin to exert an appreciable influence. Next, look at that native recruiting ground, that constantly increasing population, first 20,000,000, running up to I know not how many millions from which I have shown the Western States draw their main supply. How do we stand as to that? We stand 4,000,000 against their 30,000,000 or 40,000,000. We stand with only a tenth of their population, with a relatively insignificant number, of whom we know it to be a fact, a deeply to be regretted fact, but a fact which exists, and which there is no use trying to conceal, that many go to the United States—that out of our 4,000,000, in the best times, hundreds of thousands leave us—I think the hon. member for Cardwell, (Mr. White), gave us at over half a million, the number of those who went over during the last decade, in which prosperity was the rule, in which there was no depression, in which every Canadian had a home and good work, but still in which something occurred to allure them to the settlements in the Western States, largely by direct removal there of those who preferred a more southern climate, but also to a very great extent by removal to the manufacturing towns in the Eastern States, thus freeing the citizens of those states and enabling them to go West. Now, from our 4,000,000 there cannot without most serious consequences to the older Provinces be a very large number of emigrants altogether; and of that number a considerable proportion will continue to go to the manufacturing communities of the States—there are persons who prefer the latter to the rural and remote settlements—and others will go still to the Western States in spite of the advantages we offer them in our own North-West. We may hope—I do, I am sure, as earnestly as any man can hope—that those residents of the older Provinces who decide to remove will simply transfer their residences to some other part of this Dominion. I hope that the emigration from Canada to the United States may be seriously checked and replaced by migration to the North-West. I hope that many of those who are actuated by an adventurous spirit, or a desire for change, will seek the North-West. But my hopes will not change the facts, and, whatever we may hope and wish, it is only prudent, it is only wise, that before incurring vast obligations which, whatever the result of your speculations, you have got to meet, you should count the cost and carefully consider the risks, and weigh the probabilities. We cannot shut our eyes to the fact that a considerable number of our surplus population will still go to the manufacturing centres of the Eastern States; that some of our agricultural population will do what some have done before, and are doing now, prefer Dakota and some of the Western Territories. But suppose I am wrong—suppose that, moved by some sudden flush of patriotism changing the desires and inclinations on which they have acted hitherto, our whole migratory population should, without exception, resolve to remain within the borders of the Dominion, and to that end move to our North-West in preference to the manufacturing or the Western States ; or, suppose the establishment of an actual wall, as high and aseffectual as your Tariff wall, to keep all these within your bounds as you wish to keep out all foreign manufactures ; suppose you build a wall like that of China, not indeed to keep out invaders, but to bar your own citizens from transgressing your limits, and to drive them into the North-West, what would it do? Certainly it would be better than their going to the United States, for to go there involves a positive loss to the whole Dominion of their resources. But it is no better for us, with reference to the early ability of the country, as a whole, to meet these burdens—it is no better for us that they should reside in the North-West than that they should remain in the older Provinces. In the most highly coloured view they will only be in one part instead of another part of the Dominion ; they will only be paying taxes in the East instead of the West. But talking of it only during the next few years, I do not agree that it is merely a transference of tax-paying power. I am convinced that the North-West settler, for several years, will not be a very heavy contributor to the net revenue of Canada. He is a new settler. He pays, the Minister says, an average of $3 an acre for his land. At the end of the third year he pays four-tenths of the money and interest. He has to build his house ; he has to build his barn, and to fence his land ; he has to get his implements and his animals, and to maintain his family—in the homely parlance of our country, he has “hard scratching” before him for some years. It is true that the prairie has very great advantages in some respects. It enables you if you have capital and can lay out money, to fence in and sow very much earlier and to raise your crop very much sooner. But, on the other hand, the scarcity of timber, and so forth, renders the material required for the house and the barn and the fences dear, and that is what, I have no doubt, the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie) meant, when he spoke of the initial difficulties of the settler, in the prairies of our North-West as compared with those of the wooded country. I expect to be called unpatriotic, because I tell a few plain truths, but those who are so loud in this kind of denunciation may go on. I believe that it is not patriotic to be dishonourable. I believe it is not honourable to present false views of one's country to emigrants or others. We should not overstate, but fairly state the true position and situation of the case. But whatever refined diplomacy, whatever reticence we might, under other circumstances, choose to exercise, it is impossible, in reference to the proposals of the Government, on which we are asked to commit the country so deeply, to do otherwise than give the reasons why those proposals are not based on sound grounds ; and we must state circumstances which their high-toned patriotism might lead them to conceal, nay, perhaps even to deny. The free grant settler will not be, in early days, a very large consumer of dutiable goods. He will live as hard as he can, smuggle as much as he can, and smuggle a good deal, too, under the present Tariff ; he will, in due time, under the influence of that Tariff develop home manufactures. For I suppose that the North-West is not to be deprived of the beneficent influences of the National Policy—to find that they are to be our hewers of wood and drawers of water ; I suppose they are not to be doomed to that wretched monotony of life, and to be deprived of that charming diversity of occupation which is a chief argument for the National Policy, Under the hot-bed influence of the Tariff of high prices ; under the influences, whether beneficent or maleficent, of the National Policy, he will have his home manufactures. Since the hon. gentleman announces to us that the North-West is to supply us with a market for all time for our eastern manufactures, let us know how this fleece of Gideon is to be kept wet while all the rest is dry. It is quite true that in early years he will not have home manufactures, but these years will be the hard years for the settlers. They are the years in which it would be vastly important for his welfare to have, I will not say home-made goods, but cheap goods, to be allowed to purchase the necessaries of life at the cheapest rate, and in the market that gives the greatest satisfaction. But you encourage him in this way. You tell him we have established a Tariff wall, by which you must buy in old Canada, at our prices, what you require in the North-West. The large expenditure due to the increased price of goods will diminish the settler's narrow and limited purchasing power; and will in effect render him subject to a rate of taxation so high as to interfere with his comfort and advancement. The hon. gentleman talks of a large return to the coffers of the Dominion after paying the expenses of Local Government. To talk to the men who are to settle—to whom you are going to sell lands—to talk to them of the large taxes you expect them to pay is a new way to encourage them to go there. What cold water have we thrown, as it is alleged, upon the settlement of the North-West, that can be equal to that? I maintain that for the early years the taxpaying power of the persons who migrate from the east to the west will not be anything like what the hon. gentleman states, and that, in fact we can expect no net returns of any material amount from that country during the early years of its settlement. For the first year or so but little local or municipal Government may be needed, and with the country in that disorganised state, you may, of course, take a small net revenue out of it; but after Local Governments are established the cost will more than equal the return. Nor must you forget that the country is now costing you far more than a million a year.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: British Columbia and Manitoba pay largely into the Dominion Treasury.

MR. BLAKE: I propose to show, before I sit down, the net result in those very Provinces. The conclusion is that the resident of old Canada moving to the North-West does not at first increase, but, rather diminishes the aggregate taxpaying power of the Dominion. But, besides that practical reduction in the taxpaying power, there is another reduction involved in the transfer of population. Nobody can deny that there has been a serious depreciation in the value of real estate in the Dominion.

MR. BUNSTER: Except in British Columbia.

MR. BLAKE: Well, if the hon. gentleman's exception be true, I can give no better proof of the monstrous character of the operations which are now proposed—operations for which the whole of the vast Dominion, with its overburdened exchequer, is to be taxed to benefit a Province with 12,000 white people, which is the only Province in which real estate is on the rise; and I venture to hope that the Province which is prospering so greatly will not insist on the less prosperous Provinces further depressing their resources by raising $30,000,000 or $40,000,000 for the benefit of their fortunate little sister, but that she will wait a little longer for her railway. I have said there is a serious depreciation in the value of real estate. That is true in regard to Ontario, whatever it may be in regard to British Columbia; it is true as to New Brunswick; and I believe, as to the other Provinces. A chief reason is that the demand is not so great as it was formerly. Formerly our farmers, young and old, the natural increase of our population, created a demand which led to enhanced prices—now large numbers of them are going West. The supply is greater relatively than the demand, and that is one and a very potent reason why there is a depreciation in the value of our lands. Thus I attribute to the emigration this result that our property in the East is not so valuable, and not so likely to appreciate, and we ourselves will not be so well off if the people continue to migrate to the North-West; and that also shows that in the early years the migration to that country will not help us, but, in fact, will lower our tax-paying power for a time. When the settlers begin to thrive—when they pay off the $71,000,000 which, it is alleged, they are to pay into the Exchequer, when the North-West becomes largely productive, affairs will probably change and the strength of the Dominion, as a whole, will be increased by the larger measure of prosperity enjoyed in the new settlement; but that result cannot be looked for in the immediate future, and it does not in the least alter the argument that in the near future our tax-paying power will be rather diminished than increased by the domestic migration.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT said he understood his hon. friend intended to speak for some time yet. He had been on his feet for a long time, and it was now late. He (Sir Richard J. Cartwright) therefore suggested that there should be an adjournment, and allow his hon. friend to continue to-morrow.

MR. BLAKE.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said if his hon. friend (Mr. Blake) desired an adjournment he would certainly consent.

Mr. BLAKE moved the adjournment of the Debate.

ADJOURNED DEBATE.

House resumed the adjourned Debate on the proposed motion (Sir S. L. Tilley): That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair.

MR. BLAKE: When the House was good enough to permit me last night to postpone my further remarks, I had pointed out, with reference to the domestic migration of the United States, that it was impossible to hope from our home resources anything approaching an equal supply for the North-West; that in fact their increase furnished no indication whatever of the rate of increase on which we could count from that source, save that it would be infinitely smaller, and could not be mentioned in the same breath; and I was about to advert to the relative condition of the two countries with reference to foreign emigration. I quite agree that recent events furnish us with a very happy prospect of a considerable immigration of British farmers here. I hail that as one of the most encouraging circumstances to be looked at in glancing at our future. I think that what has happened, and what is happening, cannot be without important benefit to us. There can be no doubt whatever that the conditions of British agriculture have greatly changed, owing to the increasing food supplies both in meat and grain from foreign parts. The cheapening of the supply has rendered it impossible for English farmers to continue paying the large rents they have been accustomed to pay. There is consequently a struggle between the landlord and tenant at this time, and it is not to be expected that the landlords will submit without reluctance, or except upon the pressure of necessity, to a very large reduction, or to any reduction they may think unreasonable in their rents, and in the course of that severe, if not hostile struggle, it is to be expected that a great many British farmers will emigrate to this country. But, notwithstanding that circumstance, I hold that it is impossible to contrast the situation of the two countries—Canada and the United States—on the general question of foreign emigration, without concluding that our future is not to be measured by the estimate of theirs. What has happened in the west with reference to them cannot be expected reasonably to happen in our West with reference to us, so far as the result is to be obtained by foreign emigration. I have already stated that the foreign emigration to the United States for the decade ending 1860, was 2,600,000; for that ending 1870, 2,500,000; and for the present decade it is supposed it will amount to 2,700,000. These figures are enough to convince us that the rapidity with which western lands have been settled, so far as that rapidity is due to the direct or indirect effects of foreign emigration, it is not a rapidity which we can hope to reach in our North-West. Nor can I agree that the area of land in the United States available for settlement, although it is, no doubt, being rapidly diminished, is as yet at all reduced to such proportions as to force the current of emigration to our North-West. There are still large areas of land in that country which are available for settlement, and which, to those who happen to prefer the United States, will give them an opportunity of settling there for some years to come. The United States, in a sense, commands the market in this respect. The emigration to the states, as far as I can understand, has been composed in later years, to very large extent of the Teutonic races. The Germans have played a very large part in the settlement of the United States

They exist there in very great numbers and they exercise there a powerful influence. The same opinions which led the inhabitants of that and all the countries of Europe, enjoying but partially developed constitutional Government, when deciding to leave their native lands and seek foreign shores, to choose the United States as their goal, have derived further strength from the knowledge that there are settled in the great Republic millions of their brother Germans and the descendants of their brother Germans. It is therefore natural that we should expect, for several years to come at any rate, that the bulk of the Teutonic emigration will go, as it has gone hitherto, in the direction of the United States. The next important factor in the emigration to the United States has been from the people of the country from which I am descended; and we know that the circumstances of that country are such that, unfortunately for us, and for the British Empire, there has been a strong impulse on the part of a very large and important part of the population of Ireland to prefer the Republic. In this case the sins of the fathers have been visited on the children. The wrongs and injustice inflicted on the majority of the Irish population in former days—at least the no mory of those wrongs and that injustice, the recollection of transactions, which no man would at this day vindicate or defend, has remained with those now on the soil, and obliterates, or at any rate obscures to their vision the more liberal conduct and the more just course which has animated British policy in this respect of later years. That circumstance has led to a large emigration from Ireland to the United States; and we know what the condition of Irish sentiment still is. But I hope for great things for Ireland and the Empire from the events of the last few days. I hope and trust that the advent to power of the Liberal party, supported by a great majority of decided Liberals and Radicals, will result in fresh measures for relief and justice to Ireland, which will tend still further to weaken her old feelings of hostility and disaffection, and to make the Empire in this regard a United Empire. I hope we shall see among other things a moderate measure of Home Rule for Ireland, and witness by the application of that measure the creation and maintenance of true and real bonds of union between Ireland and the rest of the so-called United Kingdom. But things being as they are, and having regard also to the financial condition of the bulk of the Irish peasantry, no wise man can expect that within a short time, that within the next few years, there will be any serious change in the current of Irish immigration. So far as the Roman Catholic Irish are concerned we must expect that the tide of emigration will continue for some time to set towards the United States. I hope the proportion may be diminished. I should rejoice greatly to see the Irish people recognise the advantages we offer them, and establish themselves within our borders, but still, I believe that for sometime we cannot count on a decided change. The set of emigration has been sufficiently shown by the figures I have given, and naturally, with the imperfect information available to those coming from other parts of Europe, and apart from all consideration of soil and climate, the notion of the important position and situation they would occupy under a Republican form of Government—the idea that as citizens of the great Republic they would have a greater part and more active share in the Government of their country—has actuated a great number of emigrants from the European continent to choose the United States as the field where their energies and their talents could be most fully displayed and the advantages of citizenship most freely exercised. Among the obvious material advantages presented to the minds of such persons is this: that the National Debt of the United States has been reduced in fourteen years by $603,000,000. It has been reduced by 30 per cent. of the amount at which it now stands, and that great reduction has been affected in the face of great difficulties and obstacles, and, notwithstanding a period of depression which they have experienced, and which seems likely now to be followed by a period of revived prosperity, perhaps of inflation. I say that the contrast in this respect, upon which I shall take occasion later further to enlarge, between the condition of the United States and that of the countries from which emigrants come, is a contrast calculated to allure them to the Republic. Though the statistics for the current decade of the United States are not yet available, I am able to refer to some figures showing the later progress of two states, especially alluded to by the hon. member for Cardwell a few days ago, Kansas and Nebraska. We were correctly told that Kansas had increased from 360,000 in 1870, to 850,000 in 1879, thus showing an increase in nine years of 490,000. I have already pointed out the elements of which the increase of population in the Western States is composed, and the domestic and foreign recruiting grounds from which that country draws her increase. These considerations alone show that the results in Kansas do not prove that our North-West is going to have a population of 550,000 in ten years, as stated, for none of the conditions are parallel. But apart from the fact that Kansas had in 1870, 360,000 of a population to start with, from which came a large natural increase forming an important part of the 490,000, it is to be remembered that Kansas had moreover in 1870 over 1,500 miles of railway in operation and during the decade her railway facilities were increased to 2,300 miles. There is no doubt, I believe, that this state has shown the most remarkable development in the history of the world. In 1866 the State of Kansas was the twenty-fourth in rank in the United States as a corn-producer, and in 1878 she had run up to the fourth. In 1866 she was twenty-fourth in rank as a wheat-producer, and she had run up in 1878 to be almost the first in rank, producing in that year 32,000,000 bushels of wheat. With all these advantages, with all these proofs of an unexampled progress, with that large domestic and foreign recruiting ground, to which I have before alluded, we find her increase of population in nine years was but 490,000, and we are told that the North-West without the advantages which were possessed by Kansas, is to have an increase through emigration of 550,000 in eleven years. Now, Sir, I will refer to Nebraska. In that state also there has been, as the hon. member said, very rapid progress. In 1870 the population was 122,000. In 1879 it was 386,000. The increase in the nine years was 244,000: There was thus, of course a substantial nucleus, the natural increase from which would form no immaterial part of the total increase.

There was also a great domestic and foreign immigration. There were also great railway facilities throughout the period. In 1870, there were 705 miles of railway in operation, and in 1878 1,320 miles; yet with all those advantages there was only an increase of 244,000 in the nine years; and even that increase was due to the circumstances to which I have referred, which give the States a greater power of settlement than we can hope for. These are the figures for the two States which hon. gentlemen have chosen, and I believe rightly chosen, as presenting the strongest grounds for their expectations. I do not think they furnish good grounds for these expectations. I do not think that the only experience to which we can refer, having regard to the differences between the two countries, justifies us, however sanguine or fervent our hopes may be, justifies us as business men, dealing with a business transaction, and calculating the cash returns we may count on from the North-West lands in the next few years, in concluding that there will be an emigrant population of 550,000 in that country at the end of eleven years, and in incurring on the faith of that result enormous liabilities, which, if not met out of the lands, must be met otherwise. Such a thing may happen—I wish it would, but I do not think it is probable, because the experience of no other country, making allowances, proves that it can happen in our case. The statement, I think, is purely conjectural, is highly improbable, and cannot be sustained by any analogous occurrence. So much for the first postulate of the hon. gentlemen. I do not grant his postulate. I do not think that it is demonstrable in any way. I believe that all past experience points to its inaccuracy. But it is enough for me to say that it is not so far proved as to render it prudent to count on its accuracy. Next, as to the probable number of acres to be sold and preempted, the hon. gentleman said the Government expect to sell to the purchasers of railway lands 10,820,000 acres, and an equal amount to preemptors, making a total of 21,640,000 acres to be sold. They expect to make free grants of 10,830,000 acres more, making altogether 32,640,000 to be disposed of. Now, the sales by the United States from 1860 to 1869 were 11,770,000 acres; but we are to double that quantity in our sales. The lands disposed of in the United States by tree grant and under tree-planting conditions during eleven years from 1868 to 1879 amounted to 47,140,000 acres; but we are to sell in eleven years 21,760,000 acres, and dispose of 10,830,000 acres more free. Although I quite admit that there are other considerations to be regarded in this comparison; that a large quantity of lands was in the same time disposed of by railway companies in the United States, and that therefore in applying their figures we must make considerable allowances, still I think these figures furnish us with some ground on which to base our calculations. I have no accurate information as to the sales of railway companies' lands. I do not pretend to be able to inform the House on the subject, but it is well-known that the railway belts in the United States are as a rule infinitely narrower than ours, that the United States itself owns the alternate sections of these lands, and that the greater portion of the land called railway lands by us could not be so denominated according to the system of the United States. But we expect to sell twice as many acres as the United States sold in ten years. Well, may our hopes be realised! But can we afford to venture the future of our country upon the realisation of those hopes? That is the present question. There is, however, a still more important point to refer to in connection with this subject. I will give the number of acres taken up for farming purposes in the twelve great States and Territories to which I have referred, at three different periods, as compared with the population. In 1850 the population was 2,740,000. The number of acres taken up was but 35,000,000, or twelve and a half acres per head. The number of acres of improved land, was 12,900,000, under five acres per head of the population. In 1860 the population was 5,610,000. The land taken up was 67,450,000 acres or twelve acres per head, and the improved land six and one-third acres per head. In 1870 the population was 8,665,000. The land taken up was 95,190,000 or under ten and a-half acres per head. The improved land was under six and a-half acres per head. You thus find that in those States which are pointed to as the example on which our progress is to be based, there were only during the most progressive period twelve and a-half acres of land per head taken up for farms, and five or six acres per head of improved lands. Compare this with the figures the hon. gentleman has given. Grant him the 550,000 emigrants he estimates, he still assumes that these will take up 32,640,000, or more than fifty-nine acres per head of the population. The hon. gentleman may say "that is my liberality, I am offering ever so much more land than United States has given, and it is natural that more land will be taken up per head." No doubt that accounts for part of it, though for how much, I will not pretend to state; but I hold and believe that it is impossible seriously to act on the assumption that nearly five times the acreage per head will be taken up in the North-West that was taken up in the most prosperous period of the development of the States I have mentioned. I think that the calculation of the hon. gentleman has been demonstrated to be utterly fallacious. It proves that either the hon. gentleman has over calculated the number of settlers on farm lands to the population, or that he has over calculated the quantity of land each settler will take. One or other of these propositions must account for the difference. You cannot seriously assume that fifty-nine and a-quarter acres per head will be taken up with us where the United States dispose of only twelve and a-half acres to each head. Can it be said that experience proves the probability of this calculation so satisfactorily that we should commit ourselves irretrievably on the chance of its realisation? These figures are suggestive also in another respect, that of revenue, to which I have referred. You find the proportion improved is very small in proportion to the amount taken up, in the earlier period not much more than one-third, or four and three-quarter acres per head. I quite agree that our lands being largely prairie, we may expect to improve or render productive more rapidly a larger acreage than the average improved acreage in the Western States, and due allowance is to be made for that circumstance; but, making the most liberal allowance, is it possible that from the extent of the improvements indicated by these figures, a large amount in payments on land, taxes and revenue, can be realised from the settler in the very early days? These figures, as to the acreage of improved lands, adding what amount in reason you please for differences of condition, show that the returns cannot, in the early years, be very large, inasmuch as what the settlers pay must consist of surplus profits after building houses, barns, and fences, getting their lands into cultivation, and maintaining their families. I affirm that the figures I have mentioned do not justify the calculations of the Government. But whatever you may think as to the calculations considered up to this point, I hold it to be clear that the estimates of the cash to be realised from land sales are still more extravagant. The Government expect to receive in cash $38,600,000 in eleven years, which would, exclusive of interest, be less than half the cost, a balance of over $32,000,000 being payable later. The United States realised in the eighty-three years up to 1879, from its public lands, $204,500,000, the average being $2,460,000 a year. In the twenty years preceding 1879 they realised $30,350,000, or an average of $1,500,000 a year, which for eleven years would make $10,500,000. But this Government expects to realise $38,500,000 in eleven years! Of course the lands sold by the Railway Companies in the United States are not included in this calculation. Making every reasonable allowance for this circumstance, and having regard to the conditions of the Canadian so-called railway belt, and assuming the average prices of the Government to be correct, the figures justify no such expectation. But the Government's calculations, made "by the highest authority," are wholly fallacious. The railway lands are divided into five belts, and the prices are, in each belt, $5, $4, $3, $2 and $1 respectively, which, taken together, makes $15, and divided by five, the number of the belts, does, indeed, produce an average of $3 an acre, which is the estimate of the Government. But this, though a very simple, is not a scientific or accurate method of arriving at the true average price, because the various belts differ in width. In the first and highest-priced belt the width is but five miles; in the second, fifteen; in the third and fourth, twenty, while the width of the $1 belt is fifty miles. The true average—assuming as the Government does, the lands to be taken up according to their relative value and attractiveness, and that the lands will bear the enhanced prices put on them, according to their proximity to the railway, instead of being $3 for these railway lands is, when you allow for the varying widths of the belts, but $2.12½. This single error, of course, reduces the receipts from these lands nearly one-third, or by several millions. But the calculations as to the preemptions is still more amusing. The Government calculate according to the first Minister's statement that for the land preempted they will receive the same average of $3 per acre, whilst the highest price payable for any preempted land is but $2.50 an acre. This is the price for the first three belts. The fourth belt is $2, and the big belt, which nearly equals in width all the others, $1 only, and consequently, the average price for these lands is $1.75, or not much over one-half the estimate made "on the highest authority," which, by the figures given, would seem to be calculated at $2.50 an acre. I have thus pointed out how little this House can depend on the Government estimates. The general result of those two errors is, that instead of $38,500,000 being receivable from these lands in eleven years, only $23,350,000 will, on the basis assumed by the Government itself, be received, or a difference of $15,240,000. And correcting the same errors as to the sums remaining due at the close of the term, the estimate of $32,750,000, for these sums remaining due must be reduced to $21,620,000, a difference of $11,590,000, making a total error of calculation of $26,830,000 in the estimate presented to the House by the hon. the First Minister, and endorsed by the hon. the Ministers of Finance and of Railways, as the groundwork for our action. Under these circumstances I am not surprised that the hon gentleman should have felt it necessary to save the $10,000,000 he economised last week. The extravagance of the estimate is shown in other ways. It seems that a purchaser will pay on railway lands $1,219.70 for a lot, while the preemptors, at the same rate for their half, 160 acres, will pay at the highest $522,40, principal and interest. But apart from these errors of calculation, reducing so largely the fund upon which we were to depend for building the Columbia section of the Canada Pacific Railway, there are other considerations which wholly vitiate the estimates of the hon. gentleman. The average price to be realised largely depends upon the sale of lands in the nearer belts, and if anything occurs to disturb the sales in them, it is quite clear that even the smaller average I have stated cannot be realised. Then, not merely the average price, but the whole sales depend upon the character of the country. My hon. friend from Lambton will kindly relieve me from discussing in detail this important point, as having looked at all the reports on that subject, he will undertake the task of pointing out what, according to our official information, is the character of the country in the railway belt. It will be found that the map which the hon. gentleman brought down last night, and in which he depicted the barren spots as brown, is not at all "brown" enough with reference to the North-West. It does not by any means accurately represent the extent of the bad and inferior land in that country. The hon. gentleman stated that he estimated there were 150,000,000 acres of good land in the North-West; but he did not state that all that was arable or wheat land; and I understand from him in conversation that he does not mean any such thing. It will be found that the number of acres of wheat land are not to be measured by anything like those figures. In fact, Mr. Fleming, in a late paper, places the wheat land at 80,000,000 acres, and the pasture land at a like quantity. All estimates on this subject are at present conjectural; but, doubtless, there is a vast expanse of fertile land, though broken by intervening spaces of barren and inferior soils. There is there good land enough to support a very large population. It will be found, however, that circumstances will prevent much of the high-priced lands close to the railway belt being taken up. There is bad land close to the Railway, in many places, barren, swamp and inferior land. These and other considerations show that, both with reference to the smaller average, which is obtainable only by assuming that the lands near the Railway are all good lands, and with reference to the general rate of prices, which is reached on an exaggerated view as to the quantity of first-class land, the expectation of the hon. gentleman is not likely to be realised. It is obvious that if there be bad lands close to the Railway the settlers will not pay $5 an acre for them. There is no object in being near the Railway, if you can raise nothing which you can send away by it. You would rather be fifty miles away, on land capable of producing a crop, than close to the line on a desert or a swamp. Another circumstance which vitiates this estimate is, that settlers will not buy railway lands as long as free grants are obtainable. I speak in the large. Of course there will be instances in which a settler will buy railway lands; and the capitalist who wants more than 320 acres, will, doubtless, buy railway lands adjoining his free grant. But, speaking generally, you will find that settlers will not purchase railway lands so long as free grants are obtainable. There is a good reason why they should not. They get 160 acres free, and the remainder on more favourable terms than the purchaser of railway lands, and, therefore, there will be, in these earlier years, fewer settlers on railway lands than the hon. gentleman calculates. Another reason why there will be fewer purchases, by settlers, of railway lands, is that the hon. gentleman has placed a barrier in the way of such purchases by opening the railway lands to speculators. Speculators are following day by day, and hour by hour in the track of the surveyors, finding out the best sections of railway lands, particularly in the cheap outside belts, and their entries are in the land office before the report comes in; not with the view of settlement, but with the view or taking what people on the English stock market call "a long shot"—with the view of investing ten cents an acre in dollar lands, or twenty cents an acre in two dollar lands, in the expectation that after an interval of years the development of the country will enable them to exact enormously higher terms from the settlers coming in. The hon. gentleman may delude this House by a return, this year or the next, into the notion that he is going to make a great deal of money by selling the railway lands, because he is selling to speculators a large quantity of cheap lands on which the purchasers are paying only ten or twenty cents an acre; but the real and solid returns to Government from railway lands will be what settlers will ultimately pay. Those from buyers on speculation will be but insignificant. What the settlers will pay is the measure of the true value of those lands to us; and you are deliberately marring the chances of developing that country, when you place in the hands of speculators, upon the payment of 10c. or 20c. an acre, the choicest part of the railway lands; leaving it to them to determine, at their good pleasure, how soon and what prices the intending emigrant may take them, and begin to make them valuable and productive to himself and the country. For the sake of making a false show of selling fast, you are throwing away the best chances of an effective and useful disposition of these lands. Then it is pretended that the pre-emptors will, at the end of three years, pay in bulk four-tenths of their pre-emption price with the interest. The hon. gentleman seriously suggests that 3,000 homesteaders, who go in 1880, will, in 1883, pay in $696,000, or $232 a piece, on account of their preemptions; that the next lot will pay $928,000; the third, $1,000,000, and so on, until 1890, when the sums to be paid in by the pre-emptors will be $1,576,000. I quite agree with the hon. gentleman that the free-grant settlers will, as a rule, take up their preemptions. No doubt they will enter for them, and proceed to improve them, but there is equally little doubt that when the end of the third year comes round, the hon. gentleman's coffers will not be much fuller, by reason of the payments for preemptions then falling due. I do not mean to say he will not ultimately realise a considerable sum; but, I am talking of his calculation, that he will build this Railway in ten years practically out of receipts from these lands. I say that all the experience of all Governments with reference to sales of public lands is that the settler is slow to pay. Is the hon. gentleman going to tell these men, who have been straining every nerve to cultivate and improve these lands during their first three years, that unless they then pay up their preemption money, they shall forfeit their preemption? Is he going to use the landlord policy with reference to these settlers? Is he going to evict them? No; he has no intention of doing that. He will not even threaten them with eviction or forfeiture. I do not hear much talk of threatening even the speculators in case of default. Depend on it, there will be no such talk to the settlers. Judging from all past experience, the result will be, that settlers will feel secure—will feel that it is not necessary for them to pay promptly; and, indeed, to create a feeling of insecurity, by threats or harsh methods, would be most detrimental to the settlement of the country. Consequently, the calculations based upon the punctual receipts of revenue from these lands will be wholly falsified, even if all the other calculations should turn out true. The hon. gentleman expects to receive, in the fourth year, $1,870,000; in the following year, $2,622,000; in the next year, $3,230,000; in the next year, $4,112,090; in the next year, $5,058,000; in the next year $5,833,000; in the next year, $6,877,000; while the last year of this series of rapid progression is to yield $7,562,000, to be received in cash from the sales of North-West lands—an aggregate of $38,593,000, apart from the sums not yet due of $32,712,000. Now, I venture to say, if every one of the other calculations be realised, if the hon. gentleman gets into that country the amount of emigration he expects, and at the time he expects, if he makes sales to the numbers and at the prices he expects, these calculations as to the dates and amounts of his receipts will, under no circumstances, be realised. Under no circumstances will he receive these sums, or anything like them, at these times or anything like them. Let the fourth and subsequent years be the test. The receipts from settlers in all the earlier period will be relatively small; and not before these settlers, who can pay only out of their surplus profits after improving their lands and maintaining their families, achieve prosperity and become able to pay, will you find the lands becoming, as they ought to be, a source of revenue to the country. Even according to the corrected calculations, the Government would be receiving in the fourth year $1,231,000, running up to nearly $5,000,000 in the last year, so that these corrected calculations are, in this respect, almost as preposterous as the original. Depend on it your returns will be long deferred. Then the hon. gentleman takes up the question of the expenses of management and surveys, which he estimates at $2,400,000. Now, judging by the results in the United States, that also is quite too low. You will remember that there is an enormous acreage to be surveyed. If all the lands were fairly good lands, and the surveys could be kept only abreast of the settlement, you would require to survey 49,000,000 acres to effect the settlement the hon. gentleman expects, not that so much land is to be taken up by that number of persons; but to give room for the expected homesteaders to take up their free grants, so many townships as will comprise nearly 50,000,000 acres must be surveyed. But that is on the assumption that all the land to be surveyed is good land, and that all the land surveyed will be taken up. I say that is an assumption we cannot reasonably act upon, since there is bad and broken land, and since you must keep surveys ahead of settlement; and it is more correct, perhaps, to conjecture, as we are now in the region of conjecture, that 80,000,000 will be the amount of acres required to be surveyed, in order to effect the disposal of the smaller quantity, than to conjecture that 50,000,000 will be the number. Then, there is the cost of collecting all these millions of money from all these thousands of men. I think the charge too low. I do not know what the immigration policy of the Government is to be, whether they intend largely to increase the expense for that purpose or not, or to devote the available amount to the North-West; but it is obvious that, if these lands are to be rendered productive by immigration, the cost of inducing immigration should be considered a first charge upon the lands; and that this, in addition to the cost of surveys and management, should reasonably be deducted from the proceeds of the lands, before you can apply anything to railway purposes. Indeed, I may go further and say, that the cost of payments for Indians of over

$550,000 a year, and for the Mounted Police Force about $300,000 a year, in all $850,000 a year, and other local charges, are prior charges on the proceeds of the lands. I maintain that the whole thing is visionary. Indeed, I may remind the House that when the hon. gentleman opened his remarks, he demanded a certain postulate to be granted to him; that he declared later that he would prove his figures to a demonstration; and then at the end he offered us to abate one-half. "If you will not," says he, "take the whole of my estimate, take one-half." A calculation commencing so pretentiously, and terminating in so humiliating a manner, was hardly, perhaps, worthy the serious attention I have been compelled to ask the House to give it. Now, with reference to the application of all this money. In the announcement of the First Minister, he took $38,600,000 to be received in the eleven years, and deducted at the close of the period $2,400,000 for management, the net cash coming in being thus, $36,200,000. Set this against the $60,000,000 he estimated to be spent on the Pacific Railway, and there is a small balance of $24,000,000! Yet the hon. gentleman tells us the cost of the road is to be met out of the land sales, without encroaching on our taxes. But that is not the true state of the account. The hon. member for Gloucester at once pointed out that the hon. Minister had not allowed for the interest on the cost of construction, and that this would absorb a large part of the receipts. To that, no reply was then made; but the next day the hon. the Finance Minister acknowledged the justice of the criticism, and, in that free and off-hand manner in which he is accustomed to deal with millions of money, agreed that $18,000,000 for interest on the $60,000,000 should be deducted from the receipt. First, he would reduce the hon. First Minister's estimate by half, then take off $18,000,000 from the remainder, and still, said he, enough remains to build the road. Even the $18,000,000 the hon. the Finance Minister was willing to deduct, does not represent the true state of the case. As I said the other evening, we shall have spent, up to the 30th of June, $15,000,000, in round numbers, on the Pacific Railway, the interest paid on which, at only 4 per cent., would amount to $1,272,000 up to that period. But, taking the figures of the hon. Minister given the other night, namely, a further expenditure of $10,000,000 a year for the two first years, and $5,000,000 a year for each of the eight following years, allowing interest on these at 5 per cent., and on the old balance at 4 per cent.; and taking the receipts from lands as the hon. Minister himself erroneously estimated them, then the result would be a yearly deficiency for interest so large as to run up in the third year to $3,332,000, and in the sixth year to stand at $698,000. The account gets to the credit side in the year 1887, and from that time the interest is paid, and something is available towards the principal; but the practical result would be a credit, according to that calculation, not compounding the interest in the earlier period or crediting the later yearly surpluses to capital until the close of the term, of $12,631,000 only to the capital account of the Pacific Railway. But according to the corrected calculations, there would be a deficit of interest, swelling each year until in 1885 it reaches a sum of over five millions, thence gradually diminishing, until at the close of the term it stands at $1,478,000, so that the practical result would be that, at the close of the term there would be nothing accomplished out of the proceeds of the lands, except to pay the bulk of the interest on the cost of construction, and the whole capital account, with a portion of interest, would remain due. Let me summarise these results—the statement of the hon. First Minister gave him a net return from lands of $68,900,000, against an expenditure of $60,000,000, leaving a credit balance of $8,900,000. The corrected statement gives him a net return of $44,470,000 only, and an expenditure for principal of $60,000,000, and for interest, excluding arrears of interest, of $23,560,000, in all $83,560,000, leaving a debit balance of $39,090,000—a trifling error in the grand result of about $48,000,000. And, when you remember that even this calculation is, as I have proved, based upon wholly visionary estimates, I think it is established that, as business men, we cannot build largely on the taxes of this country being lightened in respect of the construction of this Railway within the next few years.

