WITHIN THEIR GATES.

Hale, hoped to be a clerg but he had to work his w harhous as one of themselve The summer sun blases down hotly enough upon the dwellers in cities, upon the inhabitants of bare, low-lying countries. But far, away in the cool regions that lie under the friendly shadow of those hills, that are so grand, and so remote and unfrequented that they hardly seem to belong to the rest of our island, all is freshness and delight. The roads which traverse this region are mostly good; and, whether flecked by the shadows of waving woods, or sweeping past orchards where the fruit trees stand waist-deep in lucuriant grass, or in front of the old-fashioned country houses, are always pleasant highways for the traveller.

Among one of these highways, on a summer evening when the air seemed full of golden serently, when the shadows or and to assure that the should "pull through golden serently, when the shadows over and to assure that the should "pull through golden serently, when the shadows were long."

These few days proved of pleasant highways for the traveller.

Among one of these highways, on a summer evening when the air seemed full of golden serenity, when the shadows were long and the day near its close, came a man who did not belong to any holiday class of traveller. He was a pedestrian of jaded appearance, whose dress we covered with dust, and whose lagging step proved that he had travelled long and far, and he hore in his hand a small black valise. Despite this apparent failigne, however, and notwithstanding that he was plainly little used to hardship, he kept steadily on his way, glancing ravely to the right or left, but firing his gase on the road before him and plodding steadily forward. He was young, six or seven and twenty, perhaps; and he evidently belonged to the better classes, for gentleman" was written on every look and movement. His dark face, of remarkably fine, clear outline, his lithe, tall, slender figure, his delicate hand and shapely foot, attested this face in a manner which could not be doubted or denied. He wore nearly gone and as he walked his lips, were compressed rigidly, giving an expression of resolution, of defiant determination, to his face.

The sun was very nearly gone when he came to a fork in the highway where no lens than three roads diverged towards widely different points. Having peaned and looked yairly around for any trace of a sign-post or milestone to direct his steps, he ast down at the foot of a large tree with an air of exhaustion.

"There's nothing for it but to wait until somebody comes by who can direct me," he said to himself. "And I don't think it need push on so very exhaustingly," he added. "Surely this place is remote enough. It seems to be the fag-end of a decolate wilderness."

The tree stood on the strip of green that bordered the highway. He up th his back

The tree stood on the strip of green that bordered the highway. He put his back against the trunk, and in a for minutes was asleep from sheer weariness.

An hour later he still slept—doubled up now in a curious position, with his heed on the mose-cushioned root of the tree—when the stillness of the road was broken by the roll of wheels and the tramp of a horse's feet. The sounds might have been heard for a minute or two before the cause of them appeared. Then a white-faced horse came into sight, proceeding at a sedate trot, and drawing a large gig, in which a middle aged man and a young woman were seated. The former looked like a substantial farmer; no doubt was one; he had a strongly-marked, intelligent face and iron-gray hair. The girl was pretty and blooming, plain in dress, lady-like in appearance, very quiet in manner. She had untied her bonnet, so warm was the evening and ast with an elhow on the wing of the gig, and one dark-gloved hand pressing her face thoughtfully.

In the apperanch gloom of the evening meither of them observed the dark object under the trees, with his value lying beside him; but the horse, passing close to it, chose to be startled. He shied, and darted off sideways across the road.

"Whos !—Steady !—What is the matter with you, Billy?" crade the farmer, pulling shamply at the reins.

"Some one is lying down there," whisper-