My conclusion is this, that although we may receive, and I hope we will receive, in the time to come, a considerable revenue from our lands in the North-West, yet we cannot, as prudent men, expect that we will early receive such a large amount, or anything approaching it, or anything approaching one-half the amount which the hon. Minister suggested; that we cannot expect that the immediate charge and strain upon the resources of the country, involved in the Ministerial programme, will be early relieved by the receipts from lands. We must look, therefore, to our other resources for the present bearing of that strain, and when these large receipts do come in they will come in only to recoup us for the long years of arrears of interest which will meantime have accrued, and will not do much towards the liquidation of the original cost. These fantastic calculations do not bear investigation. They are based on extravagant speculations in everything tending to increase the receipts, and on erroneous figures besides; they are based on untrustworthy estimates in everything tending to diminish the charge, and on erroneous figures besides; and, on the whole, I declare that no sane business man would incur large liabilities on the chance of meeting them out of such resources. Now, Sir, I for one, have no wish to prevent any expenditure which is essential for the settlement of the country. I wish the House to understand that that is, at any rate, no part of my policy. On that subject, as I have said, the die is cast. Most of us believe that we have a prospect there; and I want all to unite in the effort to realise that prospect. I think even those who do not believe it to be so bright as others do will agree in making the effort. I wish that we should direct our exertions to every step calculated to make the best of that country; to settle it at the earliest day; to give it as soon as possible a productive population, and to make it a prosperous and influential portion of the Dominion. It is because I want the great experiment to have a fair chance of success, because I believe that, committed as we are, it is our duty and our interest to give it that chance of success, that I implore the House to direct its undivided attention at present to this point; to apply the available resources, scanty as they are, of this country, exclusively to that backbone of the whole enterprise, without the success of which there can never be a Pacific Railway from sea to sea, without the success of which our whole plan and future may be scattered to the winds. Prudence in our expenditure is essential to the success of settlement. Do you suppose that those intelligent persons who are about to emigrate to this country will be attracted or repelled by the proposal to expend $30,000,000 in the gorges of British Columbia? Do you suppose that the suggestion that we can afford to expend this large sum at present, because these settlers will repay it in taxes and land purchases, is calculated to encourage them to go into that country? Do you suppose that these people, scanning the policy and programme of the Administration upon this subject, and understanding that this vast expenditure is to be at once incurred because they will pay it all, may not say, "perhaps we had better not join, perhaps we had better not be partners in this gigantic undertaking if we alone are to meet the expense." Prudence in the limitation of our burdens, prudence as to the increase of the National Debt, prudence as to every enterprise the Government are undertaking at the same time that they are undertaking the settlement of this country, is an essential condition to the success of their effort at colonisation. Do not frighten away those who might join us, by your lavish and reckless engagements, based on their anticipated payments and their expected taxes. Our position is critical, and we should husband our resources for what that position may demand. The hon. Minister himself stated yesterday that Canada stood in a critical position. I agree with him, and standing in that position—more critical in my view, perhaps, than in the hon. gentleman's—it is doubly necessary that we should take care not to undertake just now more than is generally agreed to be essential to the success and the future of our country. Tide us over for the present, and if your expectations are realised, if you receive these large sums within the short period you have predicted, if within four or five years these sums are paid into the Treasury, then it will be soon enough to decide that there is a practical basis upon which business men can act; soon enough to agree that there is a foundation upon which we can proceed to build in British Columbia. Then we can honestly tell our constituents that there is money, obtained from the lands, out of which the Railway can be built, without further adding to their burdens. But, in the meantime, we cannot honestly say this; we cannot show them that the resources of this country, without using means raised by the heavy burdens of taxation levied for the purpose, will suffice to build the Railway in British Columbia; and I, for one, stand opposed to the expenditure of these heavy taxes in any such way. And now, having shown that we cannot depend on the sales, and must look to the taxes, at present, to meet the proposed expenditure, it is necessary to ascertain our present condition, as compared with our condition in 1871, and to examine into the state and resources of this country. Circumstances render it extremely difficult to form an accurate estimate of our position. Fortunately, we are called upon to form an estimate now, not for one or two years, but for a series of years. We have a policy, a plan for ten years, before us, and we are, therefore, called upon to measure the future of this country for a long term. The best course is to look back a little and see whether from the lessons of the past we can derive any light to be shed upon our future condition. It is difficult, as I have said, to deal, even in a series of years, with the question of the progress of this country. The vicissitudes of the seasons, upon which depend our main industry and source of wealth, the changes in the markets of the world, in the price of grain, and in the price of lumber, our principal articles of export, the changes in the world's trade, the succeeding depressions and inflations which result in alterations in the profits of our shipping business, and in the cost of the goods we import, all these circumstances render it an extremely difficult task for a Finance Minister from time to time to forecast the future of Canada, even for a short eighteen months; and it is with unfeigned diffidence that I venture to offer some general observations with reference to the past as throwing light on the present and future of our country. For three years after Confederation the amount of our imports was almost stationary. The times were hard. That period was followed by several years of tremendous inflation. The hon. member for Cardwell referred to one circumstance, which, no doubt reduced to some extent the apparent amount of our imports, namely, our illicit trade with the United States. There was also the excessive value of commodities. These circumstances, no doubt, are to be considered as modifying the apparent inflation. But, apart from the question of illicit trade, these inflated values only show after all that we got less for our money. They do not prove that we paid less money. After this period of inflation, there have followed four years of ever widening and deepening depression; and the first question I put is, how far our tax-paying powers have really increased since 1871, when it was resolved that we should not increase the existing rate of taxation in order to complete the Pacific Railway. Two factors have to be considered in order to solve this question—first, the increase of population—secondly the increase of resources. Increase of population does not necessarily mean increase of tax-paying power. We may have more heads, but each head may be poorer, and consequently there may be a smaller aggregate of surplus wealth, though divided among a larger number of heads. In this case there would be no increase of tax-paying power. I do not believe that the people of Canada are, on the whole, able to pay more taxes per head to-day than in 1871. There has been an enormous shrinkage in our lumber trade, from $28,000,000 in one year to $13,000,000 in another. There have been many bad crops. There has been a great shrinkage in bank stocks, and a number of these institutions has been swept away altogether. There has been a great depreciation in real estate, not so much as compared with 1871, but sufficient to be destructive of any increase between 1871 and 1879. There has been a general and long prevailing and deep state of depression in trade and commerce, resulting in the loss of an enormous amount of capital. Besides this, there has been a large increase in federal, provincial, municipal, corporate, and private indebtedness. Anyone who listened to the debate, the other day, could not but be appalled by the statements as to the amount loaned on mortgages in the Province of Ontario. Added to all this, there has been an upward turn in the price of gold, which is unfavourable to all borrowing and indebted communities. Against these unfavourable circumstances are to be set expenditures, which have taken the form of assets. We have made large federal, provincial, corporate and private improvements. But these are represented in part by premature or mis-directed applications of capital. No one will pretend that the Intercolonial Railway, located as it is, is a good commercial speculation; and several Railways in Ontario and elsewhere have been constructed at a time and on routes which prevent their value from equalling their cost. Many of these public works will in future be very valuable, but at present they do not form an addition to our resources commensurate with the burdens they involve. The tax-paying powers of the people of Canada, man for man, are, I repeat, no greater than in 1871. One proof of that is, we are actually buying less. For four years the imports have been diminishing. Last year they reached the lowest point for nine years. It may be truly said that we bought less in nominal value, because goods were cheaper, and we got more for our money; but that observation does not hold good to the full extent to which it is sometimes advanced, for values in 1871 had not reached their maximum, and were not so far above those for 1879 as to account, to any adequate extent, for this difference in the amount of our importations. The truth is that we are not buying largely, because we are too poor to buy largely—we cannot afford it. And this, as I said, is a corroborative proof that we are not better able, man for man, to pay taxes than in 1871. Nor will an inflation next year, or the year after, if there should be one, alter the facts. We do not proceed by regular steps, we go up and down; and on this occasion it is our rate of progress for a series of years, not for a year or two, that we are called on to consider. Speaking generally, in view of the history of the last decade, and in view of our resources and our true elements of prosperity, old Canada cannot expect a genuine rapid increase of her resources. I hope for progress; though it will be hindered by our Tariff laws. The hon. gentlemen opposite hope for progress on account of our Tariff laws. Both are agreed in hoping for progress. That there will be progress I have no doubt, but I think it will not be such as to interfere with the correctness of the calculations I am making. I call on those who indulge in more sanguine hopes to give a reason for the faith that is in them. I believe hard work, rigid economy, prudent management, and gradual progress and accumulation is the fate of this country, as a whole, and of its population individually. I regard it as no unhappy fate, I regard it as possessing great and compensating advantages. From the character of our climate, and the nature of our resources, and other circumstances, from the necessities of our situation, we are taught to practice virtues whose possession is a full compensation for the absence of those somewhat easier conditions of life, those more lightly earned gains, those brighter material prospects which may, perhaps, be observed in some other lands. Sturdy independence, manly labour, vigorous exertion, prudent self-restraint, wise economy and temperance, these are great and satisfying compensations; but, Sir, we must show our appreciation of these virtues by an earnest effort to practice them, not merely in private life, but as the distinguishing characteristics of our national existence. If we do not, we fail; and when you find in this country apparent progress by leaps and bounds, you may conclude that that progress is more fictitious than real, and will be followed by disaster which will sweep away our fictitious gains, and leave us poorer than before. Now, Sir, assuming that our tax-paying power is no greater, man for man, than in 1871, we have only to ascertain the increase of population since that time. The hon. Minister of Finance roughly estimated our population the other day at 4,000,000, that is, including the new Provinces. For obvious reasons I take, for the old Provinces, the rate of increase demonstrated by the last Census, although I think that too large an estimate; and I make out our population at 4,050,000, including the new Provinces, which, for this purpose, may be reckoned at something under 200,000. Now, of the new Provinces, it may be repeated that whatever their tax-paying powers, their tax-consuming powers are still more remarkable. I have an interesting table of the results as to the collection and distribution of our Revenue for the first ten years after Confederation, which will answer the prudent query of the hon. Finance Minister yesterday, in reference to the tax-paying power of Manitoba and British Columbia, when he asked why we should not count on a large net revenue from the North-West, having regard to the example furnished by those Provinces. Now, Sir, assigning to each Province the revenue derived from it, as shown by the Public Accounts, and charging each Province with its local services, and with such parts of the Federal services as are by the Public Accounts distinguished and assigned to the separate Provinces, the results are as follows: We collected in all $198,000,000; we spent in all $189,350,000; leaving a surplus of $8,650,000. The receipts from Manitoba were $876,000, the distinguished expenditure, $1,599,000; the deficit on this head, $722,000. For Prince Edward Island the receipts were $1,596,000; the expenditure, $2,624,000; the deficit, $1,027,000. For British Columbia the receipts were $2,558,000; the expenditure, $3,441,000; the deficit, $883,000. For Nova Scotia the receipts were $19,112,000; the expenditure $21,175,000; the deficit $2,060,000. Then there come the receipts and expenditure on joint account for services not divided among the Provinces, for example, Legislation, Civil Government, a large part of the interest on the Public Debt, and other undivided items, and all the expenditures in connection with the North-West and the Pacific Railway. For these the receipts were $7,599,000; the expenditure, $50,581,000; the deficit, $42,982,000; adding to this the aggregate of the provincial deficits before stated, you find a total deficit of $47,677,000. Now, how was this met? We come to the surpluses. The receipts from New Brunswick were $17,106,000; the expenditure, $16,957,000, leaving a surplus of $508,000. The receipts from Ontario and Quebec, jointly, were $149,160,000; the expenditure, $93,340,000; leaving a surplus of $55,820,000, thus making with the New Brunswick surplus, a total surplus for these three Provinces of Quebec, Ontario and New Brunswick, of $56,328,000, to be applied to the payment of the deficits before enumerated, amounting in the aggregate to $47,677,000, leaving, after their payment, a nett balance of $8,650,000 applicable to the reduction of debt. We find, therefore, that Ontario and Quebec have to provide and have provided for the bulk of this vast undivided expenditure resulting from the Confederation of the various Provinces comprising the Dominion; New Brunswick having supplied towards her share the sum of $508,000, and Ontario and Quebec, after providing their own share, having provided the share also of all the other Provinces of the otherwise unprovided balances. I have not divided the various items for Ontario and Quebec, which are given jointly in the Public Accounts; but taking a few great heads of Revenue, a general conclusion may be reached. Thus the Excise duties of Ontario amounted to $26,732,000; those of Quebec to $13,647,600. The Customs duties for Ontario (allowing those on dutiable goods going into Ontario, though entered at Montreal, according to the results ascertained after exhaustive examination by the Commission which dealt with that subject some years ago), amounted to $60,725,000. The Customs duties for Quebec amounted, according to the same results, to $31,357,000. I estimate the division of Bill Stamps to be two-thirds for Ontario, and one-third for Quebec, making $1,106,000 for the former, and $552,000 for the latter. The general result on these heads is to give a revenue from Ontario of $87,954,000, and from Quebec of $45,556,000. I know that these figures may be disputed in some respects by the people of the Maritime Provinces as to particular items; for example, those which have reference to expenditure on the Intercolonial Railway. I know it is contended, whether rightly or wrongly, that this expenditure should be entered as a general charge against the whole Dominion, and not charged separately against those Provinces. There may be, of course, other disputable details. I state this in order that the House may understand that these figures may be somewhat affected, but I am convinced that the result will not be very materially altered on that account. It will be seen from these statistics that some of the smaller Provinces, heavy as their contributions are—and I freely admit that several of them are heavier contributors per capita than some of the larger Provinces—are yet not adequate contributors to, on the contrary that they are heavy drains on the revenues of Canada; and it will be further seen that the bulk of the expenditure—I may say every shilling of the expenditure on the North-West and on the Pacific Railway—is contributed by the Province from which I have the honor to come. But apart from the question of the distribution of taxation, I have shown that our gross taxpaying power, as a whole, may be said to have been increased since 1871 by the addition of 560,000 souls, or sixteen per cent. to our population; that is, that if we can, or if we choose, to buy, man for man, goods to the same amount in money, as we bought man for man in 1871, our consumption of imported or excisable goods, and consequently our revenue would, under the same rates of taxation, be larger by 16 per cent. This then is the estimated measure of elasticity—not indeed the actual measure, for, as I have said, we are not buying, we cannot afford to buy, on the same scale—and, therefore, it is altogether too favourable a view for us to take. But let us adopt it for a moment; and proceed to enquire at what rate our expenditures have increased during the same time. Sir, the increase in expenditures has been altogether disproportionate to the increase, even on the most favourable view, of our tax-paying power. Our gross expenditures have risen from $15,600,000, in 1871, to $24,800,000, in 1879; an increase of $8,800,000, or nearly 56 per cent. ! This, indeed, includes the charges on Revenue, which, in some cases, are represented by cross entries; but, on the whole, the charges on Revenue have increased seriously, relatively to the increased receipts. There are, in this branch of the expenditure, large added burdens. For example, in the Post Office, the deficiency, in 1871, was $203,000; in 1879, it was $612,000; an increased net charge of nearly 200 per cent. In Public Works, there was, in 1871, a surplus of $315,000; in 1879, a deficit of $817,000;

an adverse change of over $1,000,000. But, leaving out of account all the charges on Revenue, how does the remaining expenditure compare? In 1871, it was $13,250,000; in 1879, $18,890,000; an increase of $5,640,000, or over 42 per cent. Look at some of the items which produce this appalling result. The capital of our net debt stood in 1871, at $77,700,000; in 1879, it had risen to $147,480,000. It had almost doubled. It has since increased, so that it is now more than doubled; and still it goes rolling on. Our net annual charge for interest was in 1871, $4,300,000; in 1879, $6,660,000; an increase of $2,360,000, or nearly 55 per cent.; and it still goes rolling on. The increase in the charge for interest has not indeed kept pace with that of capital, for several reasons. We have raised a large sum from our people without interest, in the shape of legal tenders in circulation, and compulsorily held as bank reserves. We have issued several guaranteed loans at very low rates of interest. We have reborrowed to pay off old loans at a much lower rate of interest than the rate they bore; we have borrowed fresh money at better rates; and we have been borrowing at a discount, which, of course, means that we have been capitalising a material part of our charge for interest. But with all those advantages, real and apparent, I believe, our nett annual charge for interest will, by 30th June next, be increased by $2,700,000, a year or nearly 63 per cent. The truth is, Sir, that our annual foreign loans are now not much more than enough to pay our interest. Some part of them, indeed, have been of late years devoted in terms to that purpose; we have had yearly deficits, and have been obliged to borrow to pay our interest. But apart from this, the average annual loans to be raised for the next few years for Public Works will be not much greater in amount than our yearly interest payments. Can we go on so borrowing for ever? No, Sir, and the Minister who tells us he can, has yet prudently arranged to avoid an application to the London money market this year; and is about to try his hand at a cheap domestic loan. He is to ask us at home, out of our abundance, to supply him free of interest with the sum

he wants. Passing from the charge for debt, some of the items which comprise the ordinary annual expenditure show startling increases. The Provincial Subsidies have increased 31 per cent.; Civil Government, 34 per cent., with an enormous further increase in the present Estimates; Administration of Justice, 83 per cent.; Penitentiaries, 46 per cent.; Indian grants, by $480,000; North-West Police, by $290,000; in Legislation there has been an enormous increase; with a general result that the ordinary expenditure has increased between 1871 and 1879, by $2,330,000, or over 50 per cent. In the face of this startling and wholly disproportionate increase of our expenditures over our tax-paying power, is it not plain that we have been going too fast? We have been running ahead of our resources. We have increasing our expenses more than three times as fast as our tax-paying power. Our situation is truly critical. We have been imitating, and even surpassing, the extravagance and recklessness of the nations composing the European system. The European nations in the fourteen years from 1864 to 1879, increased their National Debts 65 per cent. in the aggregate; but we have doubled ours in nine years. The budgets of those nations were increased in the last fourteen years 40 per cent.; but we have increased ours 56 per cent. in nine years. It is quite true that our expenditure has been more productive than theirs. We have not been engaged in numerous or frightfully expensive wars. We have expended large sums in improvements more or less productive. But for all that, we have been immoderate in our expenditure, we have acted extravagantly, we have gone beyond our tax-paying power, and we have surpassed the European system in the increase of our annual charge. I say we should not present to intending immigrants such a similarity in financial management to the countries which they are leaving, mainly because of their heavy burdens. We should rather endeavour to present to them a cheering contrast to the European system; and this the more because there is one country, our rival and competitor in the immigration market, which does present a marked contrast to the European system. While Canada is so lavishly ircreasing her yearly expenditure and National Debt, the United States has presented to the people of Europe the unique example of an enormous reduction in its National Debt, and it is that fact which constitutes one of our greatest difficulties in competing with that country for immigrants. I dare say the hon. gentleman will accuse me of being "unpatriotic," but it is no use blinking the facts. It is not unpatriotic to say what is true.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER : The hon. gentleman mistakes if he thinks I object to his stating the fact that a protectionist nation has succeeded in reducing its debt. I should certainly not make any such objections.

MR. BLAKE : I am not now discussing the general question of Free-trade and Protection. However achieved, these are the results. Nor must it be forgotten that a part of the increase in Europe has been applied to public improvements. Much public money has been expended in the construction of railways there. May not the emigrant, flying from burdens in his own country—flying from an enormous National Debt and annual Budget, say that it is prudent for him to fly to a country which presents a contrast to the one he is leaving, which shows a continually decreasing debt, and which, therefore, promises to lighten the burdens of taxation? We do not present that contrast—the United States do present that contrast. They tell the emigrant that they have reduced their debt by $630,000,000, their interest by a still larger relative amount, their military expenses enormously, and that they are presenting a prospect of progress in the same direction. Why should we not emulate their plan, by placing, so far as our circumstances permit, this contrast before emigrants, instead of following the example set by the old countries from which we expect them to come? The United States has reduced its National Debt by 30 per cent. of its present amount; and its Budget, though large and extravagant compared to its scale before the war, and embracing many millions for war pensions and interest on war debt, now compares not unfavourably with our own. Before the war the expenditure of the United States, with a population of twenty-seven and one-half millions, showed a charge of $2 a head.

Of course we pay large sums for provincial services, which do not in the United States form part of the federal charge. It is perfectly true that a comparison would be unfair without a very large reduction on that account, but, making that large reduction, it is equally true that the comparison is not unfavourable after all; that our system has become extravagant and onerous, and has gone beyond the increase of the tax-paying powers of the country; and it is time to call a halt. In this expenditure there is included $1,272,000 for interest already paid on the Pacific Railway. There will be included $600,000 a year for future interest on the past expenditure on that Railway, and untold sums for interest on the further expenditure. How have we met all this, while our tax-paying powers have been increasing so slowly? How have we made both ends meet? Partly by fresh loans, and partly by adding to the taxation of the people. The hon. Finance Minister said, the other day, that the difference between the taxes of 1868 and 1879 was a dollar per head, and that the increased taxation thus calculated was four millions of dollars. He gave us the figures by a rough calculation. According to my view, the figures for that period, so calculated, would be $4,400,000, but I hold that this mode of computation is not a fair way of determining the real addition to the burdens of the people, and that they have been in truth increased to a much larger extent. That mode might be fair on the assumption that the people were consuming relatively the same amount of goods as formerly; but if in fact we are consuming a smaller value per head of goods, while we are paying a larger sum per head of taxes, it is obvious that the added taxation upon that limited consumption, which alone our poverty permits, has risen to a greater amount than $4,400,000, and and to a larger amount than $1 a head. Suppose, for example, that our imports for consumption were diminished by one half, while the taxes we paid remained the same as before, it is obvious that the burden of taxation on imports would be doubled. It becomes necessary then to ascertain and compare the rates of taxation of 1871 and 1880. There are three principal heads of taxation—first, Bill

Stamps, to which it is not necessary to refer as the amount is not very large, and there has been no material change in the tax. Taking up the second head, the duties of Excise, I will not trouble the House with any calculations as to malt and malt liquors, because the increased tax has now been taken off. The duty on spirits, estimated on the quantity entered for consumption in 1879, at the rate collected in 1880, would be \$3,650,000; and on the same quantity, at the rate for 1871, \$2,750,000. The increased tax is, therefore, \$900,000, or 33 per cent. of an addition. It may be alleged that the quantity entered for consumption in 1879 was abnormally large, and consequently, that the gross sum of \$900,000 is in excess of the increase on actual consumption. Were this so, it would not, of course, affect the rate of increase which would remain at 33 per cent. But I dispute the allegation, for it will be found that the quantity warehoused in 1879, is far below the corrected average for the nine years from 1871 to 1879, and is almost equal to the uncorrected average for that period. It is, therefore, obviously not an excessive consumption. I admit that the hon. gentleman can hardly expect so great a consumption this year, but, in my opinion, that is largely due to the fact that the tax has been raised beyond the true point of greatest productiveness. The magnitude of the tax has given rise to a great deal of smuggling or illicit distillation, thus interfering with the revenue, though not with the consumption, or with the cost to the people. I hope that the hon. gentleman may be right in attributing some part of the diminution to the prevalence of sounder views, as to the wisdom of abstaining from the use of liquor. But, after all, the test which I have applied, is the only fair one, and this proves that the quantity is not excessive. As to tobacco, the duty on the quantity entered for consumption, in 1879, at the rates for 1880, would be \$1,580,000. At the rates for 1871, \$1,140,000. The increased tax is, therefore, \$440,000, or 39 per cent. of an addition. The consumption is below the corrected average for the nine years, and, of course, far below the uncorrected average. It is, therefore, clear that this represents the minimum addition on this head. The result then is that the increased excise on spirits and tobacco is \$1,340,000, or over 34 per cent. of an addition. Now I come to the last and greatest head of taxation, the Customs' duties; and I wish to show the House what is the increase in taxation on this head on the whole mass of the imported goods, dutiable and free, which we consume. To ascertain our consumption it is obvious that you must not take the total importations; nor can you, with propriety, take the goods entered for consumption. But by deducting from these the value of foreign grains and the products of foreign grains imported, since these articles are practically only in transitu, and are either exported in specie or set free for exportation an equivalent amount of home grain, you arrive, as nearly as the information given by our returns will allow, at the quantity of imported goods, free and dutiable, which we actually consume. This forms the basis of my calculation. Allowing for the temporary duties imposed in 1870, and taken off in 1871, by a proceeding which came into operation prior to the date of the taxation resolution, the rate of taxation on the imported goods, free and dutiable, which were consumed in the four years from 1867 to 1871 was, upon the average, 13.90 per cent. This, then, I take to be a fair ascertainment of the burden of our Customs taxation in 1871. But I may say that, even if you make no allowance for the temporary duties to which I have referred, the average rate will be raised only to 14.21 per cent., an increase which you will see is not sufficient materially to affect the results. During the subsequent three years (1872, 1873 and 1874), in the course of which there were considerable remissions of taxation, and in which also the very large consumption may have somewhat disturbed the relation between the quantities of free and of dutiable goods, the average rate fell to 12.33 per cent. In 1875, the first completed year after the increase made under the late Government, the rate was 14.32 per cent., a large increase indeed, an increase of nearly one-sixth, on the average of the preceding three years, but after all a very trifling increase, an increase of only one-thirty-third, on the average rate between 1868 and 1871. But what is the rate now, as ascertained by the return for the first six months of the year? It is no less than 19.62 per cent. Nor does this represent the whole extent of the increase. The hon. Minister has told us that his revenue is suffering by reason of the excessive importation of goods in anticipation of the tariff. But the goods so imported were, of course, those of the class on which the largest increases were to be made. Of these, therefore, there has been an excessive supply, and by consequence an abnormal proportion of the importations for the last six months have been of goods paying the lower rates of duty. The over-importations being absorbed, and the imports reverting to their normal condition, these proportions will be changed, and consequently the average rate will be higher for the current six months; and, in the future, the Tariff will be found to inflict a charge considerably exceeding 20 per cent. on everything free or dutiable entered for consumption. But apart from this consideration, and assuming 19.62 per cent. to be the true rate, consider what this means compared with 13.90 per cent., the earlier rate. It means a new tax, a fresh tax, of $5\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. on the value of everything free and dutiable which we import for consumption. It means an increased rate of taxation of over 43 per cent., for 5.72 is more than 43 per cent. on 13.90. Our Customs duties are nearly half as heavy again as they were in the early period. Now, if you apply the new Tariff to our very small consumption for 1879, a consumption many millions smaller than that of 1871, and smaller than any year thereafter, the increased taxation will, on that small consumption, be \$4,075,000, and this, on the incredible assumption that we are not to increase the value of our imports, is the very smallest measure of our added Customs taxation. If to that you add \$1,340,000, the increase in Excise, you find that the additional taxation of this country on the small consumption of 1879 was more than \$5,400,000. This is far greater than the hon. Minister's estimate of \$4,000,000, but it is far less than the burden will be in case the consumption should become normal. It is true that the smallness of the value imported in 1879, is partly due to the comparative cheapness of goods, but we must not forget that I have been comparing it with 1871, when values, though higher than in 1879, had not gone nearly to their highest point; and after making every allowance for cheapness there remains a large deficiency to be accounted for only by the consideration that our poverty and our economy have led us to stint ourselves. But prices are rising, and hon. gentlemen say, good times are coming. What would this Tariff produce on a consumption of the average from 1872 to 1875, \$109,000,000? You can easily tell. It is about one-fifth. It would take out of your pockets in Customs nearly \$22,000,000! But let us try to arrive at a normal consumption. You can reach it in two ways. Take the consumption of 1871 and add 16 per cent. to represent the increase of population. This would give you, for 1879, a consumption of \$91,300,000. Or take together the nine years of inflation and depression, ending with 1879, and the uncorrected average would be \$91,000,000, less than the proper estimate, of course, but coming very close to the figure reached by the other mode. Assume, then, that for us, in 1879, \$91,000,000 would be a normal consumption of imported goods, you would pay in Customs \$17,850,000; in Excise of spirits and tobacco, \$5,230,000; in all \$23,080,000. While, at the old rates, you would have paid in Customs \$12,650,000; in Excise, \$3,890,000; in all \$16,540,000, an increased burden on your normal consumption of over \$6,500,000. And this is a fair estimate of the result of the Tariff at the Custom-house and Inland Revenue Office. It is, indeed, quite clear that, with higher prices and good times, the hon. Minister should get a Revenue. When, on an average, one-fifth part of everything we require to import, great or small, cheap or dear, necessary or luxury, raw material or manufactured article, free or dutiable, and two-fifths parts of what we drink and smoke are abstracted by Government for public uses, how in the world can Government fail to realise a Revenue? And yet, if things should so turn out, no doubt we shall find the hon. the Minister coming down next Session boasting of his feat, and endeavouring to persuade the country that he has conferred on it great blessings, when he has in fact only abstracted from it enormous sums by a raking and grinding Tariff, which is oppressive in its character and vexatious in its operation. But this is not all, Sir, or nearly all. We have been considering hitherto only the amounts that come into the hon. Minister's hands. But the uncounted millions which go into the pockets of the thousands of private tax-gatherers created by this Tariff, partly to unduly swell the legitimate profits of some industries, and the rest to compensate for the misdirected and unprofitable application of capital and labour to other trades; these millions though they are paid by the mass of the consumers, as surely as if they went into the Minister's hands, we are unable to ascertain or take into account. But this we know, that their receipt does not swell the Public Treasure. The people pay them, but the private, not the public tax-gatherer receives them; and so, though the people pay, they receive nothing in return. Sir, we have reached and passed, designedly passed, in many cases, the effective limits of a Revenue Tariff. We have been aiming at different and inconsistent ends. Pursuing revenue through imports, we have been attempting at the same time to check imports, on which our revenue depends, and to substitute for them home manufactures. And certain it is, that unless the hon. gentleman has wholly miscalculated his action, unless he has wholly bungled in the use of the great weapon he has been wielding, he will have stimulated home manufactures in respect of some of the articles of importation most productive of revenue. It is certain that he will have deprived the coffers of the country of the duties to be derived from those articles.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: As in the United States for instance.

MR. BLAKE: I do not propose, as I have already said, just now to enter into a general discussion of Free-trade and Protection, or to analyse the condition of the United States, or to examine how far they may be able to endure losses and to play tricks with the principles of political economy, which we can by no means afford. I think the distinctions are obvious. Nor do I intend to hazard a conjecture as to which of the two inconsistent objects which the hon. gentleman has been pursuing he will earliest or most signally succeed in. I say that an effect will be sooner or later produced; and while in case of good crops and high prices there is no doubt the last Customs revenue will next year be increased; there is no doubt, also, that a very large sum will be sooner or later—and I think tolerably soon—diverted from the Custom-house to the pockets of individuals. It is plain, by the admission of the hon. gentleman to the extent of $4,000,000, and, by the figures I have stated to a much larger amount, that we have greatly increased the burden of our taxation, and that every dollar that we are paying and are to pay for interest on the construction of the Pacific Railway, has come and must come out of this increased taxation, or from further additions to our burdens. It is obvious that you cannot meet in any other way the additional interest for the construction of the Railway; and, therefore, your plan is a deliberate violation of the settled and established policy of Parliament. To our present load we are to add many millions more for that work, and where, save from these odious and oppressive added taxes under which we labour, can you find the interest? Even apart from the Pacific Railway, and further expenditure on it, we are in a critical condition. We are trying one great experiment in trade. We are engaged in a supreme effort to make both ends meet in finance. We have not yet accomplished that feat. The hon. gentleman said a month or six weeks ago that the Revenue for this year would be within half a million of the expenditure. I wonder whether he will say so when he moves the second reading of the Supply Bill? We on this side believe the deficiency will be a great deal more. We are not yet in a state of equilibrium as to receipts and expenditure. We are engaged, I say, in one great experiment. Is one great experiment not enough at a time? Would it not be better not to plunge too deeply into experiments, speculations and conjectures? Would it not be better, as we are engaged in this large financial, commercial and fiscal venture, not to enter into fresh pecuniary engagements of an enormous character, based upon expectations of the vaguest and most fantastic kind? Are we now

finally to subvert the policy of Parliament re-enacted, as I have pointed out four several times, agreed to almost unanimously in 1876, that the arrangements for the construction of this road should be such as not to increase the burdens of taxation? Because, if you agree to the scheme of the Government, and go on now with the construction of the road in British Columbia, you commit yourselves to the construction of that road irrespective of the increased rate of taxation, and of the burdens imposed and to be imposed upon the country. I ask the House not to adopt that ruinous and reckless course; but in preference, to say they will limit themselves at present to the completion of the road between Fort William and Selkirk, and the prosecution of the prairie section, until we see the actual result in point of settlement, development, land sales and, above all, receipts of purchase money; and then, when that result has been ascertained, and a substantial fund has been provided from the sales, a fund available for the purpose of building in British Columbia without continuing to levy the present increased rates of taxation, that they will then, and not till then begin construction in British Columbia. Sir, we must consider the circumstances of this whole Confederation. We must not forget the mode in which it was formed. Hon. gentlemen opposite affirmed, with great warmth, in 1867, and for years afterwards, that it was but a union on paper, and that the reality and permanence of the connection were yet to be established and secured by a careful policy, and by a practical experience on the part of the people of its benefits. A cynic, indeed, has said that, as between Ontario and Quebec, it was rather a divorce than a union; that Nova Scotia was coerced into it, and compensated by damages for the loss of her honour; that New Brunswick was frightened into it, and compensated as well; that Manitoba was forced, and purchased into it, too; and that Prince Edward Island and British Columbia were—shall I say seduced into it? by pledges and promises—some impossible, all extravagant; at any rate by settlements of the most lavish character. But whether this description be true or not, at any rate hon. gentlemen admit that it was at first a union only on paper. I want to know what has been done to cement it, to make it real and permanent, to make it a union of hearts and interests, to give it vitality and strength? Look at the various Provinces. Almost every one, after all your better terms, is in deep financial difficulties, and is knocking at your doors for further aid. Imitating your extravagance they have outrun their resources, and they have come to look on you as the great tax-gatherers for the Provinces, believing that they may go as far as they please and that Canada must fill the void out of the federal revenues. You have seen the distribution of your revenues and your expenditure. You remember all the promises at the time of union, of low taxes and cheap government. All, all are broken. The vast sums you collect from the smaller Provinces, heavier per capita than you collect from old Canada, and a grievous burthen on their people, are yet, as I have shown you, quite inadequate to meet their share of the cost of confederation. Ontario settles the balance. That Province asks no special advantages. She claims no special favours. She is ready to do her part, and more than her part, in the furtherance of the common interest. But she may fairly demand of you a prudent, a just, an economical expenditure of those resources which she contributes, and an abstinence from rash engagements for speculative and unprofitable objects. This indeed is the common interest. It is the interest of the whole. What is the present application of our revenue? Public works and improvements throughout the old Provinces have been, as far as possible, wholly stopped; there is no money for them! Our inland shipping trade, labouring under the greatest depression and the keenest competition, is asking for relief from some of its burdens; there is no money for it! The vast expenditure by which Quebec has strained her resources to accomplish a connection with the great west is largely abortive. Let Quebec learn the prudence of not building railways before they are wanted, and act on the lesson now; there is no money for the eastern link! No, Sir, all that we can raise by taxes or by loans, all that we can beg or borrow, is to be sunk in the gorges of the Fraser. Should this be so? Are we to tax ourselves to the last point of endurance, and to mortgage heavily our future and our country for such an object as this? If it be true, as your trusted representative, your High Commissioner, said on the 27th March last, that "The duty of opening up the North-West is one we are to perform, not so much for ourselves as for the Empire at large; that the inhabitants of New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and even Ontario, have not much greater direct interest in opening up those wheat fields than the farmers of Yorkshire and Tipperary;" if this be true, how much less interest have we in opening up the canons and gorges of British Columbia? If it be true, as your High Commissioner said, on the same occasion, that, "it is impossible for us with our limited means to undertake alone the settlement of the North-West; that we have neither the people nor the money to do it;" if this be true, how much less are we able to add to that intolerable task the Columbia section of the Railway? Is this indeed the way to develop even such a poor and attenuated national spirit as is attainable by a people who are not permitted, who, perhaps, do not even aspire to their legitimate participation in the management of the concerns of the great family of nations? Is this indeed the way to infuse among us the spirit of unity and brotherly love, to make us one, and a contented people? You may perhaps partly satisfy the 12,000 souls in British Columbia; but only because your action is the pledge and hostage to them for the completion of this gigantic work, to the ruin of the whole. For us, for all, this is not the way. It is not by the forced connection of a restrictive Tariff, compelling each of us to trade with some other of us, to our loss, and against our will; it is not by the fatal load of an enormous debt, crushing out our energies and mortgaging our hopes; it is not by an added weight of taxes, lowering the value of our labours, and lessening the comfort of our lives; it is not by flinging, with a lavish hand, into the mountains and rivers of Columbia all you can collect or borrow, while you starve all public works at home; that you will accomplish a real success, that you will consolidate and harmonise the union. You are making our load heavier than that of the United States. You are making it heavier than we can bear. You are paving the way to that very annexation which you profess to dread; because you are bringing us to a plight in which we may be forced to do, as a people, what we heard described the other day as the sad end of many an imprudent individual borrower, to sell our poor equity of redemption to the only available purchaser. You profess unbounded faith in the permanence of your restrictive Tariff; you blame us for even discussing its operation, for throwing doubts on its durability; and at the same instant you send a High Commissioner to England, who asks her to close her ports against the grain of the world, in order that your farmers and hers may obtain from her millions of poor a higher price for the staff of life; and, who proposes in return, that you should open your ports to her manufactures, thus destroying your revenue, and at the same time, under the fierce and unchecked competition of the cheapest producers in the world, blasting at once every one of your home industries, which is said to be dependent on a duty for its existence. Such is your reckless, your inconsistent, your vacillating, your unpractical policy! Do you ask for mine? I will tell it. Set free the springs of legitimate revenue, by removing the obstacles designed to choke them. Open the avenues of legitimate trade, by lowering the legislative bars designed to close them. Free the people, as soon as may be, from the extortionate taxation by which you oppress them. Return to a moderate revenue tariff, the only practicable plan in our circumstances, and a necessary incident in whose operation is to give some of the so called advantages of protection to some of your native industries. By an earnest and searching plan of economy and retrenchment, directed to every branch of the public service, help to redress the balance between revenue and expenditure, while you lighten the people's burdens. But if you will do none of these things, if you will in all else persist in your mad career, at any rate in this be wise. If, in all else, you be rash, in this at any rate be discreet. Learn that our position is grave and serious, and that our future is dependent on present prudence. Complete the Railway to Red River; go on with the prairie section as fast as settlement demands. For that, risk something; since, as I have said, the die is cast. But in order to succeed in that, in order that you may have a chance later to do more, deal with that alone now. Bend to that great effort your undivided energies, your whole available resources. Postpone, meanwhile, the western work, and do not, by your present action, based on airy dreams and vain imaginations, risk the ruin of your country. Sir, I move, "to leave out all the words after 'that' and insert the following: 'the public interests require that the work of constructing the Pacific Railway in British Columbia should be postponed.'"

MR. BUNSTER: As a humble representative from British Columbia, I rise to offer a few remarks in answer to the hon. member for West Durham. Sir, the amendment proposed by that hon. member, judging from his past action with reference to the Pacific Province, does not surprise me. We all know, and the country knows, how determined has been the hostility of that hon. gentleman to British Columbia interests ever since the Province has entered the Canadian Union. Why he should pursue such a hostile course towards us is hard to fathom. British Columbia asks but little—simply fair play and a fulfilment of Treaty obligations. That is all the British Government expects under the Carnarvon Terms; and let me tell hon. gentlemen that the Imperial authorities are by no means disinterested in this matter, as the building of the Railway is to England something of supreme importance, from an Imperial point of view. It was only last summer that Col. Lovell, C.B., the Commanding Royal Engineer at Halifax, and that able and indefatigable soldier, Col. Strange, Royal Canadian Artillery of Quebec, were sent out to British Columbia to inspect our system of defence for the Province. There had also been visits from other officers in Her Majesty's army, for similar purposes, showing the anxiety on the part of the English Government to preserve British Columbia to the Empire. We all know Capt. Colomb's opinion of British Columbia. That gentleman, at the Royal Colonial Institute, spoke of British Columbia as being "the hub of the Empire!" Now if British Columbia is so valuable to the Empire, in her present isolated condition, how much more valuable would she be, if rendered more easily accessible by the Pacific Railway. Look at the wonderful progress of California, since she became connected with the outer world by rail—and look again, at what has been done at home, here in Canada, since the construction of the Grand Trunk, the Great Western and the Canada Southern. It may truly be said that Railways have "made" Canada and the United States. It must be remembered in this connection that British Columbia has never come to this Parliament, like Nova Scotia, when on the eve of rebellion, and other Provinces for "better terms." We do not want "better terms," but simply what has been promised to us. The hon. member for West Durham has often gone so far as to heap abuse on our Province. Now I think are all agreed that it is desirable to build the Pacific Railway, to settle and develop the Great North-West. Without that work Canada can never be a great nation. With many of the elements of national greatness, she would still lack unity and cohesiveness; the iron band only can furnish those. The hon. member for West Durham complained of spending nine millions in building the 127 miles in British Columbia, but what about that paltry sum compared with the development of the immense mineral wealth of that Province and the Dominion generally? Probably the builders would strike on a mine in what he calls a "sea of mountains"—that would more than pay for the building of the whole road. Hon. gentlemen may laugh, but we have the mineral wealth—gold and coal—in our Province, and all history shows that they go a long way towards national progress and stability. Two millions of Scotch people have done much for the greatness of England, by their iron, coal and other minerals, and their magnificent beds of limestone. British Columbia has been more to Canada than Ireland has been to England. Ireland is an agricultural country, and furnishes England with beef, butter, eggs and potatoes, which is what the North-West will do for us. British Columbia will do for Canada what Scotland has done for England. We will furnish the minerals that will afford employment to millions of people, and be to Canada what Scotland is to England, and Pennsylvania and California are to the United States. Now, these Rocky Mountains that have been so much belittled, have a reputation all over the world for their teeming mineral wealth, and every British Columbian feels proud of them, as every Englishman ought to, as long as Canada holds together. For the paltry sum of $9,000,000 the hon. Member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), would sever the connection between British Columbia and the Dominion of Canada. He forgets that we are now partners with Canada, and we are going to hold Canada to the bargain made with us. The hon. gentleman stated in his speech that, like Shylock, we demanded a pound of flesh. Does it look as if we demanded a pound of flesh when we gave Canada ten years to construct the Pacific Railway? We have been subjected to insults unworthy of a free and enlightend country like the Dominion. Now, I may just say, that we intend to hold Canada to the strict fulfilment of the pledge made by her Government with British Columbia. We have to-day at our end of the road some 5,000 tons of rails. The Government have let the contract for 127 miles, and I am happy to say it will be built at the end of three years. Had this Government remained in power in 1873 I do not hesitate to hazard the opinion that the road would have been built to-day, and we should not have to deplore the loss of 316 of our best British Columbian citizens by being drowned in a worthless American vessel like the Pacific.

SUPPLY—CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY.

DEBATE RESUMED.

House resumed the Debate on Mr. Blake's proposed amendment to the motion for the House to go again into Committee of Supply.

MR. BUNSTER: The amendment of the hon. member for West Durham I have before me. This is a matter which we have to look at as Canadians. I was very much astonished to hear the hon. member for West Durham try to make a point out of the fact that British Columbia was admitted into the Union on April 1st. This was a sorry jest, considering how we were "fooled" by the Government of which he (Mr. Blake) was a member. Probably the hon. gentleman would like to "fool" British Columbia a little more. Now, I should like to read the agreement made by the late Government with Lord Carnarvon, in order that hon. gentlemen may fully understand the nature of the compact and how solemnly Canada is bound in this matter. Here are the conditions contained in the despatch from Lord Carnarvon to the Earl of Dufferin:

"1. That the railway from Esquimaux to Nanaimo shall be commenced as soon as possible, and completed with all practicable despatch.

"2. That the surveys on the mainland shall be pushed on with the utmost vigour. On this point, after considering the representations of your Ministers, I feel that I have no alternative but to reply, as I do most fully and readily, upon their assurances that no legitimate effort or expense will be spared, first to determine the best route for the line, and secondly to proceed with the details of the engineering work. It would be distasteful to me, if indeed it were not impossible, to prescribe strictly any minimum of time or expenditure with regard to work of so uncertain a nature; but, happily, it is equally impossible for me to doubt that your Government will loyally do its best in every way to accelerate the completion of a duty left freely to its sense of honour and justice.

"3. That the waggon-road and the telegraph line shall be immediately constructed. There seems here to be some difference of opinion as to the special value to the Province of the undertaking to complete these two works; but, after considering what has been said, I am of opinion that they should both be proceeded with at once, as indeed is suggested by your Ministers.

"4. That $2,000,000 a year, $1,500,000 shall be the minimum expenditure on railway works within the Province from the date at which the surveys are sufficiently completed to enable that amount to be expended on construction. In naming the amount I understand that, it being alike the interest and the wish of the Dominion Government to urge on with all speed the completion of the works now to be undertaken, the annual expenditure will be as much in excess of the minimum of $2,000,000 as in any year may be found practicable.

"5. Lastly, that on or before the 31st of December, 1890, the railway shall be complete and open for traffic from the Pacific seaboard to a point at the western end of Lake Superior, at which it will fall into connection with existing lines of railway through a portion of the United States, and also with the navigation on Canadian waters. To proceed at present with the remainder of the railway extending by the country northward of Lake Superior to the existing Canadian lines, ought not, in my opinion, to be required, and the time for undertaking that work must be determined by the development of settlement and the changing circumstances of the country. The day is, however, I hope not very distant, when a continuous line of railway through Canadian territory will be practicable, and I look upon this portion of the scheme as postponed rather than abandoned."

I wish to point out that there is no harbour north of San Francisco, as good as that of Nanaimo. This road will have to be extended to the seaboard, and I maintain that Nanaimo is the most desirable point to connect. The people of this Dominion, by restoring the right hon. leader of the Government to power, tacitly told him to go on with the road. Now, we are met by the hon. member for West Durham, who says, the work on the road should be postponed. The road will not be postponed. The march of progress demands its early construction and completion. The hon. the Minister of Finance has made arrangements for the money. The hon. the Minister of Railways has sufficient rails on the banks of the Fraser river, and on Vancouver Island for carrying out the undertaking, sent out in good faith for the building of that Railway, and the sooner the hon. the Minister of Railways, and the people of Canada, make up their minds to complete the road, the better. At present, so long as the Government exhibit a fair disposition, in place of abuse, of doing justice, we are willing to accept the situation, but I consider the Government of the day made a mistake in not commencing at Esquimaux and going eastward. If they had built that road they would have done an injustice to the largest population of British Columbia, to that part where the wealth and influence exist. Our Provinces would be sufficient to give it the means to build the road. We have scarcely less than eight or ten ships always waiting for cargoes, and the vessels are compelled to employ tow-boats, at a great expense, having to pay 50c. per ton. Then reckoning the extra insurance, and the extra pilotage, altogether the cost amounts to about 75c. per ton, which makes the expense equal to a penny a ton per mile. Now, that is considered a good fair price on railroads in Europe. A penny per mile will pay the price of having coal carried on railways in England; and while on this subject, allow me to state, that this road can be built very much cheaper than a road can be built in England, or in the United States.

An Hon. MEMBER: Carried.

MR. BUNSTER: O, yes; carried of course, as the Governmental policy will be, I hope. Having said so much about the Island road, we will now turn to the national continental highway, from Ocean to Ocean. A great deal has been said about the American roads. Let us see what they have accomplished. Now, I have here Croft's Tourist, a reliable and trustworthy work, written by an Englishman. This gives a little history of the Union Pacific Railway. Now, did the hon. member for West Durham, when he was trying to postpone the arrangements for the building of our Railway, ever allude to the great advantage this Railway would be, not only to Canada, but Great Britain in case of war. This is a national work. The whole of Great Britain is willing to furnish $20,000,000 to Sir John A. Macdonald, the right hon. member for Victoria, the moment he wishes to ask for them. We all know that Great Britain has been the mistress of the seas from time immemorial, and she intends to remain mistress of the seas, and no one knows it better than Sir John, our Chieftain. He knows he can go over to England at any moment and we can furnish him with the raw material for their factories. We want to build this Railway and he knows very well how to do it. He did it last summer; he got all the money he wanted. It is simply absurd; it is a fraud on the face of it, to go back on a bargain with this young Province, even though it was made on the 1st of April, as the hon. member for West Durham has said. Let me tell him that if it was made on the 1st of April, British Columbians are not such fools as not to know whether they are making a good bargain or not; but instead of receiving a railroad they have received nothing but abuse up to the present time; and but for the confidence that we have in the present Government, British Columbia would fling Canada over, and go back to the old flag that has braved the battle and the breeze for a thousand years. When the Americans started the road to which I have just alluded, it was said that it was of great importance to get money, and any one reading the history of that road, and that company will know two young Englishmen got up bonds; one went to England and carried out the enterprise, obtained the money, and have carried out the enterprise successfully, and what is the consequence to-day? The consequence is that that road was built, and that is the way that that country was populated; and I may tell the hon. member for West Durham, that land their is now selling for, from $12 to $25 per acre. Now, however, allow me to draw a comparison from the very map which he produced last evening. The coloured part there represented, is forested land, all we now how valuable that is especially when cleared. By the scale of this map, (and I have measured by that scale) we have one valley there measuring 100 miles by 500 miles—and what is that? That is the best part of our country, for it is prairie land, and it is acknowledged that prairie land is the best land in Canada; because it can be tilled and made available for settlement at once. I will not say anything about our mines, our gold mines, and our coal mines, because I have already referred to them. Now we come to Vancouver Island. Take our coal fields, which are not to be surpassed in Pennsylvania or England. Anybody taking the trouble to inform himself, will be convinced that my statement is correct. Then we will take our rivers, which it is well-known, are teeming with fish with which we load ships from Fraser River and from Victoria Harbours, and send to all quarters of the globe. It is said, by authorities in England, that our fish—especially the salmon—excel all others in the world. Notwithstanding all this we have suffered lately from being excluded from the American market, in their taking advantage of us by putting a tax on our fish-cans which our fishermen put up. This reminds me, Sir, of what we have suffered in order to remain in this Confederation and be true to Canada, if we were not part and parcel of the Dominion, if we were not loyal to the old flag, we might be able to make our own Treaties with our neighbours, and we might get rid of a great many difficulties under which we now labour. We might be able to make Treaties with the United States, which the hon. member for West Durham has so much lauded to-day. He lauded the United States up to the skies. He told the people from England, Ireland, and Scotland not to settle in Canada—they could get better advantages in the United States, and all this in the face of the fact that we have a better country here than the United States, and it will be far superior when we have this railway. We will then possess of one the greatest country under the sun; but, Sir, I am satisfied that the hon. member for West Durham, and the hon. leader of the Government, will have to take a new departure, because I have here a copy of Grip containing a very true picture; Mr. Speaker, there it is; the whole House can look at it; and I see on this picture the hon. member for West Durham waving in his hand a “danger” signal, and standing in an obstructive attitude on the rails over which the locomotive of the Government comes dashing along at full speed. But, Mr. Speaker, I also see, on this picture, a boss leading the hon. member for West Durham off the track by the ear; and this boss has got the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie) in a very bad fix; he has the poor lamb doon on his back, and pressing in his windbag with his enormous hoof; the two of them are evidently a "done Brown." It is a fair indication of what their opposition to this great enterprise amounts to. In spite of all that these gentlemen can do I am satisfied that the hon. the Premier will see the road built, and that he is now hurrying it on so that he can come over and see us. He will exercise a watchful eye. He, himself, has told me that he did not like travelling by sea, he said he preferred going by rail. Well, Sir, we shall, therefore have to dispense with the pleasure of seeing him until he gets the railroad built.

AN HON. MEMBER: Let me see that picture.

MR. BUNSTER: I am going to have the picture put in as a matter of history. As I have just hinted, the hon. the Premier has promised that as soon as the road was built he would come and see us. I know he intends to have it built before the next elections.

SOME HON. MEMBERS: Ha! ha!

MR. BUNSTER: You may laugh. It will take three or four years for the elections to come round, and he knows the building of this road in the meantime will make him doubly sure of carrying the country again. Let me tell the House how long it took the Americans to build the great Union Pacific Railway. Although Geo. Francis Train on the occasion of breaking ground predicted the road would be constructed in five years, history records that the Railway was completed and in working order in three years, six months and ten days. That, Sir, brings my words correct. The hon. the Premier will have this road completed in about three years and six months, and if he does not he ought to. He has the money and the brains—if I may be allowed to use the word—and there is sufficient muscle in Canada to build the road in that time. If he does not get it finished I will not vote for him at the next election. That will make up for the bullying and abuse we have received. Who are not so hide bound that they will keep the naturally resources of this country tied up for the want of getting through them. While, to-day, Canada is sending relief to the starving Irish, she could render them a greater help by getting them to come over to till our own soil, develop our resources and raise their own food here, and, at the same time assisting our Treasury. We were told in that very long speech of the hon. member for West Durham, which took five or six hours, to which I have before referred, or rather nearly two days to deliver, a great deal about taxation. Do people expect build railways without taxation? British Columbia has submitted to taxation. When we joined Confederation our dutiable goods were 10 or 12 per cent., now they are something like 20 per cent. But we have this advantage, we export more than we import. We are producers of wheat and all cereals we have any quantity of lumber; we have inexhaustible gold and coal mines, as I have said before; we have an abundance of the finest fish in the world; and, all we require is a little more population and the establishment of our own woollen and other manufacturing mills, which will be the natural outcome of this grand policy of the Government, called the National Policy. The hon. member referred to one thing which I was proud to hear, the visit of Mr. Edgar to our Province. He came and offered $750,000 to buy up British Columbia.

MR. MACKENZIE: No, he did not.

MR. BUNSTER: Yes, he did; but we were not in the market. If I had time I could refer the hon. gentleman to the page in the Blue-book. Mr. Edgar was sent to Mr. Walkem, without sufficient authority, and Mr. Walkem refused to deal with him. We had also another visit from a nobleman, sent by the late Government. I refer to our late Governor-General, the Earl of Dufferin. There was a great deal of talk, but I would like to know how much of his promises have been carried out. Even the Mother Country felt aggrieved and insulted, that a Treaty should be entered into and not carried out. British Columbia has carried out her part of the contract to the letter, and to her disadvantage. She has, at the request of the Canadian Government, reserved a twenty-mile belt on the line of the Pacific Railway, on Vancouver Island, and this has driven settlement on to the mainland. People came to the Island, and under the condition of things, were either forced to the mainland or to the American side. I think, if everything were investigated properly, we have a good case for a suit for damages. But, what were we told in the course of the Debate? The hon. member for West Durham, said, British Columbia was seduced into the Union.

MR. BLAKE: Oh, no.

MR. BUNSTER: I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon; I will leave it to the Official Debates. I was sorry to hear such a remark, in the presence of ladies. Our Province has received so much abuse that we are getting tired of it. The only way that hon. gentlemen can become informed regarding its resources is to go to British Columbia, and to see things for themselves, and I will guarantee, that the country is as hospitable as any other part of Canada. British Columbia has been neglected shamefully. We have more natural resources than the whole of the rest of Canada put together. Our harbours are open and hospitable all the year round; they are never closed up as they are here. We have got mountains of gold, our rivers are teeming with fish, and any hunter can always go out and shoot down a deer or buffalo to maintain his family. But I have detained the House at some length, and I think the hon. member for Victoria (Sir John A. Macdonald), will be able to do greater justice to the cause of British Columbia than myself, I will, therefore, leave it now in his hands.

MR. LANGEVIN: When, eight or nine years ago, this question of the Pacific Railway came before the House, we all considered that it was one of the most important and weightiest questions that could require the attention of Parliament. That question has lost none of its importance, none of its weight or interest since that time. On the contrary, the people have attached more importance year after year, to this great work. This evening the question has acquired still greater importance, from the fact that the hon. member for West Durham proposes to postpone one of the most important portions of the Railway. I should say that the Pacific Railway question disappeared before another great question, which is, "Shall we continue to maintain this great Confederation of ours in its integrity?" The fact is, the proposal of the hon. member for West Durham, I suppose on behalf of the Opposition, is nothing else than repudiation. When British Columbia sent her delegates to settle the terms of Confederation with this Government, one of the conditions was that we should build the Pacific Railway. That condition was assented to by the Government of Canada. It was submitted to this Parliament and assented to. There may have been, on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite, some difference of opinion about the expediency of undertaking such a great work at that time, but the Act of Parliament was passed and became the law of the country, and hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House had only to bow to and obey the law. When the Government of 1873 left office, and the Administration of hon. gentlemen opposite came into power, they did not repudiate that condition of the Confederation or Union of British Columbia with Canada. They went to work to execute that great undertaking, and the only point of difference that we saw amongst the members of that Government and their supporters was that, when the question of the Esquimault and Nanaimo Railway was proposed to the House, the hon. member for West Durham separating himself from his party, voted with a few friends against that measure, and the Government of that day were not powerful or willing enough to pass it in the Upper House. If the Government had only expressed a desire that that Bill should, pass against which the hon. member for West Durham had voted, it would have become law. But there was a power behind the Throne—a power that may still exist to-day behind the leader of the Opposition. That power was stronger than that Government, and the measure for the construction of the railway from Esquimault to Nanaimo was lost. Nevertheless, the Government of 1874 down to 1878, went on with the construction of that railway. They undertook a portion of the road from Thunder Bay towards the west, and another section further on, leaving a gap of 185 miles. If I am not mistaken, the hon. member for Lambton, who was then at the head of Government, called for tenders for those four sections in British Columbia, that the hon. member for West Durham has attacked so fiercely. At that period, I believe, the hon. member for West Durham was one of the strongest supporters of the Mackenzie Government. And, moreover, I think the hon. member for Lambton has stated, sometime ago, that he never intended to build those four sections.

MR. MACKENZIE: I said no such thing.

MR. LANGEVIN: I understood the hon. gentleman said he had not decided to go on with those four sections. But my hon. friend the Minister of Railways has shown that, although the hon. gentleman had not decided to go with them, he had ordered and given a contract to convey 6,000 tons of rails from Victoria to the Fraser River. The hon. gentleman had given a contract for that, nevertheless he says, he had not decided to build the railway! The hon. gentleman says, yes; perhaps he will remember what he said on another occasion. It is for him to reconcile what he has just said with what he said then. At the elections for Ottawa, in September, 1878, the hon. gentleman spoke as follows, according to his organ the Free Press:—

“On the west, we have at this moment, very nearly completed 302 miles of road, and during this year will lay at least 270 miles. In British Columbia we have only 6,000 tons, moved up now to Yale, where we will commence, next spring, if Parliament sanctions the contract, to build the road to Kamloops.”

And yet the hon. gentleman has not decided to proceed with this work!

MR. MACKENZIE: Certainly not.

MR. LANGEVIN: But the hon. gentleman said before the electors that he had so decided. Either he deceived the electors of Ottawa or has deceived this House. At that time, the member for West Durham supported the late Government, and had been the colleague of the hon. Premier; he had assented to his policy, and never separated from the hon. Premier on account of the railway work going on. But what a change. As soon as the late hon. Ministers left office, their party ceased to regard the Pacific Railway in the same light. The hon. member for West Durham, especially, became frightened at the prospect of the construction of more than four sections in British Columbia. Everything became dark to him and his party; the greatest ruin was threatening us in connection with that work, which the late Government had not attempted to construct. But what is the cause of this change? It is this: that instead of having large deficits we have taken the means of preventing them, at the same time carrying the Public Works of the country. The member for West Durham should remember that he accepted the Carnarvon terms exacted from the late Government. Of course the late Government inserted the condition about not raising further the rate of taxation, but that was after they had raised the taxation by $3,000,000. But did they meet the ordinary expenses even with the $3,000,000 additional taxation? No. All the time they were in office they ran into debt which we have now to meet. The hon. gentleman says that those terms were not accepted by the Government without the consent of Parliament. No doubt, but they were accepted by the country. It was understood that $2,000,000 would be expended per annum in British Columbia, but the hon. gentlemen opposite, following their ordinary course towards that Province, repudiated those terms, and sent a Commission to British Columbia; she would not accept $750,000 in exchange for the original bargain. Up to that time he would not repudiate the Railway altogether; but that Government offered that amount to content that Province for the postponement of the work, as says the hon. member for West Durham. But she was not poor or reduced enough to accept such a bribe, saying: “We have a Treaty with Canada, which we know is just and proud enough to do justice to a small weak Province like British Columbia;” and she was right. She is not unreasonable; she has taken the word of this Government, that it will go on with the Railway; and though the work was not begun before the 1st of January last, the Province knew it was not our fault, and that the contracts would be given out early. Now, if the people of British Columbia, see the road does not progress at full speed, they will not complain, because they know we are acting in good faith, and that if we are not spending more millions and going on faster, it is because we cannot afford it. They know we are proceeding gradually and surely with the work. We do not want to plunge the country into debt and ruin as the hon. member for West Durham asserts; but we want to keep faith with British Columbia, though not at the immense expense he thinks we shall incur. We wish to build a good road, a colonization road, as intended from the beginning. We shall save a great deal in grades and curvatures, and by that means, be able to build the road from the Pacific to the older Provinces in such a way as not to overburden this country with expenditure. The hon. member for West Durham desires to catch Irish sympathy and Irish votes by expressing great regard for Irish rights and claims, almost going as far as Home Rule, and anticipating benefits to Ireland from the recent change of Government. I have no doubt that Ireland will get justice whatever Government is in power, as Canada got justice when our fathers struggled for a responsible Government. We are as much as the hon. gentleman in favour of Irishmen, and we showed our sympathy by proposing to Parliament a vote of $100,000 for the distressed populations of Ireland. Our sole regret was our inability to do more. But we do not on this or any other occasion wish to parade that sympathy. It was proper to show it at the proper time; but what reason is there for the hon. gentleman to appeal to Irishmen in connection with the Pacific Railway? Another of the hon. gentleman's objects was to catch all the hon. members from Quebec, and enrol them under his banner. What a bad Government, said he, is this Government which will not give Quebec a Railway to connect it with the Pacific Railway, after it has spent $11,000,000 for the beautiful railway from Quebec to Ottawa. He says to the hon. members from Quebec: "The Government will not extend the Pacific Railway far enough east to connect with your road; therefore, look, be careful, do not miss this opportunity to vote against your friends; my motion proposes to suspend the Railway in British Columbia." Did he speak about the eastern end of the Railway in his motion? Not a word. He might, therefore, have spared himself the trouble of this appeal. The Government have not changed its policy, which is to have a continuous railway from the Atlantic to the Pacific. The water-stretches will not be a part of the the Railway, as was the case under the late Government. But we must take the necessary time for the work. We can trust our supporters, on telling them we are completing the gap of 185 miles between Fort William and Selkirk, and have put under contract, 200 miles on the prairies to the west, and four sections in British Columbia, which the late Government put themselves under contract and decided to build. The road will not cost the large amount the hon. member for West Durham supposes. He speaks of an expenditure of $120,000,000. If we were to build a railway with a grade of 24 or 26 feet to the mile, it might cost that sum. But, as declared, the Government has no intention of building a railway with those small grades. They are all very well, even essential, for that portion which will carry the trade of the prairies from Red River to Thunder Bay. It was required it should be a first-class road, with small grades and proper curvatures, the lightest grades we can, under the circumstances obtain. But we do not say, for all that, we are to undertake at once all these sections of the road. We will proceed with them gradually. The connection with the railways in Quebec and Ontario will also come, when the railway is built from Lake Nipissing to the main line. Whilst I am on the subject, let me quote from the organ of the hon. gentlemen opposite, the Globe, a paragraph about this eastern end of the railway:

"We now come to the Lake Superior section, which is certainly a political necessity, but not required till the prairie line has been completed and connected with Thunder Bay. It is, as we have shown, reasonable to suppose that at least half a million people will be on the plains when the Pacific Railway reaches the Rocky Mountains. Every family going in afterwards will increase the quantity of produce available for export. The population of the United States doubled itself in twenty-five years; in several western territories the population has been doubled in ten years. The Canadian North-West will gain by immigration continually, and—as always happens where fertile land can be easily procured—births will be very numerous. By the time the line to the Rocky Mountains has been completed, it will be wise to push on the road around Lake Superior, because, before it can be built at a fair rate of speed, a large traffic will await its opening. The Lake Superior section, from the eastern terminus of the main Pacific to Fort William, will be 620 miles long, and, when completed, it will offer to the traffic of the Canadian and to a large part of the American North-West, the shortest all-rail route to the seaboard. It is not needed till the prairies have been opened up by the line to the Rocky Mountains. After that has been built, it may be safely completed as a commercial road, one that will pay better year by year, and will ultimately be a very valuable property."

That is the opinion of the Globe newspaper, and I have no doubt that at all events, a large majority of the hon. gentlemen opposite will not repudiate this article. The hon. member for West Durham has attacked the figures quoted by my hon. friend the Minister of Railways, giving the cost of the railway from Thunder Bay to Burrard Inlet. The hon. gentleman has made his calculations; it was a new role for him to play, being a lawyer, and we have very seldom seen him plunged so deeply into figures as he was this evening. He thought that as he had not handled figures for some time he would make free use of them on this occasion. So when he was making his calculations as to the cost of the Railway, he thought he might as well as not double the cost estimated by Mr. Fleming. The Minister of Railways stated yesterday, that the first portion of the road from Fort William to Selkirk, would cost $17,000,000; from Selkirk to Jasper Valley, $13,000,000; from Jasper Valley to Fort Moody, including equipments and engineering, $30,000,000, say $60,000,000, altogether. Add to this the cost of preliminary surveys, explorations, etc., $4,869,000, it would make a total of $64,869,000. Add to this a section of the Pacific Railway from Nipissing to Fort William, $24,000,000, if the cost is $40,000 a mile; but if the cost is $30,000 per mile—as it is more probable to be—it would amount to only $18,000,000, which, added to the $64,000,000, would make a grand total of $82,869,000. The hon. gentleman has tried to convince the House that these figures have been put together for the purposes of the moment, and that they had no basis, that we could not show that they were the results of careful examination and calculation, such as an engineer should place before the head of his department. Under these circumstances, I may be allowed to give this House the data upon which the Chief Engineer has based those figures. It is proper that the House should know that these figures have not simply been put together to show that the Railway will cost $64,000,000 plus the Nipissing and Fort William portion of the road, making altogether $88,000,000. The Chief Engineer has furnished the data of his calculations, which I will read to the House?

“To the Hon. Sir Charles Tupper, K.C.M.G., Minister of Railways and Canals.

“ESTIMATE OF COST, CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY.

“SIR,—I have the honour to submit the following estimate of the probable expenditure necessary to place the Canadian Pacific Railway in operation from Lake Superior to Port Moody. I understand the policy of the Government with respect to the Railway to be:

“1. To construct the section between Lake Superior and Red River, with the limited gradients and curves set forth in my report, laid before Parliament, so as to secure cheap transportation, and to provide, by the time the railway shall be ready for opening, an equipment of rolling-stock and general accommodation sufficient for the traffic to be then looked for.

“2. To proceed with the work west of Red River by constructing 200 miles on the route recently established. The roadway to be of the character defined by the 48th contract and the tenders for the 66th contract recently received.

“To proceed with the construction of 125 miles in British Columbia, under the 60th, 61st, 62nd and 63rd contracts. The expenditure on the 125 miles to be limited, in accordance with the provisions of the contract and the views set forth in my report of 22nd November last.

“To proceed gradually with the intervening distance. To delay placing additional sections under contract in British Columbia until the 125 miles are completed or well advanced, thus preventing any undue increase in the price of labour.

“In my report of last year, I placed the cost of the section between Lake Superior and Red River at $18,000,000. Since that date, the steps taken to keep down the expenditure on the 185 miles between English River and Keewatin, have been so far successful, as to reduce the length about 3½ miles, and the estimated cost about $500,000. The rails for these two contracts have likewise been secured at a considerable lower price than the estimate. Whatever an increasing traffic in future years may demand, in the way of territorial accommodation and rolling stock, I am confident the line can be opened for traffic between Fort William and Selkirk, well equipped for the business which may for some time be expected, at a cost not exceeding $17,000,000.

“West of Red River, 100 miles have been placed under contract and tenders have been received for a second 100 miles section. These two sections are designed to be constructed and equipped in the most economical manner, dispensing with all outlay, except that absolutely necessary to render the railway immediately useful in the settlement of the country. It is intended that the line be partly ballasted to render it available for colonisation purposes, full ballasting being deferred until the traffic demand high speed. It is intended to provide sufficient rolling-stock for all immediate wants, postponing full equipment until the country becomes populated and the business calls for its increase.

"On this basis, and on the data furnished by the contracts which have been let and the tenders recently received, I am of opinion that the railway can be opened from Lake Superior to the Pacific coast within the following estimate :

46 miles, Fort William to Selkirk, with light gradients, including a fair allowance of rolling-stock and engineering during construction...	$17,000,000
100 miles, Selkirk to Jasper Valley, with light equipment, etc..	13,000,000
550 miles, Jasper Valley to Port Moody, with light equipment, etc., Jasper to Lake Kamloops, 355 at $43,660..	$15,500,000
Lake Kamloops to Yale, 125 at $80,000..	10,000,000
Yale to Port Moody, 90 at $38,888.....	3,500,000
	$29,000,000
Add.....	1,000,000
	30,000,000
Total miles 1,956.....	$60,000,000

"The above does not include cost of explorations and preliminary surveys throughout all parts of the country north of Lake Nipissing to James Bay in the east, and from Esquimault to Port Simpson in the west, between latitudes 49° and 56° not properly chargeable to construction.....$3,119,618 or the Pembina Branch..... 1,750,000 or with other amount with which the Pacific Railway account is charged.

"I have the honour to be, Sir,

"Your obedient servant,

"SANDFORD FLEMING."

Another point the hon. member for West Durham endeavoured to make against my hon. friend was when he stated that, from Lake Kamloops to Yale, we had no data to go upon when we stated the Railway between those two points would cost $10,000,000. On that point, as on the other, I will ask the permission of the House to read a short extract from a report of Mr. Fleming, on which this estimate was based :

"I have examined, says Mr. Fleming, the rates given in the lowest tenders; they generally bear a fair relation to each other, and are about the prices for which other work has been recently placed under contract on other sections of the railway. I do not think experienced and responsible contractors would be safe in undertaking to do the same work at less rate.

"The total sum of the lowest tenders for the four sections, as above stated, is $9,167,040. It will be borne in mind that the character of the contract to be entered into is materially different from ordinary contracts. This sum represents the maximum. The contract is not to exceed the amount, but it may be very much less.—(See clauses 5, 6, and 7.)

"Those who made the surveys and calculations inform me that the quantities are very full, and that, in actual execution, they can be largely reduced. I am convinced, moreover, that, by making an extremely careful study of the final location, by sharpening the curvatures in some places, by using great judgment in adjusting the alignment to the sinuosities and sudden and great inequalities of the ground, by substituting the cheaper classes of work for the more costly whenever it can safely be done, and by doing no work whatever that is not absolutely necessary, a very marked reduction can be made."

The House will see by this statement with what precaution the Government acted in this matter. We took care to keep in our hands full power to stop that work at any time, if it should become necessary to do so, or to curtail the amount of work, or diminish the expenses. The contracts are entirely in the hands of the Government. If a financial crisis should occur, we would only have to stop the contracts, and the only liability on the part of the Government would be that of giving to the contractors a time equal to that of the suspension of his contracts. Therefore, though the hon. gentleman from West Durham tried to frighten the House, he must admit that the whole thing is in the hands of the Government. If we have the money we may go on; if we have not the money we need not proceed. The Government is pledged to British Columbia, and we must keep faith with her. When I speak of the Government of course I speak of Parliament, because we, as a Government, are in the hands of Parliament, and Parliament, may, at any time, it thinks proper, stop the work.

MR. MACKENZIE: Parliament is in your hands.

MR. LANGEVIN: The country will thank our party and this Government for such a boon. The hon. member for West Durham, in warning the Province of Quebec against this Government in its policy on the Pacific Railway, should have given some evidence of the good will and great services, and great concessions that the Province of Quebec had ever received at the hands of hon. gentlemen opposite. He should have told the members from that Province, how they had been treated when, two or three years ago, their Province came to this House and asked for redress. He should have told them how the petition of that Province was treated by those hon. gentlemen when it was presented to the House. What redress did they give to Quebec? In 1878, where was the hon. member for West Durham when that question was put to a vote? Did he show his friendship towards Quebec and her representatives? Did his name appear in the division that then took place? You will set that amongst the names of 70 members out of 112, the name of the hon. member for West Durham is not to be found in the vote on the Letellier question. The hon. gentleman had been in the House, but when the vote came on he was not to be found. He would not give his vote for the Province of Quebec. After that, it is rather doubtful whether the members for Quebec will put themselves in the hands of the hon. member for West Durham. And now, it is well that we should study a little, the course of the hon. gentleman on the Pacific Railway question. He was opposed to the branch from Esquimaux to Nanaimo, and the hon. member for Lambton had not the courage to resist him, and he threw out the Bill. The hon. gentleman further says, that we are not bound by the Carnarvon terms. I suppose the hon. member for Lambton had again to bow to his hon. friend, and say the Carnarvon terms must go also. The next point is, the hon. member for West Durham said, or wished the country to believe, that there was some pledge on the part of the Government of Canada, to build a railway there. Therefore, he assented to the proposal of the hon. member for Lambton, to offer that Province $150,000 as compensation. That was refused. For what was it offered? As compensation for the delays that occurred in the building of the road in British Columbia.

MR. BLAKE: And would occur.

MR. LANGEVIN: Then came the tenders called for by the hon. the First Minister, for the four sections in British Columbia. The hon. member for West Durham assented to them.

MR. BLAKE: How did I assent to them.

MR. LANGEVIN: The hon. gentleman assented to them by continuing to give his support to the hon. member for Lambton, and by supporting him at the elections.

MR. BLAKE: I was in England before these tenders were called for, and I did not return until last December.

MR. LANGEVIN: Then why did not the hon. gentleman state on the hustings that he did not agree with his hon. friend?

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT: Because he was not here at the time the elections came off.

MR. BLAKE: I said I had left this country for the Old Country before these tenders were called for, and I did not return until last December. A matter of fact, I was not aware that any such tenders had been called for until a few months within the present speaking.

MR. LANGEVIN: I accept what the hon. gentleman says, but it is strange he never took an opportunity of declaring that he had not assented to the calling for these tenders, and that he knew nothing about them. It is one of the strangest things possible that the hon. gentleman, while from the country, never saw a Canadian paper, and was ignorant of what was going on in this country. The hon. gentleman now says that if his hon. friend, the hon. member for Lambton, had wished to build these four sections he would have opposed him. It is late in the day to make this statement. We can see how the mind of the hon. gentleman is drifting. There is, first, the giving up of the Esquimaux and Nanaimo Branch; then the offer of $75,000 compensation, and, subsequently, his attitude in relation to these four contracts. Now, what has he done during the past year? The hon. gentleman being convinced that this Government was to build the Railway by Bute Inlet, denounced the policy of the Government, and it was asserted on the other side of the House that we were expending $20,000,000 more than would be required to build the same road on the Fraser River. Had we adopted that route they would have asked, "Why did you not take the route we selected by the Fraser River? We called for tenders, and by accepting them, you would effect a saving of $20,000,000 to the country." So they found their little game was over, and now their policy was to denounce what they wished for themselves. Now, what is the next move of the hon. member for West Durham? He asks us to postpone these contracts, and his next move will be to ask that their shall be no railroad at all. The country, however, is not of that opinion. The country wants this railway as it wanted the Intercolonial. We do not want to be at the mercy of our neighbours on the other side of the line. We want to build up a great nation in British North America. We want this Confederation of ours to be a success and to make it a success we must have a Pacific Railroad of our own. It is a necessity of our position, a necessity of Confederation, and therefore, the people have determined that that road shall be built. But we are alive to the position of the country. We do not want to build 1,956 miles of road in two, three or four years. We will take the necessary time to construct it, and we will construct it as the wants of the country require it. Another thing that must have struck hon. gentlemen is the determination of hon. gentlemen on the other side, (and I am sorry to say, the hon. member for West Durham), to depreciate this country. From beginning to end, the speech of the hon. gentleman was a depreciation of our resources and our country, and a eulogium of the United States. He has done his best to prove that our lands are not equal to those of the United States, and that our institutions are not as good as those of the United States, that we cannot have as large an emigration as the United States, that we have not the means of peopling our North-West as the United States have of peopling their Western States. And why? Because I suppose this is British territory, because we have British institutions. I maintain that the emigration from the British Isles will not hesitate to come to our North-West if they can find there good lands and the protection and institutions they have left at home. In that country we have the best lands in the world. We have free lands there to begin with, and settlers may also purchase lands there at a very small rate. They have also the free institutions of the Old Country and the greatest protection possible. They will have communication with the old settled Provinces as soon as the railway is built. To the manufacturing industries is attributed this attraction of foreign emigration, and the emigration from the old Provinces of the Dominion. But there is no reason why that emigration should not go to our North-West in a very short time. The National Policy is building up manufacturing industries in this country that will require all the hands we can furnish in this country and furnish employment for the emigrants from abroad. Already there is an emigration from the United States into British territory; in the North-West, I saw from a paper the other day, that three heads of families with their wives and children, had just arrived at Winnipeg for the purpose of settling in the North-West. Last year, I am informed, that no less than 3,000 people from the United States settled in the North-West. The hon. gentleman said that we would have but a small emigration to the North-West, and he characterised the figures of my hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals as "absurdly extravagant." Now, supposing the emigration and purchase of lands were only half that calculated by the hon. gentleman, The hon. gentleman is still not satisfied; he is afraid that too many emigrants will come; and he puts in their mouths good arguments to induce them not to remain but to go into what he calls that beautiful land, the United States. I do not wish to say that the hon. gentleman is not patriotic, but I am afraid that he has forgotten that patriotism for which he had such a high notion. However, I was glad to hear the hon. gentleman say that, for this year and next year, we could expect a large increase. He says the circumstances are peculiar, and we may expect an emigration this year; probably a larger influx than any previous year, but he will not allow us to have any more after; they must all go to the United States.

MR. BLAKE: The hon. gentleman is misrepresenting what I said.

MR. LANGEVIN: The inference to be drawn from what the hon. gentleman said was certainly that which I have stated: Why, if we are to have emigrants coming this year, should we not have them next year and the year after, and so forth? The same reason that will cause them to come this year and next year, will cause them to come the following years also. Surely there is no reason to prevent them coming. The peculiar circumstances are such that these people must emigrate from the old countries if they want to live, which in Canada offers exceptional attractions for all classes. We know that we had to vote a large sum of money the other day—and we did it willingly, cheerfully, and with the greatest pleasure, and we only regret that our means would not allow us to double or treble the amount—to feed a portion of that people who form the population of the British Isles. A portion of that people will emigrate and come out here, as they did before; their lands are too small in extent, and they know if they come over the Atlantic there are homes for them in the prairies of the west, on British soil. They know they will find free land and that they can purchase more, and that they will not find foreign institutions; they will find free institutions, and here they will find home rule, of which we have heard so much. Here they will find the institutions they have dreamt of; here in Canada they will find their compatriots; they will find them in every station of life; they will find them on the Bench, in Parliament, in the Local Legislatures; they will find them at the Bar, in all the liberal avocations; they find them among the merchants, and they will find them amongst the most wealthy and influential people in the country; amongst all these, Irishmen are found taking a prominent position, and well treated, on an equal footing with all of us. We are always willing to receive them, and, if I speak for my own Province, I would say that when, at a certain period, a large number of these poor emigrants were obliged to come to this country—and many of them lost their lives by the plague or other disasters—their children were not left there unassisted, unclothed, unfed, uncared for; they were received by my own countrymen in the Province of Quebec; they were taken care of, and we now find numbers of them in the best positions in this country. They were not of our own blood; they were not of our own nationality, but they were human beings, and we received them in our houses, we received them as our children. Yes, Mr. Speaker, Irishmen will find here a home, they will find peace here, and contentment, and hon. gentlemen need not be afraid, as the hon. member for West Durham insinuated, that they will not come because they will be under the same British flag, because they will be under the same rule as in Ireland. They know better than that; they know that they are as free in Canada, under the British flag, as they would be in the United States, under the stars and stripes. Ask Irishmen in the United States, ask Englishmen who have gone there, whether we do not have institutions in Canada as good, as free, as independent, as the United States. We have freedom here, Mr. Speaker, perfect freedom, but no license. The hon. gentleman has also stated that the hon. the First Minister had no right to expect from these emigrants settling in the North-West any large contribution to the revenue for many years. And what reasons does he give us? He says they will have to build a house and a barn; they will have to buy cattle and horses and agricultural implements; they will have to maintain themselves and their families; they will have to provide clothing and food; and the whole of these, he says, with hard ash. The hon. gentleman tries to prevent emigrants—I do not know why—from coming here; he says to them: "Do not come here in this country, you will have to pay for everything you require with hard cash." Well, Sir, I do not know with what they pay for the same articles, horses, cattle, implements, clothing, food and so on, in the United States, if it is not with hard cash. They surely, do not give them these horses, cattle, implements, food and clothing for nothing in the United States. Have they not to pay for all these things there, as well as here, with hard cash? This is a very argument to use; it is not worthy of the hon. member for West Durham. I am surprised that he should attack so much importance to it. But he gives the emigrant another reason against coming here. He says: "You will have to smuggle, and you will smuggle; you will smuggle a great deal." That is the accusation he brings against the people coming from England; that is the accusation he brings against these Irishmen, and against Scotchmen and Englishmen, and French Canadians. These are his words: "He will smuggle as much as he can and I expect he will smuggle a good deal;" and he gives that as a reason why we will have no revenue from that source. I think for my part the hon. the Minister of Finance will call upon the hon. the Minister of Customs to take care that the smuggling does not go on in that direction. The hon. gentleman continues and speaks of the value of real estate. He says it has sunk everywhere, except that the hon. member for Vancouver claimed differently for British Columbia. But the value of real estate has not gone down by the policy of this Government. If real estate did go down very low; if it sank and sank, while the hon. gentlemen were in power; it is well known that since the National Policy has been inaugurated, real estate has been improving; it has gone up from one end of the country to the other; and the hon. gentleman, speaking of banks and bank stocks, said that a number of banks had disappeared. Let him look at and compare the list of stocks two and years ago with the list to-day, and he will see an immense difference this year, and last year, in the value of stock. He is determined to have nothing good in this country; he is determined to see, and show, nothing but ruin and decay. It is the old cry; his friends, when he was quite young, spoke of the same ruin and decay; and so it is going on, and will go on from generation to generation; and I have no doubt this same cry will be repeated at appropriate intervals, by the children of these gentlemen in ten, and fifteen, and twenty, and thirty years hence. As long as they cannot sit on these Benches, so long as they are not in power, everything ceases to be bright, everything is dark; no emigration can come.

MR. BLAKE: That is just what you said at the last election.

MR. LANGEVIN: The hon. gentleman says, that is what we said at the last election. We had good cause at that time. The hon. gentlemen opposite had brought the country to the last point possible; we had been brought to the eve of a national bankruptcy, by the financial policy of gentlemen on the other side; the country was in a most deplorable condition; people were leaving it at every point; the revenue had fallen off; deficit after deficit had rolled up, and we had to call upon the people and point out the cause of this state of things. That brought about a change, and having been put in power by the people, we inaugurated a wise policy for improving the condition of the country, and the hon. gentleman must see that we have been successful enough. The country understood us and they have brought us here to promote the prosperity of the country, and we have to a great extent succeeded already, though we expect to do more during the next year. In conclusion, I wish only to say that the present occasion is, in my opinion, the first opportunity that this Parliament has had of deciding on this great question decisively. This is the first time that we have been met, face to face, with the important question, whether or not we are to continue to have Confederation, for which we have laboured year after year to bring about, whether that great work is to last or not? It is for hon. gentlemen to decide, and I appeal to the hon. member for Lambton—he must be in favour of Confederation—as his hon. friend, who, I am sorry to know, is in a very precarious state of health. Let us vote this amendment down. Do not let us destroy Confederation; it is a great, a good work. a work by which the institutions of England are to be made permanent on this continent; it is a work to secure freedom for our children for all time to come, to build a great Empire on this continent. We shall not, perhaps, see it fully peopled; but the time will come, if we look to the country, instead of to ourselves; if we look to the country instead of to these Benches. Hon. gentlemen should not forget that at the period of this Confederation being brought about, these Provinces were small dependencies of England; they were scattered, and far asunder; the leading men of each Province did not know the leading men of the other Provinces; they had no common intercourse; they did not know their separate institutions ; they were separated and isolated from each other, as much as we are separated from Ireland or China ; but to-day we are a united Dominion ; we are a great country, a powerful country, if we be only true to ourselves. We are not very numerous—a little over 4,000,000. But when the United States separated from England they were only 4,000,000 ; to-day they are 40,000,000 of people, perhaps 45,000,000 ; and, Mr. Speaker, they have not a better country than ours ; they had no better prospects and advantages than we have ; they have had bloody wars ; we have had no bloody wars ; they had a bloody war to bring about their independence, and they had another bloody war afterwards ; they had a fratricidal war, which was a most bloody war. We have had no such bloody wars ; England has recognised our rights, has recognised the true policy of making this country a free country, and we are so free that we have not a single British soldier, we have not a soldier of the British army amongst us, with the exception of a small number at Halifax, left to assist in the guardianship of that coast. We are left in the free exercise of our rights, and every man is loyal to the Empire and to our Queen, because we know that we are protected in case of war, protected on the seas, and protected, not only in this country, but abroad ; for every citizen that goes abroad is protected by the flag of England. Mr. Speaker, once more ; do not let us destroy Confederation ; do not let us destroy the charter of our liberties ; let us be true to ourselves, and continue to progress as we have been since the first day of Confederation ; let us continue to be contented and happy. If we begin by passing this amendment, we are, in the words of the hon. member for West Durham, saying to British Columbia, " You may go ; you are not reasonable." It would be unreasonable for us to tell British Columbia to go. She has been patient and reasonable. She will wait until the good times come, when the means of the country will allow us to build the road with vigour. We will build that railway, year by year, and shortly we will have a road from the Atlantic to the Pacific ; and most likely, on that day, we will, I hope, find the hon. members for Lambton and West Durham in a first-class car going to see their friends in British Columbia ; and at that period they will regret having attempted to destroy the future of Canada, by running down their country, and eulogizing the United States of America.

MR. CASGRAIN : I did not intend to talk on this subject to-night, because I thought that some hon. members on the other side of the House would avail themselves of the opportunity to give us some explanation of this matter. But, as they have not done so, I have some views of my own which I will explain in the best manner I can. I listened to the speech of the hon. the Minister of Railways and Canals, and I must congratulate him on its tone and the earnestness with which he gave his ideas and explained his system to the House. But I do not agree with his views. I understand that some of them are, perhaps, too high or, perhaps, too widespread even for his hon. colleagues. If I understand his plan, it is to connect both sides of the ocean with this Railway. I understand that there is one part that cannot be built for some time to come. I allude to that part connecting Thunder Bay with Georgian Bay, that is the most important part to be built first in the interest of the other Provinces. The construction of that work appears to be too hard a task for the resources of the country, or for the ability of the best engineer we can secure to grapple with it. There is no doubt that a little geographical knowledge of that part of the country would be a great assistance to those who have to deal with the work. That country is so covered with marshes and the soil is so bad and so rugged that it is next to impossible to build a railway. I do not think that the hon. the Minister of Railways or myself will live long enough to see a road constructed over it. In the month of August, in the very part through which the Railway is to pass, the ground remains frozen for all the year, except about eight inches from the surface. With regard to the land question, as I understand it, one-twentieth part of the good arable lands does not belong to the Government. The Hudson's Bay Company have the choice of this one-twentieth of the best lands, and I think as private individuals they will attend carefully to their own interests. If I understand the matter aright the Hudson's Bay Company has made a certain offer of their lands to this and preceding Government, and judging from the value they set upon them, and comparing it with the value the Government set upon theirs, they will be far from realising what the Government expects. Then there is another point: if those lands are so very valuable they must also be valuable to the Hudson's Bay Company. The Government appears to be going on the principle of speculating in those lands. The Hudson's Bay Company has the same chance of making money out of theirs as anybody else. That Company has received $1,500,000 to relinquish their rights, and they are relieved from all the charges and encumbrance of protecting themselves there. But what has been the effect on the stock of the Company. It has remained at par ever since. There is another point which has, perhaps, escaped the attention of the hon. the Minister of Railways. I do not see that we have, at the present moment, any other resources to build the Railway except those lands. I do not call the borrowing powers of the Dominion a resource. In times of peace, like the present, we should be able to discuss this business in a calm manner. We may have difficulties in the future. We may have war on the continent of Europe, and that would certainly affect our credit and emigration. We ought to provide against such contingencies. We may have trouble with the Indians of this or the other side of the line. They cost the Americans $4,000,000 or $5,000,000 a year to keep them at bay. All these matters should be taken into consideration in this important subject. I listened with a great deal of attention to the speech of the hon. gentleman. I am not an engineer, and I do not want to enter into figures which I do not understand, but I have learned the simple rules of addition and subtraction, and I would like the hon. the Minister of Railways to tell us what would be the actual cost of operating this Railway per mile.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: I cannot say what the cost of operating any railway that is not constructed, but I am in a position to give the hon. gentleman information which I am sure he will listen to with pleasure. I will not give him the hypothetical calculation, but the result of the operation of that portion of the Pacific Railway already constructed. I hold in my hands a return received to-day of the operations of the Pembina Branch, which shows, from the 1st of March to the 12th of April, 1880, the number of passengers carried was 5,236; the number of laden freight cars 1,246, or equal to 12,460 tons; the gross receipts, $36,287, and the working expenses $15,000, or a net revenue from the 1st of March to the 12th of April of $21,287.

MR. CASGRAIN: I hold in my hands the Report of the hon. the Minister of Railways, and I hope that next year he will make it in better shape, and give us more of the exact information we want on this subject. The Report ought to show, like all the American reports, the average cost of operating per mile. Take the Report of this year. I have found out the probable cost of the working of this Railway by a comparison of the cost on other railways. In statement No. 8, we have a statement of the running expenses of the different railways in the Dominion. We have 6,484 miles in operation, the total cost of running being $16,188,282. The cost per mile of this Railway, calculated upon the experience of the others, will be about $2,650.50 per mile, or $7,156,350 for the 2,700 miles, which agrees pretty well with Mr. Fleming's statement of about $8,000,000. I have been long trying to ascertain these different items of expense, and think that the hon. the Minister of Railways ought to have told us the probable working expenses of the Canada Pacific. I challenge him to give us the approximate cost of its operation, with the average yield or income, and the gross assets the first five years. I will assume the largest possible return from its working, and yet predict the Dominion will not be able to maintain it. It is all very well to boast that we are a great people, and possess a large territory; but the city of New York possesses more revenue, and one of its Aldermen might boast, with more appropriate fitness than the hon. the Minister of Railways, it could build more railways than we. I dislike such childish boasts. When I hear the Railway can be built for $60,000,000, and remember that eminent Quebec authorities estimate the cost at $150,000,000, are we to rely upon the data of the Government, which the hon. member for West Durham has shown to be totally incorrect? The boasting as to the Railway reminds me of the boasts and sanguine expectations in regard to the Grand Trunk in 1851 and 1852; the stockholders in the London market were told they were to reap 11 per cent. on their investments. We know how that enterprise turned out. I believe the Pacific Railway will yet be built, but that we can build it on the plan proposed I do not think. Why have we not been furnished with the facts as to the American Pacific Railway, and its cost per mile for working? They would afford us a fair criterion for a judgment on this subject. I see the Government do not intend to go beyond Thunder Bay to the east. Then I call Thunder Bay a cul-de-sac. The navigation at that place is stopped for a part of the year. Trade will not go that way in winter, but take its natural course south. The border country is flat and the natural channel for trade is in the direction of the United States. You cannot prevent it going in that direction. You may bring trade to Thunder Bay in summer and draw it to the Georgian Bay, by loading and unloading vessels; but in winter as well as in summer you will have to take the shortest cut and go by the American Railways to Sault Ste. Marie. Your Railway to that point will be tapped all along the route, the through freight being next to nothing. The project of a railway from Thunder Bay, north-west of Lake Superior, is as wild as that of a road from Winnipeg to Hudson's Bay. The hon. the Minister of Public Works said, that public opinion was with the Government in this matter. I appeal to the Conservatives of Quebec if the strongest pressure has not been brought to bear on them, to induce them to support the Government at this juncture? If they could shirk the vote, if the Government were not depending upon them, they would do so.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Vote against the amendment? Of course they will, en masse.

MR. CASGRAIN: We all know how they will vote. They will have to swallow the pill, however bitter. I affirm public opinion is not with the Government in this matter. If I understand the anticipations of hon. Ministers, we are before long to have a population of 500,000 souls in the North-West, say 100,000 men, who are expected to contribute $3,000,000 a year to the Revenue, or $30 a head for the privilege of living in that country. With that prospect settlers would not be much encouraged. I doubt if they would pay that amount. Regarded in an impartial sense, this scheme is not the complement of Confederation. What is British Columbia after all? It would be better to lose a finger than the whole arm. We should do anything reasonable to fulfil our bargain with British Columbia; but we must not all go to the bottom of the ocean to do so. If this policy be carried we may not, but our children will, suffer all the consequences. We ought to leave behind us a better record. To endorse an enterprise of this magnitude, is assuming a great burden. Had we the means, I would not object. But we have not the means, nor will the work be done during the lifetime of the present hon. Ministers. It is not for the hon. the Premier, who has won the crown and title of a statesman, to make such a mistake. However great his majority, he should not hesitate to follow a true statesmanlike course. He made one great mistake in politics, and is going to make another, which he may live long enough to regret. I believe this country is not able to build this Railway now. Our action on this occasion will remain on record, to inspire us with pride, or produce regret, as it shall be right or wrong.

MR. McINNES: Before the motion now before the House is carried, I say carried, for I know there is enough of patriotism in this House to carry it, I desire to say a few words on the extraordinary and unpatriotic amendment moved by the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), to the resolution of the hon. the Minister of Railways, and as the subject has been pretty exhaustively discussed, I promise not to occupy much of the valuable time of the House. I purpose in the first place to review briefly the vacillating and inconsistent policy pursued by the hon. member for West Durham and his leader, if he has a leader, in connection with the Columbia section of the Canada Pacific Railway. It will doubtless be remembered by every hon. gentleman in this House that, in the summer of 1874, the late Administration deputed a Mr. Edgar to proceed to British Columbia, not for the purpose of treating with that Province for a relaxation of the terms of Union with Canada, but for the ostensible purpose of bribing the people and Legislature of the Pacific Province. What did we find that pure-minded delegate of the hon. member for West Durham and the hon. member for Lambton doing; doing no doubt what he was ordered to do, offering the sum of $750,000 in lieu of building the Pacific Railway. The people and Legislature of British Columbia, in my opinion, properly considered Mr. Edgar's offer on behalf of the late Government was a mere bribe, and they rejected it, with that contempt it was entitled to. I may say here that, up to the time of the Union of British Columbia with Canada, British Columbia was a Crown colony, and not only did we receive justice, but every consideration, at the hands of the Imperial Government. Every promise made by that Government was fulfilled; every pledge was redeemed. The people, accustomed as they were to look upon treaties made by the British Government, or by the Legislatures of any of her colonies, as binding, especially a Treaty entered into with a sister Province. So strong was their faith in the integrity and honor of the Dominion Government that it took a considerable time before they could really believe the Government of Canada were in earnest in offering this bribe of $750,000 in lieu of the Railway. Whenever the people of British Columbia realised their true position, or rather the position they were likely to be placed in by the hon. member for Lambton and the hon. member for West Durham, they immediately appealed to the foot of the Throne for protection against this new and unnatural enemy, that had ascended, or rather usurped, the the political Throne of Canada in 1874. And now let us see with what result did British Columbia appeal to the foot of the Throne. The result was, that Lord Carnarvon, Secretary for the colonies, offered his good offices, acted as arbitrator, and, whether voluntarily or otherwise is best known to the hon. member for Lambton, he (Mr. Mackenzie) agreed to build a waggon road from British Columbia to the Canadian North-West, and to expend not less than $2,000,000 annually on railway construction. Now, we find the hon. member for West Durham and his associates in this House endeavouring, in every possible way, to poison the minds of hon. gentlemen in this House and country against British Columbia—submitting a proposition for the violation—the gross violations of the very terms they themselves made with the Pacific Provinces only a few years ago. I ask is this the course and treatment what we should expect at the hands of honest-patriotic Canadians—I leave the House to judge. I find that in 1875 the Government of that day awarded a contract for building 600 miles of telegraph line in British Columbia. This contract was awarded for the sum of $272,000, and one of the conditions was that the contractor should be compelled to keep the line in repair for five years, after which he was to receive the additional sum of $250,000, making in all the snug sum of $522,000. It is true all of this money was not expended—but $41,600 was before the contract was cancelled. A large portion of this telegraph line passed through a heavily wooded section of the country. Through this wooded portion of the line all timber was to be cleared for a width of 132 feet. In fact this telegraph line was to form a portion of the Canada Pacific Railway. This work was done on the Burrard Inlet route. Now allow me to call attention to what appears to me to be irreconcilable statements made by the hon. member for Lambton in 1875 and 1879. I find in the Hansard of 1875, page 1,013, that he (Mackenzie) said in reply to the hon. member for Niagara, the following:—

“Hon. Mr. Mackenzie said he had already stated the line was to be put up where the road was to be located (these being the Engineers instructions based upon his original suggestion) and he did not know that a single mile of telegraph line was being erected anywhere except on the line of the railway.”

This would certainly mean that the member for Lambton, had selected the Burrard Inlet route as far back as 1875. Now, I will read a few utterances made by the same hon. gentleman last Session, as will be found in last year's Hansard, page, 1904: “Now Mr. Marcus Smith admitted himself in his reports, thus from Waddington Harbour to Esquimalt, would take $27,000,000, including bridging, and we know it could not take less than from $15,000,000 to $20,000,000 to construct the remainder of the route, including bridging. These reasons seemed to me so conclusive against the Bute Inlet route, that we could not for a moment, hesitate, and I will say this to the House that up to two years my mind was wholly biased in favour of Bute Inlet." Now I ask, how can the member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie), reconcile these inconsistencies, if he can. I will be free to admit that he possesses more ingenuity than I give him credit for. I wish hon. gentlemen to note that when he declared to this House in 1875, that every mile of the telegraph line was being built on the line of the Pacific Railway, (on the Burrard Inlet route), he had hundreds of men employed in exploring the northern portions of the Province, in order to find, if possible, another line for the railway. I therefore say, that if the hon. gentleman was honest and sincere in what he stated, in 1875, he must have been insincere and innovated in making the statement he did last Session. I will do the hon. leader of the opposition the justice, in saying that, he was forced by the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), to take the position he did then, and is taking now. If his course will not bear this construction, then we are forced to the conclusion that he had no railway policy, that he trimmed his sails according to every political breeze that happened to spring up. We find again, in 1875, that the same hon. gentleman sent 5,500 tons of those notorious steel rails to British Columbia. About 2,500 tons were stacked at Esquimalt, and the balance at Nanaïao. From the best information I can get, they cost this country, in round numbers, $375,000. In addition to that, they paid in the neighbourhood of $500 a year for the ground upon which they were piled. Again, on the eve of the last general election, a contract was awarded for the removal of those rails to Yale, at a cost of $34,000. Now, I must confess, I never could understand why that contract was given out at that particular time, unless it was for political purposes, from the fact that there was no immediate use for them, as railway construction was not commenced, and would certainly take two or three years before they would be required. Yet, the honourable gentleman told us a few days ago, he was not really decided, whether he would adopt the Burrard Inlet route, and go on with construction.

MR. MACKENZIE: I said nothing of the kind. I had adopted the route.

MR. McINNIS: I meant to say to go on with the work. But, I ask what good was there in adopting the route, unless the hon. gentleman was prepared to proceed with construction. Now, I find the hon. member for Lambton, spent $1,250,000 in British Columbia, on surveys alone, during his administration. In adding up these different items, I find the amount of $2,250,000 was expended by the late Government in British Columbia, and I ask every hon. gentleman in this House for what purpose was that large amount spent there, unless he (Mr. Mackenzie) was really serious, and intended to build the British Columbia section of that road. Surely they will not attempt to say, attempt to trifle with the good sense of this House by saying, that millions of dollars have to be spent, in order to ascertain what the capabilities of that Province were, and what it would cost to construct the road. The hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) endeavoured, yesterday, to lead this House to believe that British Columbia was a poor, miserable country; in fact, that it was not worth having, and if the people of that Province wished to sever their connection with Canada, all they would have to do was to go. Now, I desire to call the attention of the House, for a few moments, to some of the resources of the Pacific Province, especially the member for West Durham (Mr. Blake). I find according to the Gold Commissioners' report for 1878, an average of $3,000,000 in gold has been taken out of what the hon. member for West Durham had the bad taste to call a sea of mountains. From September, 1858, to September, 1878, over $60,000,000 has been taken out of the virgin Province of British Columbia—more than will be required to construct the entire road, from the head of Lake Superior to the Pacific Ocean. And the supply does not appear to diminish. In fact, I am fully persuaded that industry is only in its infancy. It is established beyond controversy that we have almost inexhaustible fields of coal. It is not only inexhaustible, but it is of a very superior quality, commanding, as it does, in the San Francisco market, from $1 to $2 more per ton than any other coal to be found on the Pacific coast. Coal has also been discovered in various places on the mainland, and only await capital to open them up to the markets of the world the same as those of Vancouver Island. Adjacent to the Nanaimo coal mines we have mountains of iron ore which assays from 80 to 90 per cent. With abundance of the best coal and iron ore, lying side by side, I see no reason why British Columbia should not become one of the first, if not the first, iron manufacturing countries, at least on this continent. Copper is to be found in every portion of the Province. A large number of silver lodes have been discovered within the last few years, some of which assay as much as $1,500 to the ton, and only await capital and labour to work them successfully. The timber wealth of this Province cannot be over estimated. There is scarcely any portion of the sea coast from Alaska to Washington territory, and extending inland for miles, but what is heavily timbered. This is equally true of many of our valleys. Some of the largest timber to be found, not only on this continent but in the world, and of a quality certainly equal to anything to be found in the older Provinces. In order to give some idea of what we are doing in the lumber business, I may mention that one mill alone, that of the Hon. Senator Nelson, of Burrard Inlet, has shipped to foreign countries annually from 15,000,000 to 20,000,000 feet of lumber. Now, I contend that, if the British Columbia section of the road is built; if we had direct communication with the great North-West of Canada, one of the great benefits that will accrue directly to the North-West, and indirectly to the rest of the Dominion, will be the shipment of lumber into that vast territory. From what I can learn of that country, the timber is scarce and of a very inferior quality. We would only require to ship our lumber 700 or 800 miles in order to place it in the very heart of the North-West. If the North-West settles up as fast as we all expect and believe it will, I contend the people of that region will be compelled to draw all their lumber supply from British Columbia for many ages to come. I therefore say that the lumber trade alone will pay no small revenue to this country. As I brought the value of our Fisheries before the notice of the House last Session, I will merely say that in 1878 we exported over $1,000,000 worth of canned salmon. It is only six years since the first attempt was made at canning salmon in our Province. This industry can be extended to almost any extent. Trout, herring and other valuable fish abound in our waters. The hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) misled the House last night—as he generally does when anything affecting British Columbia is under discussion—that we had a very small area indeed of agricultural land in the Province. I frankly admit now, as I always have admitted, that our agricultural lands are limited—that they are small in proportion to our waste lands. But what good lands we have are exceptionally good—are equal to anything to be found in the Dominion. Permit me to say that it has been my privilege to have visited every Province in the Dominion, with the exception of Manitoba, and I certainly think our arable lands will compare favourably with those even of the great empire Province of Ontario. In a small section of the district I have the honour to represent, I find, according to late surveys made by the Local Government, we have 525,000 acres of arable land. This is not in detached pieces, but an unbroken stretch from the Gulf of Georgia to Popcum. Again, according to Mr. Hunter's report—a report that will be found in the engineer's report, submitted to the House a few days ago—we have 389,000 acres of arable land on Vancouver Island. I mention this in order to show that in the small portion of the Province, I have spoken of, we have more good farming land than the hon. member for West Durham gave us credit for in the entire Province. I am not so familiar with the extent of farming land in the interior of the country; but, I may say, I am informed on good authority there are many millions of acres of good wheat land. I see the hon. members for Carriboo and Yale in their seats and have no doubt but what they will give the necessary information about their districts before this debate closes. I may say, before I close this part of my subject, that the wheat, oats and barley grown in my district will compare favourably, in quality and yield, with any part of Ontario, as for all kinds of roots, and the hardier kinds of fruits, they surpass anything I have ever seen. The selection of the Burrard Inlet route by the present Government, as by the late Government, has given universal satisfaction, not only in my district, but, throughout the entire Province. As I said last year, it is the only route that would ever open up the great mineral and agricultural districts of the Province. This contract of 127 miles begins at the head of navigation on the Lower Fraser and runs up to the commencement of navigation on the Upper Fraser. We have 120 miles of navigable water on the Lower Fraser and nearly 200 on the Upper Fraser. The route selected is by all odds the shortest and cheapest. It is 225 miles shorter than the Port Simpson and will cost $10,000,000 less. It is 304 miles shorter than the Bute, with Esquimault as its terminus, and will cost $21,000,000 less. So there can be no two opinions as to it being the best route. Besides the Burrard route being the cheapest and shortest, it ends at certainly one of the finest harbours to be found in the Dominion. It is a harbour that is easy of access at all hours of the day or night, and at all seasons of the year, it is completely landlocked, and fogs are not nearly as prevalent as at Bute Inlet and Port Simpson. I would say with respect to the amendment moved by the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), that it is an extraordinary declaration for him to present to this intelligent and patriotic House. It is revolutionary in its nature—yes, it is more than revolutionary, it is disloyal. It is disloyal because I claim anything having a tendency to disintegrate the Confederation is disloyal, were it to be carried it would be the insertion of the thin end of the wedge by which this Dominion would be dismembered. This Dominion is too dear to us, has cost too much money and valuable time in bringing it into its present satisfactory condition to allow the hon. member for West Durham to do as he proposes in the amendment before the House, such a course, I claim, is unworthy of the hon.

gentleman, unworthy of one of the leaders of a party that claims to be loyal to Canada—mark the hon. gentleman does not object to building the road from Lake Superior to the Prairie region, and why? Because Ontario will get a direct benefit from the opening up of that country. He (Mr. Blake) shows an unpardonable amount of selfishness in this matter, selfishness and sectionalism that should not to be tolerated on the floor of this House. I take it that we are here as the representatives of the people of this country, to legislate for the whole Dominion, and not for any one particular Province. If there is an honourable gentleman in this House that has not the interest and prosperity of the whole Dominion at heart, he should not be here, but in a county or township council. Gentlemen on the Opposition Benches may make light of British Columbia, but the day will come, owing to the diversity and great extent of her resources when she will be recognised as one of the most prosperous Provinces in the Dominion. I have yet to hear of the country possessed of the same resources that did not attain to eminence. She has the elements within her borders of becoming one of the greatest manufacturing countries in the world. Let the hon. member for West Durham point out to me, if he can, one Province that has made the gigantic strides within so short a period. The settlement of the country can only date back to 1858, when gold was discovered. It was then a howling wilderness. While she was a Crown Colony, she went to work and built a waggon road, 500 miles, into the very heart of the country, at a cost of nearly a million of dollars. Last year our revenue amounted to $521,000. Take our population at 50,000, and I find we paid no less than $10.32 per capita in Customs duties alone, or nearly three times as much as any of the other Provinces. I ask, what did any of the old Provinces amount to when only twenty years old—did they contribute one cent. for every dollar British Columbia contributes to the general revenue of the country. I think not. The resolution of the hon. member for West Durham states, in effect, that because British Columbia is weak, Canada must take advantage of her weakness; that because we are in her power, she is to do with us as she pleases. It will be a disgrace to the fair name and fame of Canada, if she attempts to violate the solemn obligations entered into with British Columbia on the one hand, and the Imperial Government on the other, to build our road. Anything short of this would be unbritish, and would do irreparable injury to this country. Suppose this resolution is carried, and the hon. the Finance Minister went to England to negotiate a new loan. I imagine the reply he would receive from capitalists would be: "No, we cannot give any money; in fact, we are sorry we ever gave you any." Why? "Because you repudiated your Treaty with British Columbia, and now, in the same way, repudiate your foreign debts; consequently, you cannot have any." But this is only one of the many evils that would result from such a course. It must have been remarked by every hon. gentleman in this House, that whenever the name of British Columbia is mentioned the member for West Durham becomes restive, and assumes a belligerent attitude and tone. Why it is I have never been able to understand. When the Bill of the hon. the Minister of Justice, providing for the salaries of two additional Judges in British Columbia, was before the House, he (Mr. Blake) spent hours in trying to defeat it, and on no higher grounds than that it would cost a few hundred dollars more. He was willing to allow the Administration of Justice in that Province to become inefficient and inadequate to the wants of the rapidly growing population. He never loses an opportunity in proclaiming to this House and country that we have only 10,000 of a population. This is not correct. We have from 25,000 to 30,000 whites, and 35,000 Indians. With railway construction going on, and the impetus that will be given to every industry, we may reasonably expect a white population of 60,000 or 70,000 within the next seven or eight years. I challenge any hon. gentleman in this House, or out of it, to mention one kind word he (Mr. Blake) ever uttered about British Columbia. On the contrary he has defamed and belittled her in every way he could. This is treatment we have received and may expect to receive at his hands. In conclusion, I would say, the future of this country depends on the opening up the North-West, and British Columbia, and this can only be done by building this great national highway from Ocean to Ocean—from the Atlantic to the Pacific. By this means—and this means alone will this Dominion be consolidated. If this country ever assumes that position we are entitled to—that our gigantic proportions—our varied and boundless resources—and our race entitles us to among the family of nations—it is by the building the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Mr. CHARLTON moved the adjournment of the Debate.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Lost.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Why does the hon. gentleman say lost? What can be the objection to it?

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Because we want to finish it to-night.

Mr. MACKENZIE: It cannot be finished to-night. I am quite sure I am not going to speak to-night. There is nothing to be gained by forcing on a Debate at this hour of the morning.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: It is only 11 o'clock, and this is the second night upon a discussion of a principle which has been discussed every Session for the last five years. I think the hon. gentleman has a right to ask that the Debate should be brought to a close.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The debate involves most serious consequences to the country. It is the most important debate of the Session. The hon. gentleman, in my opinion, is acting unfairly in attempting to force a vote to-night.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I do not think I am open to the charge of having acted obnoxiously or unfairly during any part of this Session or any part of last Session. I think every consideration has been given as ought to be given, by the majority to the minority of this House. I do not see why we should adjourn just now. The hon. gentleman says he is not going to speak at midnight. We do not ask him to do so, but if there are younger and stronger men than himself who desire to speak they ought to have an opportunity of speaking. If they do not speak to-night they will speak on Monday night and we will be put over until Tuesday. Surely hon. gentlemen will not deny that the case in support of the amendment, which is now in your hands, has been ably and exhaustively put by the hon. member for West Durham. The hon. gentleman himself cannot and will not be denied an opportunity of discussing the subject. We ought, however, to get on with business.

MR. DECOSMOS: I think that every opportunity should be given for a full and fair discussion of this question. As a member from British Columbia I have much to say on the subject. I desire to demonstrate to this House that the Province of British Columbia occupies a position financially second to none in the Dominion. I gave way this evening to the hon. the Minister of Public Works, and I would not have done so had I not expected that the Government would extend to me the courtesy I extended to a member of the Administration. I trust the hon. gentleman will not insist upon pushing this debate through to-night.

MR. CHARLTON: The right hon. the First Minister, last night, in a very gentlemanly manner, and greatly to the comfort and convenience of the members of this House, consented to an adjournment at about this hour. This is as late as we ought ever to sit if we have a due consideration for our health. It is impossible to close this debate to-night, and the desire that it shall be adjourned is a reasonable one. The right hon. gentleman's statements have been challenged, and we expect to hear from him on the subject, and the country wants to hear from him, and it will be taken as an act of cowardice on the part of the hon. gentleman in not consenting to the adjournment of the debate.

MR. DECOSMOS: I have as much physical strength, I dare say, as the hon. the First Minister has, and perhaps more; and if the Government are prepared to resist such a reasonable proposition as an adjournment, they must be prepared to sit here till, at the earliest, eight o'clock in the morning. I propose to discuss this question, Mr. Speaker: I would have preferred to have addressed the House within reasonable hours, but as it is the will of this House that I shall not have that privilege, I trust to your indulgence possibly for two, or three, or four, or perhaps more hours, in which I shall speak, in accordance with the law and usage of Parliament. We have had a speech from the hon. the Minister of Railways, in which he made his annual statement on the Pacific Railway; and we have had also the annual review from the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake). I may say that the speech of the hon. the Minister of Railways was cheering; it was full of energy and replete with information, and gave us confidence in the future of our country. It will be unnecessary for me to go into the whole of the details respecting the Pacific Railway, for the hon. the Minister of Railways has made detailed explanations to the House. I will, however, briefly refer to the whole line, from the railway system of Ontario and Quebec to the Pacific Ocean. The first section to which I will direct attention is that between the Canada Central Railway, the Montreal, Ottawa and Occidental Railway and westward via Lake Nipissing to a junction with that section of the Canadian Pacific now in part completed and part under construction between the west end of Lake Superior and Selkirk. As I remarked, I will avoid detail. Several Sessions ago, I made a statement to this House showing that with a certain number of wheat-growers, and with a certain acreage producing wheat, in Manitoba, the receipts from the transportation of wheat alone to Montreal would pay interest and sinking fund on the entire cost of the road, would meet the cost of maintenance, repairs, and operating expenses, and leave a surplus to the credit of the country. In 1873, after the hon. member for Lambton became the head of the Government, I intimated to him the desirability of the early construction of this section, both as a matter of policy, and as a necessary public work, to unite the eastern Provinces with the Great West. But no step has yet been taken in that direction, except the subsidies granted to the Canada Central, and the proposed construction of the Georgian Bay Branch. The hon. the Minister of Railways, I was glad to observe, alluded very briefly to the possible early commencement of the construction of this great link of the Canadian Pacific, connecting the populations of Ontario and Quebec with the Great North-West.

I, therefore, take this opportunity to say that it will be sound policy on the part of this Government, at an early date, to construct this section connecting the Quebec and Ontario system of railways with the section from Fort William to Selkirk, so as to carry grain through, on an all-rail route, to the ships in the eastern seaports of our Dominion. I support this policy, not merely as a party matter, but as a matter that concerns the interests of the Dominion as a whole, and affects particularly the two large Provinces of Quebec and Ontario. Sir, I trust that the hon. the Minister of Railways, during the Recess, will prepare a scheme for its early construction, and submit it for the sanction of Parliament at its next Session. A Railway can carry more cheaply than the canals.

AN HON. MEMBER: No, no.

MR. DECOSMOS: My hon. friend to my right says: "No, no," but I find, Sir, that reports respecting canals show this to be, as I state. The Railways from Chicago to New York, and the Railways from the West to Philadelphia and Baltimore, are carrying more than what goes by the water system. The steel-rail revolution has nearly overthrown lake and water transportation. Besides that the crowded passenger trains from the east, and the great volume of westward-bound freight, enables the eastern-bound freight trains to carry grain and provisions at such low rates as to make water transportation neither as profitable, nor as desirable as formerly, and consequently prevents the canals and lakes from being as great carriers now, relatively to the total volume of eastern-bound freight in the United States as they once were in the past. At any rate we have spent since 1873 more than $15,000,000 to enlarge our St. Lawrence Canal system, and we do not get out of it enough to pay current expenses. The tonnage of the shipping in the lakes is small, in comparison to what might be expected, as a corollary to our grand scheme of water transportation. Well, Sir, returning from this digression. I say that the line between the Thunder Bay—Red River section, and the railway system of Ontario and Quebec, ought to be built, and built quickly and early. I will take up another point: I believe the late Government made a mistake in commencing work, in expending money, on the Lake Superior—Red River section of the Pacific Railway. It is really nothing more than part of the trans-continental line, it seems to me, to run as a competing line with the Pembina section half of the year, and also as a competing line for the same period with the main trunk line between Selkirk and Nipissing when the latter shall have been completed. If proper energy had been manifested, and wisdom displayed in the expenditure of the money on the through line between Nipissing and Selkirk, the work would have been carried through and completed by this time. Now, Sir, with respect to the Pacific Railway from Red River to the foot-hills of the Rocky Mountains, the hon. the Minister of Railways, with his energy and bold determination, has enunciated a policy for building it and opening up the country, which shows him accustomed to rule a country; he has shown how the resources of the North-West can be developed and the country filled with population. I endorse that policy, and look forward to the near future covering that land with prosperous farms and thriving cities, with a network of railways like a spider's web. I believe the hon. gentleman is one of those statesmen who does not propose to put on slow engineers; but is one who wishes our navies to drive the buffalo and the deer before them on their way westerly to the foot of the Rocky Mountains. Now, Sir, we have had speeches delivered here with respect to the land policy of the Government,—the land policy propounded by the right hon. the Minister of the Interior, to settle the North-West with new provinces; settle it with a daring, peaceful, industrious population, who will clothe that naked land with cultivated fields, happy homesteads, busy villages, and ambitious cities,—the hum of their industries, along the line of the Pacific Railway, girdling the continent from ocean to ocean, and yielding Revenue more than will repay a hundred times over and over again, the cost of its construction. I will not enter into detail to show how the Government may be recouped by its land policy, for its expenditure in building the Pacific Railway. That has been well and fully done by the right hon. the Leader of the House, when he explained the financial policy of the Government respecting the Railway. But, Sir, I will say that I believe that policy to be sound and good; and that it is calculated to build up the North-West as successfully, as permanently, and as rapidly as any policy that can be propounded. Whilst the Railway Land policy of the Government was under discussion, and during this debate, allusion was made to the growth of population in Nebraska and Kansas. Sir, when I first slept in Nebraska—rolled up in my blanket on the ground, twenty-eight years ago—there was not a white settler's house within its borders. The frontier military posts, and a few licensed Indian traders, were its only inhabitants besides the wandering tribes of the plains. When I first slept in Kansas it was the same. There was then west of the Missouri, no State of Nebraska, Kansas, Colorado, Nevada, or Oregon; no Territory of Dakota, Montana, Idaho, Wyoming, Arizona, or Washington; no British Columbia. The only organised Governments were the Territory of Utah, composed of a few scattered settlements along the foot-hills of the Wahsatch Mountains and near the shores of Salt Lake; the Territory of Oregon, which had a few settlements on the Columbia, Willamette, Cowlitz and Nisqually; the Colony of Vancouver Island, with a mere handful of whites, gathered under the guns of Fort Victoria; and the State of California, with two to three hundred thousand people. There was then but one small mail that crossed the continent, and that was carried monthly from Salt Lake, each way, during about six months in the year. Since then the whole extent of that vast territory has been covered with young nations, possessing all the elements of vigorous national life, enjoying all the appliances of modern civilisation, yielding fabulous wealth, and stoutly contending as rivals in the race of progress with States and Provinces, the work of centuries on this continent. Western Nebraska and Kansas, with Colorado, Montana, Idaho, Washington, Utah and Nevada, are no better than British Columbia, and in many important respects are far worse. Two hundred and fifty miles west of Missouri River,

Nebraska and Kansas cease to be agricultural states. Thence for sixteen hundred miles west, till the valley of the Sacramento is reached, no cultivated land exists,—except patches in Utah nourished by irrigation. North and south, east and west, it is mountains with untold mineral wealth, and vast plains that will ever remain pasture lands, amid irredeemable deserts. The consequence is that when the western limit of cultivable lands in Nebraska, Kansas, and contiguous territories, shall have been occupied, the tide of population flowing westwardly in the United States in search of arable land, will turn northwardly and spread itself over the fertile belt in our Great North West. Of this, there seems to me to be no doubt. Hence the policy of Government in pushing onward vigorously the Pacific Railway—providing rapid facilities of transportation for our own immigration and the coming tide from the south—commends itself to every patriot. The hon. gentlemen opposite, ever since the Debates this Session began, and ever since the admission of British Columbia, have declaimed against the building of a railway at such a vast cost. Why, Sir, the total amount for the whole line, some $80,000,000, would be voted by this Parliament at once, for the purpose of defence, if a war broke out to-morrow, and would be voted without a dissenting voice. Sir, if the expenditure for the Railway, is spread over eight or ten years, it is small in comparison to such an expenditure for defence purposes; for war expenditure would be an expenditure from which we should see no great reproductive works in the future, but would be spent at once and lost for ever. But this Railway is a great work, a great national work, that will be valuable for all time; and would become more and more valuable year after year. War would ensure a vote of a vast expenditure of millions, entailing the slaughter of our sons, the destruction of our property, and manifold miseries; whereas here, we hesitate and object to a vote for a peaceful purpose; for a railway that will always be an instrument of peace, and an implement of war. Let me draw the attention of the House to some statements made by the Toronto Globe, while the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie) was the leader of the late Government, on the 31st of August, 1876. It was made at the time that Lord Dufferin was in British Columbia on a mission that proved to be a failure; was made after the route for the Pacific Railway had been adopted from Tête Jaune Pass to Fort George; and was published, no doubt, semi-officially by the hon. member for Lambton to influence the people of British Columbia. It is as follows:

Thunder Bay to Red River,	413 miles,	average per mile	$28,000	$11,430,000
Red River to Livingstone,	271 do	do	16,300	4,420,000

Total cost Pacific Railway.....	$79,673,500

The hon. the Minister of Railways, I believe, estimated the cost of the Pacific Railway from Thunder Bay to Burrard Inlet at $64,000,000. This is higher than the Globe's semi-official statement in 1876, for the longer and alleged more costly line from Thunder Bay to Bute Inlet, namely, $50,978,500. Sir, if this estimate of the hon. member for Lambton and his Engineers were true in 1876, it is true now, and shows that what the hon. members opposite sometimes allege to be a work of appalling magnitude is no such thing, and that the objections that they urge are consequently unreasonable. No reasonable public man will truthfully say that $50,978,500 to construct the Pacific Railway in ten years to come from Thunder Bay to the Pacific is a sum of such appalling magnitude that the people of Canada cannot bear the burden. But, Sir, no matter which is right, the estimate of the hon. the Minister of Railways or that of the hon. member for Lambton, we should not halt; but should complete the Railway to the Pacific within the next ten years. The line from Thunder Bay to French River was estimated by the Globe to cost $24,800,000; the Pembina Branch, the Georgian Bay Branch, and the subsidy to the Canada Central at $3,895,000, making the total cost of the Pacific Railway from French River to Bute Inlet, $79,673,500. This differs little from the estimate of the hon.

the Minister of Railways, which I understood him to fix at $82,000,000, for the entire Railway when completed and in operation. Now, Sir, the highest estimate of the cost of the Pacific Railway completed is nearly $6,000,000 less than the total sum given by the Dominion, the Provinces and the Municipalities, in aid of Railways throughout Canada up to 1879. The Railway statistics supplied to Parliament up to April, 1879, are as follows:

	Amount of aid for Railway.
Dominion.....	$65,939,900 51
Ontario.....	2,229,639 02
Quebec.....	8,513,613 27
New Brunswick.....	2,730,000 00
Nova Scotia.....	818,750 00
Municipalities.....	7,224,578 63
Total.....	$87,456,481 43

This sum has been spent within the last fifteen or twenty years. Yet the country is none the poorer; in fact, it is far richer. The people are as well clothed, fed and housed as they were before its expenditure; and are better able to-day to expend $80,000,000 in the construction of the Pacific Railway than they were at any period during the expenditure of the $87,456,481. The aid for railways was paid in bonds, loans, taxes; but the Dominion will repay herself the total expenditure for the Pacific Railway out of revenue received from the sales of land along the line. The proposition of the hon. member for Lambton was that $80,000,000 would build the Pacific Railway; and I do not think that there is a shadow of doubt but that that sum will be sufficient. Sir, this completes my review of the Railway to the foot-hills east of the Rocky Mountains, and brings me to the motion of the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), who wishes that the road should not be constructed in British Columbia. The Esquimalt-Nanaimo section of the Pacific Railway, we look upon as a road to be built by the Government of Canada, in accordance with the contracts with Columbia, in the Terms of Union, and in fulfilment of the Carnarvon Award; but I will select some other opportunity to deal with that question. Before I deal at length with the motion of the hon. member for West Durham, I wish to draw attention to some figures in regard to British Columbia. The hon.

gentleman said, in his speech, that we had only 12,000 of a population in that Province. Some years ago the hon. gentleman said, at Walkerton, the population was 2,000. I am glad that he has given us credit of an increase of 10,000; but, nevertheless, I will endeavour to show that he is as mistaken as a statistician as he is as a statesman. I will first draw attention to some figures in regard to the imports and exports of British Columbia, as compared with the other Provinces. I will not go into all my figures at this late hour, and weary the House, but I expect the Hansard report to take them in full, as they are tabulated in order that this House, and this country, may know the true relation that British Columbia bears to the rest of the Dominion. I will confine myself only to such explanations as will make my statistics more intelligible. The first table is as follows:—

STATEMENT of the Imports and Exports of the Provinces for 1878-79, compared with each other on the basis of Population.

From this table, it will be observed that British Columbia, although only twenty-two years old as a Province, stands next to New Brunswick, and fifth in rank among the Provinces as an importer and exporter of merchandise. Ontario, Quebec, and Manitoba imported more than they exported; Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island, and British Columbia exported more than they imported; and British Columbia's excess over imports was nearly as much as the aggregate excess of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. The per capita imports of British Columbia were six times more per capita than Prince Edward Island, nearly three times more per capita than either Ontario, Nova Scotia or New Brunswick; and more than double the per capita imports of Quebec and Manitoba. Her exports per capita were five times more than the per capita exports of either Ontario or Manitoba, and three times more than either Quebec, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick or Prince Edward Island. These are incontrovertible facts that I submit to this House, and press upon the attention of the hon. gentleman who has moved a repudiation resolution. I will now draw your attention, Sir, to a summary statement showing the exports of each Province under their respective heads. It is as follows:

This statement shows that British Columbia exported one-half of the total exports of the produce of the mines of the Dominion; and in that class of exports takes the first rank. She stands fourth in rank as an exporter of the produce of the Fisheries, and exports three times more than Prince Edward Island that is so urgently asking for a share of the Fishery Award. As an exporter of the produce of the forest, she stands fifth in rank; and fifth also in rank as an exporter of animals and their produce. In agricultural products she is the smallest exporter of any of the Provinces; but I predict that after the Pacific Railway shall have been completed, she will export more than any other Province. Besides her exports, the value of her agricultural products, farming and stock-raising cannot be less than $1,000,000, and her productive industries of other kinds, $750,000, making the total value of products for domestic use, $1,750,000 in 1878-9, or the total aggregate value, in that year, of exports and productions for domestic use, $4,500,000. Need it be wondered at, then, if British Columbia, with half her population Indians, has confidence in her own magnificent resources, and content, if need be, to stand alone, that she is proud of her position and power, and that she treats with disdain those who would violate their pledges, and trample under foot the most solemn obligations? I will now, Sir, bring under the notice of the House a statement of the trade between British Columbia and the other Provinces. It is as follows:—

Total Imports by B. C. from other Provinces.....$983,005 50
 Total Exports of B.C. to other Provinces in gold drafts to pay for Imports.....$953,005 50

In round numbers, British Columbia has purchased in eight years and a-half a million dollars' worth of merchandise of Ontario and Quebec, principally the former, and paid for it in gold. The 50,000 Columbians—whites, Chinese and Indians—have, within eight years and a half paid Ontario and Quebec $20 each for goods produced in this country. That $1,000,000, when passed from hand to hand in trade, has added $5,000,000 to the aggregate volume of their domestic trade, and has contributed to the support of hundreds of operatives and hundreds of families,—and yet that is but the dawning of the inter-provincial trade with the Pacific Province. When there are one or two hundred thousand of a white population on our western coasts, when the Pacific Railway, completed, shall carry cheaply across the continent, the domestic market offered to eastern manufacturers in British Columbia, will be worth its $1,000,000 or $2,000,000 or more a year. Probably neither the Government nor Opposition have noted this inter-provincial trade in the past, or forecast its volume in the future. It is, nevertheless, a growing domestic trade that will be swollen into grander dimensions as the Pacific Railway progresses towards completion; and after its completion, our merchants and manufacturers of Old Canada and the Maritime Provinces will not merely supply manufactures for domestic consumption on our western coast and great North-West, but will enter into earnest competition with the advanced nations of the world to supply our domestic manufactures to a thousand foreign markets around the Pacific Ocean. Mr. Speaker, I will now draw your attention to the taxes paid by British Columbia and other Provinces into the Federal Treasury. I will first give a statement of what each Province paid in Customs in 1878-9. It is as follows:—

STATEMENT showing what each Province paid in Customs into Consolidated Fund in 1878-9, and what they would have paid at the rate per capita paid by British Columbia, on an estimated population of 50,000, including Indians; and also on 25,000, by reckoning 25,000 Indians equal to 5,000 white consumers.

This statement shows that the entire Customs paid by the all the Provinces into the Consolidated Fund in 1878-9, was $13,040,331. That if Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Manitoba, and Prince Edward Island, had paid in Customs into the Consolidated Fund, at the same rate per capita as British Columbia, the total amount that it would have reached, is $45,848,433; and if at the same rate per capita as British Columbia really paid, assuming that 25,000 Indians are only equal to 5,000 white consumers, the amount paid by all of the Provinces into the Consolidated Fund would have reached the enormous sum of $91,175,443. From this statement hon. gentlemen, Sir, will perceive the astounding disproportion between the Customs taxes paid by British Columbia, and what was paid by the other Provinces. If they had paid in Customs dues at $10.42, the British Columbia per capita rate on a population of 50,000, they would have paid more than three times the amount they did; and if on the reduced basis of population for British Columbia, they would have paid six times the amount in Customs that they did. But, Sir, I will not weary the House with further explanations under this head, but I will draw your attention to another statement comparing the percentage of Customs collected in British Columbia with that of other Provinces, and the proportion that the population of that Province bears to the other Provinces. I will read it. It is as follows:

STATEMENT of Customs collected in British Columbia during the fiscal year, 1878-9, compared with the Customs collected in the same period in Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island and Manitoba; showing, also, the proportion of population in those Provinces to that of British Columbia:—

ONTARIO.

“Columbia paid in Customs an amount equal to 10½ per cent, of the sum paid by Ontario—that is, 50,000 Columbians paid $521,443, and 2,000,000 Ontarians paid $4,978,514, the proportion of population being 1 to 40, or 5 Columbians to 200 Ontarians.

QUEBEC.

“Columbia paid in Customs an amount equal to 10 7-8 per cent. of the sum paid by Quebec—that is, 50,000 Columbians paid $521,443, and 1,500,000 Quebecers paid $4,788,919, the proportion of population being 1 to 30, or 5 Columbians to 150 Quebecers.

NOVA SCOTIA.

“Columbia paid in Customs an amount equal to 43 3-10 per cent. on the sum paid by Nova Scotia—that is, 50,000 Columbians paid $521,443, and 400,000 Nova Scotians paid $1,204,289, the proportion of population being 1 to 8, or 5 Columbians to 40 Nova Scotians.

NEW BRUNSWICK.

“Columbia paid in Customs an amount equal to 49 3-100 per cent. of the sum paid by New Brunswick—that is, 50,000 Columbians paid $531,443, and 300,000 New Brunswickers paid $1,063,447, the proportion of population being 1 to 6, or 5 Columbians to 30 New Brunswickers.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND.

“Columbia paid in Customs an amount equal to 150½ per cent. more than the sum paid by Prince Edward Island—that is, 50,000 Columbians paid $521,443, and 100,000 Prince Edward Islanders paid $208,438, or Columbia paid $250½ to $100 paid by Prince Edward Island; or $313,005 more than Prince Edward Island, the proportion of population being 1 to 2, or 5 Columbians to 10 Prince Edward Islanders.

MANITOBA.

“Columbia paid in Customs an amount equal to 87.8-11 per cent. more than Manitoba—that is, (assuming the population to be equal,) Columbia paid $187.8-11 to $100 by Manitoba, or $521,443 to $275,484 by Manitoba, an excess over Manitoba of $245,959.”

This statement is so full and clear, Sir, that it is unnecessary for me to enter now upon an explanation. I will, therefore, come now to the Inland Revenue paid by the different Provinces, and I submit the following statement.

INLAND REVENUE.—Excise, Sources of Revenue: Spirits, Malt Liqueur, Malt, Tobacco, Petroleum Inspection, Manufactures, Seizures and other Receipts, 1878-9.

Province.	Estimated Population	Total Excise.	Per Capita	More than Columbia	Less than Columbia

Nova Scotia.....	463,000	222,911	0.55	Nil.	0.09

B. Columbia.....	50,000	32,319	0.64	Nil.	Nil.

In this statement the estimated population of each Province is given, the amount paid by each Province, the rate per capita in excise in each, and the amount per capita more or less than in British Columbia. It shows that the Excise paid in Ontario is 55 cents more per capita than in British Columbia; 34 cents more in Quebec, 10 cents more in New Brunswick and 44c. more in Manitoba; and that it is 9c. less in Nova Scotia, and 14c. less in Prince Edward Island. This shows that British Columbia pays more per capita in Excise than either Nova Scotia or Prince Edward Island and less than the other Provinces. What she is, however, deficient in her contribution to Excise, in comparison with some Provinces is a hundred times counterbalanced by her payments in Customs in excess of all others. Before leaving this question, however, I may remark that we had, a few days ago, a discussion on the Tariff. The whole energy of the Opposition and whole strength of the Government was directed to one point—the Customs Revenue and how it was levied. No one, so far as I recollect, touched upon Excise and Stamps, amounting to over $5,500,000, nor upon Post-office and Public Works, and other receipts amounting in all to over $4,000,000. My hon. friend from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) did discuss the sale of Crown Lands; but not with respect to Revenue. His arguments were directed solely to the best mode of managing our North-West lands, with a view to settlement. Out of $22,517,381, the total Consolidated Revenue for 1878-9, the Customs only yielded $12,900,659. The difference, $10,000,000, in round numbers, remained unquestioned, showing the opinion of the Opposition to be, if it showed anything at all, that the sources of Revenue, other than Customs, as managed by my hon. friend the Minister of Finance, to be in a state of perfection. Even the long and wearisome discussion on the Tariff by hon. gentlemen opposite, amounted to little or nothing; for, if they were in office to-morrow, they could not reduce taxation, because the obligations of the country are such that taxation cannot be lowered; and hence some other expedient must be adopted to lighten the burdens of the people, if too oppressive. We will consider now the Consolidated Revenue, and Expenditure with respect to British Columbia, inasmuch as our Province has been supposed by hon. gentlemen opposite to be a poor contributor; also to show the payments required of each Province, and to show what British Columbia is entitled to pay at the ordinary per capita of the Dominion, as her share to the Consolidated Fund, and her share for Public Expenditure. I have in my hand a summary detail, from the Public Accounts, of the Consolidated Fund and Expenditure for 1878-9, which I will give to the Hansard reporter for insertion, and not enter upon the full details now. Now, Sir, I have framed a tabular statement that shows in the most concise form possible what each Province in 1878-9 ought to have contributed to the Consolidated Fund, and what ought to have been their respective contributions to the Public Expenditure. I will read it. It is as follows:—

CONSOLIDATED REVENUE AND EXPENDITURE OF DOMINION.—Total Consolidated Revenue, 1878-9, $22,517,382; Total Population, 4,400,000; Average Revenue, per capita, $5.12. Total Expenditure, 1878-9, $24,455,381 56; Total Population, 4,400,000; Average Expenditure, per capita, $5 56.

Sir, no statements can be submitted to this House that show more correctly the just charges for Revenue and Expenditure laid on each Province than the one that I have just read to this House. It shows that the rate per capita for Revenue is $5.12, and that the rate per capita for Expenditure is $5.86, throughout the whole Dominion from sea to sea. The burden of taxation and expenditure thus rests equally upon the entire people. When, however, the per capita contribution to the Revenue and Expenditure of any Province is higher than in any one or all the other Provinces, that Province is unequally and unfairly taxed. I admit that it is impossible to impose taxes with mathematical exactness upon our whole people. Some sections of our country and some classes of our people, under our system of taxation, will contribute more to the Revenue than other sections and other classes, and our only course is so to impose taxes as to rest approximately evenly on all. British Columbia, however, is one of those sections of the Dominion that contributes far more per capita than any other Province: She contributed in 1878-9, an excess, over her just share to the Consolidated Fund, of $297,762; and an excess, over her legitimate contribution to the Expenditure, of $275,762. The former and following statements prove this clearly and indisputably to this House:

REVENUE.—CONSOLIDATED FUND.

Total sum required of British Columbia, to pay her share of Consolidated Fund, on basis of population, 1878-9.....	$256,000.

Total sum actually paid by British Columbia, into Consolidated Fund, in Customs and Excise, 1878-9. . . . 553,762

Total sum actually paid into Consolidated Fund by British Columbia, in excess of sum required as her share on basis of population, 1878-9 297,762

EXPENDITURE.—CONSOLIDATED FUND.

Total sum required of British Columbia, to meet her share of expenditure, on basis of population, 1878-9. $278,000

Total sum actually paid by British Columbia, in Customs and Excise, toward Dominion Expenditure. . . . 553,762

Total sum actually paid by British Columbia, in Customs and Excise, toward Dominion Expenditure, in excess of amount required, on basis of population, 1878-9. 275,762

For a people numerically so small in comparison with the populations of older and larger Provinces, the contribution of British Columbia, in excess of her just proportion, is enormous. The excess is larger than the whole contribution to the Customs Revenue by Manitoba, or the entire Customs and Excise contribution of Prince Edward Island. Yet, Sir, not a murmur has been heard from our people. We have borne the enormous burden of Federal taxation as a manly, self-reliant people. We have only asked the Dominion to meet her just obligations to the Province; and yet up to the present, the greatest of the Dominion's obligations has not been met; and an hon. gentleman opposite proposes to repudiate that. The hon. member for West Durham spoke to-day as if his own Province, Ontario, paid nearly everything: He said she was willing to spend her money throughout the Dominion. The House ought to understand that we have ceased to be provincial, and that we meet here as representatives of the Dominion; that we pay taxes as the citizens of Canada; and no matter what the revenue may be—no matter what the expenditure—whether outside, for our agency in England, or for purposes inside, the expenditure is so much for British Columbia, Nova Scotia, and other Provinces as well as for Ontario. The hon. gentleman keeps his books in single, double and treble entry—he keeps his books for the Dominion, the Provinces, the counties, the townships, and so on, ad infinitum, and took occasion to read from them to-day to show how much the other Provinces received from Ontario. Nothing could be more subversive of good feeling under our Federal form of Government than parading what each Province contributes to the Federal Exchequer merely in laudation of Ontario, and thus raising invidious distinctions between the Provinces of this Dominion. None but a parish statesman could do such a thing. The statement often made in the press, that Ontario pays all the Revenue, is not correct. True, she has a large population, but the citizens of Quebec might as well say they pay all, because their number is also very large. Later on I will deal with this issue. I wish now, Sir, to submit to the House a tabular statement showing the total approximate amount of Revenue paid by British Columbia in eight years into the Federal Treasury. I will read certain portions, and hand the table to the Hansard reporter for insertion. It is as follows:

This statement shows that from July 20, 1871, to 30th June, 1879, British Columbia paid to the Dominion, in Customs and Excise, the large sum of $3,392,152.80. In addition she paid $351,314 in Casual and Territorial Revenue, making a gross total of her contributions, from 20th July, 1871, to 30th June, 1879, of $3,743,696.97. It must appear to hon. gentlemen somewhat singular, if the statements of the hon. member for West Durham be true, that if our small population is only 12,000 whites,—it must appear singular how they could have paid in those years, nearly $4,000,000 into the Dominion Treasury. The people who contribute thus, without croaking like the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Casgrain), and the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake)—the people who can show themselves willing and generous enough to bear such a burden, and to put their shoulder to the wheel and push on the state car, should receive a higher appreciation than has been extended to them since I have had the honour of a seat in this House. Before leaving this branch of my subject, Sir, I will give a summary showing the total amount paid by British Columbia in excess of her proportionate share. It is as follows:

British Columbia during eight years, from July 20, 1871 to June 30, 1879, paid in Customs and Excise into Consolidated Fund..... $3,392,152 80

British Columbia contributed to Consolidated Fund from Casual and Territorial Revenues, from July 20, 1871 to June 30, 1879 (under estimated)..... 351,344 17

Proportionate share of Consolidated Fund required of British Columbia in eight years, July 20, 1871 to June 30, 1879, at $256,000 per annum, taking the financial year 1878-9 as the basis for the whole period.... 2,048,000 00

Total amount contributed by British Columbia from all sources to Consolidated Fund in excess of her proportionate contribution, based on Returns of Revenue for 1878-9, in eight years, ending June 30, 1879.. $1,695,496 97

Let me repeat that the revenue we have paid in excess of our legitimate share, assuming that each citizen should pay at the same rate, approximately, throughout the Dominion, nearly $1,750,000, and, at the same time, we have not received that return we ought to have received from the Dominion.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH: How much have you received?

MR. DECOSMOS: It is quite immaterial how much we have received, so long we have paid our proper share of taxation. We are not dealing in provincial politics; we are not here as Provincials, but we are here as Federalists. The sooner the hon. member for Westmoreland takes that large view of the matter the sooner he will cease to look at his own small Province solely, or to condemn a rising Province, but twenty-two years old, that pays half as much revenue as his does into the Consolidated Fund. In respect to Dominion Expenditure made in or for British Columbia, allow me to mention that there are certain sums of money that are to be paid for British Columbia that are provided for by Statute and the Terms of Union. There are other sums that are under the direct control of this Parliament, and either party in the House can oppose them if it pleases; and any contribution, beyond the statutory provision of the House takes the responsibility for, and not British Columbia, per se. Now, Sir, I have another statement showing the amount British Columbia would have paid in Customs duties in 1878-9 at the per capita paid by each of the other Provinces, and also the amount she would have paid at the average per capita rate of the Dominion, and also the amount British Columbia paid in excess of each of the other Provinces and Dominion at their respective per capita taxation rates. I will read it. It is as follows:

STATEMENT showing the amount that British Columbia would have paid in Customs Duties in 1878-79, at the rate per capita, paid by each of the other Provinces; and, also, the amount she would have paid at the average per capita rate of Customs of the Dominion; also the amount British Columbia paid in excess of each of the other Provinces and the Dominion at their respective per capita Customs Tax Rate.

I have prepared these figures in order that this House may understand the true financial position of the Province of British Columbia. I have prepared it with the view that hereafter the croaking against that Province, may cease. To illustrate my object, I will tell a story: I once heard of a person who lived in South Carolina, on the edge of a swamp. The frogs were very numerous, and greatly annoyed this man, and prevented him from sleeping at night. He tried every expedient he could think of to stop the frogs from croaking, and finally he hit upon the plan of constructing a huge lantern, and whenever the frogs began to croak, he opened the door of the lantern, throwing a flood of light upon the denizens of the swamp, and reducing them to silence at once. I sincerely hope the statements I have made here to-night, to throw light upon the finances of British Columbia, will have the effect of stopping this eternal croaking that we have heard in this Parliament from time to time, up to the present day. My hon. friends opposite, and notably the hon. member for Durham, have been talking about railway expenditure in British Columbia, surveys, and all that sort of thing. I have endeavoured to find out the total amount of expenditure in that Province for Pacific Railway surveys, and will give it shortly, Sir, though there have been three Governments in existence since the arrangement was entered into, to commence construction of the Pacific Railway in that Province, yet not a pick has been struck in the ground in the way of construction, not a shovel full of earth has been lifted; not a cart full of earth or stone has been carried; not a culvert has been built, not a bridge erected, not a tie laid, not a rail stretched,—nothing has been done whatever; yet we have been told here that a large sum of money has been expended in surveys. Now, before I name that sum, I will call the attention of the House back to the time before British Columbia entered the Dominion. We find such men as Sir George Cartier saying that all the money expended for surveys should be charged to the company who was to undertake the construction of the road. When the Allan Charter was granted, all expenses for surveys were to be borne by the parties holding the charter. Hence the charging of surveys to British Columbia is wrong in principle, and contrary to the utterances of Government in Parliament. I will show this House, nevertheless, on the basis I have just presented, that British Columbia has paid dollar for dollar, and more, into the Dominion Treasury for every dollar expended in connection with the Railway surveys in that Province. I will show you also what we paid in excess. I draw attention to the following statement, namely:

STATEMENT showing surplus paid by British Columbia over her pro rata contribution into Consolidated Fund, compared with Railway Expenditure in and for British Columbia up to June 30, 1879.

Surplus of British Columbia over pro rata contribution (see former statement)	$1,695,496 97
Total Railway Expenditure in and for British Columbia; directly to June 30, 1879	1,499,956 19
Balance in excess of Railway Expenditure, held by Dominion Government.....	195,540 78

A large proportion of this money for Railway surveys was squandered, first, through incompetency, and in the next place this money was not all expended in British Columbia. In making this statement I do not expect you to believe that I acknowledge the right of British Columbia to pay anything more than her pro rata share to the Consolidated Fund, I want, however, to show you that after deducting this vast sum for Railway surveys, $1,499,956.17, from the surplus in our Treasury, there is $195,540 to the credit of British Columbia, showing that the railway surveys in Columbia actually cost Canada, as a whole, nothing. Yet, we have the hon. member for West Durham, and all the brilliant lights around him, condemning the construction of the Railway in British Columbia, and attempting to repudiate the solemn obligation entered into between Canada and British Columbia, and Lord Carnarvon. We had yesterday and to-day, a long and elaborate speech from the hon. member from West Durham, and in it the hon. gentleman made a statement that the total population of British Columbia was 12,000. I presume it has not been denied by anybody, and I am sure, for the purpose of reviewing his statement. I will not. I find in my notes that I have headed a table founded on this statement: "Blake, the Statistician," of which the following is the substance: If only 12,000 people paid $521,443 into the Customs, the per capita rate would be $44.43; 12,000 paid $32,319 in Excise, the per capita would be $2.70; total sum paid in Excise and Customs, $553,762; hence total per capita of the population at that rate, $47.13. Now, if Ontario with an estimated population of 2,000,000, paid an equal per capita sum in Customs and Excise into the Dominion Treasury, as British Columbia on the Blake basis, she would have paid $94,260,000! I think if we had all that money in our Treasury, the genial face of the hon. the Minister of Finance would be lit up with unusual pleasure, and he would then have no difficulty in pushing on to completion all the great public works this country has ever dreamed of. Now, Sir, we will consider the cost of the Yale-Kamloops section of the Pacific Railway. I am not in possession of the statistics that were used by the hon. the Minister of Railways yesterday, and subsequently by the hon. the Minister of Public Works, but, knowing the country through which this section of the Railway will pass, I estimate, that when completed, it will not cost this country over $8,000,000. I have heard a gentleman, who is somewhat familiar with railways, state it would not cost over $7,000,000. But I have added the $1,000,000 named as contingencies to that sum, and fix the total cost of Yale-Kamloops branch at $8,000,000. Sir, I wish to show to this House that if this Railway is constructed it will have been with British Columbia money, and not with Dominion money, except so far as our contributions to the Consolidated Fund belong to the Dominion. I wish to show that this Dominion, outside of British Columbia, will not be called upon to contribute to the construction of the Yale-Kamloops Section of the line, and that all we ask is the credit and management of the Dominion. I believe I can demonstrate this beyond controversy. I will read my statement :

Total Excess paid by British Columbia after paying the interest on $8,000,000, 4 years, on Yale-Kamloops Railway	$1,222,215

I think, Sir, that I have now done what I promised. I have shown that when the Yale-Kamloops Branch shall have been completed, the total interest on the capital—8,000,000—invested in its construction and completion, namely, $620,000, will be repaid by British Columbia; and that the total amount of receipts in excess of her pro rata contribution for Customs, to Consolidated Fund, and the Saving on Expiring Loans, will be, between 1880 and 1885, $1,842,215, leaving a balance, in excess of the interest, in the Dominion Treasury of $1,222,215. Now, Sir, it will be perceived that British Columbia has no desire to oppress any portion of the Dominion to construct the Pacific Railway from the Pacific to the Rocky Mountains. All she asks is for the Dominion to use her credit in raising the funds, and to exercise a wise and economical management in the construction of the Yale-Kamloops Railway. The total annual interest on its cost of construction, after completion, will be $320,000, and, if the road were not to earn a sufficient surplus to meet the interest, the $1,222,215 referred to will pay the whole for five years longer, when the increased contributions to the Dominion Treasury will continue to pay it and the interest on the extension easterly and westwardly. I regret that the hon. member for West Durham is not here, for I wish to refer to his remarks about the vast sums of money Ontario and Quebec contributed to this enterprise. But, Sir, no statistician, no actuary, could, by any possible means, discover the sum these two Provinces respectively paid into the Dominion Treasury, except as given in the Returns. The hon. gentleman gave us figures showing that the total charge against British

MR. DECOSMOS.

Columbia, from all sources in excess of Receipts, was some $844,000 in eight years. But I have shown that, according to my way of treating that subject, which, I think, is the correct one, that we are not indebted in that sum, nor any sum, no matter how many similar statements my hon. friend may make. But I will assume, for argument sake, that British Columbia has received, in excess of what she paid into the Dominion Treasury, on the pro rata of the Dominion, $840,000. Now, any statesman worthy of the name, looking upon that vast Province, only twenty years old, would have said: This total sum of $840,000 at the end of eight years, will amount to $33,600, a year at 4 per cent., and the present population of this Dominion will not suffer an iota; for it will be passed to Capital Account, and met by loans that will not be redeemed in this generation; and that, in a few years, Columbia will recoup the Dominion a thousand fold. I wish my hon. friend were present to hear these calculations, for they would, possibly, convince him of the error of his way in making this charge. If I were holding the important public position of my hon. friend, who aspires to control the Government of this country, instead of playing the rôle of a croaker, I would select a more dignified occupation. My policy would not be to croak against the Government that they went too fast, but I would say, you are not going fast enough. That would have been a worthy policy for a leader of the Opposition, if he wished to take a new departure and cast away the miserable traditions relating to this question. Then we would have had the leader of the Opposition vying with, and out-bidding for popular favour, the energetic Minister of Railways and the large minded leader of this Government—although I may differ with both of them occasionally, I am glad to concede their just merit—to show who could “best work and best degree,” and who could best promote the interests of the country, and force it ahead. Then we would not have heard so much about the United States; how progressive their people are, and how slow we are. The argument of the hon. gentleman is simply this: that the people of the United States are a progressive people: that we rush there, but they do not rush here. And so we have this everlasting lowering cloud cast upon the country. I will not say that the hon. member for West Durham, and the hon. gentlemen who surround him, are unpatriotic. I never use the word disloyal without attaching some meaning to it. I have generally found, with respect to those people who are always prating about their loyalty, that, if you scratch a little beneath the skin, you will find very little loyalty. Our material interests modify our sentimental opinions, and when the two come into conflict, it is the opinions which give away. I do not like more lip-loyalty, either from the Government side or the Opposition side. I like that loyalty which upholds order, maintaining the laws of our country inviolate, and if ever we have to change our relationship with the Mother Country, we will do it in a constitutional way and not hypocritically. We have heard a great deal about the great milch-cow of Ontario. I have not yet completed my enquiries into the sum of money expended in Ontario, during 1878-79. But as far as I have gone, I believe that in 1878-79, Ontario received more from the Dominion Treasury than she paid in. The Customs, Excise and Stamps—the only taxes imposed—collected in Ontario in 1878-79 was in round numbers, $8,460,000; and the expenditure for Salaries, Public Works, Interest, etc., $8,560,000. Thus showing that the great milch-cow of Ontario has received dollar for dollar, and more than she contributed in taxes in that year. Of what then has she to complain? For what reason shall her public men attempt to dominate this Dominion, and insultingly tell smaller Provinces in the language of the late Government to Lord Carnarvon: “It is especially the duty of the smaller Provinces to defer somewhat to the opinions of the older and more populous Provinces from which the Revenue for building all such public works is derived?” The sooner the systematic delusion of Ontario, that she is the great milch-cow, is blown to the winds, the better. The two millions and a-half of Canadians outside her border will not submit to be treated as though they were objects of charity, and that by a Province that never had a surplus dollar in her Treasury, till after she had united with them. I now propose, Sir, to speak about the Carnarvon Award. We have a Repudiation Resolution placed before this House, by the hon. member for West Durham. He proposes to repudiate a solemn obligation. He proposes to repudiate the Railway clause of the Terms of Union, and also the Carnarvon Award, made in 1874, and accepted with thanks by the Government led by the hon. member for Lambton. The hon. member for West Durham appears on the Parliamentary stage this Session in two very distinct parts: one, as Award-preserver; the other as Award-breaker. Hon. gentlemen, Sir, will recollect that the hon. member for Algoma moved for a Committee to enquire into all matters connected with the disputed boundary of Ontario. On that occasion the hon. member for West Durham, supported by the hon. members for Bothwell, Elgin, and Lambton, opposed the motion, denouncing it as an attempt to violate a solemn Convention, as the entering wedge to break the Ontario Boundary Award, and concluded his speech by impressing the House with the necessity of maintaining the Boundary Award intact, as it was "infinitely more important in its moral than in its material aspect," that faith should be kept with Ontario in that matter. So full of saintly fervour did the hon. gentleman appear, so exercised seemed his righteous soul over the possibility of disturbing the Ontario Boundary Award by granting a Committee of Enquiry, that he reminded me of Milton's invocation of the Muse:

Illumine; what is low, raise and support,
That to the height of this great argument
I may assert eternal Providence,
And justify the ways of God to men."

The House, however, decreed that the motion should be carried; so all the mental agony of the hon. member for West Durham, excited by a majority of this House who were so lost to the same high sense of pure international morality as that which swelled his patriotic bosom, seemed wasted till the echoes of his pathetic appeal were caught up by the Globe and spread far and wide throughout the land. The hon. gentleman, however, has now appeared in the part of Award-breaker. He seems to have forgotten the pure doctrines of international morality that he, with the assistance of his hon. friends from Bothwell and Lambton, had applied to the Ontario Boundary Award. When he applied those doctrines, no doubt the motion of the hon. member for Algoma made him feel sick: the possibility of losing 120,000 square miles of territory awarded to Ontario, that Judge Armour and Judge Ramsay, counsel employed by the late Dominion Government, testified recently that Ontario was not entitled to, was indeed a heavy prospective blow to Ontarian supremacy. That may partially account for the high moral stand taken by the hon. member for West Durham on the Ontario Boundary Award—an Award that, by his own admission, required a Statute to make it valid and binding. Now, however, when the Government proposes to keep faith with British Columbia, to abide by the Carnarvon Award, to vote $1,000,000 for Railway construction, the hon. member for West Durham comes forward to break, to repudiate the Carnarvon Award that the late Government accepted as a settlement, and told Lord Carnarvon that it was not contrary to any Resolution of Parliament or Statutory enactment, and consequently held to be valid. He quotes no high and pure principles of international morals and applies them to the Carnarvon Award to account for his change in opinion in a few weeks with respect to International Awards, or to justify his course; but he manifests, by the production of his Resolution to postpone Railway construction, such a remarkable change in his code of inter-state morals as can only be explained by himself, and then the public may decide whether his international morality is or is not "false and hollow." The parts taken by the hon. gentleman, respecting the Ontario Boundary Award and the Carnarvon Award remind me somewhat of another great Reformer referred to in the couplet of Rabelais:

"The Devil was sick, the Devil a saint would be;
"The Devil was well, the Devil a saint was he."

Before I conclude this branch of my subject, Sir, I desire to draw still further the attention of this House to the opinions entertained by hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, and outside of it, when the Terms of Union, in 1871, were under discussion in Parliament and before the country; and, also, to the speeches made by the hon. members for Bothwell, West Durham and Lambton, this Session, respecting the Ontario Boundary Award, and to a comparison of their utterances on that occasion with the course they are now pursuing in endeavouring to repudiate the Carnarvon Award as well as the Railway clause of the Terms of Union. I will first direct attention to the Railway clause of the Terms of Union. It is as follows:

“The Government of the Dominion undertake to secure the commencement simultaneously, within two years from the date of Union, of the construction of a railway from the Pacific towards the Rocky Mountains, and from such point as may be selected east of the Rocky Mountains towards the Pacific to connect the seaboard of British Columbia with the Railway system of Canada, and further to secure the completion of such Railway within ten years from the date of Union.”

The first interpretation of that document, I find, is given by Lord Lisgar, on February 1st, 1871, when he said:

“The Terms of Union are in the nature of a Treaty.”

I will give you the opinion of another Governor, Hon. Mr. Letellier, who in a speech in the Senate, on the British Columbia question, said:

“The Resolutions respecting the Union of all British America were first brought up in the Legislative Council of Canada by the late Sir Etienne Taché, and I cannot understand why there should be any difficulty now in discussing a question of the same nature though of far less magnitude. Those Resolutions were a sort of treaty between the Provinces; the Resolutions in question will also be a quasi-treaty between Canada and British Columbia.”

These are the opinions of two distinguished public men; and both unite in holding that the Terms of Union were in the nature of a Treaty. But it remained for two other distinguished lights of Parliament to explain the binding force of that Treaty: they were the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) and the hon. member for Westmoreland (Sir A. J. Smith). I find that the hon. member for West Durham on that occasion used this language:

“Were not hon. members justified then in asking for further information before taking this irrevocable step. If this measure should become law, the faith of the Dominion would be plighted, and without the consent of British

Now, notwithstanding the fact, that the hon. member for West Durham made this statement on the floor of this House, in 1871, that hon. gentleman produced a Resolution here to-day, asking for the postponement of the construction of the Yale-Kamloops Section of the Railway in the Province of British Columbia. He stated, in 1871, that the Terms of Union could not be broken “without the consent of British Columbia;” and yet without her consent he attempts to break them, to repudiate the Railway clause by refusing to sanction the vote asked by the Government. The next great authority on this matter is the hon. member for Westmoreland. That hon. gentleman is reported to have said, in 1871:

“The faith of the country was pledged by the Resolution to complete the Railway within ten years no matter if the result should be ruin. No verbal reservations could have effect; the written record alone could hold, and the words of the Resolution were clear, and if in two years the Railway was not commenced British Columbia could appeal to the Imperial Government.”

The understanding of the hon. member for Westmoreland was then that this Treaty was a binding obligation on this Dominion; yet strange as it must now appear, the hon. member for Westmoreland was the gentleman who seconded to-day the Resolution of the hon. member for West Durham repudiating it. We have in these extracts the opinions given, nine years ago, by the hon. members for West Durham and Westmoreland as to the binding force of the Treaty of Union; and we have the unexampled spectacle, to-day—after seven years continuous violation of the Terms of Union, including five years' administration of the Government they supported, and of which they had been members—of the self-same hon. gentlemen shamelessly moving and seconding a resolution to continue to violate that solemn and binding obligation. I wish now to draw the attention of the House to the utterances of the hon. member for Bothwell, on the question of the Ontario Boundary Award raised by my hon. friend from Algoma, this Session, and apply the principles he has expressed to the course the hon. gentleman and other members of the Opposition are now pursuing in respect to the Carnarvon

Award. He said, on page 64 of the Hansard, this year :

"I am opposed to the Committee for which the hon. gentleman asks in his motion. I think, Sir, that the Parliament of Canada, or at all events, the Government of Canada, are in honour and in good faith bound by the Award of the Arbitrators appointed to decide this question of boundary.

Now, Sir, I maintain that, if the language used here is correct, as regards the Ontario Boundary Award, it is still more correct in regard to an obligation, in regard to the Terms of Union for which we have the sanction of an Imperial Statute, and the sanction of the Parliament of this country; and that if "the Government of Canada are in honour and good faith" bound by the Boundary Award, it is undoubtedly more closely bound by the Carnarvon Award which it had accepted. He further says, on page 66 of Hansard :

"For this House to grant a Committee of Enquiry, for the purpose of attacking the Award of the Arbitrators in this matter, instead of confirming it, would be acting just as our southern neighbours would have done, had they refused to abide by the Halifax Award. It would be just as flagrant a breach of good faith as if Great Britain had refused to pay the money awarded by the Geneva Arbitration. The Government of Canada is continuous. Its obligations are not ended by a change of Ministry, and Ministers are solemnly bound by any action of a previous Government.

"Would it be proper for Mr. Hayes, at Washington, to ignore the Halifax Commission as an obligation undertaken by his predecessor, Mr. Grant? Would that be a right and proper mode of proceeding? And yet that might as well be done as to repudiate the Award of these Arbitrators.

"The gentlemen composing the Board of Arbitrators had a full opportunity of considering the case, and they gave it their fullest consideration."

Allow me to tell hon. gentlemen opposite, that we have, in these utterances of the hon. member for Bothwell, a statement of principles to the effect, when applied, that we would be guilty of a breach of International Law by not carrying out the Treaty of 1871 with British Columbia, and the Carnarvon Award made and accepted by the Government of which he was a member. Notwithstanding this, we have had an ex-Minister of Justice placing before this House a Repudiation Resolution. The hon. member for Bothwell complained that the appointment of the Boundary Committee was to break the Award, when no such object was ever expressed, so far as I know. But the vote before the House, that is intended to fulfil the conditions of the Carnarvon Award, in some small measure, he and his hon. friends opposite unitedly propose to reject. They want the Ontario Boundary Award to be recognised, whilst they repudiate the Carnarvon Award. The hon. gentleman says it would have been "a flagrant breach of faith" if Great Britain had not paid the Geneva Award. Then why is it not "a flagrant breach of faith" not to pay the Carnarvon Award? The principle is the same. He says: "The Ministers are solemnly bound by any action of a previous Government." Then why did the Government of which he was a member not carry out the Railway clause of the Terms of Union, if the obligations of a Government are not ended by a change of Ministry? If the obligations of a previous Government are not ended by a change of Ministry, why is the hon. member for West Durham, and the entire Opposition, trying to prevent the present Government from carrying out the Carnarvon Award that was made and accepted by the Government of their predecessors, of which the hon. member from Bothwell was a leading member? He says, that the Ontario Boundary Arbitrators gave the question their fullest consideration. So did the late Government the Carnarvon Award. Yet the hon. gentleman and his friends propose to reject that Award, if possible. Mr. Mills adds :

"To sanction the appointment of this Committee to seek to set aside the Award of these gentlemen, would be as great a wrong, as gross a breach of faith, as if one Administration of this country were to repudiate the public debt incurred by another Administration, or do anything which, in the public estimation, it is derogatory for a Government to do.

"I think this House ought not to grant this Committee; such a Committee cannot, without dishonour and bad faith, be appointed."

Now, what has been the whole course of the hon. member for West Durham? It has been, ever since 1873, an attempt to relax and repudiate the original Terms of Union. It is now to defeat, if possible, the attempt of this Government to fulfil the conditions of the Carnarvon Award. If it would be "a great wrong," "a gross breach of faith," to repudiate the act of a former Government, what is the motion of the hon. member for West Durham to stop Railway construction in British Columbia, but an attempt to commit "a great wrong" and "a gross breach of faith." If the appointment of a Committee to enquire into a matter of which nearly the entire House is ignorant, cannot be made "without dishonour and bad faith," how can hon. gentlemen opposite free themselves from the charge of "dishonour and bad faith," when they attempt to repudiate the conditions of the Carnarvon Award, of which no hon. member is ignorant? Mr. Mills goes beyond this, and says:

"If the Government think that the Arbitrators were bribed, or that they were wholly incompetent men, then they ought to assume the responsibility of opening up the question, only with the consent of the other party,—and by obtaining information through the proper channels, instead of appointing a Committee,—a course which can lead to nothing but delay in the confirmation of the Award."

I am willing to concede the right of asking for a relaxation of the Terms of Union. The mission of Mr. Edgar for that purpose, however, as is well known, failed. What attempt has been made to get the consent of British Columbia to the Resolution of the hon. member for West Durham? None. But hon. gentlemen opposite do not propose to ask any relaxation. They will not even recognise the relaxation of the Carnarvon Award, that extended the time from 1881 to 1890 to complete the Railway from the Pacific Ocean to Lake Superior only. They propose to repudiate all railway obligations to British Columbia. That Province surrendered certain rights and revenues to the custody of the Dominion, and has fulfilled all her obligations, and expects the Dominion to perform her obligations. But hon. gentlemen opposite want to hold the surrendered rights and revenues, and repudiate the obligations they incurred. It is quite natural then for us to state that we have not, as a Province, violated our obligations; and it is also quite natural that we should exact from the Government a fulfilment of theirs; and if they are unprepared to fulfil their obligations, let them aid the Province in separating from the Union. the whole of British North America is not yet consolidated. There is an outlying Province, Newfoundland, that is not within the Confederation: and how can we expect the Province of Newfoundland to enter a Dominion that has violated its solemn pledges over and over again. The bad faith of hon. gentlemen opposite tends to destroy all hope of the complete consolidation of British America. I will next take the utterances respecting the Boundary Award of the hon. gentleman who proposed the repudiation Resolution to-day. On page 72 of Hansard, this year, that hon. gentleman stated:

"A very great responsibility is assumed by that country, whatever its rank in the scale of nations, which declares it will not be bound by the results of a solemn convention.

"I esteem this in the same light as a convention between two different countries; for, as between Canada and Ontario, they are separate and distinct in this matter."

Now, Sir, if a very grave responsibility is assumed by a country that declares that it will not be bound by a solemn Convention, is there not a very grave responsibility assumed by the hon. member for West Durham, when he declares by his Resolution that Railway construction in British Columbia ought to be postponed? And if he could carry his Resolution, would he not force Canada to assume a very grave responsibility by declaring that she would not carry out the Carnarvon Award? He says that the relationship of Canada to Ontario is that of two different countries, so far as respects the Boundary Award. If that be true, Canada and Columbia are two different countries so far as the Terms of Union and the Carnarvon Award are concerned. And yet the hon. gentleman shows no hesitation in attempting to break that solemn Convention. If his position be correct respecting the Boundary Award, the stand that he has taken to-day in moving a Repudiation Resolution is totally indefensible, as it is calculated to cover this country with the infamy of attempting to break faith with one of the Provinces of this Confederation. Referring to the power of an Act of Parliament, to decide questions of boundary, Mr. Blake continued:

"But while that power exists, the question of international morality subsists also, and what we have to consider is whether a case is here made out clearly sufficient to justify the procedure suggested to-day, based as that procedure is on a disregard of the Award as a cogent instrument.

"Now the first proposition I shall advance is that, as the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) well observed, there is a continuity in government.

"I say this question rests, with respect to the Government of the day, just in the same position as if the Government of the day had been responsible for the original commission. No hon. gentleman opposite can say that the present Government, or any of its supporters, are any the less bound than was the Government of my hon. friend from Lambton in reference to the issue of this commission and its consequences."

These are the utterances of the hon. gentleman who declared to-day, that he would not be bound by those solemn obligations to British Columbia. It will be observed that the hon. member for West Durham, in opposing the motion of the hon. gentleman for Algoma for a Committee to enquire into all matters respecting the Boundary of Ontario, said that there was "a question of international morality" to be considered. But, Sir, he has not questioned "international morality" in connection with his present motion. He assumes that the mere granting a Committee to enquire into matters connected with the Ontario Boundary raises "a question of international morality"; but he boldly undertakes to break faith with British Columbia, without ever touching on the moral aspect of the question. I take it, Sir, to be the duty of every hon. gentleman in this House to do all in his power to cause the Provinces to love each other, assist each other, and work together for the common good of our common country. But the course of the hon. gentleman is the very reverse. It is to induce the Provinces to hate each other. He says that the present Government is no less bound than the Government of the hon. member for Lambton for the issue of the Boundary Commission and its consequences. On the same principle the present Government is bound by the Carnarvon Award and its consequences; and yet the hon. gentleman repudiates the latter, and upholds the former. It is lamentable to see a public man occupying the position of the hon. gentleman reduced to so pitiable a condition. He also stated:

"My second proposition is that if it be proposed not to ratify the Award, but to open the question again, and throw that instrument aside, such a proposal as that should be made upon the responsibility of the Government of the day, and with all the gravity which such a course of action demands."

Now, Sir, if this doctrine be true, the hon. gentleman, instead of moving a Repudiation Resolution, ought to have urged the Government to re-open the question of the construction of the Pacific Railway with British Columbia, and ought to have moved, "with all the gravity such a course of action demands." But the course adopted by the hon. gentleman is not statesmanlike; it is simply that of a man who has no regard for the undoubted rights of others. Why did not the hon. gentleman, when he was in the Government, endeavour to secure such modifications of the Carnarvon Award as would have satisfied both parties to the Award? All he did was to offer $750,000 as compensation for all future delays that might take place respecting the construction of the Railway in British Columbia. That was very properly rejected; and there the hon. gentleman left the subject, till he came forward to repudiate entirely the work of construction. If any one, after this, can see anything statesmanlike, any capacity, in the hon. gentleman to keep the Provinces of this Confederacy together, they have better discernment than I possess. The hon. gentleman stated further:

"What a novel and entirely indefensible proposal it is, that a private member should take charge of this great material and moral question—moral as to whether a national award should be set aside, and material as to the extensive territory involved.

"It is the bounden duty of the Government itself, if disposed, to take steps, which in its opinion, the interest of the country requires—steps tending to the disturbance and upsetting of this Award,—so to state, frankly, itself, to propose those steps on its own responsibility, and justify its course."

The hon. member for West Durham here holds that it is a novel and entirely indefensible proposal that a private member should take charge of the great material and moral question of the Boundary Award; and yet, Sir, he, as a private member, comes forward to nullify the Carnarvon Award. To call such a course inconsistency would be to apply a mild term, for what in plain Saxon must be designated as a deliberate attempt to commit a breach of public faith. I beg now to move the adjournment of the debate.

(Mr. Cockburn, West Northumberland.)

FIRST READING.

MR. COCKBURN (West Northumberland), in introducing a Bill (No. 104) To amend the Statute of 41 Victoria, Chapter 17, relating to Stamps on Notes and Bills, said: I regret to see that the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue is not in his place, as I had conferred with him on the subject of this Bill. A doubt has arisen as to the true construction to be put on the word "cheque" amongst the exemptions in the Act of last Session, and some banks treat all demand drafts as being, equally with cheques, free from the operation of the Stamp Act. The consequence is that, if it was intended by the Act of last Session that demand drafts should not be exempt, there is, in fact, a very large loss of revenue. [The hon. gentleman here read, with the permission of the House, a few lines from the Manager of the Bank of Montreal, pointing to the doubt, and to the difference in the practice of different banks.] He then proceeded: Now, Sir, it is to remove this doubt, and to provide either that all demand drafts drawn by one private person on another private person shall be clearly made subject to duty, or that they shall be as clearly exempted, that I desire to introduce this Bill. I would propose that the Bill be read a first time, and, if the Government should decide that the Act of last Session already covers the ground, a declaration to the effect that demand drafts, not being cheques on banks, should be subject to duty, may be considered sufficient. I, therefore, move the first reading of the Bill.

Bill read the first time.

SUPPLY—CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY.

ADJOURNED DEBATE.

House resumed the adjourned Debate on the proposed motion (Sir Samuel L. Tilley): That the Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go again into Committee of Supply, and on the proposed motion (Mr. Blake) in amendment thereto.

MR. DECOSMOS: In resuming the debate gave a brief summary of the previous part of his speech, and concluded by saying: I do not believe it is desirable to do so at any length, as I shall take occasion, I hope, in another way to bring all the facts and conclusions that I then presented to this House, before the members of this Parliament and the country. We come, again, sir, to the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), he who sets himself up more than anybody in this House, or in this Dominion, as the pink of morality, as the pink of all that is great, as an example to the people of this country. That hon. gentleman said on the occasion of the Ontario Boundary debate:—

"But my main proposition is, that the responsibility properly devolves on the Government of dealing with the question which, as a resident of and member from the Province of Ontario, I do not hesitate to declare I regard as infinitely more important in its moral than in its material aspect."

Sir, the man who could regard the Ontario Boundary Award as infinitely more important in its moral than in its material aspects, comes to this House and repudiates not only the Carnarvon Award but the Statute. The hon. the leader of the Opposition stated, through Lord Dufferin, that the Award was accepted—that it was not contrary to any Resolution of Parliament or any Statute, and that the Terms of the Award would be fulfilled; but we find his hon. colleague prepared to vote for the violation of that solemn compact. On the same occasion to which I have referred, the hon. member for Lambton said:

"I have no objection whatever to the hon. gentleman using his power in this House to set aside the legislation of the last Government if he thinks it wrong; but I fear if he were living in another country, he would find some difficulty in setting aside solemn treaties that have been entered upon: such as the Treaty for the settlement of the San Juan question.

"If the decision on that occasion of the Emperor William were to be set aside, it would be as justifiable from an international point of view as the setting aside of the Award in the present case.

“The hon. gentleman would have no more right to set aside the Award than he would have to set aside the Treaty of Washington.”

These are the hon. gentleman's views who proposes to vote now with the hon. member for West Durham. He said in 1874 that the Carnarvon Award should not be broken, but he now wishes to repudiate the obligations made by himself with British Columbia. As it is not my intention to occupy the House long, I will quote from an authority which the other side of the House regard with reverence. On February 20th the Globe said this:

“It is bad enough for a Premier, who has not the moral courage to oppose something he does not want carried out, to shirk his responsibility and take shelter behind a Parliamentary Committee, but it is infinitely worse for him to be the means of making one of the parties to a solemn arbitration break faith with the other after an Award has been made. It is vain to say that the Dominion Government is not bound by the decision of the Arbitrators. If one Administration is not under obligation to carry out the engagements of its predecessor, what is the good faith of the country worth? As Mr. Blake put it in his speech, the moral considerations are in this instance far more important than the material interests at stake, though these are so considerable that we venture to predict a long and obstinate struggle before Ontario surrenders her present vantageground.”

Here we have the Globe and the three great lights of the Opposition, the hon. members for West Durham, Bothwell and Lambton, denouncing anything like breaking up of the Boundary Award and yet each of them is now prepared to vote against the Government of Canada attempting to keep faith with the Province of British Columbia, in the fulfilment of the Carnarvon Award. I have another extract to read, which I hope hon. gentlemen opposite will listen to. This is also from the Globe, of February 23rd:

“What is thought of a private man who refuses to accept the award of impartial arbitrators on his case? What was thought by the whole world of the United States journals that invited their Government to disregard the decision of the Halifax Commission? The mere objections of Secretary Everts were held by the nations to have disgraced our neighbours in some degree. What if their Government had refused to pay the $5,500,000, and had constituted a Committee of Congress to take the evidence over again and decide what should be done? What if the Cabinet of Mr. Hayes had refused to ratify the Award because the Halifax Commission had been determined on by their predecessors in office? But it may be said that an arbitration between independent nations is quite different from one between a federation and one of its parts, in a much as war might be the result of bad faith in the former case. We hold that a disregard of obligation is rendered more disgraceful by the plea that it can be indulged in with safety. The stability of the Confederation depends on the general confidence of the Provinces in the central Government, and hereafter it will be impossible to respect the Administration at Ottawa while conducted by the leaders of the Tory party.”

If the Globe's assertions be correct, that “a disregard of obligation is rendered more disgraceful by the plea that it can be indulged in with safety,” then we must assume that the proposal of the hon. member for West Durham and his friends, to disregard the Carnarvon Award, is “disgraceful” indeed. I now come to the denunciations of a number of the members for Ontario in that journal, of which the following is a specimen:—

“The names of the Ontario members who voted for the national dishonour and feared to stand up for the just Award to their Province, are worthy of record. Let the electors of Ontario note the following list of men, who have at once been traitors to Canada and to their own constituents:

	SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD.

This is what we find the hon. gentlemen opposite to have said and done through their organ the Globe. The very reverse they propose to do with respect to British Columbia, the only Province in the Dominion which has paid a larger sum into the Treasury than of right she should have paid. If Ontario members voted for the “national dishonour” when they simply voted for a Committee to enquire into all matters connected with the Ontario Boundary, and if they were "traitors to Canada and their own constituents," will not hon. gentlemen oppose vote "for the national dishonour," and prove "traitors to Canada and their constituents," when they vote for the amendment of the hon. member for West Durham to break the Carnarvon Award? But I will now read some passages from a writer on International Law, for the benefit of the member for West Durham, who presents himself here in the character of an international law-breaker, whose moral instincts are so readily touched when anything concerns Ontario, but who is deaf and insensible when British Columbia is concerned, and when she asks for justice. I will read some passages from Vattel, a standard authority on International Law, as Blackstone is on Common Law, and Adam Smith on Political Economy:

"It is a settled point in natural law, that he who has made a promise to any one has conferred upon him a real right to require the thing promised,—and, consequently, that the breach of a perfect promise is a violation of another person's right, and as evidently an act of injustice as it would be to rob a man of his property. The tranquility, the happiness, the security of the human race, wholly depend on justice,—on the obligation of paying a regard to the rights of others. The respect which others pay to our rights of domain and property constitutes the security of our actual possessions; the faith of promises is our security for things that cannot be delivered or executed upon the spot. There would no longer be any security, no longer any commerce between mankind, if they did not think themselves obliged to keep faith with each other, and to perform their promises. This obligation is, then, as necessary as it is natural and indubitable, between nations that live together in a state of nature, and acknowledge no superior upon earth, to maintain order and peace in their society. Nations, therefore, and their conductors, ought inviolably to observe their promises and their treaties. This great truth, though too often neglected in practice, is generally acknowledged by all nations: the reproach of perfidy is esteemed by sovereigns a most atrocious affront; yet he who does not observe a treaty is certainly perfidious, since he violates his faith. On the contrary, nothing adds so great a glory to a prince, and to the nation he governs, as the reputation of an inviolable fidelity in the performance of promises. By such honourable conduct, as much and even more than by her valour, the Swiss nation has rendered herself respectable throughout Europe, and is deservedly courted by the greatest monarchs who entrust their personal safety to a body-guard of her citizens. The Parliament of England has more than once thanked the king for his fidelity and zeal in succouring the allies of his crown. This national magnanimity is the source of immortal glory; it presents a firm basis on which nations may build their confidence, and thus it becomes an unfailing source of power and splendour.

"As the engagements of a Treaty imposed on the one hand a perfect obligation, they produce on the other a perfect right. The breach of a Treaty is therefore a violation of the perfect right of the party with whom we have contracted; and this is an act of injustice against him."

It remains, then, for history to state, that the member for West Durham bargained with his colleagues and the leader of his Government to violate the Treaty and compact with British Columbia—the bargain between her, Canada and England, which every honourable Province and honourable man would say was a binding obligation—and that he would only enter the Ministry on condition it should be broken; and yet we have had, this Session, the statement of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), that no Treaty can be broken except with the consent of both parties to it. I will read this passage on the subject:

"Who can doubt that Treaties are in the number of those things that are to be held sacred by nations? By treaties the most important affairs are determined; by them the pretensions of sovereigns are regulated; on them nations are to depend for the acknowledgment of their rights, and the security of their dearest interests. Between bodies politic,—between sovereigns who acknowledge no superior on earth, treaties are the only means of adjusting their various pretensions,—of establishing fixed rules of conduct,—of ascertaining what they are entitled to expect, and what they have to depend on. But treaties are no better than empty words, if nations do not consider them as respectable engagements,—as rules which are to be inviolably observed by sovereigns, and held sacred throughout the whole earth.

"The faith of treaties, that firm and sincere resolution, that invariable constancy in fulfilling our engagements,—of which we make profession in a treaty, is therefore to be held sacred and inviolable between the nations of the earth, whose safety and repose is secured: and, if mankind be not wilfully deficient in their duty to themselves, infamy must ever be the portion of him who violates his faith.

"He who violates his treaties, violates at the same time the law of nations: for, he disregards the faith of treaties,—that faith which the law of nations declares sacred; and, so far as depends on him, he renders it vain and ineffectual. Doubly guilty, he does an injury to his ally, he does an injury to all nations, and inflicts a wound on the great society of mankind. "On the observance and execution of treaties," said a respectable sovereign, "depends all the security which princes and states have with respect to each other: and no dependence could henceforth be placed in future conventions if the existing ones were not to be observed."

"As all nations are interested in maintaining the faith of treaties, and causing it to be everywhere considered as sacred and inviolable, so likewise they are justifiable in forming a confederacy for the purpose of repressing him who testifies a disregard for it—who openly sports with it—who violates and tramples it under foot. Such a man is a public enemy who saps the foundations of the peace and common safety of nations. But we should be careful not to extend this maxim to the prejudice of that liberty and independence to which every nation has a claim. When a sovereign breaks his treaties, or refuses to fulfil them, this does not immediately imply that he considers them as empty names, and that he disregards the faith of treaties; he may have good reasons for thinking himself liberated from his engagements; and other sovereigns have not a right to judge him. It is the sovereign who violates his engagements on pretences that are evidently frivolous, or who does not even think it worth his while to allege any pretence whatever, to give a colourable gloss to his conduct, and cast a veil over his want of faith—it is such a sovereign who deserves to be treated as an enemy to the human race."

The hon. member for West Durham proposes delay, and every hon. member can perceive that his conclusions are at variance with his statements and promises. But he is the man of subterfuges and flimsy reasons, in order that the Treaty with British Columbia may not be carried out. Vattel, page 234, speaking of subterfuges says:

"His Catholic Majesty, Ferdinand, having concluded a treaty with the Archduke, his son-in-law, thought he could evade it by privately protesting against the treaty: a puerile finesse! which without giving any right to that prince, only exposed his weakness and duplicity."

Now, what applies to Ferdinand will apply to hon. gentlemen opposite. This resolution has only again exposed their weakness and their duplicity. I quote again from Vattel on Treaties, page 450, and I ask the House to observe its applicability to the course of the hon. member for West Durham. As is well known, the hon. gentleman has ever been in favour of delays in connection with the fulfilment of Canada's obligations to British Columbia. Now, what does this great writer on International Law say about delays? He says:

"Studied delays are equivalent to an express denial, and differ from it only by the artifice with which he who practices them seeks to palliate his want of faith: he adds fraud to

Sir, I am astonished that hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House can support so perfidious a resolution as that of the hon. member for West Durham. I am astonished that the hon. gentleman himself should wish to cover his country with such infamy, as must cover every state that breaks its treaties. If war be the sum of villainies, the breaking of treaties must be the sum of infamies. My hon. friend, the hon. the Minister of Public Works, stated the other night that the Union of the four Provinces was based upon the construction of a Railway connecting the Eastern with the Western Provinces. Without the Intercolonial Railway there could have been and would have been no real Union. Now, suppose that after that Union had been proclaimed, after the Federal Government had been organised, and the several Provinces had begun to pay their money into the Federal Treasury, that the Dominion had refused to construct that road, would not every man from those Eastern Provinces have denounced the Federal Government for its perfidy? But, when such a course is actually proposed to be pursued towards British Columbia, many hon. gentlemen seem not to understand that equal perfidy is involved in the proposition to break faith with British Columbia. Now, we will take the Carnarvon Award. The leader of the Opposition, while head of the late Government, and Lord Dufferin, concurred in accepting the Award, and thanking Lord Carnarvon for what he had done. And they added this: We accept this for a present settlement, as it is not at variance with any statute. We accept it because it is not at variance with any Resolution of Parliament. What duplicity on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite, who deliberately, down to the present hour, are still prepared to implement that Award by supporting a proposition to ignore it. The hon. the Minister of Railways has brought under the notice of hon. gentlemen opposite, that the late Premier did not propose to build the Emory-Savona section of the Pacific Railway, although he put this country to an expense of thousands of dollars in moving rails. What greater infamy can we conceive of if this charge be true? When knowingly and deliberately using the public money of Canada for a mere partisan purpose, he wasted $32,000 to make the people of British Columbia believe that the Government intended to build the road, whilst in fact they did not intend to do so.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: I made a mistake in the amount; it was over $34,000.

MR. DE COSMOS: I thank the hon. gentleman for his correction. I think it will also be found that the late Government, in order to provide themselves with a means of escape, did not pass any Order in Council calling for tenders. I believe the call for tenders was put into the papers, and no Order in Council, authorizing the call, was ever passed. In 1871 the Government of Canada, with a full sense of their obligations, made a Treaty with British Columbia. The obligations of that Treaty put a first lien upon this Dominion after the charges upon the public debt and the ordinary and current expenditure for government. Under that Treaty the Railway was to be commenced simultaneously on the Pacific coast and at some point east of the Rocky Mountains. Fifteen million dollars have already been expended by the late Government in the work of construction, and not a single dollar has been spent in British Columbia in the work of construction. Is it not right that the Parliament now, at the end of seven years, from the time fixed for its commencement, should fill, in a small measure, the obligations assumed in 1871? Again, about $15,000,000 has been expended on the canal system since 1873. We find the system of canals between Lake Huron and Montreal have cost over $15,000,000, and the interest that is being paid, at the rate of 5 per cent., amounts to $750,000 more per annum. If this Government had wished to have kept faith with the people of British Columbia, it would not have entered so readily into the enlargement of canals, because the obligations to British Columbia was a prior lien on this Dominion.

MR. MACKENZIE: No.

MR. DE COSMOS: More than that! We find that they have relieved the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec of some $600,000 or $700,000 a year interest, or nearly $11,000,000 in capital. Making a total expenditure of principal and interest of about $50,000,000 in nine years, contrary to the spirit and letter of the compact with British Columbia. I take it that anyone to whom this matter may be referred will see that the first duty of the Dominion was to fulfil its obligation with British Columbia, but we hear nothing of that in the utterances of hon. gentlemen opposite. I desire now to allude to the address of my hon. friend the hon. member for Yale, when the reply to the Speech from the Throne was before the House. The hon. gentleman stated that I took ground in my speech on that occasion against the route of the railway selected by the government. The very contrary: I expressed myself as follows on this point: "I am glad that the government has at last decided upon a route on the West Coast." He, also, stated that I represented the people as being dissatisfied with the route selected. Now, I made no such statement,—as will be seen on reference to the Hansard. He questioned my remarks with relation to "the fertile district of Kamloops," referred to in the Speech. Now with the object of placing myself right on that subject, and correcting the error into which the hon. member has fallen, I have prepared some statistics on Kamloops district and the neighboring districts, which I will ask the House to allow me to place among other reports of my utterances on this occasion. These statistics will show the extent approximately of Kamloops and contiguous districts, from which the section of railway, now under contract, will get its business. The total area in square miles and acreage in Yale Commons district, exclusive of Kootenay, is:

	Square miles.	Acres.
Lytton	2,200	1,518,000
Cache Creek	1,200	768,000
Kamloops	4,500	2,880,000
Okanagan	2,700	1,723,000
Rock Creek	2,325	1,488,000
	19,825	12,798,000

Containing in 1879 the following polling districts, voters and farmers:—

	Voters.	Farm's.
Yale and Hope polling district...	67	13
Lytton district	51	23
Cache Creek	56	26
Kamloops	126	58
Nicola	67	54
Okanagan	70	63
	452	239

In all the sub-districts, giving the 239 farmers 320 acres each, the total acreage of the farms would be 66,480 acres; while in the ten settlements in the Kamloops district the 58 farmers at 320 acres each, the total acreage would be only 18,560 acres. North of Yale district is Lilloet district (a sub-district of Cariboo Commons district), the total area of which is 18,000 square miles, or a total acreage of 11,520,000 acres. The total acreage in occupation is: 83 farmers, at 320 acres each, 26,000 acres, the total voters being 108. In 1874 the list of voters stood:

	Total Voters.	Farmers.	Stock-raisers.
Yale and Hope.....	54	12	Nil.
Lytton.....	30	10	"
Nicola.....	43	40	"
Okanagan.....	58	9	"
Kamloops.....	87	36	6
Cache Creek.....	37	17	Nil.

The total lands taken up in 1878 in Kamloops was 8,160 acres, in quantities from 36 to 640 acres. The following statement will show the increase of farmers in the above districts during the period between 1874 and 1878:—

	1874	1878	Increase.
Hope and Yale, farmers ...	12	13	1
Lytton, " ..	10	23	13
Cache Creek, " ..	17	26	9
Kamloops, " ..	36	50	14
Okanagan, " ..	9	61	52
Nicola, " ..	40	54	14

The following is a summary of the Yale and Lilloet districts:

Yale, total square miles.....	19,825
Total	37,825
Yale, total acres.....	12,798,000
Lilloet, " "	11,520,000
Total acreage.....	24,318,000
Total voters, Yale.....	452
" " Lilloet	108
Total voters.....	550
Total farmers, Yale.....	239
" " Lilloet	83
Total farmers.....	322

I will not on this occasion enter upon an estimate of the amount of business that the railway may transact with these districts—as way traffic. I will say this, that with respect to the railway that is proposed to be built by the Government, that whilst I do not believe that the Fraser is the best route for our trans-continental railway, yet at the same time I am wholly indisposed to be factious. The Government have arrived at a decision, and I am prepared to support the Government in their decision to build that section of the road. I believe, however, that the Pine Pass route will yet prove to be the great through route. I believe that after this section is built it will enable the whole of British Columbia to be opened up, by connecting the Pine Pass route through British Columbia with the Yale—Kamloop section, via Fort George, Quesnelle, Clinton and Cache Creek. To benefit the Western Province, the railway ought to start at Cache Creek, and go on to Fort George; that would be the means of opening up the entire interior of the Province of Columbia. My hon. friend from Yale, also stated, on the occasion to which I have previously alluded, that there were not twelve persons in my constituency who were opposed to the Frazer route. Allow me to state, that that was an incorrect statement. He also stated that, in an eloquent speech, I spoke in favour of that section. At that time we had no terms of Union with Canada. We were not even within the Confederation, and the question of a railway across the continent, was an unsettled one. The question was put to our Legislative Council, of which I was a member, and of which my hon. friend was a member at that time. The statement was made that we might get a trans-continental railway, if Canada accepted our terms. I said then, that if we were going to have a railway, it would be better to put in a positive provision, that it shall be constructed between Yale and Savona's Ferry. I believe that this route will be valuable to this country, and I believe that the territory south of Kamloops, which is nearly five times large as the Province of Prince Edward Island, and that in the districts to the north and south of Kamloops, some very fine country, can be opened up. As far as Kamloops is concerned, I do not believe very much traffic can be obtained. My hon. friend opposite, does not want anything to be built in the way of a railway in British Columbia, until the settler has reached the Rocky Mountain Range. I think the hon. gentleman is labouring under a very great mistake indeed. He has to know that there is only one great commercial mart on the Pacific coast, and that that great commercial mart is San Francisco; that it has formed commercial relations with every people, on the west coast of America, the east coast of Asia, the Indian Archipelago, down through Australia and New Zealand. Now, I take it, if we wish as a Canadian people, if we wish to establish a foreign policy, if we wish to find a market for our surplus products, we ought to have railway communication with the shores of the Pacific, in order that we might distribute our surplus goods among the markets of the Pacific Ocean. The hon. member for West Durham wants delay. That is a great mistake; for the sooner we are enabled to move our manufactures across the continent, and enter into commercial rivalry around the shores of the Pacific Ocean with our neighbour to the south, the sooner we will be enabled to occupy a similar commanding commercial position to the provinces on the Atlantic. Allow me to call the attention of the House to the trade of the port of San Francisco. The total imports of merchandise during 1879, in San Francisco, amounted to $34,124,417. The total exports, $36,564,328. I find that the domestic exports from the State of California amounted to $29,000,000. Now the total value of the imports of Canada in 1878-79 was $81,964,427; and total value of exports, $71,491,255. By comparison, it will be seen, that San Francisco, a city only thirty years old, imports and exports nearly half as much, exclusive of coin and bullion, as the Dominion of Canada. Now there is no good reason why this state of things should exist, if we are true to ourselves, and develop by railway the Great West. A few years ago, I employed an engineer to make a measurement of our territory from the 110th meridian, west, to the eastern boundary of British Columbia, and between the 49th and 60th parallels of north latitude. The result showed that there are 257,000 square miles of territory east of the Provincial boundary that must find its market through a port in British Columbia. That added to the 330,000 square miles of British Columbia gives us a territory of 587,000 square miles, which must also find its chief markets on the coast of the Pacific. The United States, west of the 110th meridian and between the Canadian boundary and the Republic of Mexico, have 800,000 square miles of territory, and we have just as good a country as they have. The agricultural products of Canada sent from the Atlantic side to England in 1878-79 were worth about twenty millions of dollars. Now, the exports of wheat alone, from the port of San Francisco, last year were $16,788,772. I maintain that if we have a railway running from the cereal region east of the Rocky Mountains to within a short distance of the Pacific coast, that we will be just as able to ship our wheat to England as the people of San Francisco. We trust also to find a way traffic for this railway. By the settlement of that region east of our boundary, we will get this through traffic and by that means the railway will assist most materially to build up the country. I shall not go into detail further. I desire now to summarize a few facts from what I have already said upon this subject. We, British Columbia, import and export more than any other Province, per capita. We have contributed during the last year $521,443 in Customs alone to the Revenue, whereas, at the same rate per head as we have been paying Ontario, would have contributed more than $20,000,000. I contended on Friday night that 200 Ontarians paid as much as five Columbians; that five Columbians paid as much as 150 Quebecers; five Columbians paid as much forty Nova Scotians; that five Columbians paid as much as thirty New Brunswickers; and that five Columbians paid 150 per cent. more than ten Prince Edward Islanders. I showed that British Columbia paid into the Consolidated Fund last year $275,762 more than she was lawfully bound to pay at the per capita rate of the Dominion. I showed that during the eight years, from 1871 to 1879, she paid in a total, in Customs and Excise, of $3,392,152. But let us leave out of consideration the comparison with the Provinces separately, and come down to the average for the Dominion. Our proportion of Customs per capita of the Dominion is $3.50; that is the amount per capita which we ought to pay, and, as our population is 50,000, we should by right contribute $175,000 altogether; but the fact is we paid $346,343 in addition to the $175,000 which we should not pay by right. Yet we do not grumble. All we want is the Canadian Government to come to the front and carry out their obligations in the best possible way. The 50,000 population is based upon careful calculations. During the six months preceding my arrival here I gave a great deal of attention to the matter, and I came to the conclusion that, including our Indian population, our white population and the Chinese and every other nationality the number, our population, in the maximum, is 50,000. Now, it has been stated that $1,449,956 has been expended on surveys in British Columbia, and as British Columbia has contributed, man for man, the large amount which I have stated more per capita than all the rest of the Dominion, it will be seen that over and above all railway expenditure, the Government hold in hand a net balance contributed in the eight years by British Columbia, over the remainder of the Dominion, of $195,540. I am glad to see the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) in his seat; because I want to make reference to his statement, at Walkerton, that we had only a population of 2,000.

MR. BLAKE: No, no,

MR. DECOSMOS: The hon. gentleman stated that there were about as great a population in British Columbia as in the audience he was then addressing at Walkerton, and that audience was about 2,000 in number. I have it here in the Globe.

MR. BLAKE: I neither swear by, nor at the Globe; but what I really stated, was that the population numbered as many freeholders as the number then present; and I estimated the freeholders as one to five.

MR. DECOSMOS: Oh! freeholders. The hon. member for West Durham is well able to make that look better which looked so much worse. He stated that there were only 2,000 freeholders in British Columbia. I find also that he gives 12,000 paying $553,362 in Excise and Customs in one year; that would be about $47 per capita. Oh! I wish I were such a statistician as the hon. member for West Durham. I told the House the other night that I would deal with the Vancouver section of the railway at some other time. I know it will be built. I am only dealing with the Yale-Kamloops section; the total cost of which I estimate at $8,000,000. I have shown that we pay $340,000 a year more in Customs than the average taxation of the Dominion, and, therefore, we really shall pay all the expenses, in the shape of interest and sinking fund for the building of this railway.

MR. MACKENZIE: It will naturally be expected that one who has had so much to do with the practical work connected with the Pacific Railway as myself, will have something to say on a motion of so much importance, and, therefore, I desire to speak on the subject, not, however, going over the ground trod by the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), but endeavouring to confine myself to such points of the case as have not received his attention, though I will be obliged occasionally to repeat some portions of what fell from that hon. gentleman, in order to be concise and consistent in my narrative of events. I listened to the able speech of the hon. the Minister of Railways, but, although it was an able speech, I listened to it with a sense of disappointment, for the reason that, at least, two-thirds of it was taken up with a hostile and unfair criticism of his opponents, and not one-third of it was taken up with an exposition of his own and the Government's policy. The hon. gentleman seemed to think that if he could succeed in fastening inconsistency on the late Administration, he found an excuse for doing unjustifiable things now. He took up several matters, having an important bearing on the proposed continuation of the work, which I shall endeavour to notice. While I will not pretend to follow his points seriatim, I shall endeavour to arrange them so as not to miss anything seriously important. The hon. gentleman meant his speech to bear something like a historic character, for he commenced at the beginning and attacked the late Administration, and notably myself, for having opposed the scheme of the Government of 1872, in connection with the Union with British Columbia. It is quite true that we did oppose the scheme, and my only regret is that we did not oppose it successfully. We opposed it because it would entail burdens which this country cannot bear; we opposed it because it was wholly unnecessary for the purpose of obtaining the Union; we opposed it because the Administration of the day, under the leadership of the hon. the present Premier, deliberately entered into engagements not asked by British Columbia, and against the strong remonstrances of the country, and even of his own friends, against sound policy, and with the poor excuse—which it would have been—that British Columbia, without such terms, would have remained out of the Union. If British Columbia had remained out, it would have been a disaster that could be borne, although, if it had, I should have regretted it, because I desire to see an entire Confederation of British America accomplished as soon as possible. But I was not able to agree to the terms on which that Province was brought into the Union, and I am sure there is not one hon. gentleman on the Opposition Benches who is, at this moment, prepared to justify the extent to which hon. gentlemen committed the country, in order to accomplish that object. I was hardly, and yet I was, prepared for the hon. Minister's undertaking to excuse the whole bargain by asserting that the Resolution, passed some days after the Union was assented to in this House, was a rider to the Terms of Union. Such was not the opinion of the hon. the leader of the Government for years afterwards, and such was not the opinion of the hon. the Minister of Railways, until he developed that theory in a speech during the North Renfrew election contest in 1876. Assuming that the hon. gentleman's ground is correct, that the Resolution which was passed at the instance of the then hon. leader of the House (Sir George E. Cartier) did govern the Terms of Union, hon. gentlemen will see the extent to which it commits them. The hon. gentleman says that what are known as the Carnarvon Terms were binding on the country, but that the Terms of Union were not binding; and I was a little surprised to find the last speaker (Mr. DeCosmos) administer no rebuke for what he would call "bad national morality" and bad faith. It was quite true that the Resolution regarding the non-increase of taxation was adopted after the Terms of Union were assented to by this Parliament, but when the same Resolution was embodied in the Lieutenant-Governor's Act of 1874, it did not seem to the hon. gentleman to excuse us from being bound by the Carnarvon Terms.

MR. DECOSMOS: Not a whit.

MR. MACKENZIE: But the other does, it seems.

MR. DECOSMOS: No. We Columbians never admitted the right of the Parliament of Canada to impart a provision into the Terms of Union by their own act, neither did we ever attempt, or claim, to impart a condition, or Terms of Union, by the Parliament of Canada. We maintain that the Terms made by the Parliament of Canada had no binding effect upon the people of British Columbia. I can turn up statements of the hon. member for West Durham to prove that fact, because it cost me two Sessions labour to get it into his head.

MR. MACKENZIE: The hon. gentleman will find such a declaration made last week, and he will also find that on no occasion have we asserted, on this side of the House, that that declaration was of equal authority with the Terms of Union, and, while that is our position we hold further, namely, that the Terms of Union cannot take precedence of other public obligations previously incurred. Where it is evidently impossible to maintain both, in the present state of the public finances, we have to determine which of the public works concerned are thus likely to be most beneficial to the entire country, and not to a few thousands of its population. If the hon. the Minister of Railways, and the present Administration, took the ground that the Resolution passed, after the assent to the Terms of Union, were of equal authority with those terms, and released Parliament and the country from the enormous obligation incurred, then, I might equally plead that the safeguard the late Government provided, in their Act of 1874, placed us entirely in the same position. Our sole object then in opposing the scheme, in 1872, was to obtain such Terms as could be reasonably carried out. I admit, to the utmost extent, the desirability of our keeping faith in all public obligations, even when they do not partake of the nature of a treaty; but, on the other hand, British Columbia had every notice, by the discussion which took place in the House, when the majority of its members did not believe it was possible to carry out that bargain.

MR. DE COSMOS: Being one of those who took probably as large a share to induce British Columbia to enter the Union as anyone else, allow me to state that the discussions here were over, and the Resolutions passed, almost before we heard of them in British Columbia.

MR. MACKENZIE: British Columbia had notice of the fact, and Mr. Trutch, who was then in Ottawa as a delegate from that Province, in the published speech made in this town, admitted that the Terms of Union must be determined by the public necessity. I cannot quote his language, but I think I have paraphrased correctly what he said on this subject. The hon. the Minister of Public Works alleged that the Opposition, in 1872, had endeavoured to prevent Sir Hugh Allan succeeding in England, and that we prevented his success. All I have to say about that is that we knew nothing about Sir Hugh Allan's success or doings, except from remarks made by the hon. gentleman opposite, in this House (Sir Charles Tupper), when he announced, towards the close of the Session, in 1873, that the Allan delegation, in England, were meeting with most gratifying success. No act of the Opposition, good, bad, or indifferent, could have influenced the English public in the matter. But the scheme broke down, and the Government had to fall with the scheme they brought into existence. We came into office in November, 1873, two years and some months after the commencement of the tenth year period, which was to witness the completion of the Railway to British Columbia, and after the time of the first protest by the British Columbia Legislature that the Terms of Union were not being observed. We can say that the Terms of Union had not been observed up to the moment we assumed the cares and responsibilities of office. It has been said by the hon. the Minister of Railways, and I commend his remarks to the hon. gentlemen from British Columbia, that we were then in a position to repudiate the entire Railway—that it was quite possible for us to say to British Columbia that we are not able to succeed with the work. This,

MR. MACKENZIE.

Sir, was the conclusion reached by the hon. gentleman opposite. We took the ground all along that we were bound, as public men, to endeavour to carry out the obligations to British Columbia, so far as was consistent with the security of our financial condition. We were bound so far to give every possible opportunity that could be given to obtain public contractors and financial men interested in order to carry out the Terms as soon as possible. Within a very few weeks of the time we assumed office, we despatched a representative of the Government to the Province to endeavour to arrange for a modification of the terms to the extent that we believed we might be able to carry out. These modifications were not assented to by British Columbia, and we afterwards accepted the good offices of Lord Carnarvon, or more strictly speaking, we assented to Lord Carnarvon expressing his opinion upon the subject in something like these terms: That we were willing to submit to him whether the exertions of the Government, the diligence shown and the offers made, were or were not just and fair and in accordance with the spirit of the original agreement. Seeing it was impossible to comply with the letter of the Terms of Union in this particular, Lord Carnarvon expressed the opinion that we should make a little advance upon the offers made to Columbia through Mr. Edgar. While we expressed a willingness to make further concessions rather than forego an immediate settlement of so irritating a question, as the concessions suggested might be made without involving a violation of the spirit of any Parliamentary resolution or the letter of any resolution, the declaration of our Act in 1874, as well as the Parliamentary Resolution which preceded it, and the Parliamentary enactments of 1872, all pointed to the same determination, only to proceed as fast as our resources and Union obligations permitted. This was the position of affairs in 1874. I shall not, for a moment, deny that we intended to carry out the terms of the arrangement with Lord Carnarvon, and nothing but the want of means would have prevented us from accomplishing that object, an object which could not but be desirable to anyone who wished to see our trade extended. No one who looked to the desirable extension of our business across the continent could avoid seeing that if such an extension could possibly be obtained without too great a sacrifice, it would, in itself, be desirable. I was in favour of such a scheme of Railway extension as soon as it could be proceeded with, subject to conditions stated. It was impossible to set such conditions aside, merely to gratify the opinions of a small portion of the people who live beyond the Mountains, for their views must be subject to the opinions of the four millions who live on this side of the Mountains who pay for the enterprise. The Ultramontanes have, of course, their decided and extreme opinions on the subject, but I think they will understand that they must be subject to the governing power who live on the eastern side of the continent. The hon. gentleman who spoke last referred, in very strong and very indignant terms, to the fact that certain canals had been constructed, while the obligations with British Columbia had been unfulfilled. If the hon. gentleman reads the Resolutions of the Quebec Convention, which were the basis of the Confederation Act, he will find that the Intercolonial Railway and Canadian Canals were to be constructed as conditions of the Union, and as he will also find that so far from our fulfilling the first obligations before admitting the second, we have not yet really completed the first; we have only barely completed the Intercolonial Railway, and the late Government set aside, as not to be completed for the present, the following part of the Canal system: The deepening of the St. Lawrence, the construction of the Beauharnois Canal and the St. Lawrence Canals, west of Beauharnois, estimated to cost nearly nine millions of dollars. I do not say the people of Ontario and Quebec are entitled to come before Parliament, and denounce the Government and Parliament because these works have been postponed indefinitely by the late Administration, though they would do so if they followed the example of British Columbia. I believe the present Administration are in that respect following our footsteps, for they have asked for no vote for the prosecution of these enterprises. The people of Ontario and Quebec might as well come before Parliament and denounce the late Administration and the present because they have not fulfilled the obligations incurred in 1867 to the old Province of Canada, as the British Columbia members denounce us for not fulfilling the Pacific Railway obligations as they affect to understand it. All such obligations must be governed by national exigencies—by the national capacity to prosecute them. Circumstances might change; and if the hon. gentleman (Mr. DeCosmos) should say that no circumstances would justify the postponing of such works, I ask him what would happen if this country was unfortunately to be plunged into war, or to be torn by internal dissensions, such as brought disasters on our neighbours? Under such circumstances all public works would, no doubt, be suspended. The hon. gentleman's demand for the fulfilment of this contract, would be about as senseless as the demand of the emigrant who, when the ship was about sinking in the middle of the Atlantic, declared he had a contract for his passage to America, and would compel the captain to fulfil it. It is somewhat difficult to compel a nation to any course, and strong words and warm denunciations of those who claim to be the sufferers, is not the way to induce it to stretch a point and endeavour to reach the desired end. We passed an Act, immediately on obtaining office, to enable us to build a portion of the Railway, and, if it should be found desirable, by direct Government contracts, paid for like all other Public Works. I took the ground from the first that, if this Railway has to be built, it must be built by Canada. We may obtain an Imperial guarantee for part of the cost, but we have to pay the debt all the same. Unless somebody builds the road for the lands, Canada has to do it out of her own resources. I am not at all certain that it is always advisable to obtain the Imperial guarantee. I know that, if it had been refused for the Intercolonial, we should have saved $400,000 a year in interest. The only excuse given for adopting the northern route for this road was that the Imperial guarantee could not otherwise have been obtained. I then said it would be better to borrow the money ourselves, and adopt the cheapest and best commercial route. That guarantee is worth about one-half of 1 per cent. This is not such a benefit as should induce us to depart from our established principle of progress in regard to such a work. The hon. the Minister of Railways thought he made a very strong point in saying that I declared, in my speech at Sarnia, that Canada itself would have all the profit under our plan. He is not remarkable for the fairness of his quotations, as seen in his omission of a part of Mr. Foster's speech, the other day, which misrepresented that gentleman's meaning. I was speaking of Sir Hugh Allan and his associates as not being contractors, but mere speculators in the Pacific Railway Charter; saying that they had no intention themselves of building the road; that they proposed, in England, the issue of $180,000,000 of bonds, to be manipulated by themselves in such a way that, whoever built it, the original speculators would have a handsome profit. Our plan was not to proceed with any contracts until we had some reasonable view or idea of the country through which the Railway was to pass, till it was partially surveyed and we were able to decide, in the main points, of the best route and points of departure. It became necessary for us, under the circumstances, to proceed with the surveys as rapidly as possible. I am not quite aware whether the hon. the Minister of Railways blamed the late Administration for expending so much money on the surveys.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: I did not.

MR. MACKENZIE: In that case I will not make the remarks I intended; but I may remark on this point that, when we entered office, more than $1,000,000 had been expended on surveys, while not a mile of the road was located. We practically left the matter in the hands of the Chief Engineer. We knew it was necessary to satisfy British Columbia, that the explorations and surveys should be conducted as rapidly as could fairly be done; and at this moment the only thing I blame myself or the late Government for was our proceeding far too rapidly with those surveys. Looking back on the progress made and money spent on them, I think we could have accomplished the same results with much less expenditure by taking a year or two more to it. On the American line they spent nearly twenty years, and filled twenty volumes with the result of their surveys, and yet they experienced difficulties when they came to the work of construction. We were hurried, by the impossible and preposterous bargain made by the hon. gentlemen opposite, in such a way that it was impossible to give much attention either to the saving of money or the accomplishment of a particular part of the survey until we had the whole line looked over. We proposed, in 1874, our general plan in introducing the Canada Pacific Railway Act. It had been anticipated in my election address, the Premier, as usual, speaking for his colleagues. Our plan included the keeping of the section from Lake Superior to Nipissing in abeyance, and proceeding with the sections west of Lake Superior as fast as we could conveniently do so, in order to reach the lakes in the interior, and between the lakes and the branch of the road to be built, that we should, as soon as possible, make a continuous line of travel into the country. The hon. the Minister of Railways has, on several occasions, accused the late Administration of having abandoned what he calls their amphibious plan. We find the present Government have not abandoned it, or, if they have, why do they not ask Estimates from Parliament for the construction of the road in that region, north of Lake Superior? Are they still to use the water-stretches of the Georgian Bay and Lake Superior? They have not departed from that plan yet. They have announced their intention of departing from it some time in future, but no plan is given, or principle avowed. The hon. gentleman accused us of having departed from our original line from Fort William to Shebandowan, saying we commenced a work at that and the other end of the line without knowing whether we could connect in the middle. He has no warrant whatever for that statement. We knew we could connect in the middle. When we gave out the first contract from Lake Superior to Shebandowan, we expected to be able to take a line south of the one ultimately adopted. It passed near to Sturgeon Falls on the upper branch of Rainy Lake, and thence proceeded by a more southern route to Rat Portage; or, to adopt the line Mr. Dawson had foreshadowed, it crosses the Lake of the Woods at the Narrows. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Dawson) was good enough

MR. DAWSON: That island was set down by a surveyor, Mr. Ross, a gentleman quite fit to set down islands there or anywhere else where they do not exist.

MR. MACKENZIE: The islands disappeared anyway.

MR. KIRKPATRICK: I have seen those islands at the Narrows.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH: Have you seen the islands not there?

MR. MACKENZIE: The hon. gentleman saw them before they moved off, I fancy. When the engineers reported that this route was more or less impracticable, and advised us not to adopt it, we were obliged to deviate from the line we projected at a certain point. The line to Shebandowan, on which Contract 13 was let out, was altogether about forty-five miles, but thirty-two and one-half miles from Lake Superior was reached before any deviation was necessary, in order to adopt the present line, and the contractors were simply told that they must take the same distance on the new line or confine their contracts to the point of intersection of the old and new. There was nothing whatever lost by giving out that contract. It is one of the few contracts that have been kept almost strictly within the limits of the estimates of the Engineer. It was our purpose, when we commenced this contract, and had in view the construction of the Fort Frances Lock, that when we reached Sturgeon Falls, we should have continuous navigation from that point to Rat Portage without any break, and there is no doubt, whatever, that would have been accomplished. Then we deviated to the northward, making the line somewhat longer, and pointing to the north instead of the south. That line touched the north side of Lac des Mille Lacs, and from that point, except a few portages, we could also have a line of travel all the way to Rat Portage. We also commenced from the east side of Red River, where we considered the prairie country was fairly entered, and communications established with the navigable waters of Red River and Lake Winnipeg. We are accused of doing wrong in beginning at the west end. We began at both ends, to have the double force of labour to make up, and it is quite evident we could construct the road more rapidly in that way than by depending altogether on commencing at the east side. That was our motive, design and plan. I assert it was a wise plan, and the only mode by which more rapid progress could be made. It was our intention to build that road as rapidly as possible, because there was no means of communication between Lake of the Woods and Winnipeg, except the ordinary waggon-road, which was of no use for general traffic. It will be observed, from my remarks at my election in 1873, and in 1874, that we contemplated still further using the waters of the Saskatchewan for navigable purposes. We knew it would not be difficult. Indeed, surveys had been made before we entered office, showing that something of this kind was in contemplation. We found surveys extending from the Assiniboine to Lake Manitoba, and thence into Lake Winnipegosis, by Water-hen River, and by one lock, the lift being only about 17ft. 9in., and from thence to the Moss Portage into Cedar Lake or the Saskatchewan. Those works would give us, at a small cost, continuous navigation to both branches of the Saskatchewan to the Rocky Mountains. We had this in view as a means of settling the prairie country, and saving as much as possible while keeping faith with British Columbia, to some extent, in procuring a public highway for commercial travel across the continent. We have often been attacked for our policy in the water-stretches. We announced to Parliament our policy in the Act. No one on the other side, none of the present Ministers, none of the party behind them at that time, ventured a single amendment to that policy. None objected even to it. Our policy was this: We believed that the Pacific Railway was undertaken as a great national highway from one end of the Dominion to the other, and that whatever termination we made of it, near Lake Nipissing, it must be placed in connection with some other lines, and we provided for paying a subsidy to some connecting lines east of Georgian Bay. Our object was to have, as speedily as possible, a Railway from the waters of the Georgian Bay, to have a connection with the Quebec lines, through the Canada Central, as a connecting medium.

Our idea was that the travel from the far west would naturally take such a channel in seeking the far east. We thought, and my belief now is, that had that branch been constructed, had the present Government allowed it to be proceeded with, the grain from Duluth, until it can be got to Fort William, would find its way, in large quantities, to the east end of the Georgian Bay, and in much larger vessels than can navigate other portions of the lake, and that the trade of that country would, to a greater extent, find an outlet in that way than by any other route. Besides, we could not overlook the fact that the western end of Ontario had already possession of two or three lines of through travel: one from Detroit, by the Great Western, to Toronto, and connecting with the Grand Trunk; one by the Grand Trunk, from Sarnia eastward, all the way to the ocean; the Northern Railway from Collingwood, and the smaller Railroads to Owen Sound and Kincardine, to connect with the lines tending eastward. Our plan would form a through line to the Ottawa Valley, notably and notoriously the shortest line to the east from our western territories. Hon. gentlemen opposite have given up all the advantages that the Province of Quebec and the Provinces east of that would have derived from our plan, and the President of the Council is not apparently at all disposed to avoid cheering himself because he adopted this course; he deliberately injured his own Province, and now laughs at the injury he has done.

MR. MASSON: The hon. gentleman is too fast; something better than that is going to be done for Quebec.

MR. MACKENZIE: Then it seems that something is to be developed which the Government has not yet disclosed. How is it that a Minister is allowed to get up in his place here and say it is quite true that something of this kind will injure Quebec at present, but they have something far better for it? What is it? I will sit down for a moment and allow the hon. gentleman to state what it is, because it may materially affect my opinion. I am sure the hon. gentleman will not wish me to proceed upon false ground.

MR. MASSON: The question of the Georgian Bay Branch is not on the tapis;

the question is about stopping the work in British Columbia.

MR. MACKENZIE: My hon. friend will not get out of it in that way. I was under the impression the question of the whole Pacific Railway was under review. I was under the impression the hon. gentleman was present and heard his colleague discuss the Georgian Bay Branch, the eastern section, and now he wants to prevent me from discussing it by the intimation that they have something better to satisfy the people of Quebec. Well, there are some people from Quebec on this side of the House, and I think they have a right to know what is this good thing that is coming. Is it possible the hon. the President of the Council heard this good thing developed at the several caucus meetings that were held with the object of trying to procure uniformity in the Ministerial ranks? and is that what causes the bright smile of the hon. member for Bagot (Mr. Mousseau), who looks so good naturedly? My hon. friend says it is. Now, what was this wonderful arrangement?

MR. MOUSSEAU: What do you want to know from me?

MR. MACKENZIE: I want to know what passed in your caucus.

MR. MOUSSEAU: I will tell you next week.

MR. MACKENZIE: Well, I will pass that by, as my hon. friend has not yet made up his mind to give me definite information on the subject. I hope he will before the debate is over; it is a most important thing to know what is in reserve for us all.

MR. MASSON: The hon. gentleman has done so very little for the Province of Quebec; he must do a little more.

MR. MACKENZIE: I was under the impression I had done for Quebec everything that was reasonable and proper, and I am quite willing to contrast it with what the hon. gentlemen opposite have done up to this moment. But I am not to be led off my line of argument by any such side issue. I am speaking, at present, of the bearing of the Pacific Railway scheme upon the interests of Quebec. I am speaking of the plan we adopted to carry trade by the Ottawa Valley to the great cities on the St. Lawrence, and I have asserted, what no one will deny, that that plan was one which promised well for the prosperity of these cities. I have now endeavoured to show that the scheme which we advised in 1874, upon which we went to the elections, upon which that House was returned, and upon which was based the Act of 1874, was to subsidise the Canada Central and enable the roads to make connection with existing systems eastward, build a short branch to connect that road with the waters of the Georgian Bay, build a line from Fort William to the chain of lakes in the interior, and from the western end of that chain of lakes build a railroad to Red River, thus forming a continuous line of communication. I have only to add, as I have said, that from Fort William to Selkirk we did not depart one yard from the route of Railway, which is necessary for an all-rail line, in our efforts to connect the systems of water navigation. So that it was entirely open for us, at any moment, to proceed with the construction of the intervening link of 185 miles, or it was open for us, if we felt that it would not be in the interests of Canada, in a financial point of view, to construct that, to delay it and utilise the means we had otherwise for securing communication with that country. But the hon. the Minister of Railways also found fault, in his speech, with having commenced to build the Pembina Railway some years ago, not finishing it, and for having graded the line and then left it. Now, the hon. gentleman was most unfair in this. He knows, in the first place, that his own Government was bound to have that road finished and in operation by the 31st of December, 1874. When we came into office, one of the first things we did was to enquire as to the prospects of a railroad being built in Minnesota from existing lines up to the boundary, and we were not able to induce any of the parties to proceed with these works. It was constantly stated to us that, if we proceeded with that line within our limits, it would no doubt induce some of the Minnesota companies to build their lines to the boundary. Under the belief that this object would be thus accomplished, we gave out the contract for grading the road, omitting the bridging, the ballasting and the tracklaying, omitting everything but the ordinary grading. Where this contract was carried out, and there being no sign whatever of any action on the part of the Minnesota people, we did not proceed any further; but the moment we found that the Minnesota Company was prepared to build a road to St. Vincent or Pembina, then we at once gave out the contract for the completion of the Pembina Branch. So that when the Minnesota roads were about completed ours was also about completed, in order to form a connection. Under the circumstances, I am extremely surprised that the hon. gentleman should have ventured to blame us. Suppose we had completed the road in 1874-75, the hon. gentleman would then have denounced us for having built a line of road sixty-five miles long, having neither beginning nor end. He would have asked, what was the use of spending so much money in building a railway that had no connection with any other system, and to which we would have had to take our rolling-stock by boat and teams. I am sure there is no man in Canada who would sooner join in that denunciation of us than the hon. gentleman himself, had we attempted to carry out the policy that he blamed us in his speech for not carrying out. The hon. gentleman stated that we let out sections of work upon insufficient and improper surveys. Now, I ask the close attention of the members of the House, particularly on the opposite side, to a statement I now make. Up to the present time there has not been a mile of railway let out that was not let out upon surveys that the late Administration made and completed, except the 100 miles west of Winnipeg—and that has had no survey at all—and the section of 100 miles which he is now letting is also without any survey, except the exploratory survey which has been undertaken within the last two years, and a part of which we also undertook in 1877 and had reported upon as impracticable. The 185 miles forming the connecting link between Fort William and Selkirk, we had surveyed in a most careful manner, and during 1878 we sent out four parties afresh, after the survey and location had been really completed, in order to improve the location, if possible, and see that everything was in as good a condition as possible for letting the works. The hon. gentleman had the benefit of all this. We had also sent parties two seasons in the Fraser Valley, after the survey and location had been completed, to re-survey it, with the view of determining whether it could not be made still more favourable. That survey the hon. gentleman also had the benefit of; and when he accuses the late Administration of letting the contract upon imperfect surveys, he accuses himself, because he has let out, as I have said, no work upon any surveys of his own since he assumed office. But the hon. gentleman says I led the House and the country astray in stating that the road from Fort William to Selkirk could be constructed for about $25,000 a mile. He says I had nothing to go upon but Mr. Fleming's estimates, and the hon. gentleman himself ventured a statement to the House, two nights ago, in which he declared that from Fort William to the Pacific Ocean, Mr. Fleming had certified to them, and, in consequence of Mr. Fleming's certificate, he certified to the House that it could be built for $62,000,000. It seems the hon. gentleman opposite is at liberty to make any statement he pleases upon the authority of Mr. Fleming, but the moment hon. gentlemen on this side of the House venture upon that, they are accused of doing something not justifiable. The hon. gentleman says we had no accurate statement of quantities; I had precisely the same statement of quantities the hon. gentleman has. My hon. friend from West Durham (Mr. Blake) showed that even in his latest contracts he had taken pains to inform the contractors, by a note at the foot, that the estimates were not correct, that the statement of quantities was not reliable, and that they were only roughly approximate, and that in some of them there were none at all. Well, I was not aware of anything of that kind in the estimates prepared by Mr. Fleming for these three sections, that is: Sections 13, 14 and 15. I received the approximate quantities from Mr. Fleming in good faith, after the country had been visited by himself, after surveyors had been over it, and if Mr. Fleming led me astray in giving false quantities, there is no epithet too strong to address to him. But until Mr. Fleming says that, with his own lips, I will not believe that he could be guilty of such an act of perfidy. Having Mr. Fleming's estimates of the approximate quantities, I proceeded to let the works. The works were let upon those estimates; upon those estimates I based my calculation of the cost of the entire line, and I am prepared, at this moment, upon those estimates to maintain that valuation.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: Allow me to ask the hon. gentleman if he was not present at a Committee where testimony was given upon this whole question by Mr. Fleming and all the rest of his engineers, who testified that they were yet upon mere guess work, and that they had no knowledge of the amount of work to be done on those sections to which I have alluded.

MR. MACKENZIE: No, I never did.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: If the hon. gentleman will read the testimony given by those officers, he will find the statements proved.

MR. MACKENZIE: I never heard Mr. Fleming state it was mere guess work. I can only say this, that the quantities are there; the estimated quantities of Mr. Fleming are there over his own signature, and either they are correct, or they are incorrect. How it is possible that Mr. Fleming or his engineers could state specific quantities, from mere guess work, I leave to the hon. gentleman to find out for himself. It is impossible it could be guess work; and more than that, the estimates for No. 13 turned out approximately correct. The hon. gentleman has, therefore, no more accurate quantities for the contracts that he let recently, and that he is now letting, than I had, indeed they are not so accurate. The quantities for the western 200 miles cannot possibly be accurate estimates, because there has been no time to produce them. If Mr. Fleming, or any other engineer, now says that he had no intention of setting forth those specific quantities as approximately accurate, I can only say that the Department was grossly deceived, and the Minister was grossly deceived. The hon. gentleman has tried to make the House believe that the late Government was guilty of some wrong in connection with Section 15—that the ultimate estimate would exceed the original statements by about a million dollars. I can only say that, up to the time the late Government left office, they did not pay anything upon the works which were not included in the estimates, and whatever has been paid since has been paid upon works undertaken without being authorised by us, or, if so, the authority has been given by the present Government. The hon. gentleman has said that Mr. Fleming recommended the substitution of stone and earth for wood in some of the work; that Mr. Fleming left for England under the impression that that change would be made. I have only to say that immediately after Mr. Fleming's departure he had brought the matter before the Privy Council for discussion, and that after discussing it the Council decided not to proceed with the additional works recommended by Mr. Rowan and Mr. Fleming on account of the increased cost. I did not, as the hon. gentleman stated, approve of the work. I told Mr. Fleming that the change would be a vast improvement, and that if I had been acting for myself, instead of on behalf of the public, I thought I would probably have adopted the recommendation, but as it was we were bound to do the work as cheaply as possible, and that as the trestle-work would only last a certain number of years it would be comparatively easy to replace it afterwards by the more substantial class of work, as had been done repeatedly on the Great Western and other Railways. The hon. gentleman then found fault because we did not communicate our decision to the engineer. Surely the hon. gentleman knew that we were not bound to communicate a negative decision, but that, in other words, the engineer and contractor were bound to go ahead with the original plan unless they were advised and instructed to the contrary. The hon. gentleman and his friends, both in this House and in the Senate, have tried very hard to fix upon the late Government the responsibility of this additional expenditure; and when the Senate Committee learned with dismay that I had not authorized this expenditure, they turned round and rent themselves. The hon. gentlemen were themselves responsible for that expenditure; but had they discovered that it could be laid at the door of the late Administration, the country would ring with their denunciations of such extravagance and bad management. With regard to the termini of Sections 14 and 15, I do not know precisely, at this moment, what was the condition of matters: whether the filling in of the water in Cross Lake was wholly on Section 15, or, as I believed, partly on Section 14; but, at all events, that filling was done mostly, if not wholly, after I left office, and without my order or knowledge, and formed an important part of the additional expenditure. The hon. gentleman said that I should have known that the quantities were being exceeded. The fact was, I did not know it until after the estimates showed that most of the contract-money was paid out, when I immediately called the attention of Mr. Fleming to it, and he was directed to enquire into the causes of the excess.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: He was in England.

Mr. MACKENZIE: On the contrary.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: Did you announce that to the House or the country. You repeated your statement during the elections.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I was defending my statement, which was made as based on the engineer's estimates, and I defend it now. It was entirely consistent with the figures of the various contracts. The hon. gentleman is quite willing to adopt our policy, but he will not take anything that will tell against his own side of the case.

After Recess.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Not only that, but the hon. gentleman will find, in his own Department, that an enquiry was directed to be made into the over-estimation upon these contracts. My own recollection is, that Mr. Smith was directed to enquire—some one was, I am sure—so that whatever was wrong about it, it was simply a wrong in consequence of inaccurate estimates of the engineers. The hon. gentleman has discovered a patent remedy for over-estimates upon public works, and takes care that they must be done within the limited amount, and in order to afford an opportunity for that, he has added a quarter of a million to each contract in British Columbia, or $1,000,000 in all, in order that there may be a fair margin beyond which he will not go. He has only provided that it shall not go beyond that, because, on the Kamloops Branch and between Fort William and Selkirk, the surveys are more elaborate. The late Government were repeatedly attacked because they had commenced the surveys at Fort William; and I, once before, called attention to one extraordinary circumstance, when we sent to Nepigon, then thought to offer a nearer line, we were attacked by the organ of hon. gentlemen opposite—the Mail—which said: That everybody knew that Fort William was the proper place; and when, after giving up Nepigon, we adopted the Fort William route and completed the surveys there, we were vehemently attacked by that organ, which now said that everybody knew that Nepigon was the right place. Indeed, it was not I that sent surveyors, in the first place, to Fort William. Some time before we assumed office, a party had gone to Kaministiquia River, and had actually worked for months before we had an opportunity of communicating with them. I do not blame hon. gentlemen for that; I merely allude to the circumstance to show how careful one should be in attributing blame to any party. The hon. gentleman also formerly denounced the spending of money on the Sault Ste. Marie line. We never propounded that scheme; we never spent a dollar on it, although there can be no question that it would be a very fine line of railway from east to west. We, however, never advocated it or proposed it to Parliament. Hon. gentlemen opposite surveyed it before we came into office. This shows how reckless hon. gentlemen have been in trying to find some occasion for censuring their opponents. I believe that hon. gentlemen opposite are sincerely desirous of making the best of the position in which we are placed; but when I say that I deprecate the attribution of evil motives to us, in the conduct of public affairs during our incumbency, by hon. gentlemen opposite—and I cannot refer to it without dealing with some of the misrepresentations made from time to time—no one could listen to the hon. the Minister of Railways' speech, the other evening, without perceiving that, although there seemed nothing specially objectionable in the language, still there ran a vein of deception, an intentional effort, apparent throughout, to misrepresent the action of the previous Administration, and an endeavour to contrast it unfairly with the action of the present Government; and it was this which led me to consider that it was rather a sort of invective against our policy than an exposition of their own. I will not enter at length into the question attending the modification of terms accepted by us and called the Carnarvon Terms, simply because the circumstances are well known to the members of the House; but I will say that it has generally been understood that my reply of the 3rd of March, 1873, to my hon. friend from West Durham (Mr. Blake), was that we did not intend to ask the sanction of Parliament to any portion of those Terms. No one can help seeing, by the phraseology that I used in that reply, that what I referred to was simply the expenditure upon the Pacific Railway proper, either on telegraph line or trail, to be made in advance of the road, and really forming part of the road itself, or the expenditure upon the construction proper which was to be $2,000,000 a year, that was all provided for in the Act of 1874, and we only required the vote in Supply to enable us to proceed with that part of the Terms; but as to the Nanaimo road, that being an entirely new enterprise, it was impossible to proceed with that work without an Act of Parliament, and an Act of Parliament was brought in to sanction that; it was clearly beyond our scope to deal with it without an Act of Parliament, whatever might be said about the other points regarding the construction of the telegraph line, or trail, or the construction of the work proper. For the Nanaimo and Esquimaux line we had to ask a special enactment. We failed in this, because we were not able to obtain the necessary Legislative authority, the Senate having rejected the Bill. The hon. gentlemen opposite have tried to insinuate that it was possible that the Act was not passed through the Senate, because it was not desired. I can only say that I hope that no one will accuse us of any such dishonourable course as that implied. The hon. gentleman must have supposed that we induced some of the Senators to vote against it, so as to prevent its passage. I had no knowledge of any serious opposition to it in the Senate, by our friends, until it was rejected. Messrs. Penny and MacMaster voted against the Bill, but they did so upon their own responsibility, and without any communication with them by any person, that I know of. I know that the Vancouver line was of value on account of the value of the minerals; but when we assumed the responsibility of accepting the proposition of Lord Carnarvon, we did it as a matter of course, subject to the reservation previously made in the Order-in-Council, that it was predicted upon, and subject to the enactments already in existence, and the Parliamentary Resolutions prohibiting increased taxation; and the mere fact that we had increased taxation, in 1874, is no argument that we should increase it more. We increased it then to meet other obligations; and we believed we have reached or gone beyond the limit which it would not be safe to pass. We then proposed a substitution of a money vote for these Terms, and with which the people on the Island could either build the Island road, or expend it in such other public works as might be approved of. We had expended all we could on that matter.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: Do I understand that the vote of $750,000 was given to the people in lieu of the road on Vancouver Island?

MR. MACKENZIE: If the road had been built it would not have been voted.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: We understood the hon. member for West Durham to say, that the $750,000 was in compensation for delays in the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway. Was that so, or was it in compensation for the abandonment of the Nanaimo road?

MR. MACKENZIE: I was about to come to that point. Had we proceeded with the Island Railway there would have been no necessity to adopt money compensation proposal; but we failed in that and the main portion of the Terms broke down, and hon. gentlemen will find that the exact words used were: "compensation for delays."

MR. DECOSMOS: For delays that may take place.

MR. MACKENZIE: Of course the Esquimalt road was in compensation; it was a road we were not obliged to build, except on the agreement as compensation for delays.

MR. DECOSMOS: I think it was not given in compensation.

MR. MACKENZIE: Our friends on the Island made that contention, but it will not bear any other construction than that it was in compensation for delays past and prospective. Why should we build that road, unless for some special reason of that kind? It was in connection with the delays in beginning the Pacific Railway that it was undertaken; that was the inducement; it was an object greatly desired by the people on the Island; we had reason to know that few would object elsewhere, though there was a little complaint on the mainland; the road was only in compensation, but when that broke down the main portion of the Terms broke down; the other portion are not broken to this day, except the non-completion of the telegraph line and the trail in connection with it, and even that part can hardly be said to be broken. The surveys were not completed until 1878; and if there has been any delay, which can be called breaking a portion of the Carnarvon Terms, it has taken place under the hon. gentlemen opposite; they will very likely claim that their expedition in continuing the surveys was also in continuance of the work, and that they have not broken the Terms; and if they take that view they have not any excuse for an attack upon us. Now, with regard to the line in the Province of British Columbia, a very vigorous attack was made by the hon. gentleman on the late Administration, because, having adopted the Burrard Inlet route, and having advertised for tenders for 125 miles from Yale to Kamloops, they were therefore bound and committed irrevocably to go on and give out the contract. I admit that a very plausible appearance can be put upon that, but it was not our intention to be bound by our asking for tenders to at once commence construction. We had to determine what route from Yellow Head Pass to the Pacific Ocean should be taken. I had repeatedly mentioned, in the early years of the survey, that Bute Inlet seemed to me the best, and Dean Inlet was considered afterwards the best for a time; it is the shortest still, but high grades and an inferior harbour induced us to reject it. I will not go into the considerations which induced us to adopt the Burrard Inlet route, as I went into that fully in 1878. Having decided in the spring of 1878 to adopt the Burrard Inlet route, we had then to consider how far we could carry out a part of the construction, to what extent and within what time. To have the House understand thoroughly the position of the late Government, I will call to their recollection that, in my speeches in Parliament, I pointed out that it was the intention of the Government to have an instrumental survey made from Lake Superior westward to the ocean. We proposed, in the first place, to have such an instrumental survey across the continent as would enable us to complete a profile of the road from Lake Superior to the ocean; and when Mr. Fleming went to London he was directed to call the attention of capitalists and contractors to the position of the road. These profiles, as fast as they were completed, were transmitted to London, to be placed on exhibition at the Government offices. When the operations of 1877 were completed, and the profile of Burrard Inlet route was obtained, the completed profile was transmitted to England. It was always the intention of the Government to ask for tenders under terms of the Act of 1874, and we did ask for tenders under terms of that Act. In the meantime, we compiled, in one volume, a mass of information about the country, its flora, fauna, soil, climate, geology, minerals, etc., and sent copies to all parties who might enquire concerning the work. We also had the Act of 1874 reprinted, and sent a sufficient number of copies to London, and distributed others here. We, in short, did everything in our power to make the country known contemporaneously with our asking tenders for the entire line, offering $10,000 a mile, and asking a guarantee of 4 per cent. for twenty-five years. We adopted this last item to establish a basis of computation. We also called for tenders for the Columbia Kamloops section, as an ordinary public work, in order to have the fullest information. We could not have let that work on both systems. The very asking on the plans shows what our object was. It was upon the tenders so asked for, as ordinary public works, that hon. gentlemen opposite awarded the contracts, on the Yale-Kamloops Branch, of 125 miles. We had also asked for tenders for 185 miles, with the intention, if at all possible, of proceeding with the construction of that part, under one or other of the plans, as it was most desirable to have a complete Railway system, as soon as possible, into the prairie country. We expected that would require, at least, four years for construction, before it would be possible to utilise it for through traffic from Fort William. We had not, however, actually determined to place either part under contract, but we were to consider the whole circumstances. We hoped that, if anything could produce tenders upon the plan contained in the Act, our advertisement would result in producing such tenders. The hon. gentlemen opposite seem to glory in the fact that the late Government got only one tender, and that one which could not be considered. We were accused of adopting the hon. gentlemen's plan in that Act. I confess that, after the hon. gentlemen opposite had committed themselves to the building of this road, the late Government were bound, as the successors of those hon. gentlemen, to give effect to their plan, if possible, and we tried our best to do so. Our modifications of their plan were all in favour of parties tendering, and, therefore, should have produced tenders, though theirs failed. We only gave out tenders for Sections 13, 14, 15 and 25, in order to facilitate the construction of the whole line. These initial portions of the road were begun when it was of the least importance to get into the prairie country. We knew that, without getting a large population thrown into that country, it was utterly hopeless to expect that the road could pay, and we therefore determined, in anticipation of surveys being completed, to proceed with that particular section, so that when the surveys were completed we might ask for tenders for the entire line under very favourable circumstances. The hon. gentleman said that he could have got a contract on the terms advertised by the late Government. If so the hon. gentleman committed a great mistake in not advertising for tenders. The plan of the late Government provided for the payment of $10,000 in cash per mile, extending over the entire 2,600 miles. This would make the total $26,000,000, to which add $3,000,000 for surveys, according to the hon. gentleman's statement, would make $29,000,000, leaving $1,000,000 still to be devoted to the eastern end to pay the greater portion of the subsidy to the Canada Central Railway. If the late Government could have obtained offers which would have enabled them to construct the road for $26,000,000, I think it would have been their duty to have accepted them. They did not have any offers made them, and the hon. gentleman knew that he could not get any or he would have asked for them. It has come at last to what I invariably stated formerly, when in Opposition, that the hon. gentleman would have to count on the people of Canada to pay for this road, if it was to be built. The hon. gentleman had alluded to the removal of rails from Vancouver Island to Yale, as an indication of the intention of the late Government to proceed with the work in the Fraser Valley, or else of their intention to deceive the public for the sake of the elections. The late Government, I am sure, had nothing to gain by ministering to any party in British Columbia, because British Columbia had always been hostile to them, and they had no reason to expect that a single member would be returned to support their Administration. But they had determined on Burrard Inlet as the terminus. They had determined also that as soon as they could, whatever time that might be, they would build the road, and, if they had remained in power, to devote some portion of public money, as soon as it could be spared, to place the rails on that road. How soon that could be spared was a matter of discussion, but they knew that the rails had to go there. They had a great deal of difficulty in getting them landed on the Island; heavy storage dues had to be paid, and they felt that the sooner these rails could be brought to their own property, where no charges would have to be paid, and where they would be nearest the place where they would be ultimately used, I deny that the late Government deceived any one in this matter. They made no promise. They asked for tenders, and when these tenders could be examined they would decide as to the advisability of the eastern end, or the Columbia section, being proceeded with. They had to determine, in fact, on an entirely new policy as to the mode of procedure in the construction of this work, and while they asked for tenders in perfect good faith, on both plans, for the purpose of obtaining information, they were not bound to accept the lowest, or any tender, with a view to immediate construction. With regard to the speech which I delivered in Ottawa, and from which the hon. gentleman quoted, I have no doubt it was correctly reported, but the hon. gentleman will find in that speech the strongest possible expression of the opinion that the expenditure must be controlled in the way indicated in the Act. The hon. gentleman has given the House a long table of estimates of the cost of the Railway, compiled by the Chief Engineer. Mr. Fleming gave the total amount from Fort William to Burrard Inlet, including surveys, at $64,859,616, or with the extension to Lake Nipissing, $88,869,616.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: I wish to correct the hon. gentleman as to the last-named estimate. It was not Mr. Fleming's, but my own; but I have seen him since and he puts it at $20,000,000, or $84,000,000 in all.

MR. MACKENZIE: It would be interesting to the House to take some of Mr. Fleming's estimates on other occasions. Mr. Fleming gave an estimate from Lake Superior to Selkirk at $14,700,000; now it is $17,000,000, or an increase of 16 per cent. His previous estimate of the cost of the Prairie region was $26,000,000, or double what he now states it to be. From Nipissing to Lake Superior his estimate to the late Government was $26,000,000, or $6,000,000 more than now, and $2,000,000 more than that of the hon. Minister. From the Summit Line to Burrard Inlet, his estimate was $35,000,000, which was now reduced to $30,000,000. The Pembina Branch was formerly $1,300,000; now the hon. gentleman stated it to be $1,700,000. If the same percentage is applied to the Chief Engineer's calculations on other sections, namely, 16 per cent., the whole cost will be about $114,000,000, instead of $84,000,000 as the hon. gentleman now states. Such wild estimates shows how utterly impossible it was for anyone to ascertain the probable cost, and I feel pretty certain that the estimates now presented are the merest guess-work. I will take the description of the engineers themselves as to the character of the work upon the several sections from Fort William to Selkirk, and carry out figures elsewhere on the same description. Seventy miles were described as heavy, 226 miles moderate, and 114 miles light; and in order to reach the $18,000,000, which the engineers had recently estimated, they would have to take the seventy miles of heavy work at $75,000 per mile; the 226 miles of moderate might, at $39,000, and the 114 light, at $20,000, making altogether, with the rolling-stock valued at $1,656,000, $18,000,000. From Selkirk to Battleford the first 112 miles are described as light, which, with the rails, fencing, etc., might be estimated at $14,000 per mile, or $3,000 less than the Pembina Branch; and the second 100 miles I have taken and calculated as to the materials furnished by Mr. Marcus Smith, and I do not believe that any gradient can be obtained on that section to build the road at less than $20,000 a mile. We have in some miles a quantity of 39,000 cubic yards of earth to move, and all grades steep, only kept under fifty-three feet to the mile—many of them are fifty-three feet. The average of excavation is 16,000 cubic yards per mile. We have, in short, 1,600,000 cubic yards of earth to move which, at the lowest price per yard obtained on other roads, say twenty-five cents on the average, this of itself will cost $400,000, and yet the hon. the Minister of Railways told the House that the whole road could be constructed for $428,000.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: For $438,000.

MR. MACKENZIE: This was almost the exact value of the earth work alone, leaving nothing for bridges, ties, rails, building fences, and other items.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: The rails are included.

MR. MACKENZIE: No, but they have to be added to the price. We have the estimate of Mr. Smith, the acting Chief Engineer, and even with the degraded character of this road—the high grades and sharp curves—descending into valleys and ascending again on steep gradients, he has an estimate showing the cost, even then of grading the line, would be between $700,000 and $800,000. It is impossible it should cost only $438,000. From the end of the second hundred miles to Battleford, we have 377 miles. This is not any heavier on the whole. There are some more formidable bridges, but the line is further off for the carriage of the rails. I place that section at $21,000 per mile. Then from Battleford to Edmonton, it is reported by the engineers as thirteen miles very heavy; this I estimate at $60,000 a mile, being $10,000 less than the other heavy work east of Selkirk; forty-nine miles more of the line classed as moderately heavy, I put at $39,000 per mile; and seventy miles very moderate, at $25,000, with ninety-eight miles of light work, at $20,000 per mile, which makes for this section altogether, an average of $27,000 a mile. From Edmonton to the Summit, 256 miles, the road is divided in this way by the engineer: heavy, seventy-six miles; medium, sixty-three miles; light, 117 miles. I calculate the "heavy" at $60,000 per mile,—being $10,000 more than the cost of heavy work east of Selkirk; medium, at $40,000 per mile, and light, at $20,000 per mile, making in all $9,472,000, or an average of $37,000 per mile. Assuming the Pembina Branch to cost $1,500,000, this would make the entire cost of the road west of Lake Superior, including $1,440,000 Canada Central subsidy, and $100,000 Selkirk bridge, and $300,000 construction, engineering to be 1,946 miles, $89,002,000; while from Fort William to Nipissing, about 650 miles, at $50,000 a mile, making $32,500,000, or a total $121,500,000. It will be observed that if we apply the figures as I have applied them, that is, calculating the expenditure west of Red River as it occurred, from Lake Superior to Selkirk, that it would be impossible to obtain the same description of road as to gradients, curvatures and construction, for less amounts than I have estimated. I am sure I am within the line in stating these figures, and that it will be impossible to construct anything that can be called a railroad, nothing else than a mere tramway for the amount now given, as the hon. gentleman says, by the Chief Engineer. It is quite possible to have a very steep grade and enable an engine to climb that grade with a very light load. In some places, on the Alps for instance, or the White Mountains, there is over 300 feet to the mile, but it is good for nothing but a mere tourist traffic. The road on the American Pacific in one place is about 150 feet to the mile, for a short distance, but they have to keep additional engine power at such places. I pointed out, a few evenings ago, the extreme desirability of having good grades, not merely for the purpose of obtaining the advantages of the kind I have mentioned, but for cheapening the traffic to be carried over the road. On the Canada Southern, the most favourable road we have as to grades, they are able to carry over forty loaded cars, and on our own Intercolonial, where the steepest grade is about sixty feet, and there are many between that and forty, we are not able to take quite twenty. The hon. gentleman said he thought that any grades sufficient on the Grand Trunk or Great Western ought to be sufficient for the Pacific. But it was one of the most fatal mistakes ever committed to have such excessive grades on those roads. It has already cost both companies millions. It would have been better if they had at first expended a large amount to obtain reasonably good grades. The hon. the Minister of Railways thinks it matters little what grades we had west of Winnipeg; he thinks any will suffice for the traffic. I observe that the Chief Engineer, with his usual caution, has very carefully refrained from speaking of this road as the Pacific Railway at all; he speaks of it as a colonisation road, and it is only that. If we are to build a Pacific Railway, we had better do it. If we are merely to build a line that jumps up and down hill, possessing no regard to grades and curves, nor to the traffic to be carried, let the fact be understood. It will be quite impossible, with a road of that description, to take a pound of traffic from beyond our boundaries. The hon. member for Victoria, B.C., (Mr. DeCosmos) adverted to the trade of San Francisco, and the only reason he could find for advocating a good port in British Columbia was, that grain would be brought there by the Railway and seek to be carried round Cape Horn. It would be very much cheaper to take the grain of the prairies to the east instead of to the west. There is no land in British Columbia that could justify the most sanguine in ever expecting its farm produce to be exported to Britain. Up to the present it has not sustained itself in breadstuffs. It imports a very large amount from the western States, although some of the best of land is to be found in the delta of the Fraser. Still it has not been cultivated to such an extent as to supply their domestic wants. There is, therefore, no probability of any agricultural products ever being shipped from that Province to Britain. I might say no possibility.

MR. DECOSMOS: It shipped 150 tons of wheat to England last autumn; it went from my own district.

MR. MACKENZIE: There may be some change lately, but I know that up to this year there was not enough wheat grown in British Columbia to furnish flour for its people. I am glad there was a change lately.

MR. DECOSMOS: The agricultural, the lower portion of our Province, never devoted itself to growing corn; it never had mills to make flour; but under the changed condition of agricultural matters, the people are turning their attention to wheat-growing.

MR. MACKENZIE: The last Tables of Trade and Navigation show that the Province exported no breadstuffs, but imported between 4,000 and 5,000 barrels of flour. If there are private reports on the subject, we have not been furnished with them. My statement, then, taken from the public official information, was absolutely correct—that British Columbia, up to the 30th June last, exported no breadstuffs, but imported the amount stated. I propose to consider the proposal to build this road by the sale of lands. If the consent of this House is obtained to the Government proposition upon the faith of its obtaining the entire cost of the road, and a great deal more from the land sales, then hon. members will be deceived. I believe it is impossible to obtain the means in this way. I believe that in that vast western country there is an immense amount of the finest farming lands in the world. I believe that there, as in the Province of Ontario, there is an abundance of good land for an immense population, but I believe also that, as in Ontario, one-half the land is not suitable for cultivation. I believe that, while we have much rocky land in Ontario, much land that is covered by water or swamps and that never will be available, in the North-West also there are swamps and water, and a vast amount of arid soil, which can never be made productive. What we have to do is to ascertain to what extent these arid plains, these swamps and reaches of uncultivable lands, are to be found in the North-West. I have no doubt a considerable portion of the land in districts that are utterly unfit for cultivation, will be of greater or less use as pasture lands, which can be made available, though very little that can really be farms. And so with the North-West Territory: there is a considerable portion of land which we must make allowance for, that will be of some use as pasture land, though of no use for other agricultural purposes. Now, we have a map laid before us by the hon. gentleman, and he has the parts coloured brown, which are said to be arid or barren in what is called the prairie section. He told the House, in his speech, that he estimated the amount of fertile lands within the belt at 150,000,000 acres, of which amount he estimates 30,000,000 acres to be barren. Now, I have examined these spots, which he has coloured brown; I measured them roughly, not having drawing instruments in my possession, but I think I measured them tolerably accurately, and the House will be surprised to learn that there are considerably under 9,000,000 of acres, instead of 30,000,000, showing how utterly unreliable is this map as a source of information. The hon. gentleman can measure it in his own office at his leisure—those dark spots upon his favourite sun—and he will find that they cover very little of the arid plain he himself admits to exist. Now, I have read almost everything I could lay my hands on about that country—books of travellers, the notes of surveyors, and the productions of men who examined the country many years ago, before a Railway to the Pacific was spoken of or contemplated, and I find a wonderful concurrence of testimony as to the existence of a very large extent of desert and arid country. Archbishop Taché, who knows, perhaps, that country better than almost any one else, has the following in respect to it:—

“Everybody has heard of the great American desert, but all may not know that it extends into British possessions, passing the boundary at 100 west longitude, and 49 north latitude, then following a line more or less winding in a general north-westerly direction, passes still further towards the north, and bends again towards the northwest of 113 west longitude, and 52 north latitude, thus forming an area of at least 60,000 square miles. Here is a desert—an immense desert. It is not certainly moving sand, and quite dried up; but it is quite vain to think of forming considerable settlements upon it.”

I will not wait to give the Archbishop's description of the climate, except to say it is very severe. He estimates the prairie district cultivable lands at 60,000 square miles, equal to the desert country, or 38,400,000 acres of each, and adds that much of the good land “has not all the advantages attributed to it.” This is the opinion of Archbishop Taché. Mr. Fleming, quoting Mr. Macoun, Professor of Natural History at Belleville, and who has travelled over that country at the instance of the Government, in Sessional Paper, 1878, pages 89-90, points out that the entire quantity of arable land is about 80,000,000 acres. Sir William Palliser, in his travels in the North-West, arrives at precisely the same conclusion. He travelled over and surveyed a very large portion of the country, and gave us the only good map we have to this day. Colonel McLeod, who has been over the country, perhaps, more than any of our own strictly so-called officials, says:

“What is called the ‘barren lands’ of the United States extend into the North-West Territories, forming a triangle, of which, roughly speaking, the boundary line commencing forty miles from the mountains and extending to the Grand toteau of the Souris, forms the base. A line drawn from there to the elbow of the Saskatchewan, a little south of the 50th parallel and north-west of Fort Walsh, a side; and a line drawn from the last-mentioned point to the place of beginning, the other side.”

This gives nearly 30,000,000 of acres; but very much of the arid or barren lands extends north far beyond the 50th parallel, some of it beyond the 52nd parallel. Now, this belt that Colonel McLeod describes, covers in itself, as I have said, an area of something well on to 30,000,000 acres. It is not, of course, entirely desert, because there are patches, like an oasis in the desert, here and there, showing some signs of fertility and where some settlement is possible. Mr. Marcus Smith, in the very latest paper we have from him, speaks in these general terms of another district through which the railway is made to pass from Livingston westward to the Pembina River, on the line of Railway, not more than one-half of the lands are fit for cultivation. This is a very strong expression of opinion from the Assistant Chief Engineer, who has passed over this country on several occasions, and who, from his own reports, and from the reports of his officers, must have a pretty intimate knowledge of the country. Now I propose to give, from official papers, a brief description of the whole of this tract of country, where the arid land is said to prevail. Hon. gentlemen who have the Paper 43, of 1879, will find the passages I propose to read, commencing at the 100° west longitude, some little distance west of Manitoba. [The hon. gentleman then read a series of extracts from the Sessional Papers of 1879, being Official Reports from Engineers, Surveyors, and others, to show the probable extent of the barren lands, showing that they extended north of the line of Railway in some places, and that saline and brackish lakes were to be found in many places, the desert sage in others, and alkaline dust in others.] I will not trouble the House with reading any more of these extracts. It will be observed, from what I have read, that the portion of country which exists so extensively in the western States, which makes Montana almost uninhabitable, which makes Nevada unhealthy and unproductive, which makes a great portion of Dakota unsuitable for agriculture, enters our North-West Territory, a little west of 100° west longitude, and gradually increases as it ascends northward and westward, extending northward over the land lying between the two branches of the Saskatchewan, almost to the junction of the rivers, and thence south-westward, to the boundary line near the mountains. This tract may be described as an arid, desert country, with occasional patches of good soil, of considerable extent and containing lands suitable for producing grasses. The quantity of good soil is variously estimated at from 38,000,000 acres to 60,000,000. It is impossible, after examining the official reports, to avoid coming to the conclusion, that something less than half the entire area of the land is fertile; and, after deducting from the lands available for sale to settlers, all Hudson's Bay lands, free grants, Indian reserves, school lands, etc., it will be found that the hon. gentleman's calculations, as to the money to be realised from these lands, will be very wide of the mark. We know when we come to the Pembina River, we partially arrive at the end of the fertile lands. Mr. Smith says: a farm may be obtained here and there, west of that to the British Columbian boundary line. There is no doubt that there is as yet much that is unknown respecting the country I have so feebly endeavoured to describe, and we can only hope that further discoveries will prove that there are more valuable lands there than we now know of; but we can only make our calculations on what is known. From the description given, it will be found that the projected line passes through the land described as rich land, through the first two hundred miles west of Selkirk. Some hon. gentlemen in the House insisted always that the land on the located line, from Selkirk to Livingston, was a very wet country, with deep morasses, and that the telegraph poles sank deeply into the soil. It is undeniable that, until that country is drained, which borders on Lakes Manitoba and Winnipegosis, a large portion of the soil will not be available for settlement, although it may produce very good grasses or pastures. We have to deduct from the present availability of the lands, a considerable portion of what is even good soil, besides having to deduct the whole area of the lakes and rivers; and taking that into account, together with the description of soil given we necessarily—with every desire to come to a favourable conclusion—can come to no other conclusion, that not more than one-half can be counted available for settlement, even if it reaches that. Having thus satisfied myself—in deed, I do not require any additional information to satisfy myself—on this point, that it is impossible for the Government to build the road from the produce of the lands on the North-West, I have to consider what is the best course to be pursued. I have always held that whatever revenue is realised from the lands, will be absorbed, mainly in settlement and Governmental expenses, and that the money must be contributed by the people of Canada, for the building of this Railway; that, therefore, any extravagant expenditure would simply involve us in an amount of debt such as we cannot venture to carry. The United States, at the present moment, notwithstanding their heavy debt, are in a better position than we are.

MR. PLUMB: Hear, hear.

MR. MACKENZIE: I am glad to find that the hon. member for Niagara (Mr. Plumb) agrees with me in that. In the year 1865, the actual amount of that debt, less cash in the Treasury, was 27,056 millions of dollars. In that year their debt represented an average amount per head of $78.75, while the interest on the debt was at the rate of $4.29 per head. In 1879 the debt itself was reduced, less cash in the Treasury, to something under $2,000,000,000, while, by the increase of the population, and the decrease of the debt, the amount per capita was only $40.42, and the interest, $1.69 per head. We have now $1.75 per head to pay for interest on our debt every year, and it is quite evident, when we pay one-fifth of the entire value of the goods we consumed in taxes, that we were not in a position to bear further taxation, and if the work were continued at the rate proposed by the Government, there will be no escape from further and immediate taxation. The hon. the Finance Minister has stated that he can get over this year by using the cash balances in his hands to the extent of six millions, and by issuing a certain amount of paper money. I have no confidence that the hon. gentleman will be able to float so large an amount as eight millions, floated more than what is now in circulation, and though he will get some aid from the banks, it must be borne in mind that that amount is obtained at the expense of the general business of the country. I have no hesitation in cordially agreeing with the proposition submitted by the hon. member for West Durham, because it involves no departure from the line we have adopted all along. We determined from the very first that we would limit and bind the expenditure by the capacity of the country to pay without imposing additional taxation. I have shown that we have expended money to the extent of nearly nine millions over works which, by the Terms of Union, should have been built before now, and I have no hesitation in asking those who were interested in further expenditure upon this Railway, at the present time, to adopt the course that has been adopted in Ontario and Quebec, and wait patiently until circumstances enables us to prosecute the work. I believe that when the time comes to go on with the work in British Columbia, the first section to which money should be applied is that which the Government has recently placed under contract, because it will connect two systems of navigation, inland and seaward. The hon. gentlemen, of course, repudiate any intention of availing themselves of the water-stretches, but while we denounced one for suggesting that they were available in the east, he has himself favoured such a connecting link in the west. The hon. gentlemen opposite are good enough to charge the Opposition with lack of patriotism, lack of loyalty, and lack of devotion to the Empire. This is peculiarly noticeable in the hon. the Minister of Railways, who, with his friends, has frequently charged us, not only with being unpatriotic in the extreme, but even disloyal to the Throne. I attach very little importance to these assertions; it is an old trick of hon. gentlemen opposite, but I protest against any imputations of that kind. We are as much interested in the prosperity of this country as hon. gentlemen opposite. Our interests are all centred here, and anything that administers to the prosperity of the country administers to our own prosperity. Hon. gentlemen opposite, during the whole term of the late Administration, never ceased to accuse us of something like lack of patriotism. They never ceased to paint, in the blackest colours, the state of the country, and to represent that people were leaving it by thousands. It has been shown that during their term fewer people have left the country than during previous years, and that when they ceased to administer the affairs of the country, the exodus to the United States increased again. I will not follow the example of the hon. gentlemen opposite, and say that they wholly caused this state of things, but I will say this: that their commercial policy, their taxation policy, and their imprudent expenditures, are all at this moment driving people out of the country at a speedier rate than they ever left this country before.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: To go to a country with higher taxation.
